

Exhibit C - Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel lobbying

PICTURES - Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel with Bill and Hillary Clinton, and with the King of Morocco (and his brother)	2
ARTICLES - Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel's involvement with Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign	4
ARTICLE - Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel's activities with his homosexual constituency to whom he is beholden	14
EMAILS - Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel's emails to Hillary Clinton (on behalf of the King of Morocco)	16
DOCUMENTS - Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel's Foreign Agent Registration Act documents and disclosures (and non-disclosures he is illegally withholding)	25
EMAILS - Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel's lobbying emails and activities undertaken on behalf of the King of Morocco	95

Edward M. Gabriel with President and Secretary Clinton

Edward M. Gabriel and the Royal Family

Edward M. Gabriel with King Mohamed VI of Morocco

Copyright © 2006, Luke Thomas

Edward M. Gabriel with Moulay Rachid of Morocco

<http://freebeacon.com/politics/clintons-man-from-morocco/>

Clinton's Man in Morocco: Clinton campaign fails to disclose bundler actively lobbying for Morocco

BY: Brent Scher | July 17, 2015 5:00 pm

Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign failed to list a registered lobbyist for Morocco in its legally required disclosure of all bundled fundraising done by lobbyists, according to a Washington Free Beacon analysis. Edward Gabriel, who was named U.S. Ambassador to Morocco by former President Bill Clinton in 1997, now runs the Gabriel Company, a Washington, D.C., lobbying firm that has had the government of Morocco as a client since 2002 and has been paid more than \$3.7 million by the nation since that point. Though Gabriel appeared on a list posted to the Clinton campaign website on Wednesday afternoon of all the bundlers that have raised over $100,000, his name is absent from documents filed to the Federal Election Commission listing all the other registered lobbyists that have been fundraising for the campaign. All contributions bundled by registered lobbyists must be disclosed to the FEC each quarter.

352 Active Registrants as of 07/17/2015 Back to Quick Search

Number of Active Registrants as of 07/17/2015 = 352

Search: Go Actions

Row text contains 'Gabriel Company'

Registrant	Registration #	Registration Date	Business Name
View Gabriel Company, LLC	5523	10/11/2002

1 - 1 of 1

A search conducted on Friday afternoon using the Foreign Agents Registration Act (FARA) database found that the Gabriel Company is still an active registrant. Edward Gabriel signed its most recently filed continuation. FARA requires all groups hired to lobby on behalf of a foreign government to register with the Justice Department.

Gabriel was one of the many listed members of Clinton's National Finance Committee that had raised over $100,000 for the campaign. He also contributed to the Clinton Foundation, to which he has contributed as recently as 2014 and given between \$100,001 and \$250,000. Although the fact that Gabriel has been fundraising for the campaign was disclosed through her campaign website provided list, significantly less information is made available on that list than would be made available through the FEC filing. The list of "Hillblazers," as the campaign has dubbed them, only provides a name and a city of residence without disclosing any information about how much each has raised. Each entry on the FEC filing of lobbyist bundlers, however, is required to include name, address, employer, and the exact amount that has been raised. Gabriel is not Clinton's only bundler that is registered to lobby for foreign governments. It was reported on Thursday by BuzzFeed's Andrew Kaczynski that two of Clinton's listed bundlers, Matthew Bernstein and John Merrigan of DLA Piper, are also both registered to lobby for foreign governments. Bernstein has lobbied for the United Arab Emirates and the German State of Rheinland-Pfalz, while Merrigan is registered to lobby for the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia. Both Bernstein and Merrigan are listed on Clinton's official FEC disclosure. The Clinton-Gabriel relationship extends to before he was named ambassador in 1997. Gabriel was a donor to Bill Clinton's 1996 presidential campaign and maxed out his contributions to Hillary Clinton's failed presidential campaign in 2008. Money from Morocco has flowed toward the Clintons as well. On the day that Clinton announced her current presidential campaign, it was reported that the Clinton Foundation would be paid at least $1 million to hold a May event in Marrakech. The event was paid for by OCP, the state-owned energy company that is despised by many in Morocco. "Hillary Clinton sold her soul when they accepted that money," a former miner for the company told Politico's Ken Vogel in Morocco. "We are concerned that if Hillary Clinton wins the presidency of the United States of America, she will take the side of Moroccans even more." The Clinton campaign did not respond to a request for comment. This entry was posted in Politics and tagged 2016 Election, Hillary Clinton. Bookmark the permalink.

Brent Scher Email Brent | Full Bio | RSS

Brent Scher is a staff writer for the Washington Free Beacon. He graduated from the University of Virginia, where he studied foreign affairs and politics.

Morocco lobbyist just one of several campaign bundlers Hillary hasn't reported to the FEC

Posted on July 21, 2015 by Personal Liberty News Desk

Hillary Clinton's campaign website lists a longtime family advocate and lobbyist for the nation of Morocco among its list of fundraisers, but the Clinton campaign hasn't disclosed that fact to the Federal Election Commission. A recent analysis of Clinton's FEC filings, done by The Washington Free Beacon, reveals the campaign failed to disclose specific contributions made by Edward Gabriel, a former Bill Clinton-nominated ambassador to Morocco who currently heads a lobbying firm that has, to date, received $3.7 million in payments from the Moroccan government. Candidates who accept funds from registered lobbyists, the Beacon notes, are required each quarter to disclose any contributions those lobbyists make to their campaigns. But the Clinton campaign hasn't done that in Gabriel's case. And, in a parallel with the Clinton Foundation's practice of trading U.S. influence for foreign-government dollars, Hillary's presidential campaign has ties with other bundlers who also work as lobbyists for foreign governments. From the report:

Gabriel is not Clinton's only bundler that is registered to lobby for foreign governments. It was reported on Thursday by BuzzFeed's Andrew Kaczynski that two of Clinton's listed bundlers, Matthew Bernstein and John Merrigan of DLA Piper, are also both registered to lobby for foreign governments. Bernstein has lobbied for the United Arab Emirates and the German State of Rheinland-Pfalz, while Merrigan is registered to lobby for the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia.

At least in those two instances, the Clinton campaign has reported those contributions to the FEC.

Read the full story here.

Clinton Campaign Appoints Ambassador Edward Gabriel as Advisor to Arab American Outreach Efforts

By Nisreen Eadeh/Staff Writer | Posted on: Aug 31, 2016

Democratic presidential nominee, Secretary Hillary Clinton, has developed an ethnic outreach effort to gain votes from various groups, including Arab Americans. Advising her campaign in Arab American outreach is Edward Gabriel, the former U.S. Ambassador to Morocco. Mr. Gabriel has been an active leader in the Arab American community for many years. He was the U.S. Ambassador to Morocco during President Bill Clinton's administration, where he developed a close friendship with Mrs. Clinton. He has been a Middle East Policy Advisor in the last three administrations, and is currently serving in leadership positions at the Arab American Institute and the American Task Force for Lebanon. Mr. Gabriel is also involved in non-profit efforts. He is the co-chair of two American schools in Morocco and works often with ACCESS and the Arab American National Museum. For his part, Mr. Gabriel is conducting outreach in Michigan, Virginia, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, but the campaign hopes to reach Arab Americans in all 50 states. "There's a great effort by Hillary and the campaign to make sure Arab Americans are a vital part of this targeted outreach effort," Mr. Gabriel told Arab America. "Hillary's theme is stronger together and that theme is across the board in this plan to reach Arab Americans. We are casting a wide net to encourage as many people as possible to get excited about Hillary and to get to know her." Mr. Gabriel and other advisors have set up many initiatives to reach Arab Americans. In the works are small group meetings of leaders from each state, an "Arab American Day for Hillary" in Michigan, phone banking, social media outreach, and visiting top cities to meet with influential community members. The former ambassador's plans have two main goals. "One is to make sure Arab Americans turn out and vote for Clinton and get in volunteer roles. The second thing I hope to achieve is showing a strong Arab American presence in electing her as president. That way we deserve a seat at the table when it comes to solving domestic issues," said Mr. Gabriel. One of the main domestic issues Mr. Gabriel hopes to see addressed are Arab American civil liberties. Since 9/11, Arab Americans have been disproportionately targeted in surveillance, racial profiling, and unchecked terrorist watch lists, hindering the community's civil rights. Mr. Gabriel believes "Hillary is the best candidate in either party when it comes to protecting and caring for the civil liberties of Arab Americans. When it comes to Donald Trump, it's not even a contest." When asked about how Arab Americans can overcome Clinton's stance on Israel – an issue that prevents many in the community from supporting the candidate – Mr. Gabriel said that he trusts her to earn the confidence of Israelis and Palestinians to work together. "I can say unequivocally that she cares about all people in the Middle East... She was the first to call for a two-state solution, which has now become the official policy of the United States," recalled Mr. Gabriel. "I've watched her and I've listened to her in [the peace process] and I believe she's taken the exact approach necessary to gain the trust of the parties to move forward," he added. Although Mr. Gabriel was not in the position to discuss policy opinions on behalf of the campaign, his faith in Hillary Clinton is sure to motivate other Arab American voters in time for the election. Other prominent Arab Americans included in the community outreach efforts are Jim Zogby, President of the Arab American Institute in Washington, DC; Fay Beydoun, Executive Director of the American Arab Chamber of Commerce in Dearborn, MI; and Saba Shami, founder of the New Dominion Political Action Committee for Arab Americans in Virginia. In order for Arab Americans to see their concerns addressed by political leaders, they must get involved. "We have a real seat at the table with this outreach plan," said Mr. Gabriel. "She cares a great deal about the community and hearing our voices, which is why our interests are best served by Hillary Clinton."

Qatar Tribune

US Diplomat Expects Clinton to Win at Least 300 Votes in Electoral College

Qatar Tribune | November 6th, 2016

Washington, (Qatar News Agency) - Advisor to Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton US diplomat Edward Gabriel has expected that she will win at least 300 votes of the electoral college in the presidential elections just 2% to 4% at the level of national popular vote.

He pointed out that a candidate needs at least 270 electoral votes, a majority of the 538 that are divided among the 50 US states.

Speaking to Qatar News Agency (QNA), Gabriel said that what the observers must carefully pay attention to on Tuesday is the result of the vote in Pennsylvania, adding that if Hillary Clinton wins in this state, she will guarantee her victory in the presidential elections.

Despite the optimism, the challenge is to mobilize the largest number of voters as the only factor to decide the result of the elections in favor of Clinton, Gabriel told QNA.

Gabriel, the former US ambassador in Morocco, said that Arab American voters' clear support to Hillary Clinton has reached a considerable level in this election, as two-thirds of these voters support Clinton, while only one-third of them support Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump, especially in Michigan, Ohio and North Virginia.

He added that there is a wide acceptance for Clinton and her electoral program among Arab-American and Muslim communities, which differs from her counterpart Trump, especially with regard of defending the rights of American Muslims and her plans for immigration laws as well as her understanding, as a former secretary of state, of the Middle East's issues, making her the closest and favorite among Arab and Muslim communities in these elections.

Regarding the impact of Clinton's emails issue, which the US Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) reopened its investigation into last week, Gabriel said that reopening the investigations certainly affected Clinton's campaign, as her lead ratio in national polls retreated, but because there were no new results in the investigation her ratio returned to rise in the previous two days.

In response to talks about a possibility of an outbreak of violence if Trump loses, Clinton campaign's advisor said he fully believes in the centrality of the US administration of the state that are not affected by any attempts of riots or external influences.

The American security devices are able to protect the security and stability and to face all threats of riots, violence or even possible external cyber-attacks, he added, stressing that the elections and the voters will be under the protection of the American security devices, which will oversee and secure the electoral process.

In his remarks to QNA, Gabriel said it's time for a woman to be the next US president after nearly 200 years.

(QNA)

AMBASSADOR EDWARD GABRIEL

AMERICAN TASK FORCE FOR LEBANON PRESIDENT AT THE FOREFRONT OF DIPLOMACY

The Honorable Edward M. Gabriel talks about his up-by-the-bootstraps life with HOME — telling a story of appreciation for his Lebanese heritage, patriotism for his country and hope for stronger U.S.-Lebanese relations.

“

The next generation has to take the reins from us, and make a difference in terms of what we feel is in America's and Lebanon's best interest.

<http://www.thegabrielco.com/>
<http://www.atfl.org/>

Ambassador Edward Gabriel, a mover and shaker in American foreign policy, is proud of his humble beginnings. “Not many shoeshine boys grow up to be ambassadors,” he said recently in a Skype interview from his office at The Gabriel Company in Washington, D.C. His consultancy serves U.S. businesses seeking to invest in the Middle East and North Africa. Silver wisps above his ears gave a look of distinction to his otherwise dark hair; his narrow face filled with a broad smile. “Only in America,” he exclaimed. “I am proud of the fact that from a modest background, I was able to become a policymaker in my country and on its behalf overseas.”

Gabriel was appointed by President Bill Clinton as the U.S. Ambassador to the Kingdom of Morocco and served from November 1997 – March 2001. He is proud that, during his tenure, the Embassy won recognition for having the top strategic plan of all the U.S. embassies in the world. “We brought the entire embassy together — Americans and local hires — to develop a long-term strategic vision and we integrated all the federal agencies together in pursuit of that vision.”

More important, he said, was his role in bringing Morocco closer to the U.S. through strengthening commercial relations, educational and cultural exchanges, and security and military cooperation. That post may have been the pinnacle of his career, but it is certainly not the only place his influence is felt.

He continues to be on the front lines of diplomacy in the Middle East as the president and CEO of the American Task Force for Lebanon — meeting in September with Lebanon’s President Michel Aoun as the head of an ATFL delegation, aiming to improve U.S.–Lebanese relations. He advised Hillary Clinton on Arab-American relations during her presidential campaign, and traveled to Syria extensively, prior to the conflict there, as an advisor to the U.S. government, meeting with Syrian President Bashar Assad on multiple occasions.

His opinions are found in The Washington Post, The New York

Times, The Huffington Post and The Hill, a U.S. political news site read by government insiders. A study he chaired on America’s post-Cold War relations with the Arab world has become a reference guide on the changing policies towards the Middle East.

He’s a popular guest lecturer at top universities across the U.S., including Harvard, Princeton, Cornell, St. Lawrence, Yale and Stanford. And, of course, he is a favorite at his alma mater, Gannon University in Erie, Pennsylvania. Gabriel recently spoke at MOVE 2017, an Arab-American summit called to exchange ideas about a wide range of issues impacting Arab Americans. “They wanted to know how I got involved in the world of policy,” he said, referring to his decades in public service.

““

Thank God we have an organization of prominent Lebanese Americans who care about their country of origin, can rally together and walk into the White House, the State Department and the halls of Congress, and make a difference.

He has an extensive background in international affairs, having convened multilateral policy forums on critical global concerns, including international energy, counterterrorism and regional security, and has been involved in matters of Russian and European nuclear nonproliferation.

Gabriel has served as a Visiting Fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a member of the Global Advisory Board of George Washington University, the Tangier American Legation Museum and the Casablanca American School. He is chairman of the Moroccan American Center (which works to strengthen U.S.-Moroccan political, business, cultural and security relationships) and co-chairman of the American Schools of Tangier and Marrakech. He is a member of the boards of AMIDEAST, the Arab American National Museum, the Lebanese American University (newly appointed), The Keystone Policy Center, a non-profit that works to influence public policy on “our society’s most challenging environmental, energy and public health problems,” and — the list goes on!

African Intelligence, a website that covers business and political news, ran a banner headline in late November that read, “Top Morocco PR Man Ed Gabriel Retires.” As if!

Actually — at 67, Gabriel stepped down as a consultant to the Kingdom of Morocco, but he shows no signs of retiring. He’s engaged in an impressive career that combines his passion for policy and his “Phoenician entrepreneurial gene,” another “only-in-America” experience, he said. “There are not many places in the world where you can combine both the public and private sectors into one’s career.”

Whether in the public, private or non-profit sectors, “your value system is most important,” said Gabriel. “I have found that the most important ingredient to success, whether in business or diplomacy, is being able to develop trust and confidence with your interlocutor. It doesn’t matter if you’re pitching a foreign leader or pitching a new client, trust and confidence always come first.”

Lebanese roots

Gabriel’s Lebanese roots run deep. With the Lebanese-American equivalent to coming over on the Mayflower, the family traces its lineage back to the first Lebanese person to immigrate to the U.S. — a Bishelany who settled in Boston in 1854. Gabriel’s father’s real name was Michel John Gabriel Bishelany. “At Ellis Island, the name Bishelany was removed and my father then became Michael John Gabriel.” The family’s name has been Gabriel ever since.

Ambassador Gabriel with President and Secretary Clinton

Ambassador Gabriel in Antarctica

The Word Game

To gain some insight into how Ambassador Edward Gabriel thinks, HOME asked him to play a word association game with us. We mentioned a word and he responded with the first thing that came to mind.

Diplomacy

The skill to get people to understand your point of view, while you are understanding their point of view.

Social change

Moving forward.

Citizenship

Giving back to one's country.

Gender equality

We need more of it. How can our country ever succeed if it holds back half the population?

Reform

We need it. As much as Americans think we are No. 1 in all aspects, we are not. We need reform ourselves and need to make sure our values are exhibited at the same time.

Cultural diplomacy

It is important, especially exchange programs. When people visit America, they like America; when they don't, they don't. Polls show that.

Refugees

We have to do something about it. Americans are so far removed, they don't understand how much pressure will be on the rest of the world and America if we don't address it now.

Peacemaking

One of the greatest virtues that could ever be bestowed on an individual as his or her responsibility. I think of George Mitchell when I say that.

Historically, the Bishelany family was known for its work in the ancient silk industry in the Metn. Gabriel's immediate family immigrated in several waves in the early 1900s, with Gabriel's father being the last to arrive, hailing from Salima, Lebanon, in 1910.

“

Everybody in this country has been touched by a Lebanese.

The family became quite prosperous — “everyone except my father,” Gabriel said. His relatives consider Bishop Robert Shaheen, a grandson of Gabriel's father's sister, the most successful member of the family. Shaheen was the head of the Maronite Church in America. “I soon discovered that although becoming an ambassador is an impressive and high honor, in my family, a bishop trumps an ambassador.”

Gabriel's patriotism may have come from his father. “I think my father's most satisfying work was his years in military service,” said Gabriel. “He lied about his age when he was too young to serve in World War I and again when he was too old to serve in World War II.”

Gabriel said his father was “very politically opinionated. A man of little means — a taxi cab driver, janitor, menial jobs — but he really cared about politics. I remember him always typing letters expressing his views to his representatives in Congress.”

He was especially concerned about injustices towards blacks and Native

Americans. “His English language was not great, so he filled his commentary with colorful curse words. It was well known in our family that he was quite animated in his feelings about political situations, which was quite entertaining. He was very socially conscious,” said Gabriel. “That really made an impression on me.”

Gabriel's mother was born in Olean, New York. Her parents immigrated from Hasbaya el-Metn in 1895. Gabriel says his mother was “my best friend.”

In an oral history of Gabriel produced by the U.S. State Department, he said of his mother, “She taught me most of life's lessons: the importance of education — she never doubted that my sister and I would be the first in our family to go to college; that to get a good job and the opportunity to work hard was part of the American dream.” She also had the gift of humor, and the little Arabic he speaks came from listening to her.

Yet, in his early childhood, Gabriel didn't realize he was Lebanese. “People called us ‘Turks’ or ‘Syrians,’” he said.

Then, in the 1950s, “The Danny Thomas Show” became the most popular thing on TV and put Lebanese Americans on the map. “We became Lebanese with that show.”

“In the 1970s, with the Arab oil embargo, I became more politically knowledgeable about the Middle East. I was in my 20s, and there was a lot of political activity regarding the region at that time,” he said.

Gabriel visited Lebanon for the first time in 1994, when he was 44. “I felt at HOME as soon as we landed,” he recalled. “I'm very Lebanese. I took a DNA test that showed I'm 99.3 percent Lebanese/Middle Eastern.” He has continued visiting Lebanon every year since, and is currently going twice a year in official capacities as the head of the American Task Force for Lebanon and an LAU board member.

Gabriel's Lebanese heritage shows in “the strong connection to HOME and to parents; hospitality and sense of charitable giving, and opening your HOME to people — these are all very Lebanese,” he said.

Up by the bootstraps

The American expression “to pull one's self up by the bootstraps” means to succeed through your own efforts and abilities. That's just what Gabriel, his mother and his sister, who was four years his elder, had to do.

“

Lebanese Americans need to give time, money and brain power.

When Gabriel was 7, his father died, leaving nothing financially for the family. “A cab driver who dies at the age of 57 — you can imagine how little we had, and my mom was left with two small children and her job as a clerk in a department store that she kept until she retired.”

“I also went to work when I was 10 years old, peddling papers. I lied about my age since the minimum age was 11,” Gabriel recalled in the oral history. Later, he

Ambassador Gabriel with Olympian skiers Phil and Steve Mahre

Ambassador Gabriel with Patriarch Cardinal Bechara Boutros al-Rahi

Ambassador Gabriel leads a delegation of Arab Americans in discussions with King Abdullah of Jordan worked his way through college in a construction job, digging ditches. Yet, he doesn't remember those days as particularly difficult, he told HOME.

Courtesy of The American Task Force for Lebanon

"The three of us lived in a community that was very caring," he said. Gabriel grew up in Olean, a small town in the Allegheny Mountains in upstate New York. "We could stay out until all hours of the night without worrying our parents. If we got in trouble, the police would bring us HOME to face the consequences. It was a good life, a memorable life, an easy life in many ways."

Gabriel is still in touch with a dozen of his grade school friends. "It tells you something," he said. Just like in a small village in Lebanon, you stay connected.

"The community was a mix of Lebanese, Irish, Germans, Italians and Poles. Olean was 80 percent Catholic, and everybody had their church. We went to the Maronite church. St. Joseph Grade School was connected to the church. The Catholic Maronite Church was a very big part of my growing up," he said.

"Small-town America — a place where we wandered beyond our neighborhood without fear, where we could go Christmas caroling for charity donations and people would open their HOMES to us, where in the worst winter weather, we would be sledding on the high school hill across the street from my house. It was a great place to grow up."

Thirty-four years ago, Gabriel married "an Irish woman, Kathleen Mary Linehan, from South Boston," who, like Gabriel, is a hard-working professional.

Hopes for U.S.-Lebanese relations
Gabriel is pleased to have taken the reins of the American Task Force for Lebanon "at a time when it is so badly needed. I think we have increased the impact ATFL has had in Washington, D.C.," he said. "Thank God we have an organization of prominent Lebanese Americans who care about their country of origin, can rally together and walk into the White House, the State Department and the halls of Congress, and make a difference in terms of what we feel is in America's and Lebanon's best interest."

Still there is much work to be done, he said. "I feel strongly that America has to better understand Lebanon. Unfortunately, the press of the last few decades has painted the wrong picture of Lebanon to the average American, who doesn't really know the Middle East.

““”

Not many shoeshine boys grow up to be ambassadors — only in America!

"Lebanese Americans make up one of the most successful subgroups of our population," said Gabriel. "Almost everybody in this country has been touched by a Lebanese." They have Lebanese-American neighbors, teachers, community leaders and friends "who positively affected the popular perception of the Lebanese here in America. It's been drowned out in the last few years.

"It is in America's interest to support Lebanon's security and to make sure there are strong financial institutions, like the banking system, to ensure a vibrant economy."

And Americans can learn from Lebanon. "Lebanon is a country of diverse religions where the people live with respect for each other. We should learn from them and foster the exchange of ideas in religions. The Abrahamic faiths are very much alike. How can we make Americans understand — whether Muslim, Druse, Shite, Sunni, or various forms of Christianity, we all have the same values?"

One answer is Lebanese Americans themselves, said Gabriel. "They are the secret weapon of policy making in America. I hear heads of other countries say that they wish their people who are now citizens in America would care as much as Lebanese Americans."

The next generation of Lebanese Americans needs to step up

"We need to educate young Lebanese Americans on the political process and encourage them to be involved in the community and the country they are living in," said Gabriel.

"They can't just complain. Lebanese Americans need to participate in the Task Force and similar organizations, to give time, money and brain power. They need to step up and say, 'we believe in what you do and will join with you.'

"My generation of Lebanese Americans really cared about our country," he said. "The next generation has to take the reins from us."

Photo by melissagrimesguynography.com

- Gabriel's Mentors
Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel credits mentors, both famous and obscure, who gave him inspiration, encouragement and support along his amazing journey.
- The Honorable George Mitchell – U.S. diplomat and Senate majority leader, chairman of The Walt Disney Company, a role model for rising from poverty.
 - Ed Stayer - his supervisor on a construction job, "who taught me to work hard."
 - Charles Bennett – his college economics professor, "who taught me about socioeconomic policy and President Johnson's War on Poverty, which led me to a long career in government and public policy."
 - Ben Wiley – Executive director of the Greater Erie Community Action Committee, his employer and a black leader in the community, who "was bigger than life to me. He was a lifelong mentor."
 - Hazel O'Leary – the Secretary of Energy, "who took me under her wing."
 - President Bill Clinton and Secretary Hillary Clinton – under whom Gabriel worked in several capacities; President Clinton appointed Gabriel as Ambassador to Morocco.
- "And I could go on," Gabriel said.

Interview

Adviser to Clinton campaign says Arab-American presidency 'will happen soon'

Rasha Ellass

Washington

Edward Gabriel has known the Clintons for more than 25 years, having served as president Bill Clinton's ambassador to Morocco from 1997-2001. Today, the son of Lebanese immigrants is advising Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign on outreach to Arab Americans. Gabriel is also president and chief executive officer of the American Task Force for Lebanon (ATFL).

Gabriel said in an interview that he supports Hillary Clinton because "we want to make sure that our civil liberties are protected. This goes for all Americans, and especially Arab Americans and Muslims, and Clinton exhibited this with her defence of Muslims and Mr Khan."

Gabriel was referring to Khizr Khan, a Muslim American whose son was killed in the Iraq war. Khan delivered a moving speech at the Democratic National Convention, during which he questioned whether Republican nominee Donald Trump had read the US Constitution and criticised Trump's comments about immigration, minorities, women and judges.

Trump responded by implying that Khan's wife, Ghazala, who stood by her husband throughout the speech, was "maybe not allowed to speak", invoking the stereotype of oppressed Muslim women.

Trump's comments sparked controversy and even fellow Republicans rebuked him.

For Gabriel, who proudly identifies as an Arab American, this is personal. He recalls his early childhood in a small town in upstate New York as the quintessentially American experience: His family quickly became part of the fabric of their community but not without enduring the provincial racism that many immigrants experience.

"I was called a Turk or a Jew – neither term intended as a compliment – and a 'camel jockey' and the n-word," he said.

However, he had an identical education and upbringing to many of his peers. "Same schooling, except our bread was round," he recalled.

Lebanon is one of the issues near to Gabriel's heart, especially in his capacity as head of ATFL, an advocacy group that aims to foster relations between the United States and Lebanon.

Since 2006, the United States has provided the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) with more than $1 billion in materiel and training. Gabriel said this support should deepen, despite opposition in Congress concerned about members of Hezbollah serving in the LAF.

"The LAF is the most important institution in Lebanon," Gabriel said. "We've never seen one incident where Hezbollah controls the LAF." He added that the strain on Lebanon from the Syrian war makes the LAF even more essential.

Gabriel supports establishing humanitarian corridors to help Syrians return home but said he fears that will take a long time to fully implement. Another solution, he said, would be for the United States to incentivise 100 countries to each take in 20,000 Syrian refugees who are now in Lebanon.

President Barack Obama's administration has been criticised for inaction and lack of leadership on Syria. While it is not clear what a Clinton presidency would do differently, Gabriel has some ideas.

"Our first goal should be to take out ISIS (the Islamic State)," he said, "but when we take land from ISIS, who do we give it back to? Assad?"

Gabriel said that, without a strong US military presence that actively seizes land from ISIS and prepares for Syrian self-rule without Bashar Assad as president, Russia will not take Washington seriously.

"Without a military presence, Assad and Russia won't care. They just bomb people they don't like."

Edward Gabriel

"Without a military presence, Assad and Russia won't care. They just bomb people they don't like. We need to take and hold land, create safe zones and apply lessons learned from Iraq," he said.

On the Maghreb, Gabriel said the Western Sahara conflict accounts for why the region has one of the lowest levels of intra-regional trade in the world.

"We're dealing with a Soviet-era problem that needs to be settled. Morocco and Algeria are lacking infrastructure between them, like electricity and roads, because of the Sahara conflict," he said. "America needs to incentivise especially Algeria to cut a deal on the Sahara."

Gabriel said that despite the missteps and chaos of recent years, the United States still should attempt to "spread democracy" in the region, but with caveats.

"We're going to help countries move in that direction only when they've chosen it and asked us to,"

he said.

Gabriel suggested that the United States identify countries, such as Tunisia and Morocco, that want to commit to democracy and then launch a "strategic relationship" with them in which the United States asks: "How do we help you become more democratic, improve upon the rule of law, improve your human rights record? All of that is in our interest and in yours."

Asked when he thinks the United States will have its first Arab-American president, Gabriel laughed.

"I don't know when that's going to happen," he said, though he expects many Arab Americans to work in a Hillary Clinton administration.

"Given the fact that so many Arab Americans are over-achievers and great performers, an Arab-American presidency will happen soon," he said.

Rasha Ellass is a Washington correspondent for The Arab Weekly.

Lebanon is one of the issues near to Gabriel's heart.

US unlikely to move against Assad after elections

Thomas Seibert

Washington

The United States is likely to step up its military campaign against the Islamic State (ISIS) in Syria after a new US president is sworn in next January but unseating Syrian President Bashar Assad is unlikely to be a priority.

Both major party nominees – Democrat Hillary Clinton and Republican Donald Trump – have said they would escalate the battle against ISIS if elected. Neither, however, has emphasised the need to end a war that since 2011 has killed about 400,000 people and forced another 5 million to flee to neighbouring countries and beyond.

Democrat Hillary Clinton and Republican Donald Trump have said they would escalate the battle against ISIS if elected.

Clinton has said she would order more air strikes on ISIS and "a broader target set" for US and allied warplanes, as well as improve intelligence gathering. She also has called for more US special forces to be deployed against ISIS and more equipment provided to "viable Syrian opposition groups".

With costly wars in Iraq and Afghanistan fresh in voters' minds, Clinton has stressed that she does not want "100,000 Americans in combat in the Middle East". As for Assad, Clinton said she wants a political solution to the war and favours the creation of no-fly zones "that will stop Assad from slaughtering civilians and the opposition from the air".

She has not said how such a plan could be implemented in the face of opposition by Russia, Assad's main international backer.

Trump has promised to send up to 30,000 US troops to fight ISIS. "We are going to defeat the barbarians of ISIS and we are going to defeat them fast," Trump said at the Republican National Convention.

Trump also is reluctant to have the United States play a more active role in political efforts to push Assad from power, a goal of America's regional allies Turkey and Saudi Arabia. "We must abandon the failed policy of nation building and regime change that Hillary Clinton pushed in Iraq, Libya, Egypt and Syria," Trump said, referencing Clinton's 2009-13 tenure as US secretary of State.

In an interview with the New York Times, Trump said bringing down Assad was not as important as fighting ISIS. The Syrian president was "a bad man" who had

US soldier puts on a military demonstration during the Global Coalition to Counter ISIL Meeting, hosted by Defense Secretary Ash Carter, at Andrews Air Force Base, Maryland, on July 20th.

"done horrible things" but ISIS was a far greater threat to the United States, he said.

The reluctance by both candidates to invest political capital and energy in ousting Assad clashes with the opinion of a group of US diplomats who demanded a more robust stance against the Syrian president. In an internal memo leaked to the New York Times in June, 51 mostly mid-level US State Department officials involved in the Syria issue called for the use of military force against Assad's government to push it to adhere to a ceasefire and "to negotiate a political solution in good faith".

Some analysts say Washington already has spent too much time and effort on Assad and should focus on ISIS instead. Clinton is caught in the crossfire more than Trump because she was secretary of State when the conflict broke out and ISIS emerged.

Jeffrey Sachs, an economist at Columbia University, told US cable network MSNBC that Washington focused on getting rid of Assad for too long, ignoring the growing threat posed by ISIS.

"The US priority in Syria has not been to defeat ISIS; it has been to overthrow Assad," Sachs said. "That has created chaos." He called on Clinton to change her foreign policy priorities because her record was "just terrible".

Both Clinton and Trump are trying to convince voters that they would deal decisively with ISIS and the Syrian crisis as commander-in-chief but America's top spy warts that there are no quick fixes.

"All our policymakers have are bad choices," Director of National Intelligence James Clapper told the Washington Post columnist David Ignatius. He said the United States should be prepared for a long period of instability and violence in dealing with terror groups such as ISIS or the former Jabhat al-Nusra, which used to be considered al-Qaeda affiliate in Syria.

Although Clinton and Trump broadly agree that the United States should do more to defeat ISIS, they differ sharply on the refugee crisis sparked by the Syrian conflict. Clinton wants the United States to accept 65,000 more Syrian refugees, a small number compared to the 2.7 million hosted by Turkey or the hundreds of thousands who have migrated to EU countries.

Trump opposes taking in more Syrian refugees, saying in his convention acceptance speech that "there's no way to screen these refugees in order to find out who they are or where they come from". Trump's argument is contested by migration experts, who say that there is a rigorous screening process in place.

https://westernsaharaendgame.blogspot.com/2008/06/morocco-lobby-brokeback-mountain-fate.html

Western Sahara Endgame

“The Court’s conclusion is that the materials and information presented to it do not establish any tie of territorial sovereignty between the territory of Western Sahara and the Kingdom of Morocco....”

International Court of Justice Advisory Opinion 1975

The Morocco Lobby, Brokeback Mountain, & the Fate of the Western Sahara

Tuesday, June 24, 2008

Having recently gotten back from an extended trip abroad, I searched and searched the Internet for blog-worthy items about the Western Sahara and was on the verge of concluding that Will, Alle, et al. had comprehensively taken care of business when I ran across a strange tale of J. Peter Segall and Edward M. Gabriel from early April that somehow missed their radar. Thanks guys for leaving one for me (or could it be that you did not consider it a blog-worthy item?). Anyway.... Now Ed Gabriel is familiar to my readers as the former American ambassador to Morocco who over the last few years has been on Rabat’s payroll as one of the major attractions in their multimillion-dollar propaganda circus in the U.S. Without getting into the tawdry particulars of his selling out to Morocco – which I have covered ad nauseum elsewhere – let me just say here that his groveling recitations of the Moroccan royalist line betray a moral compass little evolved from a cicada. On April 1 the following “in memoriam” ad for Mr. Gabriel appeared in the Washington Post below his smiling mustachioed face: “Though I no longer have you as my partner, this day will always be OUR anniversary. . . . I could never quit you.” Before you construe my nasty words about Mr. Gabriel in the previous paragraph as tasteless trashing of a dead man, let me quickly add that the ad was an April Fools joke and that Mr. Gabriel is not in fact dead (you can still construe it as tasteless trashing of a live man if you like). In the spirit of April-foolery, the Post on April 2, in an article titled “A ‘Death’ is Noticed,” explained that Edward M. Gabriel, an “international business consultant who was the U.S. ambassador to Morocco from 1997 to 2001,” was “very much alive”; that the ad, “in language reminiscent of the movie ‘Brokeback Mountain,’” was a hoax; and that the one who took out the ad, public relations executive and lawyer J. Peter Segall, was paying for a retraction in that day’s Post.

Other than Mr. Gabriel’s obvious association with Morocco’s campaign to discredit the Polisario Front, I suspect you are wondering what it is that makes this a blog-worthy Western Sahara story. The hook is that J. Peter Segall is “general manager in Edelman’s Washington office, and oversee[s] the relationship with the Kingdom of Morocco.” In February of last year on Richard Edelman’s “6 A.M.” blog, I took Mr. Edelman to task for getting all self-righteous in criticizing Robert Mugabe’s autocratic ways, while at the same time taking lots of money from Morocco to cover up and whitewash Mohammed VI’s disdain for democracy and Morocco’s totalitarian ways in the occupied territories. Anyway, it was J. Peter Segall who responded to my comments with a predictably wishy-washy and unconvincing defense of Edelman’s relationship with Morocco. “Our work with Morocco has been transparent and forthright and we look forward to continuing our partnership with this unique and important country.”

According to the Post article, poor Ed “fielded calls all day from friends who thought he had died. One woman told him she spent two hours crying after seeing the ad.” An apparently mortified Segall explained, “As I said in a correction that I hope is published [today], I engaged in a very stupid and ultimately cruel April Fools’ joke against a man that has been my best friend for 30 years, and I deeply, deeply regret it." And Gabriel elaborates, "He's an old friend who plays jokes on me every year, and some are hilarious, but they've been private....He's a good friend who went a little too far. He's apologized profusely, and I've accepted it, but not without being a little hurt. I think -- I know -- he had no ill intent." Summarizing the whole episode, "Segall said," according to the Post "that he is a mature man who made an immature mistake." Given the utter stupidity and silliness of publishing a gay death hoax about a friend in the Washington Post, I would say that Segall's maturity is certainly open to question -- especially since he is a high-level executive for one of the biggest and most influential PR firms in the world.

And what in the world is the homosexuality angle all about? While Segall's ad does seem to insinuate a gay relationship ("though I no longer have you as my partner..."), the Washington Post article takes it a step further by making the connection with "Brokeback Mountain" ("in language reminiscent of the movie 'Brokeback Mountain'"), a popular recent movie about two married cowboys who carry on a long-time gay love affair behind the backs of their wives. The language in question in Segall's ad, by the way, is "I could never quit you," which is indeed reminiscent of Brokeback's "I wish I knew how to quit you."

Let me preface this paragraph with a disclaimer that I couldn't care less about Segall, Gabriel, or anyone else's sexual orientation. I just find it incredibly strange that Segall would pull a public gay spoof on his old friend when, first of all, Gabriel is married (to Democratic Party operative and tobacco industry lobbyist, Kathleen "Buffy" Linehan), and, secondly, both these guys lobby and do PR for Morocco, where homosexual relations are illegal and can land you in jail for up to three years (Section 489 of the Moroccan Penal Code). With Edelman's Morocco desk being overseen by someone exhibiting such atrociously bad judgment, there just might be some hope after all for the Western Sahara cause.

This whole silly April Fools episode strikes me as sadly symbolic of the tragic dilemma in which the Western Sahara currently finds itself. For over 35 years, the UN and the world community -- through numerous resolutions and rulings, and the refusal of even one country to recognize Morocco's occupation -- have confirmed the Western Saharan's right to self-determination. A combination of blind US and French support for Morocco, the UN retreating on its commitments to the Western Sahara (see van Walsum's realism), and Morocco's huge expenditures on PR and lobbying has brought us to the point where the future of a people is being determined by a mercenary bunch of yahoos such as J. Peter Segall and Edward M. Gabriel. I can't help but be left with an image of J. Peter Segall and Edward M. Gabriel in their tight blue jeans sitting around a campfire on a dark stormy night on Brokeback Mountain concocting new and exciting schemes to screw the Sahrawi.

As an aside, in confirming that Gabriel was in fact married, I ran across some tidbits online about Gabriel's wife, Buffy, that are interesting in the context of this story. In 1992, as head of Philip Morris's lobbying group, she was deposed in a lawsuit against B.J. Reynolds Tobacco (KUEPER v. R.J. REYNOLDS TOBACCO CO). Sourcewatch, a project of the Center for Media and Democracy, comments about her deposition: "...Linehan indicated that she was involved in lobbying against the banning of smoking on commercial aircraft, and that she does not consider the health consequences of the product she is lobbying (cigarettes)." And at another deposition in 1995, Sourcewatch adds that "Linehan stated that she did not believe that cigarette smoking is addictive." Buffy and Ed really do seem made for each other; both are lobbyists who get paid for actively promoting products (cigarettes and Morocco) that spread misery and death, and neither is willing to consider the human consequences of their actions.

Posted by Chasli at 10:23 AM

RELEASE IN PART B6

From: Abedin, Huma <AbedinH@state.gov>
Sent: Sunday, January 30, 2011 9:13 AM
To: H
Subject: Fw: Bravo Hilary

From: Edward Gabriel < >
To: Abedin, Huma
Sent: Sun Jan 30 09:12:45 2011
Subject: Bravo Hilary

B6

Great job this am. She carved a perfect policy line and the need to initiate a dialogue among key actors for a transition together. Very well put after two confusing days. Ed

RELEASE IN FULL

From: Abedin, Huma <AbedinH@state.gov>
Sent: Friday, May 6, 2011 1:27 AM
To: H
Subject: Fw: Morocco arrests suspects in Marrakesh cafe bomb (Reuters)

From: OpsNewsTicker
Sent: Thursday, May 05, 2011 06:14 PM
To: NEWS-CA; NEWS-NEA; NEWS-Mahogany
Cc: SES-O_Shift-III; SES-O_OS; SES-O_CMS
Subject: Morocco arrests suspects in Marrakesh cafe bomb (Reuters)

RABAT (Reuters) - Police in Morocco arrested three people on Thursday for a cafe bombing in the tourist city of Marrakesh on April 28 that killed 16 people, and said the chief suspect showed "loyalty" to al Qaeda.

The three suspects were all Moroccans, the official news agency quoted the Interior Ministry as saying. Most of the bomb victims were foreign holidaymakers, including eight French people.

The ministry said the chief suspect was "well-versed in jihadi ideology and shows loyalty to al Qaeda".

It said the suspect had previously tried to fight alongside Islamist militants in Russia's turbulent Chechnya republic and in Iraq.

It said he dressed like a tourist to plant two remote-detonated devices, which then tore through a cafe overlooking Marrakesh's Jemaa el-Fna square, a spot that is often packed with tourists.

It was the first such attack in Morocco since 2003, when suicide bombings in the commercial capital, Casablanca, killed more than 45 people.

News Tickers alert senior Department officials to breaking news. This item appears as it did in its original publication and does not contain analysis or commentary by Department sources

RELEASE IN FULL

From: Huma Abedin

Sent: 2/22/2012 6:48:05 PM +00:00

To: H <HDR22@clintonemail.com>

Subject: Just hung up with ed gabriel. There's a morocco brief I'm sending to you and jake.

PR_RIM_PAGER_TX_FLAG: false

PR_RIM_MSG_REF_ID: 608324731

PR_RIM_MSG_FOLDER_ID: -5

PR_RIM_DELETED_BY_DEVICE: true

PR_RIM_MSG_ON_DEVICE_3_6: true

PR_RIM_MSG_STATUS: 1

Classified by DAS, A/GIS, DoS on 11/30/2015 ~ Class: CONFIDENTIAL
~ Reason: 1.4(B), 1.4(D) ~ Declassify on: 09/09/2027

RELEASE IN PART
B1 1.4 (B)(D)

From: Abedin, Huma <AbedinH@state.gov>
Sent: Sunday, September 9, 2012 2:23 PM
To: Sullivan, Jacob J; H
Subject: Re: TFF Call

I got the same call from ed gabriel yesterday. Will call you cause there's a lot of history here. Especially with sam kaplan.

----- Original Message -----

From: Sullivan, Jacob J
Sent: Sunday, September 09, 2012 05:51 AM
To: 'H' <HDR22@clintonemail.com>; Abedin, Huma
Subject: FW: TFF Call

To discuss. Huma can you call me when you're up.

-----Original Message-----

From: Kaplan, Samuel L
Sent: Sunday, September 09, 2012 5:28 AM
To: Sullivan, Jacob J
Subject: TFF Call

1.4(B)
1.4(D)
B1

Hello Jake,

The reason i was urgently looking for you last night is the following: _____

_____ Late yesterday I received a call from Taeb Fassi Fihri. _____

_____ We obviously have to deal with this today. People will be leaving for DC tomorrow.

Sorry to compcate your day.

Sam

RELEASE IN FULL

From: Huma Abedin <Huma@clintonemail.com>
Sent: Sunday, September 9, 2012 5:55 PM
To: H; 'hanleymr@state.gov'
Subject: Ed gabriel just called back. Will close loop with him and call you.

RELEASE IN PART
B6

From: Huma Abedin <Huma@clintonemail.com>
Sent: Monday, September 10, 2012 9:08 AM
To: H; 'russorv@state.gov'
Subject: Re: Pursuant to our talk in Rabat...

Ed raised this yesterday as well. Will fill you in today.

From: H
Sent: Monday, September 10, 2012 08:31 AM
To: 'Russorv@state.gov' <Russorv@state.gov>
Cc: Huma Abedin
Subject: Fw: Pursuant to our talk in Rabat...

Pls print.

From: Melanne Verveer
Sent: Saturday, September 08, 2012 10:28 PM
To: H
Subject: Fw: Pursuant to our talk in Rabat...

B6

Fyi

From: "Edward Gabriel"
Date: Thu, 6 Sep 2012 08:15:54 -0700
To: <pverveer|_>
Subject: Pursuant to our talk in Rabat...

Melanne,

It was a nice surprise running into you in Morocco and being able to spend a few minutes together. As I mentioned, the Moroccans, at the highest level, deeply appreciate Secretary Clinton's/Hillary's attention to Morocco these past four years. I can tell you that King Mohammed and his counselors are extremely excited about the coming launch of the Strategic Dialogue. The King views next week's event as a crowning achievement of the past thirteen years of his effort to create a strategic relationship with the US on bilateral, regional and multilateral matters.

As I mentioned last night, there are two concerns that I hope you can bring up to the Secretary. The first concerns her remarks at the event next week, and the second is in regards to the final communique that comes out following the event itself.

From the point of view of the officials at the highest levels in Morocco, this new Strategic Dialogue is the logical next step in a long history of our relations, especially over the last dozen years under the King's leadership, which have included a Free Trade Agreement, major non-NATO ally status, an MCC compact, and positive public statements that the Secretary/Hillary has made about the real progress that the King has made in Morocco on political, social and economic reforms.

It is "our" hope that Secretary Clinton/Hillary will draw particular attention to this fact, when she makes her public comments in at the SD next week, and says what this Dialogue represents and how it has come to pass as the culmination of the many things that Morocco has accomplished over the past 15 years and three US Administrations. This really is a story about the leadership of the King, including his recent interventions with the Secretary, and it is something I'm sure he would be pleased to hear. As I mentioned, there are many detractors and political adversaries in Morocco that are critical of the King and state that the US-Morocco relationship has waned, due to the fact that he has not yet met with President Obama. The SD obviously refutes this claim, and the Secretary's words in support of the King's achievements will go a long way in carefully balancing comments and correcting misinterpretations.

The Moroccans have also been working diligently on a draft final communique to be issued jointly at the end of the SD meeting, as well as a set of issues for the working groups, including women's empowerment. I am afraid the communique will get watered down without Hillary's staff's direct intervention to represent her views. I would graciously ask that you pass both messages on, and assure you that the views I express herein come from the highest levels in Morocco.

On a personal note, I would like to reiterate how proud I am to have been associated with Hillary and her team these past years. Her success makes us proud.

Talk with you soon and good luck next week with the SD,

Ed

RELEASE IN PART
B1,1.4(B)(D), B5, B6

From: Sullivan, Jacob J <SullivanJJ@state.gov>
Sent: Monday, September 10, 2012 1:52 PM
To: Abedin, Huma; H
Subject: RE: I just now got another direct call

B5

From: Abedin, Huma
Sent: Monday, September 10, 2012 12:54 PM
To: 'H'; Sullivan, Jacob J
Subject: FW: I just now got another direct call

FYI

From: Edward Gabriel
Sent: Monday, September 10, 2012 9:49 AM
To: Abedin, Huma
Subject: I just now got another direct call

1.4(B)
1.4(D)
B1

B6

Huma,
The King phoned directly to me just now and asked to pass another message on to her:

| Huma, I'm sorry for this continuation _____

Ed

Classified by DAS, A/GIS, DoS on 11/30/2015 ~ Class: CONFIDENTIAL ~ Reason: 1.4(B), 1.4(D)
~ Declassify on: 09/10/2027

RELEASE IN PART
B6

From: H <hrod17@clintonemail.com>
Sent: Tuesday, September 11, 2012 5:14 AM
To: 'pverveer'
Subject: Re:

B6

That must have been a surreal moment--so far from home but so present. He did a great job for the President, the party and the country.

Come see me when you have time this week.

----- Original Message -----

From: Melanne Verveer [mailto: |
Sent: Thursday, September 06, 2012 12:58 AM
To: H

B6

I'm in the business lounge at Dubai airport en route to Dhaka watching your husband's extraordinary speech and surrounded by countless foreigners all cheering him on. Only he would elicit that kind of reaction at home and abroad! I think it was his most brilliant performance yet, all bias aside. emailed me in the middle of it to say that you have to run for president so she can work for you!!

B6

The BMENA meeting in Morocco went better than I anticipated with a really impressive group of participants from the region -- men and women, NGO and govt reps speaking candidly from their experiences about the key issues that need to be addressed. The Arab Spring has created a whole new understanding about the role of women and that was underscored over and over. I will write you a short summary as they provided many important insights.

Last night I met with a group of women leaders over dinner at Laila Aloui's. (Ed Gabriel dropped by.) We -- Americans and Moroccans -- all talked about you. As Laila said, "We're Hillary people." The women are so concerned that the future of the family law reform, women's equality in the constitution and their other achievements will be reversed by the Islamists. I think they have to find a way to organize themselves and even act as an influential force in the region. I'm going to see if VV will do more in the region to help.

Ed was in background discussions on the upcoming strategic dialogue. He said the Moroccans want women's empowerment on the dialogue agenda (I'll follow up). He also said the King was very grateful to you for making the dialogue happen. They are not without big challenges there.

Good luck at the APEC meetings!

FARA Document Search

DOCUMENT	REGISTRATION NUMBER	REGISTRANT NAME	DOCUMENT TYPE	STAMPED/RECEIVED DATE <input type="checkbox"/>
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	11/15/2017
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Amendment	08/24/2017
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	05/24/2017
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	11/16/2016
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	05/16/2016
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	11/18/2015
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Amendment	06/01/2015
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	05/27/2015
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	11/19/2014
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	05/21/2014
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	11/26/2013
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	05/28/2013
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	11/28/2012
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	05/29/2012
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	11/28/2011
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	05/26/2011
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	12/01/2010
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	06/02/2010
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	11/24/2009
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	05/28/2009
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	12/03/2008
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	06/04/2008
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	12/03/2007
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	05/30/2007
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	11/27/2006
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	05/30/2006
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	12/01/2005
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Amendment	06/01/2005
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	06/01/2005
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Amendment	12/10/2004
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	10/31/2004
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Amendment	10/14/2004
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Exhibit AB	05/19/2004
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	04/30/2004
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	10/31/2003
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Amendment	06/16/2003
Available FARA Public Office	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Short-Form	05/30/2003
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Exhibit AB	05/30/2003
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Amendment	05/23/2003
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Exhibit C	05/23/2003
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Supplemental Statement	04/30/2003
Available FARA Public Office	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Registration Statement	10/11/2002
Available FARA Public Office	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Short-Form	10/11/2002
Click Here	5523	Gabriel Company, LLC	Exhibit AB	10/11/2002

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

DATE	ORGANIZATION	CONTACT	TOPIC
7/28/17	Maghreb News Wire	email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
8/16/17	US State Department	meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
8/30/17	Pittsburgh Post-Gazette	email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
8/30/17	Pittsburgh Post-Gazette	email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/1/17	New York Times	email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/5/17	The Blade	email	US-Morocco bilateral relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies

FARA registration supplemental e-filing – May 24, 2017 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

DATE	AMOUNT	ORGANIZATION	NAME OF CANDIDATE
6/23/17	$1,000.00	Issa for Congress	Darrell Issa
6/28/17	$1,000.00	Rueben Kihuen for Congress	Rueben Kihuen
9/18/17	$1,000.00	New Dominion PAC
9/27/17	$2,000.00	Saad for Congress	Fayrouz Saad
10/7/17	$1,000.00	Charlie Crist for Congress	Charlie Crist

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

DATE	ORGANIZATION	CONTACT	TOPIC
11/21/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
2/8/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Phone Call	US-Morocco bilateral relations
2/17/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
3/3/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
3/7/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
3/9/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/14/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/15/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Phone Call	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/18/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/25/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/25/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/25/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/25/17	Office of the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Egypt & Maghreb	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/25/17	Office of the Deputy Assistant Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/25/17	Office of the Director for Maghreb Affairs	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/25/17	Office of the Director	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/25/17	Office of the Under Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/25/17	Office of the Acting Coordinator for Counterterrorism	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
5/2/17	Office of the Assistant Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements - Monies
 FARA registration supplemental e-filing - November 16, 2016 - $305.00

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies.⁶

Date	From Whom	Purpose	Amount
5/11/16	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (1st trimester)	166627.50
10/11/16	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (2nd & 3rd trimesters)	333276.34

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fundraising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal	Date Received	Thing of Value	Purpose
-------------------	---------------	----------------	---------

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, moneys, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fundraising campaign. (See Rule 201(e)).

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fundraising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Organization	Contact	Topic
11/19/15	Morocco Desk, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/18/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary/NEA	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/17/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary for the Near East	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/16/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary for the Near East	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/14/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary/NEA	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/14/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary for the Near East	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/7/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary for the Near East	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/28/16	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/21/16	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/14/16	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/8/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary for the Near East	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/7/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary for the Near East	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
8/8/16	Office of the Secretary (DOS)	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
8/5/16	State Department	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/13/16	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/10/16	Office of the Deputy Secretary (DOS)	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/7/16	State Department	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
6/27/16	Office of the Deputy Secretary (DOS)	Phone call	US-Morocco bilateral relations
6/22/16	Office of the Deputy Secretary (DOS)	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
6/17/16	Office of the Deputy Secretary (DOS)	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
6/13/16	Office of the Secretary (DOS)	Phone call	US-Morocco bilateral relations
5/23/16	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
5/23/16	Office of the Deputy Secretary (DOS)	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
5/19/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary for the Near East	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
5/13/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary for the Near East	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
5/10/16	Office of the Secretary (DOS)	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
5/10/16	Office of the Deputy Secretary (DOS)	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
5/5/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary for the Near East	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
5/4/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary for the Near East	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
5/2/16	Office of the Assistant Secretary for the Near East	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies
FARA registration supplemental e-filing – May 16, 2016 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
10/20/16	$300.00	Matt Heinz for Arizona	Matt Heinz
10/10/16	$500.00	ALC PAC
10/6/16	$1,500.00	Hoyer Majority Fund	Steny Hoyer
9/27/16	$500.00	Kaptur for Congress	Marcy Kaptur
9/23/16	$2,700.00	Debbie Dingell for Congress	Debbie Dingell
9/8/16	$500.00	Luanne Bennet for Congress	Luanne Benner
8/10/16	$250.00	Matt Heinz for Arizona	Matt Heinz
8/8/16	$2,700.00	Katie McGinty for Senate	Katie McGinty
6/16/16	$1,000.00	Jamie Raskin for Congress	Jamie Raskin
6/14/16	$2,700.00	Hillary for America	Hillary Clinton
5/15/16	$1,000.00	Denise Juneau for Congress	Denise Juneau

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Organization	Contact	Topic
11/06/15	US Embassy, Rabat	Emails	US-Morocco relations
11/19/15	US Embassy, Rabat	Emails	US-Morocco relations
12/01/15	State Department, Morocco Desk	Phone call	US-Morocco relations
01/20/16	US Embassy, Rabat	Phone call	US-Morocco relations
01/26/16	US Embassy, Rabat	Emails	US-Morocco relations
03/12/16	US Embassy, Rabat	Emails	US-Morocco relations
03/13/16	US Embassy, Rabat	Emails	US-Morocco relations
03/17/16	State Department, Morocco Desk	Phone call	US-Morocco relations
03/18/16	US Embassy, Rabat	Phone call	US-Morocco relations
03/18/16	Office of State Deputy Secretary	Phone call	US-Morocco relations
03/18/16	US Embassy, Rabat	Emails	US-Morocco relations
03/19/16	US Embassy, Rabat	Emails	US-Morocco relations
03/21/16	US Embassy, Rabat	Emails	US-Morocco relations
03/24/16	US Embassy, Rabat	Emails	US-Morocco relations
03/28/16	US Embassy, Rabat	Emails	US-Morocco relations
04/12/16	State Department, Morocco Desk	Emails	US-Morocco relations
04/25/16	US Embassy, Rabat	Phone call	US-Morocco relations
04/25/16	State Department, Morocco Desk	Phone call	US-Morocco relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	11/1-11/10	Airfare, lodging, meals*	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	12/13-12/16	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	1/27-2/2	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

*Not including the night of 11/3-11/4

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies

FARA registration supplemental e-filing – November 18, 2015 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
------	--------	--------------	-------------------

10/29/15	$33,400	Hillary Victory Fund	Hillary Clinton
11/14/15	$1,000	Arab-American PAC
03/08/16	$1,000	Cooper for North Carolina	Roy Cooper
03/10/16	$250	Dr. Matt Heinz for Arizona	Matt heinz
04/06/16	$1,000	Van Hollen for Senate	Chris Van Hollen

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant - The Gabriel Company, LLC - did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies.⁶

Date	From Whom	Purpose	Amount
5/6	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (1st trimester 2015)	166,617.00
7/15	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (2nd trimester 2015)	166,627.50
10/05	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (3rd trimester 2015)	166,627.50

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fundraising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal	Date Received	Thing of Value	Purpose
See Attachment A

6, 7 A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, moneys, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fundraising campaign. (See Rule 201(c)).

8 An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fundraising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

9 Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interest in the United States.

Date	Organization	Contact	Topic
7/20/15	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Office of the Deputy Secretary of State, US State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Bureau of International Organization Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Bureau of Counterterrorism, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Office of Maghreb Affairs, Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Office of White House Chief of Staff	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Office of Policy Planning, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	NSC, Executive Office of the President	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Bureau of Economic and Business Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Office of Global Women's Issues, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Office of Under Secretary for Political Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Bureau of Intelligence and Research, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	office of Under Secretary for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28/15	Bureau of Political-Military Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
8/3/15	Office of the NEA, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
8/3/15	Office of Under Secretary for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
8/3/15	Bureau of African Affairs	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Office of the Vice President	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Office of the Deputy Secretary, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Bureau of International Organization Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Bureau of Counterterrorism, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Office of Maghreb Affairs, Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Office of White House Chief of Staff	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Office of Policy Planning, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	NSC, Executive Office of the President	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations

9/18/15	Bureau of Economic and Business Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Office of Global Women's Issues, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Office of Under Secretary for Political Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Bureau of Intelligence and Research, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Office of Under Secretary for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Bureau of Political-Military Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Office of NEA, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Office of Under Secretary for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/18/15	Bureau of African Affairs	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Office of the Vice President	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Office of Deputy Secretary of State, US State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Bureau of International Organization Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Bureau of Counterterrorism, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	White House Chief of Staff	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Office of Policy Planning, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Assistant Secretary, Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	NSC, Executive Office of the President	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Bureau of Economic and Business Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Office of Global Women's Issues, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	office of Under Secretary for Political Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Bureau of Intelligence and Research, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Office of Under Secretary for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Bureau of Political-Military Affairs, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Morocco Desk Officer, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Office of Under Secretary for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/2/15	Bureau of African Affairs	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/13/15	Office of the Deputy Secretary, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/24/15	Office of the Deputy Secretary, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/26/15	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	5/3-5/15	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies

FARA registration supplemental e-filing – 5/28/2015 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
9/22	$2700	Katie McGinty for Senate	Katie McGinty
9/18	$2500	Keith Ellison for Congress	Keith Ellison
9/9	$1500	Boustany for Congress	Charles Boustany
8/10	$1000	Lahood for Congress	Darin Lahood
6/8	$1000	Rus-Lehtinen for Congress	Ileana Ros-Lehtinen

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

U.S. Department of Justice
Washington, DC 20530

Amendment to Registration Statement
Pursuant to the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938, as amended

INSTRUCTIONS. File this amendment form for any changes to a registration. Compliance is accomplished by filing an electronic amendment to registration statement and uploading any supporting documents at <http://www.fara.gov>.

Privacy Act Statement. The filing of this document is required for the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938, as amended, 22 U.S.C. § 611 et seq., for the purposes of registration under the Act and public disclosure. Provision of the information requested is mandatory, and failure to provide the information is subject to the penalty and enforcement provisions established in Section 8 of the Act. Every registration statement, short form registration statement, supplemental statement, exhibit, amendment, copy of informational materials or other document or information filed with the Attorney General under this Act is a public record open to public examination, inspection and copying during the posted business hours of the Registration Unit in Washington, DC. Statements are also available online at the Registration Unit's webpage: <http://www.fara.gov>. One copy of every such document, other than informational materials, is automatically provided to the Secretary of State pursuant to Section 6(b) of the Act, and copies of any and all documents are routinely made available to other agencies, departments and Congress pursuant to Section 6(c) of the Act. The Attorney General also transmits a semi-annual report to Congress on the administration of the Act which lists the names of all agents registered under the Act and the foreign principals they represent. This report is available to the public in print and online at: <http://www.fara.gov>.

Public Reporting Burden. Public reporting burden for this collection of information is estimated to average 1.5 hours per response, including the time for reviewing instructions, searching existing data sources, gathering and maintaining the data needed, and completing and reviewing the collection of information. Send comments regarding this burden estimate or any other aspect of this collection of information, including suggestions for reducing this burden to Chief, Registration Unit, Counterespionage Section, National Security Division, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, DC 20530; and to the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs, Office of Management and Budget, Washington, DC 20503.

1. Name of Registrant The Gabriel Company, LLC	2. Registration No. 5523
---	---------------------------------

3. This amendment is filed to accomplish the following indicated purpose or purposes:

- To give a 10-day notice of change in information as required by Section 2(b) of the Act.
- To correct a deficiency in
 - Initial Statement
 - Supplemental Statement for the period ending April 30, 2015
 - Other purpose (specify) _____
- To give notice of change in an exhibit previously filed.

4. If this amendment requires the filing of a document or documents, please list:

5. Each item checked above must be explained below in full detail together with, where appropriate, specific reference to and identity of the item in the registration statement to which it pertains. (If space is insufficient, a full insert page must be used.)

Amendment to question 15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
4/28	$2500	Connolly for Congress	Gerry Connolly

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Organization	Contact Type	Topics
4/25	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/7	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/4	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/3	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
4/2	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
3/29	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
3/26	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
3/23	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
1/30	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
1/26	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
1/23	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
1/14	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
1/8	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
12/2	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
11/20	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
11/18	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
11/17	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	11/15-11/23	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	11/30-12/7	Airfare	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	1/21-2/1	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	3/28-4/5	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies

FARA registration supplemental e-filing – 11/19/2014 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
4/18	$2700	Hillary Clinton for President	Hillary Clinton
4/9	$2500	Butterfield for Congress	G.K. Butterfield
3/29	$1000	Chris Van Hollen	Van Hollen for Senate
3/18	$1000	Brad Sherman for Congress	Brad Sherman
2/6	$2600	Gwen Graham for Congress	Gwen Graham

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies.⁶

Date	From Whom	Purpose	Amount
10/16/14	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (2nd&3rd trimester 2014)	333,228.34
			333,228.34
			Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fundraising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal	Date Received	Thing of Value	Purpose
See Attachment A

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, moneys, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fundraising campaign. (See Rule 201(e)).
⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fundraising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.
⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Organization	Contact Type	Topics
10/28	Office of DOS Undersecretary for Economics	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
10/7	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/29	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/25	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
9/17	Office of the Undersecretary for Economics	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
8/6	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations
8/6	US Embassy Rabat	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relations
7/28	US Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	9/28-10/10	Lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	06/21-06/29	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	05/19-05/23	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies

FARA registration supplemental e-filing – 05/22/2014 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
9/19/14	$1000	Sherman for Congress
9/19/14	$2200	Keep Nick Rahall in Congress	Nick Rahall
9/11/14	$2500	Ellison for Congress	Keith Ellison
6/10/14	$1000	Mark Udall for Congress	Mark Udall
6/5/15	$500	Mark Udall for Congress	Mark Udall

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies.⁶

Date	From Whom	Purpose	Amount
4/10/14	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered	166,613.67
12/02/13	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered	166,616.67

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fundraising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal	Date Received	Thing of Value	Purpose
See Attachment A

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, moneys, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fundraising campaign. (See Rule 201(e)).

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fundraising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Organization	Contact Type	Topics
04/30/14	Cong Fattah	Meeting	North Africa security & stability
04/14/14	Office of Senator Durbin	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
04/03/14	Office of Senator Durbin	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
03/31/14	Office of Senator Durbin	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
03/30/14	Office of Senator Durbin	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
03/25/14	Cong Hastings	Meeting	North Africa security & stability
03/04/14	Cong Richmond	Meeting	North Africa security & stability
01/14/14	Cong Butterfield	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
01/14/14	Cong Moore	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
01/14/14	Cong Green	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
01/14/14	Cong Horsford	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
01/13/14	Cong Meeks	Meeting	North Africa security & stability
12/06/13	National Security Council	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
12/04/13	National Security Council	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/24/13	National Security Council	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/24/13	National Security Council	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/24/13	National Security Council	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/03/13	National Security Council	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/02/13	National Security Council	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/02/13	Office of the Vice President	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/02/13	Office of the Vice President	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/02/13	US Embassy, Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/02/13	National Security Council	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/02/13	Office of the Undersecretary, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/02/13	Office of the Deputy Secretary, State Department	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/01/13	National Security Council	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	4/20-4/28	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	3/9-3/21	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	1/20-1/28	Lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies

FARA registration supplemental e-filing – 11/26/2013 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
3/28/14	$1000	Nick Rahall for Congress	Nick Rahall
3/28/14	$1000	Debbie Dingell for Congress	Debbie Dingell
1/16/14	$2500	Bass for Congress	Karen Bass
11/19/13	$1500	The Hoyer PAC	Steny Hoyer
11/12/13	$500	Gerry Connally for Congress	Gerry Connally
11/12/13	$2000	Keep Nick Rahall in Congress	Nick Rahall

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies.⁶

Date	From Whom	Purpose	Amount
7/18/13	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered	$166636.67

166636.67

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fundraising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal	Date Received	Thing of Value	Purpose
See Attachment A

6, 7 A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, moneys, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fundraising campaign. (See Rule 201(e)).
 8 An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fundraising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.
 9 Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Organization	Contact Type	Topics
10/22/13	Office of the Vice President	Phone call	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/22/13	Office of the VP	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/19/13	Embassy Rabat	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/19/13	Office of the Deputy Secretary, DOS	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
10/22/13	Office of the Vice President	Phone call	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
10/17/13	Office of the Deputy Secretary	Phone call	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
8/21/13	Office of the Vice President	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
8/14/13	Office of the Deputy Secretary, DOS	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	6/27-7/5	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	9/29-10/6	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	10/31-11/6	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies
 FARA registration supplemental e-filing 05/29/2013 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
10/8/13	$1,000	John Dingell for Congress	John Dingell
7/30/13	$2,266.45	Keith Ellison for Congress	Keith Ellison
7/23/13	$1,000	Udall for Colorado	Mark Udall
6/19/13	$500	Sherman for Congress	Brad Sherman
6/18/13	$1,000	Moran for Congress	Jim Moran
5/8/13	$1,000	Tom Udall for Congress	Tom Udall

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies.⁶

Date	From Whom	Purpose	Amount
12/06/2012	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered	$166,636.67
04/30/2013	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered	$166,636.67
			$333,273.34
			Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fundraising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal	Date Received	Thing of Value	Purpose
See Attachment A

6, 7 A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, moneys, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fundraising campaign. (See Rule 201(c))
 8 An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fundraising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.
 9 Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Organization	Contact Type	Topics
4/25/2013	Office of the Deputy Secretary of State	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
4/23/2013	National Security Council/Office of VP	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
4/21/2013	Office of Deputy Secretary of State	Phone call	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
4/17/2013	Office of the Deputy Secretary of State	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
4/14/2013	National Security Council/Office of VP	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
4/12/2013	Office of the Vice President	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
4/11/2013	NSC/Office of VP/WH	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
12/11/2012	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
12/10/2012	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
12/9/2012	Office of the Secretary of State	Phone call	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
12/9/2012	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
12/7/2012	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
12/6/2012	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	11/12-11/21	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	12/07-12/17	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	01/29-02/07	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	02/20-02/25	Lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies
 FARA registration supplemental e-filing – 11/29/2012 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
4/15/2013	$500	Darrell Issa for Congress	Darrell Issa

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies.⁶

Date	From Whom	Purpose	Amount
5/21/2012	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (1st & 2nd Trimester 2012)	$333,290.84
			$333,290.84
			Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fundraising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal	Date Received	Thing of Value	Purpose
See Attachment A

6, 7 A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, moneys, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fundraising campaign. (See Rule 201(c)).
 8 An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fundraising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.
 9 Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Organization	Contact Type	Topics Discussed
6/21/12	US Embassy Rabat, Morocco	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
7/3/2012	Office of Deputy Secretary of State	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
7/19/2012	Office of Secretary of State	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
9/6/2012	Office of Women's Affairs	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
9/8/2012	Office of Secretary of State	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
9/10/2012	Office of Secretary of State	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
9/11/2012	Office of Secretary of State	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	6/15-6/25	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	8/28-9/5	Lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	10/7-10/10	Airfare, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies

FARA registration supplemental e-filing – May 29, 2012 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
5/15/2012	$1000	Moran for Congress	Jim Moran
	$3000	AAI PAC
5/16/2012	$500	Pascarell for Congress	Bill Pascrell
6/28/2012	5000	AMERIPAC
6/28/2012	$2500	Hoyer for Congress	Steny Hoyer
7/13/2012	$2500	Ellison for Congress	Keith Ellison

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies.⁶

Date	From Whom	Purpose	Amount
11/17/2011	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered	166,649.17
			166,649.17
			Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fundraising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date

(c) RECEIPTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal	Date Received	Thing of Value	Purpose
See Attachment A

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, moneys, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fundraising campaign (See Rule 201(e))
⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fundraising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.
⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Organization	Contact Type	Topics Discussed
2/16/2012	The Atlantic	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
1/20/2012	US Embassy Rabat, Morocco	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
11/22/2011	Office of the Deputy Secretary	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	4/19-4/26	Lodging	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	1/18-1/21	Lodging	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements Monies

FARA registration supplemental filing – November 28, 2011 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
12/18/11	$2000	Brad Sherman for Congress	Brad Sherman
3/30/12	$1000	ALC political PAC
4/12/12	$1000	John Dingell for Congress	John Dingell

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies.⁶

Date	From Whom	Purpose	Amount
6/9/2011	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered	$166,649.17

$166,647.17

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fundraising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal	Date Received	Thing of Value	Purpose
See Attachment A

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, moneys, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fundraising campaign. (See Rule 201(e)).

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fundraising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Organization	Contact Type	Topics Discussed
5/5/11	Ambassador Samuel Kaplan	US Ambassador to Morocco	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
7/29/11	Rep. Norm Dicks	Office of Congressman Dicks	Email	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
9/6/11	Ambassador Samuel Kaplan	US Ambassador to Morocco	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship
9/13/11	Deputy Chief of Mission	US Embassy in Morocco	Meeting	US-Morocco bilateral relationship

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	5/3-5/7	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	6/11-6/20	Airline ticket, some lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	9/4-9/16	Lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies
 FARA registration supplemental filing – May 18, 2011 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
6/22/11	$2500	Republican National Congressional Committee (RNCC)
10/24/11	$2000	John Dingell for Congress	John Dingell

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies.⁶

Date	From Whom	Purpose	Amount
3/10/10	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered	$166,641.67

$166,641.67

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fundraising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal	Date Received	Thing of Value	Purpose
See Attachment

6, 7 A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, moneys, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fundraising campaign (See Rule 201(c)).
 8 An Exhibit D, for which an printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fundraising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.
 9 Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Organization	Contact Type	Topics Discussed
4/21/11	Office of the Secretary	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	Recent events in North Africa
4/19/11	Office of the Secretary	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	Letter signed by former US ambassadors regarding North African stability
3/25/11	Office of the Secretary and Undersecretary	Office of the Secretary and Undersecretary of State	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/23/11	Office of the Secretary	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/21/11	Office of the Undersecretary	Office of the Undersecretary of State,	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/19/11	Office of the Secretary	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	News article on Morocco
3/18/11	Office of the Secretary	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	News article on Morocco
3/13/11	Office of the Secretary	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	News article on Morocco
3/10/11	Office of the Secretary	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	News article on Morocco
2/23/11*	Ambassador Samuel Kaplan	US Ambassador to Morocco	Meeting	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
1/3/11	Office of the Secretary	Office of the Secretary of State	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
12/6/10	State department officials	State Department	Meeting	Security and stability issues in N. Africa

* Exact date unclear, but meeting did occur between 2/15-2/27

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	2/15/11-2/27/11	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	12/10/10-12/15/10	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies

FARA registration supplemental filing – November 23, 2010 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
3/31/10	$500	Ben Cardin for Senate	Ben Cardin
3/15/10	$1000	Dingell for Congress	John D Dingell
2/28/10	$1000	Friends of Dick Durbin	Dick Durbin

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS - MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶:

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
6/21/2010	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered	$169,975.00
10/29/2010	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered	$205,025.00

$375,000.00
Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
See Attachment A

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign. (See Rule 201(e).)

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Organization	Contact Type	Topics Discussed
6/1/2010	Samuel Kaplan	US Ambassador to Morocco	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
6/9/2010	Terry Lierman	Office of the Majority Leader	Meeting	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
6/16/2010	Mariah Sixkiller	Office of the Majority Leader	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
6/23/2010	Janet Sanderson	Department of State	meeting	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
9/1/2010	Janet Sanderson	Department of State	meeting	Security and stability issues in N. Africa

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	5/2-5/7	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	5/30-6/5	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	6/28-7/2	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	7/25-7/29	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	9/6-9/10	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	10/26-10/30	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies
 FARA registration supplemental filing – May 25, 2010 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
5/20/2010	$1000	Moran for Congress	Jim Moran
5/27/2010	$1000	Richard Burr for Senate	Richard Burr
7/20/2010	$1000	Moran for Congress	Jim Moran
9/16/2010	$1000	Gifford for Congress	Gabriel Gifford
9/16/2010	$1000	Dingell for Congress	John D Dingell
9/22/2010	$1000	Boucher for Congress	Rick Boucher
9/22/2010	$2400	Rahall for Congress	Nick Rahall

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

2010 DEC - 1 AM 10:40
 ASD/DES/REGISTRATION UNIT

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS - MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶:

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
2/23/10	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (Q1-Q4 2010)	$124,975
			$124,975
			Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
See Attachment A

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign. (See Rule 201(e).)

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Organization	Contact Type	Topics Discussed
3/26/10	Pablo Duran	Office of Senator Tom Udall	Meeting	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/18/10	Huma Abedin	Department of State	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/13/10	James Smythers,	Office of Senator Richard Burr	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/1/10	Virginia White	Office of Senator Jeff Bingaman	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/1/10	Susan Bell	Office of Senator Richard Burr	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/1/10	Sylvia Oliver	Office of Senator Byron Dorgan	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/1/10	Katie Hoard	Office of Senator Blanche Lincoln	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/1/10	Jennifer Barret	Office of Senator Mark Udall	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/1/10	Donda Morgan	Office of Senator Tom Udall	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
3/1/10	Chris Lynch	Office of Senator Benjamin Cardin	Email	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
12/16/09	Mark Udall	Office of Senator Mark Udall	Meeting	Security and stability issues in N. Africa

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	2/4-2/8/10	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	12/10/12/15/09	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	11/14/-11/21/09	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	11/1-11/9/09	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies
 FARA registration supplemental filing – November 18, 2009 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
3/26/10	$500	Issa for Congress	Daryll Issa
3/23/10	$4800	Frank Kratovil for Congress	Frank Kratovil
2/24/10	$250	Sheila Jackson Lee for Congress	Sheila Jackson
11/12/09	$2400	Friends of Byron Dorgan	Byron Dorgan
11/12/09	$5000	AALC PAC

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
4/27/10	$1000	Ellison for Congress	Keith Ellison
3/23/10	$2300	Frank Kratovil for Congress	Frank Kratovil

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's Vice President. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

MSB/CES/REGISTRATION
UNIT

2010 JUN -2 AM 10: 25

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS - MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶.

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
7/1/09	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (Q1-Q4 2009)	$99,975.00
9/28/09	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (Q1-Q4 2009)	$100,037.50

$200,012.50
Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
See Attachment A

⁶ 7 A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign (See Rule 201(e).)

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Organization	Contact Type	Topics Discussed
6/19/09	Congressman Eric Massa	Cong. Massa's office	Meeting	Security and stability issues in N. Africa
6/11/09	Senator Tom Udall	Senator Udall's office	Meeting	Security and stability issues in N. Africa

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	5/10-5/15	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	6/2-6/9	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	9/24-9/27	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies
 FARA registration supplemental filing – May 19, 2009 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
6/22/09	$1000	Henry Waxman for Congress	Henry Waxman
6/25/09	$1000	Friends of Byron Dorgan	Byron Dorgan
6/25/09	$2000	Sherman for Congress	Brad Sherman
6/25/09	$2000	Friends of Barbara Boxer	Barbara Boxer
6/26/09	$2400	Massa for Congress	Eric Massa
6/30/09	$2400	Ellison for Congress	Keith Ellison
7/8/09	$1000	Citizens for Senator Spector	Arlen Spector
9/13	$1000	Frank Kratovil for Congress	Frank Kratovil
9/30/09	$2400	Steny Hoyer for Congress	Steny Hoyer
10/21/09	$2400	AMERIPAC

NSD/CES/REGISTRATION
 UNIT
 2009 NOV 24 AM 10:41

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS - MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶.

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
3/20/2009	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (Q1-Q4 2009)	$299,962.50

$299,962.50

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
See Attachment A

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign. (See Rule 201(e).)

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Organization	Contact Type	Topics Discussed
4/2/09	Staff of Kathy Dahlkemper	Cong. Dahlkemper's office	Phone call	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/2/09	Norm Dicks:	US Congress	Phone call	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/2/09	Kari Moe	Cong. Ellison's office	Phone call	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/2/09	Keith Ellison	US Congress	Phone call	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/2/09	Erica Fein	Cong. Dingell's office	Phone call	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/2/09	Beth Sinowski	Cong. Dingell	Phone call	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/2/09	Donna Frohn	Cong. Frank Kratovil	Phone	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/2/09	Jim Moran	US Congress	Phone call	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/2/09	John Tanner	US Congress	Phone call	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/6/09	Senator Leahy	US Senate	Letter	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/6/09	Senator Feingold	US Senate	Letter	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/6/09	Senator Inhoff	US Senate	Letter	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/6/09	Senator Demint	US Senate	Letter	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/6/09	Senator Kohl	US Senate	Letter	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/6/09	Senator Brownback	US Senate	Letter	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/6/09	Senator Kennedy	US Senate	Letter	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/8/08	Staff of Kathy Dahlkemper	Cong. Dahlkemper's office	Email	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara
4/8/09	Donna Frohn	Cong. Frank Kratovil	Email	Morocco-US bilateral relations; Western Sahara

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	11/15-11/19	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	12/10-12/15	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	1/28-2/3	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations
Kingdom of Morocco	4/2-4/5	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Consultations on Morocco-US relations

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies
 FARA registration supplemental filing – November 21, 2008 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
	$500	WesPac	WesPac
11/19/08	$2500	2008 General Election Debt
1/25/09	$2300	Ellison for Congress	Keith Ellison
2/18/09	$2400	Fritchey for Congress	John Fritchey
2/24/09	$1000	Friends of Byron Dorgan	Byron Dorgan
3/31/09	$500	DSCC	DSCC
4/1/09	$500	New Dominion PAC	New Dominion PAC
4/1/09	$1000	Moran for Congress	Jim Moran
4/29/09	$2000	Shumer for Senate	Charles Shumer

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant’s President and CEO. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of candidate
2/20/09	$1,000	Fritchey for Congress	John Fritchey

Please note that the above contribution was made by the Registrant’s Vice-President. The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Title	Organization	Topics Discussed
5/29/08	Howard Diamond	Staff	House Foreign Relations Committee	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
5/9/2008	Tim Reiser	Staff	Senate Appropriations Committee	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
5/23/2008	Puneet Talwar	Staff	Senate Foreign Relations Committee	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue

SECTION IV: Response to Question 14 (c)

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	5/12-5/17	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues
Kingdom of Morocco	10/6-10/16	Airline ticket, lodging, meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a)

15 (a) Disbursements – Monies

FARA registration supplemental filing – May 22, 2008 - $305.00

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements -- Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
5/1/2008	$500	Keep Rahall in Congress	Nick Rahall
5/1/2008	$500	Byrne for Congress	Leslie Byrne
6/18/2008	$2500	Ameripac
8/6/2008	$2300	Lincoln for Congress,	Lincoln Diaz-Balart
8/8/2008	$1000	Team Sununu	John Sununu
8/20/2008	$500	Udall for Colorado	Mark Udall
9/11/2008	$500	Issa for Congress	Daryll Issa

9/26/2008	$50	Udall for Us All	Tom Udall.
9/26/2008	$1000	Jim Moran for Congress	Jim Moran
9/27/2008	$2300	Kratovil for Congress	Frank Kratovil
9/29/2008	$2000	Friends of Mark Warner	Mark Warner

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO.

The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

While the Registrant's President & CEO is paid by the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco, payment was not received for this reporting period.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
2/28	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (Q4 2007)	$174,975.00
4/22	Government of the Kingdom of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (Q1 - Q4 2008)	$499,975.00
			$674,950.00
			Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	10/31-11/09	Ticket, lodging, meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.
Kingdom of Morocco	11/19-11/27	Ticket, lodging, meals	Same as above
Kingdom of Morocco	2/29-3/5	Ticket, lodging, meals	Same as above

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign (See Rule 201(e).)

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Title	Organization	Topics Discussed
4/29/08	Senator John Sununu	Senator	Senator Sununu's office	Telephone call to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
4/24/08		Staff	House Foreign Relations Committee	Staff briefing to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
1/10/08	Tim Rieser	Staff	Senator Leahy's office	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
2/27/08	Tim Rieser	Staff	Senator Leahy's office	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
12/12/08	Denis McDonough	Foreign Policy Coordinator	Obama for America	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
12/11/07	Gary Gensler	Senior Advisor	Hillary Clinton for President	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
11/16/07	Sarah Margon	Staff	Senator Feingold's office	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
4/15/08	$1000	Tom Udall for NM Congress	Tom Udall
2/12/08	$1000	John D. Dingell for Congress	John D. Dingell
2/12/08	$250	Larry LaRocco for Senate	Larry LaRocco
12/11/07	$1000	Mark Udall for Colorado	Mark Udall
12/04/07	$250	Footlick for Congress	Jay Footlick
11/14/07	$1000	Ros-Lehtinen for Congress	Ileana Ros-Lehtinen

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO.

The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

CONFIDENTIAL
 2008/11/16 AM 11:22
 CONFIDENTIAL

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
04/28/08	$500	Hillary Clinton for President	Hillary Clinton
12/03/07	$500	Hillary Clinton for President	Hillary Clinton

Please note that the above contributions were made by the Registrant's Vice-President. The Registrant - The Gabriel Company, LLC - did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
8/07/2007	Government of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (for Q2 & Q3)	$200,000.00

$200,000.00

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	06/24/07	Ticket, lodging, meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.
Kingdom of Morocco	09/18/07	Ticket, lodging, meals	Same as above
Kingdom of Morocco	10/31/07	Ticket, lodging, meals	Same as above

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign [See Rule 201(c)]

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Title	Organization	Topics Discussed
5/03/07	Kari Moe	Staff	Congressman Ellison office	Email to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
5/11/07	Alan Makovsky	Staff	House Foreign Relations Committee	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
5/16/07	Senator Feingold and Sarah Margon	Senator and staff	Senator Feingold's office	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
5/17/07	Staff of Senate foreign relations committee	Staff	Senate foreign relations committee	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
5/07	Puneet Talwar	Staff	Senate Foreign Relations Committee	Email to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
5/30/07	Paul Blocher	Staff	Congressman Thad McCotter	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
5/30/07	Frank Lowenstein	Staff	Senator John Kerry	Meeting and follow-up email to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
6/1/07	Frank Lowenstein	Staff	Senator John Kerry	Follow-up email to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
7/12/07	Keith Ellison	Congressman	Congress	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
8/7/07	Kari Moe	Staff	Congressman Ellison office	Email to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue

1857 115 115 115 115
61 0 115 115 115

APR 02 19
11 58 AM '07

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
6/07	$1000	Nick Rahall	Nick Rahall
7/1/07	$500	Gregory Meeks for Congress	Gregory Meeks
7/11/07	$2300	Hoyer for Congress:	Steny Hoyer
9/14/07	$2300	Friends of Fred Thompson	Fred Thompson
9/14/07	$250	Committee to Reelect Ed Towns	Ed Towns
9/17/07	$1000	Barbara Lee for Congress	Barbara Lee
9/17/07	$250	Carol Shea-Porter for Congress	Carol Shea-Porter

Please note that these contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO.

The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
5/15/07	$2300	Hillary Clinton Exploratory Committee	Hillary Clinton

Please note that these contributions were made by the Registrant's Vice-President.
The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

While the Registrant's President & CEO is paid by the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco, payment was not received for this reporting period.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
------	-----------	---------	--------

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	11/1/06	Ticket, lodging, meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.
Kingdom of Morocco	12/6/06	Ticket, lodging, meals	Same as above
Kingdom of Morocco	2/3/07	Ticket, lodging, meals	Same as above
Kingdom of Morocco	4/1/07	Ticket, lodging, meals	Same as above

6, 7 A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign (See Rule 201(c).)

8 An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal

9 Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Questions 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advise to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Title	Organization	Topics Discussed
1/29	Byron Dorgan	Senator	Congress	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
1/29	Keith Ellison	Congressman	Congress	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
1/30	John Sununu	Senator	Congress	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
3/28	Russ Feingold	Senator	Congress	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
4/17-4/25	Jim Moran Jim Cooper Beth Siniawsky Norm Dicks Ed Whitfield Vickey Bandy Bart Gordon Kari Moe John Tanner	Congressman Congressman Staff Congressman Congressman Staff Congressman Staff Staff	Congress Cong. Dingell office Cong. Nick Rahall office Congress Cong. Keith Ellison office Cong. Ackerman office	Phone call to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
4/17	Ben Cardin	Senator	Congress	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
April 19	Puneet Talwar	Staff	Foreign Relations Committee	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
April 20	Mariah Sixkiller	Staff	Majority Leader's office	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue
4/27	Howard Diamond	Staff	Cong. Ackerman office	Meeting to discuss the issue of instability in North Africa and Moroccan proposals to address the issue

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

15 (c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount	Organization	Name of Candidate
	$4600	Hillary Clinton Exploratory Committee	Hillary Clinton
1/15	$1000	Rangel for Congress	Charles Rangel
1/22	$1000	John Dingell for Congress	John Dingell
1/28	$200	Allyson Schwartz for Congress	Allyson Schwartz
2/11	$2100	Bill Richardson for President Exploratory Committee	Bill Richardson
2/12	$500	Ellen Tauscher for Congress	Ellen Tauscher
2/15	$1000	Friends of Rahm Emanuel	Rahm Emanuel
3/12	$1000	Ellison for US Congress	Keith Ellison
3/14	$250	New Dominion PAC
3/23	$1000	Team Sununu	John Sununu
3/26	$1000	Democratic National Committee
3/26	$2500	Bill Richardson for President Exploratory Committee	Bill Richardson
3/27	$1000	Joe Biden for President	Joe Biden
3/29	$250	Darrell Issa for US Congress	Darrell Issa
3/29	$500	Sandhills PAC	Chuck Hagel

Please note that these contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO.

The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14 (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
08/07/06	Government of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered (for Q3 & Q4)	$200,000.00
			$200,000.00
			Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	05/20/06	Airline ticket, lodging & meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.
Kingdom of Morocco	07/05/06	Airline ticket, lodging & meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.
Kingdom of Morocco	09/11/06	Airline ticket, lodging & meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign (See Rule 201(e)).

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of Value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHEMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Question 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, including regional North Africa security issues and the creation and administration of advocacy institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Title	Organization	Topics discussed
6/96	Jordan Paul	Staff	Cong. L. Diaz-Ballart office	Meeting on Western Sahara & other general Middle East issues
10/3/06	Jordan Paul	Staff	Cong. L. Diaz-Ballart office	Meeting on the new Moroccan position regarding Western Sahara
10/27/06	Jordan Paul	Staff	Cong. L. Diaz-Ballart office	Meeting on the new Moroccan position regarding Western Sahara

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15(c)

15(c) Disbursements Political Contributions

Date	Amount or thing of value	Name of political organization	Name of candidate
5/1/06	$1000	ALC PAC
5/15/06	$1000		Cong. Jim Moran
6/06	$10,000		DNC
7/4/06	$1000	Richardson for Governor, NM	Bill Richardson
7/11/06	$1000	Unite Our States
9/27/06	$2000	Hilary Clinton for Senate
10/16/06	$1000	ALC PAC

2006 NOV 27 PM 12:46
 CRM/REGISTRATION UNIT

Please note that these contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO.

The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
03/24	Government of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered See Attachment A	$100,000.00

$100,000.00

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	11/20-11/29	Airline ticket, lodging & meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.
Kingdom of Morocco	1/21-2/05	Airline ticket, lodging & meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.
Kingdom of Morocco	3/31-4/05	Airline ticket, lodging & meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign (See Rule 201(e).)

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHEMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Question 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, and on the cultural and business interests between Morocco and the United States. Issues discussed include bilateral trade and economic policies; regional North Africa security issues; and the creation and administration of cultural, trade and educational institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Title	Organization	Topics discussed
11/28/05	Michael Singh	Director of North Africa & Regional Affairs	NSC	Telephone call on behalf of Minister Taieb Fassi Fihri to discuss news reports on prisoner interrogations in Europe to confirm the US position
11/28/05	William Laurence	Desk Officer-Tunisia	State Department	Telephone call on behalf of Minister Taieb Fassi Fihri to discuss news reports on prisoner interrogations in Europe to confirm the US position
12/05	Kent Keiser Beth Siniawski Katie Albert Cong. Jim Moran	Staff Staff Staff Congressman	Cong. Rahall's office Cong. Dingell's office Cong. Steny Hoyer Congress	Telephone call or meeting regarding their support of a congressional letter from Congress to Condeleeza Rice on the subject of Western Sahara
12/5	Darrell Issa Laurent Crenshaw Ian Campbell Staff Aaron Levy	Congressman Staff Staff Staff Staff	Congress Cong. Darrell Issa Cong. Meeks office Cong. Flake office Cong. Tancredo office	Anti-terrorism and migration issues
12/05	Henry Waxman Shelly Berkley Cong. Israel Cong. Steve King	Congressman Congresswoman Congressman Congressman	Congress Congress Congress Congress	Western Sahara meetings
2/06	Jeff Bergner	A/S for Legislative Affairs	State Department	Telephone call to discuss specific points in a letter to Congressman Lincoln Diaz-Ballart: human rights concerns & view of Morocco's desire to lay down an autonomy proposal.

2/13/06	Jeff Bergner	A/S for Legislative Affairs	State Department	Telephone call to discuss the contents of the letter to Congressman Diaz-Ballart in response to a congressional letter. This was in response to the phone call made the previous week.
2/17/06	Jordan Paul	Staff	Cong. L. Diaz-Ballart	Meeting on Western Sahara & other general Middle East issues
3/29/06	Jordan Paul	Staff	Cong. L. Diaz-Ballart	Meeting on the new Moroccan position regarding Western Sahara

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15(c)

15(c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount or thing of value	Name of political organization	Name of candidate
11/10/05	$1000	Team Sununu	Senator John Sununu
11/15/05	$1000	WesPAC	Multi-candidate PAC
3/15/06	$1,000	Congress	John Dingell

Please note that these contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO.

The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
05/05	Government of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered See Attachment A	$100,000.00
07/05	Government of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered See Attachment A	$100,000.00
10/27	Government of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered See Attachment A	$200,000.00
			$400,000.00
			Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	5/28/05	Airline ticket, lodging & meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.
Kingdom of Morocco	7/18/05	Airline ticket, lodging & meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.
Kingdom of Morocco	9/17/05	Airline ticket, lodging & meals	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign (See Rule 201(e))

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive sights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHEMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Question 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, and on the cultural and business interests between Morocco and the United States. Issues discussed include bilateral trade and economic policies; regional North Africa security issues; and the creation and administration of cultural, trade and educational institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15(c)

15(c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount or thing of value	Name of political organization	Name of candidate
8/15	$250.00	WesPAC	Multi-candidate PAC
5/1	$1,000.00	AmeriPAC	Multi-candidate PAC

Please note that these contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO.

The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
12/04	Government of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered See Attachment A	$100,000.00
02/05	Government of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered See Attachment A	$100,000.00
			$200,000.00
			Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	11/14	Airline ticket and lodging	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.
Kingdom of Morocco	01/09	Airline ticket and lodging	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign (See Rule 201(e))

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHEMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Question 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: The Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, and on the cultural and business interests between Morocco and the United States. Issues discussed include bilateral trade and economic policies; regional North Africa security issues; and the creation and administration of cultural, trade and educational institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Date	Contact Name	Title	Organization	Topics discussed
03/30/05	Atul Keshap	Language Student	Foreign Service Institute	Western Sahara
11/04	Tim Pounds	Director for North African and Middle East Regional Affairs	National Security Council	Western Sahara

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15(c)

15(c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount or thing of value	Name of political organization	Name of candidate
3/21/05	1000.00	Congress	John Dingell
4/13/05	250.00	Congress	Ray Lahoud
4/13/05	100.00	Maryland State Delegate	Tom Quinn

Please note that these contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO.

The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
10/04	Government of Morocco	Compensation for services rendered See Attachment A	$133,333.32

$133,333.32

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	05/04	Airline ticket	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.
Kingdom of Morocco	09/04	Airline ticket	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign. (See Rule 201(e).)

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHEMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Question 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: From time to time, the Registrant's President and CEO provides advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, and on the cultural and business interests between Morocco and the United States. Issues discussed include bilateral trade and economic policies; regional North Africa security issues; and the creation and administration of cultural, trade and educational institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15(c)

15(c) Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount or thing of value	Name of political organization	Name of candidate
5/13/04	$500	House race, WY	Nick Rahall
7/28/04	$1,000	Senate race, OK	Brad Carson
9/30/04	$2,500	Arab-American Leadership Council PAC

Please note that these contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO.

The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

ATTACHEMENT A

Activities on behalf of the Government of the United Arab Emirates: Registrant's President and CEO helped coordinate and attended meetings between the Minister of Interior and Culture of the United Arab Emirates and members of the United States Government on Capitol Hill. The subjects of these meetings were post-Iraq, the Middle East Peace Process, and counter-terrorism.

UAE Officials	US Government Officials	Date
Sheikh Abdallah Ben Zayed Al Nahyan (Minister of Information & Culture) Yousef Otaiba (Assistant to the Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces)	Senator John Sununu	1/28/04
Same as above	House International Relations Committee	1/30/04
Same as above	Senate Foreign Relations Committee Staff	1/30/04

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS - MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

Registrant's President and CEO is not paid, as described in the initial registration and this supplemental statement, by any of its foreign principals.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies⁶

Date	From whom	Purpose	Amount
------	-----------	---------	--------

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUND RAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fund raising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D⁸ to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS - THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name of foreign principal	Date received	Description of thing of value	Purpose
Kingdom of Morocco	Dec. 8, 2003	Airline ticket	Advise Government of Morocco on regional security issues.

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, money, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fund raising campaign. (See Rule 201(e).)

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fund raising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

ATTACHEMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Question 11 and 12

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: From time to time, the Registrant's President and CEO has provided advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, and on the cultural and business interests of Morocco and the United States. Issues discussed include bilateral trade and economic policies; regional North Africa security issues; and the creation of cultural, trade and educational institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

Activities on behalf of the Government of the United Arab Emirates: Registrant's President and CEO helped coordinate and attended meetings between the Minister of Interior and Culture of the United Arab Emirates and members of the United States Government on Capitol Hill. The subjects of these meetings were post-Iraq, the Middle East Peace Process, and counter-terrorism.

UAE Officials	US Government Officials	Date
Sheikh Abdallah Ben Zayed Al Nahyan (Minister of Information & Culture) Yousef Otaiba (Assistant to the Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces)	Senator John Sununu	1/28/04
Same as above	House International Relations Committee	1/30/04
Same as above	Senate Foreign Relations Committee Staff	1/30/04

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (a) and 15(c)

15(a). Disbursement – Monies

Registrant's President and CEO is not paid by any foreign principal and has made no disbursements on their behalf during this 6-month reporting period.

15(c). Disbursements – Political Contributions

Date	Amount or thing of value	Name of political organization	Name of candidate
4/23/04	$500	Congress	Rep Jim Moran
4/7/04	$2,000	Presidential campaign	Sen. John Kerry
3/31/04	$1,000	Congress	Rep. Chris John
3/04	$1,000	Congress	Rep. John Dingell
11/24/03	$1,000	Puerto-Rican Self Determination PAC	Governor Pedro Rosello

Please note that these contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO.

The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

ATTACHEMENT A

SECTION III: Response to Question 11

Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: From time to time, the Registrant's President and CEO has provided advice to the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations, and on the cultural and business interests of Morocco and the United States. Issues discussed include bilateral trade and economic policies; regional North Africa security issues; and the creation of cultural, trade and educational institutions to promote Morocco's interests in the United States.

SECTION IV: Response to Question 15 (c)

Date	Amount or thing of value	Name of political organization	Name of candidate
10/29	$2,000.00	Wes Clark for President	Wesley Clark
09/29	$250.00	Congress	Jonathan Miller
09/29	$1,000.00	Congress	John Dingell

In addition, Registrant's President and CEO made a contribution of $500.00 to the campaign of Congressman Jim Moran in March 2003. This contribution was inadvertently left out in the Registrant's most recent supplemental statement, filed May 23, 2003.

Please note that these contributions were made by the Registrant's President and CEO.

The Registrant – The Gabriel Company, LLC – did not make any contributions.

ATTACHMENT A

Activities on behalf of the Government of the United Arab Emirates: Registrant's President and CEO helped coordinate and attended meetings between officials of the United Arab Emirates and members of the United States Government on Capitol Hill. The subjects of these meetings were post-Iraq, the Middle East Peace Process, and counter-terrorism.

UAE Officials	US Government Official	Date
Sheikh Mohammed Ben Zayd Al Nahyan (Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces)	Sen. Hagel; R-Nebraska	5/19/03
Sheikh Abdallah Ben Zayd Al Nahyan (Minister of Information & Culture),
Youssef Otaiba (Assistant to the Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces)
Dr. Jamal (Advisor for the Armed Forces)
Same as above	Sen. Pryor, D-Arkansas	5/19/03
Same as above	Sen. Chaffee, R-Rhode Island	5/19/03
Same as above	Sen. Warner, R-Virginia	5/20/03
Same as above	Sen. Hutchinson, R-Texas	5/20/03
Same as above	Tony Blinken – Chief of Staff for the Minority, Committee on Foreign Relations	5/20/03

REGISTRATION UNIT
 COM/ISS
 2008 MAY 30 PM 12:48

(b) DISBURSEMENTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you disposed of anything of value¹⁰ other than money in furtherance of or in connection with activities on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, and 9 of this statement?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Date disposed	Name of person to whom given	On behalf of what foreign principal	Description of thing of value	Purpose
---------------	------------------------------	-------------------------------------	-------------------------------	---------

(c) DISBURSEMENTS-POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS

During this 6 month reporting period, have you from your own funds and on your own behalf either directly or through any other person, made any contributions of money or other things of value¹¹ in connection with an election to any political office, or in connection with any primary election, convention, or caucus held to select candidates for political office?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Date	Amount or thing of value	Name of political organization	Name of candidate
11/21/02	$ 500.00	Congress	Darrell Issa
11/21/03	$ 2500.00	Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC)
3/24/03	$ 2500.00	DCCC

Please note that these contributions were made by the Registrant's President & CEO.

The Registrant - The Gabriel Company LLC - did not make any contributions

10, 11 Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks" and the like.

ATTACHMENT A

SECTION I: Response to Question 5(c)

The individual listed in the response to question I. 5 (c) has not yet rendered services to any foreign principal, but may do so in the future. Therefore her short-form registration is included as part of this supplemental filing.

SECTION III: Responses to Questions 11 and 12

- 11. Activities on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco: From time to time, Registrant's President and CEO has provided advice on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco on U.S.-Morocco relations and on the cultural and business interests of Morocco in the United States. Issues discussed include bilateral trade and economic policies, as well as regional North Africa security issues.

Activities on behalf of the Government of the United Arab Emirates: Registrant's President and CEO helped coordinate and attended meetings between officials of the United Arab Emirates and members of the United States Government on Capitol Hill. The subjects of these meetings were post-Iraq, the Middle East Peace Process, and counter-terrorism.

UAE Officials	US Government Officials	Date
Sheikh Mohammed Ben Zayd Al Nahyan (Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces)	Sen. Hagel; R-Nebraska	5/19/03
Sheikh Abdallah Ben Zayd Al Nahyan (Minister of Information & Culture).
Youssef Otaiba (Assistant to the Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces)
Dr. Jamal (Advisor for the Armed Forces)
Same as above	Sen. Pryor; D-Arkansas	5/19/03
Same as above	Sen. Chaffee; R-Rhode Island	5/19/03
Same as above	Sen. Warner; R-Virginia	5/20/03
Same as above	Sen. Hutchison; R-Texas	5/20/03
Same as above	Tony Blinken – Chief of Staff for the Minority, Committee on Foreign Relations	5/20/03

CRM/ISS
REGISTRATION UNIT
MAY 30 PM 12:48

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Date: Fri, 26 Aug 2011 09 :00
To: Robert Holley <RobertMHolley@aol.com>
Cc: Fatima Kurtz <fatima.kurtz@thegabrielco.com>,
Jean R AbiNader <jabinader@moroccanamericancenter.com>,
Aziz Mekouar <azizmekouar@gmail.com>,
Calvin Dark <cdark@moroccanamericancenter.com>,
Garth Neuffer <gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com>,
Jordan Paul <jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com>,
Caitlin Dearing <cdearing@moroccanamericancenter.com>
Subject: Re: Libya: Dozens of Polisario mercenaries captured by the National Transiti ...

We have to seek agreement from rabat on anything we do that mentions Algeria. Until we have clarity on that pt. Algeria is off limits.

Sent from my iPad

On Aug 26, 2011, at 8:25 AM, "RobertMHolley@aol.com" <RobertMHolley@aol.com> wrote:

Great stuff. Will look for the RRT recommendations, but a couple of things I think we definitely should do. A press release, obviously. But also an Op-Ed back to the same media outlet that we used when we first did a piece on this subject (under Ed's signature -- as we did last time). Purpose of the Op-Ed would also be something that we can again circulate to Congress as we did with the last one to point out the Polisario complicity in defying the UN resolution and engaging in active combat against the US and its NATO allies. Also useful to point out again that Algeria, along with Syria, was among those who voted against sanctioning Libya during the original Arab League vote. Press release and Op-Ed should also pick up the salient points from that excellent article analyzing US/UK/GOF policy moves in trying to maneuver Algeria away from support for Libya (a move that obviously failed miserably -- and caused us the famous "collateral damage" when State got its nose out of joint for our making a public issue out of this story while they were engaged in their failed attempt to end GOA support for Ghadaffi's regime and protect their precious "neutral" stance between GOM/GOA on the Sahara issue). Noting the steady stream also of news articles reporting the various times that Algeria was caught shipping materials to Libya -- all of which they denied -- of course. Denials that not look even more disingenuous today than they did at the time. Really think we can do some very serious damage to Algeria and especially the Polisario in Congress with this new information. Would like to think that hammering on this could help move State -- but will believe that when I see it. nevertheless, getting this around the Hill should both stiffen the resolve of our friends to back us and might even sway some neutrals and get some of the Polisario supporters on the defensive in a serious way.

We are very engaged here in McGill stuff today, but will have my Blackberry with me and would like to see drafts of both the press release and Op-Ed.

Thanks. Bob

Gee wiz! I guess we weren't wrong after all!! Jean, I think we need a rapid response team meeting to assess and recommend asap. I also need a translation. Thx

Sent from my iPad

On Aug 26, 2011 , at 4:12 AM, "Fatima Kurtz" <fatima.kurtz@thegabrielco.com> wrote:

> Libye : Des dizaines de mercenaires du polsario captures par le CNT

>

> Quelques 556 mercenaires du "polsario", appeles en renfort par Jes troupes de Kadhafi, ont ete arretes par Jes combattants du Conseil national de transition libyen (CNT), selon le site internet "geotribune.com <<http://geotribune.com>>" qui cite une source du conseil. Plusieurs de ces mercenaires ont ete arretes dans la ville de Zawiya, mais egaleme nt dans le complexe militaire de Bab El Aziziah , ajoute la meme source, precisant que le CNT a ordonne leur transfert vers Benghazi en attendant de "mettre la main sur le reste des elements du Polisario se trouvant en Libye". Selon la meme source, la decision du CNT a ete prise a la suite de l'attaque menee le 22 aout par Jes insurges contre l'ambassade d'Algerie a Tripoli. Dans les locaux de la chancellerie algerienne, Jes combattants anti-Kadhafi auraient trouve des documents particulierement compromettants pour Alger, revelant un soutien massif au colonel Kadhafi. Les dossiers ont confirme ce qui etait en partie connu : une aide militaire et logistique algerienne a Kadhafi, outre la presence sur le sol libyen de plusieurs centaines de mercenaires du Polisario. Pour rappel, la presence de mercenaires du Pol isario aux cotes du clan Kadhafi avait provoque, des le debut de !'insurrection, une forte tension entre le CNT et Alger, note le site internet qui ajoute que le CNT accusait les responsables algeriens de soutenir le dictateur libyen

>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com >
Date: Wed, 28 Sep 2011 23:05
To: taibfassi@maec.gov.ma, abdel-ouahab@hotmail.com, bahae_lil@yahoo.com, SE@interieur.gov.ma, bourita@maec.gov.ma, laraichi1@gmail.com
Subject: IMPORTANT and SECRET: Facts on the Ground Report Language/NOT FOR MEDIATIZATION

We are pleased to inform you that the US House of Representatives has acknowledged that US aid should be used in the Western Sahara. This is potentially a huge advancement for this issue as it allows US monies to be spent in the Sahara. Additional language was also included in the report, which we are forced to accept as part of the compromise process explained below.

As part of the full House Appropriations Committee process, the subcommittee on House Foreign Operations (which funds the State Department and other foreign operations) approved its budget for the fiscal year 2012, along with a committee report explaining various caveats defining particular budget items. It is in this report language that we were successful in inserting the following language:

Morocco. - The Committee notes that funds provided in title III of this Act (which is means all bilateral development and economic assistance programs) for Morocco may be used in any region or territory administered by Morocco. The Committee remains concerned about resolving the dispute over the Western Sahara and urges the State Department to prioritize a negotiated settlement and should consider the Moroccan autonomy plan.

As part of the congressional appropriations process, compromises must be made among members, especially when they are in the same party. This particular compromise required an attempt to satisfy Congressman Wolf by his congressional colleagues. The additional language in the bill therefore includes the following:

The Committee notes Morocco's partnership and cooperation on counter-terrorism activities and commends the recent constitutional referendum but remains concerned by the deportations of United States citizens living in Morocco. The Committee directs the Department of State to work with the Government of Morocco to ensure that United States citizens receive due process in such cases. The Committee further directs the Secretary of State to submit a report, no later than 45 days after enactment of this Act, detailing steps taken by the Government of Morocco in the previous 18 months on human rights, including deportation of United States citizens in Morocco.

This language is a significant win for the team, as it only calls for a report on the status of the deportation of US citizens, and not the elimination of the MCC compact of $500M, which Congressman Wolf had originally sought and is still seeking.

Please take careful note that this is only the first step in the complex process of getting this language included in the final appropriations bill. The Senate Foreign Operations subcommittee has already passed its version of the budget, which does not include our language, as stated above. The reason being that Senator Leahy is the chairman of this particular subcommittee and has been antagonistic towards Morocco. Our strategy in this regard was to make sure we did not inform him of our actions in the other chamber.

Now the two bills must be approved by the full House and Senate, before going to a joint conference committee to reconcile them both into one version for congressional passage and submission to the President for signing. As you can see, we have many more steps to go before we will know for sure whether we were successful. In the meantime please keep this news confidential as we do not want to give our adversaries the opportunity to insert themselves into this process. Thank you, Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com >
Date: Sat, 8 Oct 2011 07:23
To: taibfassi@maec.gov.ma, Yassine Mansouri, Fouad El Himma, Saad Hassar, Faycal LARAICHI
Subject: WS intel

This information has not been corroborated by third parties but is from a generally reliable source.

A Sahrawi journalist in in Algiers told us earlier this week that discussions within Polisario's ruling circles over the situation in Dakhla are focused on how to maintain the momentum of the movement and create a capital of sympathy with the young demonstrators. Parallel to this , there are efforts to transform these social protests into demonstrations against the "recently settled" populations of Dakhla and Laayoune, iwhom the authorities settled in camps in the two cities pending more permanent housing. The Moroccan government's aim is to populate the Sahara with Moroccans, says the journalist. A wave of demonstrations calling for the "expulsion of the settlers" will be launched in the coming days, concentrating at first on the Camp de l'Unite in the suburbs of Dakhla [now more commonly known as Wekala], and then extending to other Sahrawi towns.

A member of the "Polisario of the interior" from Laayoune says his organization has been collecting signatures since August from Sahrawis under Moroccan rule for a petition to the European Union to take the Western Sahara out of fishing accords with Morocco . The petition calls on the EU to stop according Morocco the right to exploit the natural resources of the "occupied" Western Sahara. The campaign is organised by Polisario activists "of the interior" and coordinated with the SADR leadership.

Sent from my iPad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, January 10, 2012 5:37 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Invite for Ambassador Bouhlal to Terrorism Panel
Attachments: AmbassadorBouhlalInviteTerrorismPanel.pdf

Rachad,

Every year the Potomac Institute sponsors a Terrorism conference at the National Press Club. Together with the Embassy we have been working with Potomac on this conference for the past three years, supplying information and data. Attached is an invitation requesting your participation in this year's conference, February 2nd. Let me know how we can help and how you want to proceed and how we can be helpful. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

THE INTER-UNIVERSITY CENTER FOR TERRORISM STUDIES

Prof. Yonah Alexander
Director

INTERNATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL
Honorary Chairman
Prof. Edward Teller*
Hoover Institution
Stanford University

Members
Prof. Edgar H. Bronner
Inter-University Center
for Legal Studies
Washington, D.C.

Prof. Irwin Cotler
Faculty of Law
McGill University
Montreal, Canada

Prof. William Olson
National Defense University

Prof. Kingsley De Silva International Center for Ethnic Studies
Colombo, Sri Lanka

Prof. Gideon Frieder
The George Washington University
Washington, D.C.

Prof. Hanspeter Heuhold
Austrian Institute of International Affairs
Vienna, Austria

Prof. Christopher C. Joyner
Georgetown University
Washington, D.C.

Prof. Walter Laqueur Center for Strategic and International Studies
Washington, D.C.

Prof. Eric Moonman
City University
London, U.K.

Prof. Yuval Ne'eman*
Institute for Advanced Studies
Tel Aviv University
Israel

Prof. Michael Noone
The Catholic University of America
Washington, D.C.

Prof. V.A. Parandiker
Centre for Policy Research
New Delhi, India

Prof. Paul Rogers
Peace Studies
University of Bradford
U.K.

Prof. Richard Ward
The University of Illinois at Chicago
Chicago, IL

U.S. Offices
Potomac Institute for Policy Studies
901 North Stuart Street
Suite 200
Arlington, Va. 22203 USA
Tel: 1-703-525-0770
Fax: 1-703-525-0259
yalexander@potomac institute.org

Inter-University Center
for Legal Studies
The Foundry Building
1055 Thomas Jefferson Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20007 USA
Tel: 1-202-247-6006
Fax: 1-202-247-6010

*Deceased

To: Ambassador Mohamed Rachad Bouhlal
Ambassador of Morocco to the United States

From: Prof. Yonah Alexander
Director, Inter-University Center for Terrorism Studies (IUCTS)
e-mail: yalexander@potomac institute.org
703-525-0770 (office)
301-518-2823 (cell)

Date: January 10, 2011

Subject: Invitation to Speak at the 14th Annual Seminar on "International Cooperation in Combating Terrorism: Review of 2011 and Outlook for 2012" National Press Club, February 2, 2012 from 2:00pm to 4:00pm

Dear Ambassador Bouhlal:

The purpose of this communication is to invite you to be a speaker at our 14th Annual Seminar on "International Cooperation in Combating Terrorism: Review of 2011 and Outlook for 2012" at the National Press Club on Thursday, February 2nd from 2:00pm to 4:00pm. This event is co-sponsored by the IUCTS, the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies, and the International Law Institute. We consider the extraordinary contribution of Morocco to regional and global security concerns of immense value and therefore shall be grateful for your participation at the event.

We are also inviting Ambassador Daniel Benjamin, as well as the Ambassadors of India and Turkey. The audience, by invitation only, will include academics, government officials, congressional staff, diplomats, professionals, and businesspeople. We expect wide domestic and foreign media coverage of the seminar (e.g. C-SPAN). Moreover, the event will be accessible on the IUCTS-Potomac Institute for Policy Studies website and a seminar summary will be published in NATO's Partnership for Peace Review (please see attached information on this publication as well as general material on our academic programs).

We will be honored if you find it possible to join us on February 2, 2012 and would appreciate a response from you at your earliest convenience. I can be reached at yalexander@potomac institute.org or 703-525-0770 (office) and 301-518-2823 (cell).

With best wishes,
Yonah Alexander

FOR TERRORISM STUDIES

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, January 10, 2012 6:24 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Changes to Washington Team List

Rachad,

We have a mailing list to Washington team members – Embassy, consultants and Mac people. We pass on news items and other information they may find interesting from open sources. Below is a list of the names from the Embassy that were on the previous list before you arrived. Can you review at your convenience and add or subtract from the list please. Ed

Embassy personnel currently on the Wash Team List:

Hakim Sayeh
Hichame Dahane
Mouaad Ibriz
Ouafae Sehhar
Saida Zaid
Sandrine Boutonnet
Wassane Zailachi

Thank you, Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, January 13, 2012 1:26 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Getting ready to depart

Rachad

I'm leaving for the airport shortly and on my cell if you want to contact me. While in Morocco I'll be on my Moroccan cell as well.

We have been busy putting our strategy together and plan to email you a rough draft by Sunday the 22nd. Is it possible for you and me to meet the week of the 23rd to compare strategies?

Again, I remain at your service and please call me as needed. I will return to DC on Saturday January 21st. Ed

US cell +1 202 744 6810

Moroccan cell: +212 661 34 66 34

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, January 14, 2012 11:41 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: Getting ready to depart

Ok, thanks. I may call with a interim report on the conference. I will definitely see Ambassador Kaplan here, I'm sure. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

-----Original Message-----

From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Saturday, January 14, 2012 8:35 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Re: Getting ready to depart

Hi Ed,

Thank you for the email and I wish you a great trip.
We can definitely meet when you are back and talk about the strategy.

In the meantime enjoy your trip.

As for Isobel Coleman, I managed to arrange meetings for her with the Minister of Habous, the Mourchidates and the Ministry of education because she requested it during her conference call with Saida, Calvin and Naomi.

Please feel free to call me if you need to.

Rachad

2012/1/13, Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>:

> Rachad
> I'm leaving for the airport shortly and on my cell if you want to > contact me. While in Morocco I'll be on my Moroccan cell as well.
>
> We have been busy putting our strategy together and plan to email you > a rough draft by Sunday the 22nd. Is it possible for you and me to > meet the week of the 23rd to compare strategies?
>
> Again, I remain at your service and please call me as needed. I will > return to DC on saturday January 21st. Ed US cell +1 202 744 6810
> Moroccan cell: +212 661 34 66 34

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, January 23, 2012 2:34 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: a few items in the coming week for your consideration

Rachad,

I'd like to propose a few items for your consideration in week ahead:

- I will work with Sandrine to schedule a lunch to further discuss the strategic plan. At that time perhaps we can agree on a way to keep each other informed on weekly activities. I'm concerned that as we go through our efforts to finalize the strategic plan we will miss the activities we are doing on a weekly basis. Let's discuss how I can report to you weekly on our work etc.
- Do you want to finalize a strategic plan with our staffs? If so that would seem to be a next step after we agree on the plan.
- After we've agreed on a strategic plan and reviewed with staff, I then suggest you meet with the Washington team, including the Embassy, Mac and the consultants, to inform them of the plan and your priorities for the year. I think we should sign off on the strategic plan before you meet with the consultants. That way, in addition to a simple courtesy meeting with them you also will be outlining our plan for the year. I think this will be a very good way to present yourself and the way in which you and I are working together.

We can close off on these ideas when we next meet. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, January 24, 2012 4:53 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: Jean Abinader
Subject: NAPEO report
Attachments: NAPEO report 24 January 2012.doc

Ambassador,

Attached is Jean's report and assessment of the NAPEO conference for your information. We'd be happy to discuss further with you at your convenience. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

24 January 2012

TO: Ed Gabriel

FROM: Jean AbiNader
Executive Director, MATIC

RE: PNB/NAPEO Report

While there are many criteria by which to evaluate the program, there are three that are most important for MATIC: program content, relevance of the content to US trade and investment policy, and opportunities going forward for Morocco. In addition, I will touch briefly on four other items: the pre-conference workshop, conference logistics, perceptions issues, and lessons learned. Please treat these perspectives as my personal views and not representing what I say/have said in public. You can check my blogs at www.moroccoonthemove.com for my public statements.

There were very few participants from the Maghreb governments. Most of the audience and presenters were from the private sector: NGOs, companies, entrepreneurs, civil society, business associations, and similar groups. This helped to focus topics and possible results more broadly than if specific government programs were being discussed. After the Moroccans, the largest group was from Algeria.

Content

The speakers, in terms of expertise and materials presented, were quite effective, relevant, and enthusiastic about the potential for the region. The plenary sessions were WEF style discussion format, which did not necessarily provide for enough substance in the introductory sessions. For example, the discussion among the chairs of the Local Advisory Boards of Morocco, Tunisia, and Algeria was useful for insights into their goals; however, the discussion featuring Madeleine Albright and others would have been more substantive if they had more time than an hour, when too much time was taken up by acknowledgements and pleasantries. Overall, the Moroccan presenters, from the Minister of Economy and Finance, and Mostafa Terrab, to those who are working on specific issues including Jai Hokimi (US - entrepreneurship), Omar Tazi (youth employment), Hicham Lahlou (design),

Ilham Zhiri (women mentoring), Adil Naji (US – design), and others, made a very strong showing.

Topics including a wide range of topics from K-12 education to training and mentoring, entrepreneurship promotion, financing related to business development, cross-border opportunities, marketing, and sessions on specific sectors. It was difficult not to have something to do for the entire time of the conference.

Relevance to US Goals

If the purpose of NAPEO is to facilitate the creation of public-private partnerships that will generate specific projects and programs that result in measureable achievements of job growth, then it has succeeded at this stage. The challenges are ahead as the local advisory boards must acquire resources, overcome hurdles in each country, not impose a bureaucracy on local efforts, ensure support from the governments, and reach out for cross-border cooperation.

The role of the US government is clearly not clear...there was confusion about the relationship of the State Department and the Aspen Institute (the secretariat for PNB/NAPEO on a contract basis), what could be expected in funding from US agencies, and what role the US embassies play in each country. The State Department has funded the Education for Employment (EfE) expansion into Tunisia and Algeria with Libya to follow when it's ready. It has also given a grant to EfE in Morocco for a start-up program. The State Department does not have additional funding to undertake program activities beyond seed monies for such programs. In addition, the role of the Aspen Institute creates confusion because it is a contractor, not a US agency, and so does not/cannot fund projects under its mandate.

Whether or not the US will eventually benefit from the PNB/NAPEO initiative is ultimately in the hands of the local advisory boards and the Aspen Institute. As importantly, the local US embassies must be fully integrated into the program, which may conflict with their own USAID and MEPI priorities and their concern with initiatives over which the embassies have little control. This was clearly the case in Morocco until weeks before the Marrakech convention. There are US trade and investment promotion agencies that can play a helpful role, if the participants are exposed to their services and contact information. This is a key role for the US embassies and commercial offices.

One feature of the conference that was important but not handled well was the continual announcements of new initiatives and programs, such as a venture capital fund, funding for franchising, etc., that were made at every plenary session/meals. Very few people paid attention to the announcements and they did not "fire up the crowd," which was probably the intention.

Opportunities for Morocco

Given the level of participation by Moroccans and the range of initiatives that are underway, there appears to be a strong probability for growing jobs and companies over the next year. An interesting question is how the new government, which is focused on job creation, will look on NAPEO and the local committee. A great deal more can be achieved if there is coordination between the private sector and government agencies concerned with employment, entrepreneurship, and de-regulating bureaucratic commercial regimes. Corruption in Morocco, logistics tie-ups in the ports, antiquated rules on transshipments, and other impediments were mentioned by international companies that work in the Maghreb. Although Algeria was more criticized, that's not our problem...and it's not an excuse for not pursuing more aggressively those steps that will make Morocco more business friendly, from revising labor regulations to reducing the levels of corruption at the ports.

It is also clear that if NAPEO is to be effective in Morocco, it must depoliticize the image of its local advisory board. It will be helpful if the local board is able to gain recognition from the new government by having access to ministries that can facilitate access to resources, reforms, and outreach to small and medium-sized enterprises.

From the various panels and workshops, it is obvious that Morocco has much to gain and to offer within the region. Tourism, entrepreneurship, IT, tourism/hospitality services, microfinance, and agro-industries are areas for cooperation and expansion. Tunisia is poised to take a prominent position in tourism once again and it would be smart for Moroccan operators to be engaging their counterparts in Tunisia to look at regional tour packages combining the best of both countries. There is some question about how the local boards will encourage cross-border cooperation or how they will enable the participants at the conference to systematically follow up leads to which they have been exposed.

Related Concerns

As previously mentioned, there are four areas for additional comments that may be useful.

Pre-conference workshops

In response to a recommendation that the conference provide a higher-level of hands-on experience/expertise to the participants, NAPEO scheduled a day of workshops before the conference. Due to miscommunication with the local advisory committee, the workshops were not promoted in Morocco and those who attended were charged a fee separate from the conference. The content and presentations in the workshops was of a very high quality but there was very poor attendance. In most sessions, there were more presenters than attendees. The concept is right; the execution was a disaster. Hopefully, this will not be a problem next year in Tunisia.

Logistics

This was the greatest weakness of the conference and was the responsibility of the local advisory board. Registration did not open on time; in fact it was delayed for four hours. Every day the schedule was over time as the day started late and never recovered. Whenever there were breaks, attendees did not return to the sessions. This could not be helped since the primary purpose was networking but it could have been managed much better. These are not new issues for conference organizers. Directions to the rooms for concurrent sessions were unclear. Attendees were not fully aware that updated schedules were produced continually, thereby missing or arriving late at sessions. Integration of efforts between the local board and Aspen was not smooth.

The food was unsatisfactory and service to the rooms was 2+ stars, not better. The location was not user friendly; and the hotel, while attractive, was a taxi ride from the medina...not helpful to promoting tourism and not a good example to the other countries!

Perceptions

While this was not obvious to others, a number of Moroccans mentioned that it was unfortunate that the hotel, travel logistics, food and beverages, design firm, events management, and other services were all provided by a single vendor, who was on the local advisory board. If the overall effort had been first class, then there would have been less complaining or at least it would be more defensible.

Lessons Learned

While remedies for the logistics and other concerns mentioned above may not affect next year's program in Tunisia, there are some lessons that Morocco should take advantage of going forward.

- Workshops are a vital component of these types of programs. The more hands-on the presentations, the more likely the learning. Workshops should be fully integrated into the program.
- Local advisory boards are ambassadors for their countries to the private sector/civil society. They should maximize opportunities to consult, develop a strategy, gather the needed resources, and work as a team with Aspen to succeed.
- Morocco should come to Tunisia prepared with concrete options for cross-border projects: in tourism, IT, services, and other areas. This will require follow up by the local advisory board in Morocco with participants to get their inputs and project ideas and build them into proposals.
- Morocco should have an institutional means for coordinating with NAPEO. With the change in government, there was a hiatus in coordination. Perhaps an agency such as AMDI or a Regional Investment Center should have the responsibility over the longer term. Rather than waiting until the last months before the conference, efforts should start now to broaden Morocco's participation in Tunisia based on follow up to Marrakech.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, January 30, 2012 11:04 AM
To: tmoffett@moffettgroupdc.com; rfn@visionamericas.com; Bill Gray <bgray@grayloeffler.com>; McAllister@blankrome.com; naomi.decter@gmail.com; Sara Parker <sara.parker@grayling.com>; RNurnberger@grayloeffler.com
Cc: Jordan Paul <jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com>
Subject: status of contracts

Unfortunately I have no new updates to provide you on your contracts for 2012. While I am confident that we will receive answers soon, I cannot make any commitments at this time and therefore cannot pay for any services after February 1st. I hope you will understand this unusual circumstance and bear with us until we get through this transition with the new government in Rabat. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, January 30, 2012 11:17 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Chronology - Why it's time to Close the Camps/ Stop subsidizing Polisario renegades & AQIM recruits
Attachments: CHRONOLOGY - 'Polisario Renegades & AQIM Recruits- It's time to Close the Camps' 1-20-12 DRAFT.pdf

Attached is a chronology we prepared, as background, for the upcoming Potomac conference. It will also be used in our strategy as we discuss what we can and cannot discuss on this issue moving forward. Your input in this future exercise will be important. This provides you with a view of how we sometimes work hand in hand with Think Tanks, offering our research capability only, without authorship. Very good background for you on this subject. Ed

CHRONOLOGY – Why it’s time to Close the Camps

Timeline of documented incidents & reports linking members of the Polisario Front, based at refugee camps near Tindouf, Algeria, with illicit, renegade actions and al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM)

Polisario members engage in drug & arms smuggling in Sahel, gun battles in Mali, kidnappings for AQIM, & as mercenaries for Qaddafi It’s time to close the camps & stop letting US aid $$ subsidize renegades & terrorist recruits

Washington, DC (January 2012) – Late last year, Polisario insiders reportedly helped an offshoot of al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb \(AQIM\) kidnap three Western aid workers from Polisario-run refugee camps near Tindouf, Algeria, supplying assailants with arms and directions to the victims. The incident is only the latest in a long line of recent illicit, renegade acts by Polisario cadres based in the camps – including drug & arms smuggling, gun battles in Mali, mercenaries for Qaddafi in Libya, and kidnappings & collaborating to expand AQIM’s terror network in Africa’s Sahel.

Growing AQIM ties with Polisario and other militants in the region – Boko Haram in Nigeria, al-Shabaab in Somalia, FARC in Colombia, and AQAP in Yemen – have created what AFRICOM head US General Carter Ham calls a “threat to the US” and British Foreign Secretary William Hague warns could have a “profoundly destabilizing effect on countries in North Africa and the Gulf.” The AQIM-Polisario connection is also a clear threat to aid workers and refugees forced to live in the Tindouf camps. It’s time to free the refugees and close the camps.

Reviewing the CHRONOLOGY of documented incidents and expert reports confirms the separatist Polisario-run camps have become a dangerous recruiting ground for AQIM, hub for trafficking arms across the Sahel and drugs into Europe, and threat to the security of the region and reforms of the Arab Spring.

Top 5 Reasons to Close the Camps

- ▶ Polisario recruits carry out AQIM kidnappings – In addition to the three taken from the camps Oct. 23, Mauritania court records reveal AQIM paid Polisario veterans to kidnap Spanish nationals in 2009. Since 2006 AQIM has abducted some 50 Westerners for an est. $130 million in ransom. AQIM offshoot ‘al Qaeda in Polisario camps’ reportedly seized two more victims, French, on Nov. 24.
- ▶ Polisario drug & arms smuggling rings among Sahel’s largest – Algeria, Mali, and Mauritania have arrested dozens of Polisario members caught leading and operating major AQIM-linked drug and arms trafficking rings.
- ▶ Polisario incursions, gun battles in Mali – On Dec. 15, a Polisario cadre invaded Mali, kills one, kidnaps three. Mali warns: ‘this isn’t the Wild West.’ In Sept., a gun battle between Polisario and rival drug gangs kills four in Mali.
- ▶ Polisario mercenaries hired by Qaddafi to fight NATO/Libya rebels – Senior NATO officials received reliable information last spring that Qaddafi paid hundreds of Polisario mercenaries $10,000 to fight for him in Libya.
- ▶ Polisario denies rights, confines refugees, who are welcome elsewhere – Refugees in the camps are among the only in the world welcome to go elsewhere if the Polisario let them. Instead refugees are confined to the camps & denied their rights. Thousands have escaped to Moroccan Western Sahara. Those who succeed never go back. Those caught the Polisario jails inside containers sent for humanitarian aid. Since 1990 international agencies have spent more than $1 billion on the camps – more than $300 million from the US. Much is diverted for Polisario profit & smuggling. This has to stop. US aid $$ must only be used for durable solutions to resettle & repatriate refugees, not to deny rights or subsidize renegades & terrorist recruits.

Le Post

It’s time to close the camps, free the refugees, and shut down the Polisario-run base for AQIM recruits and renegades in the region.

CHRONOLOGY

Jan. 11, 2012

Algerian and Mauritanian security agencies reportedly break up major drug trafficking and money laundering rings. Officials say the rings are believed linked with groups such as Al Qaida, which is working with the Polisario to traffic arms and drugs from Mauritania to neighbors north. Mali reportedly also steps up efforts against AQIM and what is believed its latest offshoot, "Al Qaida in Polisario Camps," said to abduct two French nationals Nov. 2011.¹ WORLD TRIBUNE, 1-11-12

Jan. 3, 2012

Security expert Dr. J. Peter Pham, Atlantic Council, reports economic and political reforms in Africa are "threatened by the spread of violent extremism" and "increasing links" between AQIM and other militants in the Sahel, recently "buoyed by the flow of arms and fighters" from Libya. "More ominously, AQIM has increased its linkages with the Polisario," evident in AQIM's Oct. 23 kidnappings near Tindouf, which were "aided by Polisario sympathizers" inside the Polisario's camps. The camps offer "a ready pool of potential recruits" from "large numbers of idle young fighters."² ATLANTIC COUNCIL, 1-11-12

Dec. 27, 2011

Mali reportedly distances itself from the Polisario, accusing it of kidnapping, drug trafficking, and suspected collusion with a Sahrawi branch of al-Qaeda in the Magreb. A source close to the government says Mali is "angry" with the Polisario, and Mali officials say the Oct. 23 kidnapping was done in collusion with the 'Sahrawi link' of AQIM.³ AFP, 12-27-11

Dec. 24, 2011

Mali refuses entry to "eight young Sahrawis" coming from Niger. "They had no papers. There are laws to be respected in Mali especially when it comes to dubious propaganda," said Mali police.⁴ AFP, 12-27-11

Dec. 17, 2011

Mali warns Polisario "our country is not the Wild West where they can come to kill and kidnap people." Bamako will "no longer accept the violation of its territorial integrity by the Polisario Front," says a Malian Minister. A local official adds, "everybody here knows who AQIM's accomplices are, they even assisted in abducting the Europeans in Tindouf. His name is Omar al Sahraoui but neither Mali, nor Algeria, nor the Polisario are doing anything to capture him." In 2010, al Sahraoui, reportedly a Polisario veteran, was sentenced to 12 years in Mauritania for kidnapping Spanish aid workers for AQIM, according to Mauritania court papers. He was later released in a trade for the aid workers.⁵ MIDDLE EAST ONLINE, 12-17-11

Dec. 15, 2011

Security analysts warn that AQIM is seeking to turn the region into "a new Somalia" on the edge of Southern Europe. The Western Sahara dispute is cited as a key impediment to regional coordination to counter the rising threat.⁶ UPI, 12-13-11

TERRORISM HOT SPOT: AL-QAEDA CASTS SHADOW OVER SAHEL, EXPANDS ACROSS AFRICA Traces path through Failed/Fragile States, Links with Cartels at new Crossroads of Terrorism & Trafficking

Dec. 15, 2011

Polisario launches armed incursion into northern Mali, killing one, abducting three others, ostensibly looking for kidnappers of three Western aid workers taken Oct. 23 from Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria.⁷ MIDDLE EAST ONLINE, 12-17-11

Dec. 10, 2011

A splinter group of AQIM confirms holding the three aid workers kidnapped on Oct. 23 near the Tindouf refugee camps in Algeria. The group, linked by some to al Sahraoui, calls itself "Unity Movement for Jihad in West Africa."⁸ AFP, 12-10-11

Dec. 8, 2011

AQIM denies Oct. 23 kidnapping of three Spanish and Italian aid workers in southern Algeria, but confirms two other abductions in Mali, of two French men, and a Dutch, Swedish, and South African national.⁹ AP, 12-9-11

Nov. 30, 2011

US House Subcommittee on Counterterrorism and Intelligence hears testimony that AQIM is expanding its ties in the Sahel to the Polisario, as well as to militant Nigerian group Boko Haram and Somalia-based al-Shabaab.¹⁰ WORLD POLITICS REVIEW, 12-15-11

Nov. 28, 2011

UK Foreign Secretary William Hague says AQIM's expanding terrorist ties to other militant groups in the Sahel could have a "profoundly destabilizing" effect on a region already rocked by the Arab Spring.¹¹ REUTERS, 11-28-11

Nov. 25, 2011

AQIM kidnaps a Dutch, Swedish, S. African, kills one German in Timbuktu.¹² AP, 12-9-11

Nov. 24, 2011

AQIM kidnaps two French tourists from their hotel at night in eastern Mali, claiming they are spies.¹³ AP, 12-9-11

Nov. 7, 2011

Algerian Chief of Staff General Qaid Saleh reportedly reprimands Polisario chief Mohammed Abdul Aziz for allowing an Al Qaida presence inside the Polisario-controlled camps in Tindouf.¹⁴ WORLD TRIBUNE, 11-7-11

Nov. 6, 2011

W. Post columnist J. Rubin cites alarm at AQIM kidnappings in Polisario camps. "This is a catastrophe waiting to happen. The need to empty the camps, deprive AQIM of a supply of victims and accomplices, and restore order has never been greater."¹⁵ WASHINGTON POST, 11-6-11

Oct. 26, 2011

Spanish daily El Pais reports on Tindouf abductions that "To cross the checkpoints of the Algerian army and Polisario, kidnappers benefited from support of Polisario's military."¹⁶ MOROCCO WORLD NEWS, 10-26-11

Oct. 25, 2011

Spain requests UN security mission to Polisario-run camps. "We've asked the UN to send a mission to Algeria to assess the security situation in the camps of Tindouf" – For. Minister Trinidad Jimenez.¹⁷ AL ARABIYA, 10-25-11

Oct. 23, 2011

AQIM splinter group kidnaps three Western aid workers from Polisario-run camps in Algeria, reportedly with Polisario-insider help. "Unarmed AQIM militants entered the Sahrawi refugee camp in Tindouf, western Algeria, where sympathizers of the Polisario Front gave them weapons and helped them seek out the hostages."¹⁸ AFP, 10-30-11

Sept. 29, 2011

Mauritanian President reports that AQIM has acquired Libyan arms, including surface-to-air missiles.¹⁹ VOA, 9-29-11

Sept. 20, 2011

US expert says the "Polisario is intensifying activities to transport and smuggle illegal drugs in both North Africa and Europe. The Polisario is working with Al Qaida in both the drug & weapons trade" – Y. Alexander, ICTS.²⁰ WORLD TRIBUNE, 9-20-11

Security analysts believe AQIM uses drug trafficking and kidnapping to pay for terrorist attacks. [Reuters]

Sept. 15, 2011

Malian security forces hunt for rival gangs of drug smugglers from Mali, Niger, and the Polisario, after desert gun battle over ton of cocaine and hashish leaves four dead, according to a Malian army official.²¹ MIDDLE EAST ONLINE, 9-15-11

Sept. 10, 2011

Analysts say Libyan dictator Qaddafi's fall seriously weakens the Polisario in its dispute with Morocco on the Western Sahara, after widespread reports that Polisario mercenaries sided with Qaddafi.²² AFP, 9-10-11

May 29, 2011

US Cong. Mario Diaz-Balart urges colleagues give "serious attention" to evidence Polisario members are "participating as mercenaries in Col. Gadhafi's murderous campaign."²³ INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS TIMES, 5-29-11

May 20, 2011

US Administration expresses concern to Algeria that "credible sources report" Polisario mercenaries are being paid by Qaddafi "to fight NATO-led forces and kill Libyan protesters and rebels,"²⁴ WORLD TRIBUNE, 5-20-11

April 21, 2011

London Telegraph reports senior NATO officials have received information Col. Qaddafi is hiring 450 Polisario mercenaries for $10,000 each to fight Libyan rebels and prop up his regime.²⁵ LONDON TELEGRAPH, 4-21-11

Jan. 16, 2011

Former Polisario Chief Police Inspector, Mustapha Salma Ould Sidi Mouloud says "the situation is grave for the youth who are marginalized" in Polisario-run camps in Algeria. "The camps are fertile grounds for Islamic fundamentalist groups and drug traffickers."²⁶ WASHINGTON POST, 1-16-11

Jan. 6, 2011

Terrorism cell and arms cache broken up in W. Sahara, arrests suggest "links between AQIM and the Algeria-backed Polisario Front."²⁷ Washington Post columnist J. Rubin writes: "There is ample evidence the Polisario Front... is in league with al-Qaeda."²⁸ WASHINGTON POST, 1-6-11 and 1-16-11

Jan. 3, 2010

US DEA former Director of Operations, Michael Braun, calls conditions 'dismal for Saharans living in the Polisario-run camps,' which have become "a breeding-ground for potential future AQIM recruits."²⁹ FOREIGN POLICY/THE MIDDLE EAST CHANNEL, 1-3-11

Dec. 21, 2010

Leaders arrested in one of Sahel's largest drug-smuggling rings have close ties to the Polisario Front. Niger officials call it "one of the major drug trafficking networks" in the Sahara... It is known as "Polisario" because 90% of its members come from camps of the Polisario Front.³⁰ MIDDLE EAST ONLINE, 12-21-10

Polisario-linked ring has already transported tons of drugs

Dec. 9, 2010

Political experts express increasing concern about violence instigated by pro-Polisario militants in Laayoune, Western Sahara. "The situation is becoming more dangerous, because of the violence and because al-Qaeda is now present," – political analyst T. Tarik.³¹ NY TIMES, 12-9-10

Brutal violence against police by pro-Polisario militants in Laayoune 11- 8-10

Nov. 30, 2010

AQIM reported for first time to supply operatives to al-Qaeda's Yemeni arm (al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula/AQAP) to assist in a thwarted seaborne attack against France.³² WASHINGTON POST, 11-30-10

Nov. 10, 2010

Algeria reports “Cocaine that comes from Brazil, Peru, and Colombia supports the nucleus of al-Qaeda in the region” – Algerian head of the National Office for Combating Drugs & Addiction, Abdelmalek Sayeh.³³ MAGHAREBIA, 11-10-10

Oct. 18, 2010

Drug ring linked to AQIM dismantled in Morocco; Sahrawi recruits cited. VOA report cites experts and evidence from Mauritania and Mali that AQIM has over the last two years worked “to recruit Sahrawis who are trained fighters to carry out their operations.”³⁴ VOA, 10-18-10

Aug. 23, 2010

AQIM frees three Spanish kidnapping victims after Mauritania agrees to release kidnapping perpetrator, Omar Sahraoui, who is “believed to have been a senior commander of the Polisario Front in Western Sahara.”³⁵ ASSOCIATED PRESS, 8-23-10

Omar le Sahraoui

July 2010

Mauritania sentences reported Polisario veteran, Omar al Sahraoui, to 12 years for 2009 kidnapping of Spanish aid workers. Mauritanian court papers document that he was paid by AQIM along with at least three other Polisario veterans to carry out the crime.³⁶

WORLD DEFENSE REVIEW, 9-23-10

April 12, 2010

Security expert says Western Sahara conflict is a “vicious cycle” terrorists can use as an opening to exploit; cites “evidence members of the military arm of the Polisario Front have been involved.”³⁷ JOURNAL OF MIDDLE EAST & AFRICA, 4-12-10

February 2010

Polisario veteran Omar le Sahraoui is arrested in Mali and extradited to stand trial in Mauritania for kidnapping the Spanish aid workers.³⁸

WORLD DEFENSE REVIEW, 9-23-10

Nov. 29, 2009

AQIM claims responsibility for kidnapping three Spanish aid workers in Mauritania. Mauritanian security services later discover that AQIM had hired Omar le Sahraoui—who was reportedly a member of the Polisario’s heirarchy—and at least three other Polisario veterans to organize and carry out the abductions.³⁹

WORLD DEFENSE REVIEW, 9-23-10

Spanish nationals kidnapped for AQIM by Polisario veteran Omar le Sahraoui

July 2009

U.S. Committee for Refugees & Immigrants (USCRI) issues report, “Stonewalling Refugee Rights: Algeria & the Sahrawi,” that calls attention to the Polisario’s routine abuse and denial of refugee rights at the Tindouf camps in southwestern Algeria. The report notes the camps are located in a bleak part of the Sahara called ‘Devil’s Garden’ where “prospects for livelihoods are virtually non-existent,” from which refugees are denied the freedom to leave. It cites the 2008 case of Aboh Sghair, a refugee born in the camps, who the Polisario jailed after catching him trying to escape with his wife to Morocco. He bears scars after being chained 3 months in a food container (right) that international relief groups use to deliver humanitarian aid.⁴⁰ USCRI, July 2009

Refugee caught trying to escape jailed in chains by Polisario in food container (above) sent by international relief groups for humanitarian aid – USCRI

CHRONOLOGY - Sources

- 1 "N. African states take down major narcoterror drug network," WORLD TRIBUNE, 1-11-12
<http://www.worldnewtribune.com/2012/01/11/n-african-states-take-down-major-narcoterror-drug-network/>
- 2 "The Islamist Threat to Africa's Rise in 2012," ATLANTIC COUNCIL, J. Peter Pham, 1-3-12
<http://acus.org/new-atlanticist/islamist-threat-african-rise-2012>
- 3 "Mali distancing itself from the Polisario Front," AFP, 12-27-11
http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5i4CHA2HdwpCQj_XrFkcoFm4eHBQ?docid=CNG.09c4b8e975cfc23c8718b820ade10fec.161&index=0
- 4 "Mali distancing itself from the Polisario Front," AFP, 12-27-11
http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5i4CHA2HdwpCQj_XrFkcoFm4eHBQ?docid=CNG.09c4b8e975cfc23c8718b820ade10fec.161&index=0
- 5 "Bamako warns Polisario: 'Mali is not Wild West'," MIDDLE EAST ONLINE, 12-17-11
<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=49540>
- 6 "AQIM seeks 'new Somalia' in N. Africa; W. Sahara impasse impedes efforts to counter," UPI, 12-13-11
<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2011/12/13/special-report-al-qaida-seeks-new-somalia-in-n-africa-w-sahara-dispute-cited-as-obstacle-to-counterinsurgency/>
- 7 "Bamako warns Polisario: 'Mali is not Wild West'," MIDDLE EAST ONLINE, 12-17-11
<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=49540>
- 8 "Al-Qaeda splinter group' claims kidnap of Westerners," AFP, 12-10-11
<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5hJQYCSJBL5a0NCGjPMlyCS8SryfQ?docid=CNG.4df034a80725d0c44da18538105d6420.dd1>
- 9 "Report: Al-Qaida in North Africa denies Sahara kidnappings, confirms snatching French in Mali," AP/USA TODAY, 12-9-11
<http://www.usatoday.com/news/world/story/2011-12-09/al-qaeda-kidnappings/51766924/1>
- 10 "Western Sahara: Forgotten Corner of Arab Spring," WORLD POLITICS REVIEW, 12-15-11 <http://www.worldpoliticsreview.com/articles/10947/western-sahara-forgotten-corner-of-the-arab-spring>
- 11 "AQIM expansion could be 'profoundly destabilizing' to Arab Spring nations: UK Foreign Secretary," REUTERS, 11-28-11
<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2011/11/29/aqim-expansion-could-be-profoundly-destabilizing-to-nations-rocked-by-arab-spring-uk-foreign-secretary/>
- 12 "Report: Al-Qaida in North Africa denies Sahara kidnappings, confirms snatching French in Mali," AP/USA TODAY, 12-9-11
<http://www.usatoday.com/news/world/story/2011-12-09/al-qaeda-kidnappings/51766924/1>
- 13 "Report: Al-Qaida in North Africa denies Sahara kidnappings, confirms snatching French in Mali," AP/USA TODAY, 12-9-11
<http://www.usatoday.com/news/world/story/2011-12-09/al-qaeda-kidnappings/51766924/1>
- 14 "Algeria said to discipline Polisario commander over ties to Al Qaida," WORLD TRIBUNE, 11-7-11
<http://www.worldnewtribune.com/?p=1332>
- 15 "Al-Qaeda affiliate flexing its muscles in the Maghreb," WASHINGTON POST, Jennifer Rubin, 11-6-11 http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn/post/al-qaeda-affiliate-flexing-its-muscles-in-the-maghreb/2011/11/05/gIqANMbdQm_blog.html
- 16 "Kidnappers of 3 European aid workers benefit from polisario security apparatus' support," MOROCCO WORLD NEWS, 10-26-11
<http://moroccoworldnews.com/2011/10/kidnappers-of-three-european-aid-workers-benefited-from-polisario-security-apparatus-support-spanish-paper-says/>
- 17 "Has Spain switched gear on the Western Sahara conflict?," AL ARABIYA, 10-25-11
<http://english.alarabiya.net/articles/2011/10/25/173691.html>
- 18 "Three Qaeda hostages seized last week alive: mediator," AGENCE FRANCE PRESS (AFP), 10-30-11
http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5gfskPTlgBS_IQzBOK_R-Fdj_-z0A?docid=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4c3f07.531
- 19 "Gadhafi Collapse Raises Concerns Over Arms for Africa al-Qaida," VOICE OF AMERICA, 9-29-11
<http://www.voanews.com/english/news/-Gadhafi-Collapse-Raises-Concerns-Over-Arms-For-Africa-al-Qaida-130788458.html>
- 20 "Report: Polisario working with Al Qaida in drug, weapons trafficking," WORLD TRIBUNE, 9-20-11
http://www.worldtribune.com/worldtribune/WTARC/2011/ss_terror1178_09_20.asp
- 21 "Mali security forces hunt desert drug traffickers belonging to Polisario Front," MIDDLE EAST ONLINE, 9-15-11
<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=48062>
- 22 "Kadhafi's fall strengthens Morocco over Western Sahara," AFP, 9-10-11
http://www.zaawya.com/story.cfm/sidANA20110910T075729ZHNZ90/Kadhafis_fall_strengthens_Morocco_over_Western_Sahara
- 23 "US wants probe on Gadhafi's alleged recruitment of mercenaries from Algeria-backed Polisario to fight NATO, rebels," INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS TIMES, 5-29-11
<http://m.ibtimes.com/gade-redafi-libya-rebels-morocco-algeria-u-s-congress-154113.html>
- 24 "Sources: Gadhafi paying Polisario mercenaries $10,000 each to fight for him," WORLD TRIBUNE, 5-20-11
http://www.worldtribune.com/worldtribune/WTARC/2011/me_libya0607_05_20.asp
- 25 "Libya: Col Gaddafi 'has spent £2.1m on mercenaries'," LONDON TELEGRAPH, 4-21-11
<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/africaandindianocan/libya/8464254/Libya-Col-Gaddafi-has-spent-2.1m-on-mercenaries.html>
- 26 "Exclusive: Ex-Polisario Front police chief tells his story," WASHINGTON POST, Jennifer Rubin, 1-16-11
<http://voices.washingtonpost.com/right-turn/2011/01/exclusive-ex-polisario-front-p.html>
- 27 "Arrests of Terrorism Suspects Announced," WASHINGTON POST, World Digest from ASSOCIATED PRESS, 1-6-11
<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2011/01/05/AR2011010506468.html>
- 28 "Morocco: A Different Kind of Muslim Country," WASHINGTON POST, Jennifer Rubin, 1-12-11
<http://voices.washingtonpost.com/right-turn/2011/01/morocco-a-different-kind-of-muslim-country.html>
- 29 "Unlikely bedfellows: Are some Saharan Marxists joining Al-Qaida in N. Africa?," FOREIGN POLICY/MIDDLE EAST CHANNEL, 1-3-11 http://mideast.foreignpolicy.com/posts/2011/01/03/unlikely_bedfellows_are_some_saharan_marxists_joining_al_qaida_operations_in_north
- 30 "Key members of Sahara drug ring captured are from Polisario," MIDDLE EAST ONLINE, 12-21-10
<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=43149>
- 31 "Desert Land in Limbo Is Torn Apart," NEW YORK TIMES, 12-9-10
<http://www.nytimes.com/2010/12/09/world/africa/09morocco.html?ref=todayspaper>
- 32 "Al-Qaeda Yemen affiliate widens search for recruits, targets," WASHINGTON POST, 11-30-10
<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2010/11/29/AR2010112905459.html>
- 33 "Al-Qaeda looks to Sahel for new funding sources," MAGHAREBIA, 11-10-10
http://www.magharebia.com/cocoon/awi/xhtml1/en_GB/features/awi/features/2010/11/10/feature-01
- 34 "Morocco says dismantled drug ring linked to terrorists," VOICE OF AMERICA, 10-18-10
<http://www.voanews.com/english/news/africa/north/Morocco-says-Dismantled-International-Drug-Trafficking-Ring-Linked-to-Terrorists-105188824.html>
- 35 "Spanish hostages freed by al-Qaida arrive in Spain," ASSOCIATED PRESS, 8-23-10
<http://abcnews.go.com/International/wireStory?id=11464811>
- 36 "Threat of Emboldened al-Qaeda in Islamic Maghreb," WORLD DEFENSE REVIEW, J. Peter Pham, 9-23-10
<http://worlddefensereview.com/pham092310.shtml>
- 37 "Not Another Failed State: Toward Realistic Solution in Western Sahara," JOURNAL OF MIDDLE EAST & AFRICA, 4-12-10
http://pdfserve.informaworld.com/531924_921250405.pdf
- 38 "Threat of Emboldened al-Qaeda in Islamic Maghreb," WORLD DEFENSE REVIEW, J. Peter Pham, 9-23-10
<http://worlddefensereview.com/pham092310.shtml>
- 39 "Threat of Emboldened al-Qaeda in Islamic Maghreb," WORLD DEFENSE REVIEW, J. Peter Pham, 9-23-10
<http://worlddefensereview.com/pham092310.shtml>
- 40 "Stonewalling Refugee Rights: Algeria and the Sahrawi," US COMMITTEE FOR REFUGEES AND IMMIGRANTS, Merrill Smith, July 2009
http://www.uscrrrefugees.org/2010Website/3_Our%20Work/3_2_1_3_Morocco/Stonewalling.pdf

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, January 30, 2012 12:40 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian Situation Report

The following report is from open and closed sources. None of the information has been corroborated by third parties.

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- Gen. Ahmed Kherfi has been replaced as head of the DSI, the domestic security branch of the DRS, by Gen. Bachir Tartag, who has a reputation for brutality in combating islamist subversion.
- Parliamentary elections which are to be held in the first half of May look set to be considerably more transparent than previous polls, and there is a strong possibility that islamist parties will fare particularly well.
- The regime appears to be preparing for a carefully managed hand-over to an islamist dominated coalition government, although this is likely to unsettle the 'secular-modernist' within the regime itself.
- In what seems to be a tactical move ahead of the elections, the government has begun legalising new political parties, the better to ensure that no single party can win an outright majority.

Foreign Relations

- Moroccan Foreign Minister S. Othmani's visit to Algeria – his first foreign trip since taking office – has been taken as a sign that a rapprochement between Rabat and Algiers is making headway.
- Othmani, like his colleagues in the new islamist-led, does not have an entirely free hand, however, and those who really wield power in both Rabat and Algiers still seem reluctant to make compromises over the key issues dividing them: the border, and Western Sahara.
- Morocco has been invited to take part in the second Ministerial Conference on security in the Sahara-Sahel region to be held in Bamako in February, largely because Algiers now recognises that broader international cooperation is necessary to confront the challenge of the spread of weapons from Libya across the region.
- A source at the Algerian presidency has spoken disparagingly of Polisario's ability to contribute to the counter-terrorism effort in the Sahara.

Security

- After a lull, AQMI's level of activity picked up again in late December and January. Most incidents were as usual concentrated in Kabylia.
- In the Algiers region, the security forces have clashed with jihadists just to the south of Houari Boumedienne Airport.
- The governor of Illizi province in the south-east has been abducted and held for a time in Libyan territory before being freed by a Libyan militia.
- Both AQMI's Sahel branch and the dissident group which kidnapped three Western aid workers from Polisario's camps in Tindouf last autumn have issued communiqués threatening France.

Political Trends

As the Algerian regime gingerly negotiates the changes brought on by the 'Arab Spring', there has been a change at the head of the crucial Directorate of Internal Security (DSI) within the DRS intelligence and security service. On Dec. 22, Gen. Abdelkader 'Ahmed' Kherfi, who had headed the DSI for just over two years, was replaced by Gen. Bachir 'Athmane' Tartag, a DRS career officer with a reputation as a hardliner^[1], who was apparently called back from retirement for the occasion.

The move – officially made necessary by Kherfi's unspecified health problems – attracted an unusually large volume of media comment, most of it speculative (and possibly encouraged by the military and security establishment itself), with various explanations being put forward for the change at the top of this important institution. El Watan claims Kherfi was dismissed because of “the many setbacks suffered by the security services in the fight against AQMI”; Tartag's task, the newspaper argues, is to “eradicate the last foci of AQMI that still exist in the north of the country and to prevent the possible proliferation of terrorism to the borders with Libya, Niger and Mali, particularly in the wake of the major geopolitical upheavals in North Africa”. Le Matin concurs that Kherfi was ditched because of shortcomings in counter-terrorism, pointing to the kidnapping of European aid workers on from Polisario's Rabouni camp in October as a particular failing; the appointment of Tartag is “synonymous with a strategic shift in the strata of power”, argues Le Matin. Specialised news portal Kalima DZ notes that Gen. Kherfi “did not know how to, or could not, prevent the spread of riots, strikes, rallies and the media and the return of radical opposition” and suggests that Gen. Tartag will respond more swiftly, and more harshly, to events such as the food price riots that shook Algerian cities a year ago; thus “the Algerian generals have decided to raise a dam against the tide of history”. Another specialised website, Maghreb Intelligence, for its part, places the change at the head of the DSI in the context of a struggle for Lt-Gen. Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène's succession at the head of the DRS itself, suggesting that Tartag is Tewfik's preferred dauphin.

A source close to Tewfik to whom we spoke puts the removal of Kherfi down to a “business dispute of some sort” and insists that the change has nothing to do with the Tewfik's succession – notwithstanding occasional press speculation about his health, the DRS chief “isn't going anywhere” in the foreseeable future, insists the source. Even so, the choice of such a controversial figure as Tartag – who would certainly be the target of law suits from Algerian exile opposition groups for past human rights abuses should he ever have to travel to Europe – is by no means anodyne, and merits some consideration.

The change at the head of the DRS' domestic security arm comes at a sensitive time. Although there may be some sense that the Algerian regime has managed to ride out the worst of the turbulence of the Arab Spring, the coming parliamentary elections – due to be held in the first half of May – are likely to be a delicate moment. Conditions may not be in place for completely free and fair elections (amongst other things, the deeply flawed electoral registers have not been revised, leaving the door open to instances of multiple voting and other abuse), but the signs so far are that the regime is preparing for a poll that will be considerably more transparent than previous elections, in which rigging has on occasion been quite egregious – sizeable numbers of international observers are to be invited this time, it would seem, and clear perspex ballot boxes are supposed to replace the eminently stuffable receptacles used in the past. Islamist parties – with considerable support in Algerian society at large, and buoyed by Islamist electoral victories in Morocco, Tunisia and Egypt – are likely to fare the best in any reasonably free election, and indeed an Islamist parliamentary majority could by no means be ruled out. Indeed, it would seem to be in anticipation of this that the “house-trained” Islamist MSP announced on Jan. 1 that it was leaving the Presidential Alliance, in which it has been partnered with the FLN and the RND for the past eight years, and striking out on its own (albeit without giving up its ministerial portfolios for the time being). An 'alternance à la marocaine' – a carefully prepared and managed handover to an Islamist-dominated coalition government – would appear to be the regime's chosen path, or at least an option that it is prepared to consider. Objectively, a government with an Islamist orientation is by no means incompatible with the interests of the regime's main stakeholders, as long as guarantees are given with regard to their power and privileges (immunity from prosecution for human rights abuses, respect for property rights including for those whose wealth was acquired through their proximity to the state apparatus, etc.) – after all, successive Presidential Alliance governments, under the influence of the MSP and the “Islamist-conservative” wing of the FLN led by Abdelaziz Belkhadem, have already done much for the re-Islamisation of social mores and, arguably, of the law. But subjectively the regime is encumbered with the legacy of the civil war of the 1990s and 2000s, during which it relied heavily on anti-Islamist discourse, expounded most consistently and persistently by the secular-modernists not only in the media and political class but also within the regime's own ranks, including in the Army and security services. These secular-modernist elements will certainly be alarmed by the slide towards an openly Islamist government, potentially provoking tensions within the regime's own organs. Against this background, the appointment of an officer with a reputation as an unflinching, indeed brutal, enemy of the Islamists to head the DSI may be designed to allay such misgivings.

In the meantime, in preparing its tactics for the forthcoming election, the government appears to be doing all it can to balkanise the political landscape, so that no single political force can obtain a majority. In an apparent reversal of past practice, Interior Minister Daho Ould Kablia has given the go-ahead for at least ten new parties to hold their constituent assemblies and intimated that full authorisation to operate can be delivered within as little as a month – in plenty of time for the parliamentary elections. Among these are at least three Islamist parties: Abdelmajid Menasra's Front National pour le Changement (a split-off from the MSP), Ahmed Djaballah's Front pour la Justice et le Développement and Mohamed Saïd's Parti pour la Liberté et la Justice. While the Moroccan experience suggests that such a tactic can be very effective, it is worth considering that the multiplication of political groups is likely to increase the workload of the DRS, and more particularly the DSI, which has historically made a point not only of monitoring all political formations but also of maintaining agents of influence within them. Be it by accident or design, both the strategy and the tactics currently adopted by the Algerian regime seem to be guaranteed to enhance still further the specific weight of the DRS in general, and the DSI in particular.

REGIME VULNERABILITY BAROMETER®

Algeria risk factor levels

up to January 27

Score:
0.00 (yellow): low.
1.00 (red): high.

Youth rebellion

Endemic or worsening youth / graduate unemployment, housing shortage for young couples, lower middle and working classes adopting youth grievances, etc.

Loss of state monopoly over ideas and information

Contagion of ideas, ease of circulation of information, independently of the authorities: degree of internet penetration, number of mobile telephone subscribers, access to satellite TV, etc.

Cultural hegemony failure

Cultural hegemony can be said to have failed when segments of society no longer espouse the values of the ruling elite and the latter is compelled to resort to violence in order to assert its power.

Coalescent Opposition

Risk to the regime increases whenever existing ethnic/religious/regional cleavages do not hinder the emergence of a united opposition at a national level

Succession crisis

Crisis of governance and/or succession, ageing leader, "hereditary republic" syndrome, etc.

Divisions within the security forces

Internal rivalries, splits within the security services, government neglect of important segments of the armed forces, degree of reliance on conscripts, etc.

REGIME VULNERABILITY BAROMETER®

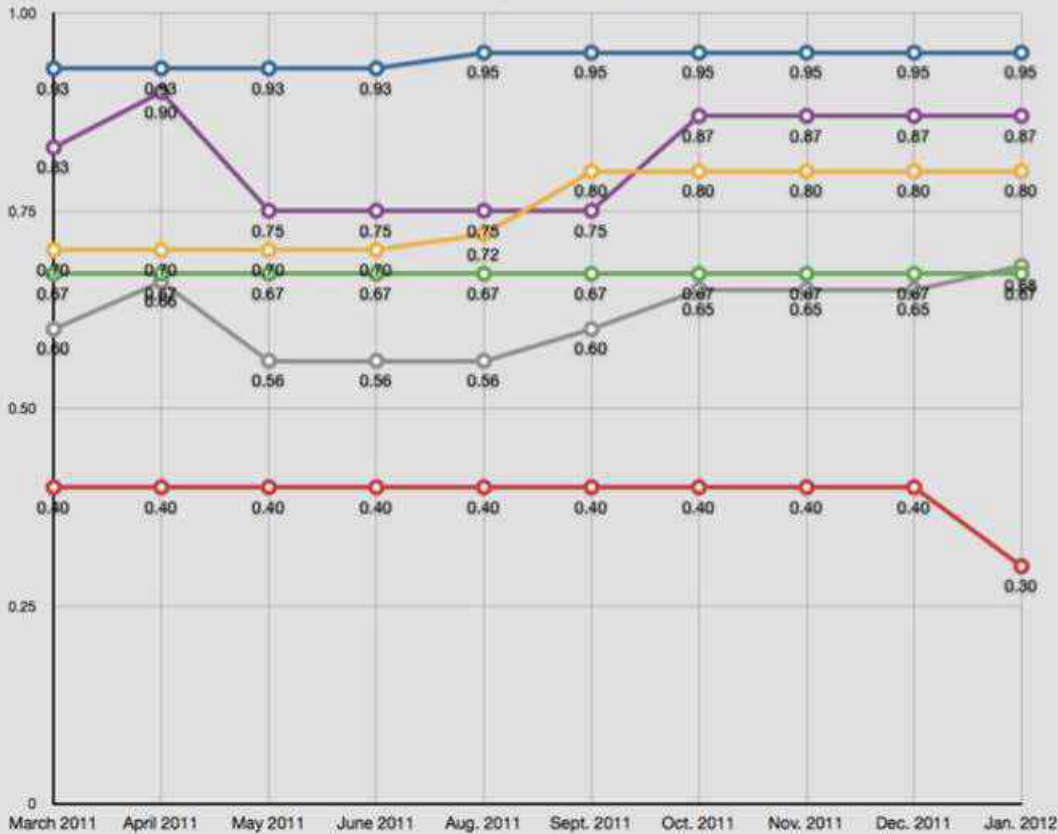

Algeria risk factor levels

Changes between February 2011 and January 2012

- Youth rebellion
- Loss of state monopoly over ideas and information
- Cultural hegemony failure
- Coalescent Opposition
- Succession crisis
- Divisions within the security forces

Score:
0.00: low.
1.00: high.

Change over time

Foreign Relations

Several months ago, it will be recalled, Algerian sources began to suggest that, with the old regional certainties crumbling around them, Algeria's leaders might envisage mending bridges with Morocco, in the hope of securing at least one stable relationship with a neighbouring country. More recently, shortly after Morocco's parliamentary elections last November in which the moderate Islamist PJD emerged as the largest single party, one of the party's top leaders intimated to us that one of the central points of its programme for government was a "re-examination" of Morocco's relations with Algeria and a creative re-think of all the disputes between the two countries (see AMSR #109). With the visit to Algiers this week by Morocco's new Foreign Minister Saadedine El Othmani (one of the PJD's main leaders), these trends towards rapprochement seemed at last to be coming together – an impression that was strengthened all the more by Algerian media reports that Morocco would henceforth be taking part in meetings of the so-called pays du champ group^[2] devoted to security in the Sahara-Sahel region, from which it has so far been pointedly excluded.

El Othmani has made a point of choosing Algiers as the destination for his very first trip abroad as Foreign Minister, but it would no doubt be a mistake to see it as a revolution in relations between the two countries, or even the beginning of one. The PJD may be sincerely committed to reorienting Moroccan foreign policy towards ties with Arab and Muslim countries, beginning by clearing the air with Algeria, but in this as in other domains its hands are not entirely free. The elected, PJD-dominated government is effectively shadowed by what amounts to a parallel government of royal advisors at the Palace – among them El Othmani's predecessor Taïeb Fassi-Fihri, a long-time friend and associate of the King, who was given a position in the Palace team as soon as he had handed over the Foreign Ministry – and there is little or no realistic chance of El Othmani and his colleagues overstepping the boundaries set by the Palace.

To be sure, as Foreign Minister Fassi-Fihri himself had over the preceding months been making positive-sounding noises about normalisation of relations with Algeria (see AMSR #109). But there can be no prospect of qualitative change in relations between the two countries as long as each continues to insist on the other's total surrender on the two key bones of contention between them, to wit the question of the border and the fate of Western Sahara, and there is as yet no sign that either Algiers or Rabat is really prepared to grasp those nettles^[3]. Indeed, El Othmani was unable to discuss either the border or the Western Sahara question while in Algiers. El Othmani and his Algerian counterpart Mourad Medelci did promise one another that they would meet for "political talks" every six months, and it was announced that an Algerian-Moroccan High Joint Committee will meet in Rabat on February 17, but these steps are altogether in continuity with the policy followed by Fassi-Fihri. Arguably the most striking innovation of El Othmani's trip to Algiers was his one-on-one meeting with Boudjerra Soltani – the leader of the moderate Islamist MSP, who holds no government position – at the MSP headquarters on Jan. 24, after the completion of his official two-day visit.

The day after El Othmani left Algiers, Algerian Foreign Ministry spokesman Amar Belani poured cold water on reports that Morocco was to be invited to join the pays du champ. Morocco was not being inducted into the Algerian-led group, he explained, but simply invited along with numerous other countries to attend a far broader meeting on counter-terrorism in the Sahara to be held in the Malian capital Bamako in February. "The central core will remain exclusively limited to four countries – Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania – with the probable addition of Libya, when the Libyans request it," Belani told news portal TSA, whereas Morocco is "an extra-regional partner which is not concerned by the meetings of the pays du champ, such as the one that was just held in Nouakchott." In other words, what Morocco is being invited to is the follow-up to the Ministerial Conference on Security in the Sahel that was held in Algiers last September (with participation from the United States, other UN Security Council members and the countries of the European Union).

This is a long way short of full-blown security cooperation. But the invitation extended to Morocco to attend the second Ministerial Conference is a breakthrough of sorts – despite pressure from France, Algiers is understood to have refused to invite the Moroccans to the first edition back in September (see AMSR #107). A staffer at the Algerian presidency tells us that the decision to invite Morocco – along with Libya, Tunisia^[4] and Egypt – this time round is dictated by one simple necessity: the need to do something about the proliferation of Libyan weaponry across the Sahara-Sahel region, up to and including Morocco, where the authorities have seized weapons that have been smuggled in from Libya^[5]. A Mauritanian political source, believed to be close to President Ould Abdelaziz^[6], goes further, arguing that Algiers has been "compelled to review its strategy" with regard to counter-terrorism cooperation, in large part because it is "genuinely terrified about the possibility of proliferation of Libyan weapons" on its own territory. The Algerians have been pushed in this direction by a number of warning signs, according to the Mauritanian source: the revival of the Tuareg insurrection in northern Mali (where Algeria was supposed to be the guarantor of peace and national reconciliation), led by Tuareg fighters who have returned from Libya with abundant supplies of arms^[7]; an increasingly active presence in southern Algeria itself of AQMI units answering to the organisation's Sahel leaders Mokhtar Belmokhtar and Abdelhamid Abou Zeid; and intelligence the source claims was supplied by the Mauritanian security services relating to an alleged AQMI plan for the destabilisation of southern Algeria. These factors, combined with prodding from the United States, France and (the source claims) Mauritania, are said to have prompted Algiers to begin moving away from the “rigid conception of sovereignty” underpinning its security doctrine, which had been a hindrance to effective cooperation in the fight against transnational terrorism.

According to the Mauritanian political source, the toughest task the Mauritians faced in persuading the Algerians to be more accommodating was to convince them that drawing Morocco into the fight against transnational terrorism need not affect Polisario's situation in any way. For his part, the source at the Algerian presidency made only the briefest of allusions to Polisario, noting that questions had been raised in Algerian political circles as to why the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic had not been invited to the Ministerial Conference in Bamako and arguing that, although Polisario was of course concerned by the struggle against terrorism, it “lacks the necessary means to participate effectively”. This rather terse evaluation may reflect a degree of dissatisfaction and frustration on the part of the Algerian leadership with Polisario's ham-fisted performance in the wake of the kidnapping of Western aid workers from Rabouni camp near Tindouf, on which we commented in our last report.

Security

Following an exceptionally quiet period in the first three weeks of December 2011 (see previous report), AQMI stepped up its activity in the final days of 2011^[8]. The month of January saw a further acceleration, with 23 operations recorded up to January 26.

As usual, the great majority of AQMI operations took place in Kabylia (out of 34 incidents recorded for the period December 20-January 26, 18 were at the initiative of AQMI, and of these no fewer than 14, most of them roadside bombs, occurred in Kabylia). In the ALGIERS area the security forces on January 8 ambushed and shot dead two jihadists on the road from Khemis el-Khechna to Hammadi, between the wilayas of Boumerdès and Algiers, about 10km south of Houari Boumedienne International Airport. One soldier was wounded and died in hospital four days later.

Elsewhere, the most remarkable incident came on January 16 when a group of armed men kidnapped the governor of Illizi, Mohamed Laïd Khelfi, near Deb Deb and took him across the border into Libya. He was liberated by Libyan fighters the next day and returned to Algeria on January 18, suffering a broken shoulder. The three kidnapers were locals protesting against heavy prison sentences received by their relatives in a terror-related case in early January.^[9] The town of Deb Deb had seen several demonstrations and sit-ins the previous week, prompting the governor to visit the town hoping to calm the situation, only to be abducted on the way back. AQMI issued a statement dated Jan. 18 “saluting the intifada of our people in Deb Deb” and declaring its support for the locals’ “fight for justice”. It also warned the new Libyan authorities not to hand over the kidnapers to Algeria. Despite its quick denouement, this affair is deeply embarrassing to the Algerian government. The fact that a regional governor was kidnapped^[10] so easily by “amateurs” in what should be a high-security zone near the Libyan border seriously dents the credibility of Algeria’s security services at a time when the situation around Algeria’s frontiers remains dangerously volatile.

To the east, Libya remains chaotic. In addition to weapons smuggling, Algerian authorities now have to face the threat of regular incursions by unruly Libyan fighters, while on at least two occasions in January, Libyan fighters detained Algerian citizens who they claimed had crossed into Libyan territory. It cannot be excluded that such incursions could lead to isolated clashes between Libyan militias and Algerian forces.

Across Algeria's southern borders, while the revival of the Tuareg rebellion in northern Mali (see above) adds another dimension to Algiers' difficulties, AQMI itself has been comparatively quiet^[11]. On January 12, however, AQMI sent a statement to a Mauritanian news agency saying it has “reliable information” that France, “with backing from Algeria and Mauritania,” is preparing a military operation to liberate Western hostages detained by the group. The statement goes on to warn European countries that such a move “would mean you are signing the death sentence of your citizens”. France was also the target of threats from Jamat Tawhid wal Jihad fi Gharbi Afriqqiya (Unity and Jihad in West Africa), the previously-unknown group which on December 10 claimed responsibility for the kidnapping of Western aid workers from Rabouni camp near Tindouf (see AMSR #108). On January 3 the group, which describes its members as AQMI dissidents, sent a statement to AFP “declaring war on France, the enemy of Islam”, accompanied by a video of the three hostages it captured at Rabouni in October. END

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

-
- [1] From 1990 to 2001 – a decade which comprised the worst years of Algeria's 'dirty war' – Tartag, then a colonel, headed the Centre Principal Militaire d'Investigation at Ben Aknoun, Algiers, a unit of the DRS which had a sombre reputation as a torture centre and home base for death squads.
- [2] “Countries of the field”. To date, Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania, who, on paper at least, participate in the joint military command (CEMOC) for the Sahara formally established at a summit in Algiers in 2010.
- [3] Algerian news website TSA has, it is true, reported that the Algerian police is undertaking “technical preparations” for the opening of the land border, suggesting that the border could be opened to traffic as soon as early May, but this claim – which is by no means without precedent – remains for the time being unconfirmed.
- [4] The exact date of the second Ministerial Conference has not yet been set, it would seem, in part because the organisers are still waiting for Libya and Tunisia to confirm that they will send representatives.
- [5] This is coherent with what we had heard from Moroccan sources last autumn. One non-governmental source told us in mid-November: “The security forces — police, Border Guard, the Gendarmerie and Auxiliary Forces — are on maximum alert, with specific instructions to take all measures necessary to prevent shipments of weapons, which are supposed to be on their way from Libya, from reaching Moroccan territory. Border areas adjacent to Algeria and Mauritania are subject to exceptional surveillance measures. ... Over the past few weeks, vehicles transporting foreigners have [also] been stopped and checked from the area north of Laayoune, and at the entry points to every Sahrawi town and village. The police freely admit they are looking for weapons coming from Libya.”
- [6] Who visited Algiers for talks on security with President Bouteflika in mid-December, it will be recalled.
- [7] On Jan. 16 and 17, the Mouvement National pour la Libération de l'Azawad, a new group formed out of a merger of Malian Tuareg rebel factions, launched an offensive with attacks on the towns of Menaka, near the border with Niger, Aguelhok and Tessalit, near the border with Algeria. A number of Algerian soldiers were reportedly evacuated from Tessalit. On Jan. 26, the rebels are reported to have taken control of the town of Aguelhoc near the border with Niger and an abandoned Malian army camp at Léré, close to the border with Mauritania. A Malian government communiqué claimed that “AQMI fighters” took part in the raids alongside MNLA fighters, but this seems unlikely insofar as one of the Tuareg rebels' complaints against the central government is that it has effectively given carte blanche to AQMI to establish a safe haven in the Tuareg lands of northern Mali.
- [8] As a result, the level of jihadist activity in December was on balance comparable with what was seen in the previous months (21 operations all told, down from 23 in November and 22 in October).
- [9] On January 2, a court in Algiers sentenced Abdelhamid Abou-Zeid, one of the chiefs of AQMI in Sahel and a native of Deb Deb, to life in prison and five members of his family to ten years in prison each on charges of “forming an international armed group”.
- [10] The first time a regional governor has been kidnapped since the troubles began.
- [11] The group's only reported action being the abduction of a Mauritanian gendarme on December 20, after which it issued a communiqué calling on the “Mauritanian regime” to free two of its prisoners in exchange for the soldier's release.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, January 31, 2012 9:32 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: hmm - smells...last graph

Rachad,

How true do you think this is? It could have important implications for how we play the press and Congress. The last paragraph is somewhat ambiguous.?? Ed

Algeria-Morocco Border Set to Open Before May

Jan 30

Posted by MoroccoTomorrow

alakhbar english

Algeria-Morocco Border Set to Open Before May

According to Algerian Newspapers, preparations for reopening the border were being made even before Saadeddine Othamni, the Moroccan minister of foreign affairs, visited Algeria last week.

(Photo: AFP – Farouk Batiche)

By: Mourad Traboulsi

Published Sunday, January 29, 2012

Algerians and Moroccans may soon be able to cross the border between the two countries if campaigns by Islamist parties on both sides calling for stronger ties between the North African countries bear fruit. The new land crossing points scheduled to resume operation by next May are likely to bring tourists and much-needed revenue to Morocco.

Algiers – This spring, the border between Morocco and Algeria will be reopened. When the border was closed in 1994 in the wake of a visa row between the two states, the usual influx of Algerian tourists was cut off, denying Morocco an estimated total of nearly US$2 billion in revenue over the course of one year.

Al-Akhbar has learned that the decision to reopen the border will likely be implemented in the coming weeks.

According to Algerian newspapers, preparations for reopening the border were being made even before Saadeddine Othamni, the Moroccan minister of foreign affairs, visited Algeria last week. While the minister assigned to Maghreb and African affairs, Abdelkader Messahel, claimed that the borders were not discussed during Othamni's visit, reports in Morocco suggested there was a closed meeting between Othamni and Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika last Tuesday. In the meeting, it is believed that the two men discussed the border and issues concerning Western Sahara, though no statements were released about the result of this meeting.

Joint panels have been working for months to normalize relations between the two neighboring countries and to boost economic cooperation. The two capitals have alternately hosted meetings for experts and officials to discuss the general framework of the expected integration in such fields as the economy, cultural affairs, and sports.

The Movement of Society for Peace, an Algerian Islamist party close to President Bouteflika, made opening the border a centerpiece of their last political campaign. Its leader, Bouguerra Soltani, promised to open the borders "as soon as the Islamists come to power."

Soltani had already discussed this issue in Rabat weeks ago with officials from the Justice and Development Party (PJD), which heads Morocco's current government.

Previously, most of the Moroccan and Algerian political parties abided by official decisions made by their respective leaderships. However, as the Arab Spring transformations swept across the region, there was more room for political parties to stake out a position on the subject.

Hence, while campaigning, the Moroccan PJD placed improving relations with Algeria high on its list of priorities, and the Algerian Movement of Society for Peace followed suit. Such steps were helped by the fact that both parties belong to the regional network of the Muslim Brotherhood.

Perhaps it was "Islamist pressure" that made the Algerian government accelerate its plans to resolve the problem of the border before the upcoming parliamentary elections in May. These elections are expected to lead to an Islamist majority or an Islamist lead opposition in the parliament for the first time in the modern history of Algeria.

The borders between the two largest countries in the Arab Maghreb Union were closed in 1994 when Moroccan authorities decided to impose visa restrictions on Algerians wishing to visit Morocco. This move was seen by many as a response to a bombing that was carried out in Marrakesh, which Rabat blamed on Algerian intelligence.

In response, then Algerian President, Liamine Zeroual ordered the closure of land borders indefinitely.

Ten years later, King Mohammad VI dropped the visa requirement for Algerians and declared that his country was seeking to reopen the border. Algeria, for its part, responded by also dropping visa requirement for Moroccans but the land border crossings remained closed.

Algerian authorities conditioned the anticipated re-opening of the border on a set of political and security measures, including stopping the flow of drugs into Algeria, resolving the Western Sahara conflict, and raising the level of border security cooperation in the context of the "war on terror."

This article is an edited translation from the Arabic Edition.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, January 31, 2012 6:47 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: Re: hmm - smells...last graph

thank you for your thoughts. this is helpful

Sent from my iPad

On Jan 31, 2012, at 16:21, "Rachad Bouhlal" <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com> wrote:

Ed,

Al-Akhbar is a pretty respected newspaper, even though the article is from "MoroccoTomorrow".

The Minister's visit to Algiers follows the sectorial visits that occurred in 2011. we remain hopeful that the process this time will bring us closer.

The "conditions" that the article talk about have always been Morocco's concerns too.

We will keep our messages that cooperation in north africa will benefit all countries, especially with the events happening in NA.

Rachad

On Jan 31, 2012, at 9:31 AM, Edward Gabriel wrote:

Rachad,

How true do you think this is? It could have important implications for how we play the press and Congress. The last paragraph is somewhat ambiguous.?? Ed

Algeria-Morocco Border Set to Open Before May

Jan 30

Posted by MoroccoTomorrow

HsC1ObeZ-0SttRcNwgFR5DJrPkf0etWSS1gwqbGmOXYOyQdoOD3XIYZbo7V7zXiNOXYLZrSeLAYMhdpzpOluZGv-W10KuAWhXLU=s220

Algeria-Morocco Border Set to Open Before May

mtcYqr4LPwgJ_BchFyNrAeVSsga7ejMubPrLTehQ31iiXqskFuOckkTVJXeDQMB6csqNoosmn6s_4KHxcrhkqzmMvy_HpJ9t=s220 According to Algerian Newspapers, preparations for reopening the border were being made even before Saadeddine Othamni, the Moroccan minister of foreign affairs, visited Algeria last week. (Photo: AFP – Farouk Batiche)

By: Mourad Traboulsi

Published Sunday, January 29, 2012

Algerians and Moroccans may soon be able to cross the border between the two countries if campaigns by Islamist parties on both sides calling for stronger ties between the North African countries bear fruit. The new land crossing points scheduled to resume operation by next May are likely to bring tourists and much-needed revenue to Morocco.

Algiers – This spring, the border between Morocco and Algeria will be reopened. When the border was closed in 1994 in the wake of a visa row between the two states, the usual influx of Algerian tourists was cut off, denying Morocco an estimated total of nearly US$2 billion in revenue over the course of one year.

Al-Akhbar has learned that the decision to reopen the border will likely be implemented in the coming weeks.

According to Algerian newspapers, preparations for reopening the border were being made even before Saadeddine Othamni, the Moroccan minister of foreign affairs, visited Algeria last week. While the minister assigned to Maghreb and African affairs, Abdelkader Messahel, claimed that the borders were not discussed during Othamni's visit, reports in Morocco suggested there was a closed meeting between Othamni and Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika last Tuesday. In the meeting, it is believed that the two men discussed the border and issues concerning Western Sahara, though no statements were released about the result of this meeting.

Joint panels have been working for months to normalize relations between the two neighboring countries and to boost economic cooperation. The two capitals have alternately hosted meetings for experts and officials to discuss the general framework of the expected integration in such fields as the economy, cultural affairs, and sports.

The Movement of Society for Peace, an Algerian Islamist party close to President Bouteflika, made opening the border a centerpiece of their last political campaign. Its leader, Bouguerra Soltani, promised to open the borders "as soon as the Islamists come to power."

Soltani had already discussed this issue in Rabat weeks ago with officials from the Justice and Development Party (PJD), which heads Morocco's current government.

Previously, most of the Moroccan and Algerian political parties abided by official decisions made by their respective leaderships. However, as the Arab Spring transformations swept across the region, there was more room for political parties to stake out a position on the subject.

Hence, while campaigning, the Moroccan PJD placed improving relations with Algeria high on its list of priorities, and the Algerian Movement of Society for Peace followed suit. Such steps were helped by the fact that both parties belong to the regional network of the Muslim Brotherhood.

Perhaps it was "Islamist pressure" that made the Algerian government accelerate its plans to resolve the problem of the border before the upcoming parliamentary elections in May. These elections are expected to lead to an Islamist majority or an Islamist lead opposition in the parliament for the first time in the modern history of Algeria.

The borders between the two largest countries in the Arab Maghreb Union were closed in 1994 when Moroccan authorities decided to impose visa restrictions on Algerians wishing to visit Morocco. This move was seen by many as a response to a bombing that was carried out in Marrakesh, which Rabat blamed on Algerian intelligence.

In response, then Algerian President, Liamine Zeroual ordered the closure of land borders indefinitely.

Ten years later, King Mohammad VI dropped the visa requirement for Algerians and declared that his country was seeking to reopen the border. Algeria, for its part, responded by also dropping visa requirement for Moroccans but the land border crossings remained closed.

Algerian authorities conditioned the anticipated re-opening of the border on a set of political and security measures, including stopping the flow of drugs into Algeria, resolving the Western Sahara conflict, and raising the level of border security cooperation in the context of the "war on terror."

This article is an edited translation from the Arabic Edition.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, February 01, 2012 6:32 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Fw: FINAL draft press release for review
Attachments: PR_ICTS Terrorism Report-Close the Camps 1Feb12 PR Final.doc

Dear Rachad,

Attached and below is the Mac release on the Potomac Institute conference. We would like to release it by 4pm tomorrow. Any comments you would like to provide, would be appreciated. Thanks Rachad. Ed

From: Jordan Paul [mailto:jordanpaul_2000@yahoo.com]
Sent: Wednesday, February 01, 2012 03:25 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: FINAL draft press release for review

CONTACT: Garth Neuffer

202.470.2055

gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com

DRAFT

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE:

Thursday, February 2, 2012

Study Warns of Rising al-Qaeda Threat in North Africa

Urges closing Polisario camps which have become recruiting ground for terrorists

Washington, DC (Feb. 2)—A new study by the International Center for Terrorism Studies (ICTS) warns that al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) poses a “dangerous threat” to the region and beyond as it seeks to exploit Arab Spring instability and expand terrorist ties to other militants and al-Qaeda affiliates across Africa’s Sahel. The report recommends closing the Polisario Front’s refugee camps near Tindouf, Algeria, which the study says “are a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises.” It calls on the US and international community to “prioritize” resettling the refugees.

The study, “Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to the Arab Spring.” was released today at the 14th annual ICTS terrorism review at the National Press Club, hosted by the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies.

The study and reliable news media report that Polisario members have engaged in drug and arms trafficking, gun battles in Mali, AQIM kidnappings in Mauritania and Algeria, and as mercenaries for Qaddafi in Libya. Two months ago, AQIM-linked assailants abducted three Western aid workers from a Polisario headquarters camp, reportedly with help from Polisario insiders, who gave the assailants arms and directions to the victims.

[Add quote from Yonah Alexander, Director, ICTS after Thursday event]

“Of grave concern,” says the report, is that “al-Qaeda has established a safe haven and breeding ground” in “the failed and fragile states bordering the Sahara.” The report calls it an “arc of instability that stretches from the Red Sea and is poised to reach to the Atlantic.”

The report cites AQIM’s expanded ties to other al-Qaeda affiliates and militant groups, including al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) in Yemen, al-Shabaab in Somalia, Boko Haram based in Nigeria, and Polisario militants from Algeria. AQIM also has opened links to “Latin cartels for ‘drugs-for-arms’ smuggling into Europe through terrorist-trafficking networks in the Sahel that include members of the Polisario Front.”

The annual report chronicles attacks by al-Qaeda and other terrorists in North and West/Central Africa since 9/11. This year it also provides a nine-country survey of developments since the Arab Spring. Among its key findings:

- * Al-Qaeda is poised to take advantage of Arab Spring events “to destabilize the region even further.”
- * Since 9/11, attacks by AQIM and other terrorist groups in the Maghreb and Sahel jumped more than 500% from their low point to reach a new high in 2009, and remain dangerously high level in 2011.
- * AQIM is taking advantage of the 35-year-old Western Sahara conflict for “expansion and also recruitment of hard-core Polisario members among the Sahrawi refugee camps in Algeria.”

 For a copy of the “Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to the Arab Spring” report, go to: [Add URL]

For more on Morocco and the region, visit MoroccoOnTheMove.com and follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

###

The Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP) is a non-profit organization whose principal mission is to inform opinion makers, government officials, and interested publics in the United States about political and social developments in Morocco and the role being played by the Kingdom of Morocco in broader strategic developments in North Africa, the Mediterranean, and the Middle East. For more, please visit www.moroccoonthemove.com.

This material is distributed by the Moroccan American Center for Policy on behalf of the Government of Morocco. Additional information is available at the Department of Justice in Washington, DC.

CONTACT: Garth Neuffer
202.470.2055

gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com

DRAFT

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE:

Thursday, February 2, 2012

Study Warns of Rising al-Qaeda Threat in North Africa

Urges closing Polisario camps which have become recruiting ground for terrorists

Washington, DC (Feb. 2)—A new study by the International Center for Terrorism Studies (ICTS) warns that al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) poses a “dangerous threat” to the region and beyond as it seeks to exploit Arab Spring instability and expand terrorist ties to other militants and al-Qaeda affiliates across Africa’s Sahel. The report recommends closing the Polisario Front’s refugee camps near Tindouf, Algeria, which the study says “are a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises.” It calls on the US and international community to “prioritize” resettling the refugees.

The study, “Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to the Arab Spring,” was released today at the 14th annual ICTS terrorism review at the National Press Club, hosted by the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies.

The study and reliable news media report that Polisario members have engaged in drug and arms trafficking, gun battles in Mali, AQIM kidnappings in Mauritania and Algeria, and as mercenaries for Qaddafi in Libya. Two months ago, AQIM-linked assailants abducted three Western aid workers from a Polisario headquarters camp, reportedly with help from Polisario insiders, who gave the assailants arms and directions to the victims.

[Add quote from Yonah Alexander, Director, ICTS after Thursday event]

“Of grave concern,” says the report, is that “al-Qaeda has established a safe haven and breeding ground” in “the failed and fragile states bordering the Sahara.” The report calls it an “arc of instability that stretches from the Red Sea and is poised to reach to the Atlantic.”

The report cites AQIM’s expanded ties to other al-Qaeda affiliates and militant groups, including al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) in Yemen, al-Shabaab in Somalia, Boko Haram based in Nigeria, and Polisario militants from Algeria. AQIM also has opened links to “Latin cartels for ‘drugs-for-arms’ smuggling into Europe through terrorist-trafficking networks in the Sahel that include members of the Polisario Front.”

The annual report chronicles attacks by al-Qaeda and other terrorists in North and West/Central Africa since 9/11. This year it also provides a nine-country survey of developments since the Arab Spring. Among its key findings:

- * Al-Qaeda is poised to take advantage of Arab Spring events “to destabilize the region even further.”
- * Since 9/11, attacks by AQIM and other terrorist groups in the Maghreb and Sahel jumped more than 500% from their low point to reach a new high in 2009, and remain dangerously high level in 2011.
- * AQIM is taking advantage of the 35-year-old Western Sahara conflict for “expansion and also recruitment of hard-core Polisario members among the Sahrawi refugee camps in Algeria.”

 For a copy of the “Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to the Arab Spring” report, go to:
[Add URL]

For more on Morocco and the region, visit MoroccoOnTheMove.com
and follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

###

The Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP) is a non-profit organization whose principal mission is to inform opinion makers, government officials, and interested publics in the United States about political and social developments in Morocco and the role being played by the Kingdom of Morocco in broader strategic developments in North Africa, the Mediterranean, and the Middle East. For more, please visit www.moroccoonthemove.com.

This material is distributed by the Moroccan American Center for Policy on behalf of the Government of Morocco. Additional information is available at the Department of Justice in Washington, DC.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, February 02, 2012 4:59 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Potomac Institute

FYI, Ed

Here is the embargoed copy of the report that is being released by the Potomac Institute on terrorism in North, West and Central Africa in 2011:

www.2012specialupdatereportfr~1/terrorismafrica/index.htm

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, February 03, 2012 12:29 PM
To: Ambassador Edward Gabriel
Subject: Fwd: Washington Post column and MoroccoOnTheMove posting on New ICTS Report - 'Terrorism on Rise in N. Africa, From 9/11 to Arab Spring'
Attachments: Untitled attachment 00035.pdf; Untitled attachment 00038.htm; Untitled attachment 00041.pdf; Untitled attachment 00044.htm

Team,

FYI – Below is a commentary posted by Washington Post columnist Jennifer Rubin and also a blog posting on MoroccoOnTheMove on today’s announcement at the National Press Club (2-4 pm) of a new ICTS Report, “Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to the Arab Spring.” by ICTS Director Yonah Alexander. The report includes as key recommendations: resolve the Western Sahara conflict; and shut down the Polisario camps, which have become a recruiting ground for terrorists and traffickers. Post columnist Rubin interviewed Alexander earlier today by phone. A MAC Release is also attached. For a full copy of the report, click on the above link. Both stories also attached as PDFs.

Visit us at <http://www.MoroccoOnTheMove.com>

Follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn/post/north-africa-terrorism-on-the-rise/2012/02/02/gIQAxia9kQ_blog.html

The Washington Post

Thursday, February 02, 2012 Posted at 05:00 PM ET

Right Turn

North Africa: Terrorism on the rise

By Jennifer Rubin

The International Center for Terrorism Studies is out with a new report that should catch the attention of policy-makers in the United States and elsewhere. The critical finding is this:

Tragically, the Maghreb — Algeria, Libya, Mauritania, Morocco, and Tunisia — as well as adjacent parts of the Sahel — Chad, Mali, and Niger — have emerged as one of the most worrying strategic challenges to the international community, and yet for decades these regions have mostly been overlooked by policy-makers in the West. Consider, for example, the empirical data generated since September 11, 2001.

More specifically, for the past ten years terrorist attacks by al-Qa'ida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and other militant extremists in the Maghreb and Sahel have increased more than 500 percent from their low point in the period to hit a high of 204 attacks in 2009. In 2011, the number of terrorist attacks remains dangerously high, increasing from 2010's total to reach 185 attacks for the year. . . . What is particularly of grave concern is that AQIM, jointly with other al-Qa'ida affiliates and militant groups (e.g. al-Qa'ida in the Arabian Peninsula, AQAP, operating in Yemen, as well as al-Shabaab members in Somalia, Boko Haram militants based in Nigeria, and Polisario militants from Algeria) currently and for the foreseeable future, represent a most dangerous threat both regionally and inter-regionally. Clearly in the failed and fragile states bordering the Sahara, al-Qa'ida has established a safe haven and breeding ground for its activities.

The ICTS recommends 10 steps to address the toxic mix of refugees, drug, human trafficking and terrorism. These include improved “collection and analysis of data related to al-Qa'ida's terrorism in general in the region and beyond,” additional technical assistance for counterterrorism, and support for governments in the region “to accelerate regional economic and social reforms with a “carrot-and-stick” approach to increase broadly the levels of economic cooperation between the nations and spur increased trade and commerce that contributes to economic growth and reduces poverty as an underlying factor in fueling social unrest and extremism.” The last few recommendations are most eye-catching:

7. Resolve the Western Sahara crisis, which is inhibiting both security and economic cooperation in the Maghreb and Sahel, and is driving a wedge between two of the region's most influential nations—Morocco and Algeria.
8. Shut down the refugee camps run by the Polisario near Tindouf, Algeria because they are a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises. The US and international community should prioritize permanent refugee resettlement in line with existing international protocols and agreements.
9. Face the intellectual challenge of radical Islam directly with “home-grown” religious and intellectual leaders who are able to challenge the misuse of Islam and channel religious tendencies into more productive social development opportunities.
10. Raise the diplomatic, economic, political, and military costs to Iran high enough to outweigh the benefits of supporting terrorism and exporting jihadist terrorism elsewhere.

As with Syria and terrorism in the Middle East, Tehran is at the nub of the problem. So long as we demonstrate there is little penalty for terrorist-support, not to mention killing of Americans, Tehran will continue to play a destabilizing role both in the Maghreb and in the Middle East.

I have written before on the intersection of refugees and terrorism arising from the humanitarian crisis in the Western Sahara. I spoke by phone today with the ICTS's director, Prof. Yonah Alexander, who has studied the topic for 40 years. He told me that the warehousing of refugees creates “a breeding ground for terrorist propaganda, even among children.” So long as thousands remain in camps, he says, we will see “exploitation of people from a very early age.” He warns: “No. 1 is the humanitarian issue. And No. 2 is the national security issue,” which has escalated into violence, kidnapping, gun-running and support for AQIM. He says bluntly that money spent through international agencies to support the camps’ operation is “perpetuating the problem.”

The Obama administration has been rhetorically supportive of late in trying to resolve the Western Sahara conflict. But the report should add new urgency to efforts to empty the tinder box that is fueling an upsurge in violence and terrorism in an already unstable part of the world.

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2012/02/02/al-qaeda-threat-in-n-africa-rising-warns-icts-urges-closing-polisario-camps-which-are-recruiting-ground-for-terrorists/>

Morocco on the Move

LATEST NEWS

Thursday, February 2, 2012

AL-QAEDA THREAT IN NORTH AFRICA RISING – ICTS; CLOSE POLISARIO CAMPS – TERRORIST RECRUITING GROUND

Washington, DC (Feb. 2)—A new study by the International Center for Terrorism Studies (ICTS) warns that al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) poses a “dangerous threat” to the region and beyond as it seeks to exploit Arab Spring instability and expand terrorist ties to other militants across Africa’s Sahel. The report recommends closing the Polisario Front’s refugee camps near Tindouf, Algeria, which the study says “are a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises.” It calls on the US and international community to “prioritize” resettling the refugees.

The study, “Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to the Arab Spring,” authored by Yonah Alexander, ICTS Director, was released at the 14th annual terrorism review today at the National Press Club, hosted by the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies.

“Osama Bin Laden has been killed, but his ideas and al-Qaeda affiliate organizations are alive and kicking,” said Alexander at the National Press Club. “One of the most troubling is AQIM in North Africa, which has links with weapons and narco-trafficking, militants in Nigeria, and Polisario mercenaries who fought for Qaddafi in Libya.”

Among the report’s key recommendations: “Shut down the refugee camps run by the Polisario near Tindouf, Algeria because they are a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises.” It adds that “The US and international community should prioritize permanent refugee resettlement in line with existing international protocols and agreements.”

The study and reliable news media report Polisario members have been arrested and accused of criminal activities that include drug and arms trafficking, gun battles in Mali, AQIM kidnappings in Mauritania and Algeria, and as mercenaries for Qaddafi in Libya. Two months ago, AQIM-linked assailants abducted three Western aid workers from a Polisario headquarters camp, reportedly with help from Polisario insiders who gave the assailants arms and directions to the victims.

“Of grave concern,” says the report, is that AQIM has established links to other militant groups and a “safe haven” in Africa’s Sahel, along an “arc of instability that stretches from the Red Sea and is poised to reach to the Atlantic.” It calls the largely “ungoverned areas” a potential “terrorist breeding ground” and cites AQIM ties to al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) in Yemen, al-Shabaab in Somalia, Boko Haram in Nigeria, and Polisario militants in Algeria. The study says AQIM also has links to “Latin cartels for ‘drugs-for-arms’ smuggling into Europe through terrorist-trafficking networks in the Sahel that include members of the Polisario.”

The annual ICTS report, which chronicles attacks by al-Qaeda and other terrorists in the region since 9/11, also offers a nine-country survey of developments since the Arab Spring. Among its key findings:

- * Since 9/11, attacks by AQIM and other terrorist groups in the Maghreb and Sahel jumped more than 500% from their low point to reach a new high in 2009, and remain dangerously high level in 2011.
- * Al-Qaeda is poised to take advantage of Arab Spring events “to destabilize the region even further.”
- * AQIM is taking advantage of the 35-year-old Western Sahara conflict for “expansion and also recruitment of hard-core Polisario members among the Sahrawi refugee camps in Algeria.”

To read the full ICTS Report, click on: “Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to the Arab Spring.”

The Washington Post

Thursday, February 02, 2012 Posted at 05:00 PM ET

North Africa: Terrorism on the rise

By Jennifer Rubin

The International Center for Terrorism Studies is out with a new report that should catch the attention of policymakers in the United States and elsewhere. The critical finding is this:

Tragically, the Maghreb — Algeria, Libya, Mauritania, Morocco, and Tunisia — as well as adjacent parts of the Sahel — Chad, Mali, and Niger — have emerged as one of the most worrying strategic challenges to the international community, and yet for decades these regions have mostly been overlooked by policy-makers in the West. Consider, for example, the empirical data generated since September 11, 2001.

More specifically, for the past ten years terrorist attacks by al-Qa'ida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and other militant extremists in the Maghreb and Sahel have increased more than 500 percent from their low point in the period to hit a high of 204 attacks in 2009. In 2011, the number of terrorist attacks remains dangerously high, increasing from 2010's total to reach 185 attacks for the year. . . . What is particularly of grave concern is that AQIM, jointly with other al-Qa'ida affiliates and militant groups (e.g. al-Qa'ida in the Arabian Peninsula, AQAP, operating in Yemen, as well as al-Shabaab members in Somalia, Boko Haram militants based in Nigeria, and Polisario militants from Algeria) currently and for the foreseeable future, represent a most dangerous threat both regionally and inter-regionally. Clearly in the failed and fragile states bordering the Sahara, al-Qa'ida has established a safe haven and breeding ground for its activities.

The ICTS recommends 10 steps to address the toxic mix of refugees, drug, human trafficking and terrorism. These include improved "collection and analysis of data related to al-Qa'ida's terrorism in general in the region and beyond," additional technical assistance for counterterrorism, and support for governments in the region "to accelerate regional economic and social reforms with a "carrot-and-stick" approach to increase broadly the levels of economic cooperation between the nations and spur increased trade and commerce that contributes to economic growth and reduces poverty as an underlying factor in fueling social unrest and extremism." The last few recommendations are most eye-catching:

7. Resolve the Western Sahara crisis, which is inhibiting both security and economic cooperation in the Maghreb and Sahel, and is driving a wedge between two of the region's most influential nations—Morocco and Algeria.
8. Shut down the refugee camps run by the Polisario near Tindouf, Algeria because they are a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises. The US and international community should prioritize permanent refugee resettlement in line with existing international protocols and agreements.
9. Face the intellectual challenge of radical Islam directly with "home-grown" religious and intellectual leaders who are able to challenge the misuse of Islam and channel religious tendencies into more productive social development opportunities.
10. Raise the diplomatic, economic, political, and military costs to Iran high enough to outweigh the benefits of supporting terrorism and exporting jihadist terrorism elsewhere.

As with Syria and terrorism in the Middle East, Tehran is at the nub of the problem. So long as we demonstrate there is little penalty for terrorist-support, not to mention killing of Americans, Tehran will continue to play a destabilizing role both in the Maghreb and in the Middle East.

I have written before on the intersection of refugees and terrorism arising from the humanitarian crisis in the Western Sahara. I spoke by phone today with the ICTS's director, Prof. Yonah Alexander, who has studied the topic for 40 years. He told me that the warehousing of refugees creates "a breeding ground for terrorist propaganda, even among children." So long as thousands remain in camps, he says, we will see "exploitation of people from a very early age." He warns: "No. 1 is the humanitarian issue. And No. 2 is the national security issue," which has escalated into violence, kidnapping, gun-running and support for AQIM. He says bluntly that money spent through international agencies to support the camps' operation is "perpetuating the problem."

The Obama administration has been rhetorically supportive of late in trying to resolve the Western Sahara conflict. But the report should add new urgency to efforts to empty the tinder box that is fueling an upsurge in violence and terrorism in an already unstable part of the world.

Morocco on the Move

LATEST NEWS

Thursday, February 2, 2012

AL-QAEDA THREAT IN NORTH AFRICA RISING – ICTS; Close Polisario camps – Terrorist recruiting ground

Washington, DC (Feb. 2)—A new study by the International Center for Terrorism Studies (ICTS) warns that al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) poses a “dangerous threat” to the region and beyond as it seeks to exploit Arab Spring instability and expand terrorist ties to other militants across Africa’s Sahel. The report recommends closing the Polisario Front’s refugee camps near Tindouf, Algeria, which the study says “are a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises.” It calls on the US and international community to “prioritize” resettling the refugees.

The study, “Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to the Arab Spring,” authored by Yonah Alexander, ICTS Director, was released at the 14th annual terrorism review today at the National Press Club, hosted by the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies.

“Osama Bin Laden has been killed, but his ideas and al-Qaeda affiliate organizations are alive and kicking,” said Alexander at the National Press Club. “One of the most troubling is AQIM in North Africa, which has links with weapons and narco-trafficking, militants in Nigeria, and Polisario mercenaries who fought for Qaddafi in Libya.”

Among the report’s key recommendations: “Shut down the refugee camps run by the Polisario near Tindouf, Algeria because they are a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises.” It adds that “The US and international community should prioritize permanent refugee resettlement in line with existing international protocols and agreements.”

The study and reliable news media report Polisario members have been arrested and accused of criminal activities that include drug and arms trafficking, gun battles in Mali, AQIM kidnappings in Mauritania and Algeria, and as mercenaries for Qaddafi in Libya. Two months ago, AQIM-linked assailants abducted three Western aid workers from a Polisario headquarters camp, reportedly with help from Polisario insiders who gave the assailants arms and directions to the victims.

“Of grave concern,” says the report, is that AQIM has established links to other militant groups and a “safe haven” in Africa’s Sahel, along an “arc of instability that stretches from the Red Sea and is poised to reach to the Atlantic.” It calls the largely “ungoverned areas” a potential “terrorist breeding ground” and cites AQIM ties to al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) in Yemen, al-Shabaab in Somalia, Boko Haram in Nigeria, and Polisario militants in Algeria. The study says AQIM also has links to “Latin cartels for ‘drugs-for-arms’ smuggling into Europe through terrorist-trafficking networks in the Sahel that include members of the Polisario.”

The annual ICTS report, which chronicles attacks by al-Qaeda and other terrorists in the region since 9/11, also offers a nine-country survey of developments since the Arab Spring. Among its key findings:

- * Since 9/11, attacks by AQIM and other terrorist groups in the Maghreb and Sahel jumped more than 500% from their low point to reach a new high in 2009, and remain dangerously high level in 2011.
- * Al-Qaeda is poised to take advantage of Arab Spring events “to destabilize the region even further.”
- * AQIM is taking advantage of the 35-year-old Western Sahara conflict for “expansion and also recruitment of hard-core Polisario members among the Sahrawi refugee camps in Algeria.”

To read the full ICTS Report, click on: “Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to the Arab Spring.”

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, February 07, 2012 9:58 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com; laraichi1@gmail.com; abdel-ouahab@hotmail.com
Subject: FW: In case you missed it, Ed's interview is on MOTM

FYI

From: Calvin Dark [<mailto:cdark@moroccanamericancenter.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, February 07, 2012 9:55 AM
To: Edward Gabriel; Robert M. Holley; Jordan Paul; Jean AbiNader; Fatima Kurtz; Garth Neuffer; Caitlin Dearing; Kristen Kouttab; Sydney Upchurch; David Forsey
Subject: In case you missed it, Ed's interview is on MOTM

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2012/02/07/podcast-ray-hanania-interviews-ambassador-edward-gabriel-morocco-the-arab-spring/>

Morocco on the Move

PODCAST: Ray Hanania interviews Ambassador Edward Gabriel, "Morocco & the Arab Spring"

What has been Morocco's response to the Arab Spring? How can the Moroccan experience serve as an example to other countries in the region? As Morocco assumes its role on the UN Security Council, how will it work with the United States and other allies to tackle the most important international political issues of our time? Listen as radio host and activist Ray Hanania explores these questions and more with Ambassador Edward Gabriel, former US Ambassador to Morocco.

To listen to the podcast, click here.

Ray Hanania is a media analyst and political consultant specializing in Middle East issues and events, and mainstream American politics. Hanania co-hosts the American Arab radio show "Radio Baladi" which is simulcast in three states on Friday mornings (7-8 am Central, 8-9 am Eastern) including in Michigan, Ohio and Northern Illinois. Hanania Hosts Radio Chicagoland on WSBC AM 1240 Radio every Sunday in Chicago from 8 am until 11 am. Previously, he hosted live Chicago morning shows on WLS AM 890 Radio and recently on WJGG AM 1530 radio. For more information visit "The Ray Hanania Show".

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, February 07, 2012 5:42 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Tribes Document
Attachments: SP_WhoRepresentsTheSahrawi20October2009.doc

FYI information and reading, not a priority. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Fatima Kurtz
Sent: Tuesday, February 07, 2012 4:21 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: FW: Tribes Document

This is the research that was conducted on tribes by Caitlin a while back. Nothing was done with it. It has not been edited.

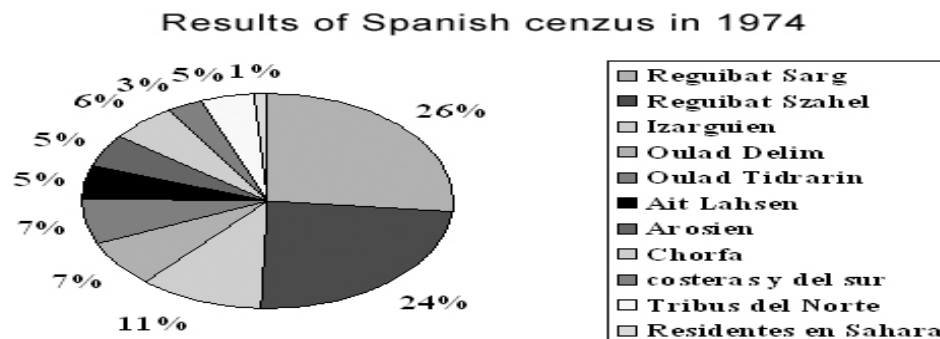

Who Represents the Sahrawis: An Analysis of the Tribal Structure of the People of the Sahara and their Misrepresentation by the Polisario Front

Introduction

The inhabitants of the area currently known as Western Sahara have a rich and unique tribal history that the Polisario Front, the self-proclaimed leader of the Sahrawis, has abhorrently oversimplified in its attempt to gain political control of the region. Even the terms most commonly used to describe the territory, “Western Sahara”, and the people “Sahrawi” have been used incorrectly in an effort to promote the idea of a “nation-state” comprised of a single, unified population. The reality of the tribal structures and tribal relations of the region prove much more complex. This paper will attempt to clarify the tribal origins of the inhabitants of the western expanse of the Sahara desert, identifying key tribes and key events that made the Sahrawi people who they are today. It will further explore the creation of a Sahrawi national consciousness and will analyze how the Polisario Front used political changes during Spanish decolonization to force a national identity upon the diverse tribes of the region. Lastly, it will detail how the Polisario has actively suppressed the important tribal history of the Sahrawis to assert political dominance over the people.

History of the Sahrawis

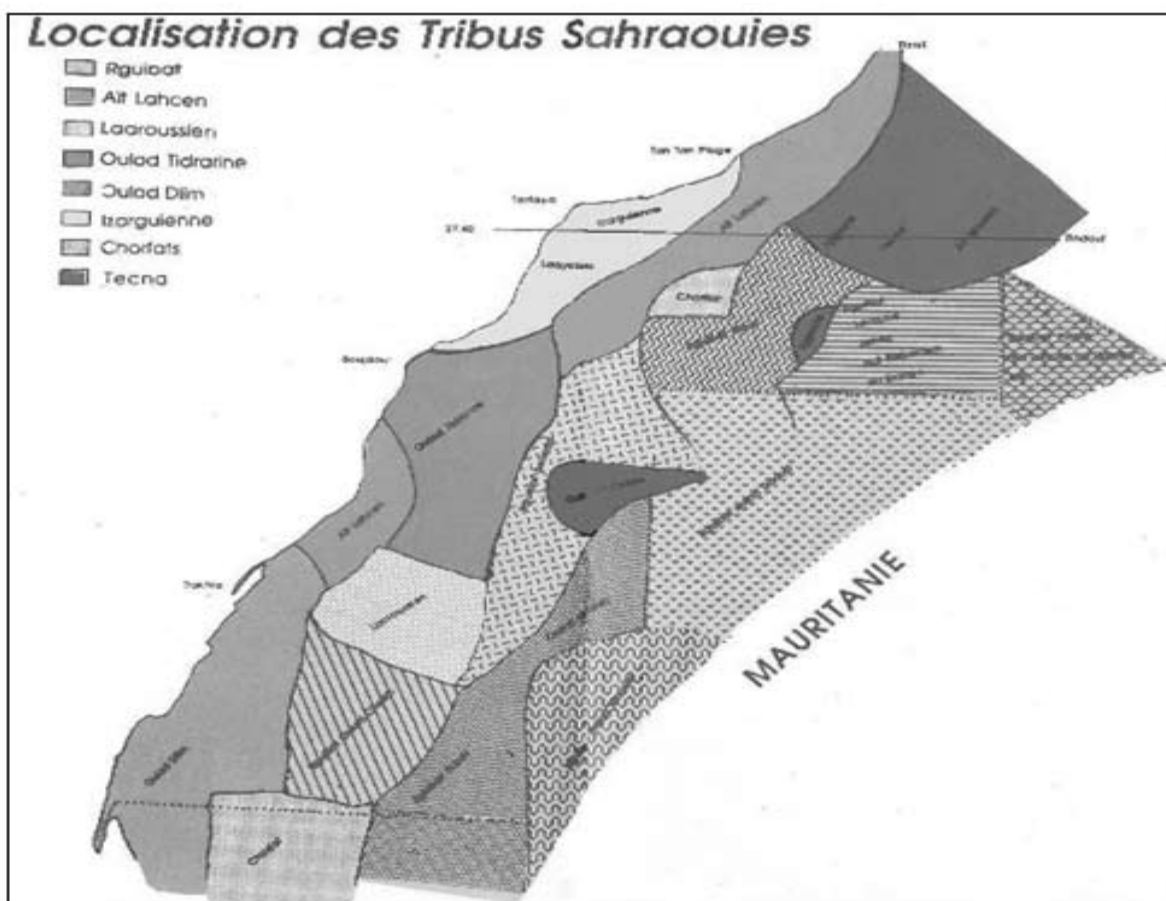

The tribes living in the western part of the Sahara are offshoots of the two main Berber people in northwest Africa, the Zenata and the Sanhaja.¹ The overarching term used to describe the people, Sahrawi, translates as “people of the Sahara” and is used to describe a variety of tribes living throughout the region. There are eight major tribes divided into forty-five fractions living in the Western Sahara according to most sources (including the 1974 Spanish census). These major tribes are the Rguibat (Lgouacem and Sahel), the Tekna (Ait Lahsen and Izarguine), the Ouled Tidrarin, the Ouled Delim, the Arosien, the Imraguen, the Ma El Ainin and the Ouled Bu Sbaa.²

¹ Hodges, Tony. Western Sahara: The Roots of a Desert War. Westport, Connecticut: Lawrence Hill & Company, 1983, p. 4.

² Thobhani, Akbarali. Western Sahara Since 1975 under Moroccan Administration: Social, Economic, and Political Transformation. Lewiston, New York: The Edwin Mellen Press, Ltd., 2002, p. 19 and Besenyő, János. Western Sahara. Pécs: IDResearch Ltd./Publikon Publishers, 2009, p. 29-31.

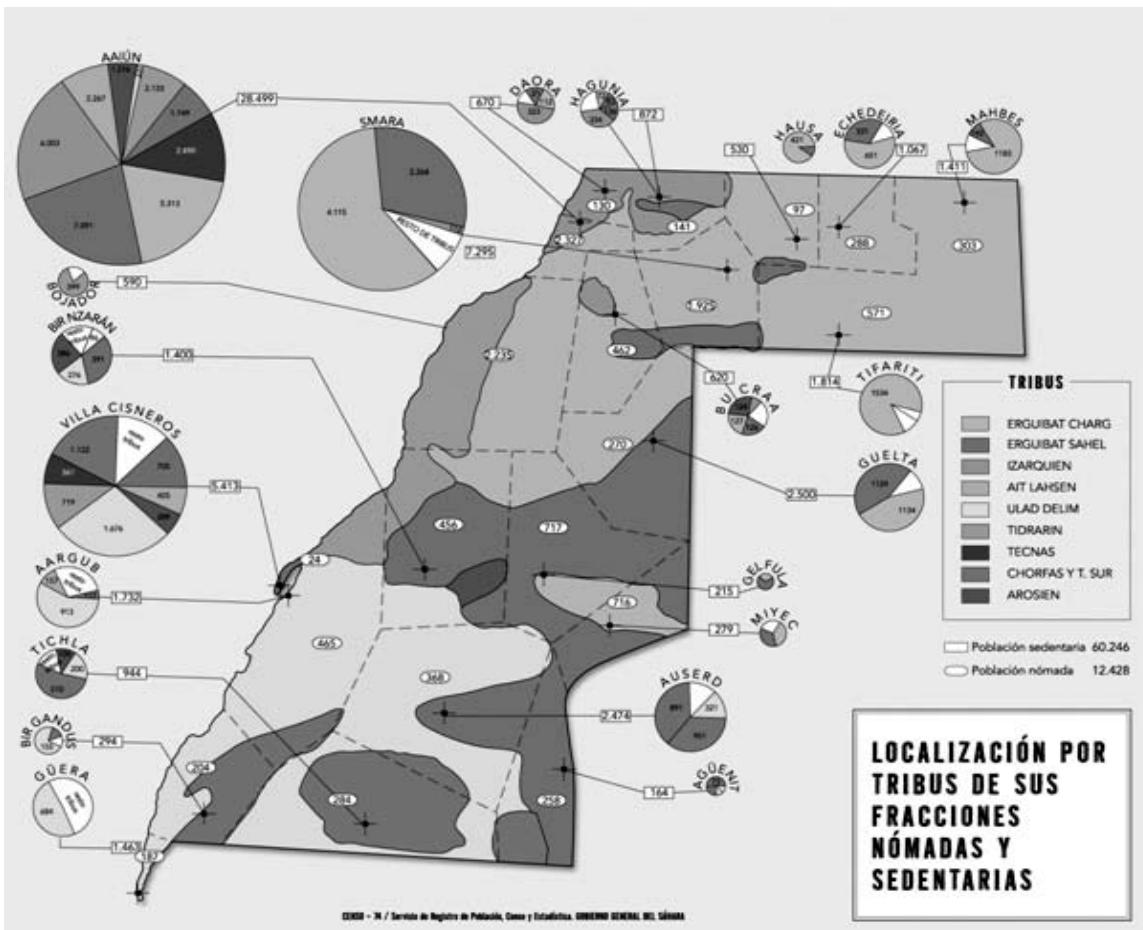

While the tribes are of nomadic origins, there did exist general patterns of migration that were unique to each tribe prior to the arrival of the Spanish and the subsequent sedentarization of the population. The areas they inhabited were dependent both on their source of income/resources (fishing, trading, warfare, etc.) and on their relations to other tribes in the region. The Rguibat Lgouacem predominated in the coastal area of Saguia El Hamra (northern part of the Western Sahara), southwest Algeria, and Northern Mauritania and the Rguibat Sahel lived along the Mauritanian frontier to the south. The Izarguine Tekna inhabited an area near Laâyoune on the northern coast of Western Sahara and in the Moroccan littoral. The Ouled Delim and Ouled Bu Sbaa inhabited Tiris El Gharbia in the area of southern Western Sahara known as Río de Oro. The Ouled Tidrarin, the Arosien, and the Ait Lahsen Tekna lived along the northern coast and in the area near southern Morocco, and the Ma El Ainin tribe traditionally lived in southern Morocco, south of the Draa.³ The Imraguen or Hawata were scattered along the Atlantic coast of the Sahara and, according to some sources, used to occupy the coast as far north as Southern Morocco.⁴

Source: Royaume du Maroc, Ministère de l'Intérieur et de l'Information: Référendum au Sahara, Recueil de textes et de cartes. pp. 176-177.

³ Thompson, Virginia and Richard Adloff. The Western Saharans. London: Croom Helm Ltd., 1980, p. 115, 317.

⁴ Briggs, L. Cabot. Tribes of the Sahara. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1967, p. 113.

Source: IDC Centre, Laâyoune

Source: Tel Quel, <<http://www.telquel-online.com/161/images/shema.pdf>>

Despite diverse tribal identities and regional origins, all of the tribes of the Western Sahara share a common Arabo-Berber origin, a shared belief in Islam, and a common structure of political and social governance. Politically, each tribe and fraction was responsible for regulating its own internal affairs through a djemaa (assembly) composed of the heads of distinguished families. The djemaa elected a sheikh to oversee the tribe and each group established its own body of law to compliment sharia.⁵ When disputes arose between tribes, the tribes generally resolved them through military means, although occasionally the Ait Arbain, a council of forty sheikhs, was formed to regulate relations.⁶ Socially, the tribes of the Western Sahara are governed by a common, stratified social structure. Family and tribal ties form the basis of social interaction and identity for the tribes of the Sahara. Genealogy thus plays a very important role in the lives of the Sahrawis as it determines both their social status and their identity.

Society is divided both horizontally into qabael (tribes), and vertically into classes. In the area of Western Sahara, there are four social classes. The Ahel mdafa (people of the gun) and the Shorfa (descendants of the Prophet) make up the highest class, as warrior status is highly important in a desert region where tribes competed for resources and dominance and religious authority was equally well regarded. The main tribes of warrior status are the Ouled Delim and the Tekna, including the Ait Lahsen and Izarguien fractions. The primary Shorfa are the Rguibat, the Arosien, and the Ouled Bbu Sbaa.⁷ However, the main tribes of the Shorfa are also part of the Ahel Mdafa. This is particularly true for the Rguibat, who are known as a bellicose warrior tribe that militarily dominated the region.⁸ The second class is comprised of znaga (tribes of tributary status), nomadic fisherman, and pastoral nomads of the interior, as well as a few sedentary and semi-sedentary Moorish groups. The main large tribes of this class are the Ouled Tidirarin and the Imraguen. The third class is the artisan and craftsman class, including tribes involved in trade, followed by the Haratin (freed, yet dependent individuals) and the slaves, who make up the lowest social class.⁹ While these social classifications are relatively fixed, it should be noted that tribes often did engage in alternate economic activities as necessary. Some tribes shifted between nomadism and sedentary life and trade, farming, or some other type of economic activity as the circumstances demanded. Likewise, fractions of tribes, while affiliated with the main group, did not always maintain a fixed identity or occupation. As L. Cabot Briggs, an anthropologist at Harvard, noted in his book on the Tribes of the Sahara, "the status of a clan or tribe could and occasionally did shift under the stress of compelling circumstances."¹⁰

The nature of the desert was such that whole tribes rarely lived or traveled together. Rather, migration required small groups so it was a rare occasion that the entirety of a tribe met in one place. Moreover, as a nomadic people, the Sahrawis moved fluidly across national borders in present-day Algeria, Morocco, Mauritania, Mali, and the Western Sahara according to the changing state of desert pastureland and the relationship between the tribes. As Tony Hodges, the author of Western Sahara: The Roots of a Desert War, notes, "desert societies have always been prone to intertribal strife and raiding. By virtue of their migrations, nomadic tribes would enter into frequent contact, and they were in competition for scarce pastoral resources, water, and livestock. Moreover, since the creation of large-scale forms of human organization was discouraged by the inhospitality of the desert and by

⁵ Hodges, Tony. "The Western Saharans." Minority Rights Group International (December 1991): 1-12, p. 4.

⁶ Besenyő, p. 34.

⁷ Hodges, "The Western Saharans.", p. 4.

⁸ Besenyő, p. 29-31.

⁹ Briggs, p. 219.

¹⁰ Briggs, p.212-213.

the sparseness and dispersion of the population, there was no effective supratribal authority to maintain order in the Western Sahara.¹¹ Success in battle was thus the surest route to power, and the warrior groups that dominated the region had ample means of war and skills of evident military application. The insecurity that resulted from this constant state of war encouraged or forced tribes to enter into alliances and pacts for protection and created an environment in which no one group dominated the region. Tribes with military prowess, however, were able to force other tribes into tributary status.

Based on both their numerical strength and military skill, the Rguibat tribe dominated much of the region. The Rguibat make up the largest tribe in the Western Sahara and the 19th century saw the rise of the Rguibat as the largest and most powerful of all the tribes in the Western Sahara.¹² The Rguibat claim semi-religious prestige as descendants of Sid Ahmed-er-Rguibi, a religious man who came to the valley of the Draa from Barbary as a Muslim missionary in 1503.¹³ However, the real power of the Rguibat comes from their reputation as a well-organized fighting force with significant wealth in livestock and a highly organized political structure. The Rguibat gained their power by defeating many tribes in the northern part of the territory.

In the southernmost part of the Spanish Sahara, the Ouled Delim emerged as the dominant tribe.¹⁴ One of the most fully Arabized of all the major tribes of the Sahara, the Ouled Delim entered into a period of expansion in the 19th century. In 1877, a series of ambushes, skirmishes, and minor battles occurred between the Ouled Tidrarin and the Ouled Delim.¹⁵ Accounts of the battles vary, with some suggesting that the Ouled Delim attacked the Ouled Tidrarin in an attempt to reduce them to the status of tributary vassals, while other suggest that the latter tribe sought the protection of the former. In any event, the Ouled Tidrarin were soon joined by the Rguibat, and the Ouled Delim were joined by the Ait Lahsen, and in the end almost all of the central Moorish tribes got involved.

When the Spanish arrived in 1884, they therefore encountered a territory rife with intertribal raiding and lacking in governance structures. The nomadic tribes moved easily across the national frontiers of Mauritania, Morocco, Mali, and Algeria, and while they had strongholds in certain areas of the territory, the concept of a defined territory with defined inhabitants had no historical precedent. There was neither territorial unity nor an overarching "Sahrawi" identity. As Tony Hodges summarized, "like many modern African nations, Western Sahara has no historical antecedent. The Sahrawis never constituted a nation in pre-colonial times. Before the arrival of the Spanish, no supratribal authority had ever regulated Western Sahara. The harsh world of the desert was not conducive to the rise of large and complex state structures, and as we have seen, Sahrawi society was traditionally prone to intertribal raiding. The Sahrawis prime loyalties were therefore to tribe, fraction, and family."¹⁶ It was only with the advent of Spanish colonization that the historic pattern of endemic intertribal raiding was halted and the concept of a "Sahrawi" people living in a defined territory came to be defined.

The Creation of a Sahrawi National Consciousness: Spanish Colonization and Nationalist Politics

Spanish colonization was the real trigger for the development of a nationalist movement. Spanish investment in the region's mineral resources led to the establishment of towns and the growth of employment and educational opportunities in those towns

¹¹ Hodges, "Western Sahara.", p. 12.

¹² Ibid, p. 10.

¹³ Briggs, p. 231-232.

¹⁴ Hodges, "Western Sahara.", p. 9.

¹⁵ Briggs, p. 212-213,

¹⁶ Hodges, "Western Sahara.", p. 149.

encouraged Sahrawis to abandon their nomadic way of life and settle in urban areas, thus increasing their contact with other Sahrawi tribes.¹⁷ The process of sedentarization, however, took decades. Notions of blood loyalty were strong and although the arrival of the Spanish terminated intertribal raiding, notions of tribal or fraction identity and loyalty had changed little by the late 1950's.¹⁸

It was only when the Spain increased its economic and political development of the region in response to Moroccan overtures to take over the region, following its independence in 1956, that more concrete political transformation took place. During the conflict with Morocco, some Sahrawis served in the Spanish armed forces. Others, including members of both the Rguibat and the Tekna tribes joined the Moroccan Army of Liberation in 1956 and were sent to the desert to inspire other nomads to revolt against Spanish rule.¹⁹ There was thus early resistance against Spanish colonial by Sahrawi guerilla forces in coordination with the Moroccan Army of Liberation in 1957-1958 and a slight hint of nationalist tendencies among the divided Sahrawi people. However, their numbers were small, their impact limited, and their efforts brutally repressed by the Spanish in Operation Ecouvillion. According to Tony Hodges, had the Army of Liberation succeeded in driving Spain from the Sahara, the territory would have been integrated into Morocco and doubtless Sahrawi nationalism would have emerged as a political force.²⁰ However, that was not the case, and after their defeat in 1957-1958, many of the older, more conservative elements of Sahrawi society left the territory and settled in southern Morocco. Others, attracted by the benefits of cooperating with the Spanish, began participating in a newly created political entity designed to increase native Sahrawi participation in the governance of the Spanish colony.

The territorial conflict with Morocco had forced Spain to introduce a series of political changes in the late 1950's and 1960's that ultimately reinforced the idea that the territory was an independent political entity with a defined population. The 1967 Djemaa (assembly) established by the Spanish authorities in the Sahara was an attempt to give greater voice to the Sahrawis, although in reality the assembly had no real power. Nevertheless, as the members of the Djemaa were assigned according to tribe, the makeup of the Djemaa provides an indication of the tribal division in 1967. All 82 members of the assembly were Sahrawi and tribes were represented in proportion to their size. Forty of the members were elected by tribal djemaas and the rest were appointed. In 1967, the Rguibat held 45 seats, the Ouled Delim held 12, the Izarguien (Tekna) 6, the Arosien 5, the Ouled Tidrarin 7, and the remaining 7 seats were shared by the smaller tribes.²¹ Despite this affiliation by tribe, the establishment of the Djemaa did force various tribes to work together and helped concretize the notion that the Sahrawis shared a common identity. This identity, however, was neither fixed nor unified.

Just as some Sahrawis were cooperating with the Spanish, others were working to rid the colonial power from the territory. In the late 1960's and early 1970's wider mass resistance against Spanish rule began to take place. The leadership of this anti-colonial movement, however, differed from the previous movement. It was led by youth who had settled in towns during their childhood, and despite association with a nomadic lifestyle, had been educated in Spanish towns and Moroccan universities. Indeed, the first movement of this sort was founded in 1967 by a Rguibi named Mohammed Sidi Ibrahim Bassiri who had attended university in Casablanca.²² Harakat Tahrir Saguia el Hamra wa Oued ed-Dahab (Organization for the Liberation of Saguia el-Hamra and Oued ed-Dahab) was the first

¹⁷ Hodges, "Western Sahara.", p. 151.

¹⁸ Ibid, p. 149.

¹⁹ Ibid, p. 75.

²⁰ Ibid, p. 150.

²¹ Ibid, p. 172.

²² Ibid, p. 153.

urban-based political party organized by Sahrawi activists. The Movement was suppressed violently and dissolved by Spanish authorities, but it established the groundwork for future activist organizations.

Shortly after the dissolution of Harakat, a new movement was formed by a Rguibi studying law in Morocco, El-Ouali Mustapha Sayed. This movement, which came to be known as the Polisario Front, was founded by the academic elite and the original members recruited by El-Ouali moved on to hold senior positions in the Polisario.²³ The Frente Popular de Liberación de Saguía el Hamra y Río de Oro (Polisario) was officially formed on May 10, 1973 at a secret congress and its early recruits were primarily well-educated youth from towns throughout Spanish Sahara.²⁴ As it sought to expand, it made contact with refugees in Tindouf, Tan-Tan, and Zouerate who had fled their homes during the violence of 1957-1958.²⁵ As it expanded, the Polisario tried to de-legitimize other anti-colonial organization, seeing itself, much as it does today, as the sole legitimate voice of all Sahrawis.

To be certain, however, there were also other anti-Spanish Sahrawi organizations, such as the Front de Libération et du Rattachement du Sahara à la Mauritanie that operated in the southern part of the territory and sought unification with Mauritania and the Mouvement de Résistance des Hommes Bleus (MOREHOB), which was founded by a pro-Moroccan Sahrawi Bashir Figuigui (known as Edouardo Moha) in 1972. As with the majority of these smaller organizations, MOREHOB was repressed by the Spanish and ceased to exist in all but name by mid-1973. As the Polisario grew in strength, anti-Polisario Sahrawis continued to fight against them, sometimes in support of Morocco as was the case with the Front pour la Libération et l'Unité (FLU) founded by pro-Moroccan refugees in Tan-Tan and recently demobilized Sahrawi soldiers who had previously been enlisted in the Spanish forces.²⁶ Their success, however, was limited and the Polisario continued to expand its ranks.

The political movement that most successfully contested the political dominance of the Polisario was the Union Nacional Saharaui (PUNS), established in 1974. Its goal was to obtain independence for the Western Sahara through a process of accelerated self-determination. Unlike the Polisario, however, PUNS sought to preserve a special relationship with Spain.²⁷ The majority of its support came from traditional elements of Saharan society, including the majority of sheikhs and nobles, and those from the older generation. Additionally, more than 60% of the members of the Djemaa supported the party and identified themselves as party members.²⁸

In the mid-1970s, there were thus two important Sahrawi nationalist movements vying for power, the PUNS in affiliation with the Djemaa and the Polisario Front. During this time, international movement also contributed to the creation of Sahrawi identity. As the UN spoke of a unified territory called the Western Sahara, the Sahrawis became aware that the territory on which they lived was being considered as a political entity, as were its peoples.²⁹ Identity thus came only with the concept of Western Sahara as a "nation-state". However, even as a Sahrawi identity was being established, particularly as the international community became involved, that identity was neither rigid nor cohesive, nor were the voices of all Sahrawi represented by the Polisario Front, despite their claims to the contrary. The presence of other nationalist movement highlights this reality. Unfortunately, as the political dynamic in Spain changed due to the impending death of Franco, Spanish policy in

²³ Hodges, "Western Sahara.", p. 158.

²⁴ Ibid, p. 162.

²⁵ Thompson, p. 142.

²⁶ Ibid, p. 138.

²⁷ Hodges, "Western Sahara.", p. 171.

²⁸ Ibid, p. 172.

²⁹ Shelley, Toby. Endgame in the Western Sahara. London: Zen Books Ltd., 2004, p, 176.

the Sahara did as well, with the end result being the growth of the Polisario to the detriment of other viable nationalist movements.

The Spanish colonial administration had initially supported the PUNS, based on their desire to maintain relations with Spain and their association with the Djemaa. In July of 1974, Spain and the Djemaa, supported by PUNS, approved the Estatuto Politico, a plan that would grant internal autonomy to the Western Sahara.³⁰ Spain's failure, however, to implement the Estatuto Politico discredited the leaders of the Djemaa and PUNS for urging the Sahrawis to take Spanish self-determination at face value. This failure gave significant support to the Polisario, who claimed that PUNS was just a colonial creation. It also led to a reversal by Spain in its support for PUNS. In 1975, Spain began urging the Polisario to unite with PUNS and the Djemaa. This was not easily achieved because the Polisario did not, in fact, represent the entirety of the Sahrawi population. The members of the Djemaa were reluctant to submit to the leadership of the young militants leading the Polisario, and the members of PUNS insisted on preserving their party within a broad patriotic front. The Polisario exacerbated this tension by refusing to accommodate the sensitivities of the leaders of the PUNS and the Djemaa. It went so far as to insist on the PUNS' dissolution and to actively recruit its members to join its own ranks.³¹

Throughout 1975, relations between the Polisario and the PUNS remained tense and occasional skirmishes broke out. During this time Spain also continued to increase its support for the Polisario as a means to improve negotiations with the militant group and limit attacks on its forces. Spain's actions led to the eventual dissolution of PUNS, leaving the Sahrawis with few options for political leadership.

As the Polisario established its dominance over political leadership in the Spanish Sahara, some tribal sheiks and members of the Djemaa met with the movement to establish an alliance in November 1975. Accounts differ on the November 1975 pact and the meeting of the Djemaa two weeks after the Madrid pact was signed. According to semi-official Polisario records, two-thirds of the Djemaa membership attended, along with almost as many Sahrawi nobles and chiefs. They declared that they would make no decision binding on the Sahrawi people, would dissolve the Djemaa, and called for the formation of a National Provisional Sahrawi Council for Unity. As a follow-up, the Polisario record asserts that on December 3, 1975, the same leaders met and signed a proclamation declaring unconditional support for the Polisario as the sole and legitimate representative of the Saharan people. The December meeting also established the National Provisional Council.³²

Despite the presence of some members of the Djemaa, this proclamation by no means had the support of the entire assembly. Furthermore, even those members that did sign were suspicious and resentful of the revolutionary zeal of the youthful militant group; the alliance therefore was uneasy.³³ Additionally, the Moroccan official record differs vastly from that of the Polisario and states correctly that the Djemaa ratified the Madrid pact in November 1975, thus contesting the legality of the Polisario declaration. Furthermore, the Moroccan record states that during a subsequent visit by Khatri Oud Jamani, the president of the Djemaa, to Rabat, the Djemaa swore allegiance to King Hassan II.³⁴ This allegiance was substantiated when the Djemaa was summoned on February 16, 1976. At the Council meeting, 57 members of the Djemaa voted unanimously to give "full approval to the decolonization of the territory and its reintegration with Morocco and Mauritania."³⁵

However, neither the UN nor Spain accepted the Djemaa as the legal representative of the Sahrawis following the "dissolution" of the council in November 1975. By the time

³⁰ Hodges, "Western Sahara.", p. 204.

³¹ Ibid, p. 204.

³² Thompson, p. 135.

³³ Hodges, "Western Sahara.", p. 235.

³⁴ Thompson, p. 135.

³⁵ Hodges, "Western Sahara.", p. 237.

Spain withdrew all of its personnel, the Polisario had successfully used coercion and negotiations to establish itself as the sole representative of the Sahrawi people and on February 27, 1976 declared the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic as the nation-state of the Sahrawi people. Mauritania and Morocco, however, had not given up their claim to the territory, the Madrid Pact, dividing the territory between the two nations, was enforced, and a deadly battle for political control of the territory ensued.

The Conflict over Western Sahara: The Polisario Front and Identity Formation in the Camps in Tindouf

As Spain withdrew its forces from the territory, Moroccan and Mauritanian military forces moved in, waging a battle against the militant Polisario Front who were determined to expel them from the region and exert sole control over the territory. The Polisario Forces were dominated by the Rguibat tribe, who reportedly accounted for a large proportion of Polisario troops, at least during the early years of fighting.³⁶ As the war progressed, other nomads, demobilized by Spain, reportedly offered their military services to the highest bidder and Algeria seemed to provide greater financial incentives than Morocco.³⁷ Thus the presence of other tribes in the Polisario's fighting force was not necessarily an indication of broad tribal support for the movement. "In any case, the numerical strength of the Rguibat and Ouled Delim and their renowned physical endurance, martial traditions, and intimate knowledge of the desert all supported the view that those two tribes predominated both in the fighting forces and in the Polisario leadership."³⁸

The breadth of tribes in the Western Sahara were not represented in the Polisario Front's fighting forces, again suggesting that the movement did not represent the entire population of the territory. Given the Ma El Ainin's orientation towards Morocco, both psychologically and geographically, it is unlikely that any members of the tribe have been induced by the Polisario Front to join its ranks.³⁹ Likewise, the Tekna had always oriented towards Morocco and "prayed always in the name of the sultan of Morocco."⁴⁰ As John Mercer points out, "the Polisario had gradually absorbed the able-bodied men of all tribes except the pro-Morocco Tekna in the north and the pro-Mauritania Delim in the south."⁴¹ Nevertheless, the Polisario continued to claim that it was the sole representative of the people and worked hard to establish a state in the refugee camps in Tindouf, Algeria, where a large number of Sahrawi refugees fleeing the conflict ended up, whether by virtue of it being the closest town across the Algerian border, or whether they were forced there by the Polisario to aid in the building of their nation-state. While their arrival at the camps varied, what was certain was that once in the camps, the Polisario Front exerted complete political domination over the refugees, indoctrinating them ideals of social and political revolution, and forcing them to forget their tribal origins in the name of national unity.

The "Sahrawi leadership consciously developed a political ideology emphasizing political unity and a new social order" and the camps in Tindouf proved to be ideal ground for recruiting adherents to the new order.⁴² Once in the refugee camps, all Sahrawis were automatically considered members of the Polisario and were politically indoctrinated. Camps presented the ideal recruiting base for the Polisario. With nowhere to go and no alternatives

³⁶ Thompson, p. 16.

³⁷ Ibid, p. 253.

³⁸ Ibid, p. 253.

³⁹ Ibid, p. 317.

⁴⁰ Ibid, p. 318.

⁴¹ Mercer, John. "The Cycle of Invasions and Unification in the Western Sahara." African Affairs, 75:301 (October 1976): 498-510, p. 504.

⁴² San Martin, Pablo. "Nationalism, Identity and Citizenship in the Western Sahara." The Journal of North African Studies, 10: 3-4 (September-December 2005): 565-592, p. 570.

to the political leadership of the Polisario, the Sahrawis had no choice but to accept the dominant leadership of the militant group. As Toby Shelley, a reporter for the Financial Times, noted, "within the camps, in order to influence the policy of the Polisario Front and the SADR, one must be active in an organization or institutions and so have a vote in deciding its direction."⁴³ The camps thus provided a blank space on which to write a new historical narrative and create a Sahrawi national identity. The Polisario created the idea of what it means to be a Sahrawi. This identity was not inherent, but rather constructed and forced upon the people living in the camps.

The atmosphere of war further contributed to the creation of a single Sahrawi identity. The war helped keep society cohesive, prevented criticism, and legitimated the purges of those perceived to be a danger to the revolution. The Polisario justified the total suppression of dissent by claiming that unity was vital to social revolution. As part of this revolution, which aimed to eliminate all forms for subjugation and promote unity in the name of creating a revolutionary society based on the principles of radical communitarianism, social equality, and group loyalty, the Polisario also eradicated any reference to a tribal past.⁴⁴ The Constitution of the SADR states that family is the basis of Sahrawi society, and the Polisario has gone so far to limit tribal divisions that the mere mention of tribal or fractional identity is censured in the camps.⁴⁵ According to one Polisario leader, "not only does one abstain henceforth from referring to tribal affiliation, but one pushes zeal to the point of refusing to name one's father."⁴⁶ According to Hodges, "in the name of national unity, the Front abhorred all forms of kinship loyalty, to the point that its members denied tribal affiliation altogether. Caste status, which has been closely associated with tribal membership, was renounced with equal resolve, and there was a strong reforming, egalitarian streak in the Front's philosophy."⁴⁷

The Polisario and the SADR hegemonically constructed the new anti-tribal, revolutionary Sahrawi identity through its actions and institutions in the camps. "The Sahrawi [revolutionary] subjectivity that emerged during the 1970s, the nationalist identity, and the concept of citizenship associated with it, was thus sedimented in the everyday life of the camps in a while range of symbols, spaces, practices, and stories."⁴⁸ The work of Pablo San Martin, a professor at the University of Leeds, highlights this physical and mental indoctrination. San Martin notes, "daily life brings a steady emphasis on national identity, ranging from the flying of the Sahroui flag to the recollection of the Republics martyrs. Both child and adult are educated in school subjects, guerilla warfare, and political understandingRadical social change is a central principle: tribal, racial, and caste differences are said to have disappeared in the common purpose."⁴⁹ Refugees have been bombarded by propaganda, and after thirty years in the camps, informed and objective freedom of opinion is limited.⁵⁰ Furthermore, any dissent is suppressed by the dictatorial political regime of the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic.

The Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic: Political Dictatorship and the Misrepresentation of the Sahrawis

The Polisario uses tribal affiliation to its advantage when it can, and actively suppresses tribal identity when it is apparent that it cannot use it to its advantage. Both the ⁴³ Shelley, p. 176.

⁴⁴ San Martin, p. 570.

⁴⁵ Hodges, "Western Sahara.", p. 344.

⁴⁶ Ibid, p. 344.

⁴⁷ Ibid, p. 163-164.

⁴⁸ San Martin, p. 573

⁴⁹ Mercer, p. 507.

⁵⁰ Jensen, Erik. Western Sahara: Anatomy of a Stalemate. Boulder: Lynne Rienner, 2005, p. 98.

Polisario Front and the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic have continually used nepotism and suppression of other tribal identity to assert Rguibat and non-Sahrawi dominance over the Sahrawi people. Interestingly, the top leadership of the Polisario does not even have tribal origins. Mohamed Abdelaziz was born in Marrakech, and part of his family continues to reside in Morocco. The number of Mauritanian and Moroccan-born Sahrawis holding high-rank in the SADR and the Polisario is striking.⁵¹ As Virginia Thompson, author of The Western Saharans points out, "there is little doubt that by 1978, the Sahraouis, that is native of the former Spanish Sahara, had become a minority in the top echelon of the Polisario command and perhaps in its army as well."⁵² In his memoirs published in 1997, Javier Perez de Cuellar, former Secretary-General of the UN substantiated this, noting, "I was never convinced that independence promised the best future for the inhabitants of the Western Sahara....such political leadership as it exists [in the camps] is not impressive and in some cases not Sahrawi in origin."⁵³

The Polisario has also tried to maintain the dominance of certain tribes at the expense of others. This was particularly apparent during the preparations for the referendum, during which the Polisario actively suppressed the rights of minorities. During the identification process for the referendum, in June of 1995, the Polisario suspended its participation in response to new applications from what were defined as the Chorfa (smaller tribes descending from the Prophet Mohammed), Tribus del Norte (tribes traditionally inhabiting the region north of the river Draa with descendants migrating to the Sahara region), and Tribus Costeras y del Sur (fishing and shepherd tribes along the Atlantic Coast), citing that it did not accept these groups since they represented minorities under the Spanish census of 1974.⁵⁴ However, it was not necessarily that these groups were unimportant under the Spanish census, but rather that they did not fit into one of the seven largest tribal groupings (Rguibat Sarg, Rguibat Sahel, Izarguien, Ait Lahsen, Arosien, Ouled Delim, Ouled Tidrarin).⁵⁵ Furthermore, the 1974 Spanish census was not complete, as it took no account of Sahrawis from the tribes that roamed in Western Sahara or those, for political or economic reasons, had settled in neighboring states. A large number of Sahrawis, including several of the Polisario leaders, had been outside Western Sahara at the time of the census, as many tribes existed on both sides of the artificial frontier and moved readily into and out of the territory according to political and economic circumstances. A rough estimate from the time numbers the individuals from said tribes at approximately 75,000.⁵⁶ It is therefore likely that the Polisario tried to eliminate these groupings from the referendum out of fear that they would not vote in the Polisario's favor. Regardless, it is apparent that the Polisario not only does not represent the entirety of the population, but in fact has also attempted to exclude native Sahrawis from voting in order to maintain its control over the territory.

⁵¹ Thompson, p. 250

⁵² Ibid, p. 255.

⁵³ Thobhani, p. 99.

⁵⁴ Castellino, Joshua. "Territory and Identity in International Law: The Struggle for Self-Determination in the Western Sahara." Millennium – Journal of International Studies, 28 (1999): 523-551, p. 542.

⁵⁵ Bensenyó, p. 75.

⁵⁶ Hodges, "The Western Saharans.", p. 7.

The Results of the 1974 Spanish Census

Rguibat Sarg (4 sub-tribes and 26 clans) 20,275	Northern tribes (29 tribes) 3,373
Rguibat Sahel (7 sub-tribes and 39 clans) 18,239	Chorfa and Zuaia (6 tribes) 4,631
Izarguien (2 sub-tribes and 10 clans) 7,984	Coastal tribes (68 tribes) 2,361
Ait Lahsen (3 sub-tribes and 13 clans) 3,540	Total: 10,363⁵⁷
Arosien (2 sub-tribes and 9 clans) 2,858
Ouled Delim (5 sub-tribes and 20 clans) 5,382
Ouled Tidrarin (15 clans) 4,842
Total: 63,120

The Polisario and the SADR have thus used political control to keep a select number of like-minded individuals in power. The system of military and political governance has never been democratic, despite claims to the contrary, and in reality both the Polisario and the SADR are dictatorial regimes. The Polisario Front serves as the single political party and state administrator of the SADR and the SADR's leading bodies tend to overlap, in function and composition with those of the Polisario itself, underscoring the reality that the SADR is a military state. Not only has the same individual, Mohamed Abdelaziz, served as Secretary General of the Polisario and President of the SADR for over 30 years, but also the core leadership has remained virtually unchanged. Ministers, ambassadors, and public officials are shifted around from various posts to give the illusion of change, but the leadership of the Polisario and the SADR remain dominated by a select group of individuals loyal to Abdelaziz. The Polisario also suppresses any form of dissent, labeling any defectors and dissidents as pro-Moroccan traitors and accuses them of inciting tribalism.⁵⁸

Leaders and civilians alike have nevertheless tried to reform the system, through both dissent and defections. Infighting within the Polisario began as early as 1976, prior to the declaration of the SADR, when El Ouali was allegedly dismissed from his post only to be reinstated shortly thereafter.⁵⁹ In 1988, the tension within the Polisario and the SADR exploded. Although there are few sources about what really happened, the organizational changes that took place following the 1988 demonstration lend credibility to a political dispute of some nature. Arguably, large demonstrations and protests occurred, with cadres from the Political Bureau protesting the actions of the Polisario Front's Executive Committee and accusing them of centralizing power and developing a political oligarchy.⁶⁰ The spark for these demonstrations was the detention of several political opponents of the leaders of the Executive Committee. The Polisario has indeed admitted that human rights abuses occurred during this time, but claims that, as with other national movements, purges and detentions are a natural part of socialist revolutions.⁶¹

Internal dissent continues to this day. In 2004, the Front Polisario Khat al-Shahid was formed as a reform movement within the Front. Khat al-Shahid still considers the Polisario to be the sole legitimate representative of the Sahrawi people and works both inside and outside of the system to promote reform. Khat al-Shahid accused the Polisario leadership of being undemocratic and of propagating corruption and tribalism. The movement thus seeks to hold the Polisario leadership accountable to the Sahrawi people. The Polisario refuses to recognize the organization, insisting that differences be solved within the established system.

In response to the autocratic tendencies of the Polisario and SADR leadership throughout the past thirty years, there have been a large number of defections from both the leadership of Polisario Front and the refugees in the camps in Tindouf. Defections began ⁵⁷ Bensenyó, p. 77.

⁵⁸ Shelley, p. 180.

⁵⁹ Thompson, p. 249.

⁶⁰ Shelley, p. 179.

⁶¹ Ibid, p. 179.

as early as the late 1970s and by the mid-1980s the pace of defections has increased, as both leaders and Sahrawi families began leaving. Notable defectors Ramadane Ould Ennes, Ambassador to the African Union, Brahim Hakim, the SADR Foreign Minister, Baba Sayed, the founder of the Polisario's younger brother, and several other important officials, including the representative to Libya, the representative to the Canary Islands, the former Director of Information, the Chief Coordinator of the Camps as well several key members of the Djemaa and camp and local officials.⁶² Defections continue to the present. In 2000, the Polisario representative for the UN identification process, Ghaoutah Ould Mohamed, defected, as did Grand Sheikh Ali El Bouhaili Hnini.

According to returnees, the reasons for leaving the camps and abandoning the Polisario are many, including the terrible living conditions in the camps, the realization that independence is unattainable and that the Polisario has lost the war, and the pain caused by separation of families. Additionally, returnees have cited corruption and authoritarianism among the leadership and tensions caused by tribalism and internal dissension.⁶³ According to reports, the camps are plagued by serious tribal tensions. The larger tribes, particularly the Rguibat, are reporting to be dominating in positions of power. The tensions is so intense that some believe the Western Sahara under Polisario control could end up being a state where rivalries based on clan, tribal, or ethnic differences and loyalties will cause tremendous destruction if not addressed or if actively suppressed, as the Polisario does in the name of national unity.⁶⁴

While these defections continue, the Sahrawis have also taken their anger with the Polisario to the polls. Most recently, in the Moroccan local elections held in June 2009, voters in the Western Sahara region sent a strong message asserting their identification with Morocco and their displeasure with the Polisario. The highest level of voter turnout (67%) came in the Moroccan-region of the Western Sahara, where local residents asserted their Moroccan identity with enthusiastic participation in the elections, rejecting a call by the Polisario Front to UN Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon to keep Sahrawis in the disputed region from voting. Unfortunately, the opportunity to vote was not given to those Sahrawi sequestered in refugee camps controlled by the Polisario. Nevertheless, given the tribal makeup of the Front, the number of defections, and the political reality in the Moroccan Sahara, it is fair to conclude that the Polisario Front is not the sole legitimate representative of the Sahrawi, but rather an elite militant group that uses political indoctrination in an attempt to gain power and support in the region.

Conclusion

The Western Sahara conflict is not only a military dispute about control of territory but a dispute about what it means to be Sahrawi, who the Sahrawis are, and who the others are that define the frontier of "our Sahara."⁶⁵ The Polisario, through war and social revolution, have attempted to define both the identity of the people and the limits of the territory. Yet, both the territorial delineation and the concept of a united Sahrawi people were not innate and neither had a historical precedent in the region or among the peoples of the region. In the process of creating a new national identity, the Polisario have thus destroyed the rich tribal history of the people and forced their own historical narrative of national unity on the people they control in the camps. However, as evident from this analysis on the origins of the Sahrawis and the development of their national consciousness, the Polisario does not represent the voices of the people of the Sahara. How can the Polisario claim to represent a people that is not wholly present in the camps under its ⁶² Thobhani, p. 66-68.

⁶³ Ibid, p. 70-71.

⁶⁴ Ibid, p. 71.

⁶⁵ San Martin, p. 587.

authority and in fact scattered across Mauritania, Morocco, and Algeria? It cannot. How can the Polisario claim to be the sole legitimate representative when it excludes some tribes from voting and elevates others? It cannot. As Dr. Akbarali Thobhani, a professor of African and Middle Eastern Studies at the Metropolitan State College of Denver, has articulated, "contrary to general misconceptions, the conflict in the Western Sahara is not purely one of Moroccans versus the Sahrawis who are all led by the Polisario Front. There are many Sahrawis who are very local to Morocco and are strongly opposed to the Polisario Front. There are thousands of Sahrawis who have defected from the Polisario and returned to Morocco."⁶⁶ Understanding the dynamics of conflict in the Western Sahara requires looking beyond the recent history of Polisario dominance of Sahrawi identity. Only when the international community and the Polisario recognize this reality will the true voices of the Sahrawi be heard.

⁶⁶ Thobhani, p. 262.

Bibliography

- Besenyő, János. Western Sahara. Pécs: IDResearch Ltd./Publikon Publishers, 2009.
- Briggs, L. Cabot. Tribes of the Sahara. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1967.
- Castellino, Joshua. "Territory and Identity in International Law: The Struggle for Self-Determination in the Western Sahara." Millennium – Journal of International Studies, 28 (1999): 523-551.
- Chatty, Dawn (ed.). Nomadic Societies in the Middle East and North Africa: Entering the 21st Century. Leiden, the Netherlands: Brill Academic Publishers, 2006.
- Hodges, Tony. Western Sahara: The Roots of a Desert War. Westport, Connecticut: Lawrence Hill & Company, 1983.
- Hodges, Tony. "The Western Saharans." Minority Rights Group International (December 1991): 1-12.
- Jensen, Erik. Western Sahara: Anatomy of a Stalemate. Boulder: Lynne Reinner, 2005.
- Mercer, John. "The Cycle of Invasions and Unification in the Western Sahara." African Affairs, 75:301 (October 1976): 498-510.
- San Martin, Pablo. "Nationalism, Identity and Citizenship in the Western Sahara." The Journal of North African Studies, 10: 3-4 (September–December 2005): 565-592.
- Shelley, Toby. Endgame in the Western Sahara. London: Zen Books Ltd., 2004.
- Thobhani, Akbarali. Western Sahara Since 1975 under Moroccan Administration: Social, Economic, and Political Transformation. Lewiston, New York: The Edwin Mellen Press, Ltd., 2002.
- Thompson, Virginia and Richard Adloff. The Western Saharans. London: Croom Helm Ltd., 1980.
- "Western Sahara Advisory Opinion." International Court of Justice Reports (16 October 1975): 1-174.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, February 11, 2012 9:32 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: FOR REVIEW: Op-eds from Ed for The Hill and Yonah for Global Post
Attachments: PR_Yonah Op-ed for Global Post_From 9-11 to Arab Spring 9Feb12 FINAL DRAFT.doc; PR_Ed Op-ed for The Hill_ Stop Subsidizing Recruiting Ground 9Feb12 FINAL DRAFT.doc

Rachad,

Enclosed are two opeds, one authored by me, and one authored by Yonah Alexander. The purpose is to provide a double hit with the target being the Congress and US policy makers, in anticipation of the upcoming film on the Refugee camps, by Havier Bodem and Penelope Cruz. I would like your opinion before sending it out. It's very hard hitting against the Polisario but steers clear of any mention of Algeria. Please get back to me as soon as you can. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Op-ed for The Hill (726 words)

February 9, 2012

Stop Subsidizing Recruiting Ground for Terrorists: Shut down Polisario Camps

By Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel

Why are US tax dollars being used to subsidize a recruiting ground in North Africa for al-Qaeda terrorists, drug traffickers, and mercenaries?

That's a question US and international policymakers should ask after reading a new study by the International Center for Terrorism Studies (ICTS), which warns that al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) is extending its reach across North Africa and the Sahel and actively recruiting from the Polisario-run refugee camps near Tindouf in Algeria.

The report says these camps—which are supported by millions of dollars in US and international relief aid—have become “a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises.” The study recommends the camps be “shut down” and calls on the US and international community to “prioritize permanent refugee resettlement in line with existing international protocols and agreements.”

The ICTS study and news media report that increasing numbers of Polisario Front members have been arrested and accused of drug and arms smuggling, gun battles in Mali, kidnappings for AQIM in Mauritania and Algeria, and fighting as mercenaries for Qaddafi in Libya.

The AQIM-Polisario connection was most recently demonstrated two months ago when AQIM-linked assailants abducted three Western aid workers from a Polisario headquarters camp, reportedly helped by Polisario insiders who gave assailants arms and directions to the victims.

ICTS says that in the decade between 9/11 and the Arab Spring, terrorist kidnappings, bombings, and other attacks by AQIM and other militant groups in North Africa and the Sahel jumped more than 500 percent. It reports that AQIM is expanding its terrorist ties in an “arc of instability” across Africa, posing “one of the most worrying strategic challenges” for the international community in a region that has been “mostly overlooked by policy-makers.”

The study cites AQIM's links to other al-Qaeda affiliates and militants, including AQAP in Yemen, al-Shabaab in Somalia, and Boko Haram in Nigeria, and Polisario militants in Algeria, which it calls a “dangerous threat” to the region and beyond. The study notes evidence that AQIM may have obtained advanced Libyan arms, including surface-to-air missiles, and says intelligence reports confirm AQIM has also “opened links to Latin cartels for ‘drugs-for-arms’ smuggling to Europe through terrorist-trafficking networks in the Sahel that include Polisario members.”

Other experts concur on the seriousness of the threat. AFRICOM head US General Carter Ham recently called AQIM's growing links with other militants in the region “very, very dangerous” and a “threat to the US.” And UK Foreign Secretary William Hague has warned that expanding AQIM terror ties could have a “profoundly destabilizing effect on countries in North Africa and the Gulf” already shaken by the Arab Spring.

Ultimately, says the ICTS report, al-Qaeda and other militants in the region seek to exploit Arab Spring instability and expand their terrorist-trafficking network across Africa and into Europe and the Americas. The study finds they are also taking advantage of “the lingering 35-year-old Western Sahara conflict, which is creating an opening for AQIM's expansion and also recruitment of Polisario members among the Sahrawi refugee camps in Algeria.”

To address the growing risk of recruitment in the camps, ICTS recommends shutting them down and focusing US and international aid on resettling refugees.

For humanitarian as well as security reasons, this recommendation should receive very serious consideration from US and international policy makers, as long as it also takes into consideration of the humanitarian needs of the refugees. Multiple reports have documented abuse of the rights of the refugees, who are confined to the camps and denied freedom to leave. Thousands have been forced to make dangerous escapes across hostile terrain. Tragically, the refugees in the Tindouf camps are among the only refugees in the world who are welcome to resettle elsewhere, if the Polisario would only let them.

Since 1990 international agencies have spent in excess of $1 billion—more than $300 million from the US—effectively perpetuating the dangerous conditions in these camps. Much of the aid has reportedly been diverted to the black market for Polisario profit. AQIM and others are now exploiting the camps as a recruiting ground. Clearly this must stop. The camps should be closed and US and international aid used only for durable solutions to resettle and repatriate refugees, not to deny their rights or subsidize a recruiting ground for terrorists and traffickers.

The views expressed in this article are the personal views of Edward M. Gabriel, US Ambassador to Morocco, 1997-2001, who advises the Kingdom of Morocco.

Draft op-ed for Global Post (748 words)

February 9, 2012

From 9/11 to Arab Spring – Rising Terrorism in North Africa & the Sahel

By Yonah Alexander

As international attention focuses on violence and upheaval in Syria, we must not lose sight of another danger to peace and stability in the region: al-Qa'ida's frightening new reach into North, West, and Central Africa.

Bin Laden is gone, but his ideas and al-Qa'ida affiliates are alive and kicking. One of the most troubling is al-Qa'ida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) in North Africa, which has links with weapons and narco-trafficking, militants in Nigeria, and Polisario mercenaries who fought for Qaddafi in Libya.

The International Center for Terrorism Studies (ICTS) has tracked a disturbing upward trajectory of terrorism in North Africa and the Sahel since 9/11. Our most recent update, released last week, reports the turbulence and events of the Arab Spring are in danger of being exploited by al-Qa'ida and other militant groups attempting to further destabilize the region.

Over the past decade, 1,288 terrorist bombings, murders, kidnappings, and ambushes — against international and domestic targets — have claimed more than 2,000 lives and 6,000 victims in Algeria, Chad, Libya, Mali, Mauritania, Morocco, Niger, and Tunisia.

It is a grave concern that AQIM is involved jointly with other al-Qa'ida affiliates and militant groups in the region — including al-Qa'ida in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) in Yemen, al-Shabaab in Somalia, Boko Haram based in Nigeria, and Polisario militants from Algeria. This network represents a dangerous threat both regionally and inter-regionally. Clearly, al-Qa'ida has established a safe haven and breeding ground in the failed and fragile states bordering the Sahara.

Intelligence reports confirm AQIM has also opened links with Latin cartels for 'drugs-for-arms' smuggling into Europe through terrorist-trafficking networks that include members of the Polisario Front. Recent reports also confirm that arms from the Libya conflict, including surface-to-air missiles, may have fallen into AQIM hands in the Sahel.

In addition to feeding Arab Spring instability, AQIM is also exploiting the lingering 35-year old Western Sahara conflict, which creates an opening for AQIM's expansion and recruitment of Polisario members living in the Sahrawi refugee camps in Algeria. This complicates diplomatic resolution of the Western Sahara issue, a major obstacle to regional economic and security cooperation.

The African nations of the Maghreb and Sahel have long been at the crossroads of history. Today, they hold great potential as a bridge between the Islamic world and the West. The threat from al-Qa'ida undermines this potential and deserves serious attention and effective action from the US and the international community.

The ICTS report offers the following concrete recommendations:

- Strengthen US intelligence to provide more effective collection and data analysis on al-Qa'ida's activities. Provide equipment, training, and monitoring assistance to ensure information is used effectively by cooperating bodies in the region.

- Expand US counterterrorism technical assistance, particularly training for internal security bodies, police agencies, and the military, under the umbrella of multilateral working groups with adequate monitoring and transparency.
- Improve security coordination in the region so countries can more effectively share intelligence and interdict terrorist networks and supply lines.
- Encourage regional governments with a “carrot-and-stick” approach to accelerate economic and social reforms and cooperation to spur economic growth and reduce poverty as an underlying factor fueling social unrest and extremism.
- Shut down the refugee camps run by the Polisario near Tindouf, Algeria because they are a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises. The US and international community should prioritize permanent refugee resettlement in line with existing international protocols and agreements.
- Resolve the Western Sahara crisis, which is driving a wedge between two of the region’s most influential nations – Morocco and Algeria –inhibiting regional security and economic cooperation.
- Face the intellectual challenge of radical Islam with “home-grown” religious and intellectual leaders who can challenge the misuse of Islam and channel religious tendencies into more productive social development.
- Raise the diplomatic, economic, political, and military costs to Iran high enough to outweigh the benefits of exporting terrorism elsewhere.

Terrorism in the Maghreb — Algeria, Libya, Mauritania, Morocco, and Tunisia — and the adjacent Sahel — Chad, Mali, and Niger — has emerged as one of the most worrying strategic challenges to the international community. For decades these regions have mostly been overlooked by policy-makers in the West. It is now clear that this cannot continue. If we fail to address this threat, the US, the EU, and our friends in the region will remain hostages to and targets of ideological, theological, and political terrorists.

Yonah Alexander is Director of the International Center for Terrorism Studies at the Potomac Institute of Policy Studies

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, February 11, 2012 11:24 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE:

OK, next week when you are back. Thank you. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Saturday, February 11, 2012 11:16 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject:

Hi ed
We have to talk about this on the phone before any release.
Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, February 11, 2012 11:39 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE:

Yes, you are exactly right. I caught that after I sent them to you. Also from a legal point of view we actually should not have authored Yonah's piece. His piece will now be put in the form of bullet point ideas for him to consider writing his own oped. I will hold off on my piece until we talk. Very good points and thank you for your time. I really appreciate your counsel. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Saturday, February 11, 2012 11:28 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject:

Ed,
We have to avoid the same language in the two documents. They to much alike especially the first page
Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, February 11, 2012 1:10 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: sboutonnet@embassyofmorocco.us; Fatima Kurtz
Subject: invitation to AAI gala April 18, 2012

Dear Mr. Ambassador,

Each year the Arab American Institute, headed by Jim Zogby, has an annual gala dinner to celebrate the spirit of the Arab American community. I would like to invite you and Mrs. Bouhlal to be with us at this dinner and sit at our table. It promises to be another great year, with Ambassador Theodore H. Kattouf, President AMIDEAST receiving the Najeeb Halaby Award for Public Service, and the Arab Thought Foundation receiving an award for International Commitment. The location, time and date of the dinner is as follows:

Wednesday, April 18, 2012

Renaissance Washington, DC Hotel

999 Ninth Street, NW Washington, DC

5:30 Reception | 6:30 Gala

Black Tie

I hope you will be able to join us at this important event. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, February 12, 2012 8:17 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: Re: invitation to AAI gala April 18, 2012

Thank you.

Sent from my iPad

On Feb 11, 2012, at 20:15, "Rachad Bouhlal" <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com> wrote:

Ed,

Thank you for the invite. Mrs Bouhlal and myself would be happy to attend and sit at your table.

Thank you again and enjoy the rest of this beautiful sunny weekend.

Rachad

2012/2/11 Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>

Dear Mr. Ambassador,

Each year the Arab American Institute, headed by Jim Zogby, has an annual gala dinner to celebrate the spirit of the Arab American community. I would like to invite you and Mrs. Bouhlal to be with us at this dinner and sit at our table. It promises to be another great year, with Ambassador Theodore H. Kattouf, President AMIDEAST receiving the Najeeb Halaby Award for Public Service, and the Arab Thought Foundation receiving an award for International Commitment. The location, time and date of the dinner is as follows:

Wednesday, April 18, 2012

Renaissance Washington, DC Hotel

999 Ninth Street, NW Washington, DC

5:30 Reception | 6:30 Gala

Black Tie

I hope you will be able to join us at this important event. Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, February 13, 2012 2:11 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: catching up this week

Rachad, do you have time to meet this week? I need to close off on the strategic plan, the congressional plan, and opeds. If so, please have Sandrine get in touch so we can arrange a convenient time with your schedule. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, February 14, 2012 3:20 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Moroccan festival in Maryland

Rachad,

Another item to discuss tomorrow is the Moroccan festival scheduled for May on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. It is the big annual event there and this year's theme is Morocco. The head of the event wants to meet with you to officially inform you of the event, and invite you and Mrs. Bouhlal to be the Honored Guests of the festival. I will have her submit an email describing the festival and formally requesting an appointment. My wife Kathleen and I are serving as the Honorary Hosts for this year's event. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, February 14, 2012 4:41 PM
To: Bob Holley; cdark@moroccanamericancenter.com; cdearing@moroccanamericancenter.com; fatima.kurtz@thegabrielco.com; gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com; Jean Abinader; jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com; kkouttab@moroccanamericancenter.com; rose.pride@gmail.com
Cc: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Algerian border

FYI
A short news item from Algeria's official news agency, which we have translated:

Electronic surveillance for southwestern borders soon

Algérie Presse Service
February 10

Electronic surveillance for the southwestern frontier “will be put in place soon,” announced Col. Abdelmadjid Benbouzid, commander of the 3rd Gendarmerie Group in Béchar, speaking February 9.

The project is part of the Gendarmerie’s efforts to guard the country’s southwestern border, all 2,825 km of it, against smugglers of all kinds, said the colonel at the annual presentation of security forces activities for the past year. “Our border guard units are spread thin along the frontiers with Morocco, Mauritania, Sadr and Mali,” he added, “which makes electronic surveillance necessary”.

The Gendarmerie Group is gearing up for the establishment of two new border guard units and several forward positions in the desert border areas as part of the anti-smuggling protection plan, he concluded.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, February 15, 2012 8:23 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW:
Attachments: Gabriel.pdf

Rachad,

Is this the article as you rewrote and approved? Sorry for any confusion. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Saturday, February 11, 2012 11:16 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject:

Hi ed

We have to talk about this on the phone before any release.

Rachad

Op-ed for The Hill (726 words)

February 9, 2012

The ever-growing threat of terrorism in the Sahel region and its connection with the Polisario camps

By Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel

Why are US tax dollars being used to subsidize a recruiting ground in North Africa for al-Qaeda terrorists, drug traffickers, and mercenaries?

That's a question US and international policymakers should ask after reading a new study by the International Center for Terrorism Studies (ICTS), which warns that al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) is extending its reach across North Africa and the Sahel and actively recruiting from the Polisario-run refugee camps near Tindouf in Algeria.

The report says these camps—which are supported by millions of dollars in US and international relief aid—have become “a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises.” The study calls on the US and international community to “prioritize permanent refugee resettlement in line with existing international protocols and agreements.”

The ICTS study and news media report that increasing numbers of Polisario Front members have been arrested and accused of drug and arms smuggling, gun battles in Mali, kidnappings for AQIM in Mauritania and Algeria, and fighting as mercenaries for Qaddafi in Libya.

The AQIM-Polisario connection was most recently demonstrated two months ago when AQIM-linked assailants abducted three Western aid workers from a Polisario headquarters camp, reportedly helped by Polisario insiders who gave assailants arms and directions to the victims.

ICTS says that in the decade between 9/11 and the Arab Spring, terrorist kidnappings, bombings, and other attacks by AQIM and other militant groups in North Africa and the Sahel jumped more than 500 percent. It reports that AQIM is expanding its terrorist ties in an “arc of instability” across Africa, posing “one of the most worrying strategic challenges” for the international community in a region that has been “mostly overlooked by policy-makers.”

The study cites AQIM's links to other al-Qaeda affiliates and militants, including AQAP in Yemen, al-Shabaab in Somalia, and Boko Haram in Nigeria, and Polisario militants in Algeria, which it calls a “dangerous threat” to the region and beyond. The study notes evidence that AQIM may have obtained sophisticated Libyan arms, including surface-to-air missiles, and says intelligence reports confirm AQIM has also “opened links to Latin cartels for ‘drugs-for-arms’ smuggling to Europe through terrorist-trafficking networks in the Sahel that include Polisario members.”

Other experts concur on the seriousness of the threat. AFRICOM head US General Carter Ham recently called AQIM's growing links with other militants in the region “very, very dangerous” and a “threat to the US.” And UK Foreign Secretary William Hague has warned that expanding AQIM terror ties could have a “profoundly destabilizing effect on countries in North Africa and the Gulf” already shaken by the Arab Spring.

Ultimately, says the ICTS report, al-Qaeda and other militants in the region seek to exploit Arab Spring instability and expand their terrorist-trafficking network across Africa and into Europe and the Americas. The study finds they are also taking advantage of “the lingering 35-year-old Western Sahara conflict, which is creating an opening for AQIM's expansion and also recruitment of Polisario members among the Sahrawi refugee camps in Algeria.”

To address the growing risk of recruitment in the camps, ICTS recommends focusing US and international aid on voluntary return or resettling refugees.

For humanitarian as well as security reasons, this recommendation should receive very serious consideration from US and international policy makers, as long as it also takes into consideration of the humanitarian needs of the refugees. Multiple reports have documented abuse of the rights of the refugees, who are confined to the camps and denied freedom to leave. Thousands have been forced to make dangerous escapes across hostile terrain. Tragically, the refugees in the Tindouf camps are among the only refugees in the world who are welcome to resettle elsewhere, if the Polisario would only let them.

Since 1990 international agencies have spent in excess of $1 billion—more than $300 million from the US—effectively perpetuating the conditions in these camps. Much of the aid has reportedly been diverted to the black market for Polisario profit. AQIM and others are now exploiting the camps as a recruiting ground. Clearly this must stop. In order to prepare the ground for a durable solution to refugee plight, the Security council have been calling for UNHCR to undertake a census that would allow the international community to know the exact figures of the population of the Tindouf camps in order to speed up the international efforts aiming at achieving a political solution to this longstanding regional dispute.

The views expressed in this article are the personal views of Edward M. Gabriel, former US Ambassador to Morocco, 1997-2001.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, February 15, 2012 8:36 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: tonight's meeting was productive

Rachad,

I want to express my satisfaction with tonight's meeting. I thought it was productive and helpful. I know these first few months are normally challenging as you get situated in a new country, with new and "extended" staff, and as you begin to get your feet firmly planted on the ground here in the United States. I am at your service to help in any way to make your transition easier. Please know that you can count on me and my staff. I also want to assure you that I want to find the best way to work with you that solidifies our partnership, provides you the comfort level necessary to perform your work, and maximizes my ability to support the Embassy, His Majesty and Morocco. I pledge my support to you and this cause and know we can find a way forward together that allows this to happen efficiently and according to a process that meets your expectations. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, February 15, 2012 8:50 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: New York Times/IHT: "Moroccan Protests One Year On" and Reuters: "Is an Arab Spring in the air for Algeria?"
Attachments: NY Times- 'Moroccan Protests One Year On', Reuters- 'Arab Spring in the air for Algeria' 2-15-12.pdf

FYI, fairly important reading. Aida Alami article is the first one. Thanks Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

FYI – The New York Times posted this story online today, “Morocco Protests One Year On,” by reporter Aida Alami, which is scheduled to appear in tomorrow’s print edition of the International Herald Tribune. The article cites several experts, including Marina Ottaway, Carnegie Endowment, who says: “The king has taken an exceptional position in the sense he has decided to respond to unrest with reforms rather than repression, but he is no different from other Arab rulers in the sense that he is determined to keep his power intact. He is just going about it in a smarter way... With all the problems of the Arab world, Morocco does not seem to be a particularly worrisome place.”

Also below is a feature story on Reuters today, “Is an Arab Spring in the air for Algeria?,” by reporters Lamine Chikhi & Christian Lowe. They write: “Most independent observers predict that the ruling establishment will adapt to the new circumstances in the same way it has for decades when its hold on power has been challenged. Algeria will probably follow the model of neighbouring Morocco, the observers say. There, the ruling elite conceded to pressure by allowing a moderate Islamist opposition party to head a new government, but kept the levers of real power in its hands.”

Both stories included in the attached PDF.

Garth D. Neuffer

Director of Press | Moroccan American Center
 1220 L Street NW - Suite 411, Washington, DC 20005
 (o) 202-470-2055 (cell) 215-840-3692 (fax) 202-536-4210
gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com

Visit us at <http://www.MoroccoOnTheMove.com>
 Follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

http://www.nytimes.com/2012/02/16/world/africa/moroccan-protests-one-year-on.html?_r=1

The New York Times / International Herald Tribune

Wednesday, February 15, 2012 (NY Times - Online)

Thursday, February 16, 2012 (IHT - Print edition)

Moroccan Protests One Year On

By Aida Alami

CASABLANCA — Protesters are set to mark the first anniversary of Morocco's February 20 pro-democracy movement with demonstrations and strikes across the country starting Sunday. But activists say that, rather than a celebration, the protests will be a reminder to the regime that they will not give up before their calls for reform are answered.

“We are advocating for a democratic constitution that will give real power to a government that currently still doesn't have enough weight to respond to our demands,” said Youness Bensaid, 23, a Casablanca-based activist.

When the unrest that swept the Arab world after the fall of President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali of Tunisia on Jan. 14, 2011, reached Morocco, King Mohammed VI responded quickly, introducing a new constitution to grant greater freedoms with a limited redistribution of power. Protesters scoffed, calling the changes “cosmetic.”

A year later and with a new government in office, Morocco still faces huge economic and social challenges. There are frequent cases of self-immolation such as the one that set off the revolution in Tunisia. In the northeastern city of Taza, protesters demanding relief from soaring prices clashed with the authorities in recent days.

Nabila Mounib, secretary general of the Unified Socialist Party — which is not part of the new government after boycotting elections last year but which supports the protest movement — went to Taza to evaluate the situation after about 150 people, including police officers, were hurt. She said there was an urgent need for the government to improve the lives of ordinary citizens and to give the young hope for a better future.

“Morocco's stability is threatened,” Mrs. Mounib said. “It is absolutely necessary to take emergency measures at all levels. We need a real reform of all institutions. The country does not have any self-respecting economic policy and has a failing education system. The constitution needs to be reformed and meet international democratic standards.”

Analysts say the protest movement failed to galvanize large sectors of society because, after the initial euphoria inspired by the Tunisian revolution, people were deterred by the chaos in Libya, Syria, Yemen and Bahrain and by difficulties in Egypt. The Moroccans, they say, are anxious to preserve stability.

Still, while the uprising of Morocco's youth brought concessions that unions and human rights groups had failed to obtain in the previous decade, observers say that the real victory is a widespread awakening of political awareness.

“For the first time there is clearly a counterbalance to power — the people,” said Abdellah Tourabi, a researcher at the Paris Institute of Political Studies who specializes in Islamic movements in Morocco. “The ‘street’ has become a true political player.”

On Feb. 20, 2011, Mr. Bensaid, a finance student at the Hassan II University in Casablanca, joined the thousands who took to the streets to protest the same problems that cripple many Arab countries: social injustice, corruption and a lack of personal freedoms. A year later, he feels frustrated, he says. “The communication stunt was successful,” said Mr. Bensaid, referring to the new constitution. “Everything that followed was a farce. The king appointed an undemocratic commission, with members committed to the conservative nature of the absolute monarchy.”

Observers say that the key difference between Morocco's uprising and those in other Arab Spring countries is that the population, deeply attached to its 1,200-year-old tradition of monarchy, never called for regime change. Still, Sunday protests have become a weekly ritual. Except for the occasional police crackdown, most are peaceful, well organized and almost celebratory, with cheerful marchers waving placards and chanting the ills of their country.

Last July, a referendum on the new constitution won 98.5 percent of the vote. Elections followed on Nov. 25, allowing the moderate Islamists of the Justice and Development Party to form a new government under Prime Minister Abdellah Benkirane. “The government is taking the necessary measures to implement the new constitution and to consolidate the rule of law in our country,” government spokesman, Mustapha Khalfi, said recently, insisting that major economic reforms would be pushed through.

"The first question is whether there is going to be a shift in the balance of power between the king and political institutions," said Marina Ottaway, a senior associate at the Middle East Program of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington. "It is not clear to me yet how forceful the Benkirane government will be," she said. "The king has taken an exceptional position in the sense he has decided to respond to unrest with reforms rather than repression, but he is no different from other Arab rulers in the sense that he is determined to keep his power intact. He is just going about it in a smarter way."

Meanwhile, the new justice minister, Mustapha Ramid, has started cracking down on corruption. But protesters say this is not enough and fear that the government won't effect radical reforms. Ms. Ottaway said: "With all the problems of the Arab world, Morocco does not seem to be a particularly worrisome place. I do not expect an upheaval now. The question is whether there will be sufficient gradual reform to prevent an upheaval later on. It depends on the king, but also on the new government."

<http://www.reuters.com/article/2012/02/15/algeria-vote-idUSL5E8DC3UT20120215>

Wednesday, February 15, 2012

FEATURE—Is an Arab Spring in the air for Algeria?

- * Middle East upheavals putting pressure on Algeria to change
- * Islamists challenging for seats in watershed election in May
- * Authorities hesitating between more democracy and crackdown
- * Violent history casts a shadow over push for reform

By Lamine Chikhi and Christian Lowe

ALGIERS, Feb 15 (Reuters) - When Moncef Marzouki, a former dissident transformed by the "Arab Spring" into Tunisia's president, paid an official visit to Algeria on Sunday, red and white Tunisian flags flew from lamp-posts in his honour. Just two days earlier, another former dissident and leading figure of Tunisia's revolution had been barred from entering. Sihem Bensedrine was allowed into the country after a seven-hour wait only after protests from fellow human rights activists.

The "Arab Spring" is knocking on Algeria's door, but the authorities cannot decide whether to let it in or shut it out. Bensedrine, for one, believes the choice has been made. "I think the Tunisian revolution is not particularly welcome," Bensedrine told Reuters in the capital, Algiers.

Alone among its neighbours in North Africa, Algeria has been largely untouched by the uprisings which last year ousted leaders in Tunisia, Egypt, Libya and Yemen and touched off the revolt still raging in Syria. Helped by revenues from energy exports that have bequeathed it the world's 14th biggest foreign exchange reserves, the Algerian authorities handed out pay rises, grants and subsidies that blunted a brief flare-up of protests demanding reform.

The country's rulers continue to run the country much as they have since independence from France 50 years ago: with a huge state apparatus backed by the powerful security forces and elections dominated by the ruling FLN party and its allies. That is looking more and more out of step with the mood of the times, however, and a parliamentary election set for May 10 could be a watershed.

Pressure is building inside Algeria and abroad to ensure a fair election. As elsewhere in the Middle East, it is likely to give greater power to Islamists who for years have been pushed to the fringes by the strongly secularist state. "People expect Algeria to come into line with the region," said a diplomat based in Algiers. "There's an expectation that Islamists will have greater influence."

MANAGED TRANSITION

Most independent observers predict that the ruling establishment will adapt to the new circumstances in the same way it has for decades when its hold on power has been challenged. Algeria will probably follow the model of neighbouring Morocco, the observers say. There, the ruling elite conceded to pressure by allowing a moderate Islamist opposition party to head a new government, but kept the levers of real power in its hands.

Western powers favour this scenario. They depend on the help of Algeria, the biggest military power in the region, to contain the spreading threat from al Qaeda's north African wing around the southern edge of the Saharan desert. They also fear that any turmoil could disrupt the flow of natural gas through pipelines under the Mediterranean Sea. Algeria supplies about one fifth of Europe's gas imports.

One factor that could derail this managed transition to limited democracy is Algeria's bloody history: after the military-backed government annulled a democratic election in 1992 fearing an Islamist takeover, security forces and Islamists fought a war that killed an estimated 200,000 people.

The shadow of the conflict still hangs over the country. In the Chifa mountain gorge, once a favourite picnic spot an hour's drive south of Algiers, security forces have posts on top of almost every ridge, where they hunker down behind concrete, sandbags and razor wire. The insurgency, now affiliated to al Qaeda, has lost momentum but still carries out sporadic kidnappings, ambushes and suicide bombings - a young soldier died this month after stepping on an improvised explosive device.

Few expect a return to the "black years" as they are known in Algeria; the Islamists are much weaker now while the state is richer and stronger. But it is unclear how security forces will react if Islamists muster huge support in the election and demand a share of real power. "An Islamist majority in parliament ... would probably trigger a reaction from the military elite," said Riccardo Fabiani, North Africa analyst with Eurasia Group. "The strongly secular security forces are ready to intervene to guarantee their vested interests."

Commentators say there are divisions inside the ruling elite. One camp believes the pragmatic thing to do is to allow more democracy. President Abdelaziz Bouteflika has said the authorities should not manipulate the upcoming election as they have done in the past. Nearly 20 new parties have been given the green light to compete, including at least one which represents a serious challenge to the establishment.

A commission of judges will oversee the vote count, replacing the interior ministry officials who usually do the job. The European Union has been invited to send observers for the first time. There are subtle signs that a nervous security apparatus is tightening control over dissent, however.

Mourad Dhina, an Algerian scientist who used to work at the CERN physics research institute in his adopted home of Switzerland, was arrested last month in Paris after attending a meeting of Rachad, an Algerian Islamist opposition movement whose leaders are based mostly in Europe. He is now in La Sante prison awaiting a hearing to decide if he will be extradited to Algeria, where a court in 2003 found him guilty of having links to armed Islamist groups.

Michael Romig, a spokesman for the Al Karama human rights organisation which Dhina headed up, said it was odd that he had been arrested now. Dhina had lived openly in Switzerland for years and travelled often to France. "We are as confused as everyone," Romig said.

However, Rachad, of which Dhina is a founder, had in the past few months launched a London-based satellite television station broadcasting into Algerian homes, and placed links on one of its Internet sites on "how to free your country" and "organise and participate in unrest."

SOCIAL PEACE

Many Algerians do not think the parliamentary election in May will provide the spark that sets off an upheaval. Parliament has limited powers under the constitution, they say, and anyway, most people are apathetic about a political system that they do not feel has any relevance to their lives.

Much of the discontent has been contained by the authorities' spending spree. In one example, thousands of young unemployed people have been taken on the payroll at state-owned firms, even when there is no work for them to do. "I get 15,000 dinars ($200) to do nothing," said Ahmed Selmi, 27, from Haizar, a village about 150 km (95 miles) southeast of the capital, who is employed at a state company but was out drinking coffee with friends at 11 a.m. "I have no task to do there," he said.

Ahmed Benbitour, prime minister of Algeria at the end of the 1990s, said all the state had done with its largesse was to buy itself a temporary reprieve. "We're a long way from having bought social peace," he told Reuters. "All we are doing is putting out fires. The conditions which prevailed for the Arab Spring are present in all Arab countries. There are no theoretical reasons why one country should be able to escape this movement."

The strongest evidence for this argument is in the almost daily protests, strikes and riots that show no sign of abating. A week-long period provides a snapshot.

On Jan. 31, riot police in a suburb of Algiers battled petrol-bomb-throwing residents who accused the authorities of failing to investigate the murder of a young man. A day later, in Tiaret, 250 km west of Algiers, 30 people were injured and buildings ransacked after a local man set himself on fire.

On Feb. 5, residents burned down the local government headquarters in a village near Boumerdes, east of the capital, because heavy snow left them with no electricity. The protests have not come together into any kind of national movement, and the protesters do not appear to have a political agenda beyond railing against local bureaucrats.

But Abdou Bendjoudi, a 27-year-old opposition activist in the capital, thinks it is just a matter of time before that changes and Algeria stages its own "Arab Spring". He says people have lost faith in a government that has failed to provide real jobs and opportunities for young people or to deliver decent public services.

"There is not a single province where there are not daily protests," Bendjoudi, one of the leaders of a group called the Movement of Independent Youth for Change, said in a cafe. "It is a political message. People are saying they have had enough of the catastrophic management of the country.

"If the authorities do not move now towards democracy, it will be too late."

(Editing by Sonya Hepinstall)

The New York Times International Herald Tribune

Wednesday, February 15, 2012 (NY TIMES - Online)

Thursday, February 16, 2012 (IHT - Print edition)

Moroccan Protests One Year On

By Aida Alami

CASABLANCA — Protesters are set to mark the first anniversary of Morocco's February 20 pro-democracy movement with demonstrations and strikes across the country starting Sunday. But activists say that, rather than a celebration, the protests will be a reminder to the regime that they will not give up before their calls for reform are answered.

"We are advocating for a democratic constitution that will give real power to a government that currently still doesn't have enough weight to respond to our demands," said Youness Bensaid, 23, a Casablanca-based activist.

When the unrest that swept the Arab world after the fall of President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali of Tunisia on Jan. 14, 2011, reached Morocco, King Mohammed VI responded quickly, introducing a new constitution to grant greater freedoms with a limited redistribution of power. Protesters scoffed, calling the changes "cosmetic."

A year later and with a new government in office, Morocco still faces huge economic and social challenges. There are frequent cases of self-immolation such as the one that set off the revolution in Tunisia. In the northeastern city of Taza, protesters demanding relief from soaring prices clashed with the authorities in recent days.

Nabila Mounib, secretary general of the Unified Socialist Party — which is not part of the new government after boycotting elections last year but which supports the protest movement — went to Taza to evaluate the situation after about 150 people, including police officers, were hurt. She said there was an urgent need for the government to improve the lives of ordinary citizens and to give the young hope for a better future.

"Morocco's stability is threatened," Mrs. Mounib said. "It is absolutely necessary to take emergency measures at all levels. We need a real reform of all institutions. The country does not have any self-respecting economic policy and has a failing education system. The constitution needs to be reformed and meet international democratic standards."

Analysts say the protest movement failed to galvanize large sectors of society because, after the initial euphoria inspired by the Tunisian revolution, people were deterred by the chaos in Libya, Syria, Yemen and Bahrain and by difficulties in Egypt. The Moroccans, they say, are anxious to preserve stability.

Still, while the uprising of Morocco's youth brought concessions that unions and human rights groups had failed to obtain in the previous decade, observers say that the real victory is a widespread awakening of political awareness.

"For the first time there is clearly a counterbalance to power — the people," said Abdellah Tourabi, a researcher at the Paris Institute of Political Studies who specializes in Islamic movements in Morocco. "The 'street' has become a true political player."

On Feb. 20, 2011, Mr. Bensaid, a finance student at the Hassan II University in Casablanca, joined the thousands who took to the streets to protest the same problems that cripple many Arab countries: social injustice, corruption and a lack of personal freedoms. A year later, he feels frustrated, he says. "The communication stunt was successful," said Mr. Bensaid, referring to the new constitution. "Everything that followed was a farce. The king appointed an undemocratic commission, with members committed to the conservative nature of the absolute monarchy."

Observers say that the key difference between Morocco's uprising and those in other Arab Spring countries is that the population, deeply attached to its 1,200-year-old tradition of monarchy, never called for regime change. Still, Sunday protests have become a weekly ritual. Except for the occasional police crackdown, most are peaceful, well organized and almost celebratory, with cheerful marchers waving placards and chanting the ills of their country.

Last July, a referendum on the new constitution won 98.5 percent of the vote. Elections followed on Nov. 25, allowing the moderate Islamists of the Justice and Development Party to form a new government under Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane. "The government is taking the necessary measures to implement the new constitution and to consolidate the rule of law in our country," government spokesman, Mustapha Khalfi, said recently, insisting that major economic reforms would be pushed through.

"The first question is whether there is going to be a shift in the balance of power between the king and political institutions," said Marina Ottaway, a senior associate at the Middle East Program of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington. "It is not clear to me yet how forceful the Benkirane government will be," she said. "The king has taken an exceptional position in the sense he has decided to respond to unrest with reforms rather than repression, but he is no different from other Arab rulers in the sense that he is determined to keep his power intact. He is just going about it in a smarter way."

Meanwhile, the new justice minister, Mustapha Ramid, has started cracking down on corruption. But protesters say this is not enough and fear that the government won't effect radical reforms. Ms. Ottaway said: "With all the problems of the Arab world, Morocco does not seem to be a particularly worrisome place. I do not expect an upheaval now. The question is whether there will be sufficient gradual reform to prevent an upheaval later on. It depends on the king, but also on the new government."

Wednesday, February 15, 2012

FEATURE—Is an Arab Spring in the air for Algeria?

- * Middle East upheavals putting pressure on Algeria to change
- * Islamists challenging for seats in watershed election in May
- * Authorities hesitating between more democracy and crackdown
- * Violent history casts a shadow over push for reform

By Lamine Chikhi and Christian Lowe

ALGIERS, Feb 15 (Reuters) - When Moncef Marzouki, a former dissident transformed by the "Arab Spring" into Tunisia's president, paid an official visit to Algeria on Sunday, red and white Tunisian flags flew from lamp-posts in his honour. Just two days earlier, another former dissident and leading figure of Tunisia's revolution had been barred from entering. Sihem Bensedrine was allowed into the country after a seven-hour wait only after protests from fellow human rights activists.

The "Arab Spring" is knocking on Algeria's door, but the authorities cannot decide whether to let it in or shut it out. Bensedrine, for one, believes the choice has been made. "I think the Tunisian revolution is not particularly welcome," Bensedrine told Reuters in the capital, Algiers.

Alone among its neighbours in North Africa, Algeria has been largely untouched by the uprisings which last year ousted leaders in Tunisia, Egypt, Libya and Yemen and touched off the revolt still raging in Syria. Helped by revenues from energy exports that have bequeathed it the world's 14th biggest foreign exchange reserves, the Algerian authorities handed out pay rises, grants and subsidies that blunted a brief flare-up of protests demanding reform.

The country's rulers continue to run the country much as they have since independence from France 50 years ago: with a huge state apparatus backed by the powerful security forces and elections dominated by the ruling FLN party and its allies. That is looking more and more out of step with the mood of the times, however, and a parliamentary election set for May 10 could be a watershed.

Pressure is building inside Algeria and abroad to ensure a fair election. As elsewhere in the Middle East, it is likely to give greater power to Islamists who for years have been pushed to the fringes by the strongly secularist state. "People expect Algeria to come into line with the region," said a diplomat based in Algiers. "There's an expectation that Islamists will have greater influence."

MANAGED TRANSITION

Most independent observers predict that the ruling establishment will adapt to the new circumstances in the same way it has for decades when its hold on power has been challenged. Algeria will probably follow the model of neighbouring Morocco, the observers say. There, the ruling elite conceded to pressure by allowing a moderate Islamist opposition party to head a new government, but kept the levers of real power in its hands.

Western powers favour this scenario. They depend on the help of Algeria, the biggest military power in the region, to contain the spreading threat from al Qaeda's north African wing around the southern edge of the Saharan desert. They also fear that any turmoil could disrupt the flow of natural gas through pipelines under the Mediterranean Sea. Algeria supplies about one fifth of Europe's gas imports.

One factor that could derail this managed transition to limited democracy is Algeria's bloody history: after the military-backed government annulled a democratic election in 1992 fearing an Islamist takeover, security forces and Islamists fought a war that killed an estimated 200,000 people.

The shadow of the conflict still hangs over the country. In the Chifa mountain gorge, once a favourite picnic spot an hour's drive south of Algiers, security forces have posts on top of almost every ridge, where they hunker down behind concrete, sandbags and razor wire. The insurgency, now affiliated to al Qaeda, has lost momentum but still carries out sporadic kidnappings, ambushes and suicide bombings - a young soldier died this month after stepping on an improvised explosive device.

Few expect a return to the "black years" as they are known in Algeria; the Islamists are much weaker now while the state is richer and stronger. But it is unclear how security forces will react if Islamists muster huge support in the election and demand a share ... would probably trigger a reaction from the military elite," said Riccardo Fabiani, North Africa analyst with Eurasia Group. "The strongly secular security forces are ready to intervene to guarantee their vested interests."

Commentators say there are divisions inside the ruling elite. One camp believes the pragmatic thing to do is to allow more democracy. President Abdelaziz Bouteflika has said the authorities should not manipulate the upcoming election as they have done in the past. Nearly 20 new parties have been given the green light to compete, including at least one which represents a serious challenge to the establishment.

A commission of judges will oversee the vote count, replacing the interior ministry officials who usually do the job. The European Union has been invited to send observers for the first time. There are subtle signs that a nervous security apparatus is tightening control over dissent, however.

Mourad Dhina, an Algerian scientist who used to work at the CERN physics research institute in his adopted home of Switzerland, was arrested last month in Paris after attending a meeting of Rachad, an Algerian Islamist opposition movement whose leaders are based mostly in Europe. He is now in La Sante prison awaiting a hearing to decide if he will be extradited to Algeria, where a court in 2003 found him guilty of having links to armed Islamist groups.

Michael Romig, a spokesman for the Al Karama human rights organisation which Dhina headed up, said it was odd that he had been arrested now. Dhina had lived openly in Switzerland for years and travelled often to France. "We are as confused as everyone," Romig said.

However, Rachad, of which Dhina is a founder, had in the past few months launched a London-based satellite television station broadcasting into Algerian homes, and placed links on one of its Internet sites on "how to free your country" and "organise and participate in unrest."

SOCIAL PEACE

Many Algerians do not think the parliamentary election in May will provide the spark that sets off an upheaval. Parliament has limited powers under the constitution, they say, and anyway, most people are apathetic about a political system that they do not feel has any relevance to their lives.

Much of the discontent has been contained by the authorities' spending spree. In one example, thousands of young unemployed people have been taken on the payroll at state-owned firms, even when there is no work for them to do. "I get 15,000 dinars ($200) to do nothing," said Ahmed Selmi, 27, from Haizar, a village about 150 km (95 miles) southeast of the capital, who is employed at a state company but was out drinking coffee with friends at 11 a.m. "I have no task to do there," he said.

Ahmed Benbitour, prime minister of Algeria at the end of the 1990s, said all the state had done with its largesse was to buy itself a temporary reprieve. "We're a long way from having bought social peace," he told Reuters. "All we are doing is putting out fires. The conditions which prevailed for the Arab Spring are present in all Arab countries. There are no theoretical reasons why one country should be able to escape this movement."

The strongest evidence for this argument is in the almost daily protests, strikes and riots that show no sign of abating. A week-long period provides a snapshot.

On Jan. 31, riot police in a suburb of Algiers battled petrol-bomb-throwing residents who accused the authorities of failing to investigate the murder of a young man. A day later, in Tiaret, 250 km west of Algiers, 30 people were injured and buildings ransacked after a local man set himself on fire.

On Feb. 5, residents burned down the local government headquarters in a village near Boumerdes, east of the capital, because heavy snow left them with no electricity. The protests have not come together into any kind of national movement, and the protesters do not appear to have a political agenda beyond railing against local bureaucrats.

But Abdou Bendjoudi, a 27-year-old opposition activist in the capital, thinks it is just a matter of time before that changes and Algeria stages its own "Arab Spring". He says people have lost faith in a government that has failed to provide real jobs and opportunities for young people or to deliver decent public services.

"There is not a single province where there are not daily protests," Bendjoudi, one of the leaders of a group called the Movement of Independent Youth for Change, said in a cafe. "It is a political message. People are saying they have had enough of the catastrophic management of the country.

"If the authorities do not move now towards democracy, it will be too late."

(Editing by Sonya Hepinstall)

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, February 15, 2012 9:11 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: Robert M. Holley; Jordan Paul
Subject: Document from Bob on "the Year Ahead"
Attachments: Year Ahead Doc.doc

Mr. Ambassador,

Attached is a summary document from Bob and I, on how we see the year ahead, as we discussed last week. Please let us know if you need anything further. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

2012 – Challenges and Opportunities Ahead

Background

Over the course of the last year, the Washington Team achieved several significant objectives that have provided new and important opportunities for the year ahead. In March of last year, Foreign Minister Fassi Fehri had a very successful meeting in Washington with Secretary Clinton which resulted in the Secretary's reiterating in a public statement the US Government's support for the Moroccan autonomy initiative as a means of resolving the on-going conflict in the Western Sahara. Secretary Clinton referred to that initiative in a public press conference following the meeting as "serious, credible and realistic." The Secretary also made clear that the US considers Morocco an important strategic partner in the Middle East and North Africa and gave her approval to a new "strategic dialogue" that could potentially establish a roadmap of common goals and agendas between Morocco and the United States. At year's end, the Washington Team also achieved a major multi-year goal of securing Congressional language in the Omnibus Appropriations Bill that authorizes the US to fund development projects in the Southern Provinces. This was a major breakthrough and, if implemented, would send a strong signal of a US commitment to the kind of political settlement in the Sahara that would advance and help protect Morocco's fundamental interests in the region.

Goals

The 2012 Strategic Plan provides a more thorough roadmap for the various goals we hope to achieve in the year ahead, as well as some of the specific activities, events and messages we believe will help achieve those objectives with our various targeted audiences. However several goals deserve special mention as priority objectives this year.

- Generating a sense of "urgency" among US foreign policy decision-makers and opinion-leaders about the need to resolve the Western Sahara issue now, rather than later.
- Implementation of the Appropriations Committee language authorizing the US to spend development funds in the Sahara. This could also require still further new language in the next appropriations bill from Congress.
- Ensuring that the response to Senator Leahy's language in the Omnibus Appropriations bill is dealt with to Morocco's satisfaction.
- New Congressional language that would "condition" US funding for the refugee camps in Algeria on UNHCR's implementation of a developmental approach to refugee assistance that both protects and advances refugee rights and also advances "durable solutions" for those in the camps.
- Establishment of a working strategic dialogue between Morocco and the United States that would define a common work agenda and establish shared goals, complete with mutual commitments for action.

- An accelerated, high visibility campaign to further diminish the credibility of the Polisario.

Impediments

Our ambitions for the coming year are large, and we believe they can be achieved. However, to reach our objectives we need to be mindful of a number of structural and systemic impediments that will need to be overcome.

- This is an election year in the United States and senior political figures in Congress will be intensely focused on the political campaign for the Presidency and the Congress.
- There is a general weariness among much of the American population with conflict in the Middle East and North Africa and a corresponding reluctance to undertake new and important foreign policy commitments in the region. Domestic political, social and economic issues will likely dominate the public agenda in the (election) year ahead for most of the US political leadership.
- The foreign policy bureaucracy is preoccupied with disentangling the United States from conflicts in the region and reluctant to undertake new initiatives.
- This will be Secretary Clinton's last year as Secretary of State. Getting her attention on our most important issues will be a challenge and likely require very senior level and sustained efforts from Morocco if we are to win her active support for our agendas.
- At the State Department, there is no sense of "urgency" about the need to resolve the problem in Western Sahara and a general belief that the status quo, while not necessarily preferable, is nevertheless both "manageable" and the path of least resistance for the immediate future.
- Passing a budget in a Congress as deeply divided as this one has become is never an easy task, but this year's budget battle in Congress is likely to be a front line battleground for the election campaign of both parties. This could have serious consequences for our efforts to use the legislative process to achieve the goals we have set for ourselves this year.
- The Polisario is clearly aware that they are losing ground in the United States at an alarming rate and we should expect that they will seek new and dramatic ways to advance their cause with American political leaders. Human rights issues have been their workhorse tool for the last two years and we should expect that they will again seek dramatic and public ways to turn this issue to their advantage.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, February 16, 2012 7:48 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: my article

FYI. And thanks. Attachment was sent as edited by you.

From: Edward Gabriel
Sent: Thursday, February 16, 2012 7:46 AM
To: Jordan Paul; 'Garth Neuffer'; Calvin Dark
Cc: Fatima Kurtz; Robert M. Holley
Subject: FW:

Attached is my Hill oped as edited by the Amb. He made some very thoughtful comments. As you can see the idea of “closing the camps” has to be taken out. There is a concern that no matter how we caveat it, our words will be twisted. This is the exact kind of review I appreciate as it gives us the Moroccan government perspective with a positive alternative and avoids us from making potentially terrible mistakes. Let me know if you have any changes, and remember although this represents my personal view, we still have to put a Fara descriptor on it. Thanks

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel
Sent: Wednesday, February 15, 2012 8:23 PM
To: 'Ed Gabriel (ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com)'
Subject: FW:

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Saturday, February 11, 2012 11:16 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject:

Hi ed
We have to talk about this on the phone before any release.
Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, February 16, 2012 7:58 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: EU action on Fisheries/Agriculture

This is a report we picked up from our contacts in Europe, FYI. Ed

Begin text:

Today, the European Parliament (EP) has given its consent to the EU-Morocco Agreement on reciprocal liberalisation measures on agricultural products and fishery products (369 MEPs in favor, 225 against, 31 abstentions), going against José Bové's (rapporteur) position. This Agreement is based on the Association Agreement in force since 2000, which provided for the gradual implementation of greater liberalisation of reciprocal trade for these products. It does not make a reference to Western Sahara.

In addition, the EP also adopted a resolution on this Agreement, calling "on the Commission to ensure that the agreement is fully consistent with international law and benefits all the local population groups affected". Western Sahara is not mentioned as such. This resolution was supported by the main political groups of the EP (including the centre-right EPP, the Socialists, and the Liberals) and was adopted by a significant majority of MEPs (398 in favor, 175 against, and 50 abstentions). Two amendments proposed by the Greens and the extreme left, indicating that "Western Sahara is not part of Morocco and should not be included either explicitly or implicitly within the scope of any agreement the EU signs with the Kingdom of Morocco" were massively rejected.

The EP's political environment for the debate on the future Fisheries Agreement has slightly improved. However, MEPs will still pay a careful attention to the substance of the upcoming Agreement; and they will unlikely support an Agreement that will not include the position they expressed in December 2011.

END

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, February 16, 2012 9:00 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: meeting with Amb. Bouhlal

Rachad,
FYI

From: Edward Gabriel
Sent: Thursday, February 16, 2012 8:36 AM
To: Jean AbiNader
Cc: Jordan Paul; Fatima Kurtz
Subject: meeting with Amb. Bouhlal

Jean,

I want to make you aware of one issue I discussed with the Ambassador that affects your work. He specifically wanted to review the process for business matters separately from the rest of the organization, although he suggested prescriptions for the other parts of MAC as well.

He wants to be the first to know when something is coming down on the business side. He wants and needs our help on business related matters, but would appreciate a more precise procedure. In this regard, when you are approached on a trade mission or visit by Moroccan agencies or similar requests (separate from a distinct process to inform him on specific business transactions), we decided the best approach is to respond positively to the requester and let them know that you will get back to them after you communicate with the Ambassador. A short email/memo should then be drafted to me for the Ambassador explaining the purpose, defining the request and outlining your thinking on the event and how to move forward. The Ambassador will work with us to then divide the work between us. Also, he will, from time to time, ask us for our help on projects when they come through him. In all cases he will keep us informed so we both know what each other is doing in this regard. As a general rule, remember that he is best placed to interact with Moroccan agencies and sees us helping on the US side. There are nuances to each circumstance which we can discuss.

Fatima and Jean, the Ambassador also discussed the cultural side, and would like to institute the same procedure. There are exceptions here, such as when we are asked in our professional capacity to support a specific cause, or lend our name to a charity; the regular kinds of things we do regardless of our work affiliation. Otherwise, as big cultural requests come in, such as the Africa photography exhibit or the "paint the town Moroccan week", he would like the same procedure so he is the first to know, and will then work with us on what he can do, as well as understanding what we can do, and ideas on how to proceed.

The Ambassador is appreciative and positive in this regard, but wants some formality to how we operate on these subjects, so that he hears about things first from us, rather than other people. We can talk further on this later today. Thanks Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, February 16, 2012 1:52 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: the monthly report to Rabat

Rachad,

Fatima and I went over the monthly Rabat report this morning and agree with you that we have a problem. In our attempt to be inclusive of the entire team, we are accidentally conveying an impression that you are in agreement with everything we are reporting. While that may be the case in the future, it certainly is not the case today. I understand your concern and want to make sure that the next report correctly reflects the team spirit of our group, as well as accurately depicting the position of the Embassy. I am sorry that this document created such discord and assure you this will not happen in the future. We will not send next month's report without your concurrence. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, February 16, 2012 5:54 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Final Op-ed by Amb Ed Gabriel to The Hill
Attachments: PR_Op-ed for The Hill_ Amb Ed Gabriel 16Feb2012 FINAL.pdf; PR_Op-ed for The Hill_ Amb Ed Gabriel 16Feb2012 FINAL.doc

Attached is the oped as sent to the Hill. Please note that the descriptor at the bottom requires a legal statement that must be used at all times that I advise Morocco. The Hill may choose not to use it, but that will be up to them to decide. We have no choice under penalty of law. Thanks Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Garth Neuffer [<mailto:gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com>]
Sent: Thursday, February 16, 2012 5:51 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Cc: Garth Neuffer
Subject: Final Op-ed by Amb Ed Gabriel to The Hill

Ed – Here you go, in Word and PDF file formats.

Garth D. Neuffer

Director of Communications | Moroccan American Center
1220 L Street NW - Suite 411, Washington, DC 20005
(o) 202-470-2055 (cell) 215-840-3692 (fax) 202-536-4210
gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com

Visit us at <http://www.MoroccoOnTheMove.com>
Follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Op-ed for The Hill
February 16, 2012

Rising threat of terrorism in the Sahel and its connection with the Polisario camps

By Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel

Why are US tax dollars being used to subsidize a recruiting ground in North Africa for al-Qaeda terrorists, drug traffickers, and mercenaries?

That's a question US and international policymakers should ask after reading a new study by the International Center for Terrorism Studies (ICTS), which warns that al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) is extending its reach across North Africa and the Sahel and actively recruiting from the Polisario-run refugee camps near Tindouf in Algeria.

The report says these camps—which are supported by millions of dollars in US and international relief aid—have become “a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises.” The study calls on the US and international community to “prioritize permanent refugee resettlement in line with existing international protocols and agreements.”

The ICTS study and news media report that increasing numbers of Polisario Front members have been arrested and accused of drug and arms smuggling, gun battles in Mali, kidnappings for AQIM in Mauritania and Algeria, and fighting as mercenaries for Qaddafi in Libya.

The AQIM-Polisario connection was most recently demonstrated this past October when AQIM-linked assailants abducted three Western aid workers from a Polisario headquarters camp, reportedly helped by Polisario insiders who gave assailants arms and directions to the victims.

ICTS says that in the decade between 9/11 and the Arab Spring, terrorist kidnappings, bombings, and other attacks by AQIM and other militant groups in North Africa and the Sahel jumped more than 500 percent. It reports that AQIM is expanding its terrorist ties in an “arc of instability” across Africa, posing “one of the most worrying strategic challenges” for the international community in a region that has been “mostly overlooked by policymakers.”

The study cites AQIM's links to other al-Qaeda affiliates and militants, including AQAP in Yemen, al-Shabaab in Somalia, Boko Haram in Nigeria, and Polisario militants in Algeria, which it calls a “dangerous threat” to the region and beyond. The study notes evidence that AQIM may have obtained sophisticated Libyan arms, including surface-to-air missiles, and says intelligence reports confirm AQIM has also “opened links to Latin cartels for ‘drugs-for-arms’ smuggling to Europe through terrorist-trafficking networks in the Sahel that include Polisario members.”

Other experts concur on the seriousness of the threat. AFRICOM head US General Carter Ham recently called AQIM's growing links with other militants in the region “very, very dangerous” and a threat to the US. And UK Foreign Secretary William Hague has warned that expanding AQIM terror ties could have a “profoundly destabilizing effect on countries in North Africa and the Gulf” already shaken by the Arab Spring.

Ultimately, says the ICTS report, al-Qaeda and other militants in the region seek to exploit Arab Spring instability and expand their terrorist-trafficking network across Africa and into Europe and the Americas. The study finds they are also taking advantage of “the lingering 35-year-old Western Sahara conflict, which is creating an opening for AQIM's expansion and also recruitment of Polisario members among the Sahrawi refugee camps in Algeria.”

To address the growing risk of recruitment in the camps, ICTS recommends focusing US and international aid on voluntary return or resettling refugees.

This recommendation should receive very serious consideration from US and international policy makers, for humanitarian as well as security reasons, taking into account the urgent humanitarian needs of refugees. Multiple reports have documented abuse of the rights of the refugees, who are confined to the camps and denied freedom to leave. Thousands have been forced to make dangerous escapes across hostile terrain. Tragically, the refugees in the Tindouf camps are among the only refugees in the world who are welcome to resettle elsewhere, if the Polisario would only let them.

Since 1990, international agencies have spent in excess of $1 billion—more than $300 million from the US—effectively perpetuating the conditions in these camps. Much of the aid has reportedly been diverted to the black market for Polisario profit. AQIM and others are now exploiting the camps as a recruiting ground. Clearly this must stop. US and international aid should be used for durable solutions that support refugee rights and resettlement, not subsidize conditions that create a recruiting ground for terrorists and traffickers.

To prepare the ground for durable solutions to the refugees' plight, the UN Security Council has called for UNHCR to undertake a census to let the international community know the exact figures of the Tindouf camps population, to help speed up international efforts aimed at achieving a political solution to this longstanding regional dispute.

Edward M. Gabriel, former US Ambassador to Morocco, advises the Kingdom of Morocco. For more information, please visit the Department of Justice in Washington, DC.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, February 16, 2012 6:26 PM
To: Bob Holley; cdark@moroccanamericancenter.com; cdearing@moroccanamericancenter.com; fatima.kurtz@thegabrielco.com; gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com; Jean Abinader; jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com; kkouttab@moroccanamericancenter.com
Subject: I picked this up from a source/what do you all think?

Given the interest in Javier Bardem's new documentary, we wanted to provide a summary on the film's topic, coverage and overall sentiment.

The film is premiering today, February 16th, at the Berlin Film Festival. As this is the first of the major film festivals this year, we should look out for it being shown at the other prominent festivals this year, including:

- Sundance (January) - The film was not showcased
- Tribeca (April) - Film line up not yet announced
- Cannes (May) - Film line up not yet announced
- Venice (August/September) - Film line up to be announced in July
- San Sebastian (September) - Film line up not yet announced
- Toronto (September) - Film line up not yet announced

Currently, there has been coverage on the film in the following websites.

- Hollywood Reporter (February 15): Interview with Bardem on the film and its aim to raise awareness on the conflict in Western Sahara. Bardem points out how "the Sarhawis [...] have been trying peacefully to demand legal rights, common sense rights, with the knowledge and consensus of the United Nations and yet they still feel they don't have a right."
- Variety (February 9): The article highlights how the film "through interviews, Bardem's voiceover, action sequences and even animation, the Alvaro Longoria-helmed "Sons" shows how and why the Western Sahara, abandoned by Spain and annexed by Morocco in its 1975 Green March, became, according to a U.N. statement, a colony -- the last in Africa, noted Bardem -- leaving 200,000 Saharawis living in desert refugee camps, mostly in South-West Algeria."
- The Guardian (February 8): An article focused on the Berlin Film Festival mentioning that "Javier Bardem will show the documentary he produced, Sons of the Clouds: the Last Colony, about a forgotten colonial war in the western Sahara."
- LA Times Blog (February 8): An article focused on the Berlin Film Festival mentioning the film being showcased.
- Reuters (February 6): Divides the Berlin Film Festival on three key themes: Chinese Epic, Vampire Star and Egyptian Protests.
- El Pais (February 3): The articles highlights how the film that took 3 years to complete and spanned 6 countries details the multiple political, economic and strategic interests of the countries involved that have prevented a resolution to this conflict that has been in a 'cold war' for more than 35 years.
 - Plataforma Sahara (similar article to the one above)
 - Dajla (similar article to the one above)
 - SOGAPS (similar article to the one above)
 - Resistencias Saharai (similar article to the one above)

Most articles focus on the film itself without discussing the greater implications or taking a specific viewpoint on the issue. In the Reuters piece, it is highlighted that Bardem will speak post-screening in a Q&A session. We should monitor in case anything particularly alarming surfaces.

Finally, below is a synopsis of the film.

"Sons of the Clouds: The Last Colony," will participate in the 62nd Berlin International Film Festival. The movie written and directed by Alvaro Longoria (Morena Films), produced and starring Javier Bardem (Pinguin Films), production by Lilly Hartley (Candescent Films) and with the participation of Canal +, will have its global debut on February 16th under the festival's official special selection. The feature-film documentary follows Bardem on his own journey through the complicated world of international diplomacy and the interest that have detonated the Arab Springs, analysing the harsh history of the habitants of Western Sahara, the last colony in Africa. The film which took 3 years to complete and spanned 6 countries details the multiple political, economic and strategic interests of the countries involved that have prevented a resolution to this conflict that has been in a 'cold war' for more than 35 years.

Additionally, we should keep an eye out for mentions of Wilaya another film about Western Sahara, which to date has only been mentioned in Variety and Hollywood Reporter.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, February 17, 2012 12:01 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: Robert M. Holley
Subject: IMPORTANT!
Attachments: Clinton Visit.doc

Mr. Ambassador,

Attached is the second paper promised by Bob and me regarding our thoughts on a meeting agenda and issues for the upcoming visit by the Secretary to Rabat. Please let me know if you have further questions. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Secretary Clinton Visit to Morocco

Background

Hillary Clinton's scheduled February 26 visit to Morocco will very likely be her last trip to Morocco as US Secretary of State. She has made clear that she will not remain in her current position should President Obama win re-election in November. Consequently, her visit later this month will likely represent our best opportunity to secure a commitment from her to make significant progress on several important objectives that we have hoped to achieve during her tenure at the State Department. The visit will offer a good opportunity to consolidate progress made during Foreign Minister Fassi Fihri's meeting with Secretary Clinton in Washington in March of last year, as well as a new opportunity to take an important step forward in consolidating US support for Morocco's initiative to resolve the issue in Western Sahara.

Objectives for the Visit

- Secure a public statement of support from the Secretary for Morocco's reforms and the importance that the US attaches to working with Morocco as a partner in promoting progress in the Middle East and North Africa. In this regard, seek assurance of the Secretary to formally inaugurate the Strategic Dialogue announced one year ago.
- Gain Clinton's support for committing US development resources to improving the lives of those living in the Southern Provinces as authorized in the December 2011 Omnibus Appropriations Bill that gives the Obama Administration a green light to use US funds in the Sahara provinces.
- Receive a commitment from the Secretary that the Department will respond to the Leahy language in a strong positively worded answer, in order to put this issue to rest, once and for all.
- Encourage the Secretary to reiterate US support for the Moroccan autonomy initiative as "serious, credible and realistic" and to state publicly that events in the region make a resolution of the Western Sahara issue through a political compromise a necessity in order to promote regional cooperation and integration, as well as combat the growing influence and activities of regional terrorist and criminal elements that seek to profit from the uncertainties of Arab Spring developments in the region.

Suggested Points on Western Sahara

- Describe steps Morocco has taken in an effort to improve relations with Algeria and foster a better climate for regional cooperation and resolution of the Sahara. Explain Moroccan perception of the results of these efforts.
- Give Secretary Clinton a full understanding of Morocco's commitment to resolving this issue as quickly as possible and explain the dangers of continued stalemate, especially as AQIM and other criminal groups seek to destabilize the region.

- Express Morocco's appreciation for Congress' authorization for the Obama Administration to use US development assistance funds to help improve the lives of those living in the Southern Provinces. Explain how such actions could help create a better climate for resolving the larger problem in the Sahara. Express willingness to work closely with the State Department and US development agencies to identify programs that could be implemented and suggest that a working level meeting in the near future should be arranged to address this opportunity to enhance US/Morocco efforts on this issue. This will be the one and only signal during her tenure that moves the WS issue incrementally forward. She should see it accomplished before she leaves office. This is one of the two most impactful items Clinton can do with Morocco before leaving office.
- The other issue that would leave an indelible Clinton signature is the US-Moroccan Strategic Dialogue. She should make sure that this Dialogue is established as an on-going process, and that the first meeting is held prior to her leaving office.
- Encourage Secretary Clinton to make a strong public statement of support for the need to resolve the Sahara problem and reiterate the need for compromise as she again expresses the US view of Morocco's initiative as "serious, credible and realistic." Anything less will be perceived as the State Department "walking back" previous commitments.
- In this regard reiterate Morocco's commitment that the refugees in the Algerian camps are welcome to come home and will be assisted in building a new life for themselves and their families.
- Explain the consequences of the Leahy language to the bilateral relations and the perception by the Moroccan population. Specifically explain the importance of an unequivocal and strong positive response from the State Department in this regard in order to lay this issue to rest, once and for all.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, February 18, 2012 11:27 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: RE: Fact Sheets and Meeting Outline Drafts

Rachad,

At the Friday congressional staff meeting we spent time going over messaging for congressional meetings. We have now prepared an initial draft of messages, which we have sent to Embassy staff for further refinements, at their request. Once we all have agreed on a final draft we will submit to you for your final approval. I hope this process is OK with you? Please let me know otherwise. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Jordan Paul [<mailto:jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com>]
Sent: Saturday, February 18, 2012 10:45 AM
To: saida Zaid; 'Fouad Kadmiri'; Mr. Mouaad Ibriz (mibriz@embassyofmorocco.us); ibriz.mouaad@gmail.com; fouadkadmiri@yahoo.fr
Cc: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Fact Sheets and Meeting Outline Drafts

Saida, Mouaad, and Fouad,

Thank you for taking the time to review and edit these documents. As in the past, we know the input from the Embassy diplomats is an invaluable part of this process. Your insights and knowledge will greatly improve all of these papers.

Per our discussion at the Congressional Team meeting yesterday, we have prepared these draft Fact Sheets and a 15 Meeting Outline. Per the advice of the group, the Fact Sheets are designed to be one page (front and back), hitting the critical points on the four issues we discussed:

1. Morocco as a Leader in the Region
2. Recent Reforms and Elections in Morocco
3. Bilateral Relationship – primarily trade and security
4. Refugee Rights

Similar to the fact sheets is a draft one page outline of a typical meeting. It is designed to be a guide, not a script, that members of the team can look at before any typical meeting.

Thanks and please let me know if you any questions. Best, Jordan

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, February 18, 2012 4:13 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Re: Projet de mail a Ed sur les "Fact Sheets and Meeting Outline Drafts"

Perfect. Thank you.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Saturday, February 18, 2012 12:51 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Projet de mail a Ed sur les "Fact Sheets and Meeting Outline Drafts"

Ed,

As our two teams discussed yesterday at the congressional meeting, we will review and add (if and when necessary) some ideas/points that, from our perspective, we think should be included in the fact sheets.

You will receive our comments soon.

Rachad

From: "Edward Gabriel" <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Subject: RE: Fact Sheets and Meeting Outline Drafts
Date: February 18, 2012 11:27:20 AM EST
To: <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>

Rachad,

At the Friday congressional staff meeting we spent time going over messaging for congressional meetings. We have now prepared an initial draft of messages, which we have sent to Embassy staff for further refinements, at their request. Once we all have agreed on a final draft we will submit to you for your final approval. I hope this process is OK with you? Please let me know otherwise. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Jordan Paul [mailto:jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com]
Sent: Saturday, February 18, 2012 10:45 AM
To: saida Zaid; 'Fouad Kadmiri'; Mr. Mouaad Ibriz (mibriz@embassyofmorocco.us); ibriz.mouaad@gmail.com; fouadkadmiri@yahoo.fr
Cc: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Fact Sheets and Meeting Outline Drafts

Saida, Mouaad, and Fouad,

Thank you for taking the time to review and edit these documents. As in the past, we know the input from the Embassy diplomats is an invaluable part of this process. Your insights and knowledge will greatly improve all of these papers.

Per our discussion at the Congressional Team meeting yesterday, we have prepared these draft Fact Sheets and a 15 Meeting Outline. Per the advice of the group, the Fact Sheets are designed to be one page (front and back), hitting the critical points on the four issues we discussed:

- 1) Morocco as a Leader in the Region
- 2) Recent Reforms and Elections in Morocco
- 3) Bilateral Relationship – primarily trade and security
- 4) Refugee Rights

Similar to the fact sheets is a draft one page outline of a typical meeting. It is designed to be a guide, not a script, that members of the team can look at before any typical meeting.

Thanks and please let me know if you any questions. Best, Jordan

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, February 20, 2012 7:45 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: Fact Sheets

Rachad,

Thank you very much for the quick response and the thoughtfulness of you and the team. I very much appreciate the process that you are establishing and think it will greatly improve our product and effect on behalf of Morocco. Thanks Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Sunday, February 19, 2012 6:40 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Fact Sheets

Ed,

First, the information in the fact sheets is excellent.

I have made some changes, which I included in the attached fact sheets.

As agreed during last Friday's meeting, our two teams can sit down together and discuss those observations and changes.

Best,

Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, February 21, 2012 8:05 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Letter to Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal
Attachments: CCF20022012_00004.pdf; PaintMoroccan.pdf

Rachad,

Attached is the official request/invitation from Lesley Westbrook, regarding the MD Moroccan event May 4 and 5th. I'd be happy to answer any questions you have and support you in this effort as you deem necessary. My wife Kathleen and I also would be honored to host you for the "Paint the town Moroccan" weekend at our place on the Eastern Shore if this suitable to your schedule. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

February 2012

H.E. Rachad Bouhlal
 Ambassador, Kingdom of Morocco
 1601 21 Street, NW
 Washington DC 20009

Dear Mr. Ambassador,

By way of introduction, I am Co-Chair of the annual fundraiser for our Academy Art Museum, this year scheduled for Saturday, May 5, in Easton, Maryland. The brand of our fundraiser is "PAINT THE TOWN"...each year using a different unique theme. My husband Paolo Frigerio and I were in Morocco in March of 2011; that was my inspiration for creating the focus on Morocco and all that it has to offer. As you know, Ambassador Gabriel and his wife, Kathleen, are actively involved in community affairs on the Eastern Shore and have agreed to be this year's honorary co-chairs.

We are not just another party...we want to showcase the best of Morocco so that our attendees really get to know something of the country, the important relationship between our two countries and its long history, the crafts/art/music/food/wines. It is our intention to take people somewhere most have never been...the majority of our 400 attendees have not been to Morocco, although there is a high percentage of citizens of our county who are affluent and have traveled extensively throughout the world. The following is an outline of the day's events.

- The main event will be Saturday, May 5, starting at 6pm with a one-hour performance at our beautiful historic theatre in downtown Easton. We are flying in the phenomenal musician Ali Amir from Morocco who will perform with 4 regional Moroccan musicians to showcase the extraordinary range of music...Berber, Gnaoua, Chaabi, Arabic, Jewish. Following the performance we will serve cocktails and appetizers at the Art Museum...then Dinner Under The Tent nearby...all authentic Moroccan cuisine and wines, a new discovery for most Americans.
- The Souk: We will close one block of our historic downtown Easton between the Avalon Theatre and the Art Museum. The Souk will be open on Saturday, May 5, noon until 7:30pm. We are working with Hassan Samrhouni of the Washington Moroccan community to procure the best merchants of Moroccan crafts, clothing, purses, art, fabrics...traditional items to feature and sell in The Souk.
- Art Galleries in Easton: the art galleries in downtown Easton as well as our Academy Art Museum would like to exhibit Moroccan art/artists for potentially a 2-week time period.
- Friday evening: One of our patrons is hosting a dinner at her waterfront estate for our top donors and honored guests.

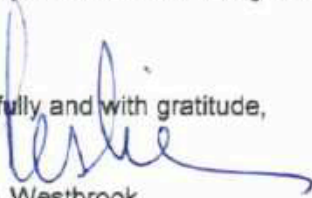

Mr. Ambassador, specifically we would like to meet with you at your convenience to discuss the following:

- We would like you and Mrs. Bouhlal to be the Honored Guests for the Saturday, May 5, event. You will have special seating for the performance and for the dinner.
- We would also like you and Mrs. Bouhlal to attend the Friday, May 4, dinner at the waterfront estate in Easton. Hilda and Arturo Brillembourg are our hosts for that evening.
- We are pleased to bring in musician Ali Amir for our performance. It would be very helpful to our fundraising goals if he were able to use a complimentary ticket on Air Maroc, if possible.

- We plan to serve Moroccan wines. We would appreciate assistance in selecting and procuring the most appropriate wines to expose to our guests.
- We want to make sure that the cuisine for the dinner is as authentic as possible and hope you are able to provide guidance in this regard.
- We would like your thoughts on art and artists to exhibit at art galleries and the Academy Art Museum.

I am sure our initial meeting will produce even more ideas to discuss as well as other questions to answer. I hope your schedule will allow us to get together soon and look forward to meeting you.

Respectfully and with gratitude,

Leslie M. Westbrook
Co-Chair
PAINT THE TOWN MOROCCAN!
Academy Art Museum

Paint the Town
Moroccan!
Saturday, May 5, 2012

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, February 21, 2012 5:37 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Memo re: event on March 13th
Attachments: AD_March9thEventMemo21February2012.docx

Rachad, more on your invitation to speak to the Council on Foreign Relations, March 13th. See below on timing. Ed

From: Caitlin Dearing [<mailto:cdearing@moroccanamericancenter.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, February 21, 2012 3:57 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Cc: Jean AbiNader; Jordan Paul
Subject: RE: Memo re: event on March 13th

It seems I missed in the initial email that Elliott suggested lunch or late afternoon for the event. Apologies for the oversight. Naomi would like to get at least the basics taken care of as soon as possible, so once we have a date and time from the Ambassador, please let me know. In addition, please let me know how you would like to proceed going forward... Thanks again.

Caitlin Dearing
Senior Vice-President of Research, Projects, and Programs
Moroccan American Center
202.470.2051
cdearing@moroccanamericancenter.com
Visit us at: <http://www.moroccoonthemove.com>
Follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

Memo

Date: February 21, 2012

To: Ed Gabriel

From: Caitlin Dearing

Cc: Jordan Paul; Jean AbiNader

Re: March 9th Event

As part of our 2012 campaign to promote Morocco as a leader, we plan to host an event around the one year anniversary of the March 9th 2011 King's Speech inaugurating reform in the Kingdom. The event will be a retrospective on the past year, highlighting key reforms and developments. The timing also presents an opportunity to introduce Ambassador Bouhlal to the think tank community. Elliott Abrams of the Council on Foreign Relations has agreed to host the Ambassador for a roundtable on March 13th. The initial thinking is that it will be a conversation between Elliott and the Ambassador on the last year in Morocco and what the future holds, but the final format is yet to be determined and Elliott has not yet signaled what format he would like or if he would like to bring in an additional speaker. Given Elliott's stature and his agreement to hold the event on behalf of the Council on Foreign Relations, I suggest that we cede ownership to Elliott, only providing counsel and assistance when requested. Elliott is a demonstrated friend of Morocco and since the Ambassador is the focus of the event, it will be friendly to Morocco regardless.

Per Elliott's directions, we need to answer the following ASAP:

1. Confirm Ambassador Bouhlal's availability for March 13th and finalize the date and time with Elliott. Elliott has suggested either a lunch or late afternoon, so pending the Ambassador's availability, it would be helpful to suggest a few options.
2. Finalize a title with Elliott. Our working suggestion is, "Elections, Reform, and the Arab Spring: Morocco, One Year Later." This will, of course, be merely a suggestion to Elliott, who will have the final say.

Please let us know if you have any further questions or if you need any further information to make the above requests.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, February 21, 2012 5:46 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Fact Sheets
Attachments: FS 1.doc; FS 2.doc; FS 3.doc; FS 4.doc; Basic Outline for a 15 Minute Congressional Meeting-1.doc

Final messaging with one change. Please see MAC staff consensus below, and let me know if you disagree. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Jordan Paul [<mailto:jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com>]
And Caitlin Dearing
Sent: Tuesday, February 21, 2012 1:33 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Fw: Fact Sheets

Dear Ed,

We have made all the required changes, with some edits ameliorating the English additions the Embassy made. I have tracked changes for their review. The one change we did not make was with regards to the title of fact sheet 4 on conditioning US aid to the camps. The Embassy's suggested titled focused solely on the census, which is not the focus of the fact sheet and we therefore think is not an appropriate title. We understand the Embassy's concern about emphasizing the census, and we have left their additional language at the end of the fact sheet. For Congress, however, the key is the conditioning, not the language that comes after "until and unless" (which would be the census). We are happy to discuss further, but after consultation with Jordan, the consultants, and Bob at the last Congressional meeting, this was the messaging everyone agreed to.

Basic Outline for a 15 Minute Congressional Meeting
Morocco as a historic friend and ally of the US, and a leader in the Region, Recent Reforms, Elections, and New Government

- Morocco has along history of important political reforms and democratic practices
 - Free and Fair elections
 - Women’s Rights
 - Political expression
- Morocco has been a leader in the region during the Arab Spring
 - Cooperation and Coordination with Tunisia
 - Leadership in Libya
 - Authored the UN Security Council Resolution on Syria
- Constitutional Reforms enacted in July
 - Morocco seized the opportunity to press forward with long planned reforms
 - Important new powers to the elected government
 - The issue of Religion remains with HMKMVI
- Results of the Elections
 - PJD wins a plurality
 - The Quote from the PM
 - Akin to the Christian Democrats of Europe
 - Part of a moderate coalition

Trade Stats and Update on the Bilateral Relationship

- Export Stats from the State to Morocco or US to Morocco depending on amount
 - Important aviations and military purchases: Boeing Commercial Planes and F16s
- Bilateral Relationship is historic, unwavering, and a true friendship.
 - It is based on shared values (elections, transparency), shared economic relationship (FTA), and shared security engagements (F-16s, joint exercises)
 - America has no better friend in the North Africa

Conditioning US Assistance to the Camps

- Increased Criminal Behavior
 - Mercenaries for Gaddafi, Shootouts in Mali, Kidnapping in the camps for AQIM, recruitment for the drug cartels
- Growing instability in the region (use Yonah’s map)
- These camps have existed for 35 years at the cost of over 1 billion dollars
- —It is ridiculous for the US to subsidize camps that contribute recruits to our adversaries

• —

- The Congress should condition non-humanitarian assistance to the camps to advance refugee rights and promote durable solutions. In order to create the conditions for such durable solutions to refugee plight, a census of the camps is required - a precondition the Security Council has long called on UNHCR to conduct. A census would allow the international community to know the exact figures of the population of the Tindouf camps with a view of speeding up the international efforts aimed at achieving a mutually acceptable political solution to this longstanding regional dispute.

◆

The Congress should condition non-humanitarian assistance to the camps to advance refugee rights and promote durable solutions. In order to prepare the ground for a durable solution to refugee plight, the security Council have been calling for UNHCR to undertake a Census that would allow the international the international community to know the exact figures of the population of the Tindouf camps in order to speed up the international efforts aiming at achieving a political solution to this longstanding regional dispute.

◆

Morocco is Committed to a Strong Bilateral Relationship with the United States

- Morocco has long-been an ally and partner of the United States. It was the first country to formally recognize the United States and, in 1786, became the first country with which the United States negotiated a formal treaty of commerce and friendship. Today, that friendship and cooperation continue in many fields, highlighted by our common commitment to peace, democracy, combating terrorism and advancing regional security and development. Morocco, a stable, democratizing, and liberalizing Arab and Muslim nation, is an important supporter of key US interests in the Middle East and has played a discrete and helpful role in the resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. ~~(particularly that Morocco plays a discrete and efficient role in the resolution of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict)~~ US policy toward Morocco is based on sustained and strong engagement, and shared priorities for reform, conflict resolution, counterterrorism cooperation, and ~~public empowerment~~ (public engagement).
<http://www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/bgn/5431.htm#relations>
<http://rabat.usembassy.gov/history.html>
- ~~(We need to make reference to the fact that our security cooperation has started long before 9/11)~~ Morocco and the United States share a long-standing commitment to security cooperation. During World Wars I and II, Morocco was aligned with the Allied Forces and fought alongside US forces operating in the region. -Following Morocco's independence in 1956, the King Mohammed VI expressed his commitment to be a staunch ally of the United States in the fight against the proliferation of communism in the region. This security cooperation was greatly enhanced in the aftermath of the ~~Following the~~ September 11, 2001 attacks and the commencement of the Global War on Terror. After 9/11, Morocco showed solidarity and renewed its commitment as a strong partner of the US on counterterrorism and military cooperation. By hindering the wave of jihadist recruits to Iraq from North Africa and by implementing successful counterterrorism measures, Morocco established itself as a key player in the global war on terrorism. Morocco is also a member of the Trans-Saharan Counterterrorism Partnership Initiative (TSCPTI), fully cooperating in the US efforts to prevent and combat terrorism in the Sahel region. Cooperation between Morocco and the US includes data sharing, law enforcement partnership, improvement of capabilities to oversee strategic checkpoints, and termination of terrorist organization financing.
<http://rabat.usembassy.gov/modern.html>
<http://www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/bgn/5431.htm>
<http://www.alertnet.org/thenews/newsdesk/L0255298.htm>
http://www.magharebia.com/cocoon/awi/xhtml1/en_GB/news/awi/newsbriefs/general/2007/02/18/newsbrief-01
- The US also contributes military and counterterrorism support to Morocco through the Foreign Military Financing (FMF) and International Military Education and Training (IMET) initiatives. These ties feature regular joint exercises as well as

This information has been produced by the Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP). www.moroccanamericanpolicy.com
 MACP is a registered agent of the Government of Morocco.
 Additional information is available at the Justice Department in Washington, D.C.

military sales. Such transfers deepen ties and help promote a modern military in Morocco. Under the FMF program, the US provides security assistance to maintain aging US-origin equipment, including aircrafts and transportation vehicles; American equipment boosts maritime surveillance to address illegal immigration, smuggling, drug trafficking, and illicit fishing; procures transport and logistics equipment; and upgrades aerial surveillance.

<http://www.fas.org/sqp/crs/row/RS21579.pdf>
<http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/158268.pdf>

- Through the IMET assistance program, of which Morocco is one of the top 20 recipients worldwide, senior military officers have received training in the United States, and 70 Moroccan students are sent annually to the Professional Military Education (PME) classes at US services schools. These courses cover human rights norms and the proper use of US military equipment, and allow for increased collaboration between the US and Moroccan armed forces. As the State Department notes, “the Moroccan military offers a significant force multiplier for US initiatives to promote regional stability on the African continent through military education. The Moroccan military trains several other African and European militaries in their schools and training facilities,” thus enhancing interoperability and contributing to peace and security in all of North Africa.
<http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/60654.pdf>
<http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/158268.pdf>
- In recognition of this, the US has doubled military assistance to the country and honored Morocco with “major non-NATO ally status,” which qualifies Morocco for increased US military cooperation. The United States also established a US-Morocco Free Trade Agreement in 2004, signaling the beginning of a new period of cooperation and economic growth between the United States and Morocco. Economic cooperation was furthered in August 2007, when the Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) signed a five-year, $697.5 million compact with the Kingdom of Morocco to reduce poverty and stimulate economic growth.
<http://www.fas.usda.gov/info/factsheets/moroccofta.asp>
<http://www.mcc.gov/pages/countries/program/morocco-compact>
- ~~The FTA with EU countries and the new TangerMed Harbor with its free industrial zone situated at 10 miles from Spain is an extraordinary opportunity to enter into the European market. The new program launched by Morocco to modernize, in the next 10 years, its agricultural sector (new equipments, new techniques for irrigation especially drop by drop systems, fertilizers, training, etc...) is a unique opportunity for the US to play a big role. The sector of renewable energies aiming at producing 38% of our electricity from renewable energy (9 billions $ of direct investments, and a production of 2000 MW by 2020) and the sector of fisheries represent unique opportunities for American companies.~~
- In 2008, Morocco chose to further strengthen its bilateral military and economic cooperation with the United States by signing a contract for 24 Advanced F-16 Block 52 aircraft manufactured by Lockheed-Martin. According to the Pentagon’s Defense Security Cooperation Agency, “the sale will also contribute to the foreign policy and national security objectives of the United States by enhancing Morocco's capability to support US efforts in the global war on terrorism."

<http://www.reuters.com/article/tnBasicIndustries-SP/idUSN1961843520071219>

http://www.lockheedmartin.com/news/press_releases/2008/060608ae_f16morocco.html

- Morocco's strategic trading location, its FTA with EU countries, and the new TangerMed Harbor, a free industrial zone situated at 10 miles from Spain, offer an extraordinary opportunity for US companies to enter into the European market. In addition, recent program initiated by Morocco, including a new program launched to modernize its agricultural sector, the expansion of renewable energies in Morocco, which aims to produce 38% of the country's electricity from renewable energy by 2020, and the continued expansion of the fisheries sector represent unique opportunities for American investment.

This information has been produced by the Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP). www.moroccanamericanpolicy.com

MACP is a registered agent of the Government of Morocco.

Additional information is available at the Justice Department in Washington, D.C.

Morocco Is Irreversibly Committed to Democratic Reform and Good Governance

- Since ascending the throne in 1999, King Mohammed VI has consolidated, accelerated, and broadened democratic reform in the Kingdom of Morocco. His staunch commitment to democracy and an active civil society is illustrated in a 2003 speech to the nation, "Indeed, our strength lies in the democratic system we have opted for as an irreversible choice which, coupled with an ~~aggressive~~ pro-active, committed diplomacy, involving parliament, political parties, trade unions and civil society, will help us in the defense of our just cause."
- Much of what King Mohammed VI has initiated is part of an ongoing process to empower individual citizens and the institutions that represent them. Major achievements include: a number of free and fair parliamentary and local elections; reform of the family code; mandatory inclusion of women in national and local elections; the beginnings of the process of regionalization to bring power and decision making closer to local communities; the equity and reconciliation commission (IER) dealing with past human rights abuses; the human development initiative (INDH) to build sustainable futures for Morocco's most disadvantaged communities; ~~sustained efforts to fight illiteracy~~; and the recent upgrading of the institution responsible for human rights protections.
- These initiatives highlight Morocco's ongoing democratic transition. As the Washington Post noted, "[Morocco] has over the past decade undergone a slow but profound transformation from traditional monarchy to constitutional monarchy, acquiring along the way real political parties, a relatively free press, new political leaders—the mayor of Marrakesh is a 33-year-old woman—and a set of family laws that strive to be compatible ~~both with Sharia~~ (no need to use the word Sharia, especially right now) with and with international conventions on human rights."
<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2009/06/29/AR2009062903455.html?hpid=opinionsbox1>
- In a speech on March 9, 2011, in line with his continued efforts to promote reform, King Mohammed VI announced a broad revision of Morocco's constitution in an effort to consolidate democracy in Morocco, devolve power to the regions, broaden individual freedoms, solidify the rule of law, and strengthen human rights. In it, he announced the creation of an advisory commission tasked with consulting with government and civil society leaders, political parties, trade unions, and youth groups to make proposed reforms for Morocco's Constitution. This marked the start of an unprecedented campaign for constitutional reform, culminating in parliamentary elections on November 25 and the establishment of a new government in late December 2011.
http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5h0nK8I_SJctJBKcT7YkOImpIhsPw?docId=CN.G.9bfa3f79ce20b70cbc21d53796182754.101
<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/faq-moroccos-2011-parliamentary-elections/>

- Leaders worldwide praised Morocco for its commitment to reform following the March 9th speech. The United States said it is “encouraged by the proposals put forward by the King to transform Morocco's democratic development through constitutional, judicial and political reforms.” The European Union called the reforms “a major step” signaling “a clear commitment to democracy and respect for human rights.” It added that new measures would continue “the Kingdom's already-launched reform process” and advance “separation of powers,” “independence of the judiciary,” “regionalization,” and “equal rights for men and women.” The 47-member Council of Europe made Morocco its first “partner for democracy” among nations in the region.

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/press-releases-morocco-delivers/>

- After several months of consultation, on June 17 the King announced a new Constitution with unprecedented and far-reaching reforms which was approved by an overwhelming majority of Moroccans through a national referendum on July 1. The Constitution enshrined several key changes to Morocco’s political system, advancing democratization by strengthening the principle of separation of powers and bringing all stakeholders into the political process. The New Constitution:
 - Establishes that the Prime Minister will be appointed from the party that wins the most seats in the Parliament in the elections.
 - Expands the powers of the Prime Minister as Head of Government and the Parliament, giving them broad legislative powers.
 - Empowers Moroccans with more control and leadership at the local government level—making local and regional officials directly accountable to voters.
 - Establishes independent agencies to guarantee civil and human rights protections.
 - Establishes an independent judiciary with a newly mandated Constitutional Court.

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/faq-moroccos-2011-parliamentary-elections/>

- Following the successful revision of the Constitution, the King called for national parliamentary elections on November 25, 2011. Certified as free and fair by international observers, the elections had a voter turnout of 45% - an increase of more than 20% from the last parliamentary elections held in 2007, thus underscoring the support among Moroccans for reform initiated by the King. The new government, led by Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane, leader of the PJD, is committed to continue to advance democratic reform in Morocco through educational reform, the promotion of international trade and investment, and support for democracy and human rights. The 2011 events thus reinforce Morocco’s tradition of reform, one that will continue to strengthen in the coming years.

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/faq-moroccos-2011-parliamentary-elections/>

Morocco's Regional Leadership

- In the last decade, Morocco has taken the lead among its neighbors in promoting democracy, human rights, and socioeconomic development. Long before the Arab Spring, Morocco had begun a process of reform and democratization. Its efforts to consolidate democracy and promote human rights through the 2011 revision of the Constitution serves as an example for peacefully promoting democratization without regime change, another demonstration of Morocco's regional leadership.
- Morocco has been at the forefront of Islamic countries in promoting the rights of women and gender equity. In 2004, based on the unprecedented initiative of King Mohammed VI, Morocco approved the Moudawana, one of the most progressive laws on women's and family rights in the Arab world. The new law forbids marriage of women under 18 and raised the age of marriage for girls from 15 to 18 and gave wives equal rights as their husbands, (and reinforces equal rights between women and men), notably in the area of division of property upon divorce. It also helps to secure women's participation in society and politics in order to reinforce their power and eliminate gender discrimination in private and public affairs. The Moudawana has since served as an example for women's rights activists across the Maghreb and Middle East.
http://www.globalrights.org/site/DocServer/Moudawana-English_Translation.pdf?docID=3106
http://www.drc-citizenship.org/system/assets/1052734625/original/1052734625-pittman_etal.2010-winning.pdf?1290019392
- Morocco launched a pioneering truth and reconciliation effort in 2004 that has served as an example for how to address human rights violations of the past. Established by King Mohammed VI, the Moroccan Truth and Reconciliation Commission (IER) was the first of its kind in the Arab world. As an independent investigative body, it shed light on past human rights violations, provided compensation for the victims, and was the basis for the Advisory Council on Human Rights (CCDH). The IER's mission is to not only answer questions about Morocco's past, but to understand the causes and use them as lessons to construct a stronger, open and more just society.
<http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2005/61702.htm>
- Morocco demonstrated its regional leadership on the importance of human rights protection during the crises in Libya and Syria. It participated in discussions with Western powers over the Libyan crisis, one of the few Arab countries and the only North African country openly involved in such talks. In cooperation with the Arab League, Morocco endorsed the no-fly zone over Libya and advocated its support for the Libyan people to democratically determine their future. On Syria, Morocco demonstrated leadership at the UN Security Council, authoring the draft resolution calling for a ceasefire, expressing grave concerns at the deteriorating situation, and condemning gross violations of human rights.
<http://www.bloomberg.com/news/2011-03-20/qatar-says-it-will-join-libya-military-operations-as-arabs-back-offensive.html>

<http://af.reuters.com/article/topNews/idAFJ0E73I01X20110419>
<http://www.unhcr.org/refworld/docid/4f3bc75826.html>
<http://www.un.org/News/Press/docs/2012/sc10536.doc.htm>

- Morocco is committed to regional integration and its participation in the Arab Union is a strategic and natural choice for Morocco the country. At the 30th Meeting of the Foreign Affairs Ministers of the countries of the Union, –M. Saad El Dine Othmani, Morocco's Foreign Affairs and Cooperation Minister stated, –at the 30th meeting of the Foreign Affairs Ministers of the countries of the Union that the achievement of the Maghreb integration is, for Morocco, a constitutional priority and a strategic necessity to respond to the growing aspirations of the people of the Maghreb, adding that the Maghreb integration is a popular aspiration given the longstanding civilizational bonds and the common destiny between the people of the member countries.
http://www.magharebia.com/cocoon/awi/xhtml1/en_GB/features/awi/features/2012/02/20/feature-01

- Morocco had long demonstrated its commitment to building stability in Africa through security cooperation and socioeconomic development. In the past decade, Morocco has contributed to peacekeeping efforts throughout the continent and promoted economic and social development projects as a means of addressing insecurity.

- As of October 2009, Morocco had over 1,500 troops, military observers, and police serving in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations, ranking 17th in terms of worldwide contributions. It is currently involved in peacekeeping missions in the Democratic Republic of Congo and Côte d'Ivoire.
http://www.un.org/en/peacekeeping/contributors/2009/oct09_1.pdf
http://www.un.org/en/peacekeeping/contributors/2009/oct09_2.pdf
http://www.un.org/en/peacekeeping/contributors/2009/oct09_3.pdf

- Morocco continues play a key role in socioeconomic development both in North and sub-Saharan Africa as its businesses increasingly transfer their technical know-how to other African nations. A recent Jeune Afrique article noted, "the expertise and know-how of Moroccan entrepreneurs is widely recognized and solicited throughout the continent." This effort has been notable particularly in the telecommunications, banking, transportation, health, agribusiness, and engineering sectors, where the Moroccan government and businesses cooperate with their African counterparts and international officials in all phases of a project: financing, planning, and execution.
<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Articles/Dossier/ARTJAJA2547p068-069.xml0/-Afrique-investissement-commerce-exterieur-Economie-une-offensive-continentale-encore-trop-timide.html>

- Part of this development includes training in order to build the human capacity of these countries. Morocco has played a key role in fostering educational development. Currently, 10,000 students from sub-Saharan Africa are enrolled in Moroccan universities. Many Central and West African countries look to Morocco for management training that contributes to the formation of a viable civil service capable of promoting real socio-economic development and democratic change.
<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Articles/Dossier/ARTJAJA2547p064-066.xml0/-Afrique-diplomatie-Mohammed-VI-RASD-Diplomatie-l-appel-du-sud.html>

This information has been produced by the Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP). www.moroccanamericanpolicy.com
 MACP is a registered agent of the Government of Morocco.
 Additional information is available at the Justice Department in Washington, D.C.

This information has been produced by the Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP). www.moroccanamericanpolicy.com
MACP is a registered agent of the Government of Morocco.
Additional information is available at the Justice Department in Washington, D.C.

Condition US Support for the Camps in Western Sahara to Advance Refugee Rights and Promote Durable Solutions ~~Condition US Support for the Camps in Western Sahara Advancing Refugee Rights and Promoting Durable Solutions~~

Formatted: Centered

- Tens of thousands of refugees have been sequestered in refugee camps in southwest Algeria near the town of Tindouf for more than thirty years. Having initially fled or been forced to flee to the camps during hostilities between Morocco and the Polisario Front, the refugees are now warehoused in Algeria in deplorable physical and moral circumstances. The international community system (community) has done little to protect the rights of these refugees in what has now become according to UNHCR, one of the longest protracted refugee situations in the world today.
<http://moroccanamericanpolicy.com/refugee/report.pdf>
- The refugees are almost completely dependent on international aid, as prospects for livelihood are limited both by the difficult physical environment and Algeria's refusal to grant refugees the right to work or freedom of movement outside of the camps. The refugees rely on aid for food and non-food items, healthcare, education, water, sanitation, transportation, and other basic services. Anemia and malnutrition remain high, water resources are insufficient, primary school and healthcare centers operate with meager resources and supplies, and there is a dearth of secondary education facilities. These conditions all violate refugee rights under international humanitarian law.
http://www.uscrrrefugees.org/2010Website/3_Our%20Work/3_2_1_3_Morocco/Stonewalling.pdf
<http://www.unhcr.org/4b05117f9.html>
- What is currently a humanitarian crisis is quickly becoming a security crisis as well. The camps are situated close to the porous border area between Mali, Mauritania, and Algeria, a vital crossroads of al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) terrorism and trafficking. In recent years, they have become a recruiting ground for AQIM and a hub for opportunistic Polisario members trafficking arms, drugs, people, and goods across the Sahel. ~~Although~~ In addition to the finding that members of the Polisario have long been involved in trafficking in the region and suspected of collusion with AQIM and other militants, the rise of terrorism in the region, ~~in addition to~~ and the continued intransigence by the Polisario to resolve the Western Sahara conflict, have exacerbated the security threat posed by the camps.¹
- The increased evidence of ties between the Polisario Front and AQIM and recruitment within the refugee camps has raised concerns among security and

¹ Alexander, Yonah. "Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11-Arab Spring." The Potomac Institute for Policy Studies (2012): 1-60, p. 7.
 This information has been produced by the Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP). www.moroccanamericanpolicy.com
 MACP is a registered agent of the Government of Morocco.
 Additional information is available at the Justice Department in Washington, D.C.

refugee experts alike.² Dr. J. Peter Pham has noted that connections between AQIM and the Polisario Front, “come[s] as no surprise given that the large numbers of idle young fighters with no prospects in camps presents the terrorist group with a ready pool of potential recruits, both for its military operations as well as the criminal activities it is increasingly involved in.” Gil Loescher and James Milner, affiliated with the Refugee Studies Centre at Oxford have echoed these warnings with regards to Western Sahara, arguing that, “prolonged and unresolved refugee crises almost universally result in politicisation and militancy of refugee communities with predictable adverse consequences for host state and regional security.”³ http://www.acus.org/new_atlanticist/islamist-threat-africas-rise-2012

- ~~UN Special~~ The Personal Envoy of the UN Secretary General to the Western Sahara, Ambassador Christopher Ross, has also warned about the dangers of these encampments. In a letter to the Group of Friends in 2010, Ross emphasized the dangers of failing to resolve the conflict, noting, “the risk of a drift toward extremism or criminal activities among Sahrawi youth is growing. The danger that a military or paramilitary adventure could escalate into hostilities increases the longer diplomacy fails to produce progress.”

http://news.yahoo.com/s/afp/20100820/wl_africa_afp/moroccosaharaspainun

- This reality became more serious on October 23, 2011 when an AQIM splinter group kidnapped three Western aid workers from the camps, reportedly with Polisario insider help. According to Agence France Presse, “unarmed AQIM militants entered the Sahrawi refugee camp in Tindouf, western Algeria, where sympathizers of the Polisario Front gave them weapons and helped them seek out the hostages.” The Polisario-run refugee camps have thus become what refugee experts have long warned about: “places of outright danger, both for refugees and relief workers.”⁴

http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5gfskPTlgBS_IQzBQK_R-Fdj_z0A?docId=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4c3f07.531

- Yet, there are more than just moral and security imperatives for promoting the rights of Sahrawi refugees. It is also in the interest of UNHCR, Algeria, and donors countries to open the Tindouf camps since the long-term care and maintenance programs come at a significant human and material cost. To date, the international community has provided over $1.3 billion dollars to UNHCR, the World Food Program, and MINURSO for the Sahrawi refugees, of which the United States has contributed over $300 million. While this money has provided vital resources to the refugees, it has done little to promote durable solutions, the primary mandate of UNHCR under international refugee law. Rather than help sustain a humanitarian crisis and an increasingly volatile security crisis, US support to UNHCR should be conditioned on its promotion of durable solutions,

Formatted: Indent: Left: 0", Hanging: 0.13", Bulleted + Level: 1 + Aligned at: 0.25" + Indent at: 0.5"

² Alexander, p. 7.

³ Loescher, Gil and James Milner. “Case studies: contemporary protracted refugee populations in Africa and Asia.” The Adelphi Papers, 45, 375 (2005): 35-65, p. 36.

⁴ Jacobsen, Karen. “A Framework for Exploring the Political and Security Context of Refugee Populated Areas.” Refugee Survey Quarterly, 19, 1 (2000): 3-22, p. 3.

including voluntary repatriation, local integration, and resettlement in a third country. ~~as a first step towards repatriation.~~

- <http://www.un.org/en/peacekeeping/missions/minurso/facts.shtml>
- <http://www.state.gov/s/d/rm/c6112.htm>
- <http://www.unhcr.org/pages/49c3646c278.html>
- http://www.usaid.gov/our_work/humanitarian_assistance/ffp/algeria.fs.01.04.11.pdf
- <http://www.wfp.org/countries/Algeria/Operations/WFP-Activities>

- <http://www.un.org/en/peacekeeping/missions/minurso/facts.shtml>
- <http://www.state.gov/s/d/rm/c6112.htm>
- <http://www.unhcr.org/pages/49c3646c278.html>
- http://www.usaid.gov/our_work/humanitarian_assistance/ffp/algeria.fs.01.04.11.pdf
- <http://www.wfp.org/countries/Algeria/Operations/WFP-Activities>

- ~~In order to prepare the ground~~ create the conditions for such a durable solutions to refugee plight. a census of the camps is required - a precondition the Security Council has long called on UNHCR to conduct. ~~there is a prerequisite of a Census that the Security Council have been calling for UNHCR to undertake~~ A census which would allow the international community to know the exact figures of the population of the Tindouf camps with a view ~~to of~~ speeding up the international efforts aimed at achieving a mutually acceptable political solution to this longstanding regional dispute.

Formatted: Indent: Left: 0.13", First line: 0"

Formatted: Normal, Space After: 12 pt, No widow/orphan control, Don't adjust space between Latin and Asian text, Don't adjust space between Asian text and numbers, Tab stops: Not at 0.13"

Formatted: Indent: First line: 0"

Formatted: Indent: Left: 0", Hanging: 0.13", Bulleted + Level: 1 + Aligned at: 0.25" + Indent at: 0.5"

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, February 22, 2012 8:39 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Questions on the US Chamber delegation

Rachad,

Our work with the US Chamber of Commerce continues on a positive path for the March conference. According to Jean Abinader, although a list of potential US companies has not been finalized, there seems to be a good response from the American side, and contacts are already being made to target specific company interests.

In the past, the Moroccan American Trade & Investment Center (MATIC) has offered to help the Chamber and other delegations by sponsoring one of the events during the trip. This has been very useful in order to build a network of contacts among the US companies for follow up. We are considering hosting the luncheon on the second day, in Rabat. Please let me know if you have any questions or comments in this regard.

Also, Jean usually travels with the delegation to provide a private sector point of contact for the US companies once they return to the US. He supports the Embassy's outreach to the companies and ensures continuity in communications with them. I fear without this continuity we may lose opportunities. The question here is whether you agree with him going to Morocco for this purpose? I have not yet figured out if we can afford to send Jean even if you agree, but want to get your thoughts first.

I would appreciate your advice concerning our hosting the luncheon in Rabat and Jean's participation with the delegation.

Thank you. Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, February 24, 2012 10:13 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Cc: Jean AbiNader
Subject: Fwd: Follow up from OPIC
Attachments: MaghrebMiddleEastRenewableEnergySummit2012CasablancaSpeakers.pdf; Untitled attachment 00105.htm

Mr. Ambassador,

What would you like us to do in this regard?

Sent from my iPad

Begin forwarded message:

From: "Jean AbiNader" <jabinader@moroccanamericancenter.com>
To: "Edward Gabriel" <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Subject: FW: Follow up from OPIC

FYI

From: Etcheverry, Suzanne [<mailto:Suzanne.Etcheverry@opic.gov>]
Sent: Friday, February 24, 2012 9:43 AM
To: gfilali@invest.gov.ma; Jean AbiNader
Subject: Follow up from OPIC

Dear Ghita and Jean,

It was very nice meeting you a few weeks ago at OPIC and discussing the exciting investment opportunities in Morocco.

As I mentioned, I will be speaking at the Maghreb/Middle East Renewable Energy Summit in Casablanca from April 16 – 17, 2012.

Attached is the brochure for your information.

I am currently planning the schedule for my trip, and would be very interested in meeting people that you think would be useful for me to meet in Morocco, and who would be interested in discussing OPIC support of investment, in particular in renewable resources.

If you have suggestions of people for me to meet, please let me know and I will be happy to follow up with them and arrange a meeting.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Best regards,

Suzanne

Director, Insurance

1100 New York Avenue, NW

Washington, D.C. 20527

Tel: (202) 336-8585

Fax: (202) 408-5142

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

MAGHREB/MIDDLE EAST RENEWABLE ENERGY SUMMIT 2012

16 - 17 APRIL 2012, HYATT REGENCY CASABLANCA , MOROCCO

Explore exciting developments including:

- ▶ MASEN's first Quarzazate solar tender, players involved, the next phase & future solar projects
- ▶ New wind farm projects in Morocco
- ▶ Hybrid solar-natural gas (ISCC) projects in MENA: An update on the Ain Beni Mathar hybrid project, new projects in Algeria & elsewhere in the region
- ▶ Algeria's ambitious renewable & hybrid projects in the next 30 years: the Hassi R'Mel ISCC, NEAL's proposed ISCC & others
- ▶ Opportunities and funding for Tunisia's solar plan
- ▶ Wind projects planned in Tunisia
- ▶ Libya's renewable energy targets – wind farm & solar thermal electricity generating projects under the new NTC government
- ▶ Market reform, new wind interconnection code, updates on the Kureimat ISCC, Hurghada wind farm, Zafarana wind farm and new projects in Egypt
- ▶ Renewable energy projects update for Bahrain
- ▶ Jordan's renewable electricity performance, new solar and wind farm projects
- ▶ Latest wind and solar projects in Oman
- ▶ Turkey's wind farm tenders in 2012
- ▶ Qatar's big push into renewables, new solar-related manufacturing activities for job creation & economic diversification
- ▶ Solar thermal electricity generating potential in Saudi Arabia and new projects & tenders
- ▶ Ethiopia's FiT policy and incentives for foreign investment in its renewable energy sector
- ▶ Project update on Desertec
- ▶ Post Arab Spring: New confidence, regime change & impact on renewable energy plans
- ▶ Comparative FiT regimes across MENA & further incentives for the renewable energy sector
- ▶ Risks and Returns in investing in Renewable Energy Projects in MENA
- ▶ Smart Grids in the integration of Renewables

Who should attend:

Gencos, T & D companies, Utilities Boards, Sovereign Wealth Funds, Clean Energy Investors, EPCs for renewable energy projects, Energy Insurers, Project Sponsors & Developers, Companies involved in wind turbines, CSP, PV & CPV, smart metering, smart grids, building energy efficiency, energy IT, project insurance & risk management...

Owned and Produced By

Supporting Organisations

Register before 28 February 2012 to save US$300

Email: register@magenta-global.com.sg or call: +65 6391 2552

MAGHREB/MIDDLE EAST RENEWABLE ENERGY SUMMIT 2012

16 - 17 APRIL 2012, HYATT REGENCY CASABLANCA, MOROCCO

In an age of austerity, financial crisis, rising oil prices and seismic political changes, the Maghreb and Middle East region, looks the most promising and interesting for investors & developers in the renewable energy sector. Held for the 4th time and with the exciting developments in the host country Morocco, this Summit takes the approach that all renewable energy projects should ultimately benefit countries in this region, their people and their industry. Charged with new mandates from the electorate, new governments will see to the success of viable energy projects, all benefits trickling down to enhance their people's livelihood, more jobs creation and security of continuing power supply.

Up till now, despite having considerable solar and wind potential, renewable energy realistically makes a minimal contribution to power generation across most of the MENA region, particularly in GCC countries where the abundance of oil and gas resources had not encouraged the development of renewable energy. However, the good news is that we are now witnessing countries across the Maghreb/Middle East region pushing for a huge hike in renewable energy capacity over the coming decade to meet high power demand growth, limit the use of oil and gas feedstock in power generation, taking advantage of a forecast drop in solar and wind generated electricity. Indeed, this capacity push has provided the incentives for nurturing new solar-related manufacturing in some countries, creating much needed employment and also help in economic diversification.

This important Summit, accompanied with a upcoming IRENA meeting, seeks to provide a world stage for new & current national energy decision-makers, national & municipal utilities boards, national electricity companies, IPPs, project sponsors & developers, meteorologists, sovereign fund managers, private equity investors, bankers (conventional & Islamic), insurers, lawyers, CEOs of wind turbine, CSP, PV & CPV and hybrid natural gas-solar plants to strategise and help advance the Maghreb/Middle East renewable energy markets.

*Plan your attendance at this Summit today. With more tenders for solar, wind and hybrid farms coming up for this region this year, this is the Summit you should not miss out! Join us at this Summit to find out more! Send in your Registration Today!

Who will you meet?

Past Attendees Profile - By Job Title

- MD/CEO/Presidents/GM/VP
- Directors & Managers of Licensing & Tariffs
- Heads of Power Generation
- Marketing / Business Development Managers
- Strategy & Technology Innovation

Past Attendees Profile - By Industry

- Utilities / Power Generation & TD
- Government Regulators & Electricity Boards
- Industry Users (Cement, Steel, Petrochem etc)
- Technology & Equipment Vendors
- Advisory Services (Banks, Insurance, Legal, Consulting)

Sponsorship & Exhibition Opportunities

4th Annual Maghreb / Middle East Renewable Energy Summit 2012 offers a diverse range of sponsorship opportunities for your organization. With major stakeholders expected to attend the event, you are guaranteed to have your message, product excellence and industry leadership transmitted to top decision makers. Call us today to book one of these primary sponsorship packages:

Platinum Sponsor * Diamond Sponsor * Gold Sponsor * Luncheon Sponsor * Refreshment Break Sponsor

Limited table top exhibition showcase opportunities are also available for companies to debut new products, generate new business, build & cement key relationships.

Email marketing2@magenta-global.com.sg to secure your place.

Media partners

Network with key decision makers in renewable energy sector

Email: register@magenta-global.com.sg | Hotline: +65 6391 2552 | Fax: +65 6392 3592

8.00	Registration
9.00	Chairman's Welcome Remarks
9.05	Host Ministerial Keynote Address His Excellency Dr Fouad Douiri, The Honourable Minister, Ministry of Energy, Mines, Water & the Environment, Morocco (invited)
9.30	IRENA's Contribution in Developing Renewable Energy Projects in North Africa and the Middle East Going Forward: Latest Updates on Projects in the Pipeline Mustapha Taoumi, Regional Director, North Africa & West and Central Asia, The International Renewable Energy Agency (IRENA)
10.00	SIE's (Morocco's Sovereign Wealth Fund) Critical Role in Financing the Success of Renewable Wind and Solar Energy Projects in Morocco Mohamed Ait Hassou, Director, Energy Development Societe d'Investissements Energetiques, Morocco
10.30	Morning Refreshments
11.00	Rebuilding the Maghreb/Middle East, Post-Unrest: Emerging Renewable Energy Regulatory Framework and Policy Options – The Case of Morocco Mohamed El Haouari, Director of Development & Planning, Renewable Energy and Energy Efficiency National Agency (ADEREE), Morocco
11.30	Post-Arab Spring: Providing Insurance & Risk Management for Renewable Energy Projects in the Middle East & North Africa <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Coverage for FIT for Renewable Energy Projects Regulatory Risk Coverage for Projects that do not involve FITs Suzanne Etcheverry, Director, Insurance Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC), USA
12.00	Algeria Renewable Energy Plans Going Forward: A Case in Point – The Ambitious Renewable Energy & Combined Natural Gas - Renewables Projects Planned in Algeria from 2012 Onwards Dr Salim Kehal, Director, Centre de Developpement des Energies Renouvelables (CDER), Algeria
12.30	Networking Luncheon
2.00	Saudi Electricity's Involvement in Renewable Projects in Saudi Arabia & MENA Engr Saud Al Rashed, Executive Director, Saudi Electricity (SEC)
2.30	Libya's Revived Renewable Wind and Solar Projects, Under the New NTC Government Engr Mohammed Al Zaroug, Office of the Chairman, The Renewable Energy Authority of Libya
3.00	Financing & Equity Investments in Renewable Energy projects in the MENA Region International Power Investor
3.30	Afternoon Refreshments
4.00	Ethiopia's FIT Policy and Incentives for Foreign Investment in its Renewable Energy Projects Getahun Moges, Director General, Ethiopian Electricity Agency
4.30	Development of Solar thermal & Photovoltaic Projects & Technology in the Maghreb region Emile H.Ouaknine, President/ Chairman, Energy Poles
5.00	New Projects in the Wind and Solar Sector in Turkey in 2012 & thereafter Atilla Gurbuz, Deputy General Manager, Ministry of Energy & Natural Resources, Turkey
5.30	Questions & Discussion
5.40	End of Day One
9.00	Chairman's Remarks
9.05	Post-Arab Spring: Egypt's Wind and Solar Power Projects Progress <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Market reform New Wind Interconnection Code Drafting new market rules Opportunities for foreign investors Dr Mohamed Abdel-Rahman, Advisor, Egyptian Electricity Regulatory Agency
9.30	The Continuing Global Climate Change and Impact on Wind & Solar Power Projects in Morocco Abdelaziz Ouldbba, Director, International Co-operation & Development, National Meteorological Directorate, Morocco
10.00	Morning Refreshments
10.30	Renewable Energy Projects in Morocco Progresses on Ali Fassi Fihri, Director General, Office National de l'Eau Potable (ONEP), Office National de l'Electricite (ONE), Morocco (invited)
11.00	Update on New Solar Projects in Morocco Mustapha Bakkoury, CEO/Director General, Morocco Agency for Solar Energy (MASEN) (invited)
11.30	The World Bank Group's Financing Renewable Projects in MENA – An Update Silvia Pariente-David, Senior Energy Specialist, The World Bank Joumana Cobein, Country Manager, International Finance Corporation
12.00	Latest Update & Development of the Sahara Wind Power Project Khalid Benhamou, CEO, Sahara Wind Inc., Morocco
12.30	Update on Bahrain's Renewable Energy Projects Fuad Ahmed Al Shaikh, Director, Electricity Production Electricity & Water Authority, Bahrain
1.00	Networking Luncheon
2.00	Meeting Oman's Electricity Needs: The Advent & Development of Renewable Energy Projects in Oman Ahmed Al Mazrouy, General Manager, Mazan Electricity Co., Oman
2.30	Sharjah, UAE: Integrating Renewable Power into UAE's National Grid Easa Ahmed Al-Zarooni, LDC Director, Sharjah Electricity & Water Authority (S.E.W.A), Sharjah, U.A.E
3.00	Wind Power Project Opportunities in Tunisia, Under the New Government Nafaa Baccari, Head, Wind Energy, Direction des Energies Renouvelables, ANME, Tunisia
3.30	Afternoon Refreshments
4.00	Smart Metering & Renewable Energy in Jordan Ahmad Thainat, General Manager, IDECO Electricity Company, Jordan
4.30	The Emerging Role of Smart Grids in the Integration of Renewables: Implication for the MENA Region Dr Frits W Bliiek, Project Manager, KEMA Nederland BV
5.00	Panel Discussion: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Addressing investor concerns about poor or weak investment returns, will the unrest lead to project cancellations or delay in the regions? Renewable energy instruments and support schemes – creating the success factors of tomorrow. Incentives and feed-in tariff to support wind energy development. Identifying barriers/challenges to scaling up wind and solar energy, are essential reforms on track? Achieving energy cooperation & stability in the Mediterranean and Middle East regions. Developing technical and technological co-operation on projects for trans-Mediterranean power links. Promoting an investment-friendly regulatory and institutional framework for viable projects in the Mediterranean Developing partnerships among key technology players, developers, operators and manufacturers to ease market entry and secure consistent supplies and services. Ensuring local/domestic technological advancement and overcoming barriers for technology adoption Hybrid power plants in the Maghreb/Middle East: electricity production from solar panels and natural gas Europe's financial crisis and impact on MENA Discussants: Speakers of the Summit
5.30	End of Summit

Magenta Global Pte Ltd
 Registration No.: 200707851H
 20 Kallang Avenue
 Level 2 Pico Creative Centre
 Singapore 339411
 Tel: (65) 6391 2552
 Fax: (65) 6392 3592

PRINTED MATTER AIR MAIL

COMPLETE & FAX REGISTRATION FORM

TO +65 63923592

4TH ANNUAL

MAGHREB/MIDDLE EAST RENEWABLE ENERGY SUMMIT 2012

WIND • SOLAR

16 - 17 APRIL 2012, HYATT REGENCY CASABLANCA, MOROCCO

REGISTER TODAY!

FEE PER DELEGATE	Priority Fee Register & Pay before 31 January 2012	Early Bird Fee Register & Pay before 28 February 2012	Regular Fee Register & Pay after 28 February 2012
Single Participant	USD1,399	USD1,699	USD1,999

Fees quoted are nett and exclusive of all taxes.

1st delegate

Salutation: Mrs/Ms/Mdm/Mr//Dr

Name:

Position:

E-Mail:

Mobile no.:

Tel:

Fax:

2nd delegate

Salutation: Mrs/Ms/Mdm/Mr//Dr

Name:

Position:

E-Mail:

Mobile no.:

Tel:

Fax:

3rd delegate

Salutation: Mrs/Ms/Mdm/Mr//Dr

Name:

Position:

E-Mail:

Mobile no.:

Tel:

Fax:

4th delegate

Salutation: Mrs/Ms/Mdm/Mr//Dr

Name:

Position:

E-Mail:

Mobile no.:

Tel:

Fax:

Company:

Address:

Country:

Post code:

Name & Title of Training Manager:

Main Business/Activity:

Contact name for payment confirmation (if different from above) :

Tel:

Fax:

E-Mail:

I am paying by:

Bank Transfer

Credit Card:

Card Number:

Security Code:

Name on Card:

Expiry date:

Signature:

(Please provide photocopy of front & back of your Credit Card)

CF067

A B C D E F G H I J K L M N O P Q R S T U V W X Y Z

HOW TO REGISTER

POST the completed form together payment to:

Magenta Global Pte Ltd,
 20 Kallang Avenue, Level 2
 Pico Creative Centre
 Singapore 339411

EMAIL your details to us at:
register@magenta-global.com.sg

TEL: (65) 6391 2552

FAX: (65) 6392 3592

PAYMENT DETAILS

- BANK TRANSFER: Payment by telegraphic transfer must be made payable to Magenta Global Pte Ltd
 Account No: 556-002236-301
 Swift Code: OCBCSGSG
 OCBC Bank, Hougang Mall Branch,
 90 Hougang Avenue 10,
 #01-01/02/03 Hougang Mall, Singapore 538766
 (All bank transfers must be marked clearly with the delegate name and event title. Bank charges are to be deducted from participating company own accounts).

BOOKING CONDITIONS

Full payment must be received prior to the event for entrance to be guaranteed. If payment is not received a personal credit card will be required to allow entry.

A confirmation letter and invoice will be sent to you on receipt of your booking. If you are unable to attend, a substitute delegate is always welcome. If you cancel your place in writing 15 working days before the event, a cancellation fee of 10% shall be applicable. Thereafter cancellations are not refundable.

It may be necessary for reasons beyond the control of the organizers to alter the content, timings or venue. The company will not accept liability for any transport disruption or any claims whatsoever and in such circumstances the normal cancellation restrictions apply.

DATA PROTECTION

The personal information provided by you will be held on a database and may be shared with companies in the Magenta Group. Sometimes your details may be made available to external companies for marketing purposes. If you do not wish your details to be used for this purpose, please email the Database Administrator at enquiry@magenta-global.com.sg

HOTEL INFORMATION

Official Hotel Details:
Hyatt Regency Casablanca
 Place des Nations Unies
 20000, Casablanca, Maroc

Person in charge:

Fatiha Tilioui, Sales Manager

T: +212 5.22.43.12.02

M: +212 (0) 6.60.59.12.02

F: +212 (0) 5.22.43.12.30

Email: fatiha.tilioui@hyatt.com

VISA REQUIREMENTS

Visitors to the Morocco must hold a valid passport. Nationals of most countries are required to obtain visas to enter the country and must be obtained prior to arrival in Morocco. Please check with the respective Morocco Embassy, High Commission, Consulate or travel agent for the latest status.

Invitation letter for travel visa will only be issued after receipt of full payment of fees.

To register, fax registration form to: +(65) 6392 3592, email: register@magenta-global.com.sg or call Hotline: +(65) 6391 2552

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, February 28, 2012 10:31 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: oped to Morocco
Attachments: FINAL_EG_OpEd_RetrospecitveMoroccoUPDATE022812.docx

Rachad,

On occasion I have been asked to provide my thoughts on US-Moroccan relations as it relates to actions by His Majesty.

Attached is an oped I would place in Moroccan newspaper, to correlate with the one year mark since the King's speech and how the US views it. I'd appreciate your review and comment. Thanks

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

DRAFT Op-Ed: The View of the 'Moroccan Spring' from the US

Americans watched the Arab Spring unfold and saw the common aspirations for democracy, freedom, and economic empowerment across North Africa and the Middle East. However, we did not look at the region from a single point of view—to the contrary, the various triggers, reactions, successes, and failures led us to understand the uniqueness of each country involved. Morocco stood out from the very beginning,.

His Majesty King Mohammed VI's historic March 9th speech, calling for a commission to bring together Morocco's political and civil society leaders, trade unions, and youth to propose wide-reaching reforms, quickly caught the United States' attention and the reaction and ensuing support were unequivocal. At the time, Senator John McCain, who had visited Morocco a month before the speech, praised His Majesty's "long-standing commitment to lead Morocco to a future of reform and modernization," and called Morocco a "positive example to governments across the Middle East and North Africa,"—a powerful endorsement at a time when regional unrest was intensifying.

Later that month, Morocco's then Minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, Taieb Fassi Fihri, the highest ranking Arab leader to visit the United States since the Arab Spring began, met with US Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton. She emphasized that Morocco was "well-positioned to lead" in working with the international community to peacefully resolve the crisis in Libya. She further reiterated that the longstanding US policy supporting a peaceful end to the Sahara conflict through autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty "remained constant" and described the Moroccan plan as "serious, realistic, and credible – a potential approach to satisfy the aspirations of the people in the Western Sahara to run their own affairs in peace and dignity."

Just last week, Secretary Clinton reaffirmed the commitment to and continuity of US solidarity and support when she met with Morocco's new Foreign Minister, Saad-Eddine Al-Othmani in Rabat. She made clear, as she has done numerous times during her tenure, that "US policy toward the Western Sahara has remained constant for many years", an autonomy solution under Moroccan sovereignty, and took steps with Minister Othmani to further the strategic dialogue between Morocco and the US.

To further strengthen this long-standing support for a resolution to the Sahara conflict, the US Congress approved, for the first time, the use of US program assistance to Morocco in all "regions and territories administered by Morocco," including the Sahara. These funds will support Morocco's extensive and ongoing programs aimed at building infrastructure, providing training, and improving the lives of all of its citizens, including the Southern Provinces. Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, Chairman of the newly reconstituted Morocco Caucus in the US House of Representatives, applauded Congress' "vital change in U.S. foreign assistance " and called its actions "an acknowledgement of the unprecedented reforms in Morocco and reinforces strong support for a solution based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty."

Americans watched as Moroccans from all segments of society proposed, debated, and articulated the reforms necessary to solidify democratization in Morocco. We took note of a process that was largely peaceful and swift, yet thoughtful and thorough, taking place in a spirit of cooperation and desire for genuine reform demonstrated by the Moroccan people and His Majesty, whose vision for irreversible progress was clear. As Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Chairwoman of the US House Committee on Foreign Affairs, noted, "King Mohammed's proposed constitutional changes are a welcome start in what must be a long-term process to increase democracy and enhance stability in Morocco. [...] If adopted, expanded, and fully implemented, Morocco's reform agenda could serve as an example for the region."

The entire world—not just the United States—closely watched Morocco's November parliamentary election, the first of-its-kind since the Arab Spring. Once again, we were reminded of Morocco's commitment to democracy when the country's political parties united to form a strong governing parliamentary coalition which made the socio-economic and political empowerment of Moroccans its priority for the coming year.

We stood in solidarity with the Moroccan people following the tragedy of the senseless bombing in Jemaa el Fna and were encouraged by Morocco's commitment to prevent these violent actions of a few to derail the commitment of the millions determined to build a stronger, more inclusive Morocco. The US firmly supports Morocco's redoubled efforts to combat AQIM and other terrorist groups who are increasingly intent on destabilizing the region and placing obstacles in the way of progress.

The US continues to follow Morocco's process and progress closely for more many reasons: both countries share a history of more than two centuries of partnership and cooperation, and Morocco is a vital friend in a region grappling with threats to stability, security, and democracy. As Morocco joins the United States on the United Nations Security Council for the next two years, these ties will be more important than ever as both nations partner to tackle the most important international political issues of our time. I am confident that we will not only continue to watch Morocco move forward, but the US will actively work to support our historic friend and partner in peace, progress, and prosperity.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, February 29, 2012 11:20 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Press Release
Attachments: PR_Clinton Reaffirms US Policy on WSahara 28Feb12 FINAL.doc

Importance: High

Rachad,

Please find attached a press release on Hillary's visit to Morocco. I would appreciate your attention and review at your earliest convenience.

We would very much like to send it out by COB today.

Thank you

Ed

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE:

Tuesday, February 28, 2012

Sec. Clinton praises Morocco as leader for peace, democracy in region Reaffirms Moroccan autonomy solution in Western Sahara as 'serious, realistic, credible'

Washington, DC (Feb. 28) – Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, speaking to press in Rabat on Sunday with Moroccan Foreign Minister Saad Dine El Otmani, praised Morocco as a leader on Arab Spring reforms and a key partner for peace in the region. She described Morocco's autonomy initiative to resolve the Western Sahara conflict as "serious, realistic, and credible" and reiterated that US policy "has remained constant." The US policy supporting a solution based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty to end the decades-old dispute has earned the backing of three US Administrations—Bill Clinton, George Bush, and Barack Obama—as well as that of bipartisan majorities in both Houses of Congress.

Clinton noted that Morocco-US relations date back to 1777, when "Morocco was the first nation to recognize America's independence." More than two centuries later, Clinton said, "Morocco once again is leading the way." She praised last summer's Constitutional referendum and the November Parliamentary elections, which "signaled an acceleration of reforms that began under his Majesty King Mohammad VI more than a decade ago." Clinton said Morocco "is a very good model for others who are also seeking to have their own democratic reforms."

"Morocco and the US are bound by strong longstanding relations that keep developing year after year," Foreign Minister El Otmani said, describing Clinton's visit as an opportunity for the two countries to agree on setting up a mechanism for regular political consultation to further reinforce bilateral cooperation. "We also agreed to foster our economic cooperation, raise US investments in the Kingdom and strengthen relations between the two country's businessmen." He said the US and Morocco have signed economic cooperation accords including a Free Trade Agreement in 2006, and are both concerned with preserving stability in the region.

Clinton's visit capped a three-day trip to North Africa that included stops in Algeria and Tunisia, where she met with representatives from Morocco and 70 other nations and international organizations in the "Friends of Syria" coalition. In Rabat, Clinton praised "the important role that Morocco has played" in leading the international effort on Syria, "first within the Arab League and second within the Security Council." Morocco began a two-year term on the UN Security Council in January, and earlier this month presented a UN Security Council resolution on Syria that won broad support from the international community.

"Personally, I was very pleased to see Sec. Clinton once again reiterate strong US support for Morocco's autonomy initiative as a continuing US policy aimed at finally resolving the Western Sahara issue," said Michael Ussery, former US Ambassador to Morocco. "This is now the third time Secretary Clinton has made it clear that US policy views Morocco's initiative as 'serious, credible, and realistic,' and has encouraged an end to the dispute based on a reasonable political compromise that best serves the interests of the people and the region as a whole.

"One can only hope that the third time is a charm and the Polisario finally gets the message to adopt a more flexible, open-minded approach, rather than continue holding fast to unworkable options and repeated threats of war," said Robert M. Holley, Senior Adviser, Moroccan American Center for Policy. "The region has seen enough bloodshed and needs to move forward together in a spirit of compromise."

A ninth round of informal talks is set for March 11-13 in Manhasset, NY, under the auspices of the UN Secretary General's Personal Envoy, Christopher Ross, and aimed at resuming negotiations between Morocco and the Polisario Front, with the participation of Algeria and Mauritania, to end the conflict.

* For Sec. Clinton's remarks at Joint Press Briefing, go to: <http://www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2012/02/184667.htm>

For more on Clinton's trip to Morocco, visit MoroccoOnTheMove.com and follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

###

The Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP) is a non-profit organization whose principal mission is to inform opinion makers, government officials and interested publics in the United States about political and social developments in Morocco and the role being played by the Kingdom of Morocco in broader strategic developments in North Africa, the Mediterranean, and the Middle East. For more, please visit www.moroccanamericanpolicy.org

*This material is distributed by the Moroccan American Center for Policy on behalf of the Government of Morocco.
Additional information is available at the Department of Justice in Washington, DC.*

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, March 01, 2012 12:04 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Re: Fwd: Press Release

Thank you for your time and attention. Ed

----- Original Message -----

From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Wednesday, February 29, 2012 06:23 PM
To: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Subject: Fwd: Press Release

>
> Ed,
>
> I have attached the press release with some changes to make it more concise and informative.
>
> Best,
>
>
> Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, March 02, 2012 2:25 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>
Cc: Robert M. Holley <robertmholley@aol.com>
Subject: CONFIDENTIAL/PLEASE DO NOT SHARE
Attachments: Blank.pdf; Untitled attachment 00059.txt

Attached is a memo to you from Bob and me regarding some ideas on how to implement tactics and activities concerning the House language. We would be happy to discuss these at your convenience. Ed

Memorandum

TO: Ambassador Bouhlal

FROM: Ed Gabriel and Bob Holley

SUBJECT: Implementation of Congressional Language on WS Spending Authorization

Background:

Implementing Congressional language authorizing the spending of USG assistance funding in Western Sahara is probably one of the two or three most important objectives the Washington Team and Rabat should accomplish this year.

Tuesday, Bob chaired a meeting of MACP plus consultants to discuss ideas that could be put in play to achieve this goal. Bob opened the meeting explaining its purpose and welcoming any and all ideas. Only two things were “off the table,” no war and we cannot ask His Majesty to become personally involved. He explained that we were not making any commitments in the meeting and suggested that we could meet again to discuss tactics for moving forward after MACP’s leadership decided which of the ideas they believed should be put in action.

In the following section Bob lists the ideas proposed by meeting participants and in the final section provides his own personal recommendations.

Ideas:

- Letter from leadership of House Appropriations Committee to State and USAID requesting their views on the way forward on the language.
- Agenda item for Clinton Meetings in Rabat
- Appropriations Committee Staffdel to Rabat and WS to fact find, issue statement, produce letter to Obama administration.
- Visit of Sahrawi local elected officials to DC to advance idea in meetings with targeted audiences.
- Advocacy with US groups that would likely benefit (IRI, etc.) to encourage their assistance in persuading State/USAID.
- Moroccan Ambassador meeting with USAID Administrator.
- Combined effort from Embassy and MACP to urge State to conduct a “policy review.”
- Visit of Foreign Minister to DC to meet with Clinton and other targets to advance the idea.
- A MACP meeting with USAID, MEPI and MCC contractors and officials to advance the idea

- New legislation that would require State to spend money in Western Sahara.
- Ambassador to advance idea in all of his upcoming meetings with Administration, Congress, others.
- Moroccan Ministry of Foreign Affairs to advance idea in meetings with Embassy and USAID personnel in Rabat.
- Request Moroccan NGOs to continually raise idea with AmEmbassy Rabat.
- Bring CEO of Southern development Agency to US for meetings with State, USAID, MCC, Congress, private sector, others to advance idea and describe opportunities.
- Another back channel message to Clinton to encourage implementation.
- Find opportunities to interest Sam Kaplan.
- Persuade GOM to allow MACP personnel to directly lobby the Administration to advance the idea.
- Push the idea with media.
- Target getting Peace Corps engaged in WS

Personal Views and Counsel by Bob.

He believes that we need to focus attention heavily on two tracks to accomplish this objective.

The first is to try to get as many senior GOM officials as possible to raise this issue directly with senior level USG officials at State and USAID. A visit from the Foreign Minister, the Director of SDA and elected Sahrawi officials and the Ambassador's meetings with senior USG officials should highlight this as a priority objective for Morocco in its relations with the USG. The higher up the food chain at State we go, the better our chances of success. Expect continued resistance at bureau level across the board at State.

The second track that bears some prospect of success are all of those actions above that would bring continuing pressure from Congress on the Administration to execute the language. As Jordan pointed out at the meeting, it is critical that we reach a determination of whether the Administration plans to do this of their own accord before mid April so that a new effort can be launched at that time to write new legislation to oblige such spending. We think that it is possible that once an effort on obligatory legislation is launched, the Administration may move forward on its own if they assess that we have enough support to enact such legislation in order to have better control over what spending they will and will not commit to. On the Hill track, I think it is critically important that the staffdel to Rabat and WS get there as quickly as possible. This should be our priority action right now, in our view. That trip needs to produce a statement and a letter to State and USAID well before mid April.

Many of the ideas listed above are interesting and potentially useful. We will be happy to discuss each of them with all of you at your convenience.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, March 05, 2012 11:46 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: follow up on confidential memo

Rachad,

I want to make sure I emphasize the confidential nature of the memo sent regarding the brain storming session on how to implement the House language. Rather than give you a final memo with priorities listed, I wanted to give you a “raw” view of how we work in a brainstorm session, so you might appreciate the full range of thinking that goes into our work. I see the next step as a meeting with you , Bob and me to go through the memo and figure out what we think is most important and what is best politically to move forward on. It is my desire to open our process as transparently to you as possible, via such memos and Embassy involvement in our meetings, so we can create the kind of “mutual” transparency and trust between us. I hope we are achieving this objective together. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, March 05, 2012 11:57 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: NEWS Update from AFP, other media on Tindouf Kidnap Victims
Attachments: News Update on Tindouf Kidnap Victims 3-5-12.pdf

FYI – Significant coverage from AFP and other media on the three European aid workers kidnapped by an AQIM splinter group from the Polisario's Tindouf camps Oct. 23. Over the weekend, the al-Qaeda offshoot – which on Saturday also claimed responsibility for a suicide bombing in Tamanrasset, southern Algeria -- announced it was demanding $37 million in ransom to release the Tindouf kidnap victims. Meanwhile, Italian press has reported that one of the victims – Italian aid worker Rossella Urru has been released in Mali.

Below and attached are stories from:

- News24 (from AFP), "Spanish hostages in Mali, Somalia 'are well'"
- The London Telegraph (from AFP), "Terror group demands $37m ransom"
- Magharebia, "Mali terrorists free Mauritanian gendarme, Italian woman"
- AFP, "Islamists want 30 mln euros to free Western hostages: source"
- Morocco World News, "Italian Aid Worker Kidnapped in Tindouf Believed to Be Set Free"
- AFP, "Al-Qaeda offshoot claims Algeria attack" Monday, March 5, 2012

Spanish hostages in Mali, Somalia 'are well'

Madrid - Spanish Foreign Minister Jose Manuel Garcia-Margallo on Monday said that two Spaniards held hostage in Mali and two others in Somalia are in good shape.

"In Somalia, they guaranteed to me that everything is fine. In Mali, it was the president of the republic [Amadou Toumani Toure] who gave me an assurance," Garcia-Margallo told the Cadena Cope radio station. "They are well."

"We haven't ceased for a single day to work for the release of the two aid workers whom we have in Mali and the two aid workers whom we have in Somalia," the minister added.

"We are in permanent contact, but this subject must be treated with total discretion."

Garcia-Margallo declined to give details of a trip he made to Mali at the end of last week in order to gather details on the hostage issue.

Two Spanish aid workers, a man and a woman, as well as an Italian woman, were kidnapped on October 23 2011 in the Tindouf region of southwestern Algeria, which is a stronghold of the Polisario Front independence movement in the neighbouring Moroccan-occupied Western Sahara.

The kidnappings were initially attributed by Polisario to al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (Aqim), which has been highly active in Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania since 2007, including taking hostages.

However, responsibility for the Tindouf kidnappings was in December claimed by a hitherto unknown armed group, the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa (Jamat Tawhid Wal Jihad Fi Garbi Afriqqiya).

The movement has made a ransom demand of $39.5m to release its three hostages, according to a source close to the mediators in Mali.

The two Spanish aid workers held in Somalia, both women, were abducted on October 13 2011, in Dadaab, the world's largest complex of refugee camps in eastern Kenya. The women, who work for Medecins sans frontieres (MSF - Doctors Without Borders), were taken across the border to Somalia by their kidnapers.

<http://www.dailytelegraph.com.au/al-qaida-offshoot-in-algeria-blast/story-fn6e1m7z-1226288349730>

theTelegraph (from AFP)

Sunday, March 04, 2012

Terror group demands $37m ransom

Ransom demand: A videograb shows an al-Qaida splinter group with European hostages kidnapped in Algeria. The terrorists want 30 million euros to free three aid workers. Picture: AFP/Serge Daniel Source: AFP

AN AL-Qaida splinter group wants 30 million euros ($37 million) to free three kidnapped European aid workers.

"The Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa is demanding 30 million euros to free two Spanish nationals and the Italian woman," a source close to the mediators said yesterday. "Their respective countries know about this."

The kidnapping was staged in Tindouf, western Algeria, in a refugee camp run by the Polisario Front which seeks Western Sahara's independence from Morocco. The Front initially blamed the kidnapping on Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM).

On December 12, a video showing armed men flanking two women - one Spanish and the other Italian - and a Spanish man was made public by the Movement for Oneness and Jihad In West Africa (Jamat Tawhid Wal Jihad Fi Garbi Afriqqiya). Security sources said it had broken off from the main group AQIM in order to spread jihad to west Africa and not confine themselves just to the Maghreb or Sahel regions.

The group also released another video showing six dark-skinned, turbaned men speaking of their ideological references, including al-Qaida founder Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Omar but putting more emphasis on historical figures of west African Islam.

Also yesterday, the group claimed responsibility for a suicide attack on a police base in southern Algeria which left 23 people wounded according to the paramilitary gendarmerie. One of them was in serious condition. "We inform you that we are behind the explosion that occurred this morning at Tamanrasset," said a message sent to AFP and signed by the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa.

The national APS news agency quoted the gendarmerie as saying that 15 gendarmes, five members of the civil protection organisation and three passers-by were taken to hospital. One gendarme was in critical condition, the report said. The gendarmerie said "a terrorist" driving a Toyota 4x4 targeted the main entrance of the base in Tamanrasset, 1,970 kilometres south of Algiers at 7.45 am local time yesterday.

The website of the Algerian Arabic-language daily En Nahar said the bomber was blown apart in the blast, which also caused major damage to the building. It was the first time such an attack had been reported in the area. The Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa (Jammat Tawhid Wal Jihad Fi Garbi Afriqqiya) surfaced in December, when it claimed to be holding three Westerners kidnapped from a Western Sahara refugee camp in Algeria in October.

Security sources said it had broken off from the main group, al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), in order to spread jihad to west Africa and not confine themselves just to the Maghreb or Sahel regions.

The group released a video of the abducted aid workers and another showing six dark-skinned, turbaned men speaking of their ideological references, including al-Qaida founder Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Omar but putting more emphasis on historical figures of west African Islam. Also in December, Mali and Algeria agreed to step up coordination in efforts to root out al-Qaida-linked groups in the region.

Al-Qaida-linked groups have been active in Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania for a decade but their activity has picked up since the fall of Muammar Gaddafi scattered the slain Libyan strongman's arsenal across the region. In April 2010, the four countries formed a Committee of Joint Chiefs (CEMOC), based in Tamanrasset, to coordinate their military efforts against AQIM.

http://www.magharebia.com/cocoon/awi/xhtml1/en_GB/features/awi/newsbriefs/general/2012/03/04/newsbrief-02

Magharebia

Sunday, March 4, 2012

Mali terrorists free Mauritanian gendarme, Italian woman

Kidnapped Mauritanian gendarme Ely Ould Mokhtar and Italian aid worker Rossella Urru were freed Friday (March 2nd) in Mali, ANI reported.

Al-Qaeda splinter group Jammat Tawhid Wal Jihad Fi Garbi Afriqqiya (Movement for Unity and Jihad in West Africa, or MUJAO) reportedly released the hostages in exchange for jailed Malian AQIM member Abderrahmane Ould Amadou Al-Azawadi.

The 29-year-old female al-Qaeda hostage was one of three Tindouf aid workers kidnapped last October. Ould Mokhtar was abducted last December during an attack on his police barracks in the eastern Mauritanian city of Adel Bagrou, near the Malian border.

The MUJAO has demanded 30 million euros for the release of the two remaining Western hostages, a source close to mediators told AFP on Saturday.

http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5gqjQRzRb1uZYKF95WgKXCAAASb_w?docId=CNG.d83c32f75f830dc8a0e74514cc86b975.491

AFP

Saturday, March 03, 2012

Islamists want 30 mln euros to free Western hostages:

source

Polisario Front soldiers guard the Presidential palace in 2011 by the Rabuni refugee camp (AFP/File, Dominique Faget)

GAO, Mali — An Al-Qaeda splinter group wants 30 million euros ($39 million) to free three European aid workers kidnapped in Algeria in October, a Malian source close to the mediators said on Saturday.

"The Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa is demanding 30 million euros to free two Spanish nationals and the Italian woman," the source said.

The kidnapping of two Spanish nationals and an Italian woman was staged in Tindouf, western Algeria, in a refugee camp run by the Polisario Front which seeks Western Sahara's independence from Morocco. The Front had initially blamed the kidnapping on Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb.

But on December 12, a video showing armed men flanking two women -- one Spanish and the other Italian -- and a Spanish man was made public by the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa. The splinter group is lead by Malians and Mauritians, according to experts.

Spanish Foreign Minister Jose Manuel Garcia-Margallo was on Saturday returning from the Malian capital Bamako after talks with Malian President Amadou Toumani Toure and other officials about the hostage issue, his office said. Security sources say the Movement for Oneness had broken off from Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb in order to spread jihad to west Africa and not confine themselves to the north African Maghreb or Sahel regions.

The group also released another video showing six dark-skinned, turban-wearing men speaking of their ideological references, including Al-Qaeda founder Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Omar but putting more emphasis on historical figures of west African Islam.

The group on Saturday claimed responsibility for a suicide attack on a police base in southern Algeria which left 23 people wounded according to the paramilitary gendarmerie. One of them was in serious condition.

<http://moroccoworldnews.com/2012/03/italian-aid-worker-kidnapped-in-tindouf-believed-to-be-set-free/29879>

Saturday, March 3rd, 2012

Italian Aid Worker Kidnapped in Tindouf Believed to Be Set Free

Morocco World News, Rabat, March 3, 2012 -- According to the Italian daily newspaper the Republica, Italian aid worker Rossella Urru, who was abducted last October along with two Spanish humanitarian workers has been freed on Saturday.

According to the Italian newspaper, Rossella Urru was released in exchange for the release of Abderrahmane Ould Amadou al-Azawad, an AQIM militiaman. The hostage exchange also involved the release of Mauritanian gendarme, Ely Ould Mokhtar, kidnapped on December 20 close to the border with Mali.

Three European nationals, two Spaniards and one Italian, were abducted last October in the camp of Rabouni near the southwestern Algerian city of Tindouf.

The abduction took place at midnight on October 22, when the aid workers in Rabouni in the Sahrawi camps in southwestern Algeria, were resting. In the struggle with the kidnapers, Gonyalons was slightly injured and one of the guards of the camp was shot. Ainhoa Fernandez is a member of the Extremadura-based Association of Friends of the Saharawi people, while Gonyalons works for the Basque-based NGO Mundubat Basque. For its part, the Italian Rosella Urru works in the Italian Cooperation Committee for the Liberation of Peoples and had started working in the refugee camps three years ago.

The kidnapping was assisted by elements of the Polisario Front as a mediator confessed to AFP. AQIM fighters who went to the Polisario refugee camps to participate in the kidnapping operation were not armed. "They had accomplices in the camps, members and sympathizers AQIM, who provided the weapons and proceeded to identify the hostages for his capture," AFP added.

According to Western intelligence elements, Mokhtar Belmokhtar, emir of AQIM, who was also behind the kidnapping of three Spanish aid workers in northern Mauritania in late 2009, is believed to be the mastermind of the kidnapping.

The two individuals from Tindouf, Mamina Laaguir Abdelaziz Ahmed Baba, 29, and Aghdafna Mohamed Hamadi Ahmed Baba, 32 are believed to have been directly involved in the kidnapping of two Spaniards and one Italian, who were working for NGO's that provide humanitarian aid to the population living in the camps.

<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5itMNtgXq2Fzt3u7e0pVNPcFr3Dcg?docId=CNG.02723b6732025f27b3266c9616104121.341>

AFP

Saturday, March 03, 2012

Al-Qaeda offshoot claims Algeria attack

GAO, Mali — An Al-Qaeda splinter group claimed Saturday to have carried out a suicide attack on a police base in southern Algeria which left 23 people wounded according to the paramilitary gendarmerie.

"We inform you that we are behind the explosion that occurred this morning at Tamanrasset," a message sent to AFP and signed by the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa said.

The national APS news agency quoted the gendarmerie as saying that 15 gendarmes, five members of the civil protection organisation and three passers-by were taken to hospital.

One gendarme was in critical condition, the report said.

The gendarmerie said "a terrorist" driving a Toyota 4x4 targeted the main entrance of the base in Tamanrasset, 1,970 kilometres (1,220 miles) south of Algiers at 7:45 am (0645 GMT) Saturday.

The website of the Algerian Arabic-language daily En Nahar said the bomber was blown apart in the blast, which also caused major damage to the building.

It was the first time such an attack had been reported in the area.

The Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa (Jamiat Tawhid Wal Jihad Fi Garbi Afriqqiya) surfaced in December, when it claimed to be holding three Westerners kidnapped from a Western Sahara refugee camp in Algeria in October.

Security sources said it had broken off from the main group, Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), in order to spread jihad to west Africa and not confine themselves just to the Maghreb or Sahel regions.

The group released a video of the abducted aid workers and another showing six dark-skinned, turbaned men speaking of their ideological references, including Al-Qaeda founder Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Omar but putting more emphasis on historical figures of west African Islam.

Also in December, Mali and Algeria agreed to step up coordination in efforts to root out Al-Qaeda-linked groups in the region.

Al-Qaeda-linked groups have been active in Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania for a decade but their activity has picked up since the fall of Moamer Kadhafi scattered the slain Libyan strongman's arsenal across the region.

In April 2010, the four countries formed a Committee of Joint Chiefs (CEMOC), based in Tamanrasset, a garrison town near the border with Mali and Niger, to coordinate their military efforts against AQIM.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

news24 (from AFP)

Monday, March 5, 2012

Spanish hostages in Mali, Somalia 'are well'

Madrid - Spanish Foreign Minister Jose Manuel Garcia-Margallo on Monday said that two Spaniards held hostage in Mali and two others in Somalia are in good shape.

"In Somalia, they guaranteed to me that everything is fine. In Mali, it was the president of the republic [Amadou Toumani Toure] who gave me an assurance," Garcia-Margallo told the Cadena Cope radio station. "They are well."

"We haven't ceased for a single day to work for the release of the two aid workers whom we have in Mali and the two aid workers whom we have in Somalia," the minister added.

"We are in permanent contact, but this subject must be treated with total discretion."

Garcia-Margallo declined to give details of a trip he made to Mali at the end of last week in order to gather details on the hostage issue.

Two Spanish aid workers, a man and a woman, as well as an Italian woman, were kidnapped on October 23 2011 in the Tindouf region of southwestern Algeria, which is a stronghold of the Polisario Front independence movement in the neighbouring Moroccan-occupied Western Sahara.

The kidnappings were initially attributed by Polisario to al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (Aqim), which has been highly active in Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania since 2007, including taking hostages.

However, responsibility for the Tindouf kidnappings was in December claimed by a hitherto unknown armed group, the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa (Jamat Tawhid Wal Jihad Fi Garbi Afriqqiya).

The movement has made a ransom demand of $39.5m to release its three hostages, according to a source close to the mediators in Mali.

The two Spanish aid workers held in Somalia, both women, were abducted on October 13 2011, in Dadaab, the world's largest complex of refugee camps in eastern Kenya. The women, who work for Medecins sans frontieres (MSF - Doctors Without Borders), were taken across the border to Somalia by their kidnappers.

theTelegraph (from AFP)

Sunday, March 04, 2012

Terror group demands $37m ransom

Ransom demand: A videograb shows an al-Qaida splinter group with European hostages kidnapped in Algeria. The terrorists want 30 million euros to free three aid workers.

Picture: AFP/Serge Daniel Source: AFP

AN AL-Qaida splinter group wants 30 million euros ($37 million) to free three kidnapped European aid workers. "The Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa is demanding 30 million euros to free two Spanish nationals and the Italian woman," a source close to the mediators said yesterday. "Their respective countries know about this."

The kidnapping was staged in Tindouf, western Algeria, in a refugee camp run by the Polisario Front which seeks Western Sahara's independence from Morocco. The Front initially blamed the kidnapping on Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM).

On December 12, a video showing armed men flanking two women - one Spanish and the other Italian - and a Spanish man was made public by the Movement for Oneness and Jihad In West Africa (Jamat Tawhid Wal Jihad Fi Garbi Afriqqiya). Security sources said it had broken off from the main group AQIM in order to spread jihad to west Africa and not confine themselves just to the Maghreb or Sahel regions.

The group also released another video showing six dark-skinned, turbaned men speaking of their ideological references, including al-Qaida founder Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Omar but putting more emphasis on historical figures of west African Islam.

Also yesterday, the group claimed responsibility for a suicide attack on a police base in southern Algeria which left 23 people wounded according to the paramilitary gendarmerie. One of them was in serious condition. "We inform you that we are behind the explosion that occurred this morning at Tamanrasset," said a message sent to AFP and signed by the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa.

The national APS news agency quoted the gendarmerie as saying that 15 gendarmes, five members of the civil protection organisation and three passers-by were taken to hospital. One gendarme was in critical condition, the report said. The gendarmerie said "a terrorist" driving a Toyota 4x4 targeted the main entrance of the base in Tamanrasset, 1,970 kilometres south of Algiers at 7.45 am local time yesterday.

The website of the Algerian Arabic-language daily En Nahar said the bomber was blown apart in the blast, which also caused major damage to the building. It was the first time such an attack had been reported in the area. The Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa (Jamat Tawhid Wal Jihad Fi Garbi Afriqqiya) surfaced in December, when it claimed to be holding three Westerners kidnapped from a Western Sahara refugee camp in Algeria in October.

Security sources said it had broken off from the main group, al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), in order to spread jihad to west Africa and not confine themselves just to the Maghreb or Sahel regions.

The group released a video of the abducted aid workers and another showing six dark-skinned, turbaned men speaking of their ideological references, including al-Qaida founder Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Omar but putting more emphasis on historical figures of west African Islam. Also in December, Mali and Algeria agreed to step up coordination in efforts to root out al-Qaida-linked groups in the region.

Al-Qaida-linked groups have been active in Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania for a decade but their activity has picked up since the fall of Muammar Gaddafi scattered the slain Libyan strongman's arsenal across the region. In April 2010, the four countries formed a Committee of Joint Chiefs (CEMOC), based in Tamanrasset, to coordinate their military efforts against AQIM.

Sunday, March 4, 2012

Mali terrorists free Mauritanian gendarme, Italian woman

Kidnapped Mauritanian gendarme Ely Ould Mokhtar and Italian aid worker Rossella Urru were freed Friday (March 2nd) in Mali, ANI reported.

Al-Qaeda splinter group Jamāt Tawhīd Wal Jihād Fi Garbi Afriqqiya (Movement for Unity and Jihad in West Africa, or MUJAO) reportedly released the hostages in exchange for jailed Malian AQIM member Abderrahmane Ould Amadou Al-Azawadi.

The 29-year-old female al-Qaeda hostage was one of three Tindouf aid workers kidnapped last October. Ould Mokhtar was abducted last December during an attack on his police barracks in the eastern Mauritanian city of Adel Bagrou, near the Malian border.

The MUJAO has demanded 30 million euros for the release of the two remaining Western hostages, a source close to mediators told AFP on Saturday.

http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5gqjQRzRb1uZYKF95WgKXCAAASb_w?docId=CNG.d83c32f75f830dc8a0e74514cc86b975.491

AFP

Saturday, March 03, 2012

Islamists want 30 mln euros to free Western hostages: source

Polisario Front soldiers guard the Presidential palace in 2011 by the Rabuni refugee camp (AFP/File, Dominique Faget)

GAO, Mali — An Al-Qaeda splinter group wants 30 million euros ($39 million) to free three European aid workers kidnapped in Algeria in October, a Malian source close to the mediators said on Saturday.

"The Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa is demanding 30 million euros to free two Spanish nationals and the Italian woman," the source said.

The kidnapping of two Spanish nationals and an Italian woman was staged in Tindouf, western Algeria, in a refugee camp run by the Polisario Front which seeks Western Sahara's independence from Morocco. The Front had initially blamed the kidnapping on Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb.

But on December 12, a video showing armed men flanking two women -- one Spanish and the other Italian -- and a Spanish man was made public by the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa. The splinter group is led by Malians and Mauritians, according to experts.

Spanish Foreign Minister Jose Manuel Garcia-Margallo was on Saturday returning from the Malian capital Bamako after talks with Malian President Amadou Toumani Toure and other officials about the hostage issue, his office said. Security sources say the Movement for Oneness had broken off from Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb in order to spread jihad to west Africa and not confine themselves to the north African Maghreb or Sahel regions.

The group also released another video showing six dark-skinned, turban-wearing men speaking of their ideological references, including Al-Qaeda founder Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Omar but putting more emphasis on historical figures of west African Islam.

The group on Saturday claimed responsibility for a suicide attack on a police base in southern Algeria which left 23 people wounded according to the paramilitary gendarmerie. One of them was in serious condition.

Saturday, March 3rd, 2012

Italian Aid Worker Kidnapped in Tindouf Believed to Be Set Free

Morocco World News, Rabat, March 3, 2012 -- According to the Italian daily newspaper the Repubblica, Italian aid worker Rossella Urru, who was abducted last October along with two Spanish humanitarian workers has been freed on Saturday.

According to the Italian newspaper, Rossella Urru was released in exchange for the release of Abderrahmane Ould Amadou al-Azawad, an AQIM militiaman. The hostage exchange also involved the release of Mauritanian gendarme, Ely Ould Mokhtar, kidnapped on December 20 close to the border with Mali.

Three European nationals, two Spaniards and one Italian, were abducted last October in the camp of Rabouni near the southwestern Algerian city of Tindouf.

The abduction took place at midnight on October 22, when the aid workers in Rabouni in the Sahrawi camps in southwestern Algeria, were resting. In the struggle with the kidnapers, Gonyalons was slightly injured and one of the guards of the camp was shot. Ainhoa Fernandez is a member of the Extremadura-based Association of Friends of the Saharawi people, while Gonyalons works for the Basque-based NGO Mundubat Basque. For its part, the Italian Rosella Urru works in the Italian Cooperation Committee for the Liberation of Peoples and had started working in the refugee camps three years ago.

The kidnapping was assisted by elements of the Polisario Front as a mediator confessed to AFP. AQIM fighters who went to the Polisario refugee camps to participate in the kidnapping operation were not armed. “They had accomplices in the camps, members and sympathizers AQIM, who provided the weapons and proceeded to identify the hostages for his capture,” AFP added.

According to Western intelligence elements, Mokhtar Belmokhtar, emir of AQIM, who was also behind the kidnapping of three Spanish aid workers in northern Mauritania in late 2009, is believed to be the mastermind of the kidnapping.

The two individuals from Tindouf, Mamina Laaguir Abdelaziz Ahmed Baba, 29, and Aghdafna Mohamed Hamadi Ahmed Baba, 32 are believed to have been directly involved in the kidnapping of two Spaniards and one Italian, who were working for NGO’s that provide humanitarian aid to the population living in the camps.

Saturday, March 03, 2012

Al-Qaeda offshoot claims Algeria attack

GAO, Mali — An Al-Qaeda splinter group claimed Saturday to have carried out a suicide attack on a police base in southern Algeria which left 23 people wounded according to the paramilitary gendarmerie.

"We inform you that we are behind the explosion that occurred this morning at Tamanrasset," a message sent to AFP and signed by the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa said.

The national APS news agency quoted the gendarmerie as saying that 15 gendarmes, five members of the civil protection organisation and three passers-by were taken to hospital.

One gendarme was in critical condition, the report said.

The gendarmerie said "a terrorist" driving a Toyota 4x4 targeted the main entrance of the base in Tamanrasset, 1,970 kilometres (1,220 miles) south of Algiers at 7:45 am (0645 GMT) Saturday.

The website of the Algerian Arabic-language daily En Nahar said the bomber was blown apart in the blast, which also caused major damage to the building.

It was the first time such an attack had been reported in the area.

The Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa (Jamat Tawhid Wal Jihad Fi Garbi Afriqqiya) surfaced in December, when it claimed to be holding three Westerners kidnapped from a Western Sahara refugee camp in Algeria in October.

Security sources said it had broken off from the main group, Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), in order to spread jihad to west Africa and not confine themselves just to the Maghreb or Sahel regions.

The group released a video of the abducted aid workers and another showing six dark-skinned, turbaned men speaking of their ideological references, including Al-Qaeda founder Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Omar but putting more emphasis on historical figures of west African Islam.

Also in December, Mali and Algeria agreed to step up coordination in efforts to root out Al-Qaeda-linked groups in the region.

Al-Qaeda-linked groups have been active in Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania for a decade but their activity has picked up since the fall of Moamer Kadhafi scattered the slain Libyan strongman's arsenal across the region.

In April 2010, the four countries formed a Committee of Joint Chiefs (CEMOC), based in Tamanrasset, a garrison town near the border with Mali and Niger, to coordinate their military efforts against AQIM.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 06, 2012 10:22 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Donald Payne died

Rachad,

I suppose you have heard by now that Congressman Donald Payne passed away, after a battle with cancer. He was respected as a great champion of American liberal ideas. You may also recall he was the number one worst friend of Morocco on the Hill and try to cause some trouble for us over the years. We are very involved with the candidate that is likely to replace him in New Jersey, who is now running to take Congressman Payne's position.

More importantly, the next in line to get a ranking member spot is Albio Sires (D-NJ). Albio is a Cuban-American and has signed all of our pro-Moroccan letters. We'll see how it plays out as a current ranking member may decide to transfer subcommittees and take this assignment. If that happens, Rep. Meeks (D-NY) is the most likely candidate.

In any case, every person eligible for the position is a public supporter of Morocco and the Autonomy/Sovereignty solution.

We have also met with Rep. Payne's most likely successor 3 times since December and he will be great on our issue.

Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 06, 2012 10:37 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Our suggestion for memo to the Ambassador concerning the tourism conference
Attachments: MENA Tourism and Development Sponsorship Benefits.doc

Rachad

I am pleased to see that the Moroccan Minister of Tourism will be giving a major address at the Middle East and North Africa Tourism and Development Inaugural Conference April 2-3 at the US Chamber of Commerce here in Washington. This event, as you well know, will be attended by very high level officials of the USG and its agencies.

A number of NGO/trade associations from North Africa will be sponsors of this event and we would like to be able to support Morocco's participation in any way that we can. If we can help in any way with sponsorship we stand ready. I have attached the package for your information.

Matic is invited to the seminar and will attend. Please let us know how we can be of further assistance at this important event marketing Morocco in the US, and in particular, if you would like us to support the conference through Matic sponsorship. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

MIDDLE EAST AND NORTH AFRICA
TOURISM AND DEVELOPMENT INITIATIVE
U.S. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Sponsor Benefits

PLATINUM SPONSOR ($25,000)

- Chair of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce MENA Tourism and Development Initiative
- VIP Dinner with five ministers of tourism (Invitation only for around 15 people on Sunday, April 1)
- Three complimentary tickets to VIP Dinner
- Company representative provides brief introductory remarks at VIP dinner
- Ten complimentary conference registrations
- Full-page color ad in event program with premier placement
- Priority seating for lunch at table with minister of your choice
- Recognition in event title on all promotion and event materials, signage & website

GOLD SPONSOR ($15,000)

- Leading member of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce MENA Tourism and Development Initiative
- Event branding choices:
 - Launch Reception of Tourism Initiative (Monday, April 2)
 - Keynote Lunch (Monday, April 2)
 - Keynote Lunch (Tuesday April 3)
- Company representative provides brief introductory remarks at chosen event
- One complimentary ticket to VIP Dinner
- Five complimentary registrations to the conference
- Half-page color ad in event program with priority placement
- Priority seating for lunch at table with minister of your choice
- Recognition on all promotion and event materials, signage & website

SILVER SPONSOR ($5,000)

- Participation in MENA Tourism and Development Initiative Development Initiative
- Marketing of company and priority seating for lunch with minister of your choice
- Company representative provides brief introductory remarks at chosen luncheon
- Two complimentary conference registrations
- Quarter- page color ad in event program with priority placement
- Recognition on all promotion and event materials, signage & website

For information please contact:

Kyle Newell
U.S. Chamber of Commerce
knewell@uschamber.com
1-202-525-7648 (Cell)

Custom sponsor packages are also available!

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 06, 2012 11:43 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Strategy Page on Polisario links to AQIM, drug traffickers in Sahel, & Latin American Herald Tribune on Tindouf kidnap victims
Attachments: Strategy Page on Polisario links to AQIM & LatAmTribune on Tindouf Kidnap Victims 3-6-12 .pdf

FYI – In today's news, a column on StrategyPage.com (respected defense/military online news portal), "Terrorists Terrorizing Other Terrorists," which details Polisario member involvement in the expanding terrorist and trafficking networks across Africa's Sahel.

Also, a story today in the Latin American Herald Tribune, from the Spanish news agency EFE, with an update from Spanish Foreign Minister Jose Manuel Garcia-Margallo on the Tindouf kidnap victims and two other Spanish nationals abducted.

<http://www.strategypage.com/html/htterr/articles/20120306.aspx>

STRATEGY PAGE.COM

Tuesday, March 6, 2012

Counter-Terrorism:

Terrorists Terrorizing Other Terrorists

American intelligence agencies fear the three largest Islamic terror organizations in Africa (al Qaeda, al Shabaab and Boko Haram) are trying to arrange an alliance, to pool capabilities and coordinate operations. There's no evidence of that, but there's no doubt that the three groups know of each other and some members in each organization have been in touch with the others. Meanwhile, each of these groups is quite different, with unique origins, goals and situations. A meaningful coalition of these groups is unlikely.

The oldest of these groups began forming a decade ago when several Islamic radical groups in Algeria, defeated in a 1990s rebellion, fled south and reformed. These men became the local al Qaeda franchise, calling themselves as Al Qaeda in the Maghreb (North Africa), or AQIM. This effort included forming new chapters south of Algeria, among tribal rebels and disaffected urbanites in Niger, Mali, Chad and Mauritania. This was more PR than reality at first. There were already some Islamic terrorists in the region, and these pronouncements appeared to be an attempt to unify pro-Islamic terrorist elements via the Internet and the mass media. So far, the many disaffected groups in the region have shown little interest in uniting, especially under the leadership of al Qaeda. Too many different objectives and al Qaeda has a reputation for being a loser. But the terrorists have extracted over a $100 million in ransoms from kidnapping Western visitors, and millions more by working for drug smugglers. This has enabled the group to expand from less than a hundred paid staff, to over 300. The money went to bribing local officials and tribal leaders, as well as buying vehicles, weapons, satellite phones and much more.

Last year this also led to the formation of a more radical splinter group; MOJWA (Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa). The appearance of MOJWA presented the possibility of a war among Islamic radical groups. MOJWAs, for example, recruited from an even older rebel group; Polisario and that caused some problems. This may have something to do with the declining prospects of Polisario, which has been in bad shape since 1991. Back then,

Morocco finally won its war with Polisario Front rebels, who were seeking independence for the Western Sahara (a region south of Morocco). Polisario remained powerful in Mauritania, where the rebel group has official recognition and maintains several more refugee camps. Because Polisario was so well-subsidized by Algeria, back when Algeria was a radical state, Polisario still had enough diehards out there to keep a lot of people in Western Sahara unhappy. Polisario was known to provide recruits and sanctuary for al Qaeda and other Islamic radicals. For two decades, the UN has been trying to work out a final peace deal between Polisario and Morocco. In the 1990s Algeria cut off all support for Polisario. But that, and UN efforts to mediate the differences, have just not worked. The contested area is largely desert with a population of less than 300,000. Logic would have it that the area is better off as a part of Morocco. But there are still thousands of locals who would prefer to fight for independence rather than submit to Morocco. Some resistance is tribal and cultural, with the Moroccans seen as another bunch of alien invaders (the area was administered, until 1976, as a Spanish colony). If the fighting breaks out again, possibly inspired by Islamic radicals, it could go on for years, just as it does in many other parts of Africa and the immediate neighborhood.

Getting involved in cocaine smuggling provides money, some of which goes towards buying guns and vehicles, making the Polisario fighters more formidable. Mali and Mauritanian police are increasingly arresting members of the Polisario Front who are involved with a major drug smuggling operation (moving cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America, to the Mediterranean coast). Polisario Front members have long been involved in smuggling and other illegal activities but their involvement in moving cocaine is relatively recent. This implies cooperation with al Qaeda, which apparently has worked out deals with Polisario. AQIM is a major player in the drug smuggling network that brings South American cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America, to the Mediterranean coast. But all that money, and radical groups with different agendas, could lead to terrorists terrorizing other terrorists.

In Somalia al Shabaab recently announced a merger with al Qaeda. This was more PR than fact, because al Shabaab like all previous Islamic radical groups in Somalia is suffering defeat and splintering. Six years ago al Shabaab itself was the result of the Islamic Courts Union (ICU) moderates (ARS, or Alliance for the Re-liberation of Somalia) splitting away and joining an attempt to form a new government in Somalia. The radicals in the ICU left and formed al Shabaab. Other remnants of the ICU fled to Eritrea or formed smaller radical groups (which were later destroyed by, or absorbed into, al Shabaab.) The ICU itself goes back to the 1990s, when religious leaders formed militias in an attempt to reduce the banditry and feuding rampant in the country. The ARS wanted to keep Islamic terrorists out of the country, in return for more foreign aid. Al Shabaab offered to shelter al Qaeda and help establish a worldwide Islamic government. Somalia became a base for many al Qaeda members chased out of Pakistan and Arabia, although many of those have since fled to Yemen to escape the many peacekeepers and local militias pressing in on al Shabaab.

Boko Haram formed in the Moslem north of Nigeria about five years ago. Modeling themselves on the Taliban, Boko Haram became larger, and more violent, because of popular anger at rampant corruption and mismanagement in Nigeria. Some Boko Haram leaders were spotted in Somalia several years ago, and others are known to have been in contact with al Qaeda members from West Africa. But for the moment Boko Haram is intent on turning Nigeria (which is half Christian) into an Islamic dictatorship.

The three Islamic terror organizations described here cover a vast area (from the Atlantic Ocean coast of West Africa to the Indian Ocean coast of East Africa) as well as numerous very different cultures. While involved are Islamic radicals, only AQIM is Arab (or at least most of them) while Boko Haram and Somalis are black Africans (generally despised by Arabs). Moreover, the Somalis consider themselves Arabs, which creates even more tension.

LATIN AMERICAN
Herald Tribune

Tuesday, March 6, 2012

Kidnapped Aid Workers in Good Condition, Spanish Government Says

MADRID (EFE) – The four Spanish aid workers kidnapped in Tindouf and Somalia “are doing fine” and the government has been working every day to win their release, Foreign Minister Jose Manuel Garcia-Margallo said Monday. The foreign minister discussed the situation in the wake of his visit over the weekend to Mali to try to speed the release of the two aid workers abducted last October from a Saharawi refugee camp in western Algeria.

The matter is sensitive and not much can be said in public because “lives are at stake,” Garcia-Margallo told Cope radio. The foreign minister said he had spoken with his European Union and Arab counterparts, and attended the Conference on Somalia in London in an effort to win the hostages’ release. Mali’s foreign minister is expected to visit Spain “very soon,” Garcia-Margallo said.

Italian media reported that Rosella Urru, an aid worker from Italy who was kidnapped from the refugee camp outside Tindouf with Spaniards Ainhoa Fernandez and Enric Gonyalons, had been released. Garcia-Margallo said Feb. 15 in Algeria that the Spanish government had received “proof” that the two Spanish aid workers kidnapped in Tindouf and the two others abducted near the Kenya-Somalia border were alive.

Blanca Thiebaut and Montserrat Serra, two Spanish citizens working with Doctors Without Borders at a Somali refugee camp in the eastern Kenyan town of Dadaab, were kidnapped at gunpoint on Oct. 13. No group has claimed responsibility for the abduction, but Kenyan officials said they suspected Somalia’s Al Shabaab Islamic militia, which has links to Al Qaeda. Ainhoa Fernandez and Enric Gonyalons were kidnapped 10 days after the incident in Kenya.

Fernandez de Rincon, Gonyalons and Urru were taken away by a group of armed men from the facility near Tindouf where foreign aid workers are lodged. The government of the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic – the Polisario Front’s name for the former Spanish colony of Western Sahara – arrested several people in connection with the kidnapping and said the captives were taken to a mountainous area on the Mali-Niger border.

A video sent by the captors shows Gonyalons, Rincon and Urru at an unidentified spot in the desert.

Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb is suspected of having staged the kidnapping. The terrorist group has carried out a number of kidnappings in southern Algeria, Mali and Mauritania, but it had never abducted anyone in the Saharawi refugee camps controlled by the Polisario Front.

The SADR is the name given the Western Sahara by the Algerian-backed Polisario Front, which launched a war for independence against Morocco in 1975 after the North African kingdom annexed the territory on the withdrawal of Spanish forces. The native Saharawis, led by the Polisario Front, have spent decades resisting Morocco’s annexation of the Western Sahara, a former Spanish colony.

Tuesday, March 6, 2012

Counter-Terrorism:

Terrorists Terrorizing Other Terrorists

American intelligence agencies fear the three largest Islamic terror organizations in Africa (al Qaeda, al Shabaab and Boko Haram) are trying to arrange an alliance, to pool capabilities and coordinate operations. There's no evidence of that, but there's no doubt that the three groups know of each other and some members in each organization have been in touch with the others. Meanwhile, each of these groups is quite different, with unique origins, goals and situations. A meaningful coalition of these groups is unlikely.

The oldest of these groups began forming a decade ago when several Islamic radical groups in Algeria, defeated in a 1990s rebellion, fled south and reformed. These men became the local al Qaeda franchise, calling themselves as Al Qaeda in the Maghreb (North Africa), or AQIM. This effort included forming new chapters south of Algeria, among tribal rebels and disaffected urbanites in Niger, Mali, Chad and Mauritania. This was more PR than reality at first. There were already some Islamic terrorists in the region, and these pronouncements appeared to be an attempt to unify pro-Islamic terrorist elements via the Internet and the mass media. So far, the many disaffected groups in the region have shown little interest in uniting, especially under the leadership of al Qaeda. Too many different objectives and al Qaeda has a reputation for being a loser. But the terrorists have extracted over a $100 million in ransoms from kidnapping Western visitors, and millions more by working for drug smugglers. This has enabled the group to expand from less than a hundred paid staff, to over 300. The money went to bribing local officials and tribal leaders, as well as buying vehicles, weapons, satellite phones and much more.

Last year this also led to the formation of a more radical splinter group; MOJWA (Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa). The appearance of MOJWA presented the possibility of a war among Islamic radical groups. MOJWAs, for example, recruited from an even older rebel group; Polisario and that caused some problems. This may have something to do with the declining prospects of Polisario, which has been in bad shape since 1991. Back then, Morocco finally won its war with Polisario Front rebels, who were seeking independence for the Western Sahara (a region south of Morocco). Polisario remained powerful in Mauritania, where the rebel group has official recognition and maintains several more refugee camps. Because Polisario was so well-subsidized by Algeria, back when Algeria was a radical state, Polisario still had enough diehards out there to keep a lot of people in Western Sahara unhappy. Polisario was known to provide recruits and sanctuary for al Qaeda and other Islamic radicals. For two decades, the UN has been trying to work out a final peace deal between Polisario and Morocco. In the 1990s Algeria cut off all support for Polisario. But that, and UN efforts to mediate the differences, have just not worked. The contested area is largely desert with a population of less than 300,000. Logic would have it that the area is better off as a part of Morocco. But there are still thousands of locals who would prefer to fight for independence rather than submit to Morocco. Some resistance is tribal and cultural, with the Moroccans seen as another bunch of alien invaders (the area was administered, until 1976, as a Spanish colony). If the fighting breaks out again, possibly inspired by Islamic radicals, it could go on for years, just as it does in many other parts of Africa and the immediate neighborhood.

Getting involved in cocaine smuggling provides money, some of which goes towards buying guns and vehicles, making the Polisario fighters more formidable. Mali and Mauritanian police are increasingly arresting members of the Polisario Front who are involved with a major drug smuggling operation (moving cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America, to the Mediterranean coast). Polisario Front members have long been involved in smuggling and other illegal activities but their involvement in moving cocaine is relatively recent. This implies cooperation with al Qaeda, which apparently has worked out deals with Polisario. AQIM is a major player in the drug smuggling network that brings South American cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America, to the Mediterranean coast. But all that money, and radical groups with different agendas, could lead to terrorists terrorizing other terrorists.

In Somalia al Shabaab recently announced a merger with al Qaeda. This was more PR than fact, because al Shabaab like all previous Islamic radical groups in Somalia is suffering defeat and splintering. Six years ago al Shabaab itself was the result of the Islamic Courts Union (ICU) moderates (ARS, or Alliance for the Re-liberation of Somalia) splitting away and joining an attempt to form a new government in Somalia. The radicals in the ICU left and formed al Shabaab. Other remnants of the ICU fled to Eritrea or formed smaller radical groups (which were later destroyed by, or absorbed into, al Shabaab.) The ICU itself goes back to the 1990s, when religious leaders formed militias in an attempt to reduce the banditry and feuding rampant in the country. The ARS wanted to keep Islamic terrorists out of the country, in return for more foreign aid. Al Shabaab offered to shelter al Qaeda and help establish a worldwide Islamic government. Somalia became a base for many al Qaeda members chased out of Pakistan and Arabia, although many of those have since fled to Yemen to escape the many peacekeepers and local militias pressing in on al Shabaab.

Boko Haram formed in the Moslem north of Nigeria about five years ago. Modeling themselves on the Taliban, Boko Haram became larger, and more violent, because of popular anger at rampant corruption and mismanagement in Nigeria. Some Boko Haram leaders were spotted in Somalia several years ago, and others are known to have been in contact with al Qaeda members from West Africa. But for the moment Boko Haram is intent on turning Nigeria (which is half Christian) into an Islamic dictatorship.

The three Islamic terror organizations described here cover a vast area (from the Atlantic Ocean coast of West Africa to the Indian Ocean coast of East Africa) as well as numerous very different cultures. While involved are Islamic radicals, only AQIM is Arab (or at least most of them) while Boko Haram and Somalis are black Africans (generally despised by Arabs). Moreover, the Somalis consider themselves Arabs, which creates even more tension.

LATIN AMERICAN
Gerald Tribune

Tuesday, March 6, 2012

Kidnapped Aid Workers in Good Condition, Spanish Government Says

MADRID (EFE) – The four Spanish aid workers kidnapped in Tindouf and Somalia “are doing fine” and the government has been working every day to win their release, Foreign Minister Jose Manuel Garcia-Margallo said Monday. The foreign minister discussed the situation in the wake of his visit over the weekend to Mali to try to speed the release of the two aid workers abducted last October from a Saharawi refugee camp in western Algeria.

The matter is sensitive and not much can be said in public because “lives are at stake,” Garcia-Margallo told Cope radio. The foreign minister said he had spoken with his European Union and Arab counterparts, and attended the Conference on Somalia in London in an effort to win the hostages’ release. Mali’s foreign minister is expected to visit Spain “very soon,” Garcia-Margallo said.

Italian media reported that Rosella Urru, an aid worker from Italy who was kidnapped from the refugee camp outside Tindouf with Spaniards Ainhoa Fernandez and Enric Gonyalons, had been released. Garcia-Margallo said Feb. 15 in Algeria that the Spanish government had received “proof” that the two Spanish aid workers kidnapped in Tindouf and the two others abducted near the Kenya-Somalia border were alive.

Blanca Thiebaut and Montserrat Serra, two Spanish citizens working with Doctors Without Borders at a Somali refugee camp in the eastern Kenyan town of Dadaab, were kidnapped at gunpoint on Oct. 13. No group has claimed responsibility for the abduction, but Kenyan officials said they suspected Somalia’s Al Shabaab Islamic militia, which has links to Al Qaeda. Ainhoa Fernandez and Enric Gonyalons were kidnapped 10 days after the incident in Kenya.

Fernandez de Rincon, Gonyalons and Urru were taken away by a group of armed men from the facility near Tindouf where foreign aid workers are lodged. The government of the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic – the Polisario Front’s name for the former Spanish colony of Western Sahara – arrested several people in connection with the kidnapping and said the captives were taken to a mountainous area on the Mali-Niger border.

A video sent by the captors shows Gonyalons, Rincon and Urru at an unidentified spot in the desert.

Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb is suspected of having staged the kidnapping. The terrorist group has carried out a number of kidnappings in southern Algeria, Mali and Mauritania, but it had never abducted anyone in the Sahrawi refugee camps controlled by the Polisario Front.

The SADR is the name given the Western Sahara by the Algerian-backed Polisario Front, which launched a war for independence against Morocco in 1975 after the North African kingdom annexed the territory on the withdrawal of Spanish forces. The native Saharawis, led by the Polisario Front, have spent decades resisting Morocco’s annexation of the Western Sahara, a former Spanish colony.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, March 07, 2012 10:45 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Congressman Donald Payne

Rachad,

I will send a condolence letter to the family of Donald Payne, as former Ambassador and Chairman of MAC. I also recommend that you/Kingdom of Morocco do the same. If you decide to send a letter and want help with the content we would be happy to assist. Hope all is well and see you soon. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, March 07, 2012 11:10 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: MiddleEastOnline:"Juppe: Morocco's proposal best plan for Western Sahara"

Rachad,

Assuming this is a correct report, this is a huge step forward. We need to think about how we get the US to this point as well. See below on the operative word changes from the US position. We only need a two word change!

First Published: 2012-03-07

Juppe: Morocco's proposal best plan for Western Sahara

French FM says Morocco's plan for granting disputed territory of Western Sahara autonomous status is only realistic proposal.

Middle East Online

Juppe: We encourage Algeria-Morocco rapprochement

RABAT - Morocco's plan for granting the disputed territory of Western Sahara autonomous status is the only realistic proposal for the territory, French Foreign Minister Alain Juppe said Wednesday.

"We still think that the Moroccan autonomy plan, which today is the only realistic proposal on the table, forms the serious and credible basis of a solution," he told Morocco's MAP news agency.

But the dispute still needed to be handled within the framework of the United Nations talks, he said.

And it should not be allowed to hamper the ongoing rapprochement between the leaders of Morocco and neighbour Algeria, he added, saying: "We can only encourage them in this direction."

Juppe's comments came ahead of the start of his official visit to Morocco on Thursday and

Friday -- and soon after US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton endorsed the Moroccan plan during a visit there last month.

Clinton, speaking during a visit to Rabat on February 26, described the autonomy plan as "serious, credible and realistic".

She also backed the UN-mediated talks on the issue.

But the Algerian-backed Polisario Front, which is fighting for independence for Western Sahara has rejected the Moroccan plan.

Morocco moved into Western Sahara when Spanish colonisers left in 1975, sparking the conflict with the Polisario Front until a ceasefire in 1991.

The United Nations is due to host another round of talks on the Western Sahara from Sunday to Tuesday in the suburbs of New York. But the UN-sponsored talks to resolve the dispute have made no progress over the past two years.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, March 07, 2012 12:46 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Getting together

Will you have time next week to meet? I get home Sunday. Have to be court on Monday. Otherwise I can fit into your schedule. Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, March 07, 2012 6:24 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Re: Fwd: Getting together

You pick it Boss and I'll be there :-)

From: Rachad [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Wednesday, March 07, 2012 11:10 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Cc: Sandrine Boutonnet <sandrine@embassyofmorocco.us>
Subject: Fwd: Getting together

Welcome back, i hope you enjoyed your trip.
how does Tuesday at 10, or 3H30 sound?

As for Payne, my staff already took care of it. thank you

Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, March 08, 2012 9:14 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: : The Atlantic Magazine - "The Coming Arab Identity Crisis"
Attachments: The Atlantic - 'The Coming Arab Identity Crisis' 8March2012.pdf

FYI -- The Atlantic magazine published an article today, "The Coming Arab Identity Crisis," on prospects for greater unity and integration in North Africa and the Arab world following the Arab Spring. The article notes Morocco's ethnic diversity and includes quotes from advisor to King Mohammed VI, André Azoulay, leader of the Parti Démocratique Amazigh Marocain, Ahmed Adghirni, and Ambassador Ed Gabriel. See below and attached.

<http://www.theatlantic.com/international/archive/2012/03/the-coming-arab-identity-crisis/254144/>

the Atlantic

Thursday, March 08, 2012

The Coming Arab Identity Crisis

By Massoud Hayoun

The Arab Spring could renew Nasser's 60-year-old mission for pan-Arabism, but the movement would face new challenges today.

Just after the 18-day uprising in Tahrir Square ousted President Hosni Mubarak, a Cairene businessman living in Hong Kong told me in rapturous excitement, "Now that we are freeing ourselves from dictators, all we need is to unify. One currency like the E.U., a common goal of economic development, and integrity for our Arab world."

He was not the first Arab idealist to envision pan-Arab unification as a legitimate goal. In 1960, at the height of Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser's Pan-Arabist, socialist movement, Egyptian musical icon Mohammed Abdel Wahab composed Watani al Akbar (in English, My Grand Nation), an ode to the idea of a united Arab super-state that would stretch from Morocco to Iraq. Many of the greatest singers of the Arab world came together on the same stage for the performance.

As independence movements pushed out European imperialists, Arabs were finally no longer second-class citizens in their own countries. Wahab's song for "a perfect unity" captured a goal that today, as democratic movements sweep the region, has returned to once again fill Arabs with hope and pride. "Arab-ness is not a religion."

Just as Nasser's movement could not survive the political realities of his era, today's renewed pan-Arabism faces the same challenge it did in the 1960s: ethnic identity. If Arabs are to come together,-- this time not in a super-state but a union of regional economies -- they will first have to agree on who does and does not count as an Arab. That's a more complicated -- and potentially controversial -- question than outsiders might realize, but it is one that could challenge the Arab world, with or without a renewed pan-Arabism.

As problematic as Nasser's pan-Arabism was, its memory is still one of sentimentality and regret. Israel's bloody 1967 defeat of a unified Arab army and Egypt's virtual take-over of Syria under the banner of Nasserist pan-Arabism soured Arab opinions of a movement that could have elevated the region economically and politically.

The Arab world encompasses a vast array of ethnic, cultural, and religious cleavages and countless skin color gradations. In Nasser's time, pan-Arabists had trouble deciding how to either include or exclude Christian Arabs, Jewish Arabs, Amazighs (more often referred to by the pejorative term Berber), Kurds, and others into the movement for Arab advancement.

"A pan-Arabist would see diversity as fitna [sedition]," said Karim Mezran, professor of Middle Eastern studies at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies. "An intelligent person wouldn't see diversity that way."

For Arab academics like Mezran, pan-Arabism has become more of a four-letter word than a legitimate aspiration of the Arab people.

"There were a lot of promises in [Nasser's] pan-Arabism that failed miserably," said Osama Abi-Mershed, director of the Center for Contemporary Arab Studies at Georgetown University. "The term is pejorative these days. ... Entry into Nasser's United Arab Republic thrust Yemen into a civil war, for example."

Still, there's some hope for regionalism. Earlier this month, Tunisia's newly elected President Moncef Marzouki announced a plan to reunify the Arab Maghreb Union (UMA), an economic union that went defunct in 1994 over a dispute between members Algeria and Morocco over control of Western Sahara. Founded in 1956, the UMA included Mauritania, Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya.

Marzouki told the AFP that a new UMA would politically and economically integrate North Africa to better attract foreign investment and combat terrorism.

But can it work? Georgetown's Abi-Mershed expressed skepticism for the feasibility of a UMA renaissance, saying that non-democratic countries like Algeria would be wary of integration..

"Regimes in power since colonialism, nationalist regimes see regionalism as a threat to autocratic powers," he said. "These regional forces can dilute national authority. They aren't interested in gaining legitimacy by enlarging enfranchisement."

Although they feel it's unlikely, academics say regionalism could do great things for the Middle East.

"A movement for freedom and improvement should unite the Arab state," said Johns Hopkins' Mezran. "It's not the time for calls for racial and religious uniformity -- unity should be in terms of values."

"The European Union," he said, "that's what the [Arab states] should follow. They should seek the progressive integration of market functions. Slowly, states should enter the union -- two states first, then four and five."

The political community agrees. "I see the UMA as an important vehicle to develop economies and combat terrorism," said Edward Gabriel, a former U.S. ambassador to Morocco and a Lebanese-American. "We in the U.S. have short attention spans. If North Africa waits for help from the U.S. and Europe, they may be disappointed."

Although diversity has been a hurdle to Arab unity before, perhaps the rising democratic movements can help make it an asset. What the Arab rulers of previous generations saw as a threat to pan-Arabist identity, Mezran sees as an economic opportunity.

"Minorities are an enrichment because of their global ties and leanings. If you open up and incorporate minorities, they bring their contacts. Maronites [Christian Lebanese] have a lot of connections with Europe and the U.S." he pointed out. "What I know is if you exclude minorities, you close markets."

Lebanon, Egypt, Morocco, and Jordan -- Arab nations with some of the largest populations of the region's ethnic minorities -- are among the largest recipients of remittances in the world, according to the World Bank's most recent figures. In 2010, those four countries received $26.1 billion in remittances.

But the idea of incorporating minorities opens an big question for the Arab-majority regions of the Middle East and North Africa: who actually counts as an Arab? "I think the idea is pretty clear -- you speak Arabic and are of Arab descent, and you are recognized as Arab," Mezran said, later observing the gray areas in that argument. "I'm not fluent. I run into being chastised. But I've never been considered non-Arab."

If Arabism is more than just a language, then makes an Arab an Arab? Georgetown's Abi-Mershed offered a sort of formula for an Arab identity:

A recipe for Arabism

There are three dimensions:

A common language

A shared history, with shared cultural values, historical references, and lived context

A willingness to be defined as an Arab ... "which is where it gets problematic."

Since the end of colonialism, North Africa's Amazighs, who are believed to have lived in the region since long before the 7th century Arab invasion, have worked to reclaim their ethnic identity from Arabized homogeneity. The ancestral Amazigh language is Tamazight, but a century of intermingling and Arab dominance mean many now speak Arabic.

In a series of reforms over the past year, Moroccan King Mohammed VI made Tamazight an official language of Morocco. Still, Moroccan Amazigh leaders say they are polarized by the ethnocentricity of their nation's leaders.

Late last year, I spoke with Ahmed Adghirni, the leader of the Parti Démocratique Amazigh Marocain, who said that despite the new reforms, the nation's Amazighs are still politically and often economically disenfranchised. His party was banned in April 2008 when Moroccan courts cited a law forbidding racially or linguistically defined political organizations.

"The officialization of Tamazight isn't going to do anything to change the situation and lifestyle of Amazighs," Adghirni said. I am still participating in the development of Amazigh political representation, and consolidating their role in the February 20th protest movements."

Amazighists, as they call themselves, like Adghirni say they oppose Arabist movements such as the UMA.

Explaining his views on the rift between Amazighs and Arabs in North Africa, Ambassador Gabriel offered an example from his own Lebanese Christian community.

"Some Lebanese Christians don't call themselves Arabs, they say they are Phoenicians," Gabriel said, explaining that he is proud of his Arab and Lebanese roots, which he sees as parts of the same identity.

Abi-Mershed says that the Amazigh-Arab divide is to some extent a fabrication of French imperialists. "The Berber-Arab rift has become a legacy of colonialism. Colonialists distinguished between Berbers and Arabs because it suited their divide and rule policy."

Many genetic studies suggest that there is actually little difference between the genetic makeups of North African Amazighs and Arabs.

"When you say what is an Arab you say what is an Arab race," explained Abi-Mershed. "It's a 19th century construct that pretends to be scientific but is not. If you flip through history, there are identities, but there has been so much mixing that race only comes out in 19th century as pseudo-scientific category,"

There are some 2.2 million Amazighs in Europe, according to the most recent figures, and that doesn't include the large Amazigh populations that have settled in Boston and French-speaking Canada. Diaspora Moroccans, including Amazighs, contribute an average $7 billion in remittances every year, according to recent findings. They might feel a connection to Morocco, but probably not to the Arab world at large, given that pan-Arabism does little to move you if you do not identify as Arab.

Even more problematic than integrating Amazighs and Christian Arabs into a neo-Arabist movement is integrating Jewish Arabs -- a term that has been used rather infrequently since the 1948 founding of Israel.

Before 1948, Jewish Tunisian singer Habiba Msika was at the forefront of a Tunisian movement against French imperial rule. Egyptian Leila Mourad -- perhaps a more central feature of the mainstream Arab musical-political canon -- was the Jewish Arab voice, and an official singer of, Nasser's 1952 revolution.

But Nasser's pan-Arabism, for which war against Israel was a defining feature and a rallying point, had no place for Jewish Arabs. Many Jews living in Egypt were coerced into leaving the country after 1948. According to some Arab Jews, the early Israeli government also worked to acculturate and Europeanize its Arab Jewish immigrants.

Perhaps the single most notable Arab Jew still thriving in the Arab world is Morocco's André Azoulay, an advisor to King Mohammed VI -- the only remaining Jewish Arab to serve in an Arab government. Azoulay is a native of Esssouira, a town that was once majority Jewish.

"I am an Arab. Arab-ness is not a religion. It's a culture, a language, and a community. Judaism is a spirituality," Azoulay. "The European Arab and Muslim communities have a population of close to 10 million. Many are from the Maghreb -- and many are developing their own [business] network. The Jewish Arab community develops that same kind of community."

Azoulay said of the period after 1948, when Arabs and Jews seemed mutually exclusive, "Now that time is over. We are reclaiming our identity and our history."

He said he believes that the UMA will successfully reunify. "What I know and what I think is having a union of the Arab Maghreb countries is so coherent. It's a win-win game for everybody. We have lost time, missed opportunities, missed so many rendezvous to make our growth larger by uniting our efforts and our wealth," he said. "I'm sure it will happen eventually."

For a new, democratic sort of pan-Arabism to ever happen, Arabs will have to reevaluate their perceptions of themselves as well as how their countries are governed.

"No major transnational movement would happen yet," said John Hopkins' Mezran. "The Arabs are inward looking. We have to wait for the states to develop values to project to the outside. Even with the revolution, The revolution is turned to Islamic movement."

Maybe Nasser's pan-Arabism would have to be reworked to succeed today, from an unwieldy Arab Republic to an economic cooperative like the European Union.

Or maybe pan-Arabism doesn't need reconfiguring. Maybe Nasser got it wrong.

"Pan-Arabism, which started long before Nasser's push for a United Arab Republic, was never supposed to be a political project," Mezran explained. "It should be primarily economic and cultural. In history, the Arab and Muslim world was unified for very short periods, but culturally and economically, it has almost always been united."

Thursday, March 08, 2012

The Coming Arab Identity Crisis

By Massoud Hayoun

The Arab Spring could renew Nasser's 60-year-old mission for pan-Arabism, but the movement would face new challenges today.

An Amazigh child in Algeria / Reuters

Just after the 18-day uprising in Tahrir Square ousted President Hosni Mubarak, a Cairene businessman living in Hong Kong told me in rapturous excitement, "Now that we are freeing ourselves from dictators, all we need is to unify. One currency like the E.U., a common goal of economic development, and integrity for our Arab world."

He was not the first Arab idealist to envision pan-Arab unification as a legitimate goal. In 1960, at the height of Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser's Pan-Arabist, socialist movement, Egyptian musical icon Mohammed Abdel Wahab composed Watani al Akbar (in English, My Grand Nation), an ode to the idea of a united Arab super-state that would stretch from Morocco to Iraq. Many of the greatest singers of the Arab world came together on the same stage for the performance.

As independence movements pushed out European imperialists, Arabs were finally no longer second-class citizens in their own countries. Wahab's song for "a perfect unity" captured a goal that today, as democratic movements sweep the region, has returned to once again fill Arabs with hope and pride. "Arab-ness is not a religion."

Just as Nasser's movement could not survive the political realities of his era, today's renewed pan-Arabism faces the same challenge it did in the 1960s: ethnic identity. If Arabs are to come together,-- this time not in a super-state but a union of regional economies -- they will first have to agree on who does and does not count as an Arab. That's a more complicated -- and potentially controversial -- question than outsiders might realize, but it is one that could challenge the Arab world, with or without a renewed pan-Arabism.

As problematic as Nasser's pan-Arabism was, its memory is still one of sentimentality and regret. Israel's bloody 1967 defeat of a unified Arab army and Egypt's virtual take-over of Syria under the banner of Nasserist pan-Arabism soured Arab opinions of a movement that could have elevated the region economically and politically.

The Arab world encompasses a vast array of ethnic, cultural, and religious cleavages and countless skin color gradations. In Nasser's time, pan-Arabists had trouble deciding how to either include or exclude Christian Arabs, Jewish Arabs, Amazighs (more often referred to by the pejorative term Berber), Kurds, and others into the movement for Arab advancement.

"A pan-Arabist would see diversity as fitna [sedition]," said Karim Mezran, professor of Middle Eastern studies at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies. "An intelligent person wouldn't see diversity that way."

For Arab academics like Mezran, pan-Arabism has become more of a four-letter word than a legitimate aspiration of the Arab people.

"There were a lot of promises in [Nasser's] pan-Arabism that failed miserably," said Osama Abi-Mershed, director of the Center for Contemporary Arab Studies at Georgetown University. "The term is pejorative these days. ... Entry into Nasser's United Arab Republic thrust Yemen into a civil war, for example."

Still, there's some hope for regionalism. Earlier this month, Tunisia's newly elected President Moncef Marzouki announced a plan to reunify the Arab Maghreb Union (UMA), an economic union that went defunct in 1994 over a dispute between members Algeria and Morocco over control of Western Sahara. Founded in 1956, the UMA included Mauritania, Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya.

Marzouki told _____ foreign investment and combat terrorism.

But can it work? Georgetown's Abi-Mershed expressed skepticism for the feasibility of a UMA renaissance, saying that non-democratic countries like Algeria would be wary of integration..

"Regimes in power since colonialism, nationalist regimes see regionalism as a threat to autocratic powers," he said. "These regional forces can dilute national authority. They aren't interested in gaining legitimacy by enlarging enfranchisement."

Although they feel it's unlikely, academics say regionalism could do great things for the Middle East.

"A movement for freedom and improvement should unite the Arab state," said Johns Hopkins' Mezran. "It's not the time for calls for racial and religious uniformity --unity should be in terms of values."

"The European Union," he said, "that's what the [Arab states] should follow. They should seek the progressive integration of market functions. Slowly, states should enter the union -- two states first, then four and five."

The political community agrees. "I see the UMA as an important vehicle to develop economies and combat terrorism," said Edward Gabriel, a former U.S. ambassador to Morocco and a Lebanese-American. "We in the U.S. have short attention spans. If North Africa waits for help from the U.S. and Europe, they may be disappointed."

Although diversity has been a hurdle to Arab unity before, perhaps the rising democratic movements can help make it an asset. What the Arab rulers of previous generations saw as a threat to pan-Arabist identity, Mezran sees as an economic opportunity.

"Minorities are an enrichment because of their global ties and leanings. If you open up and incorporate minorities, they bring their contacts. Maronites [Christian Lebanese] have a lot of connections with Europe and the U.S." he pointed out. "What I know is if you exclude minorities, you close markets."

Lebanon, Egypt, Morocco, and Jordan -- Arab nations with some of the largest populations of the region's ethnic minorities -- are among the largest recipients of remittances in the world, according to the World Bank's most recent figures. In 2010, those four countries received $26.1 billion in remittances.

But the idea of incorporating minorities opens an big question for the Arab-majority regions of the Middle East and North Africa: who actually counts as an Arab? "I think the idea is pretty clear -- you speak Arabic and are of Arab descent, and you are recognized as Arab," Mezran said, later observing the gray areas in that argument. "I'm not fluent. I run into being chastised. But I've never been considered non-Arab."

If Arabism is more than just a language, then makes an Arab an Arab? Georgetown's Abi-Mershed offered a sort of formula for an Arab identity:

A recipe for Arabism

There are three dimensions:

A common language

A shared history, with shared cultural values, historical references, and lived context

A willingness to be defined as an Arab ... "which is where it gets problematic."

Since the end of colonialism, North Africa's Amazighs, who are believed to have lived in the region since long before the 7th century Arab invasion, have worked to reclaim their ethnic identity from Arabized homogeneity. The ancestral Amazigh language is Tamazight, but a century of intermingling and Arab dominance mean many now speak Arabic.

In a series of reforms over the past year, Moroccan King Mohammed VI made Tamazight an official language of Morocco. Still, Moroccan Amazigh leaders say they are polarized by the ethnocentricity of their nation's leaders.

Late last year, I spoke with Ahmed Adghirni, the leader of the Parti Démocratique Amazigh Marocain, who said that despite the new reforms, the nation's Amazighs are still politically and often economically disenfranchised. His party was banned in April 2008 when Moroccan courts cited a law forbidding racially or linguistically defined political organizations.

"The officialization of Tamazight isn't going to do anything to change the situation and lifestyle of Amazighs," Adghirni said. I am still participating in the development of Amazigh political representation, and consolidating their role in the February 20th protest movements."

Amazighists, as they call themselves, like Adghirni say they oppose Arabist movements such as the UMA.

Explaining his [REDACTED] North Africa, Ambassador Gabriel offered an example from his own Lebanese Christian community.

"Some Lebanese Christians don't call themselves Arabs, they say they are Phoenicians," Gabriel said, explaining that he is proud of his Arab and Lebanese roots, which he sees as parts of the same identity.

Abi-Mershed says that the Amazigh-Arab divide is to some extent a fabrication of French imperialists. "The Berber-Arab rift has become a legacy of colonialism. Colonialists distinguished between Berbers and Arabs because it suited their divide and rule policy."

Many genetic studies suggest that there is actually little difference between the genetic makeups of North African Amazighs and Arabs.

"When you say what is an Arab you say what is an Arab race," explained Abi-Mershed. "It's a 19th century construct that pretends to be scientific but is not. If you flip through history, there are identities, but there has been so much mixing that race only comes out in 19th century as pseudo-scientific category,"

There are some 2.2 million Amazighs in Europe, according to the most recent figures, and that doesn't include the large Amazigh populations that have settled in Boston and French-speaking Canada. Diaspora Moroccans, including Amazighs, contribute an average $7 billion in remittances every year, according to recent findings. They might feel a connection to Morocco, but probably not to the Arab world at large, given that pan-Arabism does little to move you if you do not identify as Arab.

Even more problematic than integrating Amazighs and Christian Arabs into a neo-Arabist movement is integrating Jewish Arabs -- a term that has been used rather infrequently since the 1948 founding of Israel.

Before 1948, Jewish Tunisian singer Habiba Msika was at the forefront of a Tunisian movement against French imperial rule. Egyptian Leila Mourad -- perhaps a more central feature of the mainstream Arab musical-political canon -- was the Jewish Arab voice, and an official singer of, Nasser's 1952 revolution.

But Nasser's pan-Arabism, for which war against Israel was a defining feature and a rallying point, had no place for Jewish Arabs. Many Jews living in Egypt were coerced into leaving the country after 1948. According to some Arab laws, the early Israeli government also worked to acculturate and Europeanize its Arab Jewish immigrants.

Perhaps the single most notable Arab Jew still thriving in the Arab world is Morocco's André Azoulay, an advisor to King Mohammed VI -- the only remaining Jewish Arab to serve in an Arab government. Azoulay is a native of Essouira, a town that was once majority Jewish.

"I am an Arab. Arab-ness is not a religion. It's a culture, a language, and a community. Judaism is a spirituality," Azoulay. "The European Arab and Muslim communities have a population of close to 10 million. Many are from the Maghreb -- and many are developing their own [business] network. The Jewish Arab community develops that same kind of community."

Azoulay said of the period after 1948, when Arabs and Jews seemed mutually exclusive, "Now that time is over. We are reclaiming our identity and our history."

Hesaid he believes that the UMA will successfully reunify. "What I know and what I think is having a union of the Arab Maghreb countries is so coherent. It's a win-win game for everybody. We have lost time, missed opportunities, missed so many rendezvous to make our growth larger by uniting our efforts and our wealth," he said. "I'm sure it will happen eventually."

For a new, democratic sort of pan-Arabism to ever happen, Arabs will have to reevaluate their perceptions of themselves as well as how their countries are governed.

"No major transnational movement would happen yet," said John Hopkins' Mezran. "The Arabs are inward looking. We have to wait for the states to develop values to project to the outside. Even with the revolution, The revolution is turned to Islamic movement."

Maybe Nasser's pan-Arabism would have to be reworked to succeed today, from an unwieldy Arab Republic to an economic cooperative like the European Union.

Or maybe pan-Arabism doesn't need reconfiguring. Maybe Nasser got it wrong.

"Pan-Arabism, which started long before Nasser's push for a United Arab Republic, was never supposed to be a political project," Mezran explained. "It should be primarily economic and cultural. In history, the Arab and Muslim world was unified for very short periods, but culturally and economically, it has almost always been united."

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, March 08, 2012 10:17 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Scene setter for Event on March 27/28: US Leadership on the Western Sahara and North African Security
Attachments: AD_WesternSaharaEventScenesetter5March2012.docx

Rachad,

Attached is the outline of MACP seminar that we will sponsor at the end of the month on N. African security/Western Sahara. We can discuss any nuances or changes as you see fit, but need to proceed on logistics immediately. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Scenesetter: The Need for US Leadership to Resolve the Western Sahara Crisis

Proposed Title:

The Need for US Leadership to Resolve the Western Sahara Crisis

Proposed Date, Time, and Venue:

March 27th or March 28th, 10:00AM-12:00PM
 Council on Foreign Relations
 1777 F Street, N.W., First Floor

Thematic Overview:

In order to generate a higher level of interest in an event preceding the MINUSO rollover, it is proposed that MACP sponsor an event that presents the rationale for heightened US leadership to resolve the Western Sahara crisis. The purpose of the event is to clearly define the policy objectives that support MACP's messaging on facts on the ground and targeted aid to the camps, as well as our messaging on the need to resolve the Western Sahara in order to advance regional security and stability and resolve a humanitarian crisis in the camps.

At a time when the US is struggling to evolve a "win-win" strategy vis-à-vis transitions following last year's Arab uprisings, firm and proactive US leadership to resolve the Western Sahara conflict has critical policy implications and strategic regional benefits:

1. It is in the US national interest to do so
 - a. We have a realistic policy that is supported by the past three Administrations and Bipartisan Majority in Both Chambers of Congress
 - b. The US has a national interest in the stability of the region, of Morocco, and not creating a failed state. This policy addresses all three.
2. It will take a step towards addressing security concerns in the region and the camps
 - a. Drugs
 - b. Trafficking
 - c. Kidnapping
 - d. Terrorism
 - e. Mercenaries
3. It will demonstrate US action to improve the humanitarian crisis in the camps

- a. Warehouseing
- b. Durable Solutions

In addition to getting across our messaging on these issues, the event will also provide recommendations on what the US should do to provide leadership:

1. Be forceful in asserting its position supporting autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty and getting the negotiations back on the Van Walsum track – a solution that is good for the region and good for US interests.
2. Match US policy with actions by implementing the Congressional language authorizing US assistance to the Western Sahara.
 - a) The use of US foreign assistance to underwrite programs in the South will demonstrate that Congress' efforts to bring about a shift in US policy in the Sahara is supported by the Administration and provide substance to the statements of three successive administrations.
 - b) US assistance to the Sahara will demonstrate a concrete US commitment to improving the lives of the Sahrawis, support economic growth and development in a vital area, reduce the attraction of criminal activities pursued in the region, and encourage other countries to expand their efforts in the territory.
3. Stop subsidizing the administration of the camps and start funding durable solutions.
 - a) Targeting US assistance will create accountability and oversight over US funds being spent in the region and direct aid to promote durable solutions to the refugee crisis.
 - b) Targeting US assistance will bring additional pressure on Algeria and other supporters of the Polisario Front to take steps that fulfill their obligations to the refugees, including a census to create the conditions for durable solutions.
 - c) This will address both the humanitarian and security crisis in the camps. By enabling refugees to have options for repatriation, resettlement, or reintegration, one of their core rights under international refugee law, US aid can help eliminate a potential source of instability and insecurity in the region. Targeting aid thus serves a dual purpose of improving a humanitarian crisis and taking initial steps to resolve a security threat.

Potential Speakers:

The event would be a MACC-hosted roundtable moderated by Ambassador Gabriel, with three other prominent experts serving as speakers.

Denys Aguetant, Thomas More Institute (Regional/Security)
Les Campbell, National Democratic Institute (Facts on the Ground/US Leadership)
Lorne Craner, International Republican Institute (Facts on the Ground/US Leadership)
Robert Holley (Facts on the Ground/Target US Aid/US Leadership)
J. Peter Pham, The Atlantic Council (Regional/Security/US Leadership)
Merrill Smith, Independent Consultant (Refugees/Target US Aid)
Antonin Tiesseron, Thomas More Institute (Regional/Security)
I. William Zartman, SAIS (Regional/Autonomy/US Leadership)

Ideally, the event will be divided into three elements as noted above. Someone from MAC will discuss US national interest in resolving the Sahara, J. Peter Pham will provide a security analysis, and Merrill Smith will make the humanitarian case. All of them will endorse the recommendations to US policymakers in some capacity.

Expected Results:

Event Audience: We anticipate an audience of approximately 30-40 people from think tanks and the policymaking community in DC.

Media: This event will generate media coverage from a MAC press release, which along with the video will be sent to our targeted list of 500 journalists. We will also target DC-based journalists to attend the event, interview the speakers, and write follow-up articles.

Website: We will post a video of this on the MOTM website and will live tweet from the event.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, March 08, 2012 10:29 AM
To: Rachad
Cc: Sandrine Boutonnet
Subject: RE: Getting together

Unless you picked one of these times, I'd prefer 3:30pm, although I can make either time that fits your schedule. ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Wednesday, March 07, 2012 2:11 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Cc: Sandrine Boutonnet
Subject: Fwd: Getting together

Welcome back, i hope you enjoyed your trip.
how does Tuesday at 10, or 3H30 sound?

As for Payne, my staff already took care of it. thank you

Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, March 08, 2012 10:33 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: monthly report
Attachments: Rabat Team - February 2012 report English.doc

Rachad,
Attached is our monthly report for your review and comment prior to sending, as promised. I have highlighted the area that defines/characterizes "Washington Team". We will find a way to word this that meets our mutual satisfaction. Thank you. We can discuss this next week. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

WASHINGTON TEAM FEBRUARY 2012 PROGRESS REPORT

Introduction

The February agenda in Washington continued to be dominated by issues related to the upcoming Presidential election. Foreign policy concerns included Afghanistan (early pullout, Koran burning), Iran-Israel (nuclear enrichment issue), and the visit of the Chinese Vice President. Domestic topics were primarily those that were defined to appeal to the constituencies of the two major political parties.

There was very little movement on Morocco outside of the visit of Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and visits by other high ranking State Department and Defense Department officials to the Maghreb, primarily focused on security concerns. The first visit of a member of the new Moroccan government to the US was also of some interest although she did not have the opportunity for broad media engagement through the Washington Team.

There were a number of programs and media events that highlighted Morocco-related topics including the annual terrorism report from the International Center for Terrorism Studies (ICTS), several news stories related to the ICTS report, Secretary Clinton's visit, and the need to use US foreign assistance to bring about resolution of the status of the Tindouf refugees.

Looking ahead, it is obvious that, as the Republican primaries come to a close in March, the election campaigning will become even more combative and rhetorical between Democrats and Republicans. The slight improvements in the US economy, which is an advantage to the President, is being offset by some pundits, by the rising cost of gasoline, primarily due to threats from Iran.

It will be a difficult period in which to promote Morocco's agenda; however, with the Appropriations language allowing US aid to be spent anywhere Morocco governs, there will be opportunities to move on having US-funded projects in the South. This is our dominant objective for the spring.

The list below is not exhaustive nor is it fully detailed as we focus on the items that have the most impact on our strategy. Since it is difficult to distinguish some of the work of the Moroccan American Center from that of the Embassy, this report includes select activities of the Embassy, MAC, and its consultants as the "Washington Team".

Campaigns

MoroccoOnTheMove.com (MOTM)

As part of the Team's efforts to enhance Morocco's web and social media presence and grow its online audience, we continue to use the MOTM website and @MorocOnTheMove Twitter handle to repurpose and publish positive Morocco-related news.

The website and @MorocOnTheMove social media program continue to broaden the reach for our messaging, both in quantity and among targeted audiences. After only four months online, more than 220 news postings and other original content from the Team have appeared and the website has received more than 18,000 hits. @MorocOnTheMove sent out more than 700 tweets, gained more than 200 followers, and was retweeted regularly by influential personalities on Twitter, including the State Department and US Embassy in Rabat.

The most visited page of the MOTM website is the “Expert sources” section which contains biographical and contact information for Team members and third-party spokespeople who are familiar with our messaging and are available to provide positive commentary and background on request. This greatly increases the likelihood that journalists, policymakers, and think-tank leaders will seek out these experts for articles, briefings, and events on Morocco and the region.

Morocco as a Leader

Activities:

On February 5, Ambassador Gabriel was interviewed live on the American Arab talk radio show “Radio Balad” on the topic, “Morocco and the Arab Spring.” Hosted by Ray Hanania, the show highlighted Morocco’s leadership on democratic reforms in the region and was broadcast to audiences in Illinois, Michigan, and Ohio.

In late January, the Team briefed Isobel Coleman, author and Senior Fellow for US Foreign Policy, Director, Civil Society, Markets, and Democracy Initiative at Council on Foreign Relations, prior to her trip to Morocco to learn more about the mouchidate program and attend North Africa Partnership for Economic Opportunity (PNB-NAPEO) conference in Marrakesh. On February 21, Coleman published an article, “Democracy in development – Morocco and political reform” on the Council on Foreign Relations blog, in which she examined the reform process in Morocco compared to others in the region since the beginning of the Arab Spring.

Following Secretary of State Hillary Clinton’s visit to Morocco in late February, the Team issued a press release, “Sec. Clinton praises Morocco as leader for peace, democracy in region—Reaffirms Moroccan autonomy solution in Western Sahara as ‘serious, realistic, credible’,” citing Clinton’s remarks with Moroccan Foreign Minister Saad Dine El Othmani at a briefing in Rabat. It was picked up and posted at more than 200 US and international media outlets, including Reuters, the Wall Street Journal’s Market Watch, Boston Globe, San Francisco Chronicle, Newsday, Houston Chronicle, Sacramento Bee, Columbus Dispatch, Yahoo News, AOL News, and Afrik-News. Robert M. Holley authored a commentary posted on the MOTM website, “Three Times Not Yet a Charm,” on the implications of the Clinton visit.

In addition, MAP published "Clinton's visit to Morocco, opportunity to renew support for autonomy initiative" which cited the Atlantic Council's Peter Pham who is regularly briefed by the Washington Team. An article, "Date of UN talks on the Western Sahara announced," published by North Africa United, also referenced Pham's citation MAP.

In late February, an art exhibit, "Beauty and Belief: Crossing Bridges with the Arts of Islamic Culture," opened at Brigham Young University in Utah with Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal as a guest of honor. Several articles highlighting the exhibit and the participation of Ambassador Bouhlal were published: "BYU opens massive Islamic art exhibit," by KSL.com and "Islamic Art Extends Bridges in Utah" by OnIslam.net, "Islamic art exhibit opens at BYU's Museum of Art," Deseret News, and "Islamic art extends bridges in Utah" on ABNA.

Results:

In February, the Washington Team's efforts to highlight Morocco's role as a leader for democratic reforms and peace in the region for US audiences generated more than 430 positive media placements and 35.5 million favorable media impressions.

The Polisario and Terrorism in the Sahara/Sahel

The Team continued its efforts to bring US media attention to the growing threat from al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and other terrorist groups in the Sahara/Sahel, as well as growing concerns about AQIM links to members of the Polisario Front in the Tindouf camps. These efforts included journalist outreach; op-eds; briefings of third party spokespersons; and creating fact sheets, chronologies and other supporting documentations for distribution to target audiences.

Activities:

A focal point of the efforts was the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies "Cooperation in combating terrorism: Review of 2011 and outlook for 2012," which took place on February 2 forum at the National Press Club. The Team compiled and/or assisted in the preparation of the following briefing documents: "4Q 2011 ICTS REPORT UPDATE CHARTS 'Maghreb & Sahel Terrorism' FINAL", "Morocco Terrorism" factsheet and talking points for media and policymakers, "CHRONOLOGY-Polisario Renegades & AQIM Recruits-It's time to Close the Camps", ICTS/Potomac Institute- "Special Update Report: Terrorism in NW&C Africa from 9-11 to Arab Spring" (which documents the 500% rise in attacks by AQIM and other terrorist groups in the region since 9/11) and the ICTS Flyer - "ICTS Terrorism Special Update Report." The report also details Polisario member involvement with AQIM and traffickers, and finds that the Polisario-run camps have become "a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and criminal enterprises." It urges the US and international community to take action to "prioritize permanent refugee resettlement."

Following the event, the Team issued a press release, "Study warns of rising al-Qaeda threat in North Africa—Urges closing Polisario camps which have become recruiting ground for terrorists," which was picked up and posted at more than 150 US and international media outlets, including Reuters, the Wall Street Journal's Market Watch, ABC News, Terrorism Watch, Yahoo News, AOL News, Africa Business, and Star Africa.

For the MOTM website, Professor Alexander recorded a video commentary, "Polisario camps harbor 'seeds for recruitment and violence'," where he described the findings of the Potomac report, highlighting the recommendation that the Polisario-controlled refugee camps be closed because they are "they are a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises."

In addition, the Team arranged an interview for Alexander with Jennifer Rubin, of the Washington Post's "Right turn" blog. Her commentary, "North Africa: Terrorism on the rise" was published the morning of the event and then republished and cited by several other media outlets, including Forbes and The Daily Globe. MAP also published an article on the ICTS study, "Report in Washington calls for closure of Polisario camps in Tindouf," which was reposted by Moroccan and other media outlets, including Le Matin, E-Marrakech, Rue20, Sahara News, Sahel Intelligence, and Readers Edition.

A February 2012 report by the Africa Center for Strategic Studies, "Regional security cooperation in the Maghreb and Sahel - Algeria's pivotal ambivalence," cited the terrorism data provided by the Team from the 2011 ICTS Maghreb and Sahel terrorism report.

Ambassador Ed Gabriel authored an op-ed, "Stop subsidizing recruiting ground for terrorists and traffickers," which was published in The Hill's online "Congress Blog," which is being distributed to Congress and the media.

Results:

In February, the Washington Team's efforts to highlight for US audiences concerns about rising terrorism in the region and the Polisario connection generated more than 360 positive media placements and 24.8 million favorable media impressions.

Congressional Activities

Congress was in session for three weeks in February and the Washington Team began the annual process of conducting in person briefings with every Congressional office, meeting with twenty-four offices. It also continued disseminating the core messages of the upcoming campaigns:

- Discrediting the Polisario
- Target assistance away from administering the camps and towards promoting durable solutions

- Building Support for Facts on the Ground
- Promoting Morocco as a leader in the region, especially the reforms of the past year, and the new role on the UN Security Council.

Every office received a thorough briefing on the recent Polisario actions including: the kidnappings in the camps, how the camps are used as a recruiting center for terrorists and criminal enterprises, how members of the Polisario are trafficking in drugs and goods, and how they fought alongside Gaddafi in Libya. The Team also distributed the Potomac Institute Report on terrorism in North Africa that details these activities and walks the members/staff through the map describing the various forces of instability operating near the Polisario camps.

The Team is well aware of that fact that Morocco's adversaries are planning a campaign that will show the Polisario as victims. Our plan, starting with these meetings and all those that follow, is to brief every office, circulate op-eds and news articles that show the reality of the Polisario, and, by exposing the truth before they begin their efforts, continue to minimize the ability of the Polisario to gain supporters in Congress.

The Washington Team remained in contact with key constituencies on the Appropriations subcommittee for the Facts on the Ground campaign. It briefed the key representatives on the initial State Department reaction to the language which was that the Department was aware of the language and trying to decode what, if anything, to do about it. The key representatives followed by submitting questions to the Secretary about how she planned to implement the language. These follow up questions show that this is an important issue to the Congress and will force State Department to start answering direct questions on the issue.

Looking Ahead

The Team anticipates conducting at least another thirty briefings in March, and will also circulate Ambassador Gabriel's latest op-ed on the Polisario camps to our Congressional audience, as well as all credible information on the Polisario that reinforces our strong campaign to discredit it. We will continue our emphasis on security concerns in the region and potentially help organize a briefing in Congress on the dangers posed by the camps on both a security and humanitarian level. Finally, we will continue to work closely with Congressional appropriators on implementing the facts on the ground language.

MATIC

MATIC held a group meeting with the US Trade Representatives team responsible for MENA, which was headed to Morocco later in the month, during which time we had an extensive discussion about the need to prioritize Morocco along with Tunisia and Libya going forward. The USTR staff going to Morocco was in contact with the Ambassador also, who assisted in their preparations for the trip.

MATIC met with the Aspen Institute regional director for NAPEO as a follow up to the conference in Marrakech. They are considering a Maghreb-wide delegation to the US in May and wanted to gauge the feasibility of such a program since it would include both private and public sector participation.

MATIC arranged a series of meetings for the AMDI New York office director with various agencies and associations in Washington that have an impact on promoting Morocco in the US. These included the US Chamber of Commerce, the Department of Commerce, OPIC, EX-IM Bank, the National US-Arab Chamber of Commerce, the Moroccan Embassy, and MATIC.

Another meeting of importance to Morocco was with Shelly Porges, Director of the Global Entrepreneurship Program, which is opening a project in Morocco, now scheduled for March. She is in contact with the Embassy for assistance in launching the project.

MATIC continued to assist US companies with information regarding trade and investment opportunities in Morocco across a range of sectors.

MACC

Throughout the month of February, MACC staff attended a number of events on the Maghreb and the Middle East, including a forum on Libya's missing weapons hosted by the Stimson Center; a discussion on the Arab Spring hosted by the Henry Jackson Society on Capitol Hill; a panel on freedom of expression in the Middle East held at the National Press Club; and a conference on the Arab Spring and the challenges of reconstruction organized by the United States Institute of Peace.

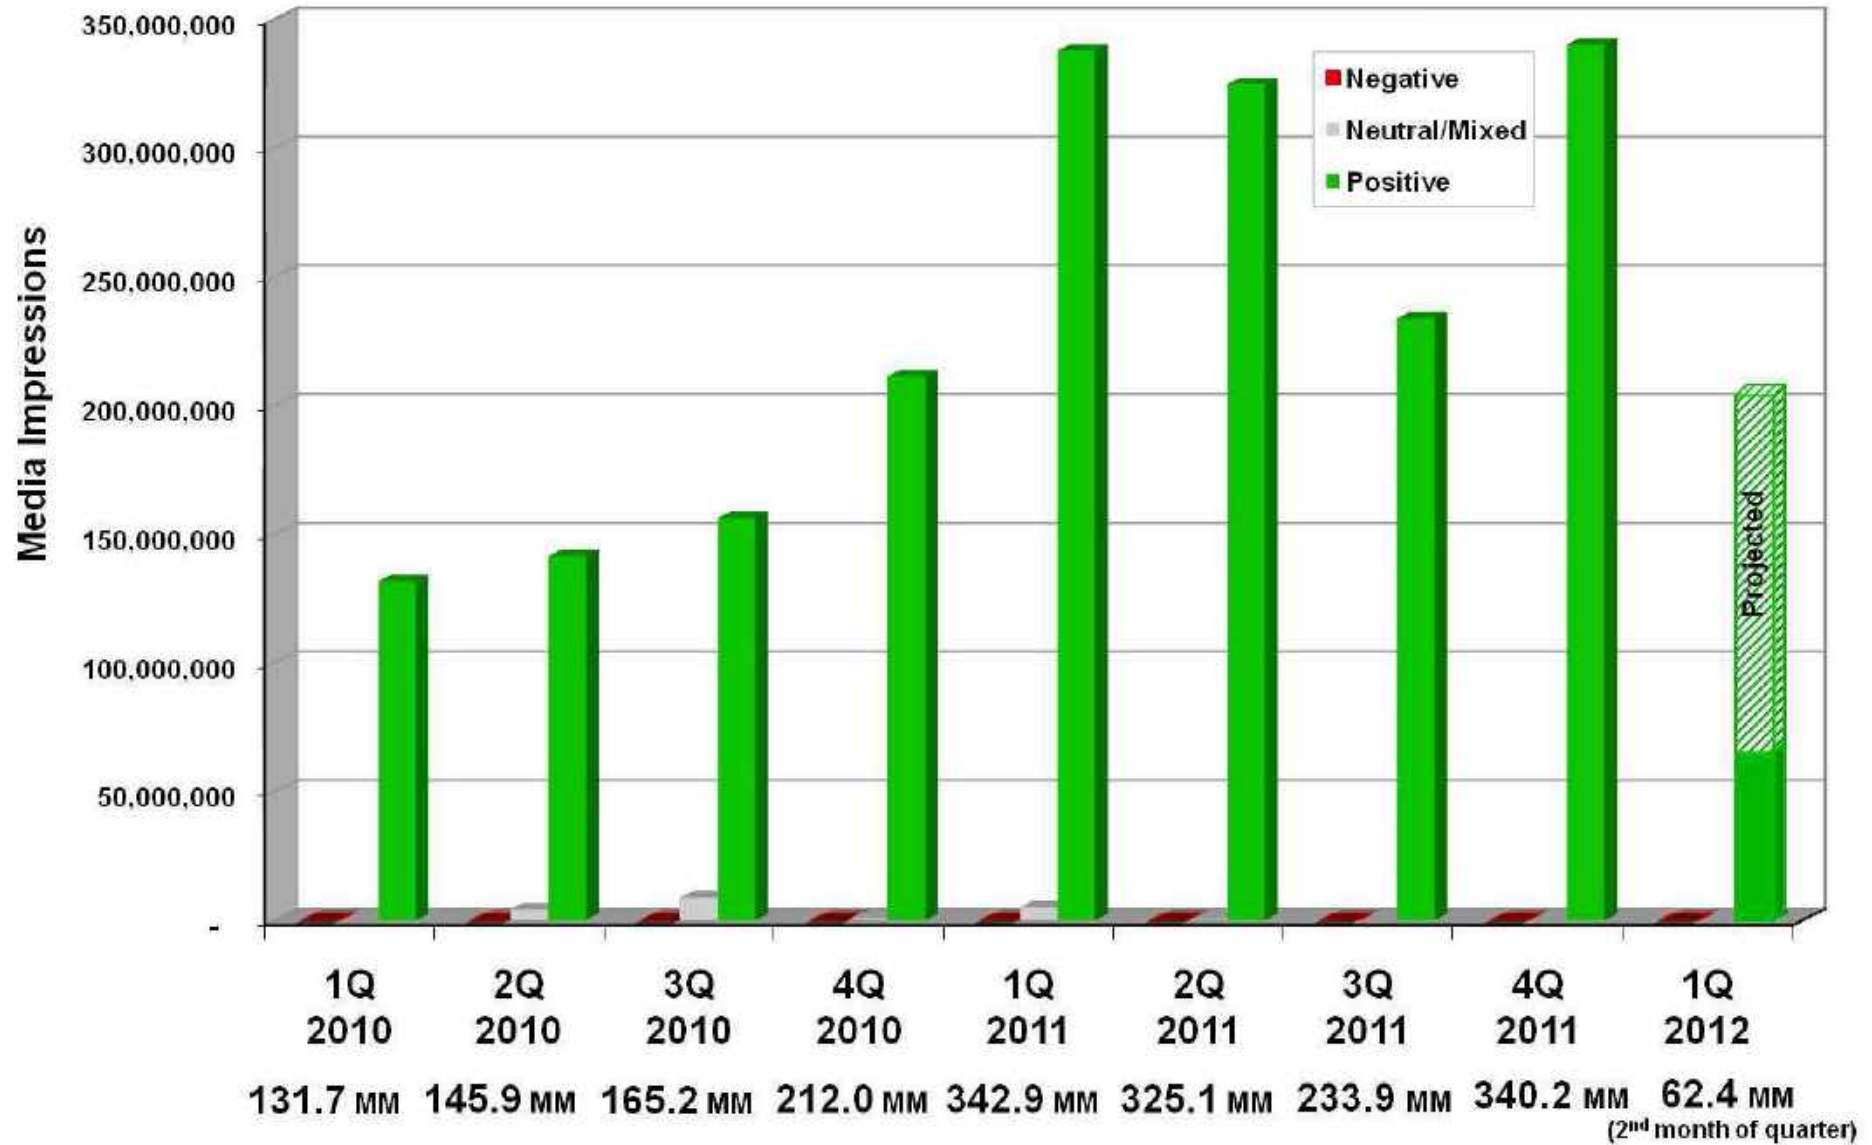

The Washington Team briefed the senior officers/officials program at the Near East and South Asia Center for Strategic Studies at the National Defense University on the role of the Moroccan American Center. It was attended by high ranking military and government officials from the region including two diplomats from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Rabat.

Media Coverage for Washington Team by Quarter

January 2010 to February 2012

Media and Web stories or Postings of MAC Press Releases, Communications Initiatives, and Related News from Washington Team (Media Impressions = Circulation, Viewership, & Circulation-equivalent for Web)

Media Coverage for Major Washington Team Initiatives

June 2010 through February 2012

Media and Web stories or Postings of MAC Press Releases, Communications Initiatives, and Related News from Washington Team (Media Impressions = Circulation, Viewership, & Circulation-equivalent for Web)

TO: Ambassador Bouhlal
FR: Naomi, Deceter, Caitlin Dearing
CC: Ambassador Gabriel, Saida Zaid, Jordan Paul
RE: Ambassador Bouhlal's Meeting at the Council on Foreign Relations on March 13th

Background

The event will be a small, informal, off-the-record meeting with participants who are likely to be well informed about a variety of foreign-policy issues in the Middle East and North Africa, though not perhaps particularly knowledgeable about Morocco specifically. The discussion will cover Morocco's Constitutional changes and new government, developments in the Maghreb, and broader issues involving the Arab Spring.

Though some high level journalists are invited, because the event is off the record, they will not write about it directly but use what they learn to inform a broader understanding of Morocco and its issues.

Because Elliott Abrams is a good friend of Morocco, this will be a friendly conversation. But there may well be candid questions – from him and other participants – about:

- The success in carrying out the Constitutional reforms;
- The precise nature and extent of power of the new government;
- Morocco's relationship with Israel;
- Freedom of expression/recent prison sentences for defamation.

Format of the event

4:45-5 pm:

- Informal meet-and-greet; light refreshments will be served.

5-5:15 pm:

- 15-minute opening statement by Ambassador Bouhlal

5:15-6 pm:

- Open discussion

Recommendation

It can be extremely helpful to conduct a brief preparatory session in advance of such meetings, and we would recommend a meeting with MACP on Monday, March 12, to help formulate responses that compellingly convey Morocco's messages and will resonate with the CFR audience.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, March 09, 2012 10:29 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: Saida Zaid; Caitlin Dearing
Subject: Memo on March 13th Event at CFR
Attachments: AD_CFRMoroccoReformEventOverview8March2012.docx

Rachad,

Attached is a briefing memo on your event with Elliott Abrams on March 13th. In the memo, we detail the format. You will be asked to speak for 15 minutes and then respond to questions. We have also noted the general line of questioning in the briefing document, and suggested that if you agree, we could have a practice session on Monday. Also, if you have any corrections, please let us know. Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, March 09, 2012 11:39 AM
To: abdel-ouahab@hotmail.com
Cc: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: here's murphy speech published in Congressional Record for yesterday's House proceedings
Attachments: murphy speech.rtf

Attached is the official statement by Congressman Murphy on the UN negotiations. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Congressional Record

112th Congress (2011-2012)

SUPPORTING RENEWED NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN MOROCCO AND THE POLISARIO FRONT -- (Extensions of Remarks - March 08, 2012)

[Page: E354]

SPEECH OF_

HON. CHRISTOPHER S. MURPHY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 8, 2012

- Mr. MURPHY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support the renewal of negotiations between the government of Morocco and the Polisario Front.
- The Western Sahara region has been disputed territory since the Spanish withdrew in 1975. It is claimed by Morocco and the Polisario Front, which seeks independence for the Western Sahara.
- Morocco and the Polisario began direct negotiations in 2007, under the auspices of the United Nations. The next round of negotiations begins on Monday, and I hope that a solution will finally be agreed to during the new talks in Manhasset, NY. The people who live in the Western Sahara have suffered as a result of the region's status being in limbo, and they deserve for this longstanding dispute to be resolved.
- Morocco has a compromise proposal on the table: democratic autonomy for the region under Moroccan sovereignty. I believe this is a reasonable offer and can serve as a basis for negotiations. Undersecretary of State William Burns previously described the Moroccan initiative as a "serious and credible proposal to provide real autonomy for the Western Sahara." It is also important for the region's residents to be able to express their views on their future, and for negotiators to take those views into account.
- Mr. Speaker, after more than 35 years, it is time for all parties to negotiate in good faith to finally bring this crisis to a close. We are witnessing monumental changes in North Africa following revolutions in Tunisia, Egypt, and Libya. It is in the interest of the United States and the parties involved to achieve a peaceful, negotiated solution to the Western Sahara issue, and more broadly to encourage Morocco to fully implement King Mohammed's proposed constitutional reforms and continue moving toward a more balanced governmental system that serves the many needs of all citizens of Morocco.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, March 10, 2012 9:59 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Follow up from AMDI

FYI

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Ghita FILALI [<mailto:GFilali@invest.gov.ma>]
Sent: Friday, March 09, 2012 1:40 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Cc: Jean AbiNader; Fatima Kurtz
Subject: Follow up from AMDI

M. Ambassador,

Thank you for meeting me a few weeks ago in Washington DC to introduce AMDI mission and objectives and lay out basis for future collaboration.

I've had successful meetings in DC thanks to the involvement of the Moroccan American Center team, and I would like to specially thank Jean and Kristin who have been amazing at putting together the program for me.

I was pleased to hear that all the institutions I met are keen to support AMDI mission.

I have since connected with Ambassador Bouhlal during his last visit to NY and explained to him our mandate as well the objectives of AMDI.

He assured me of the full support of the Embassy to work closely with our agency to promote the Invest in Morocco offer.

We will begin collaborating very soon with his team in view of the upcoming AMDI event in the US, currently scheduled in May.

Thank you again,

Ghita Filali

Ghita FILALI
Country Director
Representative Office - USA

Moroccan Investment Development Agency
Rockefeller Group Business Centers
1221 Avenue of The Americas, Suite 4200, New York, NY 10020
Tel : +1 212-899-5577
Fax : +1 212-899-5403

gfilali@invest.gov.ma
<http://www.invest.gov.ma>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, March 10, 2012 9:58 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Invitation: Breakfast with Moroccan Foreign Minister on March 16

Rachad,

I am a little disappointed we have little or no information on the visit of the FM. We are really unable to be helpful to you if we are not kept informed on events such as this. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: John Hamre [<mailto:JHamre@csis.org>]
Sent: Friday, March 09, 2012 2:23 PM
To: Undisclosed recipients
Subject: Invitation: Breakfast with Moroccan Foreign Minister on March 16

Dear Colleague:

I am writing to invite you to join me at a small, off-the-record meeting on next Friday, March 16, with Morocco's new Foreign Minister, Saadeddine El Othmani. We will meet over breakfast between 8:00-9:30am here at CSIS (1800 K Street, NW) in our 4th Floor Conference Room.

Mr. El Othmani is a member of the Justice and Development Party, an Islamist group that was in opposition for more than a decade until it won a plurality in Morocco's election last November. This is his first visit to Washington as foreign minister. He will speak about the new government's political platform and agenda, events in North Africa and the Middle East, and U.S.-Moroccan bilateral relations. I hope you can join me for this unique opportunity.

Please RSVP to Dan Holodnik (DHolodnik@csis.org or 202-775-3179). If you have any questions, please do not hesitate to contact the director of our Middle East Program, Jon Alterman (JAlterman@csis.org or 202-775-3295) or to reach me directly at JHamre@csis.org or 202-775-3227.

Sincerely,

John J. Hamre
President and CEO, CSIS

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, March 12, 2012 10:34 AM
To: Ambassador Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Subject: Fwd: Roll Call op-ed, Rep. Steve Cohen - "Changes Offer Positive Sign for Western Sahara" & Cong. Remarks by Rep. Chris Murphy
Attachments: Untitled attachment 00097.pdf; Untitled attachment 00100.txt; Untitled attachment 00103.pdf

FYI -- This morning, the Capitol Hill newspaper, Roll Call, published this op-ed by Rep. Steve Cohen, "Changes Offer Positive Sign for Western Sahara." Also, Capitol Words published recent Congressional Record remarks by Rep. Christopher Murphy, "Supporting Renewed Negotiations Between Morocco And The Polisario Front." Below and attached. This was timed to coincide with the UN Sahara talks, and will be widely distributed to important policy makers this week in advance of the visit of the FM to Washington. Ed http://www.rollcall.com/issues/57_107/changes-offer-positive-sign-western-sahara-213030-1.html?pos=hbtxt

Roll Call

- >
- > Monday, March 12, 2012
- >
- > Opinion
- >
- > Cohen: Changes Offer Positive Sign for Western Sahara
- >
- > By Rep. Steve Cohen - Special to Roll Call
- >
- > You may wonder what these very different places on the globe have in common: Manhasset, Long Island; Vienna, Austria; and Valletta, Malta. Unfortunately, all three represent an enormous piece of diplomatic failure that now helps prolong a decades-old dispute that threatens to put a damper on the most positive outcomes from the Arab Spring while thwarting movements toward democracy, peace and economic development in a key part of the world.
- >
- > The Western Sahara, a piece of territory the size of Colorado, has perhaps 500,000 people within its borders living, voting and participating under Moroccan sovereignty. The area has been a source of enormous contention for decades, essentially since the Spanish pulled out in 1975. The primary parties are Morocco, the Polisario — whose members live in refugee camps in southern Algeria and number fewer than 100,000 — and the Polisario’s principal backers, Algeria.
- >
- > This week, the United Nations-sponsored negotiations between the parties resume in Manhasset, the ninth such session in the past several years. Chris Ross, the U.N. secretary general’s special envoy for the Western Sahara, has publicly asked for the parties to negotiate in good faith “with the help of the international community.”
- >
- > Interestingly, he has also asked that parties respond to concrete proposals that any party makes aimed at resolving the crisis.
- >
- > One party — Morocco — has put forward just such a proposal. It’s been on the table for years. The kingdom’s proposal — for autonomy for the people of the Sahara under Moroccan sovereignty — has gained the endorsement of the past three U.S. administrations — Clinton, Bush and Obama. A majority of Congress has signaled its support on more than one occasion. The previous U.N. special envoy also called for negotiations to be conducted solely on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty.

>

> Is there another serious conflict in the world where there is such overwhelming bipartisan support in Congress for a path to resolution? We think not. But during the past eight negotiating sessions, no progress has been made. There's been no serious response by the Polisario or their Algerian backers to the Moroccan approach. No suggestions for how to amend it, shape it, even to fundamentally change it.

>

> But this negotiating session should be different. This session should be the one that suddenly changes the equation and leads to a resolution. Of course, it will take a change in behavior by all parties, but particularly the Polisario. Why is there a chance to move rapidly forward to a settlement? Because it takes place with an entirely new political and social backdrop in North Africa.

>

> What is this new paradigm that makes settlement of the Sahara dispute such an urgent — and achievable — priority? First, the main advocates for the Polisario are either gone or are severely weakened. Start with Moammar Gadhafi. Polisario-recruited mercenaries fought to keep him in power, but he's gone. The new Libyan government has endorsed the Moroccan approach.

>

> Moreover, former Polisario supporters are now backing away from them. The Polisario's human rights record has been recently criticized by the French. The Spanish government is no longer a major backer. And the Polisario is faced with a mounting protest from within, particularly from its youth groups and their frustration over the Sahara stalemate. The recent "re-election" of the Polisario's leader, Mohamed Abdelaziz, with 96-plus percent of the vote, seemed an anachronism, a throw-back to a period — not long ago — when elections across much of North Africa were rigged.

>

> The many crises spawned or exacerbated by the unresolved Sahara issue — human trafficking, drug trafficking, al-Qaida recruitment — have now reached a level where the reformed, democratic governments in the region realize they must be confronted.

>

> Lastly, Algeria is becoming increasingly isolated by its pro-Polisario position. All across North Africa, democracy and promotion of human rights are marching forward. Algeria continues to lag far behind. If the Sahara conflict is resolved, it will pave the way for a "new Algeria" joining with its neighbors, most notably Morocco, to promote social and economic integration in what promises to be a much more stable region — a dynamic one in the best sense of the word.

>

> So we hope that the parties now sitting together in Manhasset are serious about this session being very much unlike all those others. Both parties need to be serious. But only one, thus far, has brought forward a serious proposal aimed at a resolution. At the very least, those who oppose it need to explain why and present a workable alternative.

>

> Rep. Steve Cohen <<http://www.rollcall.com/members/1762.html>> (D-Tenn.) is a member of the Judiciary Committee.

>

> http://capitolwords.org/date/2012/03/08/E354_supporting-renewed-negotiations-between-morocco-an/

>

> capitolwords

>

> Monday, March 12, 2012

>

- >
- > Congressional Record
- > 112th Congress (2011-2012)
- >
- > Extensions of Remarks
- >
- > Thursday, March 8, 2012 - Volume 158, Number 38, Pages E354
- >
- > Supporting Renewed Negotiations Between Morocco And The Polisario Front
- >
- > by Rep. Christopher S. Murphy (D-CT)
- >
- > Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support the renewal of negotiations between the government of Morocco and the Polisario Front.
- >
- > The Western Sahara region has been disputed territory since the Spanish withdrew in 1975. It is claimed by Morocco and the Polisario Front, which seeks independence for the Western Sahara.
- >
- > Morocco and the Polisario began direct negotiations in 2007, under the auspices of the United Nations. The next round of negotiations begins on Monday, and I hope that a solution will finally be agreed to during the new talks in Manhasset, NY. The people who live in the Western Sahara have suffered as a result of the region's status being in limbo, and they deserve for this longstanding dispute to be resolved.
- >
- > Morocco has a compromise proposal on the table: democratic autonomy for the region under Moroccan sovereignty. I believe this is a reasonable offer and can serve as a basis for negotiations. Undersecretary of State William Burns previously described the Moroccan initiative as a "serious and credible proposal to provide real autonomy for the Western Sahara." It is also important for the region's residents to be able to express their views on their future, and for negotiators to take those views into account.
- >
- > Mr. Speaker, after more than 35 years, it is time for all parties to negotiate in good faith to finally bring this crisis to a close. We are witnessing monumental changes in North Africa following revolutions in Tunisia, Egypt, and Libya. It is in the interest of the United States and the parties involved to achieve a peaceful, negotiated solution to the Western Sahara issue, and more broadly to encourage Morocco to fully implement King Mohammed's proposed constitutional reforms and continue moving toward a more balanced governmental system that serves the many needs of all citizens of Morocco.

>

>

>

>

>

>

> Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Roll Call

Monday, March 12, 2012

Opinion

Cohen: Changes Offer Positive Sign for Western Sahara

By Rep. Steve Cohen - Special to Roll Call

You may wonder what these very different places on the globe have in common: Manhasset, Long Island; Vienna, Austria; and Valletta, Malta. Unfortunately, all three represent an enormous piece of diplomatic failure that now helps prolong a decades-old dispute that threatens to put a damper on the most positive outcomes from the Arab Spring while thwarting movements toward democracy, peace and economic development in a key part of the world.

The Western Sahara, a piece of territory the size of Colorado, has perhaps 500,000 people within its borders living, voting and participating under Moroccan sovereignty. The area has been a source of enormous contention for decades, essentially since the Spanish pulled out in 1975. The primary parties are Morocco, the Polisario — whose members live in refugee camps in southern Algeria and number fewer than 100,000 — and the Polisario's principal backers, Algeria.

This week, the United Nations-sponsored negotiations between the parties resume in Manhasset, the ninth such session in the past several years. Chris Ross, the U.N. secretary general's special envoy for the Western Sahara, has publicly asked for the parties to negotiate in good faith "with the help of the international community."

Interestingly, he has also asked that parties respond to concrete proposals that any party makes aimed at resolving the crisis.

One party — Morocco — has put forward just such a proposal. It's been on the table for years. The kingdom's proposal — for autonomy for the people of the Sahara under Moroccan sovereignty — has gained the endorsement of the past three U.S. administrations — Clinton, Bush and Obama. A majority of Congress has signaled its support on more than one occasion. The previous U.N. special envoy also called for negotiations to be conducted solely on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty.

Is there another serious conflict in the world where there is such overwhelming bipartisan support in Congress for a path to resolution? We think not. But during the past eight negotiating sessions, no progress has been made. There's been no serious response by the Polisario or their Algerian backers to the Moroccan approach. No suggestions for how to amend it, shape it, even to fundamentally change it.

But this negotiating session should be different. This session should be the one that suddenly changes the equation and leads to a resolution. Of course, it will take a change in behavior by all parties, but particularly the Polisario. Why is there a chance to move rapidly forward to a settlement? Because it takes place with an entirely new political and social backdrop in North Africa.

What is this new paradigm that makes settlement of the Sahara dispute such an urgent — and achievable — priority? First, the main advocates for the Polisario are either gone or are severely weakened. Start with Moammar Gadhafi. Polisario-recruited mercenaries fought to keep him in power, but he's gone. The new Libyan government has endorsed the Moroccan approach.

Moreover, former Polisario supporters are now backing away from them. The Polisario's human rights record has been recently criticized by the French. The Spanish government is no longer a major backer. And the Polisario is faced with a mounting protest from within, particularly from its youth groups and their frustration over the Sahara stalemate. The recent "re-election" of the Polisario's leader, Mohamed Abdelaziz, with 96-plus percent of the vote, seemed an anachronism, a throw-back to a period — not long ago — when elections across much of North Africa were rigged.

The many crises spawned or exacerbated by the unresolved Sahara issue — human trafficking, drug trafficking, al-Qaida recruitment — have now reached a level where the reformed, democratic governments in the region realize they must be confronted.

Lastly, Algeria is becoming increasingly isolated by its pro-Polisario position. All across North Africa, democracy and promotion of human rights are marching forward. Algeria continues to lag far behind. If the Sahara conflict is resolved, it will pave the way for a "new Algeria" joining with its neighbors, most notably Morocco, to promote social and economic integration in what promises to be a much more stable region — a dynamic one in the best sense of the word.

So we hope that the parties now sitting together in Manhasset are serious about this session being very much unlike all those others. Both parties need to be serious. But only one, thus far, has brought forward a serious proposal aimed at a resolution. At the very least, those who oppose it need to explain why and present a workable alternative.

Rep. Steve Cohen (D-Tenn.) is a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Monday, March 12, 2012

Congressional Record 112th Congress (2011-2012)

Extensions of Remarks

Thursday, March 8, 2012 - Volume 158, Number 38, Pages E354

Supporting Renewed Negotiations Between Morocco And The Polisario Front

Rep. Christopher S. Murphy (D-CT)

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support the renewal of negotiations between the government of Morocco and the Polisario Front.

The Western Sahara region has been disputed territory since the Spanish withdrew in 1975. It is claimed by Morocco and the Polisario Front, which seeks independence for the Western Sahara.

Morocco and the Polisario began direct negotiations in 2007, under the auspices of the United Nations. The next round of negotiations begins on Monday, and I hope that a solution will finally be agreed to during the new talks in Manhasset, NY. The people who live in the Western Sahara have suffered as a result of the region's status being in limbo, and they deserve for this longstanding dispute to be resolved.

Morocco has a compromise proposal on the table: democratic autonomy for the region under Moroccan sovereignty. I believe this is a reasonable offer and can serve as a basis for negotiations. Undersecretary of State William Burns previously described the Moroccan initiative as a "serious and credible proposal to provide real autonomy for the Western Sahara." It is also important for the region's residents to be able to express their views on their future, and for negotiators to take those views into account.

Mr. Speaker, after more than 35 years, it is time for all parties to negotiate in good faith to finally bring this crisis to a close. We are witnessing monumental changes in North Africa following revolutions in Tunisia, Egypt, and Libya. It is in the interest of the United States and the parties involved to achieve a peaceful, negotiated solution to the Western Sahara issue, and more broadly to encourage Morocco to fully implement King Mohammed's proposed constitutional reforms and continue moving toward a more balanced governmental system that serves the many needs of all citizens of Morocco.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 13, 2012 9:34 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: Our meeting today

Sure. Will you require our help on communications for the visit of the Minister?

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, March 13, 2012 9:30 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Our meeting today

Ed,

I was looking forward to our meeting today to discuss, unfortunately, it has become impossible to keep all my meetings scheduled for today because the Minister will be arriving one day earlier than planned. Can we reschedule for Friday afternoon?

Please let me know if it is convenient for you.

Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, March 18, 2012 5:31 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>
Subject: meeting this week

I'm sorry to have missed our meeting on Friday but I'm sure my office informed you of my absence due to unforeseen health reasons. I very much would like to meet this week at your convenience to get a read out on the meetings last week and how this affects our work plan moving forward, and will make myself available at your convenience. I fear that Monday or Tuesday may be too early for me to move around, although it's possible, but by Wednesday I'm sure to be able to meet. Thank you, Ed

Sent from my iPad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, March 19, 2012 7:44 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Re: meeting this week

Dear Rachad,

I had an emergency- pancreatic infection- that led to a gall bladder operation. Ended up in the hospital for 5 days. I plan to start working by tomorrow and would be available at your earliest convenience to meet. We have several upcoming events I would like to discuss when you are available. Thank you for your understanding and consideration. Ed

----- Original Message -----

From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, March 18, 2012 05:33 PM
To: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Subject: Re: meeting this week

> Ed,
>
> I hope you are feeling better and it was just a health scare and not something serious.
>
> Fiz told Saida that the doctor told you to rest for two weeks. Please let me know if there is anything I can do.
>
> As for the meeting, it can wait. Let's meet on the week of March 26th because my week is crazy anyway, but if I manage to move some meetings around, I will let you know.
>
> In the meantime, get well soon.
>
> Warm regards,
>
> Rachad

On Mar 18, 2012, at 5:31 PM, Edward Gabriel wrote:

> I'm sorry to have missed our meeting on Friday but I'm sure my office informed you of my absence due to unforeseen health reasons. I very much would like to meet this week at your convenience to get a read out on the meetings last week and how this affects our work plan moving forward, and will make myself available at your convenience. I fear that Monday or Tuesday may be too early for me to move around, although it's possible, but by Wednesday I'm sure to be able to meet. Thank you, Ed

>
> Sent from my iPad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, March 19, 2012 11:22 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Re: Fwd: meeting this week

I understand. No problem. Thx

----- Original Message -----

From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Monday, March 19, 2012 08:03 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Fwd: meeting this week

> Ed,
>
> Am glad you are out of the hospital and I wish you a speedy recovery.
>
> let me see how the week unfolds with a packed schedule and I will get back to you.
>
>
> From: "Edward Gabriel" <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com <mailto:ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com> >
>
> Subject: Re: meeting this week
>
> Date: March 19, 2012 7:43:57 AM EDT
>
> To: <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com <mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com> >
>
>
> Dear Rachad,
> I had an emergency- pancreatic infection- that led to a gall bladder operation. Ended up in the hospital for 5 days. I plan to start working by tomorrow and would be available at your earliest convenience to meet. We have several upcoming events I would like to discuss when you are available. Thank you for your understanding and consideration. Ed

> ----- Original Message -----

> From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
> Sent: Sunday, March 18, 2012 05:33 PM
> To: Edward Gabriel
> Subject: Re: meeting this week

>
> Ed,
>
> I hope you are feeling better and it was just a health scare and not something serious.
>
> Fiz told Saida that the doctor told you to rest for two weeks. Please let me know if there is anything I can do.
>
> As for the meeting, it can wait. Let's meet on the week of March 26th because my week is crazy anyway, but if I manage to move some meetings around, I will let you know.

>

> In the meantime, get well soon.

>

> Warm regards,

>

> Rachad

> On Mar 18, 2012, at 5:31 PM, Edward Gabriel wrote:

>

> I'm sorry to have missed our meeting on Friday but I'm sure my office informed you of my absence due to unforeseen health reasons. I very much would like to meet this week at your convenience to get a read out on the meetings last week and how this affects our work plan moving forward, and will make myself available at your convenience. I fear that Monday or Tuesday may be too early for me to move around, although it's possible, but by Wednesday I'm sure to be able to meet. Thank you, Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 20, 2012 3:18 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: Our meeting

I will come to you at 4pm tomorrow, not a problem. Thank you. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

-----Original Message-----

From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Tuesday, March 20, 2012 3:13 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Our meeting

>
> Ed,
>
> I hope you are feeling better.
>
> I managed to free my schedule tomorrow afternoon, so we can meet either at 4 or 5.
>
> If you are unable to make the trip all the way to the embassy, I can meet you somewhere else closer to you.
>
> Take care,
>
> Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 20, 2012 3:39 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: Our meeting

Thank you

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

-----Original Message-----

From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Tuesday, March 20, 2012 3:32 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Our meeting

>
>
> Great, see you then.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, March 22, 2012 11:04 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS report

The information contained herein is from a generally reliable source but has not be corroborated by third party sources.

BEGIN TEXT :

As you may have seen in the media this morning, an attempted coup is under way in Mali, following a mutiny by troops stationed in the north of the country, where a Touareg revolt has been raging since the beginning of the year.

The following report, received shortly before the outbreak of the mutiny/coup d'Etat, may be relevant:

A Saharawi NGO activist based in Oran, NW Algeria, states that the Algerian army has introduced new security measures in SW Algeria, as of the end of February, aimed at preventing all movement by nomadic groups between Algeria, Mauritania and northern Mali. Saharawi refugees from the Tindouf camps can no longer travel as they please beyond the perimeter of the camps. Permits issued by the Saharawi authorities, which were hitherto commonly used by camp residents for travel, in particular to Mauritania, no longer suffice for refugees who wish to travel outside the camps. Refugees who wish to go out of the camps for whatever reason now need a permit to travel on Algerian territory.

II

According to an Algiers-based Saharawi journalist, the Algerian authorities have have informed the SADR/Polisario via PM Abdelkader Taleb Oumar that Algiers is willing to provide all possible assistance to facilitate family visits between the Tindouf camps and the territories administered by Morocco.

END

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, March 23, 2012 9:35 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: consultant meeting

Rachad,

Let me ask you if a lunch at the Embassy might not be more appropriate than a dinner for the consultants? Given the schedules of the consultants and other considerations (including travel from NY for at least one person), I think a luncheon is more appropriate. However, if you feel strongly, then we can certainly arrange the dinner. As soon as I hear from you I will work with Sandrine on a date. Thanks

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, March 24, 2012 11:25 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: Projet de reponse a Ed/consultant meeting

The most convenient would be a lunch for sure. I am estimating 9-10 on our side, including Mac staff. Is that too much to handle at the Embassy?

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Saturday, March 24, 2012 10:54 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Fwd: Projet de reponse a Ed/consultant meeting

Hi Ed,

I Hope you feel well.

A lunch at the Embassy would be fine, but the number of guests would be limited. I thought that a dinner would be more convenient but a lunch at the residence is also an option.

Best,

Rachad

From: "Edward Gabriel" <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Subject: consultant meeting
Date: March 23, 2012 9:35:27 AM EDT
To: <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>

Rachad,

Let me ask you if a lunch at the Embassy might not be more appropriate than a dinner for the consultants? Given the schedules of the consultants and other considerations (including travel from NY for at least one person), I think a luncheon is more appropriate. However, if you feel strongly, then we can certainly arrange the dinner. As soon as I hear from you I will work with Sandrine on a date. Thanks

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, March 24, 2012 2:44 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: Projet de reponse a Ed/consultant meeting

Ok thanks

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Saturday, March 24, 2012 12:59 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Fwd: Projet de reponse a Ed/consultant meeting

ED
Let me check if we can make it.

Begin forwarded message:

From: "Edward Gabriel" <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Subject: RE: Projet de reponse a Ed/consultant meeting
Date: March 24, 2012 11:25:13 AM EDT
To: "Rachad Bouhlal" <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>

The most convenient would be a lunch for sure. I am estimating 9-10 on our side, including Mac staff. Is that too much to handle at the Embassy?

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Saturday, March 24, 2012 10:54 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Fwd: Projet de reponse a Ed/consultant meeting

Hi Ed,

I Hope you feel well.

A lunch at the Embassy would be fine, but the number of guests would be limited. I thought that a dinner would be more convenient but a lunch at the residence is also an option.

Best,

Rachad

From: "Edward Gabriel" <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>

Subject: consultant meeting

Date: March 23, 2012 9:35:27 AM EDT

To: <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>

Rachad,

Let me ask you if a lunch at the Embassy might not be more appropriate than a dinner for the consultants? Given the schedules of the consultants and other considerations (including travel from NY for at least one person), I think a luncheon is more appropriate. However, if you feel strongly, then we can certainly arrange the dinner. As soon as I hear from you I will work with Sandrine on a date. Thanks

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, March 26, 2012 12:34 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: Meeting the consultants

In that case we'll go back to the residence for dinner. Thanks

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

-----Original Message-----

From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Monday, March 26, 2012 12:31 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Meeting the consultants

Ed,

I hope you are feeling much better.
concerning my meeting with the consultants, the embassy's meeting-dining room, as you know, cant accommodate everyone, so a casual dinner or lunch at the residence would be better.

let's agree on a date that is convenient for all.

thank you,

Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, March 26, 2012 4:16 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: Robert M. Holley
Subject: Strategic dialogue material/very interesting and important
Attachments: Draft Morocco - US Strategic Partnership VT.doc; SceneSetterforTFFJulyVisit6July11JA.doc

Ambassador,

I hope you find the two attachments helpful when thinking about a strategic dialogue. The first document is what Morocco's MFA proposed to the State Department in March 2011, following a working session together. The second document is a scene setter written for Taieb in preparation for a later visit with Secretary Clinton, and/or Bill Burns. In that scene setter you will find our take on the structure and importance of a strategic dialogue/commission. I've highlighted the strategic dialogue section in yellow, however, I suggest you read the entire paper as it is somewhat instructive on how we worked with the Embassy in the past. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Morocco / United States Strategic Partnership

Subject	Planned actions
Political dialogue	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● High-level political dialogue: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Secretary of State and Minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation to meet once a year in Washington or in Rabat. - Share assessment and analysis on : <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ✓ regional issues such as African Affairs, Middle East Peace Process, Maghreb, Sahel-Saharan region ✓ multilateral issues such as Peace Keeping, Terrorism, Environment and Human Rights. - Coordinate actions at the UN and other international forums ● Human rights dialogue: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Strengthening of the existing Human rights dialogue and extending it to thematic meetings on Press freedom, civil society, freedom of speech, etc. - Extension of the dialogue to cooperation, capacity building and exchange of best practices.
Regional cooperation	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● Morocco /US cooperation in the MENA region: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Morocco provides experts and advisors on developing civil society and political cooperation (regional training center for Governments officials, NGOs, community leaders, youth, etc.) - Triangular aid on the advancement of the role of women - Establishment of a Gender institute in Morocco ● Morocco/US cooperation in the Maghreb : <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Implementation of the US/North Africa Entrepreneurship initiative: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ✓ Next summit to be held in Morocco in October 2011 ✓ Morocco could host a Regional Enterprise Fund, similar to the SEED banks set up by the US in Eastern Europe (capacity building of small and medium sized enterprises, equity capital

	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> - investments, extension of financial services, etc.). One of the first actions taken could be to invigorate the Morocco-US FTA to develop enterprise activities in target countries to accelerate economic growth and job development - Regional scientific cooperation. Morocco to host the US Conference on Science, Technology and Innovation (Cairo initiative), to be held in June 2011. • Morocco/US cooperation in Africa <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Triangular cooperation towards African countries: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ✓ Cooperation between the development agencies of both countries (USAID and AMCI) ✓ Cooperation in the fields of agriculture, water, health and environment. - Dialogue on crisis management / resolution in Africa.
Security cooperation	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Establishment of a bilateral security committee addressing a wide range of issues, such as drug trafficking, terrorism and human trafficking (3 reports of the State Department) • Morocco to join the Global Counter Terrorism Forum to be officially launched in September 2011
Military cooperation
Economic and trade cooperation	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Establishment of a US/Morocco Business Council: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Composed of private sector representatives from both countries - That issues recommendation for an enhanced cooperation in the field and a better implementation of the FTA • Strengthened cooperation on agriculture and renewable energies.
Scientific and Cultural cooperation	Establishment of “Excellence centers” in the field of public health, on the basis of the existing health centers and in cooperation with counterparts in the US

	Joint initiatives aiming at the promotion of tolerance, religious dialogue and the fight against racism and anti-Semitism. Strengthening of exchange programs for scholars, students, artists Increasing the number of beneficiaries of Fulbright scholarships Intensifying the learning of English language
--	--

Scene Setter – Your Senior Meeting at the State Department

Recent Background:

Reforms -- Your trip to Washington comes on the heels of the successful constitutional reform vote that has received a great deal of attention in the English language press, both online and in hard copy. Most of the coverage has been positive and complimentary of Morocco. That has been especially true when the articles have carried bylines of US journalists. They often contrast Morocco's achievement with the continuing turmoil and repression elsewhere in the region. Positive commentary has largely pointed to the important ceding of significant executive authorities to the elected head of government, the independence of the judiciary, greater rights for the Amazigh, the strengthening of human rights and gender protections, and the devolution of power to local elected leaders. By and large, the editorial line has been that these are very important steps forward in the democratic evolution of Morocco and an example to the region.

However, the coverage has not been uniformly congratulatory. Local Moroccan and other Middle East based Arab stringers for major US and other English language media outlets (especially their online editions and especially the British press) continue to provide a critical platform for clearly minor political actors in Morocco and have put the emphasis on a skeptical editorial point of view, even embedded in hard news coverage. Little or no attempt is made to define these critical voices as representing a small minority. Rather, these articles continue to allow radical Islamist views and those of the far left to fly under the false flag of the February 20 "democratic youth movement." A few more analytical pieces have pointed out this fallacy, but the viewpoint continues albeit less than the positive press overall.

We believe we are winning the opinion war in the media, but it requires constant and unrelenting attention. We believe that more outreach to the US media is in order. This is where Congress and other opinion leaders get their information and we need to do whatever we can to ensure that a positive story line dominates the coverage.

Sahara -- Your trip also comes on the heels of another process rich, but content poor, meeting of Chris Ross's periodic UN gathering on the Sahara. We have been disappointed that statements on this issue subsequent to your last visit to Washington seem once again to have fallen back into the hands of State's bureaucracy. It is interesting to note that in a briefing with academics traveling to Morocco - following a presentation by the Moroccan desk officer - we inquired as to the position offered by her on the WS. The academics were told that the US policy, according to the Desk Officer, favors a sovereignty/autonomy solution. This is the first and only sign that we have seen a public acknowledgement of the US policy on the Sahara, other than from Hillary Clinton or Bill Burns. This does not however alter the concern we have regarding the view that the NEA is resistant to making clear statements on a Sahara policy.

We were especially surprised by a recent article in Al Jazeera's English language online edition by Jeremy Keenan from the University of London which took a very critical view of the US "turning a blind eye" to Algerian support for Gaddafi's regime, calling AFRICOM commander Carter Ham the "one-eyed general.” The article offered very specific and damning evidence of this support and appeared to have likely been well informed by either French or British intelligence and military sources (or both). If this article is accurate, and the verifiable information it cites certainly seems credible, its most damning charge was that the US has conspired with the British and French to cut a deal with Algeria to let Bouteflika off the hook in public if he would agree to cease support for Gaddafi. This has clearly and seriously undercut our efforts to tar the Polisario with sending fighters to Libya. Politics are what they are, and international politics more so, but this shines a new light on why the US was so put out and harshly and personally critical of our effort in MACP to bash Algeria and the Polisario for their support to Gaddafi. This argument was carrying great weight in undercutting the Polisario in Congress and among some media and opinion leaders. We were drawing unwanted and too visible public attention to this problem while they were working behind the scenes to back the Algerians off its support for Gaddafi’s regime. In our view, the State Department should not have the option of pursuing this policy with Algeria without attention to the impact on Moroccan interests in the region.

Furthermore, we are in receipt of intelligence information that points to the proposition that activity by and support for the Polisario in Europe is on the increase, and they have made inroads in the UK, the Netherlands, and Scandinavian countries. With the upcoming elections in Spain, the report we received also underscores the possibility of electing a Conservative government that will be hostile to Moroccan policy. These developments will only complicate US positions in the Security Council and in Washington.

Goals for Your Visit:

- Obtain a senior level public announcement of a bilateral US/Moroccan commission to cooperate on issues of common bilateral as well as regional concern on both strategic security and political developments and in the MENA and West African regions.
- Obtain a fresh and unequivocal senior level statement on Sahara that repeats the “serious, credible and realistic” phrase and also incorporates an element stressing the urgency of solving this problem and urges the need for compromise based on “realistic” terms.
- Make sure that the Sahara issue has its own committee or special status within the commission. We believe that for the remainder of the Obama Administration, no further progress will be made on the Sahara issues unless it is part of a regularized commission discussion. Otherwise it will become a struggle just to keep the issue where it is.

We have not been privy to all of the various diplomatic exchanges that have taken place since your last visit to Washington, but our read on the situation at State today, from what we discern from watching their statements and reports in the news, is that little has changed within the bureaucracy since you were last here. Clear statements on the Sahara issue are void in their discourse. State’s behavior in the General Ham affair leads us to conclude that some there still believe they can get away with “improving” relations with Algeria at Morocco’s expense, although State may not characterize it that way. And State’s less than fully enthusiastic and unequivocal endorsement of the run up and the results of the reform vote all leave us with the view that the NEA has not yet been persuaded that they need to take Morocco’s interests more seriously. Like Ambassador Mekouar, we were astonished and taken back at how little State seemed to understand about what was happening on the ground in Morocco in the run up to the vote. Janet Sanderson's charges of "rubber bullets and tear gas" and "we're watching you" approach on the issue was not just out of place, it represented a serious, indeed almost willful, misreading of events on the ground.

In our continuing view, this kind of "dug in" resistance within the State bureaucracy can only be overcome by more frequent high level contact that lifts and regularizes the level of the dialogue to more senior levels and thus bears better prospect of reining in those within NEA (and elsewhere in State) who give every indication that they are still working a different agenda than the Secretary and her Deputy would prefer for Morocco.

Sahara Statement

The timing for such a statement is perfect following another process filled attempt by Chris Ross. The arguments in favor of such a statement remain the same. We think it more than appropriate to draw attention to the fact that since your visit and the Secretary's statement, State has consistently failed to repeat the agreed language. Instead, returning to the same formula you noted was unsatisfactory for Morocco on your last visit. This should also provide the opportunity to leverage that failure into a further demand that the statement include the two additional elements we noted above – urgency and the need for compromise based on realistic terms.

Bilateral Commission

Unless some in-depth preparations have taken place already of which we are unaware, we are highly skeptical that U/S Burns and/or Secretary Clinton will be prepared on this visit to do more than agree a statement that formally establishes a Commission and states its purpose in general terms. It would be a plus, but might be very difficult without prior in-depth preparations, to have included in such a statement any description of its modalities (working groups are our recommendation) and periodicity (quarterly at the working level and annually at senior level -- our counsel). We think it should be possible to define the categories in broad terms in a statement at this point such as "US/Moroccan bilateral relations, and security, social, economic and political development issues in the North and West Africa and the Middle East regions." This is broad enough to allow discussion of what you want to include in specific categories.

Our advice is to concentrate first and foremost on agreeing to the language of the statement establishing the Commission and then concentrate on agreeing to what the content should be in terms of general issues to be covered, basic modalities of how it would function, and the meeting schedules. This would be a tremendous achievement in itself if all of this can be accomplished on this visit. In our view, trying to accomplish too much at such a senior level in one meeting without in-depth prior preparation risks putting the enterprise in jeopardy. It bears recalling that there is now little interest in this proposal below the Secretary and U/S Burns. The priority is to get something concrete established that will present the bureaucracy with something of a fait accompli so that they will then have to produce results for submission to more senior levels. You could also announce the appointment of a dual secretariat to oversee the commission on a daily working basis, if you can reach such agreement by the time of the meeting. In other words, each country would appoint a principal person to oversee the work of the committees of the commission. These two individuals would become the overall coordinators for the effort and could be announced at the time of the Burns meeting.

In any case, we suggest that you propose a senior level group to meet in the immediate future (we would suggest in Rabat) to conclude details on a formal statement of purpose and scope for the Commission once the language and statement to establish the Commission has been agreed and announced in Washington at a senior level on this visit

For such a statement establishing the commission, and if discussions proceed to that depth during your visit, we suggest that the "charter" for the commission begin with a preamble that recalls the strong and historic character of US/Moroccan relations and emphasize our common commitment to a set of shared political and social values based on democratic process, respect for human rights, minority and gender equality, justice before the law, and respect for international agreements in the resolution of regional disputes.

In terms of establishing categories for working groups, we think that the more simply it is presented, the better the chance of its being accepted. We would suggest that you propose only two broad categories at the outset. One working group would work on bilateral issues between the US and Morocco. This group could cover the full range of issues from human rights to economic assistance. It clearly would be managed within State at the Office Director level through periodic interagency meetings to work on issues that are commonly agreed as requiring priority attention.

The second group should focus on regional security, political, and social development issues. This is where US/Moroccan cooperation on political development in the MENA and West Africa region would be coordinated. It is also where Sahara would be discussed. At State, this second group would also likely fall to the Office Director to manage. The inclination will be to keep the workload down and not get overly ambitious lest the process fall victim to overwork. This is why we suggest keeping it to two groups and tightly defining priorities in each group. But we believe the Sahara should be a visible and important part of any committee structure, whether as a stand-alone committee or as part of a larger "regional" committee.

Separate committees under each broad category can be defined at a later time, or evolve from the first meeting and prior to a working group meeting in Rabat. In any case, the WS will need its own concentrated effort at the Fassi Fihri - Burns/Feltman level, and should be agreed upon as an issue that will be regularly discussed with specific action agenda items attached to the effort. We see this as the only way to keep the Sahara dialogue on a progressive track and potentially become an ingrained issue to be dealt with by this Administration and potentially future Administrations.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, March 26, 2012 5:05 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Invitation: CSIS Roundtable with Mustapha Khalfi

Let me know if you would like to solicit our advice or help. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Jon B. Alterman [<mailto:middleeastprogram@csis.org>]
Sent: Monday, March 26, 2012 3:01 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Invitation: CSIS Roundtable with Mustapha Khalfi

To ensure receipt of our email, please add middleeastprogram@csis.org to your address book.

While revolutionary change has brought Islamists to rule in several Middle Eastern countries, it was evolutionary change that brought Islamists into government in Morocco after more than a decade in opposition. The country's own future trajectory and its inspirational power for other religious opposition movements in the Middle East remain the subjects of considerable debate.

To examine these issues, the CSIS Middle East Program invites you to a roundtable luncheon entitled:

Morocco: The Challenges of Democratic Reform

with

Mr. Mustapha Khalfi
Minister of Communications, Government of Morocco

Wednesday, April 4, 2012

12:00 noon to 1:30 pm
1800 K Street, NW / 4th Floor Conference Room

Mustapha Khalfi is the is the Minister of Communications of the government of Morocco, a portfolio which he has held since early 2012. He is also a member of the ruling Justice and Development Party, and a long-time Islamist political activist. Prior to assuming his new role in the government Mr. Khalfi was Editor-in-Chief of the PJD's Arabic daily newspaper Attajdid and founded the Moroccan Center for Studies and Contemporary Research in 2009. In 2007, he was a Fulbright/American Political Science Association Congressional Fellow and a Visiting Scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Throughout his career, Mr. Khalfi has published over 200 articles and reports for numerous newspapers and journals. He earned degrees in Physics and Mathematical Sciences from the College of Sciences in Kenitra, Morocco, as well as degrees in Islamic Studies and Political Science from Ibn Tofail University and Mohammed V University at Agdal.

To RSVP, please email middleeastprogram@csis.org

To unsubscribe from all CSIS emails, please click here.
To log in to your profile and edit your subscriptions, please click here

Powered By  informz

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, March 26, 2012 5:09 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Independent Diplomatic
Attachments: IndependentDiplomatic march2012.docx

Please see attached. If you require additional information we would be happy to provide it. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Independent Diplomat Brief Overview

Following reception of the memo on Independent Diplomat's activism at the UN dated 8 March 2012, we thought it relevant to provide this short preview of this pro-Polisario lobbyist's activities in the United States.

You will find below information on its employees (past and present), activities (2009-2011), funding, as well as its meetings. The latter are of particular interest as they show access to Congress and various US government agencies, as well as at the UN.

It is important to keep in mind that ID also has a presence in Europe (London).

Employees who work on SADR Dossier

Current:

Dean Bialek

Susan P. Emmet

Christina Kiel

Andrew Graham Lewis

Scott Phillip Sheeran

Carne Ross, Executive Director

Former:

Soren Jessen-Peterson (Terminated 15 July 2010)

Karine Lepillez (Terminated 19 January, 2011)

Jennifer Anne Lake, Corporate secretary

Leanne Smith (Terminated 15 June 2010)

Thomas J. Miller (Terminated 15 June 2012)

Independent Diplomat's Activities

Staff members from both ID Ltd., and ID Inc., (ID's sister organization in the United Kingdom) provide advice and support to the SADR and assist them in devising diplomatic strategy to achieve their goals. ID analyzes the SADR's current diplomatic situation by canvassing views of US government, the UN Security Council, and the European Union. ID staff members provide assistance to the SADR on diplomatic communications—letters to the UN Security Council, for example—preparation for international visits and meetings, and drafting speeches.

Solicitation of the views of US government involves meetings with key officials and desk officers in the State Department, Department of Defense, and other agencies to gather their views. ID informs SADR of this information and, on that basis, advises how best to tailor an approach to US government.

During meetings, representatives of ID discuss US policies and matters of importance to the SADR and distribute various press releases and "media backgrounders." Meetings with US officials have a two-fold purpose: One, to discuss and understand US policies affecting the SADR, and two, to brief these officials on initiatives the SADR has undertaken with ID's assistance. On Western Sahara, meetings with State Department and NSC officials focused on the regional political context of the dispute and the human rights situation in the territory.

Documents filed by ID with FARA indicate that only a small percentage of services performed for the SADR is work covered by FARA.

Funding

All funding for work in the US on behalf of the SADR comes from either the SADR or the Polisario:

- 5/12/09: Received contract fees of $6000 from POLISARIO
- 11/2/09: Received contract fees of $5,975 from SADR
- 9/6/10: Received contract fees of $10,458 from SADR
- 1/6/11: Received $10,000 from SADR

Other sources of general funding for Independent Diplomat as noted on its website include:

Foundations:

- ACE Rule of Law Fund
- David & Elaine Potter Charitable Foundation
- Gladys Kriebel Delmas Foundation
- Humanity United
- Joseph Rowntree Charitable Trust
- Mertz Gilmore Foundation
- National Endowment for Democracy
- Oak Foundation
- Open Society Institute
- Sigrid Rausing Trust
- TckTckTck Campaign
- Winston Foundation

Governments:

- The Government of Finland
- The Government of Liechtenstein
- The Government of Norway
- The Government of Switzerland

ID also gets pro bono assistance from the following law firms:

- Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton LLP
- Hogan Lovells LLP
- Patterson Belknap Webb & Tyler LLP
- White & Case LLP

Contact (meetings, phone calls)

Congress:

- Perry Cammack, Staffer, Senate Foreign Relations Committee
- 5/21/10 (Meeting also attended by Daniel Benaim, Staffer, Senate Foreign Relations Committee)
- Donald Payne, NJ Congressman and Chairman of the House Subcommittee on Africa and Global Health
- 11/06/09
- Joel Starr, Staffer, Office of Senator Inhofe
- 2/19/10

Department of Defense:

Ambassador Vicki Huddleston, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Africa in the Office of Secretary of Defense

4/26/10; 8/27/10

Department of State:

Jeff Feltman, Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Near East Affairs

4/6/10

Elisabeth Hopkins, Director of Assistance to Asia and the Near East in the Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration

4/23/09

Randall Kaailau, Morocco Desk Officer

3/30/09

Margaret Nardi, Deputy Director/Director of the Office of Maghreb Affairs

3/30/09; 5/6/10; 10/21/09

Michael Posner, Assistant Secretary of State for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor

2/11/10; 5/3/10 (Meeting also attended by Deborah Graze, Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary DHRL, and Kathleen Fitzpatrick, Deputy Assistant DHRL)

9/26/11

Janet Sanderson, Deputy Assistant Secretary, Bureau of Near East Affairs

3/30/10; 9/15/10

Barbara Masilko, Senior Staff, NEA 3/15/10

National Security Council:

Sergio Aguirre, Director for North Africa, National Security Council

10/21/09; 1/19/2010; 2/12/10; 5/21/10; 1/19/12

United Nations:

Elizabeth Cousens, Principal Advisor to the US Ambassador to the UN, US Mission to the UN

2/3/09

Ambassador Rosemary DiCarlo, US Mission to the United Nations

1/23/09, 3/1/09, 10/5/2011

Michael Gordon, US Mission to UN

4/29/09

Barbara Masilko, US Mission to UN

3/15/10

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 27, 2012 2:58 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Social Security taxes/totalization agreement
Attachments: Memo_Amb MUSTA 15Feb12.docx

Rachad,

Attached is a memo sent to you on February 17th regarding a proposal to address the double taxation question with regard to social security taxes between our two countries. Included in this analysis is a list of countries that have totalization agreements with the US and the ones Morocco has with other countries. There is a growing list of US companies that view this issue as an impediment to their decision to send US employees to Morocco to work on projects in Morocco. Do you have any interest to pursue this further with US companies and if so, could you give us an idea of whether there is an interest in Morocco to pursue an agreement with the US? There are several US companies waiting to make corporate joint venture decisions with Moroccan companies and any signal I could pass on from you would be appreciated. Thank you for your time and consideration of this request and sorry I forgot to bring it up last week when we were together. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

17 February 2012

Memorandum

TO: H.E. Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal

From: Ed Gabriel

RE: Eliminating Duplicate Social Security Payments

Mr. Ambassador

This document provides the background on the need to promote the adoption of a "totalization" agreement between Morocco and the US in order to eliminate duplicate social security payments for US employees residing in Morocco for more than six months.

I have also attached a copy of the Social Security Administrations (SSA) Totalization Agreement with Spain which clarifies what type of clauses are included in such agreements.

I appreciate your attention to this concern and look forward to discussing it in detail with you.

Regards,

Ed

PROPOSAL FOR THE CREATION OF THE:
Morocco US Totalization Alliance (MUSTA)
To eliminate duplicate social security payments

Overview

With increased prospects for a greater number of US citizens working in the Kingdom of Morocco, US employers with operations in Morocco, whether corporate or NGO, have expressed increased concern with regard to ensuring that the tax consequences for the employer and employees are dealt with equitably. Morocco has a tax agreement with the United States (Convention for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with Respect to Taxes on Income – signed in Rabat 1 August 1977, and Related Exchanges of Notes), but it does not apply to the estate, gift, and generation-skipping transfer taxes, the Windfall Profits Tax, Federal unemployment taxes, social security taxes, or excise taxes on premiums paid to foreign insurers. Therefore, US expatriates must conform to Moroccan social security laws and US employers are required to register their employees with the Caisse National de Securite Sociale (CNSS) and pay social security taxes on the basis of an employee's gross salary and other benefits granted to the employees.

To alleviate this double taxation in other cases, the US Social Security Administration (SSA) has signed treaties, often referred to as Totalization Agreements, with government social insurance programs in various foreign countries. These treaties serve two main functions: 1) they eliminate dual Social Security taxation, so that workers from one country working in another country will not have to pay Social Security taxes to both countries on the same earnings; and 2) they help fill gaps in benefit protection for workers who have divided their careers between the United States and another country by providing continuity in their social security payments.

Since a bi-lateral social security agreement/convention does not currently exist between the US and Morocco, it is necessary to initiate an effort to promote the mutual adoption of such an agreement at the earliest possible opportunity.

Morocco-US Social Security Issue

It is mandatory for all employers to participate in the Caisse National de Securite Sociale (CNSS) and they are responsible for enrolling all employees in the program. Expatriate employees are considered part of the Moroccan workforce—they participate fully in social security and are afforded the same benefits as Moroccans.

Employers contribute approximately 6% of the company payroll to social security, while employees' contributions are about 3% of earnings. This amount is automatically deducted from an employee's pay so no further action is needed by the employee to contribute.

Existing US treaties/agreements

Per the SSA website, the following countries have signed totalization agreements with the SSA ¹:

- Italy (November 1, 1978)
- Germany (December 1, 1979)
- Switzerland (November 1, 1980)
- Belgium (July 1, 1984)
- Norway (July 1, 1984)
- Canada (August 1, 1984)
- United Kingdom (January 1, 1985)
- Sweden (January 1, 1987)
- Spain (April 1, 1988)
- France (July 1, 1988)
- Portugal (August 1, 1989)
- Netherlands (November 1, 1990)
- Austria (November 1, 1991)
- Finland (November 1, 1992)
- Ireland (September 1, 1993)
- Luxembourg (November 1, 1993)
- Greece (September 1, 1994)
- South Korea (April 1, 2001)
- Chile (December 1, 2001)
- Australia (October 1, 2002)
- Japan (October 1, 2005)
- Denmark (October 1, 2008)
- Czech Republic (January 1, 2009)
- Poland (March 1, 2009)
- Mexico (Signed on June 29, 2004, but not yet in effect)

Existing Moroccan treaties/agreements

The Moroccan government has signed 18 bilateral conventions on Social Security payments per the CNSS website. Others are in the process of negotiation:

Conventions signed and in effect (12):

1. France (July 9, 1965)
2. Belgium (June 24, 1968)
3. The Netherlands (February 14, 1972)
4. Spain (November 8, 1979)
5. Sweden (January 4, 1980)
6. Germany (March 25, 1981)
7. Denmark (April 24, 1982)
8. Romania (July 27, 1983)
9. Libya (August 4, 1983)
10. Tunisia (February 5, 1987)

¹ To view all if the agreements in detail visit http://www.ssa.gov/international/agreements_overview.html

11. Canada (July 1, 1998)
12. Portugal (November 14, 1998)

Conventions signed for ratification (06):

1. Algeria (February 23, 1991)
2. U.M.A (March 10, 1991 – multilateral convention)
3. Italy (February 18, 1994)
4. Québec (May 25, 2000)
5. Egypt (May 12, 2006)
6. Luxembourg (October 2, 2006)

Conventions in negotiation (03):

1. Norway
2. Greece
3. Turkey

Morocco's conventions cover the following basic principles:

- Equality of treatment between Moroccan nationals and the host countries' nationals in terms of rights and duties relating to social security.
- Determining the needed legislation to avoid undue accumulation of social security contributions or other contributions and employee-born benefits.
- Maintaining the authority of the initially applied legislation in exceptional cases, such as maintaining affiliation if the person is working on another country's territory.
- Retaining rights in the acquisition process for maintaining contribution, employment, and residence periods complying with one party's legislation, and cumulating it with corresponding periods achieved with the other party, in order to 1) acquire, maintain, or regain rights and, should it occur, calculate benefits; and 2) enroll in voluntary or optional insurance.
- The transfer of acquired benefits to beneficiaries in line with one party's legislation, regardless of their place of residence.

Need for an US-Morocco agreement

No exceptions to the above can be made unless an agreement is in place. For example, the "detached worker" rule (designed to minimize disruptions in the coverage careers of workers whose employers send them abroad on temporary assignment) or "seconded" expats (those workers on loan for a determined period not exceeding an authorized duration) apply only within the framework of an existing bilateral agreements on social security entered into between Morocco and the United States.

CNSS was contacted regarding this issue in December 2010, and they confirmed that no convention/agreement is in place, none is in the works, and the above rules apply to US expats with no exceptions. They expressed their frustration at this void and their strong desire to see this matter resolved between Morocco and the United States.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 27, 2012 4:51 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: Social Security taxes/totalization agreement

Ok. Thanks. It would be helpful to understand steps as we move forward so we can keep our the companies informed, and be able to provide a general understanding to them regarding progress, obstacles etc. Also, when appropriate I can have them meet with you on this subject to convey their direct interest and a sense of the problem. You also said in the email, “By the way there was no meme attached”. Do you mean the names of companies that have an interest in this subject? There are several companies/institutions which I can reveal at an appropriate time and also provide you with a list of more companies interested in joining in support. Thanks Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, March 27, 2012 4:38 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Re: Social Security taxes/totalization agreement

Ed,
I know the importance of this matter and I mentioned it in many of my contacts here. I have invited more than one month ago my ministry to work on a draft to propose to our american partners. I worked on models already signed with other countries.
The only problem is that these kind of agreements take some time because many administrations are involved.
By the way there was no meme attached.
Rachad
On Mar 27, 2012, at 2:58 PM, Edward Gabriel wrote:

Rachad,
Attached is a memo sent to you on February 17th regarding a proposal to address the double taxation question with regard to social security taxes between our two countries. Included in this analysis is a list of countries that have totalization agreements with the US and the ones Morocco has with other countries. There is a growing list of US companies that view this issue as an impediment to their decision to send US employees to Morocco to work on projects in Morocco. Do you have any interest to pursue this further with US companies and if so, could you give us an idea of whether there is an interest in Morocco to pursue an agreement with the US? There are several US companies waiting to make corporate joint venture decisions with Moroccan companies and any signal I could pass on from you would be appreciated. Thank you for your time and consideration of this request and sorry I forgot to bring it up last week when we were together. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

<Memo_Amb MUSTA 15Feb12.docx>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 27, 2012 5:13 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: Social Security taxes/totalization agreement

Oh, Well I'm not sure what happened. Let me go back. Sorry.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, March 27, 2012 5:08 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Re: Social Security taxes/totalization agreement

Ed,
 I ment no memo attached. Rachad
 On Mar 27, 2012, at 4:51 PM, Edward Gabriel wrote:

Ok. Thanks. It would be helpful to understand steps as we move forward so we can keep our the companies informed, and be able to provide a general understanding to them regarding progress, obstacles etc. Also, when appropriate I can have them meet with you on this subject to convey their direct interest and a sense of the problem. You also said in the email, "By the way there was no meme attached". Do you mean the names of companies that have an interest in this subject? There are several companies/institutions which I can reveal at an appropriate time and also provide you with a list of more companies interested in joining in support. Thanks Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, March 27, 2012 4:38 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Re: Social Security taxes/totalization agreement

Ed,
 I know the importance of this matter and I mentioned it in many of my contacts here. I have invited more than one month ago my ministry to work on a draft to propose to our american partners. I worked on models already signed with other countries.
 The only problem is that these kind of agreements take some time because many administrations are involved.
 By the way there was no meme attached.
 Rachad
 On Mar 27, 2012, at 2:58 PM, Edward Gabriel wrote:

Rachad,
 Attached is a memo sent to you on February 17th regarding a proposal to address the double taxation question with regard to social security taxes between our two countries. Included in this analysis is a list of countries that have totalization agreements with the US and the ones Morocco has with other countries. There is a growing list of US companies that view this issue as an impediment to their decision to send US employees to Morocco to work on projects in Morocco. Do you have any interest to pursue this further with US companies and if so, could you give us an idea of whether there is an interest in Morocco to pursue an agreement with the US? There are several US companies waiting to make corporate joint venture decisions with Moroccan companies and any signal I could pass on from you would be appreciated. Thank you for your time and consideration of this request and sorry I forgot to bring it up last week when we were together. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

<Memo_Amb MUSTA 15Feb12.docx>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 27, 2012 5:14 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Social Security taxes/totalization agreement
Attachments: Memo_Amb MUSTA 15Feb12.docx

It appears to be attached, but just in case, here it is again. Thanks

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel
Sent: Tuesday, March 27, 2012 2:58 PM
To: Boulal Rachad (rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com)
Subject: Social Security taxes/totalization agreement

Rachad,

Attached is a memo sent to you on February 17th regarding a proposal to address the double taxation question with regard to social security taxes between our two countries. Included in this analysis is a list of countries that have totalization agreements with the US and the ones Morocco has with other countries. There is a growing list of US companies that view this issue as an impediment to their decision to send US employees to Morocco to work on projects in Morocco. Do you have any interest to pursue this further with US companies and if so, could you give us an idea of whether there is an interest in Morocco to pursue an agreement with the US? There are several US companies waiting to make corporate joint venture decisions with Moroccan companies and any signal I could pass on from you would be appreciated. Thank you for your time and consideration of this request and sorry I forgot to bring it up last week when we were together. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, March 30, 2012 12:22 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Comm Plan: Ambassador Roll-out
Attachments: COMMAmbRollOut032112mod.docx

Rachad,

Attached is our compilation of ideas for your communications rollout. I'd be happy to review this with you next week at your convenience and will call your office once you give me the go ahead to meet. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

MEMORANDUM

TO: Jordan Paul
CC: Garth Neuffer, Naomi Decter
FROM: Calvin Dark
SUBJECT: Communications Plan for Ambassador Bouhlal Rollout
DATE: 3/11/2019

As Morocco seeks to increase support among US media, policymakers and think-tank leaders, the arrival of Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal provides a wonderful opportunity to introduce the Ambassador to the US and communicate Morocco's positive messages. The MAC Communications Team would like to propose the following activities as a roll-out for the Ambassador in the US over the coming weeks (all, ideally, to be concluded before the beginning of summer vacations in July.)

Media Luncheon with the Ambassador

The Comm. Team proposes to work with the Embassy to organize a media luncheon at the Embassy with the Ambassador and a small group of select reporters to introduce himself as Morocco's new Ambassador and for a briefing on US-Moroccan relations, including highlighting the importance of targeting US support for the refugee camps and full implementation of the recent Appropriations language. The proposed journalists include:

- 1) Jennifer Rubin (Washington Post, "Right Turn") – Jennifer Rubin is very interested in Morocco, understands and supports our messaging, particularly with regards to the Western Sahara, the Polisario and terrorism. Rubin has written several times on key issues concerning our campaigns and maintain and strengthening this relationship will be very beneficial in the future.
- 2) Massoud Hayoun (The Atlantic) – Massoud Hayoun writes often about the Arab Spring and has written about Morocco's experience, as it relates to ethnic identity and protection of ethnic minorities. His publication is well-known and well-respected—particularly among the Left—and educating Hayoun/strengthening that relationship will encourage him to explore and write further on Morocco and topics related to our campaigns.
- 3) Lee Smith (The Weekly Standard) -- Lee Smith is Weekly Standard Senior Editor and author of the respected book on the Middle East, "The Strong Horse." He has reported extensively on the Middle East/Arab Spring and has written favorably several times about Morocco -- about human rights, Western Sahara and the king's March 9, 2011 speech on Constitutional reform.
- 4) Oren Dorell (USA Today) -- Oren Dorrel, a foreign affairs reporter for USA Today, writes about society and warfare in the Middle East, from Morocco to Pakistan. He has written favorably about the recent Constitutional reforms and referendum.

- 5) Eli Lake (Newsweek/The Daily Beast) -- Eli Lake, Senior National Security correspondent for Newsweek/The Daily Beast, writes extensively about security ramifications for US policy of developments in MENA.
- 6) Jackson Diehl (Washington Post) -- Jackson Diehl is an influential foreign affairs columnist for the Washington Post.
- 7) Robert Kagan (Brookings Institution) -- Robert Kagan, senior fellow at Brookings is historian, author and foreign policy commentator, who is very interested in Morocco. His latest book (2012), The World America Made, has won broad acclaim and was mentioned in President Obama's most recent state of the union address.

Editorial Board Meetings

The Comm. Team proposes meetings for the Ambassador at the major newspaper editorial boards in DC and NYC to introduce himself and educate editorialists on Morocco-US relations, democratic reforms, appropriations language and efforts to peacefully resolve the Western Sahara conflict. The proposed editorial boards include:

- 1) Wall Street Journal
- 2) New York Times
- 3) Washington Post

Think Tank Roundtable (Public)

Ambassador Bouhlal has met off-the-record with policymakers at the Council on Foreign Relations. Given the influence of think tanks in Washington, DC, the Comm. Team proposes an additional, public "conversation-style" roundtable with the Ambassador and a moderator to discuss previously agreed upon topics, followed by a Q&A portion with the audience. Invited guests would include policymakers (from the Hill and Admin) and targeted journalists. Possible locations for this roundtable would be CSIS, Brookings and The German Marshall Fund.

Website "Feature" Section

Our website statistics and analysis of web search results indicates that there are many people searching for information about Ambassador Bouhlal. (A Google search for "morocco ambassador bouhlal" yields the current posting on the MoroccoOnTheMove website about Ambassador Bouhlal's event in Utah as the second result. Also, the most viewed post on the MOTM website over the last 30 days was "Morocco's New Ambassador to the United States – Mohamed Rachad Bouhlal.") Because the Embassy website is under construction, and to take advantage of the reach of the MoroccoOnTheMove website, the Comm Team proposes to use the "Features" section of MOTM not only to provide a photo, bio and contact information for the Ambassador, but also to highlight other public activities he participates in. (Note that after only four months on line, the website has had over 20,000 hits.) In addition, the current NPR sponsor tags refer to the MOTM website, so that these "Features" postings would increase the Ambassador's exposure as he conducts introductory meetings over the coming months.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, March 30, 2012 1:28 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Spotlight -- Final Layout for review
Attachments: SR_Spotlight-CaseforRedirectingUSAidtoPolisarioCamps(FULL DOCUMENT)033012.doc

Attached is the latest MACP paper on the Polisario, which will be used as a handout and on our website. The new website has now surpassed 20,000 hits in four months. Thank you, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Moroccan American Center for Policy

April 2012

The case for redirecting US aid for the Polisario-run camps in Algeria, which are becoming a recruiting ground for AQIM, arms and drug traffickers

Evidence continues to grow that members of the Polisario Front have been engaged in drug and arms smuggling in the Sahel, gun battles and incursions in Mali, kidnappings and collaboration with AQIM, and as mercenaries for Qaddafi in Libya. Given escalating security concerns in the region, rather than subsidize the camps, which are becoming a recruiting ground for terrorists and traffickers, US assistance should be redirected to promote durable solutions prioritizing refugee resettlement, thus removing the security threat emanating from the camps and improving the humanitarian situation of the refugees.

AQIM’s growing ties with Polisario members and other militants in the region—Boko Haram in Nigeria and al-Shabaab in Somalia—have created what AFRICOM head US General Carter Ham calls a “threat to the US”² and UK Foreign Secretary William Hague says could have a “profoundly destabilizing effect on countries in North Africa and the Gulf.”³ UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon has warned that ‘inaction could be catastrophic’ as AQIM and other militants form alliances with traffickers smuggling almost $1 billion in cocaine a year through Africa’s Sahel.⁴ A recent ICTS study confirms that the Polisario camps have become “a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises,”⁵ and a new Carnegie Paper reports that “deteriorating social and political conditions in the camps in Tindouf represent a tinderbox waiting to explode.” The AQIM-Polisario connection is “major security threat”⁶ to the region and to aid workers and refugees forced to live in the Tindouf camps, which rely heavily on international and US aid dollars to exist. Instead, this money should be used for promoting durable solutions to the refugee crisis.

According to multiple reports, the Polisario violates refugee rights and is the leading impediment to refugee resettlement.⁷ Refugees in the camps are among the only refugees in the world who are welcome to go elsewhere, if the Polisario would let them. Since 1990 international agencies have spent more than $1 billion perpetuating these conditions in the camps—more than $300 million from the US.⁸

Much of it has reportedly been diverted to profit some Polisario leaders. While international aid has provided vital resources to the refugees, it has done little to promote durable solutions, a principal mandate of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) under international refugee law. Rather than perpetuate a humanitarian crisis and an increasingly volatile security crisis, US support to UNHCR should be targeted for the promotion of durable solutions, including voluntary repatriation, local integration, and resettlement in a third country.

Now is the time to take action to guarantee the stability and security of the Maghreb and Sahel by resolving the refugee crisis. UNHCR must take action to create the conditions for the implementation of durable solutions including: conduct of a census to identify and provide documentation to Sahrawi refugees; establishment of an intimidation-free, voluntary repatriation program for those Sahrawi refugees who wish to return to their previous homelands and families in Morocco; establishment of a viable resettlement program for those Sahrawi refugees who wish to settle in a third country, and creation of a partnership with the Algerian government to improve prospects for local integration for those who want to remain in Algeria.

Rossella Urru and two other Western aid workers were kidnapped October 23, 2011 in the Polisario-run refugee camps near Tindouf, Algeria by an AQIM sect reportedly receiving help from Polisario sympathizers.¹

US and international aid dollars should only be used to support refugee rights and durable solutions, not to deny their rights or subsidize a recruiting ground for terrorists and traffickers.

A review of documented incidents and expert reports confirms that the Polisario-run camps are indeed a recruiting ground for AQIM, a hub for opportunistic Polisario members trafficking arms across the Sahel and drugs into Europe, and a threat to the security of the region and reforms of the Arab Spring. The most significant of these recent developments includes:

- Polisario members have assisted and carried out AQIM kidnappings – On October 23, 2011, Polisario insiders reportedly helped an AQIM offshoot kidnap three Western aid workers from the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria. The assailants were supplied weapons and directions to the victims, who were at the Polisario headquarters location in the Rabouni camp, and they had to travel through several security checkpoints to make their escape.⁹ AQIM offshoot ‘al Qaeda in Polisario camps’ reportedly seized two more victims, French, on November 24.¹⁰ In a separate incident, Mauritanian court records reveal AQIM paid Polisario veterans to kidnap Spanish nationals in 2009.¹¹
- Polisario drug and arms smuggling rings in the Sahel – In the last two years, Algeria, Mali, and Mauritania have arrested dozens of Polisario members caught leading or operating major drug and arms trafficking rings in the region, linked to

AQIM and South American cartels engaged in trans-Atlantic drugs-for-arms trade with end markets in Europe and the Americas.¹²

- Polisario-related incursions and battles in Mali – On Dec. 15, a Polisario cadre invaded Mali, killing one person, kidnapping three, and provoking a Mali warning that ‘this isn’t the Wild West.’¹³ In Sept. 2011, a gun battle between Polisario and rival drug gangs killed four in north Mali.¹⁴ On March 22, 2012, Mali’s democratically elected government was overthrown in a coup that analysts say was sparked by a “toxic cocktail of rebels, weapons, refugees, drought, smugglers and violent Islamic militants” that spilled into Mali with Tuareg and other pro-Qaddafi forces from the Libya conflict.¹⁵
- Polisario mercenaries hired by Qaddafi to fight NATO and Libyan rebels – Last spring, senior NATO officials were reported to receive reliable information that Qaddafi paid hundreds of Polisario mercenaries $10,000 each to fight for him in Libya.¹⁶

* For Full Chronology of documented incidents and reports linking members of the Polisario Front with AQIM, trafficking, and other illicit activities in the region, go to:

<http://moroccoonthemove.com/chronology>

Chronology:

Documented incidents and reports linking members of the Polisario Front with AQIM, trafficking, and other illicit activities in the region.

March 12, 2012

The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace publishes a paper underscoring the “disturbing reality” that growing numbers of disenchanted Polisario youth and fighters are being recruited by AQIM and a “vast network” of regional drug traffickers. The paper cites the Oct.23 kidnappings as confirmation that, “the deteriorating social and political conditions in the camps in Tindouf represent a tinderbox waiting to explode.” It also notes that AQIM-Polisario member links pose “a major security threat to the Maghreb and the Sahel.”¹⁷

Feb. 21, 2012

Experts testify to a United Nations Security Council special session that drug cartels and smugglers now traffic almost $1 billion in cocaine a year from Latin America into Africa's Sahel. They add that traffickers are forming alliances with AQIM and other militants, in a region that has seen an influx of Libyan weapons. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon warned leaders: "inaction could be catastrophic."¹⁸

Feb. 2, 2012

ICTS releases a study reporting that the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria have become "a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises." The study recommends that Western aid to the camps "prioritize permanent resettlement" for the refugees to confront this new reality. Noting expanding AQIM links with Polisario members, South American drug cartels, Boko Haram, and al-Shabaab, as well as AQIM's access to the influx of Libyan weapons in the Sahel, the study cites a 500% rise in terrorist attacks in the region since 9/11. It argues that AQIM is seeking to extend an "arc of instability" across Africa to exploit turbulence from the Arab Spring and destabilize the region.¹⁹

Jan. 11, 2012

Algerian and Mauritanian security agencies reportedly break up major drug trafficking and money laundering rings. Officials say the rings are believed to be linked with groups such as al-Qaeda, which is working with the Polisario to traffic arms and drugs from Mauritania to northern neighbors. Mali reportedly also steps up efforts against AQIM and what is believed its latest offshoot, "Al Qaida in Polisario Camps," said to have abducted two French nationals Nov. 2011.²⁰

Jan. 3, 2012

Security expert Dr. J. Peter Pham, Atlantic Council, reports that economic and political reforms in Africa are "threatened by the spread of violent extremism" and "increasing links" between AQIM and other militants in the Sahel, recently "buoyed by the flow of arms and fighters" from Libya. "More ominously, AQIM has increased its linkages with the Polisario," evident in AQIM's Oct. 23 kidnappings near Tindouf, which were "aided by Polisario sympathizers" inside the Polisario's camps. The camps offer "a ready pool of potential recruits" from "large numbers of idle young fighters."²¹

Dec. 27, 2011

Mali reportedly distances itself from the Polisario, accusing it of kidnapping, drug trafficking, and suspected collusion with a Sahrawi branch of al-Qaeda in the Maghreb. A source close to the government says Mali is "angry" with the Polisario, and Malian officials say the Oct. 23 kidnapping was done in collusion with the 'Sahrawi link' of AQIM.²²

Dec. 24, 2011

Mali refuses entry to "eight young Sahrawis" coming from Niger. "They had no papers. There are laws to be respected in Mali especially when it comes to dubious propaganda," said Malian police.²³

Dec. 17, 2011

Mali warns the Polisario, "our country is not the Wild West where they can come to kill and kidnap people." Bamako will "no longer accept the violation of its territorial integrity by the Polisario Front," says a Malian Minister. A local official adds, "everybody here knows who AQIM's accomplices are, they even assisted in abducting the Europeans in Tindouf. His name is Omar al Sahraoui, but neither Mali, nor Algeria, nor the Polisario are doing anything to capture him." In 2010, al Sahraoui, reportedly a Polisario veteran, was sentenced to 12 years in Mauritania for kidnapping Spanish aid workers for AQIM, according to Mauritanian court papers. He was later released in a trade for the aid workers.²⁴

Dec. 15, 2011

Members of the Polisario launch an armed incursion into northern Mali, killing one and abducting three others, ostensibly looking for the kidnappers of three Western aid workers taken Oct. 23 from the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria.²⁵

Dec. 10, 2011

A splinter group of AQIM confirms that it is holding the three aid workers kidnapped on Oct. 23 near the Tindouf refugee camps in Algeria. The group, linked by some to al Sahraoui, calls itself "Unity Movement for Jihad in West Africa."²⁶

Nov. 30, 2011

The US House Subcommittee on Counterterrorism & Intelligence hears testimony that AQIM is expanding its ties in the Sahel with the Polisario, as well as militant Nigerian group Boko Haram and Somalia-based al-Shabaab.²⁷

Nov. 28, 2011

UK Foreign Secretary William Hague says AQIM's expanding terrorist ties to other militant groups in the Sahel could have a "profoundly destabilizing" effect on a region already rocked by the Arab Spring.²⁸

Nov. 24, 2011

AQIM kidnaps two French tourists from their hotel at night in eastern Mali, claiming they are spies. Officials later report that the abductions were coordinated with the Polisario.²⁹

Nov. 7, 2011

Algerian Chief of Staff General Qaid Saleh reportedly reprimands Polisario chief Mohammed Abdul Aziz for allowing an al-Qaeda presence inside the Polisario-controlled camps in Tindouf.³⁰

Nov. 6, 2011

Washington Post columnist Jennifer Rubin cites alarm at AQIM kidnappings in the Polisario camps. "This is a catastrophe waiting to happen. The need to empty the camps, deprive AQIM of a supply of victims and accomplices, and restore order has never been greater."³¹

Oct. 26, 2011

Spanish daily El Pais reports on the Tindouf abductions, noting that, "to cross the checkpoints of the Algerian army and Polisario, kidnappers benefited from support of Polisario's military."³²

Oct. 25, 2011

Spain requests a UN security mission to the Polisario-run camps. "We've asked the UN to send a mission to Algeria to assess the security situation in the camps of Tindouf" – Foreign Minister Trinidad Jimenez.³³

Oct. 23, 2011

An AQIM splinter group kidnaps three Western aid workers from the Polisario-run camps in Algeria, reportedly with Polisario-insider help. "Unarmed AQIM militants entered the Sahrawi refugee camp in Tindouf, western Algeria, where sympathizers of the Polisario Front gave them weapons and helped them seek out the hostages."³⁴

Sept. 29, 2011

Mauritanian President reports that AQIM and other militants have acquired Libyan arms, including surface-to-air missiles.³⁵

Sept. 20, 2011

US terrorism expert Yonah Alexander, International Center for Terrorism Studies, says the "Polisario is intensifying activities to transport and smuggle illegal drugs in both North Africa and Europe. The Polisario is working with Al Qaida in both the drug and weapons trade."³⁶

Sept. 15, 2011

Malian security forces hunt for rival gangs of drug smugglers from Mali, Niger, and the Polisario, after a desert gun battle over ton of cocaine and hashish leaves four dead, according to a Malian army official.³⁷

Sept. 10, 2011

Analysts say that Libyan dictator Qaddafi's fall seriously weakens the Polisario in its dispute with Morocco on the Western Sahara, after widespread reports that Polisario mercenaries sided with Qaddafi.³⁸

May 29, 2011

US Congressman Mario Diaz-Balart urges colleagues in Congress to give "serious attention" to evidence that Polisario members are "participating as mercenaries in Colonel Qaddafi's murderous campaign."³⁹

May 20, 2011

The US Administration expresses concern to Algeria that "credible sources report" that Polisario mercenaries are being paid by Qaddafi "to fight NATO-led forces and kill Libyan protesters and rebels."⁴⁰

April 21, 2011

The London Telegraph reports that senior NATO officials have received information that Col. Qaddafi is hiring 450 Polisario mercenaries for $10,000 each to fight Libyan rebels and prop up his regime.⁴¹

Jan. 16, 2011

Former Polisario Chief Police Inspector, Mustapha Salma Ould Sidi Mouloud says "the situation is grave for the youth who are marginalized" in Polisario-run camps in Algeria. "The camps are fertile grounds for Islamic fundamentalist groups and drug traffickers."⁴²

Jan. 6, 2011

Terrorism cell and arms cache broken up in W. Sahara suggest "links between AQIM and the Algeria-backed Polisario Front."⁴³ Washington Post columnist J. Rubin writes, "there is ample evidence the Polisario Front... is in league with al-Qaeda."⁴⁴

Jan. 3, 2010

US DEA former Director of Operations, Michael Braun, calls conditions 'dismal for Saharans living in the Polisario-run camps,' which have become a "breeding-ground for potential future AQIM recruits."⁴⁵

Dec. 21, 2010

Leaders arrested in one of the Sahel's largest drug-smuggling rings are purported to have close ties to the Polisario Front. Nigerien officials call it, "one of the major drug trafficking networks" in the Sahara. It is known as "Polisario" because 90% of its members come from camps of the Polisario Front.⁴⁶

Dec. 9, 2010

Political experts express increasing concern about violence instigated by pro-Polisario militants in Laayoune, Western Sahara. "The situation is becoming more dangerous, because of the violence and because al-Qaeda is now present." – political analyst T. Tarik.⁴⁷

Nov. 10, 2010

Algeria reports "Cocaine that comes from Brazil, Peru, and Colombia supports the nucleus of al-Qaeda in the region" – Algerian head of the National Office for Combating Drugs & Addiction, Abdelmalek Sayeh.⁴⁸

Oct. 18, 2010

A drug ring linked to AQIM is dismantled in Morocco. VOA cites experts and evidence from Mauritania and Mali indicating that AQIM has worked in the last two years "to recruit Sahrawis who are trained fighters to carry out their operations."⁴⁹

Aug. 23, 2010

AQIM frees three Spanish kidnapping victims after Mauritania agrees to release the perpetrator, Omar Sahraoui, who is “believed to have been a senior commander of the Polisario Front in Western Sahara.”⁵⁰

July 2010

Mauritania sentences reported Polisario veteran, Omar al Sahraoui, to 12 years for the 2009 kidnapping of Spanish aid workers. Mauritanian court papers document that he was paid by AQIM along with at least three other Polisario veterans to organize and carry out the crime.⁵¹

April 12, 2010

Security expert calls the Western Sahara conflict a “vicious cycle” that terrorists can exploit; cites “evidence that members of the military arm of the Polisario Front have been involved in illicit activities.”⁵²

February 2010

Polisario veteran Omar le Sahraoui is arrested in Mali and extradited to stand trial in Mauritania for kidnapping Spanish aid workers.⁵³

Nov. 29, 2009

AQIM claims responsibility for kidnapping three Spanish aid workers in Mauritania. Mauritanian security services later discover that AQIM had hired Omar al Sahraoui—who was reportedly a member of the Polisario’s hierarchy—and at least three other Polisario veterans to organize and carry out the abductions.⁵⁴

¹ “Three Qaeda hostages seized last week alive.” AFP, Oct. 30, 2011, <<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5g fsKPTIgBSIQzBQKR-Fdjz0A?docId=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4 c3f07.531>>.

² “Al-Qaeda could be looking for new sanctuaries in troubled African states.” Middle East Online, October 30, 2011, <<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=48788>>.

³ “EU police, experts to counter al Qaeda in Africa-UK.” Reuters, November 28, 2011, <<http://af.reuters.com/article/worldNews/idAFTRE7AR29020111128?sp=true>>.

⁴ “Ban calls for boost in efforts to fight organized crime in West Africa and Sahel.” UN Press Centre, February 21, 2012, <<http://www.un.org/apps/news/story.asp?NewsID=41314&Cr=organized+crime&Cr1=>>>.

⁵ Alexander, Yonah. “Special Update Report – Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to the Arab Spring.” International Center for Terrorism Studies, at the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies, (January 2012). <<http://moroccoonthemove.files.wordpress.com/2012/02/2012-special-update-report-full-report-terrorism-in-africa-from-9-11-to-arab-spring-icts-potomac-2feb2012.pdf>>.

⁶ Boukhars, Anouar. “Simmering Discontent in Western Sahara.” Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, March 2012, <<http://carnegieendowment.org/2012/03/12/simmering-discontent-in-western-sahara/a2ah>>.

⁷ Smith, Merrill. “Stonewalling on Refugee Rights: Algeria & the Sahrawi.” US Committee for Refugees & Immigrants, (2009), <<http://www.uscrrrefugees.org/2010Website/3Our%20Work/3213Morocco/Stonewalling.pdf>>. “Group Rights & International Law: Case Study on Sahrawi Refugees in Algeria.” Inter-University Center for Legal Studies/MACP, (Sept.2009): 1-71, <<http://moroccanamericanpolicy.com/refugee/report.pdf>>.

⁸ “MINURSO Facts and Figures.” United Nations Mission for a Referendum in the Western Sahara, <<http://www.un.org/en/peacekeeping/missions/minurso/facts.shtml>>.

⁹ “Congressional Budget Justification for Department of State Operations.” United States Department of State (1991-2012), <<http://www.state.gov/s/d/rm/c6112.htm>>.

¹⁰ “The Global Report and Funding Reports.” United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (1999-2010), <<http://www.unhcr.org/pages/49c3646c278.html>>.

¹¹ “Food for Peace Fact Sheet.” United States Agency for International Development (2002-2011), <http://www.usaid.gov/our_work/humanitarian_assistance/ffp/algeria.fs.01.04.11.pdf>.

¹² “Algeria.” World Food Programme, <<http://www.wfp.org/countries/Algeria/Operations/WFP-Activities>>.

¹³ “Three Qaeda hostages seized last week alive.” AFP, Oct.30, 2011, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5g fsKPTIgBS_IQzBQK_R-Fdj_z0A?docId=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4 c3f07.531>.

¹⁴ “N. African states take down major narco trafficking network.” World Tribune, January 11, 2012, <<http://www.worldnewtribune.com/2012/01/11/n-african-states-take-down-major-narcoterror-drug-network/>>.

¹⁵ “Report: Al-Qaeda denies Algeria kidnappings.” Associated Press, November 28, 2011, <<http://www.usatoday.com/news/world/story/2011-12-09/al-qaeda-kidnappings/51766924/1>>.

¹⁶ Pham, J. Peter. “When Crime Does Pay: The Threat of an Emboldened al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb.” World Defense Review, 23 September, 2010, <<http://worlddefensereview.com/pham092310.shtml>>.

¹⁷ “N. African states take down major narco trafficking network.” World Tribune, January 11, 2012, <<http://www.worldnewtribune.com/2012/01/11/n-african-states-take-down-major-narcoterror-drug-network/>>.

¹⁸ “Report: Polisario working with Al Qaida in drug, weapons trafficking.” World Tribune, September 20, 2011, <http://www.worldtribune.com/worldtribune/WTARC/2011/ss_terror1178_09_20.asp>.

¹⁹ “Bamako warns Polisario: ‘Mali is not Wild West.’” Middle East Online, December 17, 2011, <<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=49540>>.

²⁰ “Mali security forces hunt desert drug traffickers.” AFP, Sept. 14, 2011, <<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5g8CmjxraUtlYfTRp39MlbQmmbvzw?docId=CNG.84013840d691548b4d501bfc5f665885.51>>.

- ¹⁵ "Analysis: Mali coup shakes cocktail of instability in Sahel." Reuters, March 23, 2012, <<http://www.reuters.com/article/2012/03/24/us-mali-sahel-instability-idUSBRE82N07120120324>>.
- ¹⁶ "Gaddafi 'spent £2.1m on mercenaries'." Telegraph, April 21, 2011, <<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/africaandindianocean/libya/8464254/Libya-Col-Gaddafi-has-spent-2.1m-on-mercenaries.html>>.
- ¹⁷ Op. Cit. 6
- ¹⁸ Op. Cit. 4
- ¹⁹ Op. Cit. 5
- ²⁰ "N. African states take down major narco trafficking network." World Tribune, January 11, 2012, <<http://www.worldnewstribune.com/2012/01/11/n-african-states-take-down-major-narcoterror-drug-network/>>.
- ²¹ Pham, J. Peter. "Islamist Threat to Africa's Rise in 2012." Atlantic Council, January 3, 2012, <http://www.acus.org/new_atlanticist/islamist-threat-africas-rise-2012>.
- ²² De Serge, Daniel. "Mali distancing itself from the Polisario Front." Agence France Presse, December 27, 2011, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5i4CHA2HdwpCQJ_XrfCkoffM4eHBQ?docId=CNG.09c4b8e975cfc23c8718b820ade10fec.161&index=0>.
- ²³ Ibid
- ²⁴ "Bamako warns Polisario: 'Mali is not Wild West.'" Middle East Online, December 17, 2011, <<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=49540>>.
- ²⁵ Ibid
- ²⁶ "'Al-Qaeda splinter group' claims kidnap of Westerners." Agence France Presse, December 10, 2011, <<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5hJQYCSJBL5aONCGjPMlyCS8SryfQ?docId=CNG.4df034a80725d0c44da18538105d6420.dd1>>.
- ²⁷ Madden, Christina L. "Western Sahara: Forgotten Corner of the Arab Spring." World Politics Review, December 15, 2011, <<http://www.worldpoliticsreview.com/articles/10947/western-sahara-forgotten-corner-of-the-arab-spring>>.
- ²⁸ Croft, Adrian. "EU police, experts to counter al Qaeda in Africa – UK." Reuters, November 28, 2011, <<http://af.reuters.com/article/worldNews/idAFTRE7AR29020111128?sp=true>>.
- ²⁹ "N. African states take down major narco trafficking network." World Tribune, January 11, 2012, <<http://www.worldnewstribune.com/2012/01/11/n-african-states-take-down-major-narcoterror-drug-network/>>.
- "Report: Al-Qaeda denies Algeria kidnappings." Associated Press, November 28, 2011, <<http://www.usatoday.com/news/world/story/2011-12-09/al-qaeda-kidnappings/51766924/1>>.
- ³⁰ "Algeria said to discipline Polisario commander over ties to Al Qaida." World Tribune, November 7, 2011, <<http://www.worldnewstribune.com/2011/11/07/algeria-said-to-discipline-polisario-commander-over-ties-to-al-qaida/>>.
- ³¹ Rubin, Jennifer. "Al-Qaeda affiliate flexing its muscles in the Maghreb." The Washington Post, November 6, 2011, <http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn/post/al-qaeda-affiliate-flexing-its-muscles-in-the-maghreb/2011/11/05/gIQANMbDqM_blog.html>.
- ³² "Kidnappers of three European aid workers benefited from polisario security apparatus' support: Spanish paper says." Morocco World News, October 26, 2011, <<http://moroccoworldnews.com/2011/10/kidnappers-of-three-european-aid-workers-benefited-from-polisario-security-apparatus-support-spanish-paper-says/12992>>.
- ³³ Ajbaili, Mustapha. "Has Spain switched gear on the Western Sahara?" Al Arabiya, October 25, 2011, <<http://english.alarabiya.net/articles/2011/10/25/173691.html>>.
- ³⁴ "Three Qaeda hostages seized last week alive: mediator." Agence France Presse, October 30, 2011, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5g fsKPTIgBS_IQzBQK_R-Fdj_z0A?docId=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4 c3f07.531>.
- ³⁵ Stearns, Scott. "Gadhafi Collapse Raises Concerns Over Arms for Africa al-Qaida." Voice of America, September 29, 2011, <<http://www.voanews.com/english/news-Gadhafi-Collapse-Raises-Concerns-Over-Arms-For-Africa-al-Qaida-130788458.html>>.
- ³⁶ "Report: Polisario working with Al Qaida in drug, weapons trafficking." World Tribune, September 20, 2011, <http://www.worldtribune.com/worldtribune/WTARC/2011/ss_terror1178_09_20.asp>.
- ³⁷ "Mali security forces hunt desert drug traffickers." Agence France Presse, September 14, 2011, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5g8Cmjx_raUtLYfTrp39MbmQmv_bzw?docId=CNG.84013840d691548b4d501bfc5f665885.51>.
- ³⁸ "Kadhafi's fall strengthens Morocco over Western Sahara." Agence France Presse, September 10, 2011, <http://www.zawya.com/story.cfm/sidANA20110910T075729ZH290/Kadhafis_fall_strengthens_Morocco_over_Western_Sahara>.
- ³⁹ Francheska, Alyangka. "U.S. wants probe on Gadhafi's alleged recruitment of mercenaries from Algeria-backed Polisario to fight NATO, rebels." International Business Times, May 30, 2011, <<http://au.ibtimes.com/articles/154113/20110529/gade-redafi-libya-rebels-morocco-algeria-u-s-congress.htm>>.
- ⁴⁰ "Sources: Gadhafi paying Polisario mercenaries $10,000 each to fight for him." World Tribune, May 20, 2011, <http://www.worldtribune.com/worldtribune/WTARC/2011/me_libya0607_05_20.asp>.
- ⁴¹ Coughlin, Con. "Libya: Col Gaddafi 'has spent £2.1m on mercenaries'." The Telegraph, April 21, 2011, <<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/africaandindianocean/libya/8464254/Libya-Col-Gaddafi-has-spent-2.1m-on-mercenaries.html>>.
- ⁴² Rubin, Jennifer. "Exclusive: Ex-Polisario Front police chief tells his story." The Washington Post, January 16, 2011, <http://voices.washingtonpost.com/right-turn/2011/01/exclusive_ex-polisario_front_p.html>.
- ⁴³ "Arrests of Terrorism Suspects Announced." The Washington Post, January 6, 2011, <<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2011/01/05/AR2011010506468.html>>.
- ⁴⁴ Rubin, Jennifer. "Morocco: A Different Kind of Muslim Country." The Washington Post, January 12, 2011, <http://voices.washingtonpost.com/right-turn/2011/01/morocco_a_different_kind_of_muslim_country.html>.
- ⁴⁵ Lake, Alison. "Unlikely bedfellows: Are some Saharan Marxists joining Al-Qaida operations in North Africa?" Foreign Policy, January 3, 2011, <http://mideast.foreignpolicy.com/posts/2011/01/03/unlikely_bedfellows_are_some_saharan_marxists_joining_al_qaida_operations_in_north_>.
- ⁴⁶ "Key members of Sahara drug ring captured are from Polisario." Middle East Online, December 21, 2010, <<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=43149>>.
- ⁴⁷ Worth, Robert F. and Souad Mekhennet. "Desert Land in Limbo is Torn Apart." The New York Times, December 9, 2010, <<http://www.nytimes.com/2010/12/09/world/africa/09morocco.html?ref=todayspaper>>.
- ⁴⁸ "Al-Qaeda looks to Sahel for new funding sources." Maghreb, November 10, 2010, <http://www.maghreb.com/cocoon/awi/xhtml1/en_GB/features/awi/features/2010/11/10/feature-01>.
- ⁴⁹ Look, Anne. "Morocco says dismantled drug ring linked to terrorists." Voice of America, October 18, 2010, <<http://www.voanews.com/english/news/africa/north/Morocco-says-Dismantled-International-Drug-Trafficking-Ring-Linked-to-Terrorists-105188824.html>>

⁵⁰ "Spanish hostages freed by al-Qaida arrive in Spain." Associated Press, August 23, 2010, <<http://abcnews.go.com/International/wireStory?id=11464811>>.

⁵¹ Pham, J. Peter. "When Crime Does Pay: The Threat of an Emboldened al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb." World Defense Review, 23 September, 2010, <<http://worlddefensereview.com/pham092310.shtml>>.

⁵² Pham, J. Peter. "Not Another Failed States: Toward a Realistic Solution in the Western Sahara." The Journal of the Middle East and Africa 1 (2010): 1-24.

⁵³ Op. Cit. 9

⁵⁴ Ibid

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, March 31, 2012 8:35 AM
To: Rachad <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>
Subject: RE: Ambassador Roll-out

Thank you. I will ask my assistant to call your office for a convenient meeting for next week. Ed

-----Original Message-----

From: Rachad [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Friday, March 30, 2012 11:06 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Ambassador Roll-out

>
> Thank you so much Ed for the list.
>
> As I am out of town, I would like to talk to you more about this because I already met few journalists who requested to see me among whom the Washington Post guy on the list.
>
> I appreciate your communication team's efforts for the outreach.
>
> Have a nice weekend,
>
> Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, March 31, 2012 9:26 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: Jordan Paul; Bill Gray
Subject: meeting with Congresswoman Karen Bass, February 18 at 3:30pm

Mr. Ambassador,

We have arranged a time to meet with Congresswoman Karen Bass, the new chairman of the sub-committee on Africa, who took Payne's place as chairman. This took some doing to get the meeting so it is important we accommodate her schedule if at all possible. This could be one of the most important congressional meetings of your year and we will need to properly prep for it. For your most if not all of you congressional meetings we advise against them simply being conducted as a courtesy visit. They must always be combined with and "ask". Former Whip and Congressman Bill Gray and she are very close and he will be involved in the messaging as well. Can you please mark your calendar for this meeting and we can discuss further next week. Thank you. Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, March 31, 2012 11:08 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com; bgray@grayloeffler.com
Subject: Correction: meeting with Congresswoman Karen Bass, April 18 at 3:30pm

Sorry that's April 18th for the meeting, not February!

From: Edward Gabriel
Sent: Saturday, March 31, 2012 06:25 AM
To: Boulal Rachad (rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com) <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>
Cc: Jordan Paul <jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com>; Bill Gray <bgray@grayloeffler.com>
Subject: meeting with Congresswoman Karen Bass, February 18 at 3:30pm

Mr. Ambassador,

We have arranged a time to meet with Congresswoman Karen Bass, the new chairman of the sub-committee on Africa, who took Payne's place as chairman. This took some doing to get the meeting so it is important we accommodate her schedule if at all possible. This could be one of the most important congressional meetings of your year and we will need to properly prep for it. For your most if not all of you congressional meetings we advise against them simply being conducted as a courtesy visit. They must always be combined with and "ask". Former Whip and Congressman Bill Gray and she are very close and he will be involved in the messaging as well. Can you please mark your calendar for this meeting and we can discuss further next week. Thank you. Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, April 04, 2012 2:43 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Sorry I will miss you tomorrow

Please let me know when we can meet next. Thanks. I have several things for you. Ed

Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Compnay, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, April 04, 2012 6:25 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: April 18th

Rachad,

I was planning to discuss this tomorrow but hope to catch up with you soon. In the meantime, I would like to confirm your availability on the 18th to meet with Karen Bass at 330pm. Also, we are hoping to get blocks of your time for other key congressional meetings around that same date. We have requested time from your staff. Thank you for your consideration of this request. Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, April 05, 2012 10:00 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Re: April 18th

Ok. We also have two more very big meetings: Ileana Ross Lehtinen and Howard Berman, chairman and Ranking on Foreign Affairs. Before these meetings we should meet to prepare for expectations and "asks". Thank you

----- Original Message -----

From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Thursday, April 05, 2012 06:44 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Re: April 18th

Ed,

Thank you for arranging the appointment with congresswoman Karen Bass. Any appointments your office arranges that go through my office are automatically on my schedule. My staff is also working with Jordan on different meetings.

Thanks again,

Rachad

On Apr 4, 2012, at 6:24 PM, Edward Gabriel wrote:

> Rachad,

> I was planning to discuss this tomorrow but hope to catch up with you soon. In the meantime, I would like to confirm your availability on the 18th to meet with Karen Bass at 330pm. Also, we are hoping to get blocks of your time for other key congressional meetings around that same date. We have requested time from your staff. Thank you for your consideration of this request. Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, April 05, 2012 2:12 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: So you don't have to wait until the end of the month
Attachments: ER_CSIS Democracy Challenges in Morocco Min Khalfi 4Apr12.docx

FYI, attached is a MAC report on the presentation of the Minister of Communications, Mustapha Khalfi, at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, CSIS.

MAMS EVENT REPORT

4 April 4, 2012

1. Title: MOROCCO – THE CHALLENGES OF DEMOCRATIC REFORM

Hosted by CSIS

Participant:

H.E. Mustapha Khalfi, Minister of Communication, Morocco
Jon Alterman, Director of the Middle East Center

2. Overview

While revolutionary change has brought Islamists to rule in several Middle Eastern countries, it was evolutionary change that brought Islamists into government in Morocco after more than a decade in opposition. The country's own future trajectory and its inspirational power for other religious opposition movements in the Middle East remain the subjects of considerable debate. Minister Khalfi discussed why Morocco's third way – between revolution and retaining the status quo, resulted from unique conditions in the kingdom.

3. Summary

Minister Khalfi noted that Morocco's response to the Arab Spring was a result of reforms that had been instituted over the past six years, and others going back even further, to Youssefi's time as prime minister. There were two views anchoring perceptions of the King's reform agenda in response to the February 20th movement: from skeptical to positive. The period between Feb 20th and the election of Nov 25th was a competition between these views. The election results showed that Moroccans want a serious and credible democracy. Although the new constitution is not ideal and won't radically reshape the political system, it provides many opportunities in its implementation that reflect the King's speech of Mar 9th in which he talked about equality, justice, accountability, and other values to be incorporated into the new constitution.

The Minister elaborated by defining three factors which explain Morocco as an exception: the monarchy's leadership role that enhances credibility and stability; the existence of political parties, including the opposition, which gave them experience in building coalitions; and the role of civil society, which, in fact, often promotes issues before the political parties accept them as part of their agendas.

He listed four challenges facing the new government. First of all, implementing the constitution including power-sharing, expansion of freedoms and liberty, regionalization – the key to solving the Western Sahara problem, and good governance, including reforming the judiciary, accountability, and transparency—the key to building citizen trust. Passing new legislation for the local elections to be held in the fall is the next challenge. It is necessary to succeed in reconciling people with politics, i.e. make them believe that the process works for them. Goal is to facilitate the emergence of new local elites who will work with the youth. The third challenge is the need to resolve social and economic problems, especially poverty, which in some areas is twice the national average. Related to this is dealing with the impact of the European financial crisis which affects tourism and exports. All of this impacts the overwhelming need to create hundreds of thousands of jobs to both absorb existing unemployed and the 150,000 annual new entrants to the job market. The GOM has established a public-private partnership to address this challenge and to build an educational system that prepares people for the job market. Finally, Minister Khalfi mentioned the growing positive environment for closer regional cooperation, which would also lead to resolving the Western Sahara crisis.

The Minister provided specific examples throughout his presentation of actions being undertaken by the new government to deal with these challenges and the changing political environment in Morocco.

4. Q & A

Q: (Jon Alterman) Given Adl al Ihsan's opposition to the monarchy, what is the future for Islamic politics in Morocco—greater diversity or cooperation?

A: Both are happening at the same time. The key challenge for all Islamist parties is to link Islam and democracy. Islamists have to decide whether or not to be part of the political party system.

Q: (Karim Mezran, the Atlantic Council) How will decentralization lead to solving the Western Sahara crisis?

A: The constitution provides for regionalization in all matters: budget, administration, social and cultural policies. Regionalization provides a means for the transition from the current situation to autonomy.

Q: Three questions on women's rights

A: The basic protection and rights of women are already enshrined in the moudawa. The constitution calls for full equality and that is part of our national agenda, adopted by parliament. A national watchdog has been proposed to protect women's rights by monitoring what is going on and if targets are being achieved. Gave details of what steps are being taken.

Q: (Haim Malka, CSIS) How to manage expectations?

A: People want concrete results. Transparency is the key. In conflict areas, government is encouraging open dialog with all stakeholders. Expect that passing of budget by mid-April will enable government to accelerate efforts to reduce poverty, expand healthcare coverage, and promote other economic and social development projects.

5. Observation

40 representatives from various NGOs, including Eric Goldstein from HRW, and think tanks participated in the program. The Minister spoke eloquently, thoughtfully, and credibly about the challenges facing the government as it works to implement the new constitution. He gave multiple examples of what the government has proposed, which strengthened his case. He was strongly behind the autonomy solution for the Western Sahara and the role of the King in providing indispensable leadership and continuity. He directly answered the questions on the future of Islamists and democracy and the prospects for women and minorities and provided many examples of what can be done to implement the various sections of the constitution. He is definitely a formidable resource. It is imperative that we track what is going on in parliament in the coming months to have credible talking points on Morocco's reform agenda.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, April 06, 2012 8:28 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Re: April 18th

OK. Yes, let me get back to you with recommendations.

----- Original Message -----

From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Thursday, April 05, 2012 01:20 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: April 18th

>
> Ed,
> Am looking forward to all the meetings on the Hill.
> However, I met Ileana Ross Lehtinen in a different context and got a chance to brief on Morocco and talk about organizing a trip to Morocco. I think it would be better to schedule a different meeting with the Chair of appropriations in stead, in addition to Congressman Berman. What do you think?
> Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, April 08, 2012 12:55 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Congressional meeting strategy

Dear Rachad,

After discussing options with team members this weekend, I suggest we focus on the Foreign Operations subcommittee members first before going to the full committee on Appropriations. However, this should not take away from any meetings we have with key Foreign Affairs members in the meantime.

The timing on the meeting is tricky because you want to do it sooner rather than later and you also want to make sure you have your asks lined up. Right now we are still uncertain about facts on the ground and Leahy (waiting on Administration).

I know that Mouaad and Jordan are seeing Lowey's person next week and can line up the Lowey meeting, but I would caution going slow on other members for now.

Instead, the meeting with Mario Diaz Balart on the 17th will be critical because he can help with both Ileana and the Appropriations process. If we go into that Mario meeting with everything lined up we can really leverage it. Nobody is closer to Ileana than Mario and Lincoln, and further, Granger also trusts the Balarts completely on Morocco.

We counsel that we take the same approach as last year when we got everything lined up first:

Start with Mario Diaz Balart, then go to Lowey, then the other members (both Dem and R) then finish with Granger. Then you go to Rogers (Chair) and Dicks (Ranking) of the full committees. We are very wired in with Dicks and Rogers and will be able to add much value to these meetings.

The Chairman and the Ranking Member of the full committee are not likely to lead this process and would prefer to follow the subcommittee. If we go to them with everything lined up via their sub committees first, they should support easily.

Of course, there are different ways to skin the cat. I just think that when we show up with support in hand it is more effective than starting with the Chair/Ranking and not being able to answer the question: "Who is supporting this on the subcommittee?"

That is why we used this particular order last year:

- 1) MDB - you need a sponsor and original supporter. He is our strongest ally and best target
- 2) Lowey (Subcommittee Ranking Democrat) A fan of Morocco and great friend. She will give her "soft" support.
- 3) The other members of the sub-committee except Wolf. Last year we had Member/Ambassador meeting plus any value added consultants/MAC, with the staff and secured unanimous support.
- 4) Then we went to Granger who Mario had been working on while we were rounding up the rest of the support and she signed right up - closing the deal.
- 5) Then we went to Rogers/Dicks and had almost no work to do. Sub Chair and Ranking plus broad bipartisan support both against Wolf and for the House aid language, and they fell right into line.

Like I said, you can do this a number of different ways. We can go to MDB and then straight to Granger, but I'm partial to our route last year because it worked but we can discuss further when we are together. Ed

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, April 09, 2012 12:11 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: March summary report
Attachments: Rabat Team - March 2012 report English.doc

Rachad,
Attached is the March summary report for your review and comment. In this report I actually provide two different work descriptions that defines our work in relation to one another. They are highlighted in yellow on the first page. The first paragraph, my preferred option, is the paragraph we used last month and agreed upon then. The second paragraph is an attempt by me to better understand your concerns to make sure the report is not confusing the work of the Embassy with that of MAC. While I do not like the second paragraph as well as the first option it does attempt to distinguish between our work and that of the Embassy. Hopefully we can discuss your preferences tomorrow at our meeting.

Also tomorrow I'd like to discuss the "Ambassador's communications rollout", and the Communications strategy paper sent to you a few weeks back. We can also close off on any congressional issues you have and any other issues you have for me. Thank you, Ed

Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Compnay, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

WASHINGTON TEAM MARCH 2012 PROGRESS REPORT

Introduction

In the highly politicized atmosphere in Washington during this US presidential election year, US foreign policy receives little attention except when crises occur. In times past, US presidents could count on "flying the flag," appealing to American patriotism as a means of building support for policies. Today, every word or action is placed under a magnifying glass to determine or infer hidden meanings that reveal the weakness of the proposed policies. Thus, very little moves in Washington regarding policy that is not related to problems and challenges that cannot be delayed.

This challenging milieu makes the efforts of the Washington Team to move the Obama Administration to approve US funding for projects in the Western Sahara even more daunting. Yet the results to date are largely positive. Despite the negative media coverage of the Amina Filali case and Aminatou Haidar's regular visits to New York and Washington to speak against Morocco's human rights record, Morocco continues to find a positive reception in Congress. The Washington Team's drive to have more than 300 meetings with Congressional offices before the summer recess is making great progress. The key message, that US foreign assistance to the camps should be given on condition that it directly improves the lives of the refugees, is being well received. The Team is also working with members and staff to define what these "conditions" should be and concrete projects that the US should fund in the South.

There is a dilemma in the Washington Team's activities in that Morocco is not in crisis, therefore, some policy makers would prefer to leave the Kingdom's issues off the agenda while the Administration deals with Syria, Iran, Iraq, and crises beyond the MENA region. Ending the Western Sahara conflict, while a helpful outcome to US interests in the region, is not given a high priority by some in the government. It was therefore helpful that the remarks following the meeting between the Foreign Minister and Secretary Clinton reaffirmed the centrality of the Western Sahara conflict and the commitment to the bilateral strategic dialogue. This visit, and Secretary Clinton's visit to Morocco, and the generally high praise that Morocco is receiving for its role on the UN Security Council, continue to make the case that Morocco is a leader in the region, and among America's friends worldwide.

The Communications report below indicates that positive coverage of Morocco far outweighs negative coverage associated with Amina Filali and Aminatou Haidar. Security concerns related to the region, Morocco's leadership at the UNSC, continued concerns with the direction of the Arab uprisings, and op-eds that show how Morocco is making progress in its reforms and economic development, all contribute to the positive image of Morocco in the media.

This report Since it is difficult to distinguish some of the work of the Moroccan American Center from that of the Embassy, this report includes select activities of the Embassy, MAC, and its consultants as the "Washington Team".

OR:

This report is prepared by the Moroccan American Center, including MACP, MACC and MATIC. It is not exhaustive nor is it fully detailed as we focus on the items that have the most impact on our strategy. While we attempt to only highlight work that MAC has been involved in, in some cases we touch upon the work of others, such as the Embassy or other pro-Moroccan entities. In such related cases, we try to only report on activities where MAC has had a role as well, or where the activity is worthy of highlighting to the Rabat team since it relates to one of the Team's main objectives. In all cases we try as much as possible to keep this reporting to the principal work of MAC.

Campaigns

MoroccoOnTheMove.com (MOTM)

The Washington Team's MOTM website and social media program (@MorocOnTheMove) continues to broaden the reach for our messaging, in terms of quantity and targeted audiences. After five months online, nearly 250 postings of news articles and original content by the Washington Team have appeared and the website has received more than 24,000 hits. In that same period, @MorocOnTheMove has sent nearly 900 tweets, has close to 250 followers, and has been retweeted regularly by influential personalities on Twitter. Although we have to improve these numbers even more in the months ahead, this is a strong beginning to our social media efforts.

As part of increasing efforts to engage more regularly with our target audiences, particularly through email and social media, the Washington Team distributed an e-letter, "Reform, stability, and the Western Sahara" to our contacts database of approximately 3,000 policymakers, media, academics, think-tank and NGO leaders, Administration officials, and Congressional staffs. This e-letter highlighted and redistributed materials mentioned in the Communications report including the ICTS report, the Atlantic magazine article, the paper published by the Carnegie Endowment, the Roll Call column, Congressional Record remarks, The Hill op-ed, , the Washington Post "Right Turn" column, the POMED column, and positive press about the launch of RAMEL, Morocco's large-scale healthcare program aimed at providing care to disadvantaged citizens, as well as specific items Rabat wants us to highlight through its mediatization requests.

Also, in March, the Washington Team began distribution of a weekly "Morocco highlight e-mail" to our contacts database, in which one or two events, publications, and/or positive press articles are featured. The purpose of this weekly highlight is to draw attention to an important messaging opportunity to the contacts about Morocco. The first "Morocco highlight e-mail" redistributed the March 27 Global Post op-ed.

Morocco as a Leader

During the month of March, the Washington Team continued its efforts to promote Morocco as a model of progress and reform by regularly briefing and engaging influential policy makers, think-tank leaders, and target journalists.

Activities:

On March 8, The Atlantic magazine, a well-respected publication on culture, current events, and politics for more than 150 years, published an article, "The coming Arab identity crisis," by Massoud Hayoun which focuses on the questions of Arab identity that have resurfaced during the Arab Spring. The Washington Team arranged an interview for its author with Ambassador Edward Gabriel, who is quoted among other influential leaders in the Arab Diaspora. For further distribution, a blog column highlighting the article was posted on "Who's who in the Arab world? Examining Arab identity," on the Foreign Policy Association's Foreign Policy Blog.

On March 13, Elliott Abrams, Senior Fellow for Middle Eastern Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations, hosted a roundtable at the Council's offices in Washington with Ambassador Bouhlal entitled, "Morocco and the Arab Spring." At the event, which was organized through the Washington Team's outreach to Abrams and CFR, Ambassador Bouhlal detailed Morocco's reform process and answered questions about the implementation of the new Constitution.

In early March, the POMED Wire, a blog of the Project on Middle East Democracy, posted a report citing dubious torture allegations against Morocco made on the Sahara Press Service (SPS) website. The Washington Team contacted POMED's executive director, alerted him to the questionable nature of many SPS publications, which prompted him to inform his bloggers to keep the unprofessional nature of SPS in mind before republishing or sourcing its work. Following the conversation, POMED agreed to post a piece on the POMED Wire authored by Ambassador Edward Gabriel, "Gabriel: Change, reform, and progress in Morocco," which outlined the year of reform in Morocco and how its "Arab Spring" experience was successful and exceptional.

On March 23, the Foreign Policy Association's Foreign Policy Blog published a column by Moroccan-American international attorney, Leila Hanafi, "Constitutional reforms in Morocco: Outlook for youth rights." The article examined the success of the current reform process in Morocco and what measures will be necessary to insure that success is sustained and far-reaching. Knowing that Ms. Hanafi's articles can be somewhat dubious in content, when she asked the Washington Team for feedback we reviewed the draft at her request in order to ameliorate any adverse consequences.

Results:

In March, the Washington Team's efforts to highlight Morocco's role as a leader for democratic reforms and peace in the region generated more than 320 positive media placements and 20 million favorable media impressions.

The Polisario and Terrorism in the Sahara/Sahel

During March, the Washington Team continued its efforts to call US attention to the growing threat of AQIM and other terrorist groups in the Sahara/Sahel in order to shape the debate and reinforce perceptions of the Polisario's negative role in the region. These efforts included journalist outreach, arranging briefings by Washington Team members and third-party spokespeople, and creating fact sheets and other supporting documents for distribution to target audiences.

Activities:

Following the March 2 publication by The Hill of an op-ed by Ambassador Edward Gabriel, "Stop subsidizing recruiting grounds for terrorists and traffickers," several other media outlets republished or cited the piece, including the World247.net News network and the U.K. Foreign Office/U.K. Government Online. Also, the Italian-based online newspaper, Lettera 43, published an article about terrorism in the Sahel that cited ICTS reports and maps.

To maintain US media attention on the continued detention of the European aid workers kidnapped by members of an AQIM-related group with suspected help from members of the Polisario Front, the Washington Team authored a blog posting on the MOTM website on March 20, "Day 150 – still hostage: Rosella Urru, two others seized by AQIM sect in Polisario camp." This posting will be a part of a regular series of updates on the kidnapping as the situation develops.

On March 27, the Global Post published an op-ed by Jordan Paul, "Why are we perpetuating a source of instability in North Africa?" The op-ed made the case for retargeting non-humanitarian aid destined for the Polisario to stop perpetuating the refugee camps' deteriorating security and humanitarian conditions and urged US leadership to resolve the Western Sahara conflict.

In late March, the Washington Team compiled a paper, "Spotlight: The case for redirecting US support for the Polisario-run camps in Algeria, which are becoming a recruiting ground for AQIM, arms and drug traffickers." The paper provides background information and a chronology of documented incidents and reports linking members of the Polisario Front with AQIM, trafficking, and other illicit activities in the region. It will be widely distributed in April to key contacts in Congress, the media, and think tanks.

Results:

In March, the Washington Team's efforts to highlight the Polisario's involvement with rising terrorism in the region generated more than 200 favorable media placements and 21 million media impressions.

Resolving the Western Sahara: Autonomy under Moroccan Sovereignty

Ahead of and following the ninth round of informal talks on the Western Sahara conflict, the Washington Team conducted outreach to journalists, policymakers, and government officials to highlight the urgent need to solve the conflict for security as well as humanitarian reasons and to promote Morocco's compromise autonomy proposal.

Activities:

To focus US media attention on the informal talks and Morocco's efforts to offer genuine compromise in the negotiations, the Washington Team issued a press release on March 12, "US, France voice strong support for Morocco's autonomy plan to resolve Western Sahara dispute, remove obstacle to peace in region." The release, which highlighted recent public declarations of support for the autonomy plan by US Secretary of State Clinton and French Foreign Minister Juppé, was distributed to PRNewswire and targeted journalists. It was posted by more than 150 US and international media outlets, including Reuters, the Wall Street Journal's Market Watch, Forbes, Boston Globe, Dallas Morning News, Cleveland Plain Dealer, Sacramento Bee, Yahoo News, AOL News, AfricaBusiness, and Afrik-News. MAP published an article, "Les 9è pourparlers sur le Sahara se tiennent avec en toile de fond un soutien consolidé de Washington au Plan d'autonomie," that referenced the release and the ICTS report, which was republished by L'Opinion, Le Matin, and several other Moroccan news publications.

Following regular briefings and updates by the Team, two Members of Congress also made strong, public statements of support for Morocco's autonomy plan as a peaceful, compromise solution to the Western Sahara conflict. In an opinion piece published March 12 in Roll Call, "Changes offer positive sign for Western Sahara", Rep. Steve Cohen of Tennessee gave the background on why the autonomy proposal was the best option for peace. In remarks for the Congressional Record, Rep. Chris Murphy of Connecticut said the people of the Western Sahara "deserve for this longstanding dispute to be resolved" and stated that Morocco's compromise proposal is "a reasonable offer and can serve as a basis for negotiations." Murphy acknowledged, "it is in the interest of the United States and the parties involved to achieve a peaceful, negotiated solution to the Western Sahara issue[.]" MAP ran stories on both Members' statements, "US Congressman highlights overwhelming bipartisan support for Morocco's autonomy plan within two chambers of US Congress," and "Moroccan autonomy proposal, a democratic solution that can serve as a basis for negotiations, US Cong."

On March 13, the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace published a paper by Professor Anouar Boukhars, "Simmering discontent in the Western Sahara," in which Boukhars examined a number of internal and external factors that affect resolution of the Western Sahara conflict. The paper – which cited several information sources the Washington Team helped generate – was distributed widely to key contacts and targeted journalists and incorporated into our regular information packet on the Western Sahara.

In order to highlight the urgent need to address the humanitarian crisis in the Polisario-controlled camps in southern Algeria through implementation of durable solutions for refugees, Robert Holley authored a blog posting on the MOTM website, "You don't have to live like a refugee", which is a play on words from Tom Petty song with the same title.

Results:

In March, the Washington Team's efforts to highlight to US audiences the broad support for Morocco's autonomy plan and need for US leadership to help resolve the Western Sahara generated more than 650 favorable media placements and 57 million media impressions.

Upcoming in April

On April 3, the Washington Team will host a roundtable, "The Western Sahara crisis: Why US leadership is needed now," where an expert panel will offer insights on the crisis in the Western Sahara, the growing threat of terrorism in the region, the deteriorating humanitarian situation, and how US leadership can help bring this conflict to a peaceful end. The roundtable will feature Jean AbiNader, Senior Advisor, Moroccan American Center (Moderator), Ambassador Michael Ussery, Former US Ambassador to Morocco, Dr J. Peter Pham, Director, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, The Atlantic Council, and Robert Holley, Senior Policy Advisor, Moroccan American Center for Policy. To encourage attendance and coverage of the roundtable, the Washington Team widely distributed a press advisory to target journalists, as well as an invitation to all major policymakers and US government officials who focus on Morocco. The advisory was picked up and posted by more than 120 US and international media outlets, including Reuters, the Wall Street Journal's Market Watch, CNBC, CNN Top News, Boston Globe, African Press Organization, Sacramento Bee, Yahoo News, AOL News, and Afrik-News.

Congressional Activities

The Washington Team conducted over 90 meetings with Congressional offices in March alone, which focused on our core themes: Morocco as a leader, the rising threat of terrorism in the region and the dangers of the Polisario camps, the need to target assistance to the camps, and the need to resolve the issue of the Western Sahara based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty.

These meetings serve to maintain our majority support in Congress, to ensure that the truth is known about the Polisario, to build support for targeting assistance to the camps, and to create a greater awareness of the importance of a strong US-Morocco bilateral relationship. These meetings constitute the base we build every year as we never take for granted our current supporters and always seek to secure the support of additional members. The Washington Team followed up on these meetings with a series of emails containing updates, recent news, publications so as reinforce our messaging provided at each meeting. The latter also lay the groundwork for our upcoming meetings so that members are aware of the issues to be discussed well in advance. .

The Ambassador continued his introductory meetings to key Members of Congress. In April, he was hosted for a lunch in the Congressional Members Dining Room where he met with Rep. Steve Cohen (who wrote the Op-Ed earlier in the month), Rep. Ed Towns, Rep. Ed Markey, Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee, and Rep. David Dreier. The Ambassador also met the co-Chair of the Morocco Caucus, Rep. Michael Grimm. These introductory meetings will continue throughout the year.

The Washington Team also produced significant statements around the latest informal round of the negotiations. Rep. Chris Murphy (D-CT) made a statement in support of Morocco on the eve of the Manhasset talks and Rep. Steve Cohen (D-TN) published a very favorable Op-ed on the Monday of the talks. These statements and Op-Eds from leftist, democratic members help to reinforce the concept that the autonomy/sovereignty solution has broad based support and is the inevitable solution. The more that this message takes hold, the easier it will be to secure congressional support for establishing facts on the ground (building on the language from last year) and conditioning aid to the camps.

The Washington Team also worked with the office of Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart to pose questions to the Administration during oversight hearings with Secretary Clinton on how they planned to implement the language authorizing US assistance to Morocco to be spent in the southern provinces. This helps to keep the issue in front of the State Department and makes them aware that Congress is intent on seeing action this year. The Washington Team is also working with the Appropriations Committee to develop language and secure support for targeting assistance to the refugee camps away from the status quo and towards durable solutions, including a census and resettlement.

MATIC

MATIC worked with the US Chamber of Commerce in setting up its first business delegation to Morocco March 20-22, which including major corporations such as Raytheon, Honeywell, Lockheed Martin, General Dynamics, and others, as well as six companies focused on renewable energies. The Moroccan Embassy arranged for the participation of a number of senior government officials to attend events and lunches and dinners hosted by AMDI and Maroc Export. MATIC hosted a luncheon for the delegation on March 21 and worked with ADEREE, MASEN, and ONE on a panel on renewable energies. Ambassador Kaplan and members of the US Embassy attended the luncheon.

The most important news of the month was an announcement by the China Africa Development Fund (CAD Fund) that it had chosen Morocco for its regional office for North, West, and Central Africa. MATIC has escorted three different CAD Fund delegations in Morocco and helped them survey possible office and apartment sites.

MATIC was involved with them in setting up meetings for and providing logistical support, as well as coordinated with GOM officials. MATIC was the first among several Moroccan entities to make contact with the CAD Fund.

MATIC also set up the latest in a series of meetings for MANAS Development Group <http://www.manasdevelopment.org/> an international company that provides training services to agencies and companies, which resulted in their choosing Morocco as the location for the regional office serving North, West, and Central Africa.

MACC

Throughout the month of March, MACC staff attended a number of events on the Maghreb and the Middle East, including an Ambassadors forum hosted by the US-Arab Chamber of Commerce, a roundtable on democracy in the Arab World held at the National Press Club, and a conference on access to justice hosted by the American Bar Association.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, April 09, 2012 12:53 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: CORRECTION: monthly report
Attachments: Rabat Team - March 2012 report English.doc

Please disregard last email attachment as it contained typographical errors. Instead, refer to this attachment. Ed

Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Compnay, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

WASHINGTON TEAM MARCH 2012 PROGRESS REPORT

Introduction

In the highly politicized atmosphere in Washington during this US presidential election year, US foreign policy receives little attention except when crises occur. In times past, US presidents could count on "flying the flag," appealing to American patriotism as a means of building support for policies. Today, every word or action is placed under a magnifying glass to determine or infer hidden meanings that reveal the weakness of the proposed policies. Thus, very little moves in Washington regarding policy that is not related to problems and challenges that cannot be delayed.

This challenging milieu makes the efforts of the Washington Team to move the Obama Administration to approve US funding for projects in the Western Sahara even more daunting. Yet the results to date are largely positive. Despite the negative media coverage of the Amina Filali case and Aminatou Haidar's regular visits to New York and Washington to speak against Morocco's human rights record, Morocco continues to find a positive reception in Congress. The Washington Team's drive to have more than 300 meetings with Congressional offices before the summer recess is making great progress. The key message, that US foreign assistance to the camps should be given on condition that it directly improves the lives of the refugees, is being well received. The Team is also working with members and staff to define what these "conditions" should be and concrete projects that the US should fund in the South.

There is a dilemma in the Washington Team's activities in that Morocco is not in crisis, therefore, some policy makers would prefer to leave the Kingdom's issues off the agenda while the Administration deals with Syria, Iran, Iraq, and crises beyond the MENA region. Ending the Western Sahara conflict, while a helpful outcome to US interests in the region, is not given a high priority by some in the government. It was therefore helpful that the remarks following the meeting between the Foreign Minister and Secretary Clinton reaffirmed the centrality of the Western Sahara conflict and the commitment to the bilateral strategic dialogue. This visit, and Secretary Clinton's visit to Morocco, and the generally high praise that Morocco is receiving for its role on the UN Security Council, continue to make the case that Morocco is a leader in the region, and among America's friends worldwide.

The Communications report below indicates that positive coverage of Morocco far outweighs negative coverage associated with Amina Filali and Aminatou Haidar. Security concerns related to the region, Morocco's leadership at the UNSC, continued concerns with the direction of the Arab uprisings, and op-eds that show how Morocco is making progress in its reforms and economic development, all contribute to the positive image of Morocco in the media.

This report is not exhaustive nor is it fully detailed as we focus on the items that have the most impact on our strategy. Since it is difficult to distinguish some of the work of the Moroccan American Center from that of the Embassy, this report includes select activities of the Embassy, MAC, and its consultants as the "Washington Team".

OR:

This report is prepared by the Moroccan American Center, including MACP, MACC and MATIC. It is not exhaustive nor is it fully detailed as we focus on the items that have the most impact on our strategy. While we attempt to only highlight work that MAC has been involved in, in some cases we touch upon the work of others, such as the Embassy or other pro-Moroccan entities. In such related cases, we try to only report on activities where MAC has had a role as well, or where the activity is worthy of highlighting to the Rabat team since it relates to one of the Team's main objectives. In all cases we try as much as possible to keep this reporting to the principal work of MAC.

Campaigns

MoroccoOnTheMove.com (MOTM)

The Washington Team's MOTM website and social media program (@MorocOnTheMove) continues to broaden the reach for our messaging, in terms of quantity and targeted audiences. After five months online, nearly 250 postings of news articles and original content by the Washington Team have appeared and the website has received more than 24,000 hits. In that same period, @MorocOnTheMove has sent nearly 900 tweets, has close to 250 followers, and has been retweeted regularly by influential personalities on Twitter. Although we have to improve these numbers even more in the months ahead, this is a strong beginning to our social media efforts.

As part of increasing efforts to engage more regularly with our target audiences, particularly through email and social media, the Washington Team distributed an e-letter, "Reform, stability, and the Western Sahara" to our contacts database of approximately 3,000 policymakers, media, academics, think-tank and NGO leaders, Administration officials, and Congressional staffs. This e-letter highlighted and redistributed materials mentioned in the Communications report including the ICTS report, the Atlantic magazine article, the paper published by the Carnegie Endowment, the Roll Call column, Congressional Record remarks, The Hill op-ed, , the Washington Post "Right Turn" column, the POMED column, and positive press about the launch of RAMED, Morocco's large-scale healthcare program aimed at providing care to disadvantaged citizens, as well as specific items Rabat wants us to highlight though its mediatization requests.

Also, in March, the Washington Team began distribution of a weekly "Morocco highlight e-mail" to our contacts database, in which one or two events, publications, and/or positive press articles are featured. The purpose of this weekly highlight is to draw attention to an important messaging opportunity to the contacts about

Morocco. The first "Morocco highlight e-mail" redistributed the March 27 Global Post op-ed.

Morocco as a Leader

During the month of March, the Washington Team continued its efforts to promote Morocco as a model of progress and reform by regularly briefing and engaging influential policy makers, think-tank leaders, and target journalists.

Activities:

On March 8, The Atlantic magazine, a well-respected publication on culture, current events, and politics for more than 150 years, published an article, "The coming Arab identity crisis," by Massoud Hayoun which focuses on the questions of Arab identity that have resurfaced during the Arab Spring. The Washington Team arranged an interview for its author with Ambassador Edward Gabriel, who is quoted among other influential leaders in the Arab Diaspora. For further distribution, a blog column highlighting the article was posted on "Who's who in the Arab world? Examining Arab identity," on the Foreign Policy Association's Foreign Policy Blog.

On March 13, Elliott Abrams, Senior Fellow for Middle Eastern Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations, hosted a roundtable at the Council's offices in Washington with Ambassador Bouhlal entitled, "Morocco and the Arab Spring." At the event, which was organized through the Washington Team's outreach to Abrams and CFR, Ambassador Bouhlal detailed Morocco's reform process and answered questions about the implementation of the new Constitution.

In early March, the POMED Wire, a blog of the Project on Middle East Democracy, posted a report citing dubious torture allegations against Morocco made on the Sahara Press Service (SPS) website. The Washington Team contacted POMED's executive director, alerted him to the questionable nature of many SPS publications, which prompted him to inform his bloggers to keep the unprofessional nature of SPS in mind before republishing or sourcing its work. Following the conversation, POMED agreed to post a piece on the POMED Wire authored by Ambassador Edward Gabriel, "Gabriel: Change, reform, and progress in Morocco," which outlined the year of reform in Morocco and how its "Arab Spring" experience was successful and exceptional.

On March 23, the Foreign Policy Association's Foreign Policy Blog published a column by Moroccan-American international attorney, Leila Hanafi, "Constitutional reforms in Morocco: Outlook for youth rights." The article examined the success of the current reform process in Morocco and what measures will be necessary to insure that success is sustained and far-reaching. Knowing that Ms. Hanafi's articles can be somewhat dubious in content, when she asked the Washington Team for feedback we reviewed the draft at her request in order to ameliorate any adverse consequences.

Results:

In March, the Washington Team's efforts to highlight Morocco's role as a leader for democratic reforms and peace in the region generated more than 320 positive media placements and 20 million favorable media impressions.

The Polisario and Terrorism in the Sahara/Sahel

During March, the Washington Team continued its efforts to call US attention to the growing threat of AQIM and other terrorist groups in the Sahara/Sahel in order to shape the debate and reinforce perceptions of the Polisario's negative role in the region. These efforts included journalist outreach, arranging briefings by Washington Team members and third-party spokespeople, and creating fact sheets and other supporting documents for distribution to target audiences.

Activities:

Following the March 2 publication by The Hill of an op-ed by Ambassador Edward Gabriel, "Stop subsidizing recruiting grounds for terrorists and traffickers," several other media outlets republished or cited the piece, including the World247.net News network and the U.K. Foreign Office/U.K. Government Online. Also, the Italian-based online newspaper, Lettera 43, published an article about terrorism in the Sahel that cited ICTS reports and maps.

To maintain US media attention on the continued detention of the European aid workers kidnapped by members of an AQIM-related group with suspected help from members of the Polisario Front, the Washington Team authored a blog posting on the MOTM website on March 20, "Day 150 – still hostage: Rosella Urru, two others seized by AQIM sect in Polisario camp." This posting will be a part of a regular series of updates on the kidnapping as the situation develops.

On March 27, the Global Post published an op-ed by Jordan Paul, "Why are we perpetuating a source of instability in North Africa?" The op-ed made the case for retargeting non-humanitarian aid destined for the Polisario to stop perpetuating the refugee camps' deteriorating security and humanitarian conditions and urged US leadership to resolve the Western Sahara conflict.

In late March, the Washington Team compiled a paper, "Spotlight: The case for redirecting US support for the Polisario-run camps in Algeria, which are becoming a recruiting ground for AQIM, arms and drug traffickers." The paper provides background information and a chronology of documented incidents and reports linking members of the Polisario Front with AQIM, trafficking, and other illicit activities in the region. It will be widely distributed in April to key contacts in Congress, the media, and think tanks.

Results:

In March, the Washington Team's efforts to highlight the Polisario's involvement with rising terrorism in the region generated more than 200 favorable media placements and 21 million media impressions.

Resolving the Western Sahara: Autonomy under Moroccan Sovereignty

Ahead of and following the ninth round of informal talks on the Western Sahara conflict, the Washington Team conducted outreach to journalists, policymakers, and government officials to highlight the urgent need to solve the conflict for security as well as humanitarian reasons and to promote Morocco's compromise autonomy proposal.

Activities:

To focus US media attention on the informal talks and Morocco's efforts to offer genuine compromise in the negotiations, the Washington Team issued a press release on March 12, "US, France voice strong support for Morocco's autonomy plan to resolve Western Sahara dispute, remove obstacle to peace in region." The release, which highlighted recent public declarations of support for the autonomy plan by US Secretary of State Clinton and French Foreign Minister Juppé, was distributed to PRNewswire and targeted journalists. It was posted by more than 150 US and international media outlets, including Reuters, the Wall Street Journal's Market Watch, Forbes, Boston Globe, Dallas Morning News, Cleveland Plain Dealer, Sacramento Bee, Yahoo News, AOL News, AfricaBusiness, and Afrik-News. MAP published an article, "Les 9è pourparlers sur le Sahara se tiennent avec en toile de fond un soutien consolidé de Washington au Plan d'autonomie," that referenced the release and the ICTS report, which was republished by L'Opinion, Le Matin, and several other Moroccan news publications.

Following regular briefings and updates by the Team, two Members of Congress also made strong, public statements of support for Morocco's autonomy plan as a peaceful, compromise solution to the Western Sahara conflict. In an opinion piece published March 12 in Roll Call, "Changes offer positive sign for Western Sahara", Rep. Steve Cohen of Tennessee gave the background on why the autonomy proposal was the best option for peace. In remarks for the Congressional Record, Rep. Chris Murphy of Connecticut said the people of the Western Sahara "deserve for this longstanding dispute to be resolved" and stated that Morocco's compromise proposal is "a reasonable offer and can serve as a basis for negotiations." Murphy acknowledged, "it is in the interest of the United States and the parties involved to achieve a peaceful, negotiated solution to the Western Sahara issue[.]" MAP ran stories on both Members' statements, "US Congressman highlights overwhelming bipartisan support for Morocco's autonomy plan within two chambers of US Congress," and "Moroccan autonomy proposal, a democratic solution that can serve as a basis for negotiations, US Cong."

On March 13, the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace published a paper by Professor Anouar Boukhars, "Simmering discontent in the Western Sahara," in which Boukhars examined a number of internal and external factors that affect resolution of the Western Sahara conflict. The paper – which cited several information sources the Washington Team helped generate – was distributed widely to key contacts and targeted journalists and incorporated into our regular information packet on the Western Sahara.

In order to highlight the urgent need to address the humanitarian crisis in the Polisario-controlled camps in southern Algeria through implementation of durable solutions for refugees, Robert Holley authored a blog posting on the MOTM website, "You don't have to live like a refugee", which is a play on words from Tom Petty song with the same title.

Results:

In March, the Washington Team's efforts to highlight to US audiences the broad support for Morocco's autonomy plan and need for US leadership to help resolve the Western Sahara generated more than 650 favorable media placements and 57 million media impressions.

Upcoming in April

On April 3, the Washington Team will host a roundtable, "The Western Sahara crisis: Why US leadership is needed now," where an expert panel will offer insights on the crisis in the Western Sahara, the growing threat of terrorism in the region, the deteriorating humanitarian situation, and how US leadership can help bring this conflict to a peaceful end. The roundtable will feature Jean AbiNader, Senior Advisor, Moroccan American Center (Moderator), Ambassador Michael Ussery, Former US Ambassador to Morocco, Dr J. Peter Pham, Director, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, The Atlantic Council, and Robert Holley, Senior Policy Advisor, Moroccan American Center for Policy. To encourage attendance and coverage of the roundtable, the Washington Team widely distributed a press advisory to target journalists, as well as an invitation to all major policymakers and US government officials who focus on Morocco. The advisory was picked up and posted by more than 120 US and international media outlets, including Reuters, the Wall Street Journal's Market Watch, CNBC, CNN Top News, Boston Globe, African Press Organization, Sacramento Bee, Yahoo News, AOL News, and Afrik-News.

Congressional Activities

The Washington Team conducted over 90 meetings with Congressional offices in March alone, which focused on our core themes: Morocco as a leader, the rising threat of terrorism in the region and the dangers of the Polisario camps, the need to target assistance to the camps, and the need to resolve the issue of the Western Sahara based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty.

These meetings serve to maintain our majority support in Congress, to ensure that the truth is known about the Polisario, to build support for targeting assistance to the camps, and to create a greater awareness of the importance of a strong US-Morocco bilateral relationship. These meetings constitute the base we build every year as we never take for granted our current supporters and always seek to secure the support of additional members. The Washington Team followed up on these meetings with a series of emails containing updates, recent news, publications so as reinforce our messaging provided at each meeting. The latter also lay the groundwork for our upcoming meetings so that members are aware of the issues to be discussed well in advance.

The Ambassador continued his introductory meetings to key Members of Congress. In April, he was hosted for a lunch in the Congressional Members Dining Room where he met with Rep. Steve Cohen (who wrote the Op-Ed earlier in the month), Rep. Ed Towns, Rep. Ed Markey, Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee, and Rep. David Dreier. The Ambassador also met the co-Chair of the Morocco Caucus, Rep. Michael Grimm. These introductory meetings will continue throughout the year.

The Washington Team also produced significant statements around the latest informal round of the negotiations. Rep. Chris Murphy (D-CT) made a statement in support of Morocco on the eve of the Manhasset talks and Rep. Steve Cohen (D-TN) published a very favorable Op-ed on the Monday of the talks. These statements and Op-Eds from leftist, democratic members help to reinforce the concept that the autonomy/sovereignty solution has broad based support and is the inevitable solution. The more that this message takes hold, the easier it will be to secure congressional support for establishing facts on the ground (building on the language from last year) and conditioning aid to the camps.

The Washington Team also worked with the office of Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart to pose questions to the Administration during oversight hearings with Secretary Clinton on how they planned to implement the language authorizing US assistance to Morocco to be spent in the southern provinces. This helps to keep the issue in front of the State Department and makes them aware that Congress is intent on seeing action this year. The Washington Team is also working with the Appropriations Committee to develop language and secure support for targeting assistance to the refugee camps away from the status quo and towards durable solutions, including a census and resettlement.

MATIC

MATIC worked with the US Chamber of Commerce in setting up its first business delegation to Morocco March 20-22, which including major corporations such as Raytheon, Honeywell, Lockheed Martin, General Dynamics, and others, as well as six companies focused on renewable energies. The Moroccan Embassy arranged for the participation of a number of senior government officials to attend events and lunches and dinners hosted by AMDI and Maroc Export. MATIC hosted a luncheon for the delegation on March 21 and worked with ADEREE, MASEN, and ONE on a panel on renewable energies. Ambassador Kaplan and members of the US Embassy attended the luncheon.

The most important news of the month was an announcement by the China Africa Development Fund (CAD Fund) that it had chosen Morocco for its regional office for North, West, and Central Africa. MATIC has escorted three different CAD Fund delegations in Morocco and helped them survey possible office and apartment sites. MATIC was involved with them in setting up meetings for and providing logistical support, as well as coordinated with GOM officials. MATIC was the first among several Moroccan entities to make contact with the CAD Fund.

MATIC also set up the latest in a series of meetings for MANAS Development Group <http://www.manasdevelopment.org/> an international company that provides training services to agencies and companies, which resulted in their choosing Morocco as the location for the regional office serving North, West, and Central Africa.

MACC

Throughout the month of March, MACC staff attended a number of events on the Maghreb and the Middle East, including an Ambassadors forum hosted by the US-Arab Chamber of Commerce, a roundtable on democracy in the Arab World held at the National Press Club, and a conference on access to justice hosted by the American Bar Association.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, April 10, 2012 5:13 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com

Rachad,
Thank you for your generous time today. I felt it was a very productive session. As promised here are two questions submitted for the record during a hearing with Secretary Clinton last month:

Madame Secretary, I was pleased to read about your visit to North Africa and Morocco over the past weekend. We all agree that this is a very important moment for the region and I believe that you and I are in agreement that Morocco presents a promising model. Congress and this Committee have long been concerned about the resolving the Western Sahara in a realistic manner.

The Omnibus Spending Bill recently passed by Congress and signed by President Obama directs that US program aid designated for Morocco can be used in the Western Sahara in order to extend Morocco's reform agenda and support stability in the region. When in the next year do you expect that we will see the State Department establish or extend a program to this region?

I know you share that concern and have worked to reaffirm the US policy of resolving the conflict over the Western Sahara between Morocco and the Polisario based on a formula of autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty to be negotiated between the parties. This policy began under the Clinton Administration and has continued under both President Bush and President Obama. As you know it is strongly supported by a bipartisan majority of both the US House and Senate. You reiterated the continuation of that policy in Morocco over the weekend. We know that drug cartels are filling the security void in the Sahel and that AQIM is getting stronger. We all agree that resolving this issue would create conditions for better economic and security cooperation in the region. Do you believe that we can come to a resolution on this issue in the near future? Thank you Madam Secretary for your time.

Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, April 12, 2012 12:38 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Follow up to staff meeting yesterday

Rachad,
We had a good staff meeting yesterday and believe we've established a process to address our immediate policy issues. Mouad attended the meeting and I'm sure he will give you his own readout. Based upon this morning's meeting and our discussion on Tuesday I'd like to suggest the following processes for your consideration:

Congressional meetings involving the Ambassador

1. Secure time available to the Ambassador. This would be handled by your staff and they would inform us of your availability.
2. Prioritizing upcoming congressional meetings and selecting members to meet with. Our staffs would jointly collaborate, and recommend directly to you through your staff, regarding the order of the meetings. I am always available to directly provide you with any additional thinking in this regard.
3. Prepare a briefing document for your meeting. This will include talking points and issues of importance to the member, and proposed asks and expected results from the meeting. The briefing paper would be developed by our joint staffs at our weekly staff meeting and will involve our congressional, communications and policy people. The final paper would come up to you from both your staff and me. As we do more and more meetings, the briefing document process will become more streamlined with only some smaller "tweaks" for future meetings depending on the member and purpose of meeting.
4. We also think a face to face preparation meeting with you before important congressional visits would be useful. We understand however that this may cause undue pressure on your schedule.
5. It is also my understanding from our meetings that MAC staff will attend congressional meetings with you when you ask us to, when your staff is unable, or when we add some value to the meeting as a result of our familiarity with the member. In all cases, we think a summary of the meeting is important as it will provide us with important information on the nuances of the meeting, and an understanding of where a member stands on various issues. I believe that such reporting is critical and has been extremely helpful in the past, as we have been able to rate the history of each congressional member over time based upon specific actions they took with regard to Morocco.
6. The congressional staff visits continue extremely well with joint cooperation between our staffs. We are proud that our staffs have jointly conducted nearly 100 meetings to date. Congratulations to your and our staffs.

Rollout for the Ambassador

Based upon the plan you approved during our meeting on Tuesday, I suggest that your staff (Saida?) participate in our weekly communications meeting (she already does each Thursday) and through that meeting we will jointly implement tasks approved in the plan as a regular part of our business together.

Facts on the Ground Strategy

Based upon your approval of our plan two weeks ago, we would conduct a weekly meeting, including our staffs, to oversee the implementation of tasks for the plan.

I look forward to your review and comment and am pleased by the cooperation together. I feel we are making good progress, and as I mentioned to you, as we get used to a new way of doing business together please let me know if I ever do anything you do not feel comfortable with.

Thank you, Ed

Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, April 14, 2012 12:16 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: US soldiers who died in helicopter accident in Morocco

FYI, we'll get back to you very soon. Thanks

-----Original Message-----

From: Edward Gabriel
Sent: Saturday, April 14, 2012 12:16 PM
To: 'Jordan Paul'; Calvin Dark
Subject: RE: US soldiers who died in helicopter accident in Morocco

Thanks guys

-----Original Message-----

From: Jordan Paul [mailto:jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com]
Sent: Saturday, April 14, 2012 12:14 PM
To: Calvin Dark
Cc: Edward Gabriel
Subject: RE: US soldiers who died in helicopter accident in Morocco

Cal,

Can you keep an eye out for an Obituary or something that would pin down the LA neighborhood/zip code? I'm looking as well but have only found "Los Angeles." There should be something in one of the Sunday So Cal papers.

Like I said, I'll keep looking as well and between the two of us we should find something.

Thanks, Jordan

-----Original Message-----

From: Edward Gabriel [mailto:ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com]
Sent: Saturday, April 14, 2012 11:52 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Cc: Calvin Dark; Jordan Paul
Subject: RE: US soldiers who died in helicopter accident in Morocco

Thank you. We will research this and get Mouaad the name of the member of Congress. Ed

-----Original Message-----

From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Friday, April 13, 2012 11:44 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Re: US soldiers who died in helicopter accident in Morocco

> Ed,
>
> Thank you for the names of the two marines who died.

- >
- > I have sent a condolence letter to the leadership of the Department of Defense and the State Department.
- >
- > But I will definitely send a letter to the families and members representing the districts of the deceased.
- >
- > I would appreciate if Jordan could provide Mouaad with the name of the congressman for Cptl. Robby Reyes.

>

> Thanks again,

>

>

> Rachad

On Apr 13, 2012, at 7:26 PM, Edward Gabriel wrote:

- > Rachad,
- > You may already be doing something on this but would like to recommend a letter of condolence from you to the families of the deceased and to the members of Congress from their districts. We can do more research if you require it. Info follows:

- >
- > Cptl. Robby Reyes
- > Los Angeles, CA
- > (Not sure how to find which of the dozen or so Reps from LA it would be without a ZIP.)

- >
- > Cpl. Derek Kerns
- > Fort Dix, N.J
- > (Rep. John Runyan)

>

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, April 14, 2012 12:21 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: DRAFT Final Bill Language

Rachad,

Below is the language our team worked on with the Embassy regarding the appropriations language, including my final input. It was also sent from Jordan to Mouaad. We look forward to your review and thoughts. Thanks Ed

From: Jordan Paul [<mailto:jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com>]
Sent: Friday, April 13, 2012 6:04 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: DRAFT Final Bill Language

Ed,

Below is the language agreed to in the meeting this morning and signed off on by Bob, Caitlin and the Congressional Team (including the Embassy) and represents our collective judgment on the best way to target assistance for the camps. Please review and let me know what you think. Thanks, Jordan

None of the funds in the bill can be used for UNHCR operations to administer the Polisario run refugee camps near Tindouf, Algeria until the Secretary of State submits a report to the House and Senate Committees on Appropriations that UNHCR is dedicating part of the contribution for programs that support durable solutions, including a census, a refugee resettlement grant program, and active permanent resettlement or voluntary repatriation programs for these refugees.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, April 14, 2012 1:05 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Delegation Coordination
Attachments: Memo on delegations and visitors 12Apr12.doc

Rachad,
This is not an immediate priority, but I wanted to give you a paper to reflect upon on how we may better serve you on visiting delegations. Attached is a proposal to address delegation visits for your review and comments. It does not require your immediate attention and can wait until we have a chance to discuss when convenient. Thanks Ed

Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

MEMORANDUM

14 APRIL 2012

TO: Ambassador Bouhlal

From: Ed Gabriel

RE: Delegation program Coordination Process

As we move forward to work with the Embassy on programs that involve guests and delegations from Morocco, it may be useful to propose a process for your consideration, when working with the Embassy to coordinate programs for the visitors.

Visitors/Issues:

Most of the visitors are here to promote Morocco as the Leader in the region. This could include issues ranging from women rights, social development, human rights, regionalization, implementation of the new constitution, and Morocco's progressive interfaith policies, to leaders in women's economic development, parliamentarians, and others who have a role that contributes to a greater awareness of Morocco's progressive agenda.

Process:

In the past, the first step consisted of a joint meeting between Embassy staff and MAC to review upcoming programs – the vast majority of these programs are initiated by the Embassy staff. Usually, the Embassy staff prepares a scene-setter, which provides the context for the visit – who is coming, the issues that they will address, and the objectives of the visit.

Once the context has been defined, we discuss five items with Embassy staff:

1. Activities – what is the optimal schedule for the visitors and who is responsible for organizing which events
2. Logistics – what is needed for the overall program: biographies, press releases, local transportation services, types of events, e.g. meal-related or not, budget issues
3. Audience – given the proposed events, who are the key audiences for each activity, for example, the Embassy usually has very strong relations with NGOs and may want to host and event targeting NGOs interested in women's issues. Another example, MAC has strong relations with the private sector and agencies involved in trade and investment promotion, and can take the lead on those types of events. The key is that information is shared and a schedule agreed upon with defined responsibilities for each team.

4. Media/Communications – primary and secondary objectives are defined and priorities for securing coverage, as well as allocating specific times in the schedule for media relations.
5. Hill meetings, if any, are also considered and time on the schedule is allocated for Hill meetings along with assignments for who is responsible for which meetings.

Timing:

Ideally, we will have two to three weeks advance notice of visitors/delegations. This provides sufficient time for the initial organizing meeting and subsequent follow up meetings to finalize details. In the past, we have been able to achieve good results on much shorter notice but it affects media/communications outreach and the ability to target audiences when there is short notice.

For example, will there be any events for Morocco surrounding the World Bank spring meetings next week? Although there is great competition for media attention during that week, there may be opportunities for one on one interviews that could be helpful to Morocco's messaging.

I apologize for the array of questions and papers being sent to you. I'm sure as we get accustomed to your preferred way of operating, we will not have to bother you as much with such details. Thank you.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, April 14, 2012 1:35 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: follow up

Rachad,
 Thank you for your thoughtful response and I'm sorry I am sending so much material. I know it will get more efficient as the months go on, but I am pleased we are addressing all needs before us in an efficient manner. Again, thank you for your time and thoughtful consideration of my requests and comments. Ed

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Thursday, April 12, 2012 11:46 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: follow up

Ed,

Sorry to send to email you this late, just came back from a very impressive diner with Prince Salman bin Abdel Aziz Al Saoud, Saoudi Arabian Defense minister.

thank you for the update.
 here is my feedback so we can stay on top of things:

1. Secure time available: Mouaad will be the focal point for securing time for the House meetings and Saida for Senate meetings while Sandrine and Ouissal will be requesting them.
2. Prioritizing upcoming congressional meetings and selecting members.

must do meetings:

- first with MDB which is scheduled for the 17th
- meeting Moroccan Caucus, met with Grim with Mouaad and we are working on a dinner for the co-chairs
- meeting with the replacement of Payne, already scheduled for the 18th

Strategic meetings with Chairmen, committees and subcommittees with Jurisdiction our country

- House Foreign Affair committee members: Ros-Lehtinen (will do a follow up meeting) and Berman
 -subcommittee: Chris Smith, Gary Ackerman, Karen Bass (scheduled the 18th)
- Senate Foreign Relations: Kerry, Lugar, Casey, Jim Risch
- House Appropriations: hall Rogers, Norm Dicks, Kay Granger, Nita Lowey (Mouaad and Jordan met with her staff)
- House Appropriations: Inouye, Thad Cochran

- House Armed Services: Buck McKeon, Adam Smith
- Senate Armed Services: Carl Levin, John McCain
- House Intelligence Committee : Mike Rogers, Dutch Ruppersberger
- Senate Intelligence Committee : Dianne Feinstein, Saxby Chambliss

3. my guys told me that all material for the meetings is prepared by Jordan. This is why I suggested to hold follow up meetings (first one tomorrow at 11am).

4. face to face preparation meeting with you before important congressional visits are very useful but the material and talking points prepared before the meetings can prevent undue pressure on my schedule.

5. MAC staff will attend congressional meetings as agreed between us when need be.

6. am glad that Congressional staff visits are going well and they should continue, Fouad gives me feedback on all the meetings he attends. I also agree that a summary of the meetings is important as it will provide us with important information about where that members stands on different issues.

take care,

Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, April 16, 2012 5:05 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Foley Hoag
Attachments: Foley Hoag aprill2012.docx

Attached is an analysis of one of the chief lobbyists against Morocco. We are analyzing it very closely as it will aid us in future meetings on the Hill and with the Administration. We recommend an in-depth read. Ed

Foley Hoag LLP Brief Overview

Following reception of the memo on Independent Diplomat's activism at the UN dated 8 March 2012, we thought it relevant to provide relevant information on pro-Algeria and Polisario lobbyist's activities in the United States. This memo on Foley Hoag, LLP is an addition to the memo previously sent on the activities of Independent Diplomat.

You will find below information on Foley Hoag's history, current employees, activities, funding, as well as its contacts. The latter are of particular interest as they show access to Congress, State Department as well as media

Background

Reichler & Soble first registered as foreign agents working on behalf of the SADR on 18 February 1992. The primary contact was through Ambassador Moulud Said.

According to publically available documents, the registrant "will represent SADR on matters that may affect the interests its principles." It is also noted that the principle "shall reimburse the registrant for costs and expenses and that the registrant will represent the principal in communications with Members of Congress, their staffs, and in communications with the Executive Branch and its agencies."

During this time, Paul Reichler met with Tim Reiser and Bernadette Paslo (House Subcommittee on Africa) on behalf of SADR (Meetings in March and April 1992).; David Schorr met with Mark Murray (House Subcommittee on Foreign Operations) (Meetings in March and April 1992, November 1992); Paul Reichler met with Gare Smith (Office of Senator Kennedy) (June 1992). The firm dissolved and stopped representing any principals on 15 January 1993, thus terminating its relationship with SADR on that date.

The Law Offices of Paul S. Reichler took over all of Reichler & Soble's foreign principles, including SADR on 1 March 1993. The details of the arrangement are the same as noted above. On 1 January 1994 the name of the firm became Reichler, Milton, and Midel.

On behalf of SADR, Paul Reichler held the following meetings during this time period:

- 05/07/93 Terry Peel, House Foreign Operations Subcommittee
- 05/07/93 Moulud Said
- 05/10/93 Representative Lee Hamilton
- 05/19/93 Representative Harry Johnston
- 05/19/93 Cliff Kupchan, House Subcommittee on Africa
- 05/19/93 Frank Kiehne, Office of Representative Donald Payne
- 05/19/93 Moulud Said
- 06/09/93 Representative Harry Johnson
- 06/09/93 Representative Esteban Torres
- 06/09/93 Representative Donald Payne
- 06/09/93 Representative Robert Torricelli
- 06/10/93 Representative Lee Hamilton
- 06/10/93 President Abdelaziz

06/22/93 Alice Slayton, Office of Representative Torricelli
 02/02/94 Representative Lee Hamilton

The agreement with SADR was terminated on 1 April 1994. There was no activity on Western Sahara between 1994 and 2007.

Foley Hoag's activities

Reichler, Milton, and Midel joined Foley, Hoag, and Eliot LLP on 1 June 1998. The firm became Foley Hoag LLP sometime in 2002 and signed an agreement with Algeria (not SADR) on May 16, 2007. This contract notes that payment should be through October 2007 at the fixed monthly rate of $30,000/month, but does not specify the length of the contract. There is no indication that the contract has fixed terms, nor is there any subsequent contract or renewal listed on FARA.

In the contract: “Mr. Gare A. Smith will keep the Embassy of Algeria closely apprised regarding the specific nature of his activities and the feedback received from the Congress, federal government officials, and civil society. Mr. Smith will be available for regular consultations with designated representative of the Embassy. He shall provide monthly written reports of activities undertaken in furtherance of the goals of this Agreement.”

As such, Foley Hoag provides council to and conducts lobbying activities for the Government of Algeria. Principal services include:

- Contribute to strengthening relations of friendship and cooperation between Algeria and US
- Work with members and staff of the Congressional and Executive branches of US government to facilitate a greater understanding of Algeria's concerns and positions on various issues
- Mobilize non-governmental organizational, public, and media support for Algeria
- Promote Algeria's role of peace and cooperation in world and regional affairs
- Enhance the image of Algeria in the US

Employees who work on the Algeria/SADR issue

Gare Smith

Mr. Gare Smith personally manages the Foley Hoag services on behalf of the Government of Algeria, under supervision of the Embassy of Algeria to the United States. Mr. Smith keeps the Embassy of Algeria closely apprised regarding the specific nature of his activities, and the feedback received from Congress, federal government officials, and civil society.

Other Registered FARA Employees of Foley Hoag:

- Alexander Aber
- Michelle Aldeman
- Essence Arzu
- Jayne Bulenta
- Jannis Brennan
- Clara Brillembourg
- Hemmie Chang
- Rodger Currie
- Euripides Dalmanieras

Jasmine C. Trillos Decarie
 Eileen Smith Ewing
 Ara Gershengorn
 Ronald Goodman
 Russell Hathway
 Julia Huston
 George N. Lester VI
 Terence McCourt
 Paul Stuart Reichler
 Robert Toone
 Gwendolyn Wilber
 Michael Wyatt
 Jeremy Younkin
 Doug Zingale

Funding

The Consulting and Legal Agreement stipulates that the Government of Algeria will pay Foley Hoag a fixed fee of $30,000.00 per month.

Payments reported to FARA:

05/16/07 – 09/30/07: $106,041.82
 10/01/07 – 03/31/08: $205,340.00
 04/01/08 – 09/30/08: $211,131.63
 10/01/08 – 03/31/09: $212,436.88
 04/01/09 – 09/30/09: $210,931.00
 10/01/09 – 03/31/10: $211,230.73
 04/01/10 – 09/30/10: $210,886.66
 10/01/10 – 03/31/11: $210,724.00
 04/01/11 – 09/30/11: $210,851.00

Contacts (Meetings)

Subjects discussed (all): The promotion of Algeria –US relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self determination. The Right to self-determination for the indigenous people of the Western Sahara.

Congress:

Date	Contact name	Office
8/13/2007	Christos Tsantas	Rep. Barbara Lee
7/29/2011	Elise Gately	Rep. Dennis Ross
7/24/2007	Noelle LuSane	Rep. Donald Payne
11/21/2007	Noelle LuSane	Rep. Donald Payne
4/3/2008	Noelle LuSane	Rep. Donald Payne
9/11/2008	Nkechi Mbanu	Rep. Donald Payne
10/10/2008	Noelle LuSane	Rep. Donald Payne
10/24/2008	Antonia King	Rep. Donald Payne
10/31/2008	Antonia King	Rep. Donald Payne

11/17/2008	Antonia King	Rep. Donald Payne
4/1/2009	Antonia King	Rep. Donald Payne
4/6/2009	Noelle LuSane	Rep. Donald Payne
8/11/2009	Antonia King	Rep. Donald Payne
9/28/2009	Antonia King	Rep. Donald Payne
11/24/2009	Antonia King	Rep. Donald Payne
3/18/2010	Antonia King	Rep. Donald Payne
3/24/2010	Antonia King	Rep. Donald Payne
1/12/2011	Algene Sajery	Rep. Donald Payne
1/12/2011	Algene Sajery	Rep. Donald Payne
2/7/2011	Algene Sajery	Rep. Donald Payne
4/5/2011	Algene Sajery	Rep. Donald Payne
10/5/2007	Molly Miller	Rep. Frank Wolf
10/17/2007	Molly Miller	Rep. Frank Wolf
5/4/2009	Elizabeth Hoffman	Rep. Frank Wolf
4/28/2010	Elizabeth Hoffman	Rep. Frank Wolf
5/26/2010	Elizabeth Hoffman	Rep. Frank Wolf
7/15/2010	Elizabeth Hoffman	Rep. Frank Wolf
10/8/2010	Elizabeth Hoffman	Rep. Frank Wolf
10/20/2010	Elizabeth Hoffman	Rep. Frank Wolf
4/5/2011	Elizabeth Hoffman	Rep. Frank Wolf
3/18/2010	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Gus Bilirakis
3/23/2010	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Gus Bilirakis
2/27/2010	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Gus Bilirakis
5/7/2010	Liz Hittos	Rep. Gus Bilirakis
7/2/2010	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Gus Bilirakis
7/15/2010	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Gus Bilirakis
8/10/2010	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Gus Bilirakis
10/26/2010	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Gus Bilirakis
12/6/2010	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Gus Bilirakis
5/7/2010	Rick Kessler	Rep. Howard Berman
1/31/2011	Rebecca Ulrich	Rep. Jeff Duncan
7/29/2011	Rebecca Ulrich	Rep. Jeff Duncan
8/5/2011	Rebecca Ulrich	Rep. Jeff Duncan
6/7/2007	Karin Finkler	Rep. Joe Pitts
8/6/2007	Karin Finkler	Rep. Joe Pitts
10/16/2007	Karin Finkler	Rep. Joe Pitts
4/16/2008	Karin Finkler	Rep. Joe Pitts
6/24/2008	Karin Finkler	Rep. Joe Pitts
7/15/2008	Karin Finkler	Rep. Joe Pitts
11/21/2008	Karin Finkler	Rep. Joe Pitts
4/24/2009	Karin Finkler	Rep. Joe Pitts
6/30/2009	Amanda Lahr	Rep. Joe Pitts
9/24/2009	Amanda Lahr	Rep. Joe Pitts
1/15/2010	Amanda Lahr	Rep. Joe Pitts
4/27/2009	Michaeleen Crowell	Rep. John Lewis
6/23/2009	Michaeleen Crowell	Rep. John Lewis
10/4/2007	Andria Hoffman	Rep. Mark Kirk

6/16/2008	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
8/21/2008	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
12/18/2008	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
3/10/2009	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
4/17/2009	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
6/15/2009	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
6/23/2009	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
10/16/2009	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
10/27/2009	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
10/30/2009	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
11/2/2009	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
11/17/2009	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
12/14/2009	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
1/14/2012	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
2/18/2010	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
7/22/2010	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
9/10/2010	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
9/30/2010	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
10/25/2010	Dan Murphy	Rep. Patrick Kennedy
4/20/2009	Jonathan Halpern	Rep. Sanford Bishop
7/27/2007	Robert Bacon	Rep. Tim Ryan
12/28/2007	Robert Bacon	Rep. Tim Ryan
4/16/2008	Robert Bacon	Rep. Tim Ryan
1/28/2009	Robert Bacon	Rep. Tim Ryan
4/23/2009	Robert Bacon	Rep. Tim Ryan
11/24/2009	Robert Bacon	Rep. Tim Ryan
6/5/2007	David Killion	Rep. Tom Lantos
6/5/2007	Alan Makovsky	Rep. Tom Lantos
8/1/2007	Alan Makovsky	Rep. Tom Lantos
4/16/2008	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
5/9/2008	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
6/24/2008	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
8/7/2008	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
1/22/2009	Helen Hardin	Rep. Trent Franks
3/20/2009	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
5/19/2009	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
7/30/2009	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
9/14/2009	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
10/23/2009	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
10/27/2009	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
10/28/2009	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
11/18/2009	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
6/6/2011	Tina Ramirez	Rep. Trent Franks
7/29/2011	Stephanie Hammond	Rep. Trent Franks
8/5/2011	Stephanie Hammond	Rep. Trent Franks
7/24/2008	Katie Hargis	Rep. Vic Snyder
8/6/2008	Katie Hargis	Rep. Vic Snyder
2/13/2009	Katie Hargis	Rep. Vic Snyder

3/20/2009	Katie Hargis	Rep. Vic Snyder
5/4/2009	Katie Hargis	Rep. Vic Snyder
11/2/2009	Vic Snyder	Rep. Vic Snyder
11/18/2009	Katie Hargis	Rep. Vic Snyder
11/24/2009	Katie Hargis	Rep. Vic Snyder
12/7/2009	Katie Hargis	Rep. Vic Snyder
1/21/2010	Katie Hargis	Rep. Vic Snyder
3/18/2010	Katie Hargis	Rep. Vic Snyder
10/18/2010	Katie Hargis	Rep. Vic Snyder
6/7/2007	Helen Hardin	Rep. Zach Wamp
8/7/2007	Helen Hardin	Rep. Zach Wamp
9/18/2007	Helen Hardin	Rep. Zach Wamp
6/24/2008	Helen Hardin	Rep. Zach Wamp
5/11/2009	Helen Hardin	Rep. Zach Wamp
11/18/2009	Helen Harden	Rep. Zach Wamp
10/13/2007	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
10/22/2007	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
12/31/2007	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
2/12/2008	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
5/5/2008	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
7/1/2008	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
12/16/2008	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
1/5/2009	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
4/3/2009	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
4/13/2009	Jurie Feldman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
5/21/2009	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
6/16/2009	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
8/17/2009	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
9/16/2009	Sharon Waxman	Sen. Edward Kennedy
5/21/2008	Phil Karsting	Sen. Herb Kohl
7/31/2007	Sarah Margon	Sen. James Inhofe
5/22/2008	Sarah Klotz	Sen. James Inhofe
6/30/2008	Sarah Klotz	Sen. James Inhofe
7/1/2008	Ryan Thompson	Sen. James Inhofe
7/23/2008	Ryan Thompson	Sen. James Inhofe
9/18/2009	Sarah Klotz	Sen. James Inhofe
1/5/2009	Sarah Klotz	Sen. James Inhofe
7/23/2009	Sarah Klotz	Sen. James Inhofe
7/24/2009	Joel Starr	Sen. James Inhofe
12/9/2009	Sarah Klotz	Sen. James Inhofe
12/2/2010	Sarah Klotz	Sen. James Inhofe
12/7/2010	Sarah Klotz	Sen. James Inhofe
7/29./2009	Chris Socha	Sen. Jim DeMint
6/5/2007	Frank Lowenstein	Sen. John Kerry
11/14/2009	Frank Lowenstein	Sen. John Kerry
1/7/2010	Frank Lowenstein	Sen. John Kerry
11/22/2010	Frank Lowenstein	Sen. John Kerry
3/3/2011	Frank Lowenstein	Sen. John Kerry

6/2/2011	Frank Lowenstein	Sen. John Kerry
8/21/2007	Tim Rieser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
12/3/2007	Tim Reiser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
1/15/2008	Tim Reiser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
2/7/2008	Tim Reiser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
11/3/2008	Tim Reiser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
8/5/2009	Tim Reiser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
10/27/2009	Tim Rieser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
12/1/2009	Tim Rieser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
12/7/2009	Tim Rieser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
1/6/2010	Tim Rieser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
3/17/2010	Tim Rieser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
3/23/2010	Tim Rieser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
7/23/2010	Tim Rieser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
7/29/2010	Tim Rieser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
4/11/2011	Tim Rieser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
5/9/2011	Tim Rieser	Sen. Patrick Leahy
7/21/2008	Helosia Griggs	Sen. Richard Durbin
6/5/2007	Sarah Margon	Sen. Russ Feingold
11/9/2007	Sarah Margon	Sen. Russ Feingold
7/30/2008	Peter Quaranto	Sen. Russ Feingold
9/20/2008	Peter Quaranto	Sen. Russ Feingold
12/3/2008	Peter Quaranto	Sen. Russ Feingold
7/20/2009	Peter Quaranto	Sen. Russ Feingold
10/5/2009	Peter Quaranto	Sen. Russ Feingold
10/26/2009	Peter Quaranto	Sen. Russ Feingold
3/8/2010	Peter Quaranto	Sen. Russ Feingold
3/9/2010	Peter Quaranto	Sen. Russ Feingold
3/30/2010	Peter Quaranto	Sen. Russ Feingold
11/5/2010	Peter Quaranto	Sen. Russ Feingold
12/20/2010	Sarah Margon	Sen. Russ Feingold
7/26/2011	Tom Buttry	Sen. Tom Harkin
8/1/2011	Tom Buttry	Sen. Tom Harkin
8/2/2011	Tom Buttry	Sen. Tom Harkin
8/24/2011	Tom Buttry	Sen. Tom Harkin
1/13/2011	Hans Hogrefe	Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission

Media:

10/8/2008	Scott Bronstein	Executive Producer, CNN
11/6/2008	Scott Bronstein	Executive Producer, CNN

State Department/Administration:

10/26/2007	Bobby Pittman	National Security Council
10/25/2007	Chris Camponovo	National Security Council
4/2/2010	Dan Baer, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department

11/19/2010	Dan Baer, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
4/1/2011	Dan Baer, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
6/2/2010	Elisa Carlson-Reiner, Human Rights Officer	State Department
8/19/2010	Elisa Carlson-Reiner, Human Rights Officer	State Department
9/3/2010	Elisa Carlson-Reiner, Human Rights Officer	State Department
12/11/2009	Eric Schwartz, Assistant Secretary of State for Population, Refugees, and Migration	State Department
9/19/2011	Eric Schwartz, Assistant Secretary of State for Population, Refugees, and Migration	State Department
3/3/2010	Harold Koh, Legal Adviser	State Department
9/15/2010	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
9/22/2010	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
11/9/2010	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
11/15/2010	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
11/17/2010	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
1/7/2011	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
1/27/2011	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
1/28/2011	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
2/10/2011	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
2/16/2011	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
4/20/2011	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
6/28/2011	Jason Starr, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
11/1/2010	Jason Ullner, Algeria Desk Officer	State Department
11/1/2010	Jessica Patterson	State Department
4/16/2010	Jessica Patterson, Algeria Desk Officer	State Department
5/28/2010	Jessica Patterson, Algeria Desk Officer	State Department
6/2/2010	Jessica Patterson, Algeria Desk Officer	State Department
6/15/2010	Jessica Patterson, Algeria Desk Officer	State Department
7/8/2010	Jessica Patterson, Algeria Desk Officer	State Department
9/17/2010	Jessica Patterson, Algeria Desk Officer	State Department
2/5/2010	Maria Otero, Under Secretary of State for Democracy and Global Affairs	State Department
4/1/2010	Maria Otero, Undersecretary of State for	State Department

	Democracy and Global Affairs
4/16/2010	Matt Keene, Deputy Director, Office of Maghreb Affairs, Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs	State Department
10/21/2009	Michael Posner, Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
12/9/2009	Michael Posner, Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
4/12/2010	Michael Posner, Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
11/19/2010	Michael Posner, Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department
6/17/2011	Michael Posner, Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor	State Department

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, April 17, 2012 3:51 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: March Event Report Bulletin

Below please find the March 2012 MAC Events Bulletin. Our team compiles a monthly list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

March 2012 Events Bulletin

March 12

Ambassadors Forum

March 13

Morocco and the Arab Spring

March 20

Will Democracy Succeed in the Arab World - Tunisia As A Model?

Ambassadors Forum

Date: 12 March 2012

1. Title: Ambassadors Forum

Hosted by the National US-Arab Chamber of Commerce

Participants:

Thomas Krajewski: US Ambassador, Bahrain

Anne Patterson: US Ambassador, Egypt

James Jeffrey: US Ambassador, Iraq

Gene Cretz: US Ambassador, Libya

Samuel Kaplan: US Ambassador, Morocco

Gordon Gray: US Ambassador, Tunisia

Gerald Feierstein: US Ambassador, Yemen

Henry Ensher: US Ambassador, Algeria

Matthew Tueller: US Ambassador, Kuwait

Richard Schmierer: US Ambassador, Oman

Susan Ziadeh: US Ambassador, Qatar

James Smith: US Ambassador, Saudi Arabia

Michael Corbin: US Ambassador, United Arab Emirates (UAE)

Don DeMarino: Moderator: Chairman, National US-Arab Chamber of Commerce

2. Overview

Since the Arab Spring protests and demonstrations began in December 2010, governments have been overthrown in Tunisia, Egypt, Libya, and Yemen. Protests continue in parts of the Middle East and North Africa. The National US Arab Chamber of Commerce (NUSACC) Ambassador's Forum brought together thirteen US Ambassadors to the Arab World to discuss the impact of the Arab Spring on US-Arab commercial relations. Half of the Ambassadors discussed the transformation of regional economies in the wake of the past year's events, while the second group discussed efforts by oil-rich countries to diversify away from petroleum-based industries.

3. Summary

Following introductory remarks by US-Arab Chamber of Commerce Chairman Don DeMarino, seasoned diplomat Thomas Pickering gave a lengthy discussion on the significance of the 2011 Arab revolts. His guardedly optimistic remarks covered the crisis in Syria, Yemen, Bahrain, Egypt, and the general political changes in the Middle East and North Africa.

Ambassador Gordon Gray championed the opening of Tunisian markets to foreign trade and investment, which will benefit from the country's proximity to multiple regions and accessible ports. Citing the Agadir Agreement, he noted that Tunisia is the only North Africa country that can trade with all of its neighbors. Looking toward further opportunities for US companies, Gray highlighted large tourism projects, mega infrastructure projects, and franchising. Gray said that OPIC's $200 million commitment to North Africa can provide further support to foreign entry into regional markets.

Ambassador Samuel Kaplan hailed the Morocco "brand" as its claim to political stability and economic health. Morocco's historical emphasis on the development of tourism has resulted in an excellent reputation among Americans and businesses of all sizes. According to Kaplan, the Arab Spring has had a positive effect that led to a new government and a new constitution. Although the King maintains the preponderance of power, he is acting in accordance with the enshrined principle of shared government in the Constitution. Pointing to the 150 or so American companies that already operate in Morocco, Kaplan invited newcomers to take advantage of the US-Morocco Free Trade Agreement.

Conceding that Libya's current political situation remained precarious, Ambassador Gene Cretz highlighted the NTC's pronounced commitment to democracy. The number of political parties is exploding; election plans are proceeding with the aid of the United Nations; and the revolution's anniversary passed without incident. Turning to the matter of oil, Cretz pointed out that production has recovered dramatically, pushing past expert estimates. He summed up that Libya was in a good spot for American investment, even if contracts were not immediately forthcoming due to security concerns.

Ambassador James Jeffrey discussed Iraq's economic opportunities, noting that if Morocco's brand is stability, Iraq's may be instability. However, Iraq's enormous hydrocarbon reserves will allow it to eventually compete with Saudi Arabia, and American companies should therefore look closely at investment opportunities. Heavy equipment, chemicals, defense, and information technologies will be key sectors in the near future. Jeffrey warned that Iraq's business environment is a "daily challenge" - major constraints include a weighty bureaucracy that requires extensive permitting and legislating for larger projects. He pointed out that many countries, Turkey and Iran among them, have learned to adapt accordingly, and US companies should therefore be able to do the same. Jeffrey qualified that his assessment is based on the key assumption that Iraq will remain a unified nation with a steadily improving security situation.

Ambassador to Egypt Anne Patterson described the huge transformation in Egypt over the last year, which has also seen a relative liberalization of its economy. She said that the next six months will be very unsettled, as political uncertainty may exacerbate a sharp economic decline, but long term prospects for economic growth appear positive. One CITIGroup report predicts that Egypt may emerge from the next decade as a top ten global economy.

Ambassador to Bahrain Thomas Krajewski lamented the island nation's failure to build on its economic achievements prior to recent civil unrest. The government now faces a drop in tourism, an exodus of businesses, and lost investment driven by a perception that unrest has affected the business climate. Krajewski acknowledged that, without a political resolution, Bahrain's economy could continue to stagnate, causing rising unemployment and deeper social divides. He nevertheless expressed optimism that Bahrain would again realize its potential, most importantly through sector diversification, increased economic participation, and effective exploitation of the US-Bahrain Free Trade Agreement.

Algerian Ambassador Henry Ensher began the second session by comparing Algeria to his home state of California, complete with a Mediterranean climate, large landscapes, a diverse population, effective security forces, and immense cash reserves. But Ensher complained that much of its macroeconomic policy seems designed to thwart foreign investment, particularly in areas outside of the hydrocarbon sector. However, when it comes to defense, healthcare, and agribusiness, opportunities for high returns are ripe. Ensher said that his embassy in Algiers focuses primarily on security cooperation vis-à-vis Libya and the potential for the development of an al-Qaeda sanctuary in northern Mali. He concluded that "if the government would just get out of the way a little bit," Algeria would immediately see benefits.

Ambassador to the UAE Michael Corbin argued that the UAE has benefited not only from the Arab Spring's attendant instability, but also its focus on developing alternative energy industries. The World Future Energy summit invites businesses to enter a market destined for greatness in the future world economy. Corbin pointed out that the UAE is a place where the US brand is not only popular, but where it can actually compete with Indian and Chinese manufacturers. He foresees US businesses coming to the UAE and finding an atmosphere conducive to a regional integration and an ideal transportation hub.

Ambassador James Smith claimed that Saudi Arabia wants to become the prime destination for energy in general, not just petroleum products. Smith underscored the impact of increasing domestic consumption, which means Saudi Arabia may soon become a net importer of oil. Smith insisted that and making products out of downstream derivatives is far more efficient in terms of creating jobs and promoting diversification. As consumption in the West continues its decline, alternative energy sources proliferate, and shale oil and shale gas overcome their current challenges, Saudi Arabia faces the risk of falling into irrelevance as a global player.

Ambassador to Qatar Susan Ziadah echoed previous claims that the nation is open for business. Basking in the glow of rapid GDP growth and expanding trade, Qatar's emir has further developed his vision for 2030, which places a premium on diversification away from upstream energy production. There is also a tremendous emphasis on the development of petrochemical refinement. Ziadah explained how education initiatives, such as Education City, have produced a new export sector in educated workers. Qatar is also exploring opportunities to host great numbers of sports events, which has pushed up the schedule for infrastructure development, an area in which American companies enjoy a comparative advantage.

Ambassador to Oman Richard Schmierer furthered the discussion on commercial diversification. He explained that, as a market, Oman has used revenues to attract American companies to invest in its gas sector, where it has seen rapid growth in exports. Tourism is Oman's highest priority, although they are also focused on consultancy and franchising. The US-Oman Free Trade Agreement has led multiple corporations to base production there. In addition, Oman's location, outside of the Gulf and the Strait of Hormuz, allows it to market itself as a key location for those foreign investors who want to expand inwards toward Iraq and Iran. The government is consequently investing in new ports, airports, and railroad stations.

Ambassador Matthew Tueller recalled the storied history between the Kuwaiti government and large foreign firms. He said that Kuwaiti leaders frequently express an interest in seeing more American companies move to Kuwait. Like the other Gulf states, Kuwait has embarked on a development plan designed to reduce its dependence on oil revenues, and the new budget will fund over 100,000 projects in transportation, education, healthcare, IT, and alternative energy. Tueller argued that these are all areas in which US businesses possess a comparative advantage.

4. Q & A

Q: Does business have to wait for the Libyan elections before considering investment options?

A: (Cretz) I do not think you have to wait. You can keep saying well let's wait until any point, but I think now is the time for business, because even if the top names change, those who are dealing with contracts and the economy will be part of the economic fabric of Libya for years to come. The point is you must come and establish yourself, making contacts that will keep you in good standing for years to come. The government is not in a position to make contacts as of now, but you have the power to meet the right people before and after the elections. In addition, they are reviewing all the different laws from the Qaddafi era, and I will tell you that in terms of transparency and anti-corruption measures, this government is very committed to creating a new environment for business to come. That does not mean the entire rot that characterized the Qaddafi years will be gone, but I might add that one reason they are reluctant to start giving out new contracts is they are very aware of the eyes that are on them in terms of corruption, and they are making great efforts to avoid the taint of corruption.

Q: Many of the jobs in the Saudi sector are occupied by foreign labor, at the same time that there is high youth unemployment rate, so do young Saudis object to working in jobs that foreigners might take? How real is the problem of youth unemployment, politically and economically?

A: (Smith) I think the youth unemployment problem today is overstated, but the challenge for any one generation is understated. The challenge in Saudi Arabia is a bloated public sector as Saudis represent 90% of the public sector and 10% of the private sector, which means the government becomes the biggest obstacle toward developing small and medium enterprises. When you target 3rd party nationals as the problem, you will not solve the problem. You have to create new industry and new enterprises, with this hugely educated young generation coming of age, whom you bring in at entry level management and allow them to develop a career over time. You have to focus on the private sector to do that. It will be a challenge to be sure.

(Schmeier) I think there is a correlation in Oman, a minority country in the sense that the majority of residents are Omanis, and so most of the economy is run by Omanis. But the per capita income is 20,000 dollars a year. When you have a 100,000 dollar per year income, your needs for entering the workforce are much less. But I think Oman is doing a very good job of identifying where employment can be carried out in the most efficient manner.

(Ziadeh) In Qatar, only 250,000 out of almost 2 million are Qatari. Women are making up more and more of the workforce, but the good thing is there is too much work to go around, and the local population cannot fill the jobs.

Q: Why are European businesses in general so much more successful in the Middle East, and in particular the Gulf?

A: (Corbin) It is not the Europeans, it is the Turks, the Chinese, and the Indians. We need to highlight the fact that we have innovation in the US For example, pointing out that we have diet-conscious products, the same thing in healthcare and other areas where we have a real advantage.

(Smith) If you follow the money, it takes you to Riyadh. 51,000 Saudis are going to school in the US for a reason, they want to connect with American business people. We came home after 9/11, and we were less active in Riyadh for five and half years. The world does not like a void, and so the South Koreans and Chinese filled it. But China wants to be a manufacturer, and Saudi Arabia's problem is jobs, and so they will not get that from Asia— you will get it from Americans. So if Americans let competition result in a price competition, they will lose. If they present a whole value package that comes with education and training, where they are creating an industry there, creating a job there and here, then you have a winning combination.

(Tueller) I do hear this perception, and European governments do aggressively support foreign travel and visits with large business delegations, but I certainly do not see that in the trade figures. At the end of the day, it comes down to the products. When it comes to women's education and healthcare, at least in Kuwait, that is where they want the US involved.

5. Observation

The event was attended by approximately 200 people from all areas of business and government. Major media were also present, including Al-Jazeera, C-SPAN, CNN, Foreign Policy Magazine, and the New York Times. Corporate sponsors for the event consisted of American and Arab companies representing a range of sectors, including Aramex (logistics), Dow Chemical (petrochemicals), DynCorp International (training & government services), Emaar (construction & engineering), General Dynamics (defense & security), and Qatar Airways (commercial airlines). The US business community's strong interest in this event is a reflection of the growing commercial relationship between the United States and the Arab World. As a whole, the event reinforced the notion that the Moroccan "brand" of political stability remains hard to come by in North Africa, and the country therefore has an opportunity to reach out to American businesses. Moroccan businesses must make the case not only that Morocco can earn investors high returns, but that it is suitable as a platform from which foreign companies can expand into Africa.

\(Back to top\)

Morocco and the Arab Spring

Date: 13 March 2012

1. Title: Morocco and the Arab Spring

Hosted by the Council on Foreign Relations

Participants:

H.E. Rachad Bouhlal: Ambassador, Kingdom of Morocco

Elliott Abrams: Senior Fellow for Middle Eastern Studies, CFR

2. Overview

Throughout the Arab Spring, Morocco has demonstrated its leadership in promoting democratic reform without regime change, revising its Constitution through a national vote in July 2011 and electing a new government in November of that year. At this roundtable, Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal detailed Morocco's reform processes and responded to questions about the implementation of the new Constitution.

3. Summary

Ambassador Bouhlal opened by providing his overall assessment of the Arab Spring. He noted that the events of 2011 took everyone by surprise and that the protests started in a very dramatic way. That said, the factors that ignited the protests – young populations, high unemployment, feelings of exclusion and injustice, income disparities, and corruption – had been prevalent for decades. While very few countries knew how to react to such protests and indeed are still sorting out the aftermath, what is true is that the region will never be the same.

Turning to Morocco, Ambassador Bouhlal explored the reasons for why the country is so different from the rest of its neighbors with regard to the Arab Spring. First, Morocco's reforms have been going on for decades, beginning in 1980 with elements of reconciliation, the pardoning of the opposition leader, and continuing with elections in 1997. Thus, while some elements that caused the catalyst for protests were present in Morocco, the country's dedicated commitment to reform, demonstrated by the presence of an opposition since 1997, created a degree of stability that mitigated a more prominent protest movement. Second, this stability is both maintained by the King and desired by the populace; the country knows where it is heading with the monarchy at the helm. Things are moving and change – certainly one King is not like the next, but they are moving at a stable pace. In the case of King Mohammed VI, he is viewed as a young King in tune with the demands of the people. So even when there were protests for more freedom and reform in Morocco, they never called for the overthrow of the King, who is viewed as uniting the country.

In elucidating these two primary differences between Morocco and the other leaders of the region, Ambassador Bouhlal provided two examples of reform – the reform of the family code and the equity and reconciliation commission. The reform of the family code was notable because it wouldn't have happened without the leadership of the King. Prior to introducing the reform, it was widely viewed that such reform would be challenging to get through Parliament because of Islamist and Conservative opposition to it. Cognizant of this, the King commenced a drafting process that was all-inclusive – input was solicited from a variety of stakeholders, both in government and among the general populace. As a result, when the reform was presented to the Parliament, it was well-received. Ambassador Bouhlal stressed that while this process was not perfect, it has nevertheless stood as a model for the Arab world. With regards to the reconciliation commission, Ambassador Bouhlal argued that it was unique because it was initiated without regime change. Again, while not perfect, it has been a key tool in addressing the past, providing retribution to victims, and helping Morocco learn to address human rights in the future.

These reforms, among others such as the National Initiative for Human Development, provided the context for the country's most recent reforms. Ambassador Bouhlal stressed the political debate is something that Morocco is used to and therefore it was not surprising that the King responded so quickly to the February 20th protests. In responding to the demands of the people, King Mohammed VI once again initiated an inclusive process, calling on all elements of society – civil society, unions, political parties – to participate in the draft proposal. The result was a Constitution overwhelmingly approved by the people. True to the Constitution and following November 2011's elections, the Prime Minister was elected from the head of the party with the highest number of votes, the Party for Justice and Development (PJD). While the King is still in charge of foreign policy, defense, and other matters, the Prime Minister is now the Chief of Government. Speaking of the PJD and the new PM Abdelilah Benkirane, Ambassador Bouhlal stated that it was easy for the PJD to build a majority coalition since the party has been in the opposition for thirteen years. He further noted that Benkirane is very popular among the people, citing an anecdote about a bourgeoisie friend (who would not typically vote for an Islamist party) who voted for the PJD because he was fed up with all the other parties and hoping for a change. In closing, Ambassador Bouhlal noted that Morocco's reforms have not been perfect and that the country faces continued challenges. That said, people seem to have trust in the Moroccan government and it will indeed take time to implement all of the new measures found in the Constitution. Morocco will likewise need the support and advice of its allies as it continues its reform program.

4. Q & A

Q: (Ali Turbah, McLarty Associates) What was the motivation beyond the GCC's overture to Morocco and what is Morocco's current response?

A: (Ambassador Bouhla) Morocco did not ask for membership, but special status is maybe okay. Why not? Primarily because Morocco needs to maintain its independent decision-making capabilities – we do not want to be constrained in our position on the Security Council by membership in the GCC. As you have seen, participation in the Arab League means that we sometimes vote as a bloc and we need flexibility on the Security Council. The GCC looks at Morocco with interest because it's a monarchy that has successfully instituted reform. The first response was why are you doing this? Now it's how are you doing it and what can be transferred to other monarchies – how to undertake reform and maintain stability. Nevertheless, a special status will bring a mutually beneficial relationship. Already the GCC has greatly supported the tourism sector in Morocco.

Q: (Hillel Fradkin, The Hudson Institute) There has been a lot of talk about models in the Arab Spring – the Turkish model, Iranian model, Moroccan model. It seems that the Moroccan model is the most promising. It is obviously hard to recreate the conditions you so helpfully explained. How do you describe the movement of reform going forward – the transition from a traditional monarchy to a constitutional monarchy?

A: (Ambassador Bouhla) In most other countries, protestors were calling for the removal of leaders. This was not the case in Morocco, not even among Islamists. The King provides unity for the country. The reforms paved the path for elections and a new Prime Minister. Not even the PJD asked for the religious affairs portfolio or that of homeland security. The PJD found a way to deal with the palace, using the Constitution as a reference. It also appears that the PJD is going to confront some of the real issues in Morocco – corruption and transparency. Already it has taken steps to do so, announcing the list of special licenses for bus routes that people have long suspected of being corrupt in practice. But, it will not be easy. Changing a system of clientalism creates losers.

Q: (Maria McFarland, Human Rights Watch) There are huge gaps between the Constitution and a number of Morocco's current laws. Are there any plans for reforming the penal code or the press code in particular?

A: (Ambassador Bouhla) The Constitution has to be implemented. It guarantees freedom of the press, but you need to give the government time. The Constitution certainly calls for new laws that we created before its revision and laws need to be reconciled according to it. But, there are some things that are just different in Morocco. For example, in the US, the broadcast media has limits on what can be shown. I do not question those. Likewise, there are limits in Morocco that shouldn't be crossed. I'm not justifying anything, but this is all part of the debate and part of the changes taking place in Morocco. Changes on freedom of expression are certainly expected.

C: (Elliott Abrams) Well that certainly needs to change – if there were restrictions on that here, most of us would be in jail by now!

Q: (Dana M. Marshall, Dewey & LeBouef LLP) From the economic and social perspective, Morocco has the gold standard in trade – the FTA. Is it working?

A: (Ambassador Bouhla) It is not perfect. I met with DUSTR Miriam Sapiro and it's clear that Morocco needs to implement the FTA. We suggested the creation of a working group. In looking at the figures from 2006-2011, the FTA is working, but we can do more. The Tanger-Med port presents an excellent opportunity to do so. Morocco has an FTA with Europe and sees the potential of using the port as a gateway for the US to the EU.

Q: (Dana M. Marshall, Dewey & LeBouef LLP) What advice do you have for dealing with Egypt's Islamists?

A: (Ambassador Bouhla) We are not a model and don't want to be one, but we are prepared to share our experiences. That said, you can't duplicate what happened in Morocco in Egypt.

Q: (Berl Bernhard, DLA Piper US LLP) Where is Morocco's economy going? What are its particular weaknesses?

A: (Ambassador Bouhla) Morocco has national strategies in a number of sectors – tourism, investment, renewable energies. On the energy front, Morocco has invested $9 billion in renewables and hopes to produce 38% percent of its energy from renewables, including hydraulic, wind, and sun, by 2020. We import 97% of our energy, so we have no choice. But we do want partnerships with foreign companies to implement this renewables strategy. We also have a strong electronics (airplane parts and cables) and automotive sector (Renault factory). In terms of weaknesses, unemployment is high, unemployment among graduates is particular high, and there is a lack of training for graduates – we need more coordination between university graduates and industries. Illiteracy is also a tremendous problem. In our latest elections, because of the rate of illiteracy, people had to vote for symbols. We aren't proud of that and it's a continued challenge.

Q: (Eric D.K. Melby, Forum for International Policy) Why has fear of security services disappeared among protestors?

A: (Ambassador Bouhlal) I cannot speak to this in Morocco because the protests were never like elsewhere in the region. While there were big protests, police were on one side, protestors were on the other. Things have cooled down recently perhaps due to changes and a new Islamist government. People are still demanding more amendments to the Constitution – occupying ministries and agencies, but things seem to be slowing down overall.

5. Observation

15 policymakers and trade professional attended this off-the-record roundtable held at the Council on Foreign Relations. Ambassador Bouhlal provided a thorough overview of Morocco’s reform process and elucidated the reasons for its unique experience in promoting political and social reform. The audience was engaged throughout the Ambassador’s presentation and asked informed questions in the dialogue that followed. The sole pointed question came from the representative of Human Rights Watch and the Ambassador responded deftly. The Council on Foreign Relations provided an excellent forum to introduce the Ambassador to prominent experts in the think tank community and if the relationship continues to be cultivated, CFR may present more opportunities in the future.

\(Back to top\)

Will Democracy Succeed in the Arab World – Tunisia As a Model?

Date: 20 March 2012

1. Title: Will Democracy Succeed in the Arab World – Tunisia As a Model?

Hosted by the Center for the Study of Islam and Democracy

Participants:

Dr. Radwan Masmoudi: President, Center for the Study of Islam and Democracy

2. Overview

In a region marked by continued strife and instability, Tunisia stands out as the most promising “post-Arab-Spring” nation. While neighboring Libya and Egypt face enduring violence and conflict beset by vexing social and economic ills, Tunisians benefit from a comparably strong and diverse economy, developed infrastructure, high literacy rates and an educated population, entrenched women’s rights, and a moderate new governing party. A successfully democratic Tunisia is critical to the outcome of the region as a whole, as it would be best possible model for others rebuilding after revolution to emulate. However, Tunisia faces troubling issues that cannot be resolved in the absence of international assistance.

3. Summary

Radwan Masmoudi recently returned from a two-month visit to Tunisia. He began by discussing the October 23rd elections, which were deemed free and fair. These elections resulted in a coalition government made up of the moderate Islamist Ennahda and two secular parties, Ettakatol and CPR. This kind of compromise bodes well for Gannouchi’s (the secretary general of Ennahda) moderate brand of Islam. Most of Tunisia’s small, educated, and homogenous population are enjoying the post-revolution safety and stability. However, three principal obstacles challenge aspirations for an open and democratic Tunisia.

First, thousands of government officials under Ben Ali have retained their positions and actively work to impede democratization processes. For example, 460 businessmen have been placed on a no-fly list thanks to dubious allegations of corruption by what Masmoudi calls “so-called independent prosecutors.” Actions of this sort only create an atmosphere of fear and deny Tunisia’s economy the investment it desperately needs to recover. Gannouchi and his party oppose this measure, but rulings from the entrenched judiciary prevent the party from taking them off the list. Second, religious extremists hostile to democracy are gaining influence. Under the old regime, Tunisians had limited exposure to moderate Islam; satellite channels dominated by Wahhabis and Salafists provided the only available religious information. Now, Masmoudi continued, wealthy Wahhabis of Tunisian descent living in exile in the Gulf during Ben Ali’s rule have returned and actively preach against democratic progress. Third, blows to two key economic sectors—tourism and phosphates—are testing the patience of the young, educated unemployed, jeopardizing Tunisia’s democratic aspirations. Fear of instability following the revolution has deterred tourists from what was formerly a thriving vacation destination, and worker strikes and sit-ins have incurred losses of approximately $4 billion in the phosphate industry. The international community must provide Tunis with at least $5 billion in economic assistance, or risk the failure of a Tunisian democracy.

Masmoudi went on to say that for democracy to work in Tunisia, democratic ideals must not be conflated with an “anything goes mentality.” This is especially apparent in the wake of recent freedom of the press issues. The arrests of two journalists—one who depicted God as a cartoon and the other who portrayed a nearly-naked woman on the cover of a magazine—have attracted international criticism. However, Masmoudi argued, Tunisians as a people are conservative and modest. The majority of the population was very offended by both of these journalists and secular parties actually lost votes for publicly condemning the arrests. Democracy must co-exist with the religious and cultural values of a society, or risk alienating the people. It is possible to respect religious and social values while instilling a culture of human rights and liberties.

In fact, it is this popular distrust of an “anything goes mentality” that has allowed extremist groups to gain traction. The Salafists and Wahhabis preach a very simple message: democracy and secularism threaten Tunisians’ identity. Democracy is immoral, godless, and inherently incompatible with Islam; everything is either halal or haram, there is nothing in between. Tolerating actions that offend popular values in the name of democracy will only fuel extremists’ influence and impede democratic reform.

4. Q & A

Q: (Atlantic Council, Rafik Hariri Center) Who exactly represents the Salafist leadership?

A: (Masmoudi) Many of the leaders are individuals who were either living in the Gulf States in exile or were in prison during Ben Ali’s regime. In his absence they are free to spread their message, and this could prove very dangerous. They are extremely well-funded; they sponsor speakers every week that draw crowds of 10 – 50 thousand people. Their rhetoric about preserving the “Tunisian identity” is very appealing to younger generations.

Q: (Independent consultant) How do you see countries like Tunisia progressing toward democracy in the midst of a developing anti-Western, xenophobic, counter-reform movement?

A: (Masmoudi) Many people feel that the West, especially the US, has tried to dominate politics and power in the region, but I can confidently say that this movement is superficial. Tunisians have no qualms with the West itself, perhaps with its international policies, but no feeling that could be accurately characterized as xenophobic. Fortunately Washington began distancing itself from the Ben Ali regime back in 2004, which undermines the idea of America trying to control regional politics.

Q: (Robert Webb, National Press Club) Could you touch on the current situations in Algeria, Egypt, and Jordan?

A: (Masmoudi): For the first time, Algeria has announced that it will permit international observers to monitor the upcoming elections, which is very promising. Jordan, unfortunately, is not doing as well; King Abdullah’s reforms have proven piecemeal and insubstantial. He missed a very important opportunity. The situation in Egypt is unclear, but certainly very troubling.

Q: (International Forum for Electoral Systems) Ennahda is very well-organized and competent group of professionals. What is their strategy for mitigating the Salafist influence?

A: (Masmoudi) The Salafist issue is a top priority for Ennahda. They want to engage peacefully with them and allow them to participate politically, but the party must be cautious. If Ennahda is too open with the Salafists, the latter could potentially infiltrate the party—alienating moderate voters and dominating the political scene.

Q: (Middle East Institute) The importance of tourism as a job creator cannot be underestimated, but tensions between foreigners staying in luxury hotels along the coast, for example, and conservative Tunisians have become fodder for social ills. How can Tunis revive this crucial economic sector without creating serious social conflicts?

A: (Masmoudi) I am confident that Tunisia will always be a tourist destination; in the long term this issue will naturally reconcile itself. For the short term, however, unemployment, currently at approximately 25% and rising, could contribute to large scale social unrest. In the interim, foreign economic assistance could help maintain stability.

5. Observation

This discussion, which was attended by approximately 15 professionals from various Washington think tanks, NGOs, and press agencies, focused almost entirely on Tunisia, and most likely would be of little use to MAC. Masmoudi feels that a successfully democratic Tunisia could be a model for other countries in the region, namely Egypt, Libya, and Algeria, looking to embark on democratic change. However, his reason for thinking this lies solely in his belief that Tunisia’s democratic aspirations are the most promising in the region, thanks to its highly educated and homogenous population, entrenched women’s rights, diverse economy, and developed infrastructure. Were other countries in the region to follow Tunisia as a model, they would still struggle to educate their populations, promote women’s rights, and develop their economies and infrastructures—all endeavors that are critical to successful democratization.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, April 17, 2012 6:06 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Re: my meeting with Congressman Diaz-Balard

We should discuss this on phone or in person. I'll see you shortly. Ed

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, April 17, 2012 02:22 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: my meeting with Congressman Diaz-Balard

Dear Ed,

I thought I would give you my insight on how today's meeting with Congressman Mario Diaz-Balart went, as I think it was a very interesting one.

Congressman Mario Diaz-Balart is a wonderful man with great qualities. He showed his great sense of hospitality and warmth and expressed his deep admiration to the King.

The exchange went extremely well. We spoke about the reforms process, development efforts, arab spring, Sahara etc...

I also raised the fundamental question of how to implement Congress' decision to spend US money in the South of Morocco, as it was included in last year's report language.

I was surprised that the Congressman and his staff started by raising the issue of UNHCR language. How did he know I was going to raise this issue, especially that Saida and Mouaad told Jordan that I will not raise it.

Rachad.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2012 9:09 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Mario question

Dear Rachad,

Again I want to thank you for last night's dinner. You are a very gracious host and I know everyone enjoyed themselves. I found the conversation and exchanges most helpful and interesting. You provided a very good setting for everyone to relax and feel at home with the conversation.

I am travelling tomorrow to Rabat, on other client matters, and do not want the Mario question to linger until I get back. I'd like to give you my quick thoughts on the meeting and hopefully we can discuss the matter in person after next week. There is probably a short and longer answer to your question, "How did he know I was going to raise this issue, especially that Saida and Mouaad told Jordan that I will not raise it."

The short answer lies in email we sent you in response to your instructions to us:

Begin original email:

----- Original Message -----

From: Jordan Paul

To: saida Zaid <zaidouelli@hotmail.com>

Sent: Mon Apr 16 15:12:25 2012

Subject: RE: Bill Language

Ed and the team and I briefly discussed this and we really appreciate your candor. First and most importantly, this is the Ambassador's call.

However, we would be remiss if we didn't give you our best advice. Mario and his staff are up to speed on this issue and are prepared to say yes to this request, in principle. The final language will not be sorted out in this meeting but we can secure his agreement on this project going forward. Frankly, we think it is important that we do this tomorrow. We know that we can meet with Mario on short notice, though it is still important to maximize our time with him. As we discussed on Friday, the timing on this request is important because the Appropriations process is going to be moving forward in the next 6 weeks - not in July like last year. Tomorrow is the perfect time to make this request.

Because of this, we feel he can do both things in this meeting: get to know him and agree on this project.

Of course, it is up to the Ambassador and we fully respect any decision he makes.

Thanks, Jordan

End original email

Rachad, in the email we stated that Mario was up to speed on the issue and was prepared to discuss UNHCR with you. So it was natural for him to ask a question on the matter. This is an issue we have been discussing for several months now and have discussed the general concept in our meetings on the Hill. We have not discussed specific language, as that was just agreed to by our staffs last Friday, and it is pending your approval. Mario does not have specific language but he was well aware of the issue for several months. I think the email answers your question. I suppose we could have called Mario's office and told him that you did not intend to bring up/discuss the issue and that he should not therefore bring it up. But as you can imagine, that might have been more awkward than saying nothing. We were not instructed to stop him in any way, but rather that you were not going to discuss the matter. As it turned out, you handled the issue well and deflected the conversation.

The longer answer lies in a failure of our process. I am wondering what I could have done/should have done that would have prevented this from happening. I think we've got the beginning of a good way of interacting, but obviously we failed in this regard. I would like to discuss this further with you to see what we can do in the future to avoid such problems, and I know we can do it. My initial thought is that it will require more than the exchange of emails, or talking through our staffs.

I hope this email will provide you with some understanding until we have more time to thoughtfully discuss the matter, and am sorry for any misunderstanding in this regard. Ed

Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2012 12:47 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Re: Mario Question

Can u take a call now from me?

----- Original Message -----

From: Rachad Bouhlal [mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com]
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2012 09:33 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Mario Question

Ed,

Thank you for the kind words. It was a pleasure to meet them and put names on faces. I really enjoyed it.

As for the Mario Question, you wanted to talk about it in person or on the phone. Anyway, in the same email Jordan sent to Saida he said: "Of course, it is up to the Ambassador and we fully respect any decision he makes".

Moreover, Mouaad said clearly during the congressional meeting last Friday that "we need to wait for the Ambassador's approval on the language".

I made my decision that it was too early and Mouaad told Jordan the same day.

I still don't understand why would your office talk to anyone in Congress about something I didn't see or at least talked to you about. It just would get us into awkward situations, especially with our closest allies, like what happened yesterday.

Thanks,

Rachad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, April 19, 2012 8:57 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Amb Susan Rice Remarks re: WS

Rachad,

I found Ambassador Rice's comments below interesting and helpful, especially her mention of the King's initiative to establish a Human Rights Council. I know some of our colleagues believe that the US makes a commitment of support on the rollover to Morocco, but then does not fight in private UNSC session to protect their agreement during the drafting process. I am encouraged however by Bill Burns comments to you and the Minister when he mentioned the King's counsel and the importance of the M6 initiative. Combined with Susan Rice's comments, it appears to me they have stronger marching orders this year than last and will therefore work with other members to make sure their agreement holds. Ed

Q&A followed by Rice statement:

Reporter: Question on Western Sahara and then one more on Syria. Are you concerned at all about the changes that have been made to the Secretary-General's report prior to it reaching what I guess is now its final form, and is this, the South African Ambassador said as he was leaving—that he considered it deplorable that this happened. And then on Syria, could you maybe tell us a bit about what's expected to come out of the friends of Syria meeting that they've announced in Washington that Secretary of State Clinton will be attending in Paris tomorrow.

Ambassador Rice: No, I will leave that to the State Department to comment on your later point. With respect to the Secretary-General's report, that was a point that the Ambassador of South Africa made repeatedly in the session. I think maybe one other delegation echoed that concern. I think most countries including our own were dealing with the report as it came to us in final form and treating its analysis and recommendations on their face. And we as penholder who will have to draft the resolution, have no alternative but to view the report as it came to us, and it will be the basis for the renewal of the mandate.

From: Calvin Dark
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2012 4:13 PM
To: Edward Gabriel; Robert M. Holley; Jean AbiNader; Jordan Paul; Fatima Kurtz; Garth Neuffer; Caitlin Dearing
Subject: Amb Susan Rice Remarks re: WS

FYI...below are Amb. Rice's remarks during yesterday's press stakeout re: the UNSC WS debate. Note, she acknowledges the kidnapping of international aid workers AND the fact that Morocco "had opened two National Human Rights Commissions in Dakhla and Laayoune, and the continuing commitment of Morocco to ensure access to all Special Procedures of the UN Human Rights Council."

We going to tweet it out/mention @AmbRice and I think we should incorporate it in whatever release we put out re: MINURSO (unless she says anything stronger after the vote.) --CD

Remarks by Ambassador Susan E. Rice, U. S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations, At the Security Council Stakeout

Susan E. Rice
 U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations
 U.S. Mission to the United Nations
 New York, NY
 April 17, 2012

Ambassador Rice: Good afternoon. The Security Council had sessions both on the Western Sahara and on the situation between Sudan and South Sudan, and I'll brief you on both, starting with Western Sahara. The Council heard briefings today from SRSR Abdel-Aziz and the Secretary General's Personal Envoy Chris Ross on the situation in Western Sahara and the UN Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara, MINURSO.

SRSR Abdel-Aziz briefed that MINURSO's area of operation was relatively quiet over the past year, with the exception of deadly clashes in Dakhla in September 2011 and the abduction of three international aid workers who were kidnapped in October 2011 near the Tindouf Camps in Algeria, the first such abduction incident since MINURSO was established. SRSR Abdel-Aziz reported that there was a decrease in overall violations of the military agreement over the course of the year by all parties. He also outlined challenges to MINURSO's operations in implementing its mandate including freedom of movement and free access to interlocutors.

Ambassador Chris Ross updated the Council on the three rounds of informal talks he's held over the past year which showed the parties' willingness to continue to meet, to discuss specific subjects of mutual interest, and to take additional steps to implement prior agreements on Confidence Building Measures and to explore new measures. However, Ambassador Ross reported that no progress was made on the core issues of the future status of Western Sahara.

Ambassador Ross reported to the Council that at the conclusion of the most recent talks in March, the parties agreed to meet for two more rounds of informal talks in June and July, and they welcomed his trip to the region in May, which will include an extensive visit for the first time to Western Sahara.

Council members welcomed the efforts of the Personal Envoy to assist the parties to achieve a just, lasting, and mutually acceptable political solution and the agreement of the parties to hold additional informal talks this year.

Many Council members also highlighted the need to improve the human rights situation in Western Sahara and the Tindouf camps. They noted that Morocco had opened two National Human Rights Commissions in Dakhla and Laayoune, and the continuing commitment of Morocco to ensure access to all Special Procedures of the UN Human Rights Council.

Council members also thanked SRSR Abdel-Aziz for his four years of service as head of MINURSO.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, April 21, 2012 11:05 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: New Report from NATO's Civil-Military Fusion Centre (CFC) cites ICTS Study & Carnegie Paper on Polisario-AQIM ties
Attachments: NATO Civil-Military Fusion Centre Report - 'Security Threats in the Sahel and Beyond' 19April2012.pdf

FYI – NATO Allied Command’s Civil-Military Fusion Centre \(CFC\) in Norfolk, VA just released a new report, “Security Threat in the Sahel and Beyond: AQIM, Boko Haram & al Shabaab,” which cites the recent ICTS Study (map on p. 1) and Carnegie Paper on links between AQIM and the Polisario-run camps. In its introduction, CFC warns that an “Arc of Instability” (links to ICTS study) of insurgent and terrorist groups in Africa’s Sahel poses a “greater risk for instability not only in the region but for the international community.”

The CFC report references the Carnegie Paper (on p. 3), saying: “The danger of destabilization in Western Sahara is real with AQIM’s ability to smuggle weapons drugs and contraband among neighboring countries. Boukhars indicates that there are also growing links between AQIM and Sahrawi refugee camps in Tindouf, Algeria. The author suggests that, while the Moroccan controlled Western Sahara is generally stable, the Polisario-run Tindouf camps are becoming havens for ‘militancy, illegality and drug smuggling.’ Malian officials have repeatedly claimed that the Polisario is involved in kidnappings and drug smuggling in the region.”

Note: NATO Allied Command created the CFC in 2008 with think tank/NGO Desk Officers to analyze and share information between civilian and military sectors on complex world crises. First page and link to CFC report are below. Full report is attached. This article underscores the work and analysis we have been doing is finding its way into the mainstream press.

https://www.cimicweb.org/cmo/medbasin/Holder/Documents/r013%20CFC%20Monthly%20Thematic%20Report%20\(18-APR-12\).pdf.pdf)

CIVIL - MILITARY FUSION CENTRE
MEDITERRANEAN BASIN TEAM PRESENTS

Security Threats in the Sahel and Beyond: AQIM, Boko Haram and al Shabaab

Comprehensive Information on Complex Crises

April 2012

Erin Foster-Bowser
Desk Officer
North Africa

erin.foster@cimicweb.org

Angelia Sanders
Desk Officer
Northeast Africa

angelia.sanders@cimicweb.org

This document discusses current security threats in the Sahel and surrounding regions, with the rise of groups such as al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), Boko Haram and al Shabaab. A brief background and current events will be presented for each group, along with a review of regional cross-cutting issues. Related information is available at www.cimicweb.org. Hyperlinks to source material are highlighted in blue and underlined in the text.

Security threats in Africa's Sahel region, spanning the northern tier of the African continent, have existed for decades. However, in recent years security analysts have focused their attention on the increasingly sophisticated attacks by al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), the now al Qaeda-linked al Shabaab based in Somalia and the insurgent group Boko Haram based in northern Nigeria. Increased fighting in this "arc of instability" as well as changing tactics among insurgent and terrorist groups might reveal a growing relationship¹ between these groups and as a result pose a greater risk for instability not only in the region but for the international community. The following report will provide a brief review of AQIM, Boko Haram and al Shabaab in the Sahel region based upon open source reports and will also highlight potential linkages.

AQIM

According to the BBC, al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) dates from the 1990s and grew out of an insurrection mounted by an Islamist resistance movement protesting the Algerian regime's decision to end

¹ See Telegraph, "Top US General Warns of Coordination Between al Qaeda Linked African Terror Groups", 01 March 2012

The Civil-Military Fusion Centre (CFC) is an information and knowledge management organisation focused on improving civil-military interaction, facilitating information sharing and enhancing situational awareness through the CimicWeb portal and our weekly and monthly publications. CFC products are based upon and link to open-source information from a wide variety of organisations, research centres and media sources. However, the CFC does not endorse and cannot necessarily guarantee the accuracy or objectivity of these sources. CFC publications are independently produced by Knowledge Managers and do not reflect NATO policies or positions of any other organisation.

Security Threats in the Sahel and Beyond: AQIM, Boko Haram and al Shabaab

Comprehensive Information on Complex Crises

April 2012

Erin Foster-Bowser
Desk Officer
North Africa

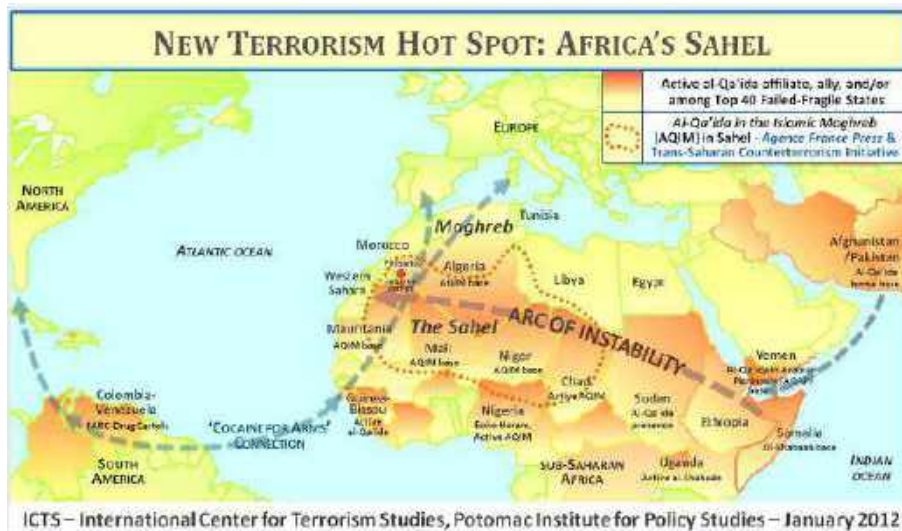

erin.foster@cimicweb.org

Angelia Sanders
Desk Officer
Northeast Africa

angelia.sanders@cimicweb.org

*This document discusses current security threats in the Sahel and surrounding regions, with the rise of groups such as al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), Boko Haram and al Shabaab. A brief background and current events will be presented for each group, along with a review of regional cross-cutting issues. Related information is available at www.cimicweb.org. Hyperlinks to source material are highlighted in blue and underlined in the text.

Security threats in Africa's Sahel region, spanning the northern tier of the African continent, have existed for decades. However, in recent years security analysts have focused their attention on the increasingly sophisticated attacks by al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), the now al Qaeda-linked al Shabaab based in Somalia and the insurgent group Boko Haram based in northern Nigeria. Increased fighting in this "arc of instability" as well as changing tactics among insurgent and terrorist groups might reveal a growing relationship¹ between these groups and as a result pose a greater risk for instability not only in the region but for the international community. The following report will provide a brief review of AQIM, Boko Haram and al Shabaab in the Sahel region based upon open source reports and will also highlight potential linkages.

AQIM

According to the BBC, al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) dates from the 1990s and grew out of an insurrection mounted by an Islamist resistance movement protesting the Algerian regime's decision to end

¹ See Telegraph, "Top US General Warns of Coordination Between al Qaeda Linked African Terror Groups", 01 March 2012

*The Civil-Military Fusion Centre (CFC) is an information and knowledge management organisation focused on improving civil-military interaction, facilitating information sharing and enhancing situational awareness through the CimicWeb portal and our weekly and monthly publications. CFC products are based upon and link to open-source information from a wide variety of organisations, research centres and media sources. However, the CFC does not endorse and cannot necessarily guarantee the accuracy or objectivity of these sources. CFC publications are independently produced by Knowledge Managers and do not reflect NATO policies or positions of any other organisation.

parliamentary elections in 1992. Experts believe that these elections would have resulted in the Islamic Salvation Front political party gaining a majority. The Islamist resistance group was originally part of the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) but eventually declared its independence in 1998 out of concerns that GIA's violent methods were hurting the Islamist cause.² Once separated from GIA, the group was called the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat (GSPC) and was popular for its commitment to fighting the Algerian government while simultaneously working to prevent indiscriminate killing of civilians in the process. According to a 2007 report by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, Osama bin Laden was involved in the GSPC's early formation. Although the group declared its allegiance to al Qaeda in 2003, it was not officially approved by al Qaeda's senior leadership until January 2007, at which point GSPC changed its name to AQIM, reports the US National Counterterrorism Center (NCTC). A 2010 US Congressional Research Service (CRS) report, "Al Qaeda and Affiliates: Historical Perspective, Global Presence, and Implications for US Policy", explains that it is "not clear what AQIM's unity with or allegiance to al Qaeda means in practice as the group does not appear to take directions from leaders in Afghanistan/Pakistan".³

AQIM initially pursued a targeted suicide bombing campaign in Algeria, says the Long War Journal. However, by 2008 these attacks tapered off and were replaced with "ambushes against security forces and kidnapping operations", the latter of which provides millions of dollars in financing for its operations. AQIM collected an estimated USD 70 million in ransom payments between 2006 and 2011. The Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) suggests that AQIM conducted 33 attacks in Algeria in 2007 which increased to a high of 40 attacks in 2009. One of the more notable incidents was the bombing of the UN building and a court house in Algiers on 11 December 2007, which killed an estimated 67 people in the simultaneous attacks.⁴ Experts further suggest that AQIM is capable of conducting kidnapping operations of foreigners inside and outside of Algeria in order to collect ransom payments and/or for the exchange of militant Islamist prisoners. Hostages are said to be held in remote areas close to the Algerian border with Mali.

AQIM reportedly maintains mobile training camps along the Algeria-Mali border and has taken advantage of the porous borders of the Sahel region in order to move people and supplies. According to a 2011 US House of Representatives Committee on Homeland Security report, "Boko Haram: Emerging Threat to the US Homeland", AQIM has recently expanded its operations into Mauritania, Mali, Niger, and other countries in response to intensified counter-terrorism crackdowns by North African governments. As AQIM moves south, it has expanded its operations to include local militant groups and has become involved in drug trafficking. The CRS report states that the group has carried out raids on military and police targets, kidnapped and assassinated soldiers and tourists, attacked foreign embassies, and repeatedly clashed with the militaries of Mali, Mauritania, Niger and Algeria.

The European Union's (EU) counter-terrorism coordinator, Gilles de Kerchove, stated in August 2011 that AQIM had "gained access to weapons, either small arms or machine-guns, or certain surface-to-air missiles," reports Agence France-Presse (AFP). Confirmation of this came in November 2011, when one of AQIM's commanders, Mokhtar Belmokhtar (also known as Khaled Abou al-Abbas), said in an interview with Mauritania's private news agency ANI, that the group had obtained weapons as a result of the Libyan conflict, reports Reuters. However he did not state what types of weaponry the group had obtained nor did he disclose how they obtained the weapons. In late November, UK Foreign Secretary William Hague stated that the fighting in Libya had created the potential for "new recruits for AQIM in the form of former mercenaries" who have left Libya and have little opportunities elsewhere.

The International Institute for Counter-Terrorism (ICT), a leading academic institute for global counter-terrorism studies, released a report in January 2012 on the new AQIM splinter group called Jamaat Tawhid Wal Jihad Fi Garbi Ifriqiya (The Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa- MOJWA).⁵ MOJWA comprises young militants who separated from the leadership of AQIM. Although they reportedly have the same goals as AQIM,

² According to the Council on Foreign Relations, GIA gained a reputation for targeting anyone even remotely affiliated with the military and government, in addition to killing civilians and foreign nationals. The GIA sought to establish a Muslim state ruled by sharia law. The Algerian civil war that resulted was ranked as one of the most violent conflicts in the 1990s.

³ United Press International reported on 27 December that senior British officials believe al-Qaeda's core leadership in Pakistan has begun to move to North Africa.

⁴ Actual numbers of those killed in the attack varies by source, with others citing 41 killed in the twin attacks.

⁵ Also known as the Unity Movement for Jihad in West Africa (MUJAO).

MOJWA seeks to fund their activities through the use of kidnappings for ransom.⁶ A Mauritanian man, Hamada Ould Mohamed Kheirou, is the presumed leader of the splinter group, prompting Mauritania to issue a warrant for his arrest for “supporting terror groups in the Sahel”, reports AFP. MOJWA released a statement on 10 December 2011 claiming responsibility for the 23 October abduction of three Europeans in Algeria and threatened to spread jihad beyond North Africa to sub-Saharan West Africa, reports Middle East Online. Until this statement was released, it had been assumed the kidnappings had been carried out by AQIM. ICT reports that “MOJWA is unique in that its leadership is comprised of black Africans, despite a history of tension between Arabs and black Africans. In the past, perceived Arab disregard for blacks had given rise to inter-organizational tension and resentment; another possible reason for the split”.

Additionally, Algerian analyst Mohamed Mokeddem believes the splits in leadership are occurring as a result of “suspicions that the group’s [AQIM] Algerian leadership... is infiltrated by the Algerian security services” and also the new availability of weapons from Libya.⁷ Magharebia reports that the split could also represent the broader trend across North Africa of young people turning against unilateral authority on the part of their leaders. “If the Arab Spring represents a civil revolt against despotic leaders, young terrorists could be seen as echoing that sentiment” explains Dah Ould Hamadi, an analyst of Salafist groups and Sahel terrorism. Previously, AQIM had sought to prevent internal resentment and defections by promoting disaffected young fighters to important roles and dividing the Sahara emirate into quasi-autonomous battalions in efforts to provide more titles and defined roles to more fighters, reports Magharebia.

Recent AQIM Developments

Algeria

Reuters reports that Libyan weapons, including shoulder-fired missiles, were discovered by Algerian security forces near the Libyan border on 18 February 2012. This discovery reinforces concerns regarding the smuggling of weapons out of Libya to unknown groups in the region, including AQIM.⁸

Algerian Prime Minister Ahmed Ouyahia reassured Algerians that the government is committed to eradicating terrorism in the country. His announcement came following an attack on a police station in Tamanrasset, which was reportedly carried out by the splinter group MOJWA. Tamanrasset is home to a regional security task force which aims to counter AQIM, with participation from Algeria, Mali, Mauritania and Niger. This attack is seen as an attempt to halt regional counter-terrorism activities. In related news, AFP reports that the MOJWA has demanded a ransom of EUR 30 million (USD 39 million) for the three aid workers, two Spanish nationals and one Italian national, taken hostage in October 2011 from a refugee camp run by the Polisario Front. The kidnapping was originally tied to AQIM but was later found to have been conducted by MOJWA.

Additional steps taken by Algerian authorities include the prosecution of suspected AQIM members. Most recently, the head of AQIM, Abdelmalek Droukdel, received a death sentence in absentia from Algerian courts on 13 March 2012, says BBC. He was found guilty on charges of “murder, membership of a terrorist organisation and attacks using explosives”, along with 17 others accused in bomb attacks committed in Algiers in 2007. It is alleged that Droukdel, also called Abou Mossab Abdelwadoud, introduced suicide bombings to Algeria following his return from fighting with the insurgency in Afghanistan. Meanwhile, Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika signed a new terror finance law which requires banks in the country to monitor transactions that are suspicious, according to Magharebia.

Western Sahara

In an article from the Carnegie Endowment, Anouar Boukhars explains that the danger of destabilisation in Western Sahara⁹ is real with AQIM’s ability to smuggle weapons, drugs and contraband among neighbouring ⁶ AQIM has kidnapped foreigners for ransom; however Magharebia reports that MOJWA is defying the common Sahel terrorist’s practice of focusing on only foreigners for ransom. It is believed that MOJWA may be responsible for the kidnapping of a Mauritanian gendarme.

⁷ ICT also believes that “like AQIM, it is likely MOJWA will exploit the excess of weapons looted from the fall of the Gaddafi regime to assist their operational activities”.

⁸ For more information on Libyan Weapons, please see CFC report “Unsecured Libyan Weapons: Regional Impact and Possible Threats”, January 2012 countries. Boukhars indicates that there are also growing links between AQIM and Sahrawi refugee camps in Tindouf, Algeria. The author suggests that, while the Moroccan controlled Western Sahara is generally stable, the Polisario-run Tindouf camps are becoming havens for “militancy, illegality and drug smuggling”. Malian officials have repeatedly claimed that the Polisario is involved in kidnappings and drug smuggling in the region.

Mali

Malian officials assert that AQIM is responsible for the January 2012 attacks in Afuehok during which time summary executions were carried out by anti-government forces led by Tuareg rebels, says Magharebia. Officials say the style and nature of the attacks resemble those of AQIM. However, the National Liberation Movement for the Azawad (MNLA)¹⁰ spokesman, Mossa Ag Atter, refuted claims that the group is linked to AQIM, further suggesting that “the MNLA shares no interests nor policies with this terrorist organisation”, reports AFP. Meanwhile, AdnKronos reports that AQIM is moving its base in northern Mali to southern Algeria as a result of the on-going conflict between Tuareg rebels and Malian soldiers. The new location is in a mountainous area some 90 kilometres from Timiaouine, Algeria.

Mauritania

Elsewhere in the region, Mauritanian officials are increasing border security in an effort to fight AQIM, prevent the kidnapping of foreigners and address the smuggling of illegal immigrants, reports Magharebia. Three new transit points have been established for foreigners travelling in the southern province of Brakna, while the border area has been demarcated to facilitate patrols.

Boko Haram

Boko Haram is an Islamist movement based primarily in the north-eastern region of Nigeria. According to the Nigeria Guardian, the group was primarily based in the states of Borno, Yobe, Katsina, Kaduna, Bauchi, Gombe, and Kano in its early beginnings, but have since expanded to “virtually all northern states and are advancing their frontiers to other parts of the country”. The BBC reports that the group’s official name, Jama’afu Ahlis Sunna Lidda’awati wal-Jihad, is Arabic, meaning ‘people committed to the propagation of the prophet’s teachings and jihad’. In the north-eastern Nigerian town of Maiduguri where the group was founded, the local people call the group Boko Haram, which, in the local Hausa language, is a phrase loosely translated as “Western education is dangerous” or “Western education is forbidden”.

According to the Council on Foreign Relations, the charismatic radical young Islamist cleric Mohammed Yusuf created Boko Haram in 2002 with the aim of establishing a fully Islamic state in Nigeria. Yusuf’s followers consisted mainly of impoverished northern Islamic students and clerics. However, he gained other supporters by speaking out against corruption within the Nigerian government. A US House of Representatives Committee on Homeland Security report from November 2011 states that prior to 2009, the group did not aim to violently overthrow the Nigerian government but primarily engaged in low-level battles with local police forces and non-compliant villagers. This approach changed in 2009 when Nigerian police forces clashed with members of Boko Haram in Borno state, followed by more clashes in the neighbouring states of Bauchi, Yobe and Kano (see map below). The fighting culminated on 30 July, 2009 with a Nigerian army intervention in the northern city of Maiduguri in Borno state. More than 700 died during the regional uprising and Nigerian soldiers broadcasted the execution of Yusuf. In the aftermath of fighting, Boko Haram was forced underground and many members fled to neighbouring countries but in 2010, under the leadership of Iman Abubakar Shekau, Boko Haram re-emerged with members carrying out violent operations against government targets in northern states. The University of Maryland's National Consortium for the Study of Terrorism and Responses to Terrorism (START) global terrorism database shows there were 11 armed attacks and two bombings attributed to Boko Haram in 2010. Shehu Sani, in his 2011 article on the history, ideas and revolt of Boko Haram, listed eight explosive-related incidents in addition to armed assaults conducted by Boko Haram in 2010. The two most notable attacks in 2010 involved the freeing of more than 700 inmates from a prison in Bauchi state and a series of bombings on Christmas Eve, 2010, in Jos that killed 80 people. Jos is a town located in central Nigeria at the ‘Middle Belt’ dividing the northern Muslim and southern Christian regions of Nigeria.

⁹ A recent three-day dialogue was held 11-13 March, between Moroccan officials and the Polisario Front, representatives of the Sahrawi people, regarding the autonomy or self-determination of Western Sahara. During the past 36 years, more than 165,000 Sahrawis have fled into camps in Tindouf, southern Algeria.

¹⁰ The United Nations Office for Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) reports that recent fighting between Malian forces and MNLA fights has resulted in the displacement of more than 172,000 Malians from their homes in northern Mali into other towns and neighbouring countries.

In 2011, Boko Haram was allegedly responsible for several attacks throughout the April election cycle which included bombings of polling centres and electoral commission offices. Following several bombings in late May, the BBC reports that Boko Haram demonstrated a change in its tactics with the use of suicide bombings.¹¹ The most notable of which was a 26 August suicide vehicle-borne improvised explosive device (V-IED) attack on the UN headquarters in Abuja, in which 23 people were killed and an additional 116 injured. On 04 November, the group bombed police stations, churches, a bank and an army base in Damaturu, the capital of Yobe state, reports the Christian Science Monitor. According to AFP, the coordinated attacks left more than 150 dead and approximately 100 wounded. In December 2011, the group claimed responsibility for a series of Christmas Day attacks on multiple churches that killed at least 40 people, reports the Telegraph.

A recent report by the Africa Center for Strategic Studies, suggests that Boko Haram will not be stopped by military force but that northern Nigeria's communities need to receive socio-economic support from the government to dissuade them from supporting the militant group. The author describes Boko Haram as a “fanatical sect” that is not in line with the majority of Nigeria's Muslim population.

Recent Boko Haram Developments¹²

¹¹ Prior to June 2011, there had not been a recorded suicide bomb attack in Nigeria. The Telegraph reports that Boko Haram members had traditionally carried out attacks using hit-and-run assassination methods from the back of motorbikes; however, in recent years Boko Haram has begun targeting high profile targets with greater casualties.

¹² Information on current attacks by Boko Haram was collected by CFC Desk Officers until 15 March 2012. For additional information, please see the Integrated Regional Information Networks \(IRIN\) timeline of Boko Haram attacks.

Nigerian Response

Nigerian officials continue their efforts to counter attacks by Boko Haram in northern areas of the country. Nigerian police officials claimed to have captured the Boko Haram spokesman known as Abdul Qaqa in February 2012 by tracing his mobile phone, however, Boko Haram says the man is not the group's spokesman but a senior official in charge of "public enlightenment", reports AFP. Further gains were made with the "recapture" of Kabiru Sokoto, the suspected mastermind of the 2011 Christmas Day bombing of a Nigerian church in Madalla, reports BBC. He is said to be affiliated with Boko Haram militants and escaped custody in February during a search of his home. Authorities have also taken additional measures to prevent foreign fighters from joining Boko Haram through the establishment of a repatriation programme for foreigners from Niger and Chad. Nigerian officials claim that Boko Haram militants recruit foreign fighters from neighbouring countries and this repatriation programme is aimed to undermine these efforts. Immigration officials say that nearly 11,000 foreigners from Niger and Chad have been repatriated in the past six months, reports AFP. In response to Nigerian president Goodluck Jonathans' threat that he will shut down Boko Haram in three months, the group release a video suggesting that they will bring down the government in three months, reports Vanguard.

Security

In February 2012, Boko Haram militants are said to have conducted retaliatory attacks for the arrests of suspected members in the Baga fish market in the north-eastern city of Maiduguri market. One attack killed at least 30 people, just a day after explosions and gunfire struck the same market. This was followed by yet another bombing of a Nigerian church in Jos, on 26 February. Nigerian President Goodluck Jonathan urged citizens to remain calm, stating "those who seek to divide us by fear and terror will not succeed". Just two weeks later, on 12 March, al Jazeera reported that at least 14 people died as a result of an additional bombing of a Catholic church in Jos and other attacks in the city. Boko Haram has reportedly carried out the attacks in retaliation for raids on Islamic schools, allegedly conducted by Nigerian security forces, by burning public and private schools. At least 12 schools have also been targeted in Maiduguri alone since late February, reports Daily Trust. Meanwhile, in a move to end the violence, the Nigerian government has approved an amnesty bill for members of Boko Haram, "if it agrees to negotiations and renounces violence", says United Press International (UPI). Meanwhile, Malian security officials claim that Boko Haram is now supporting the Tuareg-led rebel movement in northern Mali, reports International Business Times. An estimated 100 members of Boko Haram, from Nigeria and Niger, are said to be in Gao, Mali and allegedly led the attack and kidnapping at the Algerian embassy in that city on 05 April. Finally, AP reports, on 08 April the city of Kaduna, fell victim to a suicide car bomb attack, in which at least 38 people were killed. The All Nations Christian Assembly Church and the ECWA Good News Church were damaged during Easter sermons. Nigerian authorities assert that the Boko Haram may be behind the bombing. Another attack occurred later on 08 April in a city of Jos, causing further injuries.

Dialogue

In mid-March 2012, Nigerian officials and Boko Haram leaders were reportedly engaged in indirect dialogue in an effort to end violence in northern regions of the country. Boko Haram asked for the release of all its members from prison in return for a ceasefire. However, Bloomberg reports that current talks are now in jeopardy with mediator Datti Ahmad withdrawing from discussions citing the disclosure of confidential information to media outlets. He expressed his dismay to reporters stating "an opportunity to negotiate and terminate this cycle of violence is being missed".

Al Shabaab

Somalia has experienced 14 separate governments¹³ between 1991 and 2010. According to the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR), a lack of effective governance structures and rule of law in Somalia led to the establishment of neighbourhood sharia courts in the 1990s. The Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) backgrounder on al Shabaab explains that 11 of these neighbourhood courts united and formed the Islamic Courts Union (ICU) to counter warlords in Mogadishu. The militant Islamist faction of the ICU came to be known as al Shabaab or the "The Youth" in Arabic. Al Shabaab's original fighting force comprised nearly 400 young members, remnants from the former Somali Islamist movement al Itihaad al Islamiya (AIAI).

¹³ The most recent system of government is the Somali Transitional Federal Government (TFG) that was established by international bodies in 2004.

In June 2006, the ICU led a military coup against the Somali Transitional Federal Government (TFG), which was subsequently put down by Ethiopian forces in December 2006. The involvement of foreign forces¹⁴ in ousting the ICU is said to have “stoked extremist flames” and garnered support for the al Shabaab movement. Recognising the risk of militant groups within Somalia, by the United States¹⁵, United Nations, African Union and League of Arab States, the UN Djibouti Peace Process of 2008 was convened as an effort to prevent the rise of militant Islamism in Somalia. Ethiopian forces withdrew in January 2009 but by May, al Shabaab launched an offensive and took control of large portions of Mogadishu. African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM) forces remained in the capital and managed to secure a few square kilometres of government buildings, however, in June the TFG was forced to declare a state of emergency.

CSIS’s Rob Wise describes the evolution of al Shabaab in two phases: the Emergence (December 2006-Early 2008) and the Transformation (Early 2008-Present). During “The Emergence” phase, a surge in radicalism was seen in response to the foreign intervention aimed at ridding Somalia of Islamic extremism. International intervention resulted in a more radical and violent al Shabaab which understood itself as a nationalist movement. The lack of governance during this period, particularly in southern Somalia aided al Shabaab in recruiting fighters from communities where it filled local needs by distributing food, non-food items and basic services including communications. “The Transformation” phase is referred to by the author as the period when al Shabaab transitioned from a nationalist local movement to an international al Qaeda aligned terrorist group. According to the report this new phase was in response to the presence of Ethiopian troops and seen as a tactical shift. Roland Marchal, Senior Research Fellow at CNRS SciencesPo Paris, suggests that there is a worrisome new trend of East African citizens joining al Shabaab that could produce jihadi movements in Kenya, Tanzania, Uganda and South Africa in the future. The UN Security Council Monitoring Group on Somalia and Eritrea has identified indigenous networks engaged in recruitment, radicalisation and resource mobilisation on behalf of al Shabaab in Kenya. The Muslim Youth Centre has been identified as the largest support network for al Shabaab in Kenya.

Currently, al Shabaab is led by Sheikh Mohamed Mukhtar Abdirahman “Abu Zubeyr”, although leadership is shared amongst independent regional groups of leaders in Bay and Bokool, south-central Somalia and Mogadishu, and Puntland and Somaliland. Al Shabaab is also affiliated with a militant group in the Juba Valley led by Hassan Adillahi Hersi “Turki”. CFR suggests that organisationally, regional groups do not necessarily work in concert with one another and there is some evidence of friction. Analysts say it is difficult to know how many fighters agree with the al Shabaab’s ideology and approach, as many are victims of forced recruitment. However, experts estimate that there are likely 300-800 hard-line Islamists. In February 2012, Human Rights Watch (HRW) released a report titled “No Place for Children”, which cites the recruitment of child soldiers by al Shabaab and the TFG, with al Shabaab also abducting children for forced marriage and rape. HRW says children as young as 10 years old are being recruited by al Shabaab as suicide bombers. In one instance, the Shabelle Media Network of Mogadishu reported the abduction of 200 boys from Afgoye, 30 kilometres from Mogadishu.

The UN Security Council Monitoring Group Report on Somalia and Eritrea from July 2011 found that al Shabaab earns an estimated USD 70 - 100 million annually in taxation and extortion operations within their regions of control, especially from the export of charcoal and cross-border contraband into Kenya. The Monitoring Group lists revenue streams by order of importance: taxation and extortion; commerce, trade and contraband; diaspora support; external assistance. However, tracking remittances from Somalia diaspora communities is difficult due to the heavy use of informal money transfer systems.

¹⁴ The majority of Somalis are Sufi Muslims, says CFR, and have moderate religious views in a clan oriented culture that rejects foreign presence including Arab jihadi organisations.

¹⁵ Al Shabaab was designated a terrorist group by the United States in February 2008.

In a December 2011 interview with Somalia Report, the head of an al Shabaab mukhabaraat, or intelligence unit, provided an “inside” perspective, on condition of anonymity, on how the group operates in Somalia. According to the article, nearly 45 mukhabaraat intelligence units are tasked with collecting information from Somali cities as well as from al Shabaab fighters throughout the country regarding TFG officials, banned relief agencies and AMISOM forces.

Foreign Affairs suggests that al Shabaab is weakened by having to fight on three fronts against Ethiopian and Kenyan forces; AMISOM; and TFG forces. Kenyan forces launched their offensive against al Shabaab in October 2011, citing national security threats posed by the group. The incursion was not coordinated in advance with AMISOM or the United States and timed with the rainy season, but Ethiopian forces later joined Kenya’s efforts against al Shabaab in December 2011. According to Somalia Report, al Shabaab’s forces have decreased from between 12,000 and 14,000 fighters to 8,000 since fighting began late last year.

Recent Al Shabaab Developments

Piracy

The rise of piracy attacks of the coast of Somalia in 2008 has led some experts to question the relationship of pirate gangs with al Shabaab. Discussion of the possible links between piracy and al Shabaab centre around one key point, pirates and al Shabaab have ideological differences and may only possibly cooperate for “business purposes”. Further, there is a lack of evidence to confirm if such a relationship exists.¹⁶ Some research suggest that pirate gangs are forced to pay a portion of their ransom earnings to al Shabaab for protection and this percentage varies depending on how involved al Shabaab is in the pirate attempt (5-10% protection, 20% weapons training, 50% financing). According to the US Department of State, there may not be clear evidence of a pirate-al Shabaab link but that it “would not be uncommon for criminal gangs working in the same ungoverned space to share resources or pay kickbacks to one another.” A NATO Review article from 2009 further suggests that, though there may not be formal links, the two groups act as destabilising multipliers and benefit from each other’s presence.

Security

In January 2012 Reuters reported that AMISOM troops took control of Mogadishu University and Barakaat cemetery from al Shabaab. This was hailed as a historic gain, marking the first time the force has been able to secure an area on the outskirts of Mogadishu. Al Shabaab spokesman Aduaziz Abu Muscab told journalists at a press conference held outside of Mogadishu on 27 January 2012 that the group was shifting or modifying fighting tactics from “hit and run” to a “face to face” offensive. He said that al Shabaab fighters had received training to prepare them for the new offensive. However, Kenyan troops made further gains against al Shabaab with the capture of Badhadhe, located 180 kms (110 miles) south of port town Kismayo. This strategic move cuts off al Shabaab from its main coastal supply town. On 22 February, Ethiopian and Somali troops captured the central town of Baidoa from al Shabaab. Baidoa is an al Shabaab stronghold and the main town in Bay region where its fighters originate. The main road connecting Mogadishu to south-western Somalia and parts of Kenya and Ethiopia passes through the Baidoa and it is considered a major business route, according to BBC. Additionally, on 16 March, BBC reported that AMISOM and TFG troops forced al Shabaab from the town of Galgalato, 20 miles northeast of Mogadishu. On 05 April, the Pan-African News Agency (PANA) reports that AMISOM and the TFG announced the formation of a Joint Fusion and Liaison Unit (UFL) to improve information sharing on terrorist threats, particularly al Shabaab, in Somalia. Authorities it has already proved successful with the defeat of militants in the Dynile area.

Puntland

¹⁶ January 2012 saw the first self-stated link of pirates with al Shabaab, with the pirate “purchase” of two MSF Spanish aid workers (originally kidnapped by al Shabaab from northern Kenya) for the price of USD 100,000 each, or a total of USD200,000. The pirates told Somalia Report it was purely a business transaction because al Shabaab needed money and had no way to organise a ransom negotiation.

As al Shabaab faces increased pressure from AMISOM, Ethiopian and Kenyan forces in southern Somalia may now also be attempting to reach into the semi-autonomous region of Puntland in northern Somalia, reports Associated Press. Al Shabaab and a Puntland militia led by Mohamed Said “Atom” recently announced their merger in what analysts believe is a move for the group to fight against the three-front offensive. Security experts believe the militants will attempt to hide in the Golis mountains, between Puntland and Somaliland, due to the extensive network of caves. The destabilisation of Puntland, analysts say, could jeopardise recent gains made by forces fighting al Shabaab and threaten the newly launched oil drilling project in northern Somalia. Further, the African Union has announced that Ethiopian troops will withdraw from Somalia by the end of April 2012.

International Response

The February 2012, UN Security Council Resolution 2036 on the situation in Somalia describes al Shabaab as a continued terrorist threat to the country with established links to al Qaeda. International conferences, such as the 23 February London Conference and the forthcoming Istanbul Conference, aim to prepare the country for the end of the transitional period on 20 August 2012. The UN has authorised¹⁷ AMISOM to take all necessary measures as appropriate with Somali security forces to reduce the threat posed by al Shabaab and other armed opposition groups. However, experts warn that, even if al Shabaab is defeated, the various clans and nationalist factions will commit to ousting the TFG and compete for power. Foreign Affairs also supports the notion that al Shabaab is susceptible to fragmentation and also suggests there are now two distinct movements within the group, nationalists and radicals.

Cross Sahel Links between AQIM, Boko Haram and Al Shabaab

In December 2011, the African Union’s Peace and Security Council (PSC) listed Boko Haram, AQIM and al Shabaab as African terrorist groups. The AU cited worrying trends of increased violence by the groups in 2011 as well as growing links among them. There is also an observed trend in the kidnapping of foreigners¹⁸ in the Sahel region with 13 Europeans currently held by militant Islamists groups in the region.

This map depicts the Sahel region, Tuareg areas (darker brown) and AQIM areas (lighter brown). Source: The Economist 2012

CFR suggests that al Qaeda attempted to join with AIAI (al Shabaab’s precursor) in the 1990s in Somalia but were unable to integrate and gain acceptance by clan leadership. Following the Ethiopian intervention al Qaeda renewed efforts to link with al Shabaab. Al Shabaab leaders have claimed an affiliation with al Qaeda since 2007; however, some analysts believe this link has been weak. Al Shabaab carried out its first transnational attack in July 2010 at the Soccer World Cup final in Uganda, a country supporting the AMISOM peacekeeping mission in Somalia. Other analysts, such as CSIS’s Wise, suggest closer linkages, explaining that al Qaeda has taken key leadership positions within al Shabaab as a way for ‘Abu Zubair’ to exert control over the regional factions of al Shabaab. The increasing use of suicide bombs is also attributed to closer ties with al Qaeda. During the ‘Transformation’ period, beginning in early 2008, al Shabaab has attempted to utilise information and communications technologies to attract foreign fighters including various video campaigns and internet messages.

On 30 January 2012, al Shabaab made its first official statement confirming its link with al Qaeda. Recently, al Shabaab joined with a smaller anti-government militia called Kamboni – previously allied to Hizbul Islam. The move is seen by experts as a unification effort of extremist groups operating in Somali, led by al Shabaab. Others suggest that this is a publicity stunt for al Qaeda, as they have been weakened by drone strikes in Pakistan, and the merger with al Shabaab and AQIM is a means to project its credibility. Within the African continent, Nigeria’s

¹⁷ Additionally, the UN approved the request for a troop increase of 5,731 or a total of 17,731 troops and police units.

¹⁸ six French, two Italians, two Spaniards, a Swede, a Dutch and a Briton

The Nation notes the possibility of links between al Shabaab and AQIM, citing the rapidly changing tactics of al Shabaab towards a more violent approach possibly learned at AQIM training camps.

Evidence of close connections between the three groups is still limited; however, according to VOA, some analysts suggest that Boko Haram and elements of al Shabaab have participated in joint trainings. Additionally, the Algerian deputy foreign minister, Abdelkader Messahel, reported in November 2011 that intelligence reports showed evidence of coordination between Boko Haram and AQIM.¹⁹ The following month, EU counter – terrorism coordinator, Gilles de Kerchove, warned about the dangers regarding AQIM’s efforts to expand its power base through its alliance with Boko Haram in the region. Recent findings from a US House of Representatives Homeland Security²⁰ report, caution that Boko Haram’s “evolving tactics and targeting may be the result of ties between AQIM in North Africa and al Shabaab in Somalia. Such cross-pollination of weapons, tactics, and bomb-making expertise can quickly increase the capabilities of terrorist groups”.²¹ Nigerian officials claim that the attack on the UN building in August 2011 in Abuja by Boko Haram was conducted by a Nigerian man returning from Somalia.

Other analysts are not convinced of Boko Haram’s links to other groups. A 12 March 2012 article from the Independent suggests that linkages between Boko Haram and other groups such as AQIM and al Shabaab are perhaps limited to some training but does not include foreign fighters. “Boko Haram is everywhere, or you could say it’s nowhere: both would be correct”, according to a security expert interviewed, making the point that the group is not necessarily cohesive and is often blamed for violence initiated by unrelated criminal gangs. Further, the group is said to have its own sophisticated bomb making unit and domestic sources of weapons, thereby negating the need for external resources. However, on 22 March, Nigerian police disrupted the first verifiable AQIM terrorist cell operating in the country according to Magharebia. Five AQIM operatives were arrested in Kano for the 26 January kidnapping of a German engineer. Nigerian officials worry their presence demonstrates the potential for cooperation with Boko Haram.

Analysts say that al Qaeda is now relying on AQIM to support the greater organisation; however, the Maghreb division is facing its own challenges following increased and coordinated security measures by Sahel states. The groups have also lost some support from local populations following the success of the Arab Spring countries; which demonstrated change through peaceful struggle, not the violent tactics used by al Qaeda and its affiliates. The Royal United Services Institute (RUSI) further suggests that al Qaeda is seeking to seize on local unrest and discontent to further its foothold in the continent through regional militant Islamist movements. Within the extremist groups themselves, a lack of cohesion could lead to a greater possibility for more dangerous splinter groups to develop. ICT states that “we may see a greater threat of kidnappings in the Sahel region from other splinter groups but it may also indicate that the main leaders of groups such as AQIM will have less power.” However the concern is that young operatives may rashly kill their victims rather than wait for the outcome of lengthy hostage negotiations, reports Magharebia. Additionally, in an effort to make a name for themselves, they may commit horrific acts. According to CSIS, al Shabaab may also undermine itself by turning away from its early nationalistic messages and forcing the recruitment of teenage boys. Wise predicts a splintering of the group as more foreigners gain leadership positions, upsetting Somali fighters and creating rifts among various regional groups. Additionally, they could lose clan support if al Shabaab pushes a purely al Qaeda-driven ideology.

Regional Response²²

Commander of the US Africa Command (AFRICOM), General Carter Ham, warns that al Qaeda-linked groups, including al Shabaab, Boko Haram and AQIM, are attempting to “synchronise” activities across North Africa and the Sahel region, as reported by the Telegraph. Countries in the Sahel are now refocusing efforts to secure the region.

¹⁹ This announcement is taken seriously by international security experts due to the fact that the Algerian government conducts the largest intelligence gathering operation on AQIM of any country in Africa.

²⁰ Specifically, the Subcommittee on Counterterrorism and Intelligence

²¹ United States House of Representatives Committee on Homeland Security report, “Boko Haram: Emerging Threat to the US Homeland”.

²² The below listed information on regional meetings and initiatives is not meant to be an exhaustive list, but to provide a general understanding.

According to Algerian Foreign Minister Mourad Medelci, “effective and multi-faceted co-operation among the regional countries is [...] vital for responding to the challenges facing security and development in the region,” reports Magharebia. In April 2010, at the conclusion of a Sahel-Saharan security summit, Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania established a new military command in the Algerian city of Tamanrasset. The command was established to co-ordinate intelligence-gathering in efforts to combat terrorism, organised crime, arms smuggling and kidnapping. Additionally, military patrols along shared border areas were established in order to monitor and control the movement of terrorist groups. All four of the above countries met for two days in Washington DC in mid-November 2011 to further their multilateral approach to Sahel security, reports Magharebia. Also in mid-November, the country of Burkina Faso joined the regional command unit in Tamanrasset. AFP reports that in November 2011, some 150 anti-terrorism experts from about 30 countries met at an international security conference focused on the threat of armed militant groups in the Sahel. Major concerns discussed at the conference included the inability to control large porous borders and also the need to counter terrorist financing.

The 5 + 5 group²³, begun in 1990, is a forum for political dialogue that holds meetings regularly at the ministerial level. The group met for the first time in December 2011, since regime changes occurred across much of North Africa in 2011. According to AFP, the objective of the December meeting was to bring together defence ministers from each of the 10 countries in order to address security issues in the region, with AQIM activities and the influx of weapons from Libya receiving special focus. The meeting resulted in the adoption of an action plan for 2012 on training and exchanges and joint drills and exercises amongst the countries.

Libya hosted a two-day ministerial level conference on border security from 11 to 12 March as part of efforts to increase regional cooperation to address the escalation of “cross-border criminal activities”, reports Tripoli Post. The nine northern African countries attending the conference have adopted the “Tripoli Plan” to enhance information sharing and to develop strategic border communities, reports Reuters. This conference was the first time in more than a year that interior ministers met to discuss regional security concerns. Arms and human smuggling have escalated in recent months due to inadequate border security.

Conclusion

The Sahel region is afflicted by a myriad of challenges which include militant Islamist insurgencies in Nigeria and Mali, the growth of extremist groups, and the kidnappings of foreigners by AQIM and splinter groups. As AQIM, Boko Haram and al Shabaab continue to wage attacks in the Sahel region and Horn of Africa, those most affected are the civilian populations who live in fear of suicide bombs, raids and threats. In Nigeria, as many as 1,000 people have been killed as a result of recent Boko Haram violence, with Maiduguri particularly devastated, reports VOA. Local Nigerian women are demonstrating and calling for an end to violence, meanwhile Daily Trust reports that the Northern Governors Forum has called on Boko Haram and Nigerian authorities to forge a meaningful dialogue. Elsewhere, AMISOM and TFG forces are gaining ground against al Shabaab; however, the terrorist group continues to adapt and pose a serious threat to Somalia and neighbouring countries. Finally, AQIM remains a concern as reports surface about their activities in the Sahel including the acquisition of weapons and recruitment tactics. Although the full extent of relationships among these terrorist and insurgent groups is difficult to document, the danger posed by these groups remains a real threat to the people and governments of the Sahel region.

²³ The “5 + 5” Mediterranean Dialogue Group includes the five southern European countries of Spain, France, Italy, Malta and Portugal and the five North African countries of Algeria, Libya, Tunisia, Morocco and Mauritania.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, April 30, 2012 7:44 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: getting together

Dear Rachad,

I am back from my trip to Rabat and Detroit, MI and would appreciate getting together to catch up. I also like your bio to prepare my introduction of you this weekend. We can discuss this weekend's activities when we get together. I'd appreciate it if you or your office could give me convenient times to meet. See you soon, Ed

Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, April 30, 2012 9:03 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: getting together

Thank you.

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Monday, April 30, 2012 9:02 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Re: getting together

Dear Ed,

Welcome home.
I will get Sandrine to coordinate with Kristen.

Have a nice day,

Rachad

On Apr 30, 2012, at 7:44 AM, Edward Gabriel wrote:

Dear Rachad,

I am back from my trip to Rabat and Detroit, MI and would appreciate getting together to catch up. I also like your bio to prepare my introduction of you this weekend. We can discuss this weekend's activities when we get together. I'd appreciate it if you or your office could give me convenient times to meet. See you soon, Ed

Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, May 01, 2012 6:37 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: New House language tonight

Rachad,
This evening, we received draft language concerning UNHCR for the upcoming bill. The language is attached below and is generally accurate but not verbatim. They said they are moving fast and if we had any changes we have to interact quickly. So, the process has begun, and I suggest we meet on this early next week to coordinate the Moroccan strategy.

In our analysis, this is report language and there is no downside. It addresses all of our concerns: points out the dangers of the camps, reinforces USG support for autonomy/sovereignty as the solution to the WS conflict, and hits UNHCR for not pursuing durable solutions.

We have been reliably informed that we have very short window within which we can suggest “tweaks” to this general language. It should be understood that this language may be different from what the Senate decides to do. It is our belief that the Senate language will be more along the lines of what I submitted to you today. However, the problem in the Senate is Leahy and in the end he will have the final say. The House language is a better bet.

We should attempt to spell out “durable solution” in this House language - similar to the language we proposed today - which states, “durable solutions includes a census and an active permanent resettlement or repatriation program for these refugees.”

Again this is generally accurate but not verbatim:

The Committee is concerned about growing violence and instability in the Sahel region and growing AQIM strength across North Africa. The Committee is increasingly concerned about growing ties between AQIM and members of the Polisario run camps. It is now even more important to redouble our efforts to solve the dispute over the Western Sahara based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty. The committee also urges the Secretary of State to work with UNHCR on the protracted refugee issue especially the pursuit of durable solutions.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, May 01, 2012 6:42 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: sboutonnet@embassyofmorocco.us
Subject: This weekend

Two things:

What do you like for breakfast? And may I have your bio please. Thank you.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 02, 2012 12:41 PM
To: lesliew@goeaston.net; kathleen@klinehan.com
Cc: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Morocco World News - "Paint the Town Moroccan: Morocco Brought to the United States for a Weekend"

Please note below that NPR will air the following spot this week:

SUPPORT FOR WAMU 88.5 COMES FROM MOROCCO, WHERE FASHION, FOOD AND MUSIC WILL BE CENTER STAGE DURING EASTON, MARYLAND'S PAINT THE TOWN MOROCCAN CELEBRATION. MORE AT MOROCCO ON THE MOVE DOT COM.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 02, 2012 5:35 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Suggested language changes

Rachad,

I am sorry I did not get this to you sooner. The modifications will be provided to the committee this evening.

The language as reported earlier says:

The Committee is concerned about growing violence and instability in the Sahel region and growing AQIM strength across North Africa. The Committee is increasingly concerned about growing ties between AQIM and members of the Polisario run camps. It is now even more important to redouble our efforts to solve the dispute over the Western Sahara based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty. The committee also urges the Secretary of State to work with UNHCR on the protracted refugee issue especially the pursuit of durable solutions.

We are suggesting that modifications be made as follows:

1. Add a further description of durable solutions to read, including ensuring a census is completed and developing programs that promote voluntary repatriation or resettlement outside the camps for these refugees
2. Add a reporting requirement for the Sec. of State to report back to the committees on progress being made.

The combined language as we propose to committee staff now reads:

Committee is concerned about growing violence and instability in the Sahel region and growing AQIM strength across North Africa. The Committee is increasingly concerned about growing ties between AQIM and members of the Polisario run camps. It is now even more important to redouble our efforts to solve the dispute over the Western Sahara based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty. The committee also urges the Secretary of State to work with UNHCR on the protracted refugee issue especially the pursuit of durable solutions, including ensuring a census is completed and developing programs that promote voluntary repatriation or resettlement outside the camps for these refugees. The Department of State will provide the Committees on Appropriations of both the House and Senate a report of steps being taken to fulfill this requirement."

We understand that the census language is the most important modification to be made and will work to ensure that such language is included at a minimum. We will do all in our power to ensure that the final language of the committee will be that which is reflected herein. Thank you.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 02, 2012 6:06 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: Kerry McNamara <ksmcnamara@gmail.com>
Subject: Invitation to the Keystone Center annual dinner
Attachments: Keystone Awards Sponsorship Form 2012.pdf; PressRelease_2012 Awards Dinner.pdf

Mr. Ambassador,

It is my pleasure to extend an invitation to you and your wife to join us for The Keystone Center 19th Annual Leadership Awards Dinner on June 7th. Dr. Mostafa Terrab and I are both members of the board of this distinguished public policy NGO. OCP and the Gabriel Company will be jointly hosting a table at the event and would be honored to have you as our guest. Mr. Terrab's Senior adviser and US Director, Mr. Kerry McNamara, will be attending the function in place of Mr. Terrab, who will be unavailable to attend the dinner. Attached a detailed program and press release. Dinner logistics follow.

June 7, 2012

6:30 Cocktails

7:30 Dinner Program

EAST HALL OF UNION STATION

50 Massachusetts Avenue, NE

Washington, District of Columbia

Business Attire

I hope your schedule will allow you to attend the dinner. Ed

19th Annual Keystone Leadership Awards

June 7, 2012
Union Station, Washington, DC

Since 1994, The Keystone Center has proudly presented awards to exemplary thought leaders and decision-makers who embody The Keystone Center's belief that lasting policy is best crafted by considering diverse perspectives and building consensus.

2012 Award Recipients

Leadership in Energy

Louis R. Chênevert

Chairman and CEO
United Technologies Corporation

Leadership in Environment

Marilyn Black

Founder
GREENGUARD Environmental Institute and Air Quality Sciences, Inc.

Leadership in Health

Drew Altman

President and CEO
Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation

Leadership in Government

Lisa Murkowski

U.S. Senate

Keystone Founder's Award

Robert N. Downey

Senior Director
Goldman Sachs

Honorees are selected for their leadership, outstanding problem-solving skills and efforts to seek consensus-based solutions to the most challenging issues facing society. In addition, they exhibit a sense of vision and a capacity to bring about change, have been recognized for their efforts by their peers and other national and international leaders, and have contributed to society in ways that reflect the spirit and mission of The Keystone Center.

Each year The Keystone Center hosts more than 400 leaders from industry, government, and the NGO community at our annual dinner ceremony in recognition of these innovative leaders. Now in its 18th year, the Leadership Awards Dinner has become known as a premier event in Washington.

The Keystone Center seeks to solve our society's most challenging environmental, energy, and public health problems. We bring together today's public, private and civic sector leaders to confront these issues and we arm the next generation with the 21st Century intellectual and social skills required to effectively approach the questions they will face. Founded in 1975, The Center is a non-profit organization headquartered in Keystone, Colorado with offices in Denver and Washington, DC.

Inquiries: 970.513.5816

2012 Leadership Awards Dinner SPONSORSHIP OPTIONS

The Keystone Center is a 501 (c)(3) nonprofit organization. All contributions are tax deductible to the extent allowed by law.

_____ SUMMIT SPONSOR—$50,000

Includes two tables (20 seats), acknowledgement by Keystone CEO at the podium, logo placement at event, full page advertisement/congratulatory message in event program, recognition in list of sponsors

_____ TIMBERLINE SPONSOR—$25,000

Includes one table (10 seats), logo placement at event, full page advertisement/congratulatory message in event program, recognition in list of sponsors

_____ ALPINE SPONSOR—$10,000

Includes one table (10 seats), recognition in list of sponsors

_____ BASE CAMP SPONSOR—$5,000

Includes one-half table (5 seats), recognition in list of sponsors

_____ INDIVIDUAL SEAT(S)—$1,000

_____ FULL-PAGE ADVERTISEMENT/CONGRATULATORY MESSAGE IN PROGRAM—$1,000

Message specifications will be sent upon receipt of this form.*

_____ I am unable to attend, but would like to make a contribution of $ _____

PAYMENT OPTIONS

_____ I will pay with a check. *Please make checks payable to The Keystone Center and mail to:
Attn: Keystone Awards Dinner, The Keystone Center, 1628 Sts John Road, Keystone, CO 80435*

_____ I will pay via wire transfer. Please email mmissel@keystone.org for instructions.

For alternative payment methods, please contact Megan Missel at mmissel@keystone.org or 970-513-5837.

The Keystone Center's Federal tax ID number: 84-0688506

The Keystone Center is a 501 (c)(3) nonprofit organization. All contributions are tax deductible to the extent allowed by law.

NAME: _____

TITLE: _____

ORGANIZATION: _____

ADDRESS: _____

CITY: _____ STATE: _____ ZIP: _____

DAYTIME PHONE: _____ EMAIL: _____

PLEASE FAX TO: 970-262-0152 or email to mmissel@keystone.org
Questions? Please call 970-513-5837

The Keystone Center
Annual Leadership Awards Dinner Past Recipients

Leadership in the Environment Award

- 1994 Gustave Speth, U.N. Development Programme Administrator
- 1995 Professor Florence Taylor Robinson
- 1996 John Sawhill, The Nature Conservancy
- 1997 Mildred McClain, Citizens for Environmental Justice
- 1998 Kathryn S. Fuller, World Wildlife Fund
- 1999 Fred Krupp, Environmental Defense Fund
- 2000 George Archibald, International Crane Foundation
- 2001 Patrick F. Noonan, The Conservation Fund
- 2002 Russell E. Train, World Wildlife Fund
- 2003 Teresa Heinz Kerry, Heinz Family Philanthropies
- 2004 Jonathan Lash, World Resources Institute
- 2005 Anne H. Ehrlich, Stanford University
- 2006 John H. Adams, Natural Resources Defense Council
- 2007 Peter A. Seligmann, Conservation International
- 2008 Paul W. Hansen, The Nature Conservancy
- 2009 David Rockefeller, Sailors for the Sea
- 2010 Robert Socolow, Princeton University
- 2011 Christine Eibs-Singer, E + Co

Leadership in Industry Award

- 1994 Frank Popoff, Dow Chemical
- 1995 H. Laurance Fuller, Amoco Corporation
- 1996 Edgar S. Woolard, DuPont
- 1997 Bob Burt, FMC Corporation
- 1998 John F. Smith, Jr., General Motors Corporation
- 1999 Sidney Taurel, Eli Lilly & Company
- 2000 Responsible Care Initiative of the Chemical Manufacturers Association
- 2001 Archie Dunham, Conoco
- 2002 Marilyn Ware, American Water Works
- 2003 Thomas C. Jorling, International Paper
- 2004 Ralph Peterson, CH2M HILL Companies
- 2005 James E. Rogers, Cinergy
- 2006 Peter A. Darbee, PG&E Corporation
- 2007 John Hofmeister, Shell Oil Company
- 2008 Jeffry Sterba, PNM Resources
- 2009 Hugh Grant, Monsanto
- 2010 Michael T. Duke, Wal-Mart Stores
- 2011 John W. Rowe, Exelon

Leadership in Government Award

- 1994 Energy Secretary Hazel O'Leary
- 1995 Senator Pete V. Domenici
- 1996 Mayor Norman Rice (Seattle, WA)
- 1997 Senator John Chafee
- 1998 Senator John Glenn
- 1999 Congressman Sherwood Boehlert
- 2000 Congressman John D. Dingell
- 2001 Congressman Henry Waxman
- 2002 Senator Richard Lugar
- 2003 Congressman James L. Oberstar
- 2004 Senator Daniel K. Inouye
- 2005 Congresswoman Nancy Johnson
- 2006 Senator Christopher Dodd
- 2007 Senator Olympia Snowe
- 2008 Governor Martin O'Malley (Maryland)
- 2009 Senator Mark Udall
- 2010 Senator John McCain
- 2011 Administrator Lisa Jackson, U.S. EPA

Leadership in Education Award

- 1998 Donald Kennedy, Stanford University
- 2000 Bruce Alberts, President, National Academy of Sciences
- 2001 Helge Wehmeier, Bayer USA
- 2002 Daniel Ritchie, University of Denver
- 2005 Jane Nelson, Harvard University
- 2006 Rodger Bybee, Biological Sciences Curriculum Study
- 2007 Carlo Parravano, Merck Institute for Science Education
- 2008 Gerald Wheeler, National Science Teachers Association
- 2009 Beverly L. Hall, Atlanta Public Schools
- 2010 Terrance Carroll, Speaker of the House (Colorado)
- 2011 Joel I. Klein, News Corporation

Spirit of Keystone Award

- 1996 Congressman William J. Tauzin
- 1998 Stephan Schmidheiny, ANOVA Holding Ag
- 1999 John Brown, BP Amoco Corporation
- 2001 Edward M. Gabriel, former Ambassador to Morocco
- 2002 Paul V. Tebo, DuPont
- 2003 William K. Reilly, Aqua International Partners
- 2005 Nicholas L. Reding
- 2006 Kathleen Sebelius, Governor of Kansas
- 2008 Jim Lehrer, PBS
- 2009 George Stephanopoulos, ABC News
- 2010 Gwen Ifill, Washington Week

Founder's Award

- 2011 Clint Vince, SNR Denton

April 26, 2012

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

The Keystone Center Announces 2012 Leadership Awardees

Keystone, CO – Today, The Keystone Center announced the recipients of its 2012 Leadership Awards.

The Keystone Center established its Leadership Awards program in 1994 to recognize extraordinary leadership by individuals who model the spirit and mission of The Keystone Center: inspiring critical thinking, seeking multiple perspectives in decision-making, and advancing public policy. The Center provides awards in various categories within its areas of practice including energy, environment, public health, and education.

"This year's honorees exemplify the values on which The Keystone Center has built its 37-year reputation for excellence," said Gary Grappo, President and CEO of The Keystone Center. "Each has demonstrated a sense of vision and a capacity to effect positive change, and we are pleased to recognize their commitment and contributions to society."

Awards will be presented at The Keystone Center's 19th Annual Awards Dinner, held at Union Station in Washington, DC on June 7th. Shelby Coffey III, Trustee of The Newseum, will serve as emcee.

2012 Keystone Leadership Award recipients include:

Leadership in Energy

Louis R. Chênevert
Chairman and CEO, United Technologies Corporation

Leadership in Health

Drew Altman
President and CEO, Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation

Leadership in Government

Lisa Murkowski
U.S. Senate

Leadership in Environment

Marilyn Black
Founder, GREENGUARD Environmental Institute and Air Quality Sciences, Inc.

Keystone Founder's Award

Robert N. Downey
Senior Director, Goldman Sachs

About The Keystone Center

The Keystone Center helps facilitate and craft decision-making processes for public, private, and civic sector leaders in order to advance complex energy, environmental, and public health issues. Its educational division, Keystone Science School, provides teachers and students with meaningful outdoor learning experiences that incorporate scientific inquiry, leadership development, civic engagement, and academic rigor. Founded in 1975, The Center is a non-profit organization headquartered in Keystone, Colorado with offices in Denver, CO and Washington, DC.

CONTACT:

Robyn Brewer, 970-513-5816
rbrewer@keystone.org
The Keystone Center
www.keystone.org

###

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 02, 2012 7:07 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Suggested language changes

Rachad, this email just returned to me with a server notice it had not been sent. I apologize and thought it went out as soon as we talked an hour or more ago. Sorry but this past hour appears to be a technical mistake. Ed

Rachad,

I am sorry I did not get this to you sooner. The modifications will be provided to the committee this evening.

The language as reported earlier says:

The Committee is concerned about growing violence and instability in the Sahel region and growing AQIM strength across North Africa. The Committee is increasingly concerned about growing ties between AQIM and members of the Polisario run camps. It is now even more important to redouble our efforts to solve the dispute over the Western Sahara based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty. The committee also urges the Secretary of State to work with UNHCR on the protracted refugee issue especially the pursuit of durable solutions.

We are suggesting that modifications be made as follows:

1. Add a further description of durable solutions to read, including ensuring a census is completed and developing programs that promote voluntary repatriation or resettlement outside the camps for these refugees
2. Add a reporting requirement for the Sec. of State to report back to the committees on progress being made.

The combined language as we propose to committee staff now reads:

Committee is concerned about growing violence and instability in the Sahel region and growing AQIM strength across North Africa. The Committee is increasingly concerned about growing ties between AQIM and members of the Polisario run camps. It is now even more important to redouble our efforts to solve the dispute over the Western Sahara based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty. The committee also urges the Secretary of State to work with UNHCR on the protracted refugee issue especially the pursuit of durable solutions, including ensuring a census is completed and developing programs that promote voluntary repatriation or resettlement outside the camps for these refugees. The Department of State will provide the Committees on Appropriations of both the House and Senate a report of steps being taken to fulfill this requirement."

We understand that the census language is the most important modification to be made and will work to ensure that such language is included at a minimum. We will do all in our power to ensure that the final language of the committee will be that which is reflected herein. Thank you.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

This e-mail communication is confidential and is intended only for the individuals or entities named above and others who have been specifically authorized to receive it. If you are not the intended recipient, please do not read, copy, use or disclose the contents of this communication to others. Please notify the sender that you have received this e-mail in error by replying to the e-mail or by telephoning (214) 445-9600, Monday - Friday during the hours of 8:00 A.M. - 5:00 P.M. (CST). Please then delete the e-mail and any copies of it. Thank you. Nothing contained in this disclaimer shall be construed in any way to grant permission to transmit confidential information via this firm's e-mail system.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 02, 2012 7:15 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: MINURSO Resolution and reactions; EU-Morocco talks on "advanced status," e.g. FDI and regional integration
Attachments: SR_MINURSOResolutionComparison1May2012.docx

FYI, Attached is a comparison of the 2011 and 2012 UN MINURSO rollovers, which you may find of use. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

-----Original Message-----

From: Edward Gabriel
Sent: Wednesday, April 25, 2012 12:01 PM
To: Fatima Kurtz; Jordan Paul
Subject: FW: MINURSO Resolution and reactions; EU-Morocco talks on "advanced status," e.g. FDI and regional integration

I would be good to see a comparison side by side or in color differences with last's year's resolution. Is that possible? thanks

-----Original Message-----

From: Pence, Anne [mailto:apence@cov.com]
Sent: Wednesday, April 25, 2012 9:47 AM
To: Bill Hayes; Joe Matthews; Hugh McDowell; Larson, Alan; Edward Gabriel; Fatima Kurtz
Subject: MINURSO Resolution and reactions; EU-Morocco talks on "advanced status," e.g. FDI and regional integration

It is "clean" but those involved (e.g. Morocco) may also see messages they may not like -- such as exhortations to provide "unhindered movement", etc. which harken to elements of the SG's report. At same time, the Resolution is positive about Morocco's steps on human rights, and some by the Polisario with UNHCR. It references the Moroccan autonomy proposal, but also a 2007 Polisario proposal. It offers continued support for the Ross process, and mentions that natural resources have been discussed in that context.

Morocco's public comments are interesting too -- stresses the importance of self-determination (but indicates concern that a referendum would cause tension at an already tense time.

Meanwhile, EU-Morocco discussion were held in Luxembourg to prepare for the ag trade liberaization agreement in effect July 1 and to discuss a range of other issues under Morocco's "advanced status," including regional integration, the AMU and the positive trend in Morocco-Algeria relations.

Anne

24 April 2012

Security Council
SC/10621

Department of Public Information • News and Media Division • New York Security Council 6758th Meeting (AM)

Security Council Extends Mandate of United Nations Mission in Western Sahara until 30 April 2013, Unanimously Adopting Resolution 2044 (2012)

The Security Council today extended the mandate of the United Nations mission in Western Sahara until 30 April 2013.

Unanimously adopting resolution 2044 (2012), the Council called on the parties to cooperate fully with the operations of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO), including its free interaction with all interlocutors, and to take the necessary steps to ensure the security of, as well as unhindered movement and immediate access for, United Nations personnel in carrying out the mandate.

Today's resolution came on the heels of the Secretary-General's 5 April report, in which he recommended the extension because the Mission remained relevant as a guarantor for the stability of the ceasefire and as a visible commitment of the international community to achieve a resolution of the conflict.

The Mission's ability to fully monitor and assess the situation on the ground — in a total area of 104,000 km sq. — and to interact with the full spectrum of interlocutors was essential, as illustrated in the context of recent violence following a sports event and of evidence of "simmering community tensions" in the west, which the Secretary-General said was another consequence of the absence of a peace agreement between Morocco and the Frente Polisario and the continuing status quo, the report stated.

Expressing concern about the violations of existing agreements and calling on the parties to respect their relevant obligations, the Security Council called upon the parties to continue to show political will and work in an atmosphere propitious for dialogue in order to enter into a more intensive and substantive phase of negotiations.

It further called upon the parties to continue negotiations under the auspices of the Secretary-General without preconditions and in good faith, taking into account the efforts made since 2006 and subsequent developments, with a view to achieving a just, lasting and mutually acceptable political solution, which will provide for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara.

Following the adoption of the resolution, Morocco's representative said the text reiterated the importance and priority of the initiative of self-determination.

"There is no alternative to negotiations," he said. "We will not move backwards. Since 2001, we have thought that the referendum approach could result in tension in a society which is still seeking to find solutions by consensus. We believe we will be able to live as neighbours in our neighbourhood."

However, South Africa's representative, also speaking after the vote, expressed concern over the resolution's failure to more fully address human rights issues, especially in light of the Security Council's recent bold steps in that field, particularly in northern Africa and the Middle East.

"The continuation of that trend will threaten to erode the Mission," he cautioned. Still, his country voted in favour of the resolution because of the need to resolve the Western Sahara issue in a peaceful manner.

The meeting began at 10:14 a.m. and ended at 10:30 a.m.

Resolution

The full text of resolution 2044 (2012) reads as follows:

"The Security Council,

"Recalling and reaffirming all its previous resolutions on Western Sahara,

"Reaffirming its strong support for the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy to implement resolutions 1754 (2007), 1783 (2007), 1813 (2008), 1871 (2009), 1920 (2010), and 1979 (2011),

"Reaffirming its commitment to assist the parties to achieve a just, lasting, and mutually acceptable political solution, which will provide for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in the context of arrangements consistent with the principles and purposes of the Charter of the United Nations, and noting the role and responsibilities of the parties in this respect,

"Reiterating its call upon the parties and States of the region to cooperate more fully with the United Nations and with each other and to strengthen their involvement to end the current impasse and to achieve progress towards a political solution,

"Welcoming the efforts of the Secretary-General to keep all peacekeeping operations, including MINURSO, under close review and reiterating the need for the Council to pursue a rigorous, strategic approach to peacekeeping deployments,

"Expressing concern about the violations of existing agreements, and calling on the parties to respect their relevant obligations,

"Taking note of the Moroccan proposal presented on 11 April 2007 to the Secretary-General and welcoming serious and credible Moroccan efforts to move the process forward towards resolution; also taking note of the Polisario Front proposal presented 10 April 2007 to the Secretary-General,

"Encouraging in this context, the parties to demonstrate further political will towards a solution including by expanding upon their discussion of each other's proposals,

"Taking note of the four rounds of negotiations held under the auspices of the Secretary-General and the continued rounds of informal talks, and welcoming the progress made by the parties to enter into direct negotiations,

“Welcoming the progress made by the parties in discussing innovative negotiating approaches and discrete subjects, their commitment to deepen the discussions on these and other issues, and the 9 November 2011 meeting of the parties on natural resources and progress made towards demining,

“Welcoming the positive conclusion of the 12-16 September 2011 UNHCR-sponsored seminar on Hassaniya culture and the agreement by the parties to hold two additional seminars in 2012, as well as the holding of a UNHCR-facilitated high-level meeting on Confidence Building Measures for Western Sahara on 24-25 January 2012,

“Stressing the importance of improving the human rights situation in Western Sahara and the Tindouf camps, and encouraging the parties to work with the international community to develop and implement independent and credible measures to ensure full respect for human rights, bearing in mind their relevant obligations under international law,

“Welcoming the opening of National Council on Human Rights Commissions operating in Dakhla and Laayoune, and the steps taken by Morocco in order to fulfil its commitment to ensure unqualified and unimpeded access to all Special Procedures of the United Nations Human Rights Council,

“Also welcoming the implementation of the enhanced refugee protection program developed by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in coordination with the Polisario Front, which includes refugee and human rights training and awareness initiatives,

“Reiterating the request that UNHCR maintain its consideration of a refugee registration in the Tindouf refugee camps,

“Looking forward to the implementation of the updated plan of action on confidence building measures adopted in Geneva 24-25 January 2012, including the inauguration of family visits by land, use of new information technology to facilitate communication links between families, and the continuation and expansion of the existing programme by air, and encouraging the parties to cooperate with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in implementing their agreement,

“Welcoming the commitment of the parties to continue the process of negotiations through the United Nations-sponsored talks,

“Recognizing that the consolidation of the status quo is not acceptable, and noting further that progress in the negotiations is essential in order to improve the quality of life of the people of Western Sahara in all its aspects,

“Affirming support for the Secretary-General’s Personal Envoy for Western Sahara Ambassador Christopher Ross and his work in facilitating negotiations between the parties, welcoming his ongoing consultations with the parties and neighbouring states, and looking forward to his regional visit in the near future, including to Western Sahara, as per the communiqué of the Informal Meeting on Western Sahara 11-13 March 2012,

“Affirming support for the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Western Sahara and Head of MINURSO Hany Abdel-aziz,

“Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 11 April 2012 (S/2012/197),

“1. Decides to extend the mandate of MINURSO until 30 April 2013;

- "2. Reaffirms the need for full respect of the military agreements reached with the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) with regard to the ceasefire and calls on the parties to adhere fully to those agreements;
- "3. Calls upon all parties to cooperate fully with the operations of MINURSO, including its free interaction with all interlocutors, and to take the necessary steps to ensure the security of as well as unhindered movement and immediate access for the United Nations and associated personnel in carrying out their mandate, in conformity with existing agreements;
- "4. Welcomes the parties' commitment to continue the process of holding small, informal talks in preparation for a fifth round of negotiations, and recalls its endorsement of the recommendation in the report of 14 April 2008 (S/2008/251) that realism and a spirit of compromise by the parties are essential to achieve progress in negotiations;
- "5. Calls upon the parties to continue to show political will and work in an atmosphere propitious for dialogue in order to enter into a more intensive and substantive phase of negotiations, thus ensuring implementation of resolutions 1754 (2007), 1783 (2007), 1813 (2008), 1871 (2009), 1920 (2010), and 1979 (2011) and the success of negotiations, inter alia, by continuing their discussion of the ideas in paragraph 120 of the Secretary General's report (S/2011/249);
- "6. Affirms its strong support for the commitment of the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy towards a solution to the question of Western Sahara in this context and calls for an intensified pace of meetings and strengthening of contacts;
- "7. Calls upon the parties to continue negotiations under the auspices of the Secretary-General without preconditions and in good faith, taking into account the efforts made since 2006 and subsequent developments, with a view to achieving a just, lasting, and mutually acceptable political solution, which will provide for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in the context of arrangements consistent with the principles and purposes of the Charter of the United Nations, and noting the role and responsibilities of the parties in this respect;
- "8. Invites Member States to lend appropriate assistance to these talks;
- "9. Requests the Secretary-General to brief the Security Council on a regular basis, and at least twice a year, on the status and progress of these negotiations under his auspices, on the implementation of this resolution, challenges to MINURSO's operations and steps taken to address them, and expresses its intention to meet to receive and discuss his briefings and in this regard, further requests the Secretary-General to provide a report on the situation in Western Sahara well before the end of the mandate period;
- "10. Welcomes the commitment of the parties and the neighbouring states to hold periodic meetings with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to review and, where possible, expand confidence-building measures;
- "11. Urges Member States to provide voluntary contributions to fund confidence-building measures that allow for visits between separated family members, as well as for other confidence-building measures agreed upon between parties;

“12. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to take the necessary measures to ensure full compliance in MINURSO with the United Nations zero-tolerance policy on sexual exploitation and abuse and to keep the Council informed, and urges troop-contributing countries to take appropriate preventive action including pre-deployment awareness training, and other action to ensure full accountability in cases of such conduct involving their personnel;

“13. Decides to remain seized of the matter.”

Background

The Security Council had before it the Report of the Secretary-General on the situation concerning Western Sahara (S/2012/197), which covers developments since 1 April 2011 concerning the situation on the ground in the Territory, the status and progress of negotiations and challenges to the operations of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO).

In the report, the Secretary-General recommends the extension of MINURSO’s mandate for a further 12 months until 30 April 2013.

He recommends, therefore, an increase of 15 military observers to bolster monitoring capacities. As the report outlines a series of challenges that demonstrate that MINURSO is unable to exercise fully its peacekeeping, monitoring, observation and reporting functions, he requests the assistance of the Council in reasserting the Mission’s mandated role, ensuring that the minimum conditions for its successful operation are met and upholding peacekeeping standards and United Nations neutrality. He calls on the two parties to cooperate fully with MINURSO in achieving those goals.

He says that during the reporting period, the three rounds of informal talks between the parties, their two meetings on natural resources and confidence-building measures, and the numerous bilateral consultations that his Personal Envoy held with them, confirmed that the parties continue to have the political will to meet, but not as yet to engage in substantive negotiations towards a just, lasting, and mutually acceptable political solution, which will provide for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara, as required by Security Council resolutions.

It is possible that changes in the regional political environment will provide new opportunities, the report states. Absent a new framework, however, the Secretary-General’s Personal Envoy will continue his established pattern of activities and encourage the development of new ideas.

* * * * *

SA blasts UN over Western Sahara rights

2012-04-25 09:13

New York - South Africa on Tuesday accused UN Security Council powers of "conveniently" ignoring human rights abuses in the disputed territory of Western Sahara.

The council again rejected growing demands for the UN peacekeeping force in the Moroccan-controlled territory to have a permanent rights investigation duty.

But the annual resolution renewing the mandate of the UN force did stress the need for Morocco to improve rights in Western Sahara, which it annexed in 1975 following a Spanish withdrawal.

South Africa's UN ambassador Baso Sangqu said the 15-nation council was guilty of "double standards" by taking "bold steps" over the Arab Spring countries but refusing a permanent rights monitoring system for Western Sahara.

The rights of the people of Western Sahara must be "equally defended with the same zeal and commitment", he told the council.

Without naming countries, he said "the selective approach to human rights by this council calls into question the motivation of those who have conveniently looked the other way while human rights abuses are committed in Western Sahara".

France, a permanent member of the council, is a strong backer of Morocco but has strongly denied trying to influence the Western Sahara talks. South Africa and Morocco are current temporary members of the council.

This year's talks on the UN mission were held amid growing UN complaints that its mission in the sparsely populated phosphate-rich territory is being "undermined" by Moroccan tactics.

The Security Council resolution, which renewed the peacekeeping mandate until April 2013, stressed "the importance of improving the human rights situation in Western Sahara and the Tindouf camps".

Disharmony and tension

Morocco controls the bulk of the territory. The Polisario Front, which fought a guerrilla war against the Moroccans until a UN-brokered ceasefire in 1991, governs the Tindouf camps in Algeria which were set up for Sahrawis who fled the conflict.

The resolution called on the two sides "to work with the international community to develop and implement independent and credible measures to ensure full respect for human rights".

The peacekeepers are officially known as the UN Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO). Efforts to organise a vote for the Sahrawi people have been deadlocked for years however.

The UN-brokered talks have failed to make progress on a political solution between the Polisario Front and Morocco.

Morocco's UN ambassador Mohammed Loulichki said the council had been "quite correct" to again reject "broadening the mandate to bring in questions which have nothing to do with the function" of the UN mission.

"Morocco makes a commitment to the [UN-brokered] negotiations" on the territory, said Loulichki. But he reaffirmed Morocco's claim to sovereignty over Western Sahara and said a referendum could lead to "disharmony and tension".

The Polisario Front's UN envoy, Ahmed Boukhari, also condemned what he called the "intrigues and subterfuges" of council members, including France, and said it had not been strong enough on human rights.

"It does not respond to the demands of international human rights organizations nor to the gravity of the situation on the ground, which reveals that there are dozens of Sahrawi political prisoners, hundreds of disappeared in addition to those who have died in detention in Moroccan secret prisons," he said in a statement.

EU-Morocco: Preparing For The Action Plan On Reforms

Date: 2012-04-24 07:29

Source: European Commission

Remarks by Commissioner Füle at the press conference after the EU-Morocco Association Council in Luxembourg on 23rd April 2012 "Morocco and the EU share the objective of a deepening and strengthening their relations on the basis of the "advanced status". Today we took note of the very good progress achieved in the discussions on a new comprehensive EU-Morocco Action Plan which will provide us with an operational roadmap for our bilateral relations in the next five years (2012-2016). The new Action Plan will be fully in line with the political, economic and social reform agenda of Morocco and with the EU's renewed approach to the European Neighbourhood Policy. In particular regarding our Southern partners The Action Plan contains orientations for progressive alignment to EU legal and regulatory acquis in key areas in order to establish closer economic integration with the EU with benefits for Morocco in terms of: foreign investment, market access, competitiveness and job creation. It also contains important objectives for the consolidation of the respect of human rights and democratic principles, improved governance and a more active involvement of the civil society.* Our bilateral relations are currently in a positive dynamic phase and I would like to highlight in particular the following the areas:

* The forthcoming entry into force (by 1st July 2012) of the Agreement on liberalisation of trade in agriculture. This is a balanced agreement that will contribute to the development of Morocco's agriculture and trade while opening new market opportunities for the EU operators.

* The on-going important bilateral negotiations, such as on liberalisation of trade in services and establishment and for a mobility partnership. The former one would pave the way for negotiations for the DCFTA while mobility partnership would allow us to better manage migration.

* Technical and financial assistance continues at a high level (190 € million per annum). Furthermore, I'm happy to announce today a first additional allocation of 80 € million under the new "Spring" facility for Morocco in order to promote economic and social development and human rights/governance. We are still going to discuss some other issues related to regional issues. Morocco is playing very important role in the regional cooperation; we are going to talk also about the Union for Mediterranean and about Maghreb Arab Union and its cooperation with the EU. Let me also say that in this context we welcome the positive trend in Algeria-Morocco relations. The EU looks forward to further progress in this process of regional integration."

C. Anne Pence
Senior International Advisor
Covington and Burling LLP
202 662 5443
apence@cov.com

This message is from a law firm and may contain information that is confidential or legally privileged. If you are not the intended recipient, please immediately advise the sender by reply e-mail that this message has been inadvertently transmitted to you and delete this e-mail from your system. Thank you for your cooperation.

-----Original Message-----

From: Edward Gabriel [mailto:ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com]

Sent: Tuesday, April 24, 2012 4:27 AM

To: Bill Hayes; Joe Matthews; Hugh McDowell; Larson, Alan; Pence, Anne; Fatima Kurtz

Subject: RE: CONFIDENTIAL/PLEASE DO NOT SHARE: lunch today with Amina and another point on Amrani

Bill, I think you should be upbeat. Amina is very engaged and appears on top of the Kosmos priorities in this regard. It seems your initial reaction was right in thinking that Amina's return to OHNYM would be a good thing as she would be more engaged in the priorities of the MKWG. I was impressed that she was on top of the issues and offered comments on what we view as most important topics, without being prompted. Ed

-----Original Message-----

From: Bill Hayes [mailto:whayes@kosmosenergy.com]

Sent: Monday, April 23, 2012 11:07 PM

To: Edward Gabriel; Joe Matthews; Hugh McDowell; alarson@cov.com; apence@cov.com; Fatima Kurtz

Subject: Re: CONFIDENTIAL/PLEASE DO NOT SHARE: lunch today with Amina and another point on Amrani

Ed:

As always, grateful for your efforts and relaying this information.

Kosmos "gets" Amina's caution in her dealings within the new GoM. We want to emphasize that with her. We will respect her wishes to keep her close and seek her concurrence before Kosmos reaches out to others within the GoM. This (ours) is a delicate situation made more so by the new faces in the government. As you appreciate, we want to balance that with Kosmos' ability to be respectful to the Minister to whom we "report.". But, we can wait for the proper time; it just may take some explaining to our Board and others. Regarding the Moroccan Ambassador's trip to Dallas, our invitation is in and we await a reply.

Your information on Amina's carrying the Kosmos/Onhym messages is great to hear; and more so, the reminders about Correll she apparently emphasizes.

Before I read your note, I was getting somewhat concerned in the past few days that we may have lost some momentum following from a remarkable MKWG in Feb in Rabat (Amina's first). Now, however, it seems we are seeing some fruit of our labors; that is, we are seeing Amina taking the MKWG guidance back to the GoM.

We would welcome meetings with Mr Aziman and Mr Terab's participation - at some level - in the MKWG.

All this points in the right direction for the MKWG and our efforts.

Thanks again.

Bill

-----Original Message-----

From: Edward M. Gabriel

To: William S. Hayes

To: Joe Matthews

To: Hugh McDowell

To: Alan P. Larson

To: Anne Pence

To: Fatima Kurtz

Subject: CONFIDENTIAL/PLEASE DO NOT SHARE: lunch today with Amina and another point on Amrani

Sent: Apr 23, 2012 2:22 PM

I had lunch today with Amina, and will debrief Hugh tomorrow morning. Although there was no heavy agenda between us, I did pick up a few things from her.

The concern she expressed about controlling all points of contact with the Moroccan government came through loud and clear. She discussed at some length how difficult it is trying to figure out how to work with the new government, especially given the fact they are made up of people they do not know that well. We should be reminded that many of our colleagues have been working together in key Moroccan positions for more than a decade, and now things have changed over night.

For instance, she said that she's been trying to get clearance on a meeting for Kosmos with both Ambassadors in the US (including the UN) and has not been able to get an answer. She asked me for my advice on whether I thought she could have an "unofficial" meeting with Bouhlal that didn't get reported back to MFA, in the event she didn't get clearance. I suggested she speak directly to the Ambassador and candidly ask him, since he will understand, and is in somewhat the same boat himself. This underscores the delicate nature of the new relationships with the new government and the importance she places on controlling the situation with regard to meetings with her Moroccan colleagues.

She also plans on providing the Minister of Energy with a complete brief on the Kosmos dossier tomorrow morning. She expressed confidence in the Minister and made it clear that they have an excellent working relationship. I can attest to it, since she took a call from him during lunch that was extremely warm and gracious, although formal and respectful on her

This e-mail communication is confidential and is intended only for the individuals or entities named above and others who have been specifically authorized to receive it. If you are not the intended recipient, please do not read, copy, use or disclose the contents of this communication to others. Please notify the sender that you have received this e-mail in error by replying to the e-mail or by telephoning (214) 445-9600, Monday - Friday during the hours of 8:00 A.M. - 5:00 P.M. (CST). Please then delete the e-mail and any copies of it. Thank you. Nothing contained in this disclaimer shall be construed in any way to grant permission to transmit confidential information via this firm's e-mail system.

2011 MINURSO Resolution	2012 MINURSO Resolution
Expressing serious concern about the increase in violations of existing agreements and calling on the parties to respect their relevant obligations	Expressing concern about the increase in violations of existing agreements and calling on the parties to respect their relevant obligations
Inviting in this context the parties to demonstrate further political will towards a solution including by expanding upon their discussion of each other's proposals	Encouraging in this context, the parties to demonstrate further political will towards a solution including by expanding upon their discussion of each other's proposals
Welcoming the parties' agreement to explore innovative negotiating approaches and discrete subjects	Welcoming the parties' agreement to explore innovative negotiating approaches and discrete subjects, their commitment to deepen the discussions on these and other issues, and the 9 November 2011 meeting of the parties on natural resources and progress made towards demining
N/A	Welcoming the positive conclusion of the 12-16 September 2011 UNHCR-sponsored seminar on Hassaniya culture and the agreement by the parties to hold two additional seminars in 2012, as well as the holding of a UNHCR-facilitated high-level meeting on Confidence Building Measures for Western Sahara on 24-25 January 2012
Welcoming the establishment of a National Council on Human Rights in Morocco and the proposed component regarding Western Sahara, and the commitment of Morocco to ensure unqualified and unimpeded access to all Special Procedures of the United Nations Human Rights Council	Welcoming the opening of National Council on Human Rights Commissions operating in Dakhla and Laayoune, and the steps taken by Morocco in order to fulfill its commitment to ensure unqualified and unimpeded access to all Special Procedures of the United Nations Human Rights Council
Also welcoming the implementation of the enhanced refugee protection program developed by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in coordination with the Polisario front, which will include human rights training and awareness initiatives	Also welcoming the implementation of the enhanced refugee protection program developed by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in coordination with the Polisario front, which includes human rights training and awareness initiatives
Welcoming the agreement of the parties expressed in the Communiqué of the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General for Western Sahara of 18 March 2008 and looking forward to the inauguration of family visits by land and the continuation of the existing programme by air, and encouraging parties to cooperation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in implementing their agreement	Looking forward to the implementation of the updated plan of action on confidence building measures adopted in Geneva 24-25 January 2012, including the inauguration of family visits by land, use of new information technology to facilitate communication links between families, and the continuation and expansion of the existing programme by air, and encouraging parties to cooperation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in implementing their agreement

Recognizing that the consolidation of the status quo is not acceptable in the long term, and noting further that progress in the negotiations is essential in order to improve the quality of life of the people of the Western Sahara in all its aspects	Recognizing that the consolidation of the status quo is not acceptable, and noting further that progress in the negotiations is essential in order to improve the quality of life of the people of the Western Sahara in all its aspects
Affirming support for the Secretary-General's Personal Envoy for Western Sahara Ambassador Christopher Ross, and his work in facilitating negotiations between the parties also welcoming his ongoing consultations with the parties and neighboring states	Affirming support for the Secretary-General's Personal Envoy for Western Sahara Ambassador Christopher Ross, and his work in facilitating negotiations between the parties, welcoming his ongoing consultations with the parties and neighboring states, and looking forward to his regional visit in the near future, including to Western Sahara, as per the communiqué of the Informal Meeting on Western Sahara 11-13 March 2012
13. Decides to extend the mandate of MINURSO until 30 April 2012	1. Decides to extend the mandate of MINURSO until 30 April 2013
1. (Same Text as 2. in 2012)	2. (Same Text as 1. in 2011)
2. Calls on all parties to cooperate fully with the operations of MINURSO and to ensure the security of as well as unhindered and immediate access for the United Nations and associated personnel in carrying out their mandate, in conformity with existing agreements	3. Calls on all parties to cooperate fully with the operations of MINURSO, including its free interaction with all interlocutors, and to ensure the security of as well as unhindered and immediate access for the United Nations and associated personnel in carrying out their mandate, in conformity with existing agreements
3. (Same Text as 4. in 2012)	4. (Same Text as 3. in 2011)
4. (Same Text as 5. in 2012)	5. (Same Text as 4. in 2011)
5. (Same Text as 6. in 2012)	6. (Same Text as 5. in 2011)
6. (Same Text as 7. in 2012)	7. (Same Text as 6. in 2011)
7. (Same Text as 8. in 2012)	8. (Same Text as 7. in 2011)
8. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council informed on a regular basis, and at least twice a year, on the status and progress of these negotiations under his auspices and express its intention to meet to receive and discuss his report 9. Requests the Secretary-General to provide a report on the situation in the Western Sahara well before the end of the mandate period	9. Requests the Secretary-General to brief the Security Council on a regular basis, and at least twice a year, on the status and progress of these negotiations under his auspices, on the implementation of this resolution, challenges to MINURSO's operations and steps taken to address them, and expresses its intention to meet to receive and discuss his briefings and in this regard, further requests the Secretary General to provide a report on the situation in the Western Sahara well before the end of the mandate period
11. Urges Member States to provide voluntary contributions to fund confidence-building measures that allow for increased contact between separated family members, especially family visits, as well as for other confidence-building measures that may be agreed upon between the parties	11. Urges Member States to provide voluntary contributions to fund confidence-building measures that allow for visits between separated family members, as well as for other confidence-building measures that may be agreed upon between the parties

12. Requests the Secretary-General in his next report to examine the existing challenges to MINURSO's operations, reflecting the situation on the ground	N/A
13. (Same Text as 1. in 2012)
14. (Same Text as 12. in 2012)	12. (Same Text as 14. in 2012)
15. (Same Text as 13. in 2012)	13. (Same Text as 15. in 2011)

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 02, 2012 7:27 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: CORRECTION: MINURSO Resolution and reactions; EU-Morocco talks on "advanced status," e.g. FDI and regional integration

Rachad,

Please do not share the information in the last email/or this one on this Minurso subject, as it contains information to other clients that you may not want to share with your staff. It should have been deleted but I mistakenly sent it too quickly. I do not mind you seeing it however. Ed

-----Original Message-----

From: Edward Gabriel
Sent: Wednesday, May 02, 2012 7:15 PM
To: Bouhlal, Rachad (rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com)
Subject: FW: MINURSO Resolution and reactions; EU-Morocco talks on "advanced status," e.g. FDI and regional integration

FYI, Attached is a comparison of the 2011 and 2012 UN MINURSO rollovers, which you may find of use.
Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

-----Original Message-----

From: Edward Gabriel
Sent: Wednesday, April 25, 2012 12:01 PM
To: Fatima Kurtz; Jordan Paul
Subject: FW: MINURSO Resolution and reactions; EU-Morocco talks on "advanced status," e.g. FDI and regional integration

I would be good to see a comparison side by side or in color differences with last's year's resolution. Is that possible? thanks

-----Original Message-----

From: Pence, Anne [mailto:apence@cov.com]
Sent: Wednesday, April 25, 2012 9:47 AM
To: Bill Hayes; Joe Matthews; Hugh McDowell; Larson, Alan; Edward Gabriel; Fatima Kurtz
Subject: MINURSO Resolution and reactions; EU-Morocco talks on "advanced status," e.g. FDI and regional integration

It is "clean" but those involved (e.g. Morocco) may also see messages they may not like -- such as exhortations to provide "unhindered movement", etc. which harken to elements of the SG's report. At same time, the Resolution is positive about Morocco's steps on human rights, and some by the Polisario with UNHCR. It references the Moroccan autonomy proposal, but also a 2007 Polisario proposal. It offers continued support for the Ross process, and mentions that natural resources have been discussed in that context.

Morocco's public comments are interesting too -- stresses the importance of self-determination (but indicates concern that a referendum would cause tension at an already tense time.

Meanwhile, EU-Morocco discussions were held in Luxembourg to prepare for the agricultural trade liberalization agreement in effect July 1 and to discuss a range of other issues under Morocco's "advanced status," including regional integration, the AMU and the positive trend in Morocco-Algeria relations.

Anne

24 April 2012

Security Council
SC/10621

Department of Public Information • News and Media Division • New York Security Council 6758th Meeting (AM)

Security Council Extends Mandate of United Nations Mission in Western Sahara until 30 April 2013, Unanimously Adopting Resolution 2044 (2012)

The Security Council today extended the mandate of the United Nations mission in Western Sahara until 30 April 2013.

Unanimously adopting resolution 2044 (2012), the Council called on the parties to cooperate fully with the operations of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO), including its free interaction with all interlocutors, and to take the necessary steps to ensure the security of, as well as unhindered movement and immediate access for, United Nations personnel in carrying out the mandate.

Today's resolution came on the heels of the Secretary-General's 5 April report, in which he recommended the extension because the Mission remained relevant as a guarantor for the stability of the ceasefire and as a visible commitment of the international community to achieve a resolution of the conflict.

The Mission's ability to fully monitor and assess the situation on the ground — in a total area of 104,000 km sq. — and to interact with the full spectrum of interlocutors was essential, as illustrated in the context of recent violence following a sports event and of evidence of "simmering community tensions" in the west, which the Secretary-General said was another consequence of the absence of a peace agreement between Morocco and the Frente Polisario and the continuing status quo, the report stated.

Expressing concern about the violations of existing agreements and calling on the parties to respect their relevant obligations, the Security Council called upon the parties to continue to show political will and work in an atmosphere propitious for dialogue in order to enter into a more intensive and substantive phase of negotiations.

It further called upon the parties to continue negotiations under the auspices of the Secretary-General without preconditions and in good faith, taking into account the efforts made since 2006 and subsequent developments, with a view to achieving a just, lasting and mutually acceptable political solution, which will provide for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara.

Following the adoption of the resolution, Morocco's representative said the text reiterated the importance and priority of the initiative of self-determination.

"There is no alternative to negotiations," he said. "We will not move backwards. Since 2001, we have thought that the referendum approach could result in tension in a society which is still seeking to find solutions by consensus. We believe we will be able to live as neighbours in our neighbourhood."

However, South Africa's representative, also speaking after the vote, expressed concern over the resolution's failure to more fully address human rights issues, especially in light of the Security Council's recent bold steps in that field, particularly in northern Africa and the Middle East.

"The continuation of that trend will threaten to erode the Mission," he cautioned. Still, his country voted in favour of the resolution because of the need to resolve the Western Sahara issue in a peaceful manner.

The meeting began at 10:14 a.m. and ended at 10:30 a.m.

Resolution

The full text of resolution 2044 (2012) reads as follows:

"The Security Council,

"Recalling and reaffirming all its previous resolutions on Western Sahara,

"Reaffirming its strong support for the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy to implement resolutions 1754 (2007), 1783 (2007), 1813 (2008), 1871 (2009), 1920 (2010), and 1979 (2011),

"Reaffirming its commitment to assist the parties to achieve a just, lasting, and mutually acceptable political solution, which will provide for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in the context of arrangements consistent with the principles and purposes of the Charter of the United Nations, and noting the role and responsibilities of the parties in this respect,

"Reiterating its call upon the parties and States of the region to cooperate more fully with the United Nations and with each other and to strengthen their involvement to end the current impasse and to achieve progress towards a political solution,

"Welcoming the efforts of the Secretary-General to keep all peacekeeping operations, including MINURSO, under close review and reiterating the need for the Council to pursue a rigorous, strategic approach to peacekeeping deployments,

"Expressing concern about the violations of existing agreements, and calling on the parties to respect their relevant obligations,

“Taking note of the Moroccan proposal presented on 11 April 2007 to the Secretary-General and welcoming serious and credible Moroccan efforts to move the process forward towards resolution; also taking note of the Polisario Front proposal presented 10 April 2007 to the Secretary-General,

“Encouraging in this context, the parties to demonstrate further political will towards a solution including by expanding upon their discussion of each other’s proposals,

“Taking note of the four rounds of negotiations held under the auspices of the Secretary-General and the continued rounds of informal talks, and welcoming the progress made by the parties to enter into direct negotiations,

“Welcoming the progress made by the parties in discussing innovative negotiating approaches and discrete subjects, their commitment to deepen the discussions on these and other issues, and the 9 November 2011 meeting of the parties on natural resources and progress made towards demining,

“Welcoming the positive conclusion of the 12-16 September 2011 UNHCR-sponsored seminar on Hassaniya culture and the agreement by the parties to hold two additional seminars in 2012, as well as the holding of a UNHCR-facilitated high-level meeting on Confidence Building Measures for Western Sahara on 24-25 January 2012,

“Stressing the importance of improving the human rights situation in Western Sahara and the Tindouf camps, and encouraging the parties to work with the international community to develop and implement independent and credible measures to ensure full respect for human rights, bearing in mind their relevant obligations under international law,

“Welcoming the opening of National Council on Human Rights Commissions operating in Dakhla and Laayoune, and the steps taken by Morocco in order to fulfil its commitment to ensure unqualified and unimpeded access to all Special Procedures of the United Nations Human Rights Council,

“Also welcoming the implementation of the enhanced refugee protection program developed by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in coordination with the Polisario Front, which includes refugee and human rights training and awareness initiatives,

“Reiterating the request that UNHCR maintain its consideration of a refugee registration in the Tindouf refugee camps,

“Looking forward to the implementation of the updated plan of action on confidence building measures adopted in Geneva 24-25 January 2012, including the inauguration of family visits by land, use of new information technology to facilitate communication links between families, and the continuation and expansion of the existing programme by air, and encouraging the parties to cooperate with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in implementing their agreement,

“Welcoming the commitment of the parties to continue the process of negotiations through the United Nations-sponsored talks,

“Recognizing that the consolidation of the status quo is not acceptable, and noting further that progress in the negotiations is essential in order to improve the quality of life of the people of Western Sahara in all its aspects,

“Affirming support for the Secretary-General’s Personal Envoy for Western Sahara Ambassador Christopher Ross and his work in facilitating negotiations between the parties, welcoming his ongoing consultations with the parties and neighbouring states, and looking forward to his regional visit in the near future, including to Western Sahara, as per the communiqué of the Informal Meeting on Western Sahara 11-13 March 2012,

“Affirming support for the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Western Sahara and Head of MINURSO Hany Abdel-aziz,

“Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 11 April 2012 (S/2012/197),

“1. Decides to extend the mandate of MINURSO until 30 April 2013;

“2. Reaffirms the need for full respect of the military agreements reached with the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) with regard to the ceasefire and calls on the parties to adhere fully to those agreements;

“3. Calls upon all parties to cooperate fully with the operations of MINURSO, including its free interaction with all interlocutors, and to take the necessary steps to ensure the security of as well as unhindered movement and immediate access for the United Nations and associated personnel in carrying out their mandate, in conformity with existing agreements;

“4. Welcomes the parties’ commitment to continue the process of holding small, informal talks in preparation for a fifth round of negotiations, and recalls its endorsement of the recommendation in the report of 14 April 2008 (S/2008/251) that realism and a spirit of compromise by the parties are essential to achieve progress in negotiations;

“5. Calls upon the parties to continue to show political will and work in an atmosphere propitious for dialogue in order to enter into a more intensive and substantive phase of negotiations, thus ensuring implementation of resolutions 1754 (2007), 1783 (2007), 1813 (2008), 1871 (2009), 1920 (2010), and 1979 (2011) and the success of negotiations, inter alia, by continuing their discussion of the ideas in paragraph 120 of the Secretary General’s report (S/2011/249);

“6. Affirms its strong support for the commitment of the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy towards a solution to the question of Western Sahara in this context and calls for an intensified pace of meetings and strengthening of contacts;

“7. Calls upon the parties to continue negotiations under the auspices of the Secretary-General without preconditions and in good faith, taking into account the efforts made since 2006 and subsequent developments, with a view to achieving a just, lasting, and mutually acceptable political solution, which will provide for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in the context of arrangements consistent with the principles and purposes of the Charter of the United Nations, and noting the role and responsibilities of the parties in this respect;

“8. Invites Member States to lend appropriate assistance to these talks;

“9. Requests the Secretary-General to brief the Security Council on a regular basis, and at least twice a year, on the status and progress of these negotiations under his auspices, on the implementation of this resolution, challenges to MINURSO’s operations and steps taken to address them, and expresses its intention to meet to receive and discuss his briefings and in this regard, further requests the Secretary-General to provide a report on the situation in Western Sahara well before the end of the mandate period;

“10. Welcomes the commitment of the parties and the neighbouring states to hold periodic meetings with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to review and, where possible, expand confidence-building measures;

“11. Urges Member States to provide voluntary contributions to fund confidence-building measures that allow for visits between separated family members, as well as for other confidence-building measures agreed upon between parties;

“12. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to take the necessary measures to ensure full compliance in MINURSO with the United Nations zero-tolerance policy on sexual exploitation and abuse and to keep the Council informed, and urges troop-contributing countries to take appropriate preventive action including pre-deployment awareness training, and other action to ensure full accountability in cases of such conduct involving their personnel;

“13. Decides to remain seized of the matter.”

Background

The Security Council had before it the Report of the Secretary-General on the situation concerning Western Sahara (S/2012/197), which covers developments since 1 April 2011 concerning the situation on the ground in the Territory, the status and progress of negotiations and challenges to the operations of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO).

In the report, the Secretary-General recommends the extension of MINURSO’s mandate for a further 12 months until 30 April 2013.

He recommends, therefore, an increase of 15 military observers to bolster monitoring capacities. As the report outlines a series of challenges that demonstrate that MINURSO is unable to exercise fully its peacekeeping, monitoring, observation and reporting functions, he requests the assistance of the Council in reasserting the Mission’s mandated role, ensuring that the minimum conditions for its successful operation are met and upholding peacekeeping standards and United Nations neutrality. He calls on the two parties to cooperate fully with MINURSO in achieving those goals.

He says that during the reporting period, the three rounds of informal talks between the parties, their two meetings on natural resources and confidence-building measures, and the numerous bilateral consultations that his Personal Envoy held with them, confirmed that the parties continue to have the political will to meet, but not as yet to engage in substantive negotiations towards a just, lasting, and mutually acceptable political solution, which will provide for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara, as required by Security Council resolutions.

It is possible that changes in the regional political environment will provide new opportunities, the report states. Absent a new framework, however, the Secretary-General’s Personal Envoy will continue his established pattern of activities and encourage the development of new ideas.

* * * * *

SA blasts UN over Western Sahara rights

2012-04-25 09:13

New York - South Africa on Tuesday accused UN Security Council powers of "conveniently" ignoring human rights abuses in the disputed territory of Western Sahara.

The council again rejected growing demands for the UN peacekeeping force in the Moroccan-controlled territory to have a permanent rights investigation duty.

But the annual resolution renewing the mandate of the UN force did stress the need for Morocco to improve rights in Western Sahara, which it annexed in 1975 following a Spanish withdrawal.

South Africa's UN ambassador Baso Sangqu said the 15-nation council was guilty of "double standards" by taking "bold steps" over the Arab Spring countries but refusing a permanent rights monitoring system for Western Sahara.

The rights of the people of Western Sahara must be "equally defended with the same zeal and commitment", he told the council.

Without naming countries, he said "the selective approach to human rights by this council calls into question the motivation of those who have conveniently looked the other way while human rights abuses are committed in Western Sahara".

France, a permanent member of the council, is a strong backer of Morocco but has strongly denied trying to influence the Western Sahara talks. South Africa and Morocco are current temporary members of the council.

This year's talks on the UN mission were held amid growing UN complaints that its mission in the sparsely populated phosphate-rich territory is being "undermined" by Moroccan tactics.

The Security Council resolution, which renewed the peacekeeping mandate until April 2013, stressed "the importance of improving the human rights situation in Western Sahara and the Tindouf camps".

Disharmony and tension

Morocco controls the bulk of the territory. The Polisario Front, which fought a guerrilla war against the Moroccans until a UN-brokered ceasefire in 1991, governs the Tindouf camps in Algeria which were set up for Sahrawis who fled the conflict.

The resolution called on the two sides "to work with the international community to develop and implement independent and credible measures to ensure full respect for human rights".

The peacekeepers are officially known as the UN Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO). Efforts to organise a vote for the Sahrawi people have been deadlocked for years however.

The UN-brokered talks have failed to make progress on a political solution between the Polisario Front and Morocco.

Morocco's UN ambassador Mohammed Loulichki said the council had been "quite correct" to again reject "broadening the mandate to bring in questions which have nothing to do with the function" of the UN mission.

"Morocco makes a commitment to the [UN-brokered] negotiations" on the territory, said Loulichki. But he reaffirmed Morocco's claim to sovereignty over Western Sahara and said a referendum could lead to "disharmony and tension".

The Polisario Front's UN envoy, Ahmed Boukhari, also condemned what he called the "intrigues and subterfuges" of council members, including France, and said it had not been strong enough on human rights.

"It does not respond to the demands of international human rights organizations nor to the gravity of the situation on the ground, which reveals that there are dozens of Sahrawi political prisoners, hundreds of disappeared in addition to those who have died in detention in Moroccan secret prisons," he said in a statement.

EU-Morocco: Preparing For The Action Plan On Reforms

Date: 2012-04-24 07:29

Source: European Commission

Remarks by Commissioner Füle at the press conference after the EU-Morocco Association Council in Luxembourg on 23rd April 2012 "Morocco and the EU share the objective of a deepening and strengthening their relations on the basis of the "advanced status". Today we took note of the very good progress achieved in the discussions on a new comprehensive EU-Morocco Action Plan which will provide us with an operational roadmap for our bilateral relations in the next five years (2012-2016). The new Action Plan will be fully in line with the political, economic and social reform agenda of Morocco and with the EU's renewed approach to the European Neighbourhood Policy. In particular regarding our Southern partners The Action Plan contains orientations for progressive alignment to EU legal and regulatory acquis in key areas in order to establish closer economic integration with the EU with benefits for Morocco in terms of: foreign investment, market access, competitiveness and job creation. It also contains important objectives for the consolidation of the respect of human rights and democratic principles, improved governance and a more active involvement of the civil society.* Our bilateral relations are currently in a positive dynamic phase and I would like to highlight in particular the following the areas:

* The forthcoming entry into force (by 1st July 2012) of the Agreement on liberalisation of trade in agriculture. This is a balanced agreement that will contribute to the development of Morocco's agriculture and trade while opening new market opportunities for the EU operators.

* The on-going important bilateral negotiations, such as on liberalisation of trade in services and establishment and for a mobility partnership. The former one would pave the way for negotiations for the DCFTA while mobility partnership would allow us to better manage migration.

* Technical and financial assistance continues at a high level (190 € million per annum). Furthermore, I'm happy to announce today a first additional allocation of 80 € million under the new "Spring" facility for Morocco in order to promote economic and social development and human rights/governance. We are still going to discuss some other issues related to regional issues. Morocco is playing very important role in the regional cooperation; we are going to talk also about the Union for Mediterranean and about Maghreb Arab Union and its cooperation with the EU. Let me also say that in this context we welcome the positive trend in Algeria-Morocco relations. The EU looks forward to further progress in this process of regional integration."

C. Anne Pence

Senior International Advisor
Covington and Burling LLP
202 662 5443
apence@cov.com

This message is from a law firm and may contain information that is confidential or legally privileged. If you are not the intended recipient, please immediately advise the sender by reply e-mail that this message has been inadvertently transmitted to you and delete this e-mail from your system. Thank you for your cooperation.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, May 03, 2012 8:47 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: can you call when you get a chance

We received some additional information on the new house language. Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, May 04, 2012 10:10 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>
Cc: Kathleen M. Linehan <kathleen@klinehan.com>;
Ouissal Yasmine <ouissal@embassyofmorocco.us>
Subject: Your schedule and other notes for Saturday in Easton, Paint the Town Moroccan Attachments: Blank 2.doc; Untitled attachment 00203.txt

Attached is the schedule for Saturday, including a list of people/organizations to thank or recognize. My cell phone does not always work at our home on the Eastern Shore. Our home number is 410 745 6903.

Address:

6560 Cedar Cove Road
Royal Oak, MD, 21662

I will see you directly at the Flag ceremony. Ed

PAINT THE TOWN MOROCCAN!
ACADEMY ART MUSEUM FUNDRAISER: MAY 2012

Notes for Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal

* SATURDAY MAY 5, NOON, FLAG CEREMONY, followed by opening comments by organizers and your introduction by Ambassador Ed Gabriel. You will say a few words and thank and recognize people:

Acknowledgements:

- The Academy Art Museum: Sponsor
 - Director, Erik Neil
 - Board of Trustees and Staff
 - Creator & Chief Organizer, Leslie Westbrook
 - Joyce Doehler, (pronounced Doe-ler) Co-Chairperson

- Town of Easton
 - Mayor Robert Willey (pronounced WILL'-EE)
 - Town Council
 - Director of Economic Development, Maureen Scott-Taylor

- Hassan Samrhouni, President of the Washington American Moroccan Club and Moroccan community

* You and the Mayor will cut the ribbon

* Following the Flag ceremony, at 12:30pm you will tour the souk and see sights on your walk to lunch

* At 1pm you will arrive to lunch at Mason's restaurant. You will have lunch with the museum Director and his wife, Erik and Louisa Neil, and Mrs. Kay Perkins. Buffy and I are also invited to attend this lunch.

* At approximately 3pm, Buffy and I will give you a window tour of the area, including St.Michaels and Oxford MD arriving to our home at 4pm for down time.

* We will depart at 5:30pm for the Avalon Theatre for a music concert by Ali Amir, which begins at 6pm.

* We will walk from the theatre to cocktails at the Academy Art museum, followed by dinner under the tent.

* DINNER will conclude about 10-10:30pm

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, May 04, 2012 11:23 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: meeting on Tuesday at 10am

Rachad,
Thank you for your time on Tuesday to meet. I would propose we discuss the language and appropriations schedule on the new House language as well as important upcoming congressional visits by you. If you agree, I would suggest we include our staffs. On my side I would include Bob and Jordan. Please let me know how you prefer to proceed and what issues/agenda you prefer? Thank you. I am now in Easton and everyone is excited to meet you, Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, May 07, 2012 9:34 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: 1st Quarter 2012 Journal Article Review

Below please find the MAC 1st Quarter 2012 Journal Article Review. Our research team compiles and reviews recent journal publications relating to Morocco, the Maghreb, and MENA on a quarterly basis. Clicking on any article title below will link you to the executive summary for the article as well as MAC recommendations on the relevance of the article. You can also find publication information, and, where available, a link to a copy of the article. In the event that no link is posted, please email me for a copy of the article. We hope that this information will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on recent journal articles and help to keep you up-to-date on publications and academic trends.

Please do not forward this bulletin as it contains our evaluations of the articles and is proprietary information

Arab Monarchies: Chance for Reform, Yet Unmet

Climate Change, Migration, and Conflict in Northwest Africa: Rising Dangers and Policy Options Across the Arc of Tension

Europeanization through Cooperation? EU Democracy Promotion in Morocco and Tunisia

Fatna El Bouih and the Work of Memory, Gender and Reparation in Morocco

The Influence of the Socioeducation Environment on Marriage Formation in Morocco

Is Morocco Immune to Upheaval?

Law on the Books Vs. Law in Action: Under-Enforcement of Morocco's Reformed 2004 Family Law, the Moudawana

Morocco's New Geopolitics: A Wider Atlantic Perspective

New Socio-Political Actors in North Africa

Regional Security Cooperation in the Maghreb and Sahel: Algeria's Pivotal Ambivalence

U.S.-Moroccan Relations: How Special?

Arab Monarchies: Chance for Reform, Yet Unmet

Marina Ottaway and Marwan Muashar

The Carnegie Papers, Middle East, December 2011

http://carnegieendowment.org/files/arab_monarchies1.pdf

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Despite intense pressure for regime change in neighboring countries, Arab monarchs still enjoy an extraordinary degree of legitimacy in the eyes of their citizens. The events of the Arab Spring afforded these sovereigns an opportunity to take advantage of that legitimacy and engineer a process of controlled, top-down reform that would preclude an escalation of bottom-up demands. For the most part, however, they have not been inclined to take progressive steps toward the democratic governments that Arab protestors are demanding. Reforms have ranged from ostensibly bold, but in reality limited in Morocco, to hesitant and uncertain in Jordan, to practically nonexistent in the Gulf countries.

Reforms undertaken by King Mohammed VI of Morocco are the most significant and progressive among Arab monarchies. Within two weeks of the start of street protests, he announced that a new constitution would be drafted and submitted to a popular referendum, with early parliamentary elections to follow soon afterward. On paper these steps appear to expedite the democratization process, but may not be followed by substantive changes.

The two most controversial issues in the drafting of the constitution concerned the identity of the Moroccan state and the power and role of the King. The first represents the Constitution's strongest aspect. The document officially declares Morocco a pluralistic society in terms of religion, language, and culture. It guarantees freedom of religious practice, recognizes Berber as an official language, and refers to a plurality of cultural influences-Andalusian, Saharan, Christian, Jewish-on Moroccan identity. Changes to the power of the King, however, are more ambiguous. The Constitution does impose new formal limits on the King's power, concerning the appointment of the Prime Minister for example, but reserves three crucial areas-religion, security, and armed forces policy choices-as his exclusive domain. This allows him to maintain control over most decisions unless he is challenged by political parties in the parliament, which is very unlikely given the history of deference and passivity to the King.

Existing political parties, including the PJD, do not appear interested in upsetting the status quo and protest movements focus on the government's shortcomings rather than those of the King. His personal legitimacy remains intact, but a majority of Moroccans remain skeptical. Voter turnout for the parliamentary election was only 45 percent, and many voters deliberately spoiled their ballots as a sign of protest. The new Constitution will likely not quell popular discontent; the February 20th and the Islamist al-Adl wal-Ihsan movements will fight for deeper reforms. For now, the new Constitution and elections have bolstered the monarchy and enabled Morocco to maintain order and stability, but do not represent a permanent solution.

Jordan's response to domestic protests has been "considerably more hesitant" than Morocco's. King Abdullah II has only proposed piecemeal reform, while King Mohammed has "moved boldly." Morocco's party system is much better developed than Jordan's and parties can play a meaningful role in parliament.

With the exception of Bahrain, Gulf monarchies have been unaffected by protest movements, and they have failed to take advantage of this important opportunity to introduce top-down reforms and avoid future problems. Instead, they have bought off moderate discontent with economic largesse or severe repression. Qatar supports change elsewhere, but not within its own borders; Omani demonstrators call for reform, not regime overthrow; Saudi Arabia is buying domestic peace with salary increases and housing benefits; UAE has been left untouched by unrest, but is taking modest preventative measures; and it is unclear if the current turmoil in Kuwait is a product of popular discontent or simply competition among rival elites.

RECOMMENDATION

The author is very critical of Morocco's reform efforts, which he calls "ostensibly bold but in reality limited." He praises King Mohammed VI for swiftly responding to popular discontent, but suggests that, in reality, the monarch may not have to surrender much power because political parties are unwilling to play a more decisive role. He emphasizes the King's popularity, but warns that continued unrest could jeopardize his legitimacy. However, the author does identify Morocco as the frontrunner in terms of democratic change in Arab monarchies. Compared to other Arab monarchies, the author says, Morocco's new constitution is "quite liberal." Morocco's reform efforts appear much more progressive and monumental when examined in context, rather than on their own.

Marina Ottaway is a Senior Associate with the Middle East Program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Marwan Muasher is the Vice President for Studies at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, where he oversees the Middle East program.

(Back to top)

Climate Change, Migration, and Conflict in Northwest Africa: Rising Dangers and Policy Options Across the Arc of Tension

Michael Werz and Laura Conley

Center for American Progress, April 2012, pp. 1-75

http://www.americanprogress.org/issues/2012/04/pdf/climate_migration_nwafrica.pdf
<http://www.americanprogress.org/issues/2012/04/pdf/climate_migration_nwafrica.pdf>

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article is the second in a series on the intersecting challenges of climate change, human migration, and security, and the subsequent challenges they present to US foreign policy in the 21st century. For its first regional report, the Center for American Progress focused on the unique confluence of these factors in northwest Africa - a region marked by labor migration, desertification, and security risks, namely the threat posed by al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and Boko Haram. Reporting on what they term the "arc of tension," the article tracks the intersections of climate change, migration, and security in Nigeria, Niger, Algeria, and Morocco. Recognizing that these nations are rarely analyzed as a geopolitical region, the authors explain that they chose to focus on these countries as a unit since they are linked by international migration routes from sub-Saharan Africa to the Mediterranean.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, May 07, 2012 9:41 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Ambassador Golf

Rachad,
Michael Forscey who you met this weekend, and emailed me below, would enjoy inviting you out for a golf game. I'd be more than happy to reintroduce you two if you are interested or you could contact him directly. Let me know. Ed

-----Original Message-----

From: Mike Forscey [mailto:m4c@forstin.com]
Sent: Monday, May 07, 2012 9:35 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Ambassador Golf

Ed, enjoyed meeting the ambassador and his wife. I am more than happy to introduce him to Four Streams which I know he will enjoy and can do so virtually any time he picks. Moreover, there are any number of world class courses around here, some private some public, which he will want to see and which I think can be arranged. In addition to Four Streams, there is TPC Avenel, Congressional (a little trickier), Washington Golf, Chevy Chase, among others, as well as worthy places on the Eastern Shore.

Again , I can take him to Four Streams any number of times if he likes it and can arrange for trips to most if not all of the others. Just let me know.

Michael A. Forscey
Forscey & Stinson, P.L.L.C.
818 Connecticut Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006
Phone: (202) 496-3463
Cell: (202) 251-4264
m4c@forstin.com

DISCLAIMER:

This e-mail message may contain confidential, privileged information intended solely for the addressee. Please delete and do not read, copy or disseminate it unless you are the addressee. This e-mail is for informational purposes only and is not intended to constitute either an electronic signature or an agreement by the sender.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, May 08, 2012 12:59 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Ambassador's Luncheon With Journalists

Rachad,

Thank you for such a productive meeting together. I felt it was excellent and I'm glad you got to see Bob in action, as he can be a great asset, not to mention Jordan of course.

Below is the journalist luncheon proposal with friendly journalists, which we propose you conduct at the Embassy. Please get back to me at your convenience with proposed dates or other comments etc. We would be happy to work directly with your staff as well, whatever is easiest for you. Thank you again, Ed

From: Calvin Dark [<mailto:cdark@moroccanamericancenter.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, May 08, 2012 12:48 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Ambassador's Luncheon With Journalists

Hi Ed,

Here's more information and background about the Ambassador's luncheon with journalists. Below is the description of what has been proposed. The next step is to choose a date (preferably a Tuesday because that works best for these types of journalists, given their deadlines) then to send out an invite from the Embassy. I have included the contact information for each journalist below. If you have any questions or just want to discuss, feel free to call or email me. Thanks –Calvin Dark

Media Luncheon with the Ambassador

The Comm. Team proposes to work with the Embassy to organize a media luncheon at the Embassy with the Ambassador and a small group of select reporters to introduce himself as Morocco's new Ambassador and for a briefing on US-Moroccan relations, including highlighting the importance of targeting US support for the refugee camps and full implementation of the recent Appropriations language. The proposed journalists include:

- 1) Jennifer Rubin (Washington Post, "Right Turn", jandjrubin@cox.net, 703-581-2894) – Jennifer Rubin is very interested in Morocco, understands and supports our messaging, particularly with regards to the Western Sahara, the Polisario and terrorism. Rubin has written several times on key issues concerning our campaigns and maintain and strengthening this relationship will be very beneficial in the future.
- 2) Massoud Hayoun (The Atlantic, mhayoun@theatlantic.com, 818-645-4032) – Massoud Hayoun writes often about the Arab Spring and has written about Morocco's experience, as it relates to ethnic identity and protection of ethnic minorities. His publication is well-known and well-respected—particularly among the Left—and educating Hayoun/strengthening that relationship will encourage him to explore and write further on Morocco and topics related to our campaigns.
- 3) Lee Smith (The Weekly Standard, lhs462@gmail.com, 718-968-5250) -- Lee Smith is Weekly Standard Senior Editor and author of the respected book on the Middle East, "The Strong Horse." He has reported extensively on the Middle East/Arab Spring and has written favorably several times about Morocco -- about human rights, Western Sahara and the king's March 9, 2011 speech on Constitutional reform.
- 4) Oren Dorell (USA Today: odorell@usatoday.com, 703-854-3323) -- Oren Dorrel, a foreign affairs reporter for USA Today, writes about society and warfare in the Middle East, from Morocco to Pakistan. He has written favorably about the recent Constitutional reforms and referendum.
- 5) Eli Lake (Newsweek/The Daily Beast, elilake@gmail.com) -- Eli Lake, Senior National Security correspondent for

Newsweek/The Daily Beast, writes extensively about security ramifications for US policy of developments in MENA.

6) Jackson Diehl (Washington Post) -- Jackson Diehl is an influential foreign affairs columnist for the Washington Post.

7) Robert Kagan (Brookings Institution, robert.kagan@gmail.com, his assistant Tesia Schmidtke-202-797-6272) -- Robert Kagan, senior fellow at Brookings is historian, author and foreign policy commentator, who is very interested in Morocco. His latest book (2012), The World America Made, has won broad acclaim and was mentioned in President Obama's most recent state of the union address.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, May 08, 2012 4:49 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: FARA Updates
Attachments: SR_FARAFoleyHoagSuppStatement30April2012.pdf

Please notice the meeting schedule of Gare Smith, who represents Algeria.

OMB NO. 1124-0002; Expires February 28, 2014

U.S. Department of Justice
Washington, DC 20530

Supplemental Statement
Pursuant to the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938, as amended

For Six Month Period Ending 03/31/2012

(Insert date)

I - REGISTRANT

1. (a) Name of Registrant (b) Registration No.

Foley Hoag LLP 4776

(c) Business Address(es) of Registrant

1875 K Street, NW
Suite 800
Washington, DC 20006

2. Has there been a change in the information previously furnished in connection with the following?

(a) If an individual:

- (1) Residence address(es) Yes No
- (2) Citizenship Yes No
- (3) Occupation Yes No

(b) If an organization:

- (1) Name Yes No
- (2) Ownership or control Yes No
- (3) Branch offices Yes No

(c) Explain fully all changes, if any, indicated in Items (a) and (b) above.

NSD/CES/REGISTRATION UNIT
2012 APR 30 PM 2:08

IF THE REGISTRANT IS AN INDIVIDUAL, OMIT RESPONSE TO ITEMS 3, 4, AND 5(a).

3. If you have previously filed Exhibit C¹, state whether any changes therein have occurred during this 6 month reporting period.

Yes No

If yes, have you filed an amendment to the Exhibit C? Yes No

If no, please attach the required amendment.

¹ The Exhibit C, for which no printed form is provided, consists of a true copy of the charter, articles of incorporation, association, and by laws of a registrant that is an organization. (A waiver of the requirement to file an Exhibit C may be obtained for good cause upon written application to the Assistant Attorney General, National Security Division, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, DC 20530.)

4. (a) Have any persons ceased acting as partners, officers, directors or similar officials of the registrant during this 6 month reporting period?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name	Position	Date Connection Ended
------	----------	-----------------------

(b) Have any persons become partners, officers, directors or similar officials during this 6 month reporting period?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name	Residence Address	Citizenship	Position	Date Assumed
------	-------------------	-------------	----------	--------------

SEE ATTACHMENT A

5. (a) Has any person named in Item 4(b) rendered services directly in furtherance of the interests of any foreign principal?

Yes No

If yes, identify each such person and describe the service rendered.

(b) During this six month reporting period, has the registrant hired as employees or in any other capacity, any persons who rendered or will render services to the registrant directly in furtherance of the interests of any foreign principal(s) in other than a clerical or secretarial, or in a related or similar capacity? Yes No

Name	Residence Address	Citizenship	Position	Date Assumed
------	-------------------	-------------	----------	--------------

(c) Have any employees or individuals, who have filed a short form registration statement, terminated their employment or connection with the registrant during this 6 month reporting period? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name	Position or Connection	Date Terminated
------	------------------------	-----------------

(d) Have any employees or individuals, who have filed a short form registration statement, terminated their connection with any foreign principal during this 6 month reporting period? Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Name	Position or Connection	Foreign Principal	Date Terminated
------	------------------------	-------------------	-----------------

6. Have short form registration statements been filed by all of the persons named in Items 5(a) and 5(b) of the supplemental statement?

Yes No

If no, list names of persons who have not filed the required statement.

II - FOREIGN PRINCIPAL

7. Has your connection with any foreign principal ended during this 6 month reporting period? Yes No
 If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal _____ Date of Termination _____

8. Have you acquired any new foreign principal(s)² during this 6 month reporting period? Yes No
 If yes, furnish th following information:

Name and Address of Foreign Principal(s) _____ Date Acquired _____

9. In addition to those named in Items 7 and 8, if any, list foreign principal(s)² whom you continued to represent during the 6 month reporting period.

Republic of Djibouti
 Republic of Guyana
 Corporation for the Promotion of Exports and Investments of Ecuador
 Government of the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria

10. (a) Have you filed exhibits for the newly acquired foreign principal(s), if any, listed in Item 8?

Exhibit A³ Yes No
 Exhibit B⁴ Yes No

If no, please attach the required exhibit.

(b) Have there been any changes in the Exhibits A and B previously filed for any foreign principal whom you represented during this six month period? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an amendment to these exhibits? Yes No

If no, please attach the required amendment.

² The term "foreign principal" includes, in addition to those defined in section 1(b) of the Act, an individual organization any of whose activities are directly or indirectly supervised, directed, controlled, financed, or subsidized in whole or in major part by a foreign government, foreign political party, foreign organization or foreign individual. (See Rule 100(a) (9)). A registrant who represents more than one foreign principal is required to list in the statements he files under the Act only those principals for whom he is not entitled to claim exemption under Section 3 of the Act. (See Rule 208.)

³ The Exhibit A, which is filed on Form NSD-3 (Formerly CRM-157) sets forth the information required to be disclosed concerning each foreign principal.

⁴ The Exhibit B, which is filed on Form NSD-4 (Formerly CRM-155) sets forth the information concerning the agreement or understanding between the registrant and the foreign principal.

III - ACTIVITIES

11. During this 6 month reporting period, have you engaged in any activities for or rendered any services to any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, identify each foreign principal and describe in full detail your activities and services:

12. During this 6 month reporting period, have you on behalf of any foreign principal engaged in political activity⁵ as defined below? Yes No

If yes, identify each such foreign principal and describe in full detail all such political activity, indicating, among other things, the relations, interests and policies sought to be influenced and the means employed to achieve this purpose. If the registrant arranged, sponsored or delivered speeches, lectures or radio and TV broadcasts, give details as to dates, places of delivery, names of speakers and subject matter.

SEE ATTACHMENT B

13. In addition to the above described activities, if any, have you engaged in activity on your own behalf which benefits your foreign principal(s)? Yes No

If yes, describe fully.

⁵ The term "political activity" means any activity that the person engaging in believes will, or that the person intends to, in any way influence any agency or official of the Government of the United States or any section of the public within the United States with reference to formulating, adopting or changing the domestic or foreign policies of the United States or with reference to political or public interests, policies, or relations of a government of a foreign country or a foreign political party.

IV - FINANCIAL INFORMATION

14. (a) RECEIPTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal, any contributions, income or money either as compensation or otherwise? Yes No

If no, explain why.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies.⁶

Date	From Whom	Purpose	Amount
10/01/2011 - 03/31/2012	Government of the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria	Services rendered under Contract Including expenses for transportation and computer research.	$210,706.23

$210,706.23

Total

(b) RECEIPTS - FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received, as part of a fundraising campaign⁷, any money on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

If yes, have you filed an Exhibit D to your registration? Yes No

If yes, indicate the date the Exhibit D was filed. Date _____

(c) RECEIPTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you received any thing of value⁹ other than money from any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement, or from any other source, for or in the interests of any such foreign principal?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Foreign Principal	Date Received	Thing of Value	Purpose
-------------------	---------------	----------------	---------

^{6, 7} A registrant is required to file an Exhibit D if he collects or receives contributions, loans, moneys, or other things of value for a foreign principal, as part of a fundraising campaign. (See Rule 201(e)).

⁸ An Exhibit D, for which no printed form is provided, sets forth an account of money collected or received as a result of a fundraising campaign and transmitted for a foreign principal.

⁹ Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks," and the like.

15. (a) DISBURSEMENTS-MONIES

During this 6 month reporting period, have you

(1) disbursed or expended monies in connection with activity on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement? Yes No

(2) transmitted monies to any such foreign principal? Yes No

If no, explain in full detail why there were no disbursements made on behalf of any foreign principal.

If yes, set forth below in the required detail and separately for each foreign principal an account of such monies, including monies transmitted, if any, to each foreign principal.

Date	To Whom	Purpose	Amount
10/01/2011 - 03/31/2012	Government of the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria	Local transportation (taxi) and computer research, Westlaw expenses	$706.23

$706.23

Total

(b) DISBURSEMENTS-THINGS OF VALUE

During this 6 month reporting period, have you disposed of anything of value¹⁰ other than money in furtherance of or in connection with activities on behalf of any foreign principal named in Items 7, 8, or 9 of this statement?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Date	Recipient	Foreign Principal	Thing of Value	Purpose
------	-----------	-------------------	----------------	---------

(c) DISBURSEMENTS-POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS

During this 6 month reporting period, have you from your own funds and on your own behalf either directly or through any other person, made any contributions of money or other things of value¹¹ in connection with an election to any political office, or in connection with any primary election, convention, or caucus held to select candidates for political office?

Yes No

If yes, furnish the following information:

Date	Amount or Thing of Value	Political Organization or Candidate	Location of Event
03/04/2012	$250.00	Kirsten Gilliband for Senate	Fundraising Event

*Personal contribution made by Janis H. Brennan

^{10, 11} Things of value include but are not limited to gifts, interest free loans, expense free travel, favored stock purchases, exclusive rights, favored treatment over competitors, "kickbacks" and the like.

V - INFORMATIONAL MATERIALS

16. (a) During this 6 month reporting period, did you prepare, disseminate or cause to be disseminated any informational materials?¹²
 Yes No

If Yes, go to Item 17.

(b) If you answered No to Item 16(a), do you disseminate any material in connection with your registration?
 Yes No

If Yes, please forward the materials disseminated during the six month period to the Registration Unit for review.

17. Identify each such foreign principal.

18. During this 6 month reporting period, has any foreign principal established a budget or allocated a specified sum of money to finance your activities in preparing or disseminating informational materials? Yes No

If yes, identify each such foreign principal, specify amount, and indicate for what period of time.

19. During this 6 month reporting period, did your activities in preparing, disseminating or causing the dissemination of informational materials include the use of any of the following:

- Radio or TV broadcasts
- Magazine or newspaper
- Motion picture films
- Letters or telegrams
- Advertising campaigns
- Press releases
- Pamphlets or other publications
- Lectures or speeches
- Other (specify) _____

Electronic Communications

- Email
- Website URL(s): _____
- Social media websites URL(s): _____
- Other (specify) _____

20. During this 6 month reporting period, did you disseminate or cause to be disseminated informational materials among any of the following groups:

- Public officials
- Newspapers
- Libraries
- Legislators
- Editors
- Educational institutions
- Government agencies
- Civic groups or associations
- Nationality groups
- Other (specify) _____

21. What language was used in the informational materials:

- English
- Other (specify) _____

22. Did you file with the Registration Unit, U.S. Department of Justice a copy of each item of such informational materials disseminated or caused to be disseminated during this 6 month reporting period? Yes No

23. Did you label each item of such informational materials with the statement required by Section 4(b) of the Act? Yes No

12 The term informational materials includes any oral, visual, graphic, written, or pictorial information or matter of any kind, including that published by means of advertising, books, periodicals, newspapers, lectures, broadcasts, motion pictures, or any means or instrumentality of interstate or foreign commerce or otherwise. Informational materials disseminated by an agent of a foreign principal as part of an activity in itself exempt from registration, or an activity which by itself would not require registration, need not be filed pursuant to Section 4(b) of the Act.

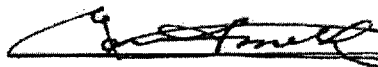

VI - EXECUTION

In accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 1746, the undersigned swear(s) or affirm(s) under penalty of perjury that he/she has (they have) read the information set forth in this registration statement and the attached exhibits and that he/she is (they are) familiar with the contents thereof and that such contents are in their entirety true and accurate to the best of his/her (their) knowledge and belief, except that the undersigned make(s) no representation as to truth or accuracy of the information contained in the attached Short Form Registration Statement(s), if any, insofar as such information is not within his/her (their) personal knowledge.

(Date of signature)

(Print or type name under each signature or provide electronic signature¹³)

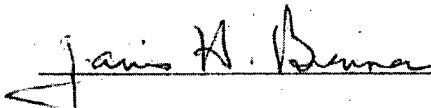

30 April 2012

30 April 2012

Gare Smith

30 April 2012

30 April 2012

Janis Brennan

2012 APR 30 PM 2:08

KSD/CES/REGISTRATION UNIT

¹³ This statement shall be signed by the individual agent, if the registrant is an individual, or by a majority of those partners, officers, directors or persons performing similar functions, if the registrant is an organization, except that the organization can, by power of attorney, authorize one or more individuals to execute this statement on its behalf.

ATTACHMENT A
Supplemental Statement
Period ending 03/31/12

FOLEY HOAG LLP
Registrant No. 4776

4. (b) Have any persons become partners, officers, directors or similar officials during this 6 month reporting period?

Yes

If yes, furnish the following information:

NAME	RESIDENCE ADDRESS	CITIZENSHIP	POSITION	DATE ASSUMED
Joubin-Brett, Anna	4 Place de Vendun Grenoble, France 38000	French	Partner	01/01/2012
Walek, David	279 South Ave. Weston, MA 02493	US	Partner	01/17/2012
Lane, Peter	20 Thoreau Circle Beverly, MA 01915	US	Director of Litigation Technology Services.	03/02/2012

ATTACHMENT B

ITEM 12 SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT period ending on 03/31/2012

Government of the People's Republic of Algeria: To promote Algeria-U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination

No. 4776

DATE	MEETINGS HELD	SUBJECT
10/04/2011	Exchanges with Mr. Tim Rieser in the office of Senator Patrick Leahy (D-VT).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
10/06/2011	Exchanges with Ms. Stephanie Hammond in the office of Congressman Trent Franks (R-AZ).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
10/07/2011	Meeting with Ms. Sharon Waxman, Senior Advisor to Under Secretary of State.	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
10/12/2011	Exchanges with Ms. Stephanie Hammond of the office of Congressman Trent Frank (R-AZ).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
11/09/2011	Exchanges with Ms. Lynn Sicade, Senior Advisor for Multinational and Global Affairs.	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
11/15/2011	Exchanges with Mr. Jason Ullner, the Algeria Desk Officer at the Department of State.	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
11/28/2011	Exchanges with Ms. Algene Sajery of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs' Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights.	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
12/02/2011	Exchanges with Ms. Elyse Anderson of the office of Congressman Frank Wolf (R-VA).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.

12/06/2011	Exchanges with Mr. Dan Baer, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights & Labor.	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
12/08/2011	Exchanges with Mr. Tom Buttry of the office of Senator Tom Harkin (D-IA).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
12/12/2011	Phone call and exchanges with Mr. Tim Rieser of the office of Senator Patrick Leahy (D-VT).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
12/15/2011	Exchanges with Ms. Elyse Anderson of the office of Congressman Frank Wolf (R-VA).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
12/20/2011	Exchanges with Mr. Tim Rieser of the office of Senator Patrick Leahy (D-VT).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
01/05/2012	Exchanges with Ms. Algene Sajery of the office of Congressman Donald Payne (D-NJ).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
01/26/2012	Exchanges with Ms. Jessica Lee of the office of Congressman Jim McDermott (D-WA).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
02/21/2012	Exchanges with Ms. Stephanie Hammond from the office of Congressman Trent Franks (R-AZ).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
02/27/2012	Exchanges with Mr. Tim Rieser of the office of Senator Patrick Leahy (D-VT).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
02/29/2012	Exchanges with Ms. Stephanie Hammond of the office of Congressman Trent Franks (R-AZ).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.

03/06/2012	Phone call with Ms. Algene Sajery of the office of Congressman Donald Payne (D-NJ).	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.
03/28/2012	Meeting with Michael Posner, Assistant Secretary of State in the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights & Labor	The promotion of Algeria- U.S. relations and respect for human rights, including the right to self-determination.

2012 APR 30 PM 2:08

NSD/CES/REGISTRATION UNIT

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, May 11, 2012 2:43 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: Fwd: US Promotion of Regional Integration in the Maghreb

We should discuss this. Obviously this is something Stu is promoting outside his representation of OCP, as a Economic expert and someone who has promoted N. African integration. State is looking to give some notice to Morocco that this may becoming out as a proposal to Morocco by the State Department and something the Economic Bureau wants to deliver for Hillary this year. We should discuss how you want to handle this as I believe it requires some thought and analysis to see how important it really is and whether it meets Moroccan interests. I'm available at your convenience to discuss more and see how you want to proceed. I am a little cautious on this one. Although in principle I know it is probably a good idea, I don't want it to interfere with your other priorities, which I'm worried could happen if it is proposed by others outside the Embassy incorrectly. Please keep this between us until we can talk further and it is nothing to worry about at this point. Ed

Sent from my iPad

Begin forwarded message:

From: "Cheek, Marney" <mcheek@cov.com>
Date: May 9, 2012 20:51:19 EDT
To: "Edward Gabriel" <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Cc: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>, "Pence, Anne" <apence@cov.com>
Subject: US Promotion of Regional Integration in the Maghreb

Ed,

As I mentioned, Stu Eizenstat understands that the State Department is considering an important initiative to promote greater economic integration -- and greater economic growth and job creation - in the Maghreb.

The proposal would focus, in part, on the Morocco FTA. The first component would be to begin discussions on regional cumulation, which is provided for in the FTA. The second component would be to liberalize some of the tariff rules for a small number of products (those in Annex 5-A of the FTA, which include figs, dates, and television parts, among other products) to make it easier for Moroccan companies and foreign investors in Morocco to achieve economies of scale by using inputs from the entire region in products ultimately destined for the U.S. market. (For example, a Moroccan company making fig jam and exporting it to the US may be able to grow its business if it also can source figs from Tunisia. Ultimately, the main value-added work of making jam would still be done in Morocco.)

We see important benefits for Morocco in these proposals. First, Morocco would serve as the hub for US trade initiatives in the region, since the FTA is the foundation for the United States' regional trade initiative. Second, these liberalized trade rules are designed to attract greater foreign direct investment, and that FDI would likely flow to Morocco. Third, Morocco for some time has wanted to see greater benefits from the FTA. There would be a renewed focus on the FTA and the U.S. Government would have an interest in promoting Morocco and the FTA to the U.S. business community (and, indeed, European and other investors as well) so that the more liberal trade rules yield results.

This is by no means an overhaul of the FTA -- most tariff rules would remain the same. But it is an effort for the State Department to create incentives for greater economic cooperation and foreign investment in the region in an incremental fashion. (Notably, the small changes envisioned would not require U.S. Congressional approval.) Finally, while we would defer to you on this, it would seem to us that there may be some political benefits to promoting greater economic ties between Morocco and its neighbors.

Please let us know if you have any questions.

Marney

Marney L. Cheek | Covington & Burling LLP
1201 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W. | Washington, D.C. 20004
Tel: (202) 662-5267 | Fax: (202) 778-5267
mcheek@cov.com

This message is from a law firm and may contain information that is confidential or legally privileged. If you are not the intended recipient, please immediately advise the sender by reply e-mail that this message has been inadvertently transmitted to you and delete this e-mail from your system. Thank you for your cooperation.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, May 14, 2012 3:39 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: Jordan Paul
Subject: FW: Language

Rachad,

Good news. The language stays as originally reported to us by the House Committee, plus they added additional language on census and resettlement. See below. The Full committee markup is on Thursday. After Thursday the language cannot be changed until the conference committee, which follows Senate action and will most likely convene in the Fall. So, we only have two days before our language is solidly in the House bill. We will send to you today talking points and the contacts for two House Members, Chairman Rogers and Ranking member Dicks of the Full Appropriations Committee, suggesting that you simply thank each member for the inclusion of the language in the house subcommittee bill. You will not have to lobby, but rather simply let them know of your gratitude for inclusion in the House bill. Please call me at your convenience and I can walk you through this in more detail. Ed

Under Title I, Department of State.

Western Sahara—The Committee is concerned about the growing acts of violence and terrorism in the Sahel region in North Africa and the rising influence of Al Qaeda across North Africa. Additionally, Al Qaeda's growing ties with members of the Polisario, residents of Tindouf camps, and other militants in the region highlight the importance of redoubling diplomatic efforts to resolve the longstanding dispute over the Western Sahara, which can lessen the political unrest and economic crises that resulted from the conflict and the resolution of the protracted refugee situation in Algeria. The Committee recommends the Secretary of State treat as a more urgent priority a negotiated settlement to the dispute, based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty and work with the parties of the conflict, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (UNHCR), and other relevant international partners to reach a durable solution, including a census, refugee resettlement, and/or voluntary repatriation.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, May 15, 2012 9:32 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: Jordan Paul
Subject: Talking points for calls with Congressmen Rogers and Dicks
Attachments: HAC_HaroldRogers_Memo2012.doc; HAC_NormanDicks_Memo2012.doc

Attached for your use are talking points to two members of Congress. Since they are addressing literally trillions of dollars in various appropriations measures for both the Defense and State appropriations, it will be difficult to draw their attention to our language. Most likely, they will now even know about our language. It is best that you simply thank them if you can get them on the phone. Usually they will return your calls later in the day. If they don't it is only because with the markup they are exceptionally busy.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

TO: Ambassador Bouhlal

FR: Ed Gabriel, MAC team

RE: Phone Call with Rep. Hal Rogers (R-KY) regarding the House Foreign Operations Bill

The number for the office of Chairman Rogers is 202-225-4601.

Most of the time, the Congressman will not be available and will call back later in the day.

Background

Rep. Hal Rogers is a Republican from Kentucky. Rep. Rogers is Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee and the most powerful person on the Committee. He has a reputation as a skillful insider with significant influence over a wide range of areas.

He was born in rural Kentucky and has represented the 5th district for 13 terms, making him the longest serving Kentucky republican ever elected to federal office.

Rep. Rogers has been a consistent supporter of Morocco. He visited Morocco when Ed Gabriel was serving as US Ambassador in Rabat. He has sent a staffer on the Congressional Staff Delegation to Morocco. In 2004 he voted in favor of the Free Trade Agreement. In 2007 and 2009 he signed both House letters supporting the Moroccan Autonomy plan.

As a strong supporter of Morocco and resolving the dispute over the Western Sahara based on Autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty, Rep. Rogers should be supportive of the report language.

Rep. Rogers has a very busy week as they are marking up 4 of the biggest Appropriations bills (Homeland, Defense, and Military Construction, in addition to our bill) and will likely not want to talk for a long time. Rep. Rogers will want to hear that this language has the support of key Republicans on the subcommittee like Kay Granger and Mario Diaz-Balart.

Goal

To Thank Chairman Rogers for his support over the years and thank him for the positive report language that was included by the Subcommittee.

Talking Points

- Thank Chairman Rogers for his support over the years.

- Thank him for the positive language that was included by the Subcommittee under the leadership of Republican Chairwoman Granger and Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart on the issue of resolving the Western Sahara based. MAKE SURE to use the correct member reference above for each call you make. One of the talking points references the Republican member who helped us, the other references the Democratic member who helped us.
- Morocco very much appreciates this attention from the Congress and we believe your actions will prove very helpful to security and stability in the region.
- If he asks for more information you can explain how the positive report language notes how the deteriorating security situation makes it imperative to resolve the dispute over the Western Sahara based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty.
- Resolving the dispute based on Autonomy/Sovereignty is the long time position of Chairman Rogers, the Congress (House and Senate Majorities) and both President Bush and President Obama. AND MOROCCO SUPPORTS THIS US POSITION.
- The language also emphasizes the need to resolve protracted refugee issue posed by the refugee camps that have been run by the Polisario for over 35 years by conducting a census of who is living there and working on programs that emphasize resettlement outside of the camps.
- Thank him again for all of his support and for this important language.

TO: Ambassador Bouhlal

FR: Ed Gabriel, MAC team

RE: Phone Call with Rep. Norman Dicks (D-WA)

The number for the office of Rep. Dicks is 202-225-5916.

Most of the time, the Congressman will not be available and will call back later in the day.

Background

Rep. Norman Dicks is the Ranking Member of the full Appropriations Committee from the state of Washington. He represents Washington's 6th congressional district, located in the northwestern corner of the state. He is a tireless advocate for environmental conservation and defense policy, as Boeing is a major employer in his district. He was first elected to Congress in 1976. He recently announced that he will not be running for reelection.

Rep. Dicks is a reliable supporter of Morocco. He signed both the 2007 and the 2009 Congressional letters in support of the Moroccan Autonomy Plan, and also voted in favor of the 2006 Free Trade Agreement. He is a long time friend of Ed Gabriel.

Rep. Dicks has a very busy week as they are marking up 4 of the biggest Appropriations bills (Homeland, Defense, and Military Construction, in addition to our bill) and will likely not want to talk for a long time. As the Ranking Member, it will be important to him to know that the policy recommendation (resolve based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty) is also the policy of the Obama administration

Goal

To Thank Ranking Member Dicks for his support over the years and thank him for the positive report language that was included by the Subcommittee.

Talking Points

- Thank Chairman Dicks for his support over the years.
- Thank him for the positive language that was included by the Subcommittee on the issue of resolving the Western Sahara based. Also note that we always enjoy working with Rep. Lowey (the Ranking Member -Democrat- on the Subcommittee). MAKE SURE to use the correct member reference above for each call you make. One of the talking points references the Republican member who helped us, the other references the Democratic member who helped us.

- Morocco very much appreciates this attention from the Congress and we believe your actions will prove very helpful to restore regional security and stability.
- If he asks for more information you can explain how the positive report language notes how the deteriorating security situation makes it imperative to resolve the dispute over the Western Sahara based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty.
- Resolving the dispute based on Autonomy/Sovereignty is the long time position of Ranking Member Dicks, the Congress (House and Senate Majorities) and President Obama, President Bush, and President Clinton. AND MOROCCO SUPPORTS THIS US POSITION.
- The language also emphasizes the need to resolve protracted refugee issue posed by the refugee camps that have been run by the Polisario for over 35 years by conducting a census of who is living there and working on programs that emphasize resettlement outside of the camps.
- Thank him again for all of his support and for this important language.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 16, 2012 11:20 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Excellent news: House Report Language - Public

Below are the two sections that apply to Morocco in the House Foreign Operations Report which will go before the full Committee tomorrow at 10. The report language on the Western Sahara we knew about but it is now public. More importantly, the House also put in funding for FMF for Morocco, which is terrific news, which is thanks in large part to Congresspersons Granger, Lowey and Diaz-Balart. This provides an excellent opportunity to strike down Leahy language in conference as the House has now spoken definitively on FMF funding. We still have to get through the House full committee markup tomorrow but things are looking very good. Then the next step will be to protect the House language in conference after the Senate passes language. We will next try to get the Senate to be more favorable so that their final bill will be more pro-Morocco when it gets to the conference committee.

Western Sahara.—The Committee is concerned about the growing acts of violence and terrorism in the Sahel region in North Africa and the rising influence of Al Qaeda across North Africa. Additionally, Al Qaeda's growing ties with members of the Polisario, residents of the Tindouf camps, and other militants in the region highlight the importance of redoubling diplomatic efforts to resolve the longstanding dispute over the Western Sahara, which can lessen the political unrest and economic crises that resulted from the conflict and the resolution of the protracted refugee situation in Algeria. The Committee recommends the Secretary of State treat as a more urgent priority a negotiated settlement to the dispute, based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty and work with the parties of the conflict, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), and other relevant international partners to reach a durable solution, including a census, refugee resettlement, and/or voluntary repatriation.

FOREIGN MILITARY FINANCING PROGRAM

Morocco.—The Committee supports not less than $8,000,000 for Morocco, which is the same as the request. The Committee supports making additional funds available for Morocco from funds described under Middle East Response under this heading, subject to the regular notification procedures of the Committees on Appropriations.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 16, 2012 11:23 AM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: FW: Speaker Boehner Appoints Elliott Abrams to the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom

FYI

This can only help Morocco. This is the commission that investigated Morocco after the Christian expulsions. Nothing happened with that investigation. Still it always helps to have another ally if anything were to come before the commission.

Subject: Speaker Boehner Appoints Elliott Abrams to the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom

Posted by Speaker Boehner Press Office

May 15, 2012

Press Release

WASHINGTON, DC - House Speaker John Boehner (R-OH) issued the following release announcing his appointment of Elliott Abrams to the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom:

"Elliott Abrams is an honorable public servant who has served the American people with integrity and distinction. I am pleased to announce his appointment to the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, where I am confident he will be a strong advocate for people throughout the world who are facing oppression and coercion for their faith. The free exercise of religion is a fundamental right our Founding Fathers acknowledged in the Constitution. They viewed this individual right as superior to any tyrannical action of government.

Preserving this sacred right the last two centuries is why the persecuted people of the world look to America as the brightest beacon of freedom.

"The commission's goal is to highlight serious threats to religious liberty throughout the world so the President and Congress can make measured and wise decisions in response. The work of the commission is as important now as it ever has been. Americans and their representatives in Washington must have the best possible information as we form our foreign policies. I want to acknowledge the valuable service of outgoing commissioner Ted Van Der Meid, who has been a steadfast voice for religious liberty."

NOTE: Elliott Abrams is a lawyer and foreign policy expert who served in the administrations of Presidents Ronald Reagan and George W. Bush.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 16, 2012 4:31 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Cc: Jordan Paul
Subject: Talkers for Senator Inouye
Attachments: SAC_Daniellnouye_Memo2012.doc

Please see attached. This is a very important phone call. See you tomorrow. Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

TO: Ambassador Bouhlal

FR: Ed Gabriel, MAC team

RE: Phone Call with Senator Daniel Inouye (D-HI) regarding FMF assistance to Morocco

We believe the Senate may mark up the Senate Foreign Ops bill as early as May 22 (our best information), the day before your meeting with Sen. Inouye. We are not optimistic about the bill and are concerned that Sen. Leahy will continue to try and condition FMF assistance to Morocco.

As Sen. Leahy is the Subcommittee Chairman, he is in charge of drafting the bill and it is very difficult to put any pressure on him. In fact, the only person in any real position to help keep the FMF restrictions out of the bill is Sen. Inouye – the Chairman of the full committee.

His phone number is 202-224-3934

Most of the time, the Chairman will not be available and will call back later in the day. It is very important that you persist to get a phone call conversation with him before COB Friday.

Background

Senator Daniel Inouye is a Democrat from Hawaii. He was first elected to the U.S. Senate in 1962 and is the most senior member of the US Senate. Sen. Inouye is decorated WW II War hero and has strong views on minority and human rights stemming from his own personal history and advocacy for justice for Japanese-Americans following WW II.

Senator Inouye is the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, which oversees all discretionary spending legislation in the Senate. He is the only member of the Senate with the ability pressure Sen. Leahy into removing FMF restrictions in the first draft of the bill. As subcommittee Chairman, Sen. Leahy has a large amount of autonomy on producing the draft and only Sen. Inouye as full committee Chairman can exert any pressure on Sen. Leahy.

The Senator is very supportive of Morocco. In 2004, he sent his staffer Charlie Houy, on a Senate Appropriations Congressional Delegation to Morocco. That same year Senator Inouye voted in favor of the Free Trade Agreement. In 2010 he, along with a bipartisan majority of 54 US Senators, signed a letter to Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, urging her to make the resolution of the Western Sahara stalemate a US foreign policy priority in North Africa.

It is unlikely that Sen. Inouye will be aware of the FMF issue. He will need to be educated on why the FMF is being conditioned and how it affects the US-Morocco bilateral relationship.

While Sen. Inouye will likely be sympathetic to our concerns it will be difficult to convince him to overrule Sen. Leahy. That is a strategic decision for him and it will need to be balanced against his other priorities with Sen. Leahy. It is still important to brief him on this issue. This way, even if he decides not to help us early in the process, he will be aware of the issue and can help us when this bill goes into conference later in the year.

GOAL

To convince Sen. Inouye to protect Morocco's FMF funding from any restrictions in the Senate Foreign Operation Bill.

Talking Points

Thank Sen. Inouye for his previous support for Morocco over the years and for signing the 54 signature Senate letter in 2010

Explain that last year, the final appropriations bill condition all of Morocco's FMF assistance ($10 million) until the Department State produced a report on the positive steps Morocco is taking to improve human right conditions in the Western Sahara

Sen. Leahy has long requested an additional report on steps Morocco is taking to further protect human rights throughout Morocco and of course this is the prerogative of any Senator and regular business between branches of the American Government.

Morocco is, of course, supportive of any report requested by a Senator from the State Department, but strongly opposes having our military support delayed. Last year Morocco's FMF funding became a part of this debate.

Morocco uses this FMF funding to purchase American military hardware, including $2.5 billion in F-16s and tanks produced by General Dynamic. Morocco views these purchases as strengthening the important economic and military relationship between our countries. These purchases also enhance the interoperability of our military forces during joint training sessions and foreign missions.

We are concerned that something like last year may be included again this year and would like to work with you to eliminate any FMF restrictions.

Morocco is strategic partner of the US in the region, on the UN Security Council, and as well as leader in the North Africa in the Arab Spring.

Morocco is leader on human rights in the region and has been used as an example by Sec. Clinton and other members of the Obama Administration.

These FMF restrictions severely and adversely affect the bilateral relationship because it directly affects the close military relationship and bilateral relationship. Morocco will take such restrictions as an affront to its long cooperative relationship with the United States.

We need your support on this issue.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, May 17, 2012 3:06 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: April Event Report Bulletin

Below please find the April 2012 MAC Events Bulletin. Our team compiles a monthly list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

April 2012 Events Bulletin

April 3

The Western Sahara Crisis: Why US Leadership is Needed Now

April 4

Morocco - The Challenges of Democratic Reform

April 5

Islamists in Power: Views from Within

April 11

Western Sahara Conference & Essay Contest Award Ceremony

April 18

Climate Change, Migration, and Security: Challenges and Policy Options in Northwest Africa

April 23

The Arab Spring, a Year On: How's America Faring?

April 24

Lord's Resistance Army, Boko Haram, AQIM, and Other Sources of Instability in Africa

April 24

The Political Economy of the 'Maghreb Spring' and its Aftermath

.....

The Western Sahara Crisis: Why Us Leadership is Needed Now

Date: 3 April 2012

1. Title: The Western Sahara Crisis: Why Us Leadership is Needed Now

Hosted by the Moroccan American Center for Policy

Participants:

Michael Ussery: Former US Ambassador to Morocco

Dr. J. Peter Pham: Director, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, The Atlantic Council

Robert Holley: Senior Adviser, Moroccan American Center

Jean AbiNader: Moderator: Senior Adviser, Moroccan American Center

2. Overview

Foreign policy experts and former US diplomats participated in a roundtable focused on the urgent need for concrete US action in support of its long-standing policy for a solution to the Western Sahara conflict based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty—a policy backed by the Clinton, Bush and Obama Administrations and reiterated by bipartisan majorities of both the US House and Senate. Now, more than ever, according to the panel, the Western Sahara dispute contributes to instability in the Sahara/Sahel region—home to deteriorating humanitarian conditions for Sahrawi refugees and an increasingly volatile security situation.

3. Summary

Jean AbiNader introduced the speakers and reviewed the evolution of American foreign policy since the 1980s, which saw priorities shift from Cold War security issues to a greater diversity of regional economic and political disputes. AbiNader argued that America has an opportunity to help the Tindouf refugees while simultaneously stabilizing the increasingly worrisome security atmosphere in North Africa.

Michael Ussery focused on the deterioration of the refugee camps themselves, noting that some of those born in the camps years ago are now grandparents, a condition that Ussery deemed unacceptable. He emphasized that it is in the interest of the United States to encourage an improvement in refugee conditions for humanitarian and security reasons, reiterating that the Western Sahara issue is the key stumbling block to an Arab Maghreb Union that would fully realize the region's economic potential. Noting that international attention has been diverted elsewhere, Amb. Ussery lamented that, even during his time at the State Department, when the crisis was far more violent, the conflict was never considered one of the top twenty-five most important foreign policy issues facing the country. Ussery argued that any solution must now come from the top down, as the US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue and the Autonomy Plan should be addressed hand in hand. He concluded by outlining specific steps that Washington could take: embracing the Autonomy Plan at the MINURSO renewal in April and opening up the Western Sahara to US development aid.

AbiNader commented that the State Department appears to be the main obstacle to such initiatives, and Amb. Ussery agreed that such policies amount to tying our hands behind our backs when it comes to addressing political, security, and commercial interests. He clarified that in the Western Sahara, the US is blocking itself, while in Tindouf, Algeria remains the primary impediment to securing improvements for the Sahrawi people.

Dr. J. Peter Pham expressed concern that the Sahel, the bridge that connects all of Africa, has in many places become occupied by al-Qaeda offshoots that are increasingly more pragmatic in their operations and local relationships. They are eschewing ideological rigidity for whatever is effective. He cited the example of a 2009 kidnapping that was contracted out by AQIM to a former Polisario member and smuggler, who dutifully assembled a so-called "A-Team" to carry out the operation. This man was not connected to al-Qaeda and did not share its ideology, but the militants hired him because they were in desperate straits and were seeking financial support through ransom. Dr. Pham called this the new modus operandi in the region—criminal groups of all persuasions cooperating to overcome the challenges inherent to operating in a desolate environment. He referenced the Tuareg rebellion in Mali, where the nationalist Azawad Front has aligned with two radical Islamist groups in its conquest of northern territory.

Turning to the humanitarian crisis in Tindouf, Dr. Pham said that while the refugees have few prospects for a better life, the one thing many of them have is military training, which if combined with arms from Libya's weapons depots, could empower militant groups that recruit from the camps. Dr. Pham likened the situation to Afghanistan in 2001, when American policymakers ignored a clear and present danger until it was too late. Ultimately, terrorists require territory and basic infrastructure with which to operate, and the Sahel is fast becoming al-Qaeda's new safe haven as members flee the US offensive in South Asia and the Arabian Peninsula. Dr. Pham suggested that, should the West fail to counter these extremists in the Sahel, the world could see the Mali drama repeated elsewhere.

Robert Holley opened with a discussion of Peter van Walsum, who, in his last report to the UN Secretary General, lamented that the Polisario leaders, who do not reside in the Tindouf camps, propagate the notion that the Sahrawi refugees prefer "to stay there indefinitely rather than accept a negotiated solution that falls short of independence." Holley then detailed his many interviews with Sahrawis that escaped the camps, most of whom left family behind. Nearly all of the refugees informed him that if he carries only one message home to American leaders, it should be to emphasize their desire to reunite with their loved ones. They also told him that many in the camps expressed interest in returning to the Western Sahara without a guarantee of independence. The situation in Tindouf, said Holley, is the only refugee situation where the victims can return home without the threat of death or persecution. The dilemma is therefore offering the refugees freedom of movement and a choice, to which the Polisario and Algeria remain an obstacle. Holley explained that American leaders should back up their overwhelming support for the Autonomy Plan with actions, push international agencies to implement programs that give Sahrawi refugees a right of return, and decouple the politics of the Western Sahara conflict from the humanitarian aspects of the camps.

4. Q & A

Q: What is in it [solving the Sahara conflict] for the Polisario?

A: (Holley) You have people in the area who have learned to become practical. If you're providing assistance to thousands of people, which the international community has done for 25 years, and you only have 40,000 or 50,000 people there, you can imagine what is happening to the extra resources. If you do not have a real economy beyond contraband, international aid is a huge source of income for the Polisario and its partners. That is the practical reason. Politically, if you think the legitimacy of your cause is based on making people believe that these refugees do not want to leave until they get their independence, then that is the point for not letting them leave. Allowing them to leave detracts from that argument.

(Ussery) The people in the camps are somewhere between being pawns and prisoners, and over time the situation has become quite severe. There are forces outside the camps that are saying it is in the refugees' best interest for them to stay where they are as victims.

(Pham) The African Union engages in this charade that the Polisario is a country, with a flag and a seat on the AU, receiving all the resources that come from that, with no obligation to deliver resources to anybody in return because the international community takes care of that for them. So, what benefit is it to the Algerians? If you think about the Arab Spring, these dictators are gone or on trial, and the one place that has not had a reform or revolution is Algeria. If this issue goes away, how do you explain to your populace that after all the years you have spent on this crisis it has suddenly disappeared like a mirage in the desert? It would be a huge blow to the legitimacy of the Algerian regime.

Q: If I am Assistant Secretary of State, for example, and want to use the tools I have to bring closure to this, what do I have to offer to Algeria?

A: (Pham) If the Malians crumble, Algeria is next, so I hope they pick up on the alarm. Over the years the US has done several things. One, we have accepted that they have swept many things under the rug. We covered up for them on the Libya issue and their involvement with Qaddafi. It is time to be candid with them, and tell them that if they try to isolate Morocco, we will no longer overlook these kind of actions. The other thing is the money. Taxpayers should be appalled that we are contributing a third of the cost for maintaining these refugee camps. Then there is the problem of the African Union itself. It has undergone admirable development since its formation, which was evident in how it reacted to the Mali coup. On the other hand, it cannot go around pretending that the Polisario is a country because that damages its credibility. Morocco should put in more effort to get invited back to the AU. At the same time, the AU is weaker without Morocco, and that is Africa's loss. So I think it is time for the AU to reexamine itself, and as a friend, the US should be able to tell them that.

Q: (AbiNader) What are the carrots or sticks the US can wield to induce cooperation from Algeria?

A: (Ussery) Algeria used to be the go-to country in the Arab and African world if you needed a clever, practical mediator. They were invited to be at almost every international table. So I do not know the answer, whether we need to leverage our position with other UNSC members and start from there, or at least have good dialogue at that level and make it an inescapable reality.

(Holley) Leveraging the Algerians requires two things. One, the status quo in the region is changing, which will hopefully serve as a wakeup call for those governments to change their vision for the future, otherwise they're going to face the same fate as some of the others in the region. But from my view, the single most important thing we could do to leverage Algerian policy specifically is to start to behave as though we believe in the policy we say we have. We have to actually do things that provide others with the impression that we mean what we say on the issue. In this case, we have three administrations back to back that support a solution that would leave Morocco sovereign, while granting broad autonomy. We have broad bipartisan support in Congress, and yet we have done nothing other than to restate our policy. Once we start aiding development in the territory, or conditioning aid in ways that promote durable solutions and refugee rights, then others will believe the US actually holds to this policy and means what it says.

Q: (Amb. Ed Gabriel) The question I have is how do we take America's stated policy and turn it into implementation? Mike said, if it is not in the top 25 issues, it will not get there. So how do you get the US to have a sustained effort to fix this thing and implement its policy?

A: (Ussery) I have hope that our Secretary of State Clinton still has the energy and stamina to get this thing at least kicked off, including getting some dialogue going with other UNSC members. We have to get down there and get active on the ground. We need to bring inevitability to the Sahara issue. Once we tip one way, the other side will have to accept that it will never be their way. So if we do what we can unilaterally, and then we bring in the UNSC members, that does not exactly speed things up, but it helps us from going backwards.

(Pham) I would add that we are going to be sending a new Ambassador out there in the next seven months, and so one small step would be the instructions given to him or her. In the confirmation hearings, the question should be asked whether they will go out and engage. Everyone is in favor of talking - we even talk to people who shoot at us - but we never move on these issues. Then there is the budget cycle and the appropriations language, so we just need to keep pushing on.

(Holley) You have to do things that are visible and tangible, or else people will continue to harbor doubts. The reputation of American foreign policy in terms of commitments is what it is. But when you begin to do things that people actually see, they are more inclined to believe what you say. So we might provide local technical assistance to government officials as Morocco transitions more authority to local elected officials, or help local NGOs build capacity for development or education policy, or make EXIM bank funds available for exploitation in industries in the territory. Those are visible things that people can actually see. The same thing applies in the camps. If we say to people we think refugees ought to be given a choice, then we should make money available to the UNCHR for resettlement grants and voluntary repatriation programs. When people see you are following your own policy, you have a greater chance of persuading people to go along with that policy, as opposed to questioning our commitment.

Q: What are the wider implications of the existence of these camps, and how are they destabilizing the region? Is there any real threat to US interests?

A: (Pham) There is an emerging body of evidence that people recruited from the camps, or veterans of the Polisario military, have engaged in kidnappings for ransom in the name of AQIM. Governments in the region have leveled accusations of people being recruited to engage in drug trafficking or contraband, which of course has its own negative consequences. So you have a pool of people who are hopeless, who have no other options, whose only skills involve weapons, and then someone comes along and offers to hire them for those skills. No one ever sets out in life and says, "I really want to be a drug mule across the Sahara," but if that is the only option, it is an understandable choice. The military commander of the Azawad movement was a colonel in the Libyan military, which shows that when you combine the aftermath of the Libya conflict with this pool of potential recruits, there is a real chance for continued instability.

Q: We have heard a lot about the claims of human rights abuses in the Tindouf refugee camps, but if there are no human rights abuses in the Western Sahara, why will the government of Morocco not allow free access to various monitoring entities?

A: (Holley) Morocco has made the Western Sahara open to every single one of the 34 special rapporteurs from the UN Human Rights Commission. This is not an issue. There are no international human rights organizations that are being denied entry into either Morocco or the Moroccan Sahara, and they come frequently, and talk to whomever it is they want to talk to. It is like asking a special rapporteur to come investigate in the United States. If you are talking about places that are closed to the human rights community, such as North Korea, Cuba, or the Polisario camps, then maybe you do need to take some special measures. But when talking about places where any human rights organizations are welcome to go, this question is kind of a red-herring.

5. Observation

The event was attended by approximately 30 policymakers and journalists. It made a strong case for US leadership on the Western Sahara crisis, which if left unresolved could exacerbate the increasingly tenuous security situation in North Africa. The participants expressed optimism that the current administration, through the State Department, could lay the foundation for improving the lives of the refugees, although all present were skeptical that a lasting political solution was imminent or even within reach. The connections between al-Qaeda and the Polisario remained sketchy and seem to be handled mostly through criminal interlocutors.

\(Back to top\)

Morocco – The Challenges of Democratic Reform

Date: 4 April 2012

1. Title: Morocco – The Challenges of Democratic Reform

Hosted by CSIS

Participant:

H.E. Mustapha Khalfi: Minister of Communication, Kingdom of Morocco

Jon Alterman: Director, Middle East Center, CSIS

2. Overview

While revolutionary change has brought Islamists to rule in several Middle Eastern countries, it was evolutionary change that brought Islamists into government in Morocco after more than a decade in opposition. The country's own future trajectory and its inspirational power for other religious opposition movements in the Middle East remain the subjects of considerable debate. Minister Khalfi discussed why Morocco's third way – between revolution and retaining the status quo, resulted from unique conditions in the kingdom.

3. Summary

Minister Khalfi noted that Morocco's response to the Arab Spring was a result of reforms that had been instituted over the past six years, and others going back even further, to Youssefi's time as prime minister. There were two views anchoring perceptions of the King's reform agenda in response to the February 20th movement: from skeptical to positive. The period between February 20th and the election of November 25th was a competition between these views. The election results showed that Moroccans want a serious and credible democracy. Although the new constitution is not ideal and won't radically reshape the political system, it provides many opportunities in its implementation that reflect the King's speech of March 9th in which he talked about equality, justice, accountability, and other values to be incorporated into the new constitution.

The Minister elaborated by defining three factors which explain Morocco as an exception: the monarchy's leadership role that enhances credibility and stability; the existence of political parties, including the opposition, which gave them experience in building coalitions; and the role of civil society, which, in fact, often promotes issues before the political parties accept them as part of their agendas.

He listed four challenges facing the new government. First of all, implementing the constitution including power-sharing, expansion of freedoms and liberty, regionalization - the key to solving the Western Sahara problem, and good governance, including reforming the judiciary, accountability, and transparency - the key to building citizen trust. Passing new legislation for the local elections to be held in the fall is the next challenge. It is necessary to succeed in reconciling people with politics, i.e. make them believe that the process works for them. The goal is to facilitate the emergence of new local elites who will work with the youth. The third challenge is the need to resolve social and economic problems, especially poverty, which in some areas is twice the national average. Related to this is dealing with the impact of the European financial crisis, which affects tourism and exports. All of this impacts the overwhelming need to create hundreds of thousands of jobs to both absorb existing unemployed and the 150,000 annual new entrants to the job market. The Government of Morocco has established a public-private partnership to address this challenge and to build an educational system that prepares people for the job market. Finally, Minister Khalfi mentioned the growing positive environment for closer regional cooperation, which would also lead to resolving the Western Sahara crisis.

The Minister provided specific examples throughout his presentation of actions being undertaken by the new government to deal with these challenges and the changing political environment in Morocco.

4. Q & A

Q: (Jon Alterman) Given Adl al Ihsan’s opposition to the monarchy, what is the future for Islamic politics in Morocco - greater diversity or cooperation?

A: Both are happening at the same time. The key challenge for all Islamist parties is to link Islam and democracy. Islamists have to decide whether or not to be part of the political party system.

Q: (Karim Mezran, the Atlantic Council) How will decentralization lead to solving the Western Sahara crisis?

A: The constitution provides for regionalization in all matters: budget, administration, and social and cultural policies. Regionalization provides a means for the transition from the current situation to autonomy.

Q: How are women’s rights being protected in Morocco?

A: The basic protection and rights of women are already enshrined in the moudawana. The constitution calls for full equality and that is part of our national agenda, adopted by parliament. A national watchdog has been proposed to protect women’s rights by monitoring what is going on and if targets are being achieved.

Q: (Haim Malka, CSIS) How can you manage people’s expectations for rapid change?

A: People want concrete results. Transparency is the key. In conflict areas, the government is encouraging open dialogue with all stakeholders. I expect that the passing of budget by mid-April will enable the government to accelerate efforts to reduce poverty, expand healthcare coverage, and promote other economic and social development projects.

5. Observation

Forty representatives from various NGOs, including Eric Goldstein from HRW, and think tanks participated in the program. The Minister spoke eloquently, thoughtfully, and credibly about the challenges facing the government as it works to implement the new constitution. He gave multiple examples of what the government has proposed, which strengthened his case. He was strongly behind the autonomy solution for the Western Sahara and the role of the King in providing indispensable leadership and continuity. He directly answered the questions on the future of Islamists and democracy and the prospects for women and minorities, and he provided many examples of what can be done to implement the various sections of the constitution. He is definitely a formidable resource. It is imperative that we track what is going on in parliament in the coming months to have credible talking points on Morocco’s reform agenda.

\(Back to top\)

Islamists in Power: Views from Within

Date: 5 April 2012

1. Title: Islamists in Power: Views from Within

Hosted by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Panel 1:

Building New Regimes After the Uprising

Panelists:

Mustapha Elkhalfi: Minister of Communications, Justice and Development Party, the Kingdom of Morocco

Abdul Mawgoud Rageh Dardery: Member of Parliament, Freedom and Justice Party, Egypt

Nabil Alkofahi: Head of International Relations, Muslim Brotherhood, the Kingdom of Jordan

Sahbi Atig: Member of National Constituent Assembly, Ennahda, Tunisia

Marwan Muasher: Moderator: Vice President for Studies, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Panel 2:

Writing a New Constitution

Panelists:

Khaled Al-Qazzaz: Foreign Relations Coordinator, Freedom and Justice Party, Egypt

Osama Al Saghir: Member of National Constituent Assembly, Ennahda, Tunisia

Mohamed Gaair: Head of Public Relations, Muslim Brotherhood, Libya

Nathan Brown: Moderator: Nonresident Senior Associate, Middle East Program, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Panel 3:
Economic Challenges of Transition

Panelists:

Hussein Elkazzaz: Managing Director and Co-Found, SKOPOS Consulting, Egypt

Mondher Ben Ayed: President and CEO of TMI and Oradist, Tunisia

Nael Al-Masalha: Chairman and Director of Al-Essra Hospital, Jordan

Masoon Ahmed: Moderator: Director, Middle East and Central Asia Department, International Monetary Fund

2. Overview

Islamist parties have emerged as the strongest contenders in recent elections in Tunisia, Egypt, and Morocco, and are likely to continue to do well in future elections in other countries. It is clear that Islamist parties will have a dominant impact on the outcome of Arab transitions, but there is little understanding in Washington of what that will mean for governing. This political reality raises many challenges and questions about the future of politics in the Arab World: how strong of a role will religion play in government? How will Islamists groups address the issue of individual freedoms, particularly those of women? Will Islamists respect the outcome of future elections even if they don't win? What are their strategies for reducing unemployment and how business-friendly will the new economic environment be? On April 5, high-level representatives of Islamist parties from Egypt, Tunisia, Morocco, Jordan, and Libya participated in a one-day conference convened by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace to address these questions.

3. Summary

Panel 1:

Marwan Muasher opened the first panel by detailing two types of reform in the Arab world in the past year – reform from above in order to avoid transition and regime change, as was the case in Morocco and Jordan; and reform with regime change, as was the case in Egypt and Tunisia. He then asked the participants to respond to the following questions about governance in the aftermath of reform: What will be the rights of women and minorities in the new political system? How will Islamist parties address economic challenges? What does an Islamic state look like? Before turning the conversation over to the panelists, Muasher underscored that all parties should be committed to pluralism and, not exclude Islamist parties.

Sahbi Atig stressed that Ennahda was committed to a true democratic system and sought to link Islamic values with modernity. Recent elections were the first time that Tunisians had the opportunity to express their will at the ballot box and the result was that all parties were included in the Constituent Assembly, a reflection of the diverse reality of Tunisian society. Going forward, governance will be done by consensus. Numerous committees have been set up to address issues of governance, national reconciliation, and a new constitution; and all parties are represented on these committees. Atig noted that there is no contradiction between Islam and democracy or between Islam and rights. Islam and Arabism will form the foundation of the Tunisian state, but individual freedoms will be respected and upheld. The key is to guarantee that dictatorship will never return to Tunisia by creating a civil state, an independent judiciary, and an independent commission to provide oversight for free and fair elections. Turning to the new constitution, Atig noted that sharia will provide legal references for it, but that there will be other sources of law as well – these issues are currently being debated among all parties. Beyond the challenges of governance and reconciliation, Atig detailed Tunisia's economic challenges, namely attracting domestic and foreign investments in the aftermath of the revolution. He concluded by calling for transitional justice and accountability to address both the political and economic ruptures of the past.

Abdul Mawgoud Rageh Dardery argued that the problem in Egypt was not the failure of a dictator, but the culture of dictatorship. Living in a free society is difficult and requires intellectual and psychological preparation – it is therefore going to take time to witness a sea change in Egyptians' views of governance. Dardery detailed the recent elections, noting that they were free and fair, that there was 65% turnout, that over twenty different parties won, and that although the Freedom and Justice Party won 40% of the vote, it does not control all committees. On the contrary, since the government represents the wealth of Egyptian society, the party underscored that representatives from all parties must be present on the committees. After the parliamentary vote, the vote for the Shura Council took place, in which the Freedom and Justice party received more than 50% of the vote. Again, the party did not think of this as a majority, as the government is required to represent all Egyptians. Next comes the drafting of a constitution. Because it belongs to all people and lasts forever, Dardery noted that all parties will be involved in the drafting.

Examining questions of governance, Dardery outlined the basic tenets of the Freedom and Justice Party's views on the overall system. First, it wants a balance between the presidential and parliamentary systems. Second, it believes in a civil state. Third, Islamic principles and Islamic sharia will be the basis of law - there is no debate about this in Egypt as there is in Tunisia. That said, Dardery asked people to look beyond the specifics of sharia to the overall objective - democracy, freedom, and rule of law. He then spoke about the challenges of the party's relationship with the Military Council, noting that he was not in favor of a theocracy, but neither was he in favor of a military-industrial system. Regardless of the debates over governance, all Egyptians must work to change from a culture of repression to a culture of human dignity and Egypt will only be able to reach that goal with the participation of all of its citizens.

Mustapha Elkhalfi presented what Muasher termed the "third way" of reform - neither an overthrow of the old system nor the continuation of the status quo. Rather, a serious and sustained process of reform within the framework of the monarchy. Muasher questioned whether or not reform from above could work and Elkhalfi presented his defense of the third way. He detailed the importance of reform without any instability and the key role of the King in previous reforms such as the Equity and Reconciliation Commission and the reform of the family code. Now Morocco is moving toward a second generation of political reforms. Elkhalfi noted the role of the youth movement in mobilizing civil society and the political parties to demand an end to corruption and authoritarianism. He likewise noted the response of the King on March 9th, which offered a renewed commitment to good governance and a real elected government. Although at the beginning critics argued that the reformers were limited and/or superficial, the reforms passed the first test of the March 9th speech - the referendum on the new constitution, which enshrined a bill of rights, good governance, rule of law, and transparency into Moroccan law.

Turning to Morocco's recent elections, which Elkhalfi described as the second test, many Moroccans were waiting to see if the government would succeed in implementing the constitution or not and if the country would succeed in giving voice to the people to promote democratic reform. Elkhalfi described the outcome - the true third path that Morocco has taken as a "revolution of the ballot box." The Justice and Development Party (PJD) gained a majority of the votes, a true change in power given their former position in the opposition. However, only 45% of Moroccans turned out to vote, a reality that Elkhalfi underscored as providing urgency to the implementation of the Constitution - implementing the Constitution is important in order to widen the trust of the Moroccan people in the government. The PJD-led government is prepared to tackle these challenges and, along with the other political parties in its coalition, regain the trust of the Moroccan people.

Despite these difficulties, Elkhalfi does believe there is a Moroccan exception. He provided three main reasons for this: the role of the monarchy, the role of civil society, and the presence of political pluralism in the country. First, the Moroccan monarchy is unique in its role as unifier of the country and source of religious legitimacy. The King has preserved political pluralism in the country and found a means of linking modernity with Islamic history through gradual reform. This reform, which began under King Hassan II, has accelerate since the 1997 period of "alternance" and under the leadership of King Mohammed VI, who is leading the country toward democracy. Second, Morocco's dynamic and active civil society has provided an important link between state and society. There are nearly 50,000 civil society organizations working in Morocco, ranging from groups that work on women's and human rights to those that work on youth issues and development, all of which have worked to create a culture of citizenship and rights in Morocco. These groups have pushed the country toward political and social reform and in turn are being pushed themselves do to more by the February 20th movement. The civil society has a very important role to play in implementing the Constitution and in confronting problems linked to illiteracy, poverty, corruption, and poor governance. Third, in Morocco there has always been at least a minimal degree of political pluralism that has been strengthened by the integration of moderate political parties into government, including Islamist parties. Different groups are therefore able to work together to form a strong coalition and address the challenges of governance, of which there are many.

Foremost, the new government must implement the Constitution. Morocco succeeded in surviving the Arab Spring and the Constitution provides a roadmap for reform to address the political, economic, and social demands of the people. However, implementing the Constitution requires reshaping the system of governance through organic laws. The new government will thus need to draft new laws, including a revised press code to ensure freedom of the press and expression, judicial reform to fight corruption and establish independent institutions, and laws to enhance the social, economic, and political participation of women. Second, the government must work to institute the regionalization and decentralization program it has committed itself to in order to resolve the Sahara conflict and empower local and regional governance. Third, it must work to confront the challenges of poverty, illiteracy, unemployment, and poor health indicators – core economic and social problems that require urgent attention. Last, the government must improve regional cooperation. The countries of North Africa cannot confront these challenges alone and must work together to ensure development and reform across the region.

Nabil Alkofahi spoke about issues of governance in Jordan. He underscored that Jordan had not undergone as many changes in recent months as Morocco had. Although the country is similar to Morocco in that both countries have monarchs without blood on their hands and that both have begun a process of reform, Alkofahi stressed that Jordan is unique because it has suffered serious setbacks in the last ten years as opposed to progress. Elections in 2007 were fraudulent, the government has stalled in implementing reform, and protests continue throughout the country. According to Alkofahi, the core problem is that the regime is not serious about reform and is only responding partially to pressure. Although the Muslim Brotherhood believes that the King should be part of efforts to solve the problems associated with poor governance, there is no consensus on this issue at the national level, as many people see the King as the problem. What the country needs is free and fair elections in order to make gains like those in other countries.

Panel 2:

One of the major challenges that Islamist parties in power face is drafting a new constitution. The panelists discussed how a new constitution could be drafted to act as an instrument of reconciliation and how it should define the place of Islam and sharia. The panel also addressed the growing chasm dividing Islamic parties from liberals and leftists.

Panel 3:

The panelists outlined their party's short- and long-term plans to address the present economic crisis. The panel also discussed the varying roles of the state, private sector, and international finance institutions in promoting economic development.

4. Q & A

Panel 1:

Q: (World Bank) The economy played a major role in the Moroccan elections. Will the success of the PJD be determined by economic factors in spite of other successes?

A: (Elkhalfi) We will not be able to address any other issues without first addressing this. This is the most important factor after addressing problems associated with poor governance and corruption, as these are at the core of Morocco's economic problems. The PJD is working to develop a partnership with the private sector for reform and working to undertake financial and legislative measures to improve economic opportunities. Part of this will be reviving the Free Trade Agreement with the US. Education is another vital component of our plans because we need to train people for the jobs that are available.

Q: What is the relationship between civil society and the military in Tunisia? Is there concern that what happened in Algeria in 1991 could happen elsewhere?

A: (Atig) This is not an issue in Tunisia – the army plays a side role. It is quite different than in Egypt and Algeria, where the military plays a more active role. Our principle going forwards is no violence – violence is a redline.

Q: The King of Morocco was courageous in engaging in reform. How far do you see this going?

A: (Elkhalfi) What is unique in the Moroccan case is that we drafted the constitution before the election. And the constitution has clearly determined the relationship between different centers of power. The drafting of the constitution with all parts of society participating also established the climate of and institutional tools for cooperation between the monarchy and the government. The monarchy and the government have thus established an environment of trust and confidence that has facilitated successful cooperation. In the past, the PJD limited its participation in the elections because it needed to ensure that the government was working in the best interests of the people and also needed to build the trust of the voters. This is the attitude it takes in governing and in implementing the new Constitution.

Q: (Rawan Masmoudi, CSID) We've heard a lot of abuses of the new Constitution recently, and there are lawyers who are trying to have a legal case against the King himself for abusing the new Constitution. Do you have any comments about that? What is the government doing about this?

A: (Elkhalifi) The country is still working under old laws and there is a problem with a number of those laws in light of the new Constitution. We need new laws and they are being drafted – for example, one regarding the establishment of an independent, democratic council for the press. This is why I underscored that the first democratic challenge for Morocco is the implementation of the Constitution. And we need to do it quickly with laws that implement both the text and spirit of the new Constitution.

Panels 2 and 3:

Questions from these panels were not relevant to Morocco or to American foreign policy in the Middle East and North Africa.

5. Observation

Approximately 350 policymakers, journalists, and experts attended this conference on the future of Islamist governance in the Middle East. All of the panelists provided convincing arguments for the future of stable, democratic, and transparent governments under Islamist rule and assuaged concerns about the protection of individual freedoms under the new Islamist-led regimes. From Morocco to Egypt, each party representative outlined a coherent plan to address the challenges of governance and economic growth. Morocco stood out on the first panel as providing a successful third way of reform, due in part to Minister Elkhalfi's articulation of the reform process in Morocco and his position as a member of a truly new government. Nevertheless, the same questions continue to be raised about the implementation of the Constitution and alleged abuses of it by the political elite, including the monarchy. Morocco is being closely followed because of its reputation as a model for the region and these questions are being raised as a result of Morocco being the "exception." Members of the government are well-placed to respond to these questions and elaborate on the steps being taken to both implement the constitution and draft new laws to limit the abuse of it, and Minister Elkhalfi responded deftly to the questions raised at this panel. Future visits by PJD and other government officials at events in Washington would provide a great opportunity to further tell this story of a third way of reform. That said it is obvious that although Morocco will continue to be looked at as an exception in the region, concrete steps must be taken to ensure continued reform and the implementation of the constitution.

For complete transcripts and videos of the event, please visit:

<http://carnegieendowment.org/2012/04/05/islamists-in-power-views-from-within>

\(Back to top\)

Western Sahara Conference & Essay Contest Award Ceremony

Date: 11 April 2012

1. Title: Western Sahara Conference & Essay Contest Award Ceremony

Hosted by the American Task Force for Western Sahara (ATFWS)

Participants:

Jennifer Bubke: MA Candidate, International Politics, School of International Service, American University

Audra Grant: Political scientist, RAND Corporation

Darlene Voeltz: Professor Emeritus, Rochester University

I. William Zartman: Professor Emeritus, School of Advanced International Studies, Johns Hopkins University

2. Overview

The Western Sahara conflict is one of the world's oldest frozen disputes and remains a key obstacle to economic development and political stability in North Africa and the Sahel. Its languishing effects on poverty, extremism, and geopolitics prevent the region from reaching its full potential. After many rounds of formal and informal negotiations between the Polisario Front and Morocco, there has been no political progress. Morocco's Autonomy Plan has garnered support in the West and within some international institutions, but the African Union and Algeria remain opposed to its central provision. The American Task Force on the Western Sahara gathered several academic experts on the Maghreb to consider a possible way forward. The ATFWS also presented its grand prize to the winner of its Western Sahara Essay Contest.

3. Summary

Following a short video featuring former US Ambassador to Morocco Edward Gabriel and current Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, contest winner Jennifer Bubke opened with a broad overview of the impact of the Western Sahara crisis on the MENA region. She said that over the past 30 years, the US has taken several approaches to the dispute. American leaders first pushed the passage of the Madrid Agreement, then took a more neutral position, followed by 'positive neutrality,' decreased interest, and, finally, support for Rabat's Autonomy Plan.

Darlene Voeltz was impressed by Morocco's progress in diversifying its economy and raising the standard of living. Life expectancy and literacy rates have risen as the fertility rate had decreased, all while education has greatly improved. Literacy rates among younger children show even greater progress. Morocco's port expansion catapulted Morocco from a family-based economy to one of the Mediterranean's premier destinations for seaborne cargo. Free trade zones and landmark trade agreements with the US and EU have had an equally important effect on employment, value-added exports, and foreign investment. Voeltz thought that Morocco should be proud to be the home of the first zero-carbon automobile manufacturing plant, to be built by Nissan and Renault. Turning to the political process, Voeltz praised the government for making real progress on due process and gender rights. She concluded that many of Morocco's long term problems, such as corruption, are rooted in culture. Thus, Western governments should be patient, rewarding democratic progress in ways that pave the way for the next stage.

Audra Grant discussed democracy in the larger Maghreb. She presented Morocco as a beacon of reform, where a peaceful democratic transition has yet to yield to the kind of violence seen elsewhere in the region. In addition, the King's human rights initiatives are taking a more prominent role, reinforcing perceptions that the palace is truly committed to real reforms. But Grant acknowledged emerging concerns—the monarch retains influence over matters of huge importance; the PJD has showed troubling signs of division among moderates and conservatives; the government has yet to devise creative solutions in order to overcome the failure of old trade strategies to maintain previous levels of growth; recent elections were marred by low turnout, especially among youth; the government is not capitalizing on social media and NGOs to involve youth in politics; and female representation in government is still disproportionately low.

Turning to the Western Sahara, Grant admitted that multiple rounds of talks had produced no progress, just as the Arab Spring has amplified some calls for self-determination among Sahrawi refugees. The socioeconomic conditions in the territory have barely improved, despite large military and non-military investments in the territory. She suggested that a solution may be found in the Moroccan constitution, which could devolve significant power to local governments. Concluding that greater autonomy for local governments is the only long term approach to stability, Grant added that language and cultural rights might form an intermediate stepping stone to more controversial political rights.

William Zartman focused exclusively on the Western Sahara crisis, laying out five reasons why American policymakers need a solution to the dispute. First, an independent state in the Western Sahara is not in US interests. Such a nation would be scarcely viable in economic terms, having phosphates and a small fishery, but being "mostly a sandbox." The territory is by nature unstable and influence over its government could be bought at a cheap rate, attracting many of America's adversaries to the region. Thus, reasoned Zartman, Washington should want this territory under responsible management. He continued that, although it is no secret that the Western Sahara issue blocks regional efforts to integrate economically, now more than ever neighboring countries must look toward each other for further investment. They cannot rely on Western powers for future growth. Economic cooperation could ameliorate emigration from the region, which is a thorn in the side of the entire Northern Hemisphere. Studies of Maghrebis in Europe indicate that immigrants come in search of economic and spiritual satisfaction. Failure to find these things makes them vulnerable to radicalization. Third, settlement of the Western Sahara conflict would not mend deep rivalries, but it would remove the focal point that is most likely to lead to a war in North Africa. Fourth, the Tindouf refugee camps represent a direct security threat to US interests at home and abroad, and closing them would facilitate Washington's counter-terror strategy. In light of recent events in Libya and Algeria, this rationale takes on even greater urgency. Finally, Zartman pointed out that the US should want to see a legal, internationally accepted solution to such a longstanding border conflict, if only because it can help set a precedent and expedite other resolutions around the world. He concluded that the Autonomy Plan would undoubtedly stand up in a court of international law, particularly when compared with similar proposals involving Aceh, Zanzibar, and Catalonia.

4. Q & A

Q: Given the widely publicized danger of terrorism throughout the Sahel, what are the prospects for an American counter-terror campaign akin to those run in Somalia, Yemen, and Pakistan? Will American drones begin flying over Mali or Mauritania soon?

A: (Zartman) I obviously cannot comment on whether that will ever happen or not, because I just do not know. But my sense is that the current administration wants to avoid boots on the ground wherever possible, and I do not foresee that happening anytime soon.

Q: We have heard a lot about what is good for the United States and what is good for Morocco, but what do the Sahrawis want?

A: (Grant) Well I would suspect they want some sort of autonomy, although it is very hard to estimate how many Sahrawis want full independence or not. I am guessing, however, that the longer the Western Sahara languishes in poverty, and the longer Morocco views the problem as a military problem rather than a development challenge, the greater the likelihood that more Sahrawis will push for full independence.

5. Observation

This event was attended mostly by American University students and the Moroccan press. The proceedings are valuable to MAC because William Zartman, a highly respected Maghreb scholar, was unequivocal in his insistence that the US should demonstrate full-throated support for the Moroccan Autonomy Plan, which he characterized not only as legal, but wise. He made a powerful argument that an independent Western Sahara could grow into a serious threat for the United States and its partners in North Africa.

\(Back to top\)

Climate Change, Migration, and Security: Challenges and Policy Options in Northwest Africa

Date: 18 April 2012

1. Title: Climate Change, Migration, and Security: Challenges and Policy Options in Northwest Africa

Hosted by the Center for American Progress

Panelists:

Senator Tom Daschle: Introductory Remarks: Distinguished Senior Fellow, Center for American Progress

Dr. Kit Batten: Global Climate Change Coordinator, USAID

Sherri Goodman: Senior Vice President, General Counsel & Corporate Secretary, CNA; Executive Director, CAN Military Advisory Board

Marcus D. King: Moderator: Associate Research Professor of International Affairs, Associate Director of Research, Elliott School of International Affairs, George Washington University

2. Overview

Climate change, population growth, and migration are challenging traditional notions of security and creating unique security challenges throughout the world. In northwest Africa, the challenge is particularly poignant - in Algeria, there have been over 1,000 incidents of terrorism since 9/11. Morocco, a reliable western partner in the war on terrorism, faces freshwater scarcity in the coming years and is increasingly unable to take in migrants. Niger and Nigeria are confronting both security and environmental threats due to desertification and conflict over land. This panel discussion explored the challenges of climate change, security, and migration, and provided recommendations on how the US can respond to these challenges in the coming years. The event also marked the release of a new report from the Center on American Progress, entitled, "Climate Change, Migration, and Conflict in Northwest Africa: Rising Dangers and Policy Options Across the Arc of Tension."

3. Summary

Senator Tom Daschle opened the panel by arguing that the nexus between climate change, migration, and security is one of the most substantial challenges facing US today. It is a challenge that threatens the political, economic, and global stability of many nations around the world, with the potential to negatively impact our international governance systems. These challenges affect America's interest abroad as they hamper economic growth, investment, and development. Senator Daschle praised the work of the Center for American Progress for bringing visibility to these challenges. He likewise praised the report, noting that it convincingly argues that the US is entering uncharted waters in the 21st century. Furthermore, the report accurately calls for a new conceptual framework and understanding to address the complex crises scenarios caused by the increasing interplay between climate change and security.

In the case of northwest Africa, recent events have shown that these three elements are interacting in increasingly dangerous ways. Instability in Libya and Mali add additional urgency to addressing these issues. Referencing an article in which Thomas Friedman argues that the Arab awakening was driven not only by political and economic stresses, but, less visibly, by environmental, population and climate stresses as well, Senator Daschle called for a rebalancing of diplomacy, development, and defense in the Middle East to address long-term sources of instability such as those outlined in Friedman's article.

Dr. Kit Batten echoed these thoughts, starting that in addition to supporting democratic movements, the US also needs to address climate issues, including conflict over land and water. She argued that climate change is only one source of stress on migration and security, in addition to other social, political, and economic stressors. USAID recognizes this and confronts climate change within the political and economic context of each country in which it is working. Ultimately, it is the national government and the overall political and economic climate that dictate whether or not climate change contributes to instability and causes migration. She explained that conflict does not always occur where there is climate change and migration and that effective governance can help mitigate the effects of climate change, just as poor governance can exacerbate its effects. Batten referenced a recent USAID study that showed that peace-building can positively impact climate change to highlight this point. Thus, USAID works not only to promote development in a climate sensitive manner, but also works with weak states to help build institutions capable of addressing potential ramifications of climate change, including conflict over resources.

Sherri Goodman agreed, noting that climate change is a threat multiplier, not the sole source of instability. She provided three observations and three recommendations related to the links between climate change and instability. Her first observation was that population growth will alter migration in the coming decade, but that this reality won't tell us how migration is going to occur. Secondly, the modeling on patterns of migration is not complete and more work should be done to understand such patterns. That said, humans are not always predictable and models of migration in one area will not necessarily transfer to other places, particularly since migrants move both to and from areas of environmental difficulties. Third, all migration is not the same. The task of researchers and experts is to understand different patterns and distinguish between them. In her recommendations, Goodman called for lowering the risks associated with mass development by looking at how to do smart development, diplomacy, and planning; reducing illegal migration; and doing more research on how to use development, defense, and diplomacy to address these issues.

Michael Werz spoke about his report, stating that he hopes it will be a launching pad for further discussion on the issue with the aim of reconfiguring foreign policy in the 21st century. He said that while the relationship between climate change and migration, as well as security, is not a certain one, uncertainty cannot and should not be taken as a reason not to act. Instead, it should lead to cautious and prudent planning.

4. Q & A

Q: (King) Is there a role for NATO to play on this issue?

A: (Goodman) NATO is a military organization that tends to get involved after there is a crisis, whereas this issue is more about prevention. The EU is going to be the most active in confronting these challenges and should get involved at an early stage. After a crisis, NATO certainly has a role to play in facilitating the delivery of humanitarian assistance and in helping respond to a disaster.

(Werz) You don't want to think about a military response unless it's necessary. Military responses to migration issues are already a problem. For example, the EU uses military force to control immigration and such a response is not addressing the core issues of such immigration.

Q: (King) Other countries seem to be involved in confronting the challenges posed by climate change and security. How is the US approach different?

A: (Batten) US assistance is primarily rooted in technical assistance and capacity building – getting the countries themselves to be the drivers of their own growth. There is some infrastructure development, but the US is not operating like China in Africa, as the US prefers to empower nations to respond to these challenges themselves, with US assistance, not direction.

(Werz) The US has a longer-term strategy. The question should be: how can the US partner with some of the countries taking the lead on these issues, particularly up and coming democracies? Brazil is a good example of development and the US should think about opportunities for triangular aid. Thinking about these partnerships will be a worthwhile path to pursue.

Q: (Refugees International) Do you have any comment on the impact of climate change on the Tuareg rebellion in Mali and subsequent displacement of many people from northern Mali into neighboring countries like Niger, which is experiencing a drought and a severe food shortage crisis?

A: (Werz) This is exactly why we are looking into these issues – in order to be prepared for some of these future conflicts. Do you want to wait until you have a failed state? Or should you build capacity in aid-recipient countries so that they are prepared to confront these challenges? We are arguing for the latter and arguing for a new development and diplomacy framework that accurately takes into account the nexus between climate change, migration, and conflict.

5. Observation

Approximately 100 representatives from government, international NGOs, and think tanks attended the event. While the event was supposed to address the links between climate change, migration, and conflict in northwest Africa, the panelists ended up discussing the links at a global level, thus limiting the utility of the event for those focused on the Maghreb. Nevertheless, the panelists provided an interesting analysis of the nexus, which has gained increased attention from development agencies and is a core component of their efforts to promote human security – an issue the Moroccan American Center has begun to address through its campaign to expand US assistance to the Western Sahara. The event was likewise effective in highlighting northwest Africa as an area of strategic concern for US interests. Reference to the incidents of terrorism in Algeria, taken from Professor Alexander’s report, also backed up Morocco’s core security message.

Furthermore, much of the reasoning presented at the event is applicable to the Western Sahara conflict – autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty is the only viable option for the future of the Western Sahara given the need for strong states and institutions to confront the threat of climate change, migration, and conflict. A review of the report itself further substantiates this reasoning, as it notes, “major US imperatives in the region, including counterterrorism and reform, would be served by supporting, for example, Morocco’s efforts to peacefully settle the Western Sahara dispute or Nigeria efforts to quell ethno-religious violence. Establishing effective governance in Western Sahara and domestic stability in northern Nigeria will allay economic uncertainty in the region and reassure other states confronting North-South and Christian-Muslim divides.” Although these arguments were not articulated during the panel discussion, the report was handed out to all participants, and as a result, the event offered a venue for disseminating some of Morocco’s key messages to a high-level audience.

For a video of the event and a complete copy of the report, please visit:

<http://www.americanprogress.org/events/2012/04/ccmsafrica.html>

\(Back to top\)

The Arab Spring, a Year On: How’s America Faring?

Date: 23 April 2012

1. Title: The Arab Spring, a Year On: How’s America Faring?

Hosted by the Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars

Participants:

Nathan Brown: Professor of Political Science and International Affairs, George Washington University and Former Fellow, Woodrow Wilson Center

Ellen Laipson: President and CEO, Stimson Center

Michael Singh: Managing Director, Washington Institute for Near East Policy

2. Overview

As countries touched by the Arab Uprisings build new governments and institutions, US engagement in the Middle East and North Africa must adapt to a radically different political context. Most notably, the scope of relevant political actors in the region has expanded, and American foreign policy needs to happen on a society-to-society level rather than a government-to-government level. A year after uprisings swept the region, the three panelists discussed the challenges America faces in dealing with new governments after the Arab Uprisings, US interests in the region, and how the US must alter its strategy toward the Middle East.

3. Summary

Aaron David Miller opened the discussion by asking the panelists to shed some light on US engagement in the Middle East and North Africa a year into the uprisings. Time is the ultimate arbiter for so many things, and some would argue that it is too early to draw conclusions about how America is faring in the wake of tumultuous changes that have transformed the Arab world. However, narrowing the scope to an examination of US policy, interests, and credibility makes an accurate assessment feasible.

Nathan Brown remarked that any assessment should primarily consider Washington's response to the uprisings. Attempting to gauge how events in the region have been beneficial or detrimental to American interests is neither relevant nor possible at this point. He identified three principal challenges confronting a successful US response to the Arab Uprisings. First, the American foreign policy apparatus needs to adapt. The era of "take-me-to-your-leader" policy is over. Instead of interacting with a few top-tier individuals, US policymakers need to engage with entire societies. Second, the US expects emerging power dynamics to fall into the same patterns. Brown noted, "as old actors disappear, we expect replacements, when in reality, the fundamental structures are shifting." Third, the process is extremely difficult for these societies. Egypt represents one of the most obvious cases as the transition process there is messy. The US response in Egypt has been moderately successful thus far. American foreign policymakers recognized their limitations from the start and did not try to impose specific outcomes, which would have immediately backfired. The US was prudent to focus and take a firm stand on a few key issues—retaining the Camp David Accords and promoting economic and political liberties—as central to American foreign policy objectives. Additionally, it is starting to reach out to new actors, such as the Muslim Brotherhood.

Ellen Laipson turned the conversation to a broader discussion of American engagement in the Middle East. She stressed the importance of examining the US' role in the region in a global context. Absent the events of the Arab Spring, this is a trying time for the US. Redistribution of power internationally suggests that the US has less influence and leverage over foreign affairs than it once did. The somewhat inward focus on domestic economic well-being and curtailing resources available for international engagement make this a somewhat awkward time for American foreign policy. It is a time of transition for both Arab governments and American diplomacy, and thus far, the US has not had any significant successes.

Laipson laid out three basic principles for American engagement in the region. First, "it's not about us." The "Arab Spring" is truly a spontaneous, authentic phenomenon with historic consequences. Second, there is a sharpening bifurcation of the Middle East. There is the prosperous, relatively stable, non-democratic, oil-exporting Middle East, and the populist, economically stressed, democratizing Middle East. Faced with such differences, it is difficult for the US to have an overarching regional strategy that successfully embraces both blocs. The result is two often conflicting policies. Third, sometimes less is more. The current atmosphere in the region will be less receptive to a robust American presence, and US involvement must be scaled back.

Egypt is the most troubling case, according to Laipson. Many Egyptians have come to associate the fall of Mubarak with a repudiation of the United States. This is very frightening for long-term American interests. In fact, it appears all too similar to the early years of the Iranian revolution, when the association of the Shah with Washington became an embedded principle and an identity of the revolution. Certainly the protestors in Tahrir Square did not act from passionate anti-Americanism, but emerging political actors are finding it a useful position to maintain. Widespread distrust will have negative structural implications for American engagement, and if the US cannot improve its image within Egypt, problems there will spillover into other countries in the region. Granted, the situation in Egypt is largely unsettled, so these concerns may be transitory. Tunisia and Libya, thankfully, are unfolding far more favorably for the US. Tunisia is a homogenous, democratizing, prosperous country that very much wants to partner with America. In Libya, while the outcome of its transition is still in the balance, popular sentiment toward the US is positive for the most part.

Expanding on her “less is more” principle, Laipson explained that the US needs to rethink its engagement strategy. State-to-state relations play a less prominent role in American foreign policy as society-to-society interactions become more important. Soft power executed by democracy building and humanitarian organizations, for example, is less visible but often more effective. American foreign policy needs to be agile and responsive to these new political environments, and this requires a focus on non-security related engagement. In the past, economic assistance has been the principal tool for wielding US influence and engagement in the region. The 2013 budget increases US aid to the region by approximately a billion dollars, for a total of eight billion dollars. Five billion, however, will be spent on preexisting security relationships—to Israel, Egypt, and Iraq. Very little is available for new and expanded economic promotion activities; the budget does not reflect as dramatic an adjustment as is necessary. In fact, Washington plans to scale back various education, health, and basic development services that stimulate job creation. A leadership deficit and weak public-private partnership are two major challenges confronting US engagement in the region. There is also a marked absence of regional leaders; no one wants a return of the strong-man model, but organized and competent leaders are desperately needed to mobilize their citizens. Neither the US nor governments in the region have proven adept at partnering the public and private sectors. Private sector interests often clash with local interests, and investors have little patience to work with weak and indecisive government.

Michael Singh started by saying that interests, obstacles, strategy, and tools constitute the hierarchy of international relations. An assessment of how the US is faring should examine the status of these factors in the region. American interests in the region, namely energy, commerce, non-proliferation, counterterrorism, and economic and political development have not been substantially affected by the uprisings. Obstacles, strategy, and tools for pursuing these interests, however, are in disarray. The events of the “Arab Spring” have resulted in radically different political contexts, and three chief obstacles to American engagement have emerged. First, as the spectrum of relevant political actors expands, American officials face increasingly complex array of domestic political forces. Prior to the revolution, American engagement in countries like Egypt did not require a nuanced understanding of domestic politics, as American diplomats only dealt a select group of top officials. Now, however, issues like the Camp David Accords, which were previously confined to the purview of government elites, are making their way into popular political dialogue. American officials must learn to adapt to this emerging nexus of foreign and domestic politics. Second, new governments are going to be more hostile to the US, the West, and Israel. Egyptians associate the US with Mubarak and view the peace treaty with Israel as bargains made by old regimes against the interest of the people. Third, the resulting political situation is more prone to regional conflict than the old order. In the absence of clear regional leadership, governments may look to external conflicts to unite their populations. These new obstacles require an updated US strategy in Middle East.

US foreign policymakers should take specific actions to update its regional strategy. First, they should elucidate Washington’s priorities and red lines. The US should counter any slide into irrelevance by asserting itself as a regional leader, rather than a cautious observer. Additionally, the US should reach out to its allies in the region. Democracy promotion and political reform are needed more now than ever, and the US should not take a back seat. That being said, attempting to control the reform process will prove counterproductive. These countries are undergoing historic transitions, and the US has a clear interest in the outcomes. Washington will benefit from promoting democracy and discouraging a tyranny of the majority. There is a large gap between the moment when citizens demand their own rights and the moment they demand rights for their entire society; elections do not create democracy. America needs to promote liberal values, regardless of who is in power.

Before beginning the question and answer period, Miller reflected on the panelists’ statements. A country’s policy has to serve its interests, he said, and that policy has to be clearly defined. What the world is witnessing in the Middle East are transactions, not transformations. The events of the “Arab Spring” are not revolutions, but rather, competitions for power resulting in vacuums of open political space. Naturally, the vacuums will be filled by the most competent and organized political actors, regardless of ideology or agenda. This is not Tehran in 1979; transformations could happen, but they have not yet. Great powers, particularly the US, do not manifest the kind of agility and tactical dexterity required in this kind of situation. American foreign policy on core issues has a lot of inertia, and has not changed in 30 years. Concerning Iran, Gaza, Israel, and weapons among other things, the US will be a cautious and incremental player. Washington will be slow to give up on investments like Bashar al Assad. The US is still involved in the “devil’s bargain” in places like Bahrain and Saudi Arabia, and even with Egypt’s SCAF. Further, American foreign policy often presents logical contradictions; US officials cooperate with the worst, most violent insurgent insurgents in Afghanistan and Iraq but refuse to talk to Hamas or Hezbollah.

4. Q & A

Q: (Miller) Nathan, what exactly did you mean when you said that Camp David is not dead yet?

A: (Brown) In some ways, Camp David is more alive than ever, but it is also deeply threatened. In Mubarak's absence, no one has presented an alternative to the treaty. The forces that were critical of the Egyptian-Israeli relationship have indicated that they respect Egypt's existing relationships; no one will push for war with Israel. Egyptians do not like the terms of the treaty, especially its economic aspects and the demilitarization of Sinai. The treaty is safer than it was before, but it could fray in the context of a regional crisis.

Q: (Miller) So essentially the Egyptian public now owns the treaty, and that has created a new normative standard which the Islamists, for reasons of practicality, have come to acquiesce in it. What does this mean for the prospects of an Israeli-Palestinian deal?

A: (Brown) The two are connected. The prospects for Israeli-Palestinian deal were almost nonexistent before Mubarak's departure, and today any peace process remains highly unlikely. Nothing has changed, except the Israelis won't find Egypt to be the helpful partner in mediating the former's relationship with Palestine as they did in the past.

Q: (Miller) We have not witnessed the disruption of a major oil producer, save Libya. Why have the monarchs of the GCC fared much better than their less fortunate counterparts?

A: (Laipson) Our relations remain strong with the Gulf States, excluding Bahrain. Iran represents a unifying factor; we share specific goals on this issue. However, the Gulf Arabs have expressed misgivings about our intentions as we abandoned Mubarak. They are squirming under our pressure to comply with sanctions toward Iran. They depend on us to stop Iran, and engage with us, but they do not entirely trust our policy processes. If the US were to relocate the Fifth Fleet because of instability in Iran, it would undermine the logic of our human rights policy. Bahrain may force us to shift, creating tension with Saudi Arabia.

Q: (Miller) We need to stand up for what we believe in and promote a liberal order. We have created problems for ourselves in the past when our words exceeded our capacity. On the issue of democratization, how do we promote democratic reform if our actions elsewhere contradict our principles? Egypt, Bahrain, and Syria offer examples of where our words exceed our capacity to affect results.

A: (Singh) Economic and political development are our key interests. We want both, and both benefit us in a real way. In response to all this talk about our conflicting interests and values, it is worth saying that interests are often in conflict with one another. A country always needs to manage these conflicts in a smart way. We cannot allow our rhetoric or promises to exceed our willingness to act. We tend to raise expectations too high, so we should have a frank, realistic conversation to yield better results.

Q: (Haleh Esfandiari, Director, Middle East Program, Woodrow Wilson Center) If Tehran is able to come to an understanding on the nuclear issue, it will likely emerge as a strong regional power. How will the Gulf States and Israel respond?

A: (Laipson) The reactions in the Gulf to an resolution would be confusing. Elites, as well as businesspeople and the general public in the Gulf would be relieved. The governments, however, would face uncertainty. Gulf governments have feared that Iran will become the US' strategic partner in the region if the nuclear issue is resolved.

(Singh) The prospect of an understanding that falls short of stopping the program entirely is not welcome by leaders in the Gulf. They want the US to deal with the issue forcefully. The Israelis share this sentiment. It is a very diverse society, but their view of red lines includes full suspension of enrichment, and our view may be a little more lax.

(Laipson) If a resolution meant internationalizing the fuel cycle the Gulf countries may be in favor of coming to an understanding. A regional, internationally monitored fuel bank to support nuclear energy programs and prevent them from becoming military programs could benefit all partners involved.

5. Observation

The discussion was attended by approximately 35 professionals, students, NGO workers, policymakers, and members of the press. The panelists focused almost entirely on Egypt, stressing the dire need for the US to reform its engagement strategy there. Nathan Brown offered a much more optimistic picture of American involvement in Egypt. He insisted that many features of the US response to Mubarak's departure represents a success, while Ellen Laipson countered that the US has not seen any significant successes anywhere in the region, save Tunisia. All of the panelists stressed the significance of new emerging political contexts and actors and the overarching sense of uncertainty in the region. No one mentioned Morocco, Algeria, or broader security threats in the region.

\(Back to top\)

Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), Boko Haram, AQIM and Other Sources of Instability in Africa

Date: 24 April 2012

1. Title: Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), Boko Haram, AQIM and Other Sources of Instability in Africa

Hosted by the US House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs

Participants:

Ambassador Donald Y. Yamamoto: Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary, Bureau of African Affairs, US Department of State

Ambassador Daniel Benjamin: Coordinator for Counterterrorism, Bureau of Counterterrorism, US Department of State

Amanda J. Dory: Deputy Assistant Secretary for African Affairs, Office of the Secretary of Defense, US Department of Defense

2. Overview

The US House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs heard testimony from senior officials from the State Department and Defense Department who conduct oversight of US counterterrorism efforts in Africa. The panelists examined instability in Africa caused by the rising influence of radical Islamist and terrorist organizations. The Committee also examined potential deficiencies and successes of US bilateral and regional initiatives and evaluated collaboration and coordination among military and civilian agencies to promote stability on the African continent.

3. Summary

Following opening remarks by committee chairman Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Ambassador Donald Yamamoto began his statement by acknowledging that effective counterterrorism depends upon coordination of military, political, economic, diplomatic, and social resources. He explained how the current situation in Mali presents a microcosm of four larger, interrelated crises afflicting multiple nations in Africa: a crisis of legitimacy for civilian authorities, a lack of dialogue with rebel groups, massive flows of refugees, and the looming threat of terrorism. According to Yamamoto, the Obama administration is meeting these challenges with a four pillar approach that emphasizes institution building, fostering sustainable economic growth, expanding education, and mitigating armed conflict. He added that the State Department is committed to linking security cooperation with respect for human rights and effective democratic reforms, as ameliorating popular grievances will help to diminish the strength of extremist groups who attempt to capitalize on misery and desperation.

Ambassador Daniel Benjamin rejected claims that terrorism in Africa is not a threat to the United States or its allies. He interpreted the positive results US agencies have seen as a testament to two signature programs that encourage security cooperation among African partner nations. Echoing Yamamoto's statement that counterterrorism requires a multi-pronged strategy, Benjamin conceded that counter-terror efforts in North Africa can appear daunting, particularly when targets can hide in great expanses of ungoverned territory. As a result, he explained, the US government aims to address 'upstream' drivers of extremism, an objective that seeks to bypass the difficult challenge of finding needles in haystacks. Benjamin said that, although al-Qaeda's ideology remains unpopular in most African communities, the turmoil in Mali, coupled with the recent return of mercenaries and weapons from Libya, have increased the internal pressures facing governments in Mali, Mauritania, and Niger. Benjamin expressed concern that AQIM's newfound mobility and its interest in deadly weapons from Libyan arsenals could endanger Western interests on a global level. Linking Boko Haram and al-Shabaab with AQIM, Benjamin insisted that the US government was making great progress against all three organizations in Algeria, Mauritania, Niger, and Somalia.

Deputy Assistant Secretary Amanda Dory discussed recent progress in addressing security concerns across Africa. She touted the significant roles played by the AU in Somalia and Sudan, as well as the quick response by ECOWAS to the coup in Mali. Unfortunately, American partners in Africa still lack key capabilities in terms of training, equipment, doctrine, and civil-military relations. Dory said Defense Department engagement in Africa consisted of two prongs: 1) the maintenance of constant pressure on al-Qaeda and its allies across the continent, and 2) the establishment of small outposts manned by special operations forces who can counter extremist groups. She lauded a 2012 NDAA provision that provided the Defense Department with specific guidance to improve a counterterrorism course for African officers and non-commissioned officers. Following regime change in Libya, American commanders also incorporated improved MANPAD awareness and IED training for African partners.

4. Q & A

Q: (Rep. Ros-Lehtinen) Please describe the goals and status of US efforts to counter the LRA, and how the success is being gauged. Also please describe the relationship between private and US-funded efforts to establish monitoring and alert systems for LRA-affected communities. What happens to non-leadership defectors from the LRA? Finally, how frequent have defections been since the initiation of US efforts to counter the LRA?

A: (Yamamoto) The key is interoperability and training programs by the four countries involved against the LRA. The goals and objectives are threefold in order to isolate Kony and the other leaders, to support and assist those who are defecting, also to help with rehabilitation and reconciliation efforts. One thing that has proven effective is the provision of basic cell phones. USAID has provided around 200,000 dollars worth of cell phone towers, which helps warn when LRA groups are in the area. It is only a matter of time, as Uganda is working very hard on reconciliation and is seeing some fruits from their efforts.

(Dory) The DoD deployment is in support of the anti-LRA strategy that spans the US government. The first is on civilian protection, the second is reintegrating former LRA members, and the third is removing Kony and key leaders from the battlefield. So DoD is working with local militaries in the region. We have a variety of metrics for measuring success, which includes our level of access to deliver humanitarian goods and numbers on defections and captures from the battlefield. Some of the metrics that are important to us are building trust and relationships with partner militaries. We also focus on reducing the amount of time for intelligence gathering to produce actionable intelligence for Ugandan forces.

Q: (Rep. Berman) Ms. Dory, on the third objective, given 100 military advisors working with local military partners, why haven't we been able to kill or capture Kony?

A: (Dory) One of our biggest problems is expectations management. It is a huge territory of challenging terrain and a very dense jungle. A second challenge relates to logistics support for field forces. Given the four different militaries and the terrain, it is very challenging.

Q: (Rep. Berman) Didn't the Dodd-Frank legislation require the administration to provide a map to give us a sense of the relationship between conflicts, mining, and the LRA rebels?

A: (Yamamoto) We have been tracking mines and materials produced. The Congo produces many of the materials we use in our daily lives. The map is coming out soon. One of the issues is that these are artesian mines that spring up and close, but we do have mapping ready.

Q: (Rep. Berman) How do our executive agencies balance the desire to cooperate on terrorism with our desire for protection of human rights and political rights?

A: (Benjamin) An integral part of anti-terrorism assistance is always human rights training, as human rights is always a component of what we do. It is also an integral part of our message to these countries, and we tell them they must observe human rights norms in order to tamp down radicalization.

(Yamamoto) In Ethiopia we have the NCO and officer training program, and we have learned that those trained troops are much more disciplined and very effective for civilian control. So these efforts are getting the message now, and we are improving coordination and cooperation.

Q: (Rep. Smith) Again on Kony, if you could tell us what is being given by the US and African countries toward the killing and capture of Kony? And how degraded is his capability to capture child soldiers and commit murder? Have we gotten credible leads?

A: (Yamamoto) The priority is very high, and in discussions with regional defense ministers and related officials, we find they are very committed to cooperating to cordon off his escape routes and capture him. On Kony himself, we have been able to degrade his force down to a few hundred loyalists, but the number of attacks has increased, although we are trying to limit those areas of operations.

(Dory) The message in terms of encouraging defections and providing monetary compensation is going out through airwaves, radio, civilians in the area, and previous members. The intelligence community assesses that he has been significantly degraded and is currently focused on surviving and evading.

Q: (Rep. Bass) How are you fighting extremism among youth?

A: (Benjamin) We recognize that those most at risk of radicalization are the young. We are conducting programs that complement what USAID does in the sense that they do the longer term work that provides key social services that ameliorate grievances, while we are looking at hot spots, where we see particularly intense radicalization, and are trying to figure out what we can do to provide alternatives to potential recruits, often with civil society actors and local groups that enjoy more credibility.

Q: (Rep. Schmidt) How are State and DoD coordinating resources to combat threats throughout the region?

A: (Benjamin) I think we have very close coordination, particularly through the Trans-Saharan partnership and its corollary in East Africa. We feel there is an excellent give and take on these issues.

(Dory) What Africa Command has been able to do is develop cross-cutting regional campaign programs, for example a Northwest Africa campaign program that aligns with State's two programs which can be understood within the DoD structure.

Q: (Rep. Schmidt) Turning to Boko Haram, I know several Congressmen asked the State Department to list them as a terrorist organization. What is the status of the request?

A: (Benjamin) We are very concerned about Boko Haram and are closely engaged with the Nigerians, but the State Department does not comment on prospective designations.

Q: (Rep. Rivera) It is my understanding that the Polisario-run refugee camps in Algeria have become a recruiting ground for AQIM, and a hub for opportunistic drug traffickers, as well as a threat to some of the reforms of the Arab Spring. Since 1990, international support for the camps has exceeded one billion dollars. So it seems the US taxpayer is being called upon to partly fund camps being exploited by regional terrorist groups.

A: (Benjamin) I have seen such reports of AQIM involvement, but whenever we have dug deeper we have found such reports spurious. But we can check again to ensure we have up to date information.

5. Observation

Representatives were primarily focused on US and African efforts to kill or capture Joseph Kony and his subordinates of the Lord's Resistance Army. As a result, al-Qaeda activities in the Sahel and Maghreb received minimal attention. Two panel members essentially ducked the one question on allegations that Polisario members collaborate with AQIM operatives in Algeria and beyond. This event is of minimal value to MAC.

\(Back to top\)

The Political Economy of the 'Maghreb Spring' and its Aftermath

Date: 24 April 2012

1. Title: The Political Economy of the 'Maghreb Spring' and its Aftermath

Hosted by the Maghreb Center

Participants:

Ahmed El-Hamri: Former Economist and Program Director for the Maghreb Region, World Bank

Robert Prince: Lecturer, University of Colorado at Denver

Francis Ghiles: Senior Research Fellow, Barcelona Center for International Affairs

Nejib Ayachi: Moderator: President, Maghreb Center

2. Overview

The so-called "Arab Spring", which should more appropriately be labeled the "Maghreb Spring" or the "North Africa Spring," was triggered by exacerbated economic inequalities and stalled social development for large segments of the population, particularly youth, within a context characterized by the lack of basic human and political rights, rule of law deficits, and high levels of corruption and nepotism. The panel discussion assessed economic development strategies adopted in North Africa since independence, focusing on the recent past. Participants weighed reforms recently adopted in Morocco as well as those integrated in Tunisia's "Jasmine Plan" for economic and social development.

3. Summary

Ahmed El-Hamri described the basic economic models pursued in Morocco, Tunisia, and Algeria from the late 1950s onwards. The early years saw inconsistent approaches to growth, with Algeria reinforcing the role of government in economic management and state-owned enterprises (particularly in the oil and gas sector), while Tunisia and Morocco placed more emphasis on private initiatives. In Algeria, state-owned companies employed the majority of Algerian workers. The only private investment was in small, unproductive industries. Tunisia's economic policy was characterized by liberalism in the late 1950s, socialist-type government intervention throughout the 1960s, and a market economy from 1970 to 1985, although the government maintained stringent protections against foreign competition for local producers. The signature features were improved GDP growth rates to as much as 5%, greater focus on social modernization and population control, and state involvement in the economy, despite the notable failure of collectivism in preceding years. Turning to Morocco, El-Hamri said Rabat has made a relatively successful shift from an agrarian-focused economy to one with greater prowess in manufacturing. El-Hamri noted that all three countries suffer from a shortfall in value-added exports and "reinvestment projects." He also gave credit to the Moroccan government for taking steps to involve women more intimately in the economy.

Robert Prince observed that, although Tunisia earns frequent praise for its relatively advanced economy, such expansion is not sustainable. In particular, growing inequality, geographically unbalanced development, limited roles for women, and horrendous working conditions may exacerbate social problems and, subsequently, economic development. Prince likened Tunisia's democratization process to that of the Philippines, where a dictator was overthrown and elections were fairly run, but where today people remain mired in abject poverty. Prince argued that Bourguiba's economic reforms are subject to unfair criticism, which often overlooks the prominent effects of European woes on Maghreb economies. He assessed that the Tunisian economic model has undergone very little change in the past 20 years, and the state will probably have to stay moderately involved in order to get the nation out of the current crisis.

Francis Ghiles noted that the Maghreb economies were typical of developing nations, where governments continue to play major parts in dominant sectors. He lamented the underutilization of the highly skilled diaspora in North Africa and mused that local idiosyncrasies might be rooted in the bureaucratic practices introduced by Ottoman and French occupiers. Drawing attention to the stark contrast laid bare by Europe's divergent approaches toward Eastern Europe and North Africa, Ghiles posited that a European commitment on par with 1989 could greatly help the Maghreb climb out of the doldrums. More importantly, Europe has failed to offer the kind of political support extended to Eastern European nations, many of whom were promised membership in the EU and NATO should they reform. Such leverage is missing in trans-Mediterranean relations, a situation that hurts Western efforts to lay solid democratic foundations across the Middle East. Ghiles reiterated the popular view that Maghreb nations must train their graduates for jobs that are in demand, not jobs they want. Ghiles concluded that a primary obstacle to further political and economic progress is the tendency of developed nations to view North Africa and the Middle East as a problem rather than an opportunity.

4. Q & A

Q: What do you think will happen in Libya?

A: (Ghiles) I remain pessimistic about the situation in Libya, particularly when you look at recent reports of infighting among the many militias from Tripoli to Misrata. One of the big issues for all these countries going forward is what model will they follow? There is a sense that the Western model is broken. Here we are, mired in partisanship, facing great crises, and we seem unable to do anything about it. So how will they organize their societies, especially when they are still very dependent on the West in the short term?

Q: What about the lack of rural infrastructure in Morocco?

A: (El-Hamri) The government has been toying with such ideas for a long time, and I believe they are still pursuing rural development very aggressively.

5. Observation

The event was attended by a dozen or so retired officials and think tank personnel. The discussion was wide ranging despite the event's publicized focus on the political economy of North African nations. Ghiles was particularly enlightening, and he supported his views with multiple anecdotes and references to academic research. However, much of the focus was on Tunisia and Algeria. Morocco earned praised for its handling of gender equality and liberalization, but virtually no discussion was given to the relationship between Morocco's new parliament, its economic promises, and prospects for successfully carrying out those plans.

\(Back to top\)

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, May 17, 2012 3:29 PM
To: Bouhlal, Rachad
Subject: Now to the Senate....

Now that the House is in order until the conference committee, we recommend you focus on calling Inouye as the Senate markup is Tuesday. Thanks Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, May 18, 2012 11:08 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Cc: Jean AbiNader
Subject: Fwd: Meeting with NAPEO/Aspen

Ambassador,
per our conversation last night, below is an email from Jean on his recent contact at Aspen/NAPEO. I think it is an important read and should be held as confidential. Ed

Sent from my iPad

Begin forwarded message:

From: "Jean AbiNader" <jabinader@moroccanamericancenter.com>
Date: May 18, 2012 10:30:31 EDT
To: "Edward Gabriel" <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Subject: Meeting with NAPEO/Aspen

Dear Ed

I met yesterday with one of my contacts at ASPEN/NAPEO.

The source was quite upset because it appears that Morocco will be dropped as a host site from an academic/education delegation visiting Morocco, Tunisia, and Algeria the first week of June.

Brief recap:

- The delegation is one of three that was defined late last year by NAPEO (private equity/venture capital and the creative arts were the others) to take place in Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia in 2012. The others have been completed.
- After initially ignoring the education delegation, State/NEA decided that it wanted the embassies to participate and to control the program. This resulted in the program being shifted from late May to early June to accommodate State. So Aspen/NAPEO had to go back to the private-public boards in each country and re-do the schedules.
- As recently as two weeks ago, there was continuous communication between Aspen/NAPEO with the Morocco local board and the US Embassy.
- It became clear that nothing was done to set up the two-three events that had been previously agreed among the parties.
- Aspen/NAPEO asked the Economic Bureau at State what to do and the consensus is to drop Morocco from the delegation itinerary. NEA is not yet on board. This will mean again going back to the local boards in Tunis and Algiers to rearrange their schedules.

Problems identified:

According to the source, key issues are:

- NEA conflict with the Economic Bureau over NAPEO projects, even objecting to participation of Julie Egan.
- Lack of US embassy support for NAPEO projects – Aspen particularly critical of cultural attaché and Ambassador Kaplan for lukewarm or non-existent support, causing failure of Morocco to stay on the itinerary.
- Morocco local board does not have an institutional approach to working with NAPEO. No real structure in place rather a loose committee with leadership that has other priorities.
- NAPEO finds it very difficult to work with local board in Morocco and Embassy under these conditions, which may lead to erosion of other regional opportunities for Morocco, e.g. two other US delegations are visiting Tunisia right after the education group.

Let me know if you need further elaboration.

Best

Jean AbiNader
Moroccan American Center

Direct: 202 470 2046
Mobile: 301 802 1401

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, May 19, 2012 8:01 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: This is our proposed language

In last year's final Foreign Operations bill, Senator Leahy conditioned all of Morocco's FMF assistance ($10 million) by the Senate on the State Department submitting a report on the positive steps Morocco is taking to improve human rights in the Western Sahara.

We have two requests:

- 1) That the FMF money come without negative conditions or restrictions by Senate language.
- 2) That the bill not contain any other negative language that would adversely affect the US-Morocco bilateral relationship.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, May 19, 2012 9:57 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com
Subject: Good job tonight

This is a very good sign.

----- Original Message -----

From: Edward Gabriel
Sent: Saturday, May 19, 2012 05:00 PM
To: rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>
Subject: This is our proposed language

In last year's final Foreign Operations bill, Senator Leahy conditioned all of Morocco's FMF assistance ($10 million) by the Senate on the State Department submitting a report on the positive steps Morocco is taking to improve human rights in the Western Sahara.

We have two requests:

- 1) That the FMF money come without negative conditions or restrictions by Senate language.
- 2) That the bill not contain any other negative language that would adversely affect the US-Morocco bilateral relationship.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 23, 2012 6:00 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: Fwd: US Statement re: Morocco UN Human Rights Council

FYI

below is the statement made by the US Mission to the UN Human Rights Council during Morocco's Universal Periodic Review yesterday.

United States

"The USA warmly welcomes his Excellency, the Minister of Justice, Mr. Moustapha Ramid, and the delegation of the Kingdom of Morocco. We commend the government for creating a special committee to draft a new constitution based on input from all sectors of civil society. The new constitution sets high standards for the individual liberties, gender-equality, and cultural diversity. Despite these positive efforts, we are concerned by recent arrests of journalists, bloggers and artists which demonstrate restrictions on the freedom of opinion and expression. We're also concerned about continued allegations of police brutality against peaceful demonstrators and torture of prisoners and detainees at the hands of police and security forces. Finally, we are concerned that some civil society organisations advocating on behalf of minority populations, including Saharawis, have not yet been registered.

Bearing in mind these concerns, the USA makes the following recommendations. One, investigate all allegations of police brutality and torture and prosecute all security force officials accused of harsh treatment. Two, finalise in collaboration with press associations and rights groups, a legal framework that ensures full freedom of expression. And three, promptly approve the license application of all civil society organisations, that meet legal requirements, including those organisations advocating for minority populations."

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, May 27, 2012 12:49 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS report

The information contained in this report has not been corroborate by third party sources and therefore its accuracy cannot be verified.

WESTERN SAHARA
18/05/12

According to a Moroccan personality, close to the Palace:

- i. During the French presidential election, the Benkirane government sounded out the Hollande camp in order to seek reassurances that, if the left were to win, French support for Morocco would continue unaltered. There were direct contacts with Pierre Moscovici, a senior member of the Socialist Party leadership who is close to Hollande. Moscovici suggested that French policy towards Morocco (and in particular support for Rabat's autonomy plan) would probably remain largely unchanged, but stressed that nothing could be confirmed 100% until after the second round of voting (May 6).
- ii. Immediately after Hollande's victory in the second round, but before the constitution of the new Socialist-led government, Foreign Minister Othmani travelled to Paris to meet Moscovici for further information on the positions of the incoming administration. Othmani was at that stage convinced that Moscovici himself would get the Foreign Affairs portfolio.
- iii. A wave of panic ran through the Benkirane government when the make-up of the new government was finally announced on May 16, with Laurent Fabius as Foreign Minister. Benkirane sees Fabius^[1], like Hollande himself, as a pure product of the Mitterrand era – and as such capable of reverting to Mitterrand's regional policy, seen as less favourable to Morocco and its claim to Western Sahara than that of successive right-wing administrations.
- iv. It was specifically in order to sound out the incoming Socialist government and test its reactions that the Benkirane government has “withdrawn confidence” in Christopher Ross, in belated reaction to the UN Secretary General's last report (dated April 24).
- v. However, rather than calming their jittery nerves, the French reaction has alarmed Benkirane and Othmani all the more. Even though the position stated by the Quai d'Orsay was essentially the same as before, the statement was made by Foreign Ministry spokesman Bernard Valéro, who has been in the job for years, rather than by Fabius – and it was Fabius that Benkirane wanted to hear. The Paris correspondent of Maghreb Arabe Presse has been instructed by his superiors in Rabat to interview Fabius on the incoming government's Morocco policy, but has not yet managed to do so. In the meantime, Benkirane and Othmani are convinced that France's new Socialist government will be more reserved towards Morocco and more open towards Algeria than was the case under Sarkozy.
- vi. At the Palace, on the other hand, there is no panic or particular concern. Indeed, the King's advisors on the Western Sahara question have been exchanging sarcastic Tweets about Benkirane and Othmani's panic attacks (!). The Palace knew in advance that, once elected, Hollande would not deviate from France's traditional stance on the Sahara and support for Morocco's territorial integrity.
- vii. King Mohamed VI, for his part, has been spending an extended holiday with his mother in Paris.

According to a member of Polisario's National Secretariat:

- i. The victory of Hollande, and the make-up of the new Socialist-led government, could augur a break with the policy of unconditional support for Morocco adopted by the outgoing Sarkozy government. Polisario has been in touch with its friends in France, in particular those who are close to the Socialists, to explore such a possibility, and all have confirmed that French Maghreb policy will have to be a put on a new and more balanced footing.

- ii. Polisario's French friends claim that unconditional support for Morocco will no longer be considered appropriate, and that human rights issues will emerge as an important element of France's Maghreb policy. The Islamist wave in North Africa will be judged on its degree of integration into a democratic process that respects human rights and the rights of peoples. The Sahara question will be an integral part of this policy of support for democracy and human rights in the Maghreb.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

[1] Fabius is also known to have firm friendships in Algiers, and none such in Rabat.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, May 29, 2012 3:54 PM
To: Bouhlal, Rachad
Cc: Jordan Paul
Subject: Senate Bill

This is all the staff could come up with on the internet regarding the Senate appropriations. Unfortunately, it looks like we were not successful in deflecting the Leahy language in the Senate, although we are in good shape for the conference committee. Ed

From: Kristen Kouttab [<mailto:kkouttab@moroccanamericancenter.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, May 29, 2012 3:12 PM
To: Edward Gabriel; Jordan Paul
Subject: RE: Just heard the Senate Bill

I searched S. 3241, which is for appropriations for DOS, Foreign Ops, and related programs for fiscal year ending Sept 30, 2013. Reported by Leahy and placed on the Senate calendar.

The word searches "Morocco" and "Sahara" turned up the following item of interest. Sahara also showed up under counter-terrorism funding, but the only mention of "Western Sahara" was in the section with Morocco. No hits on Tindouf, Algeria, or census.

MOROCCO

(g) Morocco- Prior to the obligation of funds appropriated by this Act under the heading `Foreign Military Financing Program' for assistance for Morocco, the Secretary of State shall submit a report to the Committees on Appropriations on steps taken during the previous 12 months by the Government of Morocco to--

(1) protect freedom of expression, association, and assembly regarding the status and future of the Western Sahara, and due process of law;

(2) release prisoners of conscience;

(3) support a human rights monitoring and reporting role for the United Nations Mission in Western Sahara in cooperation with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights; and

(4) provide unimpeded access to human rights organizations, journalists, and representatives of foreign governments to the Western Sahara.

AFRICA

(c) Counterterrorism Programs-

(1) Of the funds appropriated by this Act, not less than $55,000,000 should be made available for the Trans-Sahara Counter-terrorism Partnership program, and not less than $25,000,000 should be made available for the Partnership for Regional East Africa Counterterrorism program.

(2) Of the funds appropriated by this Act under the heading `Economic Support Fund', $10,000,000 shall be made available for programs to counter extremism in East Africa, in addition to such sums that may otherwise be made available for such purposes.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, May 29, 2012 7:39 PM
To: Bouhlal, Rachad
Cc: Jean AbiNader
Subject: FW: Trip Report

Rachad,
 A report from Jean on his recent visit to Morocco. We are happy to collaborate as you see fit. Ed

From: Jean AbiNader [<mailto:jabinader@moroccanamericancenter.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, May 29, 2012 10:05 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Trip Report

Hi Ed
 As you know, I was in Morocco last week to teach a graduate level negotiations seminar for the Executive MBA program at Al Akhawayn's Executive Education Center at the TechnoPark in Casablanca. Before going to Casa, I met with some of our trade and investment promotion partners to get and update on what is going on and to offer our continued support. Below are my notes from the meetings.

- AMDI
 Met with Driss Sekkat, new Business Development Manager for everywhere but Europe. He and Saloua Dlimi are our main points of contact. They advised us that MFA will be coordinating their delegation to the US as part of the strategic dialogue program planned by the Ambassador. This may not affect their auto show specific trip to Detroit in September as that is where the suppliers and manufacturers will be. They were glad to have the information of the possible US-Maghreb Economic Forum in Detroit in October since being their earlier may give Morocco an advantage.

- MCC/APP
 Met with Morad Abid, the DG, and Malika, the Deputy DG to continue our discussions about the steps leading up to the end of the compact in September 2013. They are already downsizing. Looks like they will have allocations for 90+% of the MCC funds by end of program.

Their sources in MCC are not optimistic about a second compact because of general attitude towards foreign assistance in US (do we know funding appropriations for MCC for 2013-14?). They have been advised that there is a clique in MCC that is still upset with the GOM's taking over the Fez Medina project. They have been told that any second compact would be smaller, less than $170m, should focus on human development and building capacity for consumer protection facilities, and stay away from infrastructure (long term) projects.

Enterprise support (enables capacity building/coaching to promote sustainability for SMEs) has been cut $12m without any explanation - political decision they were told. $ is available but seems the funds got caught up in a turf war between 2 MCC VPs and Morocco got the short end of the argument.

MCC has told APP that it should not take Moroccan companies to the fancy foods show in DC this year because there are people on the Hill complaining against the subsidies for growing olives in competition with US growers. (Maroc Export will have its own delegation.) This is certainly something that we can explore and we need to counter arguments that this is hurting US companies. MCC's response has been to run from the program rather than have their legislative staff take it on.

- US Embassy
 Met with Michael DeTar, outgoing economic counselor, and Jane Kitson, SCO, who was in Rabat for meetings. There was also a US presence at an energy show that was held later that week that Jane was going to attend. Someone from OPIC was making a presentation.

Michael and Jane were quite friendly and helpful. We covered three topics: totalization, NAPEO, and entrepreneurship in Morocco.

Totalization:
 Treaty is negotiated by the Treasury Department. Small number of Americans affected and small negotiating staff at Treasury are main reasons Morocco is not a priority. Totalization issue is now part of Kaplan's talking points when he comes to US for 2 weeks this month. Treasury will not act without pressure from State and Moroccan government.

AmCham is now officially part of the US Chamber network, this happened last week. So AmCham could do a doorknock (Hill visits) and have totalization on their agenda.

He really likes the idea of a coalition of companies/schools working this issue because otherwise it won't get the attention/priority from USG. GOM is key as well since State can push Treasury on this issue.

Another wrinkle that Jane brought up: under Moroccan law, age limit for work is 60. So Americans over 60 could not work in Morocco full time. Spain, Germany, France have negotiated a waiver to this in their totalization agreements. Affects companies with highly skilled workers, e.g. Jacobs, who have seasoned staff in the field.

NAPEO:

The Embassy is generally not supportive because they see Aspen's strength as managing events, not supporting a long term effort that will have results. They were opposed the educational delegation because the Embassy wanted it to focus on vocational/technical, not universities and higher education. Needs of Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco are different so setting up delegations for all three countries is difficult to address their different priorities. Embassy believes that Aspen does not have enough resources/staffing for a substantive, well-coordinated effort across Maghreb. It appears that he is more supportive of more involved effort from US side although NAPEO assumption is that local boards will carry the weight once NAPEO facilitates initial efforts.

Morocco has long history with US assistance so the Moroccans are not as anxious as Tunisia and Algeria to have US programs unless there is an obvious connection to Moroccan needs. In the case of the educational delegations, the local NAPEO board did not see the value of a 1 1/2 day program, built around a reception and two roundtables with experts as a benefit to Morocco so they were hesitant to make the effort. Michael has a very high regard for the local NAPEO board. Michael was skeptical that having experts come to Morocco, most for their first time, without French or Arabic, and under a tight timeframe, was not the best recipe for effectiveness.

Entrepreneurism:

Both were generally skeptical of short term results of overall entrepreneurship projects due to compelling need to have a full enabling environment for programs to succeed. People are willing but institutions and systems are not in place. Morocco will get a black eye in report this fall for failing to move on an agreement with Buffet company that has approval from national investment committee (Hassan II Fund qualified) that took 5 years and for 2 years since, nothing has happened. State will have to report on it and it will affect Morocco's ratings for "business friendly" environment. Michael feels that Morocco has to move more aggressively to implement changes that really help business, ranging from labor codes to customs to basic services. Laws are passed, actions don't follow.

FTA came under particular mention as Moroccan companies are raising the issue of the perceived lack of impact with the new government. That's way Said Benabdullah (Maroc Export) was in US in March, to try to identify means to ratchet up bilateral efforts to promote more T&I.

• ADEREE

Met with Said Mouline to get some clarification regarding how to insure that US companies make the right connections when they are pursuing renewable energy project.

We discussed the current projects and regulations in place and the possibility of Morocco focusing next on biomass, particularly trash to energy conversion. As always, a useful meeting and reassuring regarding the progress that Morocco is making in renewables.

• MAROC EXPORT

I have been on a panel with Saad Benabdallah, the DG, previously, and he eventually remembered the program. He is quite proactive in his approach and innovative in moving to promote trade from Morocco. Definitely a big thinker and is very proud of his close relationship with Ambassador Bouhlal. He believes that a meeting among Maroc Export, the Ambassador, you, and me to develop a roadmap for the next three years for promoting Morocco is very important.

Key points we discussed:

1. Quite necessary to improve results for Morocco from the FTA
2. Have to support Morocco's capability to follow up with US companies
3. Important to get AMDI involved and the Artisan folks as well
4. Welcomes MATIC's support, energy, and experience
5. He will convey meeting points to Amb Bouhlal for follow up.

We gave him a detailed review of MATIC from the beginning since he was thinking of setting up a business council, didn't know we worked on the various trade shows, and is also concerned that there are too many events floating around that are disconnected or being done for the wrong reasons.

He says that he's not a business guy but he is a thinker and an organizer. Saad just funded a senior business leaders' conference hosted by the FT on high value luxury goods in Morocco this week. 4 days. He worked on in for 2 years. We talked about similar opportunities in the US. It was a very positive meeting and it will be quite good to work through the Ambassador on moving forward.

The balance of the week was spent leading the graduate seminar: professionals from ONE, Cargill, MTIC (managers of TechnoPark). Always interesting and useful to talk with them in class and outside. The class will be coming to Bentley University in Boston for their last course next month. Unfortunately, it was too expensive to do it in Washington.

Thanks.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 30, 2012 4:46 PM
To: Bouhlal, Rachad
Cc: Robert M. Holley
Subject: pursuant to our talks this morning
Attachments: Suggested Actions for USG in WS.doc

Mr. Ambassador,

Pursuant to our meeting this morning, attached is a list of ideas to advance the WS issue to the next logical step. Hope you find this useful. Ed/Bob

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

- Senior US officials, specifically including the US Ambassador in Morocco should be encouraged, indeed required, to visit the Western Sahara. Such a visit is now prohibited by State Department. While perhaps arguably useful in the past, today this prohibition conveys the impression that the United States is so unconcerned with the problems in the Sahara/Sahel and the Western Sahara that it does not need the first-hand views of its most senior diplomats to help inform and guide the process of resolving these issues.
 - The United States should take every available opportunity to clearly state, in unambiguous terms, its chosen policy of support for a mutually acceptable political solution based on the only reasonable and viable option available, that of sovereignty and autonomy. Doing anything else only continues to encourage the Polisario Front that it does not need to compromise. This has the effect of making the United States a part of the problem, not the solution.
 - The United States should also use its influence in the Security Council to make clear that this is indeed the only realistic way forward and help end the charade that any meaningful compromise can be found through old formulas that have already failed and are, in any case, clearly to be avoided.
 - The policy decision to restrict US access to the Western Sahara and deny US development assistance funds to the region should be reversed, as Congress has now both authorized and urged. Morocco has invested hundreds of millions of dollars in the territory to improve its basic infrastructure and quality of life and would welcome US participation in meeting genuine humanitarian and development needs in the area. This kind of engagement would demonstrate through concrete actions that the United States is fully committed to its support for autonomy. Further, it would build confidence among the Sahrawi people to endorse such an outcome. Such actions would also help project an image elsewhere in the Sahara/Sahel that there are viable, peaceful alternatives to the chaos being promoted by a rapidly expanding revolutionary jihadist population in the region. Most importantly, funding that leads to improved governance and economic development will aid in stabilizing the region.
 - The rest of the State Department should align their internal decision-making criteria vis-à-vis the Western Sahara with Secretary Clinton's verbal statements of support for the Moroccan autonomy initiative. Inside the State Department, there is bureaucratic stalling that inhibits creative approaches and initiatives that could lead to resolution of the conflict. As Zbigniew Brzezinski wrote recently, "As a result [of Obama's priority on domestic political affairs], his grand redefinition of U.S. foreign policy is vulnerable to dilution or delay by upper-level officials who have the bureaucratic predisposition to favor caution over action and the familiar over the innovative¹." Nowhere is this more evident than in US policy on Western Sahara where senior officials below the level of Secretary Clinton routinely misses opportunities to support the Moroccan initiative and instead proffer bland statements of support for the "UN process," as though this was somehow a substitute for US national interest or even consistent with what the US has clearly stated is its alleged policy priority. This kind of ambivalence serves to add only further confusion to an already difficult situation and perpetuates the problem rather than contributing anything useful towards a solution.
 - Existing US foreign assistance programs in Morocco targeting social and economic development should include the inhabitants of the Western Sahara, again as Congress has now specifically authorized, especially those focusing on health, education, entrepreneurship, and similar capacity-building initiatives.
 - The people of the Western Sahara have clearly demonstrated their commitment to democratic participation within the Moroccan context by large turnouts in local and national elections despite Polisario Front calls for boycotts and cancellations. Continued support for NGO, civil society, and local government programs will enhance the US presence in the region and US support for their democratic participation. It will also add much needed US support to the only area in the increasingly volatile Sahara/Sahel region that continues to be an island of stability, security, social and economic progress and democratic practice. Surely an example the US would encourage others in the immediate region to emulate.
 - The US should help establish conditions for a successful autonomy arrangement by engaging US agencies including USAID, USTDA, OPIC, and EX-IM Bank in support of enhancing private sector investments in Western Sahara. America's European partners are already investing in key sectors in the region. There is no reason that the United States should not follow suit.
-

- The United States should recognize the Western Sahara conflict as an impediment to US economic investment and opportunity in North Africa. Once the conflict is resolved, the US might have better leverage with Algeria by responding to its need to attract US investments in their energy sector, tourism, infrastructure and a much needed broader diversification of their economy. More importantly, this offers the US an array of opportunities to promote broader regional economic integration. Morocco's free trade agreement with the US will benefit the Maghreb countries, principally Algeria, clearly demonstrating the benefits of settling the conflict.
- The UN should implement its mandate to encourage Sahrawi leadership in both the Tindouf camps and Western Sahara region to work together on matters of mutual interest affecting the region. One of the original confidence building measures, this dialogue can help build towards the broader integration on interests on both sides of the berm.
- The United States should urge the UNHCR and the Security Council to urge Algeria to respect their legal obligations under the 1951 Refugee Convention and the 1967 Protocol and reduce the burden associated with maintaining the camps in a hostile physical environment. UNHCR should immediately begin a public information campaign in the camps to inform the refugees of their rights under international law, including identification, documentation, access to travel documents, and freedom of movement. If the UNHCR carries out a census in the camps, those results, along with freedom of movement that includes voluntary repatriation for the refugees, and more accountability for international food and medical assistance, would drastically change conditions in the camps making them obsolete, thus greatly reducing the humanitarian crisis and the vulnerability of the refugee population to other dangerous enticements.
- In addition to a voluntary repatriation program, the US should work with UNHCR and the UN Security Council to encourage and provide support for any Algerian efforts to allow the refugees to settle elsewhere in Algeria if they choose an option other than repatriation to Morocco. Again, this should help reduce regional tensions and dangers.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 30, 2012 5:27 PM
To: Bouhlal, Rachad
Subject: FW: Sorry. In Morocco. Great idea. Pull together a quick memo to Ed and we'll move it through the thickets!
Attachments: 2012-05-29 Memo - SLLF International Conference.pdf - Adobe Acrobat.pdf

Rachad,
This may be a great opportunity for us. Can you look over the materials and advise us on how you may want to proceed.
Thanks

From: Jean AbiNader [<mailto:jabinader@moroccanamericancenter.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, May 29, 2012 7:14 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: FW: Sorry. In Morocco. Great idea. Pull together a quick memo to Ed and we'll move it through the thickets!

Important opportunity for Morocco.
Jean

From: Justin Gray [jgray@grayglobaladvisors.com]
Sent: Tuesday, May 29, 2012 5:15 PM
To: Jean AbiNader; Ralph Nurnberger DL
Please see attached.

Justin Gray
President and Chief Executive Officer
Gray Global Advisors, LLC
300 New Jersey Avenue, NW, Suite 650
Washington, DC 20001
202-461-2100 (office)
202-449-8323 (fax)
jgray@grayglobaladvisors.com

To: The Honorable Edward Gabriel; Jean AbiNader
 From: Justin Gray
 Date: May 29, 2012
 Re: Transatlantic Leadership Forum for the State Legislative Leadership Foundation

Ed and Jean,

The State Legislative Leaders Foundation (“SLLF”) recently reached out to me and asked for assistance in helping them organize their upcoming Transatlantic Leadership Forum. They have a specific interest in doing this next event in Morocco. In pursuit of planning and executing this event, they were hoping to meet with you and senior leadership from the Embassy. For your reference, below is a brief summary of SLLF.

About SLLF:

The SLLF was established in 1972 as a nonprofit corporation dedicated to working with state legislative leaders in their efforts to reform the institution of the state legislature. SLLF’s earliest funding derived from a multi-million dollar Ford Foundation grant which was earmarked for a seven-state pilot project known as The Program for Legislative Improvement. The seven states selected for this project included: Ohio, Colorado, Minnesota, Arizona, Louisiana, Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Today, the SLLF is nationwide and has an advisory council of over 68 major U.S. companies.

SLLF seeks to educate and inspire our nation's current and future state political leaders regardless of party, politics or ideology. SLLF gives these leaders regular opportunities to take part in university-based educational programs that focus on many of the critical issues of our day. SLLF programs are designed to give them a sense of the high value of public service and the vital role they, as elected representatives of the people, play in our democracy.

SLLF leadership programs seek to educate leaders on a wide range of issue areas with national and global importance. For example, prior SLLF leadership programs have focused on how state legislators can impact key issue areas such as: healthcare; education; innovation and entrepreneurship; technology; economic recession and recovery; environment and energy; digital literacy; and “democracy 2.0” using digital media. With the advent of digital media, SLLF has also taken a strong interest in how legislators can utilize new tools to engage the public and encourage civic participation. SLLF’s most recent program, which was held in Providence, RI this past May, was on the topic of restoring the people’s trust in government.

SLLF Transatlantic Leadership Forum:

SLLF is looking for a host country for its next Transatlantic Leadership Forum. The upcoming Transatlantic Leadership Forum will bring together a group of forty (40) to sixty (60) individuals composed of senior US State Legislative Leaders and their counterparts from across the globe, representatives of the US business community and special guests to discuss matters of global importance with an impact on politics, foreign policy and the economy. SLLF is flexible on dates to hold their next conference and would welcome suggestions as to what dates would be the optimal for the conference in Morocco. Past Transatlantic Leadership Forums have been held in Barcelona, Spain (July 2011) and Dublin, Ireland (August 2010). Attached is more detailed background on SLLF and the Transatlantic Leadership Forum.

Home | Contact Us
About
Leadership Programs
Awards & Events
National Speakers Conference
Publications & Research
Leaders Digest

About Us

History
FAQ's
Board Of Directors
Staff
Advisory Council
Office Locations
Calendar

STAFF

"The State Legislative Leaders Foundation staff is without equal. With an average tenure well over 20 years, each person brings tremendous experience, exceptional skills, and complete dedication to the job. They are an honor to work with and the successes and accomplishments we have enjoyed over these past 40 years are a celebration of their talents." Stephen G. Lakis

Stephen G. Lakis
President

Stephen joined SLLF in 1972 just after it was established and through the following decade honed his political skills by working directly with state legislative leaders across the country on a series of legislative reform studies. In 1981, the Board of Directors appointed him President and Chief Executive Officer.

Stephen created the blueprint for bringing political, business and academic leaders together on college campuses to examine critical public policy issues and aspects of leadership. Over the course of his tenure the SLLF has grown into the preeminent nonpartisan legislative leadership organization in the land, reaching Senate Presidents, Speakers of the House, Majority and Minority leaders, and future leaders, with its unrivaled university-based educational programs.

In addition to overseeing all SLLF activities, he is a frequent speaker on legislative leadership, ethics, and legislative performance. He also has extensive experience in the international arena where he has organized scores of programs in Europe, Asia, and Latin America.

Stephen received his BA in Political Science from the University of Bridgeport. He also attended graduate school at American University. He is married to the former Evelene Corrigan and is the proud father of four grown children, two grown stepchildren, and grandfather of two perfect girls!

Marcia B. VanderVoort
Executive Vice President

Marcia VanderVoort has been with the State Legislative Leaders Foundation since 1981 and has served as Vice President since 1999 and Executive Vice President since 2010. She is the heart and soul of the Foundation!

Over the years Marcia has been involved with creating, planning and managing many of the Foundation's national and international educational programs. She has also assisted in editing several major research studies and virtually every significant piece of correspondence prepared by the Foundation's President, Steve Lakis. She works closely with the Board of Directors and has responsibility for the annual board meetings and the organization and management of the National Speakers Conference.

Marcia is a graduate of Newcomb College of Tulane University. She and her husband Tom have two adult children - Betsy (a graduate of Smith College and Suffolk Law School), and John (a graduate of Union College and now serving as a pilot in the Air Force) - and a beautiful granddaughter, Kinley Elizabeth.

Home | Contact Us

About | Leadership Programs | Awards & Events | National Speakers Conference | Publications & Research | Leaders Digest

About Us

- History
- FAQ's
- Board Of Directors
- Staff
- Advisory Council
- Office Locations
- Calendar

Board of Directors

The SLLF is governed by a board of up to 45 House Speakers, Senate Presidents, Majority Leaders, Minority Leaders, and Pro Tempores.

Directors are elected to three year terms and are eligible for reelection. Legislative leaders may be nominated for membership on the board by a current director or on the recommendation of the President.

The Board meets regularly to review all ongoing SLLF programs and policies, approve the annual operating budget, oversee all fiscal audits, and discuss future SLLF initiatives.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS 2012

CHAIR
 Hon. Lois M. DeBerry
 House Speaker Pro Tempore
 Emeritus
 Tennessee

VICE CHAIR
 Hon. Eric Turner
 House Speaker Pro
 Tempore
 Indiana

DIRECTORS

Hon. B. Patrick Bauer
 House Minority Leader
 Indiana

Hon. Roger H. Bedford, Jr.
 Senate Minority Leader
 Alabama

Hon. Sharon Weston Broome
 Senate President Pro
 Tempore
 Louisiana

Hon. Michael E. Busch
 Speaker of the House
 Maryland

Hon. John F. Campbell
 Senate President Pro
 Tempore
 Vermont

Hon. Al Carlson
 House Majority Leader
 North Dakota

Hon. Mike Chenault
 Speaker of the House
 Alaska

Hon. Matt Dean
 House Majority Leader
 Minnesota

Hon. Jeff Fitzgerald
 Speaker of the House
 Wisconsin

Hon. Gordon D. Fox
 Speaker of the House
 Rhode Island

Hon. Joe Hackney
 House Minority Leader
 North Carolina

Hon. Robert W. Harrell, Jr.
 Speaker of the House
 South Carolina

Hon. Bernie Hunhoff
House Minority Leader
South Dakota

Hon. Tim Jones
House Majority Leader
Missouri

Hon. Martin M. Looney
Senate Majority Leader
Connecticut

Hon. Fiona Ma
Assembly Speaker Pro
Tempore
California

Hon. W. Ken Martinez
House Majority Floor
Leader
New Mexico

Hon. Thomas V. Mike
Miller, Jr.
President of the Senate
Maryland

Hon. Terie Norelli
House Minority Leader
New Hampshire

Hon. Robert Nutting
Speaker of the House
Maine

Hon. John Ocegüera
Speaker of the Assembly
Nevada

Hon. John A. Pérez
Speaker of the Assembly
California

Hon. Dominic F. Pileggi
Senate Majority Leader
Pennsylvania

Hon. Chip Rogers
Senate Majority Leader
Georgia

Hon. Calvin K. Y. Say
Speaker of the House
Hawaii

Hon. Michael Schneider
Senate President Pro
Tempore
Nevada

Hon. Gary Stevens
President of the Senate
Alaska

Hon. Joe Straus
Speaker of the House
Texas

State Legislative Leaders Foundation, 1645 Falmouth Road, Bldg. D, Centerville, MA 02632
508-771-3821 | 800-532-3375 | Fax: 508-771-0136 | info@sllf.org
805 15th Street, NW, Suite 425, Washington, DC 20005
202-568-6557 | Fax: 508-256-5511

Copyright © 2011, State Legislative Leaders Foundation. Website by dlfwebgroup.com

Home | Contact Us
About
Leadership Programs
Awards & Events
National Speakers Conference
Publications & Research
Leaders Digest

About Us

History
FAQ's
Board Of Directors
Staff
Advisory Council
Office Locations
Calendar

Advisory Council

Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers
 Altria Client Services, Inc.
 American Beverage Association
 American Traffic Solutions, Inc.
 Amgen
 Archer Daniels Midland Company
 Astellas Pharma US, Inc.
 AstraZeneca
AT&T Corporation
 Bentley Systems, Inc.
 Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation
 Bristol-Myers Squibb Company
 Brown-Forman Corporation
Chevron Corporation
 Coca-Cola Refreshments
Comcast
 Community Financial Services
 Covanta Energy Corporation
CTIA
 CVS Caremark
 Diageo
 Distilled Spirits Council of the United States
Entertainment Software Association
 General Electric Company
 GlaxoSmithKline
 Google
 Grocery Manufacturers Association
 GTECH
 IBM
 IMS Health
 International Paper
 Intuit
 JM Family Enterprises, Inc.
 Kraft Foods Global, Inc.

LKQ Corporation
 Mark Anthony Brands, Inc.
McDonalds Corporation
 MedImmune, Inc.
 Motion Picture Association of America
 Motorola Solutions
 National Beer Wholesalers Association
 National Seating and Mobility
 Nestle Waters North America
 News Corporation
 Novo Nordisk
 Nuclear Energy Institute
 Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP
 Pernod Ricard
 Pharmaceutical Research & Manufacturers (PhRMA)
 Property Casualty Insurers Association of America
 Raytheon Company
 Retail Industry Leaders Association (RILA)
 Reynolds American
 SAS Institute
 Security Finance Corporation
 Target Corporation
 The Carpet and Rug Institute
 The Home Depot
 The Procter & Gamble Company
 TracFone Wireless, Inc.
 Unilever United States, Inc.
 United Health Care
 United States Fireworks Safety Commission
 Verizon
 Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.
 Waste Management, Inc.
 WE Energies
 Wine Institute

Home | Contact Us
About
Leadership Programs
Awards & Events
National Speakers Conference
Publications & Research
Leaders Digest

LEADERSHIP PROGRAMS

2012 Leadership Forum
2012 Health Care Summit
2012 Majority Leaders Symposium
2012 Emerging Leaders Program
Past Leadership Programs
Calendar

2011 TRANSATLANTIC LEADERSHIP FORUM

Barcelona, Catalonia - Spain
July 27-31, 2011

"A Cry for Freedom: The Arab Spring and its Political Impact on the Mediterranean Region"

Host: Mr. Jordi XUCLÀ i COSTA, Member Spanish Parliament

Keynote Speaker: Hon. Jordi Pujol, former Prime Minister of Catalonia (1980-2003) and the premier expert on the politics of Catalonia.

This summer, sixteen US Legislative Leaders, thirteen of their European, Canadian, and Asian counterparts, representatives of the US business community, and special guests convened in Barcelona for SLLF's 13th Annual Transatlantic Leadership Forum. Home of the extraordinary architecture of Antoni Gaudi, Barcelona is Europe's 6th largest city and an economic powerhouse for the region.

The program, our first in Spain, was called "A Cry for Freedom: The Arab Spring and its Political Impact on the Mediterranean Region". Hosted by Member of the Spanish Parliament Hon. Jordi XUCLÀ i COSTA, the agenda focused on the 'Arab Spring' and Catalanian regionalism. The participants from Catalonia hold a special appreciation for freedom and independence - Catalonia has won and lost its autonomy multiple times in its lengthy history. The discussions were sometimes intensely passionate. Participants from Egypt, for example, were critical of European and US policies towards the Middle East and said so. According to SLLF President Steve Lakis, the biggest issue - one that overrides all else with respect to policy in the region - is the Palestinian question. It's difficult to envision progress on most other issues without a resolution to this seemingly intractable conflict.

State Legislative Leaders Foundation, 1645 Falmouth Road, Bldg. D, Centerville, MA 02632
508-771-3821 | 800-532-3375 | Fax: 508-771-0136 | info@sllf.org
805 15th Street, NW, Suite 425, Washington, DC 20005
202-568-6557 | Fax: 508-256-5511

Copyright © 2011, State Legislative Leaders Foundation. Website by dlfwebgroup.com

Home | Contact Us
About
Leadership Programs
Awards & Events
National Speakers Conference
Publications & Research
Leaders Digest

LEADERSHIP PROGRAMS

2012 Leadership Forum
2012 Health Care Summit
2012 Emerging Leaders Program
Past Leadership Programs
Calendar

2010 International Program

Dublin, Ireland

August 17-22, 2010

Sixteen members of SLLF's Board of Directors and several of its Advisory Council members gathered with leaders from across Europe in the chamber of the Irish Parliament to discuss the economy of Ireland and the future of the Euro and the European Union. The European Union and the Euro: Prospects for the Future brought together policymakers from across Europe and the United States with experts on the economies and politics of Ireland and the EU. The discussions were informative and spirited.

Dr. John Fitz Gerald from the Economic and Social Research Institute (ESRI) in Dublin painted a hopeful, but challenging picture of the future of the Irish economy. He noted that economic growth had been inspired by universal access to education in the 1960's and free market expansion in the 1980's, but now was being stymied by a housing bust and increased pressure on the nation's social welfare network. He suggested that the Irish government has made the difficult, but correct choices, but would need to continue to make those hard choices to see the country through this region.

Ernst Wehlteke, former President of the Deutsche Bundesbank, argued that the Euro and the European Union would not only survive its recent crises, but would emerge stronger and more agile if we shift our focus from looking at causes of the crisis to working towards solutions. Those solutions should include increased transparency in the international banking system, stronger regulation of hedge funds and a better managed credit rating system that did not give NINJNA (No Income, No Jobs, No Assets) Loans.

The Hon. John Bruton, as a former Irish Prime Minister and EU Ambassador to the United States, brought a unique portfolio to his presentation. In leading a discussion of Europe and the United States, he suggested three key differences that define the relationship: expectations of government, confidence in the use of force to address international challenges and the importance of state sovereignty and autonomy. Further, he noted that the Europeans nations and the United States have a mutual interest in the strength of the European Union. On Saturday, David Marsh of the London and Oxford Group and author of Europe and the European Union offered insights into where the EU came from and where it is going. Most interestingly, he indicated that because of different regional economic prospects, the future of the union may have to rely on two monetary units, one for Northern countries and one for Southern members.

In addition to these highly informative sessions, participants also enjoyed all that Ireland has to offer including a walking tour of historic Dublin, a trip to the countryside and a tour and dinner at the Guinness Storehouse. Perhaps the highlight of the trip was an official dinner in St. Patrick's Hall of the famous Dublin Council (where England turned over power to Michael Collins in 1922 establishing Irish independence). It was, by all accounts, an amazing conference for one and all.

The Hon. Seamus Kirk TD,
Speaker of the Irish Parliament

L-R: Hon. Darko Fras, The National Council of Slovenia; Hon. Lois DeBerry, Speaker Pro Tem, Louisiana House of Representatives; Hon. Ferdinand Riederer, Switzerland; Stephen Lakis, President, SLLF; Dr. Karl W. Edtstadler, Chief Clerk of Salzburg House, Austria

Senator Phil Prendergast, County Tipperary; Gerry Been, Lord Mayor of Dublin

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, May 31, 2012 12:20 PM
To: Bouhlal, Rachad
Subject: VERY Important to read before your meeting with McDermott today
Attachments: Grimm McDermott Notes.doc

Rachad,
Attached is a quick compilation of information on Congressmen Grimm and McDermott. In particular you should read McDermott's summary as it provides a few important insights. Thanks Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Rep. Michael Grimm (R-NY)

Congressman Michael Grimm has represented New York's 13th congressional district since January 2011. He is a supportive and active friend to Morocco. In February 2011 his Chief of Staff, Chris Berardini, met with Mouaad Ibriz and Jordan Paul to discuss US-Morocco bilateral relations. Chris has travelled to Morocco and is a key supporter of Morocco in Congress; the meeting was very positive. On November 29, 2011, Representative Grimm issued a statement congratulating Morocco on the region's first free and fair parliamentary elections, and noted that he looks forward "to working with my counterparts in the new Moroccan Parliament to strengthen the historic US-Morocco bilateral relationship." In August 2011 he signed the Congressional letter to HM Mohammed congratulating him on the success of the July 1 referendum and welcoming the progress that the new Constitutional reforms will bring.

Rep. Jim McDermott (D-WA)

Congressman Jim McDermott has represented Washington's 7th congressional district since January 1989. He met with a MACP Consultant from the Moffett Group in March 2011; the meeting notes indicate that it was neither positive nor negative.

We believe he was the only Member at the Moroccan American Coalition convention, held in Denver in 2008, and he had a great time. He loves Morocco and the community. Doesn't have enough good things to say about them, although his floor statement below is damning of the government.

Mustapha Khalfi, currently the Minister of Comm. & Government Spokesperson, was a recipient of the Fulbright/American Political Science Association (APSA) Congressional Fellowship in 2006, and served as an intern for Congressman Jim McDermott (D-WA), taking a course at Johns Hopkins University, and receiving a visiting scholarship at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Importantly, below is McDermott's statement on the FTA in 2004, which is pretty damning of Morocco's position on the WS.

Begin Congressional floor text:

United States - Morocco Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act

By: Jim McDermott

Date: July 22, 2004

Location: Washington, DC

UNITED STATES-MOROCCO FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION ACT -- (House of Representatives - July 22, 2004)

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to House Resolution 738, I call up the bill (H.R. 4842) to implement the United States-Morocco Free Trade Agreement, and ask for its immediate consideration.

BREAK IN TRANSCRIPT

Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Speaker, the President and his Trade Representative say that the U.S.-Morocco free trade agreement is a good idea because it will strengthen our economic ties with moderate, I emphasize moderate, Muslim countries.

Well, first of all, two-way trade flow between the United States and Morocco is around a billion dollars a year. Morocco is a tiny economy with little economic significance. The U.S. Commerce Department indicated the trade agreement will have a negligible impact on trade and negligible impact on our economies.

Furthermore, while I recognize that King Mohammed VI has made great strides recently, particularly with regard to the rights of women, we should not forget two very important issues. One, Morocco is a monarchy and the king is deemed the country's religious leader. This FTA is really about strengthening ties with moderate monarchies; Jordan, Bahrain and others have preceded it.

There are dozens of Muslim countries that are vibrant democracies, Egypt, that we should have chosen to pursue trade agreements before we chose Morocco.

But, two, the way in which Morocco has handled the Western Sahara is really a stain on their nation. In 1975, when the Western Sahara went free from Spain, the Moroccans moved in immediately and said this is our country. It is a very, very wealthy country in natural resources. Both oil is being drilled for by Kerr McGee and other American and British companies, and the fishing industry off the coast is very proficient.

So before signing an agreement with them, with a nation that has been occupying a territory to which it has no legal claim for 25 years, a nation that has erected a 2,000-kilometer wall to keep the inhabitants of Western Sahara from fleeing, with a country that has no respect for the right of self-determination, we should have ensured that the area of Western Sahara was justly and peacefully resolved. It would have been a lever we could have used to get them to resolve this.

The U.N. has said you should have an election and they just never quite get around to having it for 25 years.

I am really pleased, however, that the chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means and the ranking member, the gentleman from New York (Mr. Rangel), have worked with me to insert language into the official committee documents to indicate that in no way does the free trade agreement cover trade investment in the Western Sahara.

The issue is this: If you drill oil in the Western Sahara and the Moroccans take it into Morocco, is it then eligible for tariff-free dealings with the United States? And the answer should be no, and there should really never have been a trade agreement until that legal claim was relinquished or we had some sort of agreement on all of this.

What we do have is a letter which the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Pitts) inserted in the RECORD. I suspect I have one very similar to his but he will insert it also in the RECORD. I will include a letter from the Trade Representatives saying that in dealing with Morocco we are dealing with Morocco as understood by the United Nations and the United States, and we are not using this as a kind of end-around to go out and get more oil.

One wonders why did we go to Morocco? What is it about Morocco? It is a little tiny country, very little trade with us. What is being done here that really needs to be done?

I think we need to protect the indigenous people of the Sahrawi who live in Western Sahara. They need to have the protection from this United States reaching in and taking their resources by the back door. I thank the chairman for bringing this issue to the floor.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, May 31, 2012 1:22 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: RE: VERY Important to read before your meeting with McDermott today

OK, thanks. Good luck today. Ed

From: Rachad Bouhlal [<mailto:rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>]
Sent: Thursday, May 31, 2012 1:21 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Re: VERY Important to read before your meeting with McDermott today

Thanks Ed,
Very useful for my meeting.
Congressman Grimm has just ask to postpone the diner, he has an urgent matter.
Rachad
On May 31, 2012, at 12:20 PM, Edward Gabriel wrote:

Rachad,
Attached is a quick compilation of information on Congressmen Grimm and McDermott. In particular you should read McDermott's summary as it provides a few important insights. Thanks Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

<Grimm McDermott Notes.doc>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, June 01, 2012 5:44 PM
To: Bouhlal, Rachad
Subject: FW: The State Legislators are coming to DC Wednesday-Wednesday
Attachments: 2012-05-29 Memo - SLLF International Conference.pdf - Adobe Acrobat.pdf

Rachad,

As you can see from this email, the State Legislators Group I sent you material on earlier in the week, are actually coming to DC June 6-13. If you can meet with them it would allow you to get a more complete understanding of their proposal. I would like to have Ralph or Justin attend the meeting as well so we would have some continuity on follow up. Let me know if you want to proceed and who and how? I've attached the doc sent to you in the last email. Thank you, Ed

From: Jean AbiNader [<mailto:jabinader@moroccanamericancenter.com>]
Sent: Friday, June 01, 2012 11:28 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: FW: The State Legislators are coming to DC Wednesday-Wednesday

Might be an opportunity for them to meet the Ambassador.
Jean

From: Ralph Nurnberger [rnurnberger@grayglobalstrategies.com]
Sent: Friday, June 01, 2012 11:21 AM
To: Jean AbiNader
Subject: The State Legislators are coming to DC Wednesday-Wednesday

Jean:

Justin just called me. The heads of the legislator group that is considering holding their convention in Morocco will come to DC June 6 - 13. Might you (or Ed? someone from the embassy?--up to you) have time to meet with them?

I would not be available on June 6; open on June 7 after 10:30; although I need not be at such a meeting.

Thanks for considering this--hope this might work.

Ralph

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

To: The Honorable Edward Gabriel; Jean AbiNader
 From: Justin Gray
 Date: May 29, 2012
 Re: Transatlantic Leadership Forum for the State Legislative Leadership Foundation

Ed and Jean,

The State Legislative Leaders Foundation (“SLLF”) recently reached out to me and asked for assistance in helping them organize their upcoming Transatlantic Leadership Forum. They have a specific interest in doing this next event in Morocco. In pursuit of planning and executing this event, they were hoping to meet with you and senior leadership from the Embassy. For your reference, below is a brief summary of SLLF.

About SLLF:

The SLLF was established in 1972 as a nonprofit corporation dedicated to working with state legislative leaders in their efforts to reform the institution of the state legislature. SLLF’s earliest funding derived from a multi-million dollar Ford Foundation grant which was earmarked for a seven-state pilot project known as The Program for Legislative Improvement. The seven states selected for this project included: Ohio, Colorado, Minnesota, Arizona, Louisiana, Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Today, the SLLF is nationwide and has an advisory council of over 68 major U.S. companies.

SLLF seeks to educate and inspire our nation's current and future state political leaders regardless of party, politics or ideology. SLLF gives these leaders regular opportunities to take part in university-based educational programs that focus on many of the critical issues of our day. SLLF programs are designed to give them a sense of the high value of public service and the vital role they, as elected representatives of the people, play in our democracy.

SLLF leadership programs seek to educate leaders on a wide range of issue areas with national and global importance. For example, prior SLLF leadership programs have focused on how state legislators can impact key issue areas such as: healthcare; education; innovation and entrepreneurship; technology; economic recession and recovery; environment and energy; digital literacy; and “democracy 2.0” using digital media. With the advent of digital media, SLLF has also taken a strong interest in how legislators can utilize new tools to engage the public and encourage civic participation. SLLF’s most recent program, which was held in Providence, RI this past May, was on the topic of restoring the people’s trust in government.

SLLF Transatlantic Leadership Forum:

SLLF is looking for a host country for its next Transatlantic Leadership Forum. The upcoming Transatlantic Leadership Forum will bring together a group of forty (40) to sixty (60) individuals composed of senior US State Legislative Leaders and their counterparts from across the globe, representatives of the US business community and special guests to discuss matters of global importance with an impact on politics, foreign policy and the economy. SLLF is flexible on dates to hold their next conference and would welcome suggestions as to what dates would be the optimal for the conference in Morocco. Past Transatlantic Leadership Forums have been held in Barcelona, Spain (July 2011) and Dublin, Ireland (August 2010). Attached is more detailed background on SLLF and the Transatlantic Leadership Forum.

Home | Contact Us
About
Leadership Programs
Awards & Events
National Speakers Conference
Publications & Research
Leaders Digest

About Us

History
FAQ's
Board Of Directors
Staff
Advisory Council
Office Locations
Calendar

STAFF

"The State Legislative Leaders Foundation staff is without equal. With an average tenure well over 20 years, each person brings tremendous experience, exceptional skills, and complete dedication to the job. They are an honor to work with and the successes and accomplishments we have enjoyed over these past 40 years are a celebration of their talents." Stephen G. Lakis

Stephen G. Lakis
President

Stephen joined SLLF in 1972 just after it was established and through the following decade honed his political skills by working directly with state legislative leaders across the country on a series of legislative reform studies. In 1981, the Board of Directors appointed him President and Chief Executive Officer.

Stephen created the blueprint for bringing political, business and academic leaders together on college campuses to examine critical public policy issues and aspects of leadership. Over the course of his tenure the SLLF has grown into the preeminent nonpartisan legislative leadership organization in the land, reaching Senate Presidents, Speakers of the House, Majority and Minority leaders, and future leaders, with its unrivaled university-based educational programs.

In addition to overseeing all SLLF activities, he is a frequent speaker on legislative leadership, ethics, and legislative performance. He also has extensive experience in the international arena where he has organized scores of programs in Europe, Asia, and Latin America.

Stephen received his BA in Political Science from the University of Bridgeport. He also attended graduate school at American University. He is married to the former Evelene Corrigan and is the proud father of four grown children, two grown stepchildren, and grandfather of two perfect girls!

Marcia B. VanderVoort
Executive Vice President

Marcia VanderVoort has been with the State Legislative Leaders Foundation since 1981 and has served as Vice President since 1999 and Executive Vice President since 2010. She is the heart and soul of the Foundation!

Over the years Marcia has been involved with creating, planning and managing many of the Foundation's national and international educational programs. She has also assisted in editing several major research studies and virtually every significant piece of correspondence prepared by the Foundation's President, Steve Lakis. She works closely with the Board of Directors and has responsibility for the annual board meetings and the organization and management of the National Speakers Conference.

Marcia is a graduate of Newcomb College of Tulane University. She and her husband Tom have two adult children - Betsy (a graduate of Smith College and Suffolk Law School), and John (a graduate of Union College and now serving as a pilot in the Air Force) - and a beautiful granddaughter, Kinley Elizabeth.

Home | Contact Us

About Leadership Programs Awards & Events National Speakers Conference Publications & Research Leaders Digest

About Us

- History
- FAQ's
- Board Of Directors
- Staff
- Advisory Council
- Office Locations
- Calendar

Board of Directors

The SLLF is governed by a board of up to 45 House Speakers, Senate Presidents, Majority Leaders, Minority Leaders, and Pro Tempores.

Directors are elected to three year terms and are eligible for reelection. Legislative leaders may be nominated for membership on the board by a current director or on the recommendation of the President.

The Board meets regularly to review all ongoing SLLF programs and policies, approve the annual operating budget, oversee all fiscal audits, and discuss future SLLF initiatives.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS 2012

CHAIR
 Hon. Lois M. DeBerry
 House Speaker Pro Tempore
 Emeritus
 Tennessee

VICE CHAIR
 Hon. Eric Turner
 House Speaker Pro
 Tempore
 Indiana

DIRECTORS

Hon. B. Patrick Bauer
 House Minority Leader
 Indiana

Hon. Roger H. Bedford, Jr.
 Senate Minority Leader
 Alabama

Hon. Sharon Weston Broome
 Senate President Pro
 Tempore
 Louisiana

Hon. Michael E. Busch
 Speaker of the House
 Maryland

Hon. John F. Campbell
 Senate President Pro
 Tempore
 Vermont

Hon. Al Carlson
 House Majority Leader
 North Dakota

Hon. Mike Chenault
 Speaker of the House
 Alaska

Hon. Matt Dean
 House Majority Leader
 Minnesota

Hon. Jeff Fitzgerald
 Speaker of the House
 Wisconsin

Hon. Gordon D. Fox
 Speaker of the House
 Rhode Island

Hon. Joe Hackney
 House Minority Leader
 North Carolina

Hon. Robert W. Harrell, Jr.
 Speaker of the House
 South Carolina

Hon. Bernie Hunhoff
House Minority Leader
South Dakota

Hon. Tim Jones
House Majority Leader
Missouri

Hon. Martin M. Looney
Senate Majority Leader
Connecticut

Hon. Fiona Ma
Assembly Speaker Pro
Tempore
California

Hon. W. Ken Martinez
House Majority Floor
Leader
New Mexico

Hon. Thomas V. Mike
Miller, Jr.
President of the Senate
Maryland

Hon. Terie Norelli
House Minority Leader
New Hampshire

Hon. Robert Nutting
Speaker of the House
Maine

Hon. John Ocegüera
Speaker of the Assembly
Nevada

Hon. John A. Pérez
Speaker of the Assembly
California

Hon. Dominic F. Pileggi
Senate Majority Leader
Pennsylvania

Hon. Chip Rogers
Senate Majority Leader
Georgia

Hon. Calvin K. Y. Say
Speaker of the House
Hawaii

Hon. Michael Schneider
Senate President Pro
Tempore
Nevada

Hon. Gary Stevens
President of the Senate
Alaska

Hon. Joe Straus
Speaker of the House
Texas

State Legislative Leaders Foundation, 1645 Falmouth Road, Bldg. D, Centerville, MA 02632
508-771-3821 | 800-532-3375 | Fax: 508-771-0136 | info@sllf.org
805 15th Street, NW, Suite 425, Washington, DC 20005
202-568-6557 | Fax: 508-256-5511

Copyright © 2011, State Legislative Leaders Foundation. Website by dlfwebgroup.com

Home | Contact Us
About
Leadership Programs
Awards & Events
National Speakers Conference
Publications & Research
Leaders Digest

About Us

History
FAQ's
Board Of Directors
Staff
Advisory Council
Office Locations
Calendar

Advisory Council

Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers
 Altria Client Services, Inc.
 American Beverage Association
 American Traffic Solutions, Inc.
 Amgen
 Archer Daniels Midland Company
 Astellas Pharma US, Inc.
 AstraZeneca
AT&T Corporation
 Bentley Systems, Inc.
 Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation
 Bristol-Myers Squibb Company
 Brown-Forman Corporation
Chevron Corporation
 Coca-Cola Refreshments
Comcast
 Community Financial Services
 Covanta Energy Corporation
CTIA
 CVS Caremark
 Diageo
 Distilled Spirits Council of the United States
Entertainment Software Association
 General Electric Company
 GlaxoSmithKline
 Google
 Grocery Manufacturers Association
 GTECH
 IBM
 IMS Health
 International Paper
 Intuit
 JM Family Enterprises, Inc.
 Kraft Foods Global, Inc.

LKQ Corporation
 Mark Anthony Brands, Inc.
McDonalds Corporation
 MedImmune, Inc.
 Motion Picture Association of America
 Motorola Solutions
 National Beer Wholesalers Association
 National Seating and Mobility
 Nestle Waters North America
 News Corporation
 Novo Nordisk
 Nuclear Energy Institute
 Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP
 Pernod Ricard
 Pharmaceutical Research & Manufacturers (PhRMA)
 Property Casualty Insurers Association of America
 Raytheon Company
 Retail Industry Leaders Association (RILA)
 Reynolds American
 SAS Institute
 Security Finance Corporation
 Target Corporation
 The Carpet and Rug Institute
 The Home Depot
 The Procter & Gamble Company
 TracFone Wireless, Inc.
 Unilever United States, Inc.
 United Health Care
 United States Fireworks Safety Commission
 Verizon
 Wal-Mart Stores, Inc.
 Waste Management, Inc.
 WE Energies
 Wine Institute

Home | Contact Us
About
Leadership Programs
Awards & Events
National Speakers Conference
Publications & Research
Leaders Digest

LEADERSHIP PROGRAMS

2012 Leadership Forum
2012 Health Care Summit
2012 Majority Leaders Symposium
2012 Emerging Leaders Program
Past Leadership Programs
Calendar

2011 TRANSATLANTIC LEADERSHIP FORUM

Barcelona, Catalonia - Spain
July 27-31, 2011

"A Cry for Freedom: The Arab Spring and its Political Impact on the Mediterranean Region"

Host: Mr. Jordi XUCLÀ i COSTA, Member Spanish Parliament

Keynote Speaker: Hon. Jordi Pujol, former Prime Minister of Catalonia (1980-2003) and the premier expert on the politics of Catalonia.

This summer, sixteen US Legislative Leaders, thirteen of their European, Canadian, and Asian counterparts, representatives of the US business community, and special guests convened in Barcelona for SLLF's 13th Annual Transatlantic Leadership Forum. Home of the extraordinary architecture of Antoni Gaudi, Barcelona is Europe's 6th largest city and an economic powerhouse for the region.

The program, our first in Spain, was called "A Cry for Freedom: The Arab Spring and its Political Impact on the Mediterranean Region". Hosted by Member of the Spanish Parliament Hon. Jordi XUCLÀ i COSTA, the agenda focused on the 'Arab Spring' and Catalan regionalism. The participants from Catalonia hold a special appreciation for freedom and independence - Catalonia has won and lost its autonomy multiple times in its lengthy history. The discussions were sometimes intensely passionate. Participants from Egypt, for example, were critical of European and US policies towards the Middle East and said so. According to SLLF President Steve Lakis, the biggest issue - one that overrides all else with respect to policy in the region - is the Palestinian question. It's difficult to envision progress on most other issues without a resolution to this seemingly intractable conflict.

State Legislative Leaders Foundation, 1645 Falmouth Road, Bldg. D, Centerville, MA 02632
508-771-3821 | 800-532-3375 | Fax: 508-771-0136 | info@sllf.org
805 15th Street, NW, Suite 425, Washington, DC 20005
202-568-6557 | Fax: 508-256-5511

Copyright © 2011, State Legislative Leaders Foundation. Website by dlfwebgroup.com

Home | Contact Us
About
Leadership Programs
Awards & Events
National Speakers Conference
Publications & Research
Leaders Digest

LEADERSHIP PROGRAMS

2012 Leadership Forum
2012 Health Care Summit
2012 Emerging Leaders Program
Past Leadership Programs
Calendar

2010 International Program

Dublin, Ireland

August 17-22, 2010

Sixteen members of SLLF's Board of Directors and several of its Advisory Council members gathered with leaders from across Europe in the chamber of the Irish Parliament to discuss the economy of Ireland and the future of the Euro and the European Union. The European Union and the Euro: Prospects for the Future brought together policymakers from across Europe and the United States with experts on the economies and politics of Ireland and the EU. The discussions were informative and spirited.

Dr. John Fitz Gerald from the Economic and Social Research Institute (ESRI) in Dublin painted a hopeful, but challenging picture of the future of the Irish economy. He noted that economic growth had been inspired by universal access to education in the 1960's and free market expansion in the 1980's, but now was being stymied by a housing bust and increased pressure on the nation's social welfare network. He suggested that the Irish government has made the difficult, but correct choices, but would need to continue to make those hard choices to see the country through this region.

Ernst Wehlteke, former President of the Deutsche Bundesbank, argued that the Euro and the European Union would not only survive its recent crises, but would emerge stronger and more agile if we shift our focus from looking at causes of the crisis to working towards solutions. Those solutions should include increased transparency in the international banking system, stronger regulation of hedge funds and a better managed credit rating system that did not give NINJNA (No Income, No Jobs, No Assets) Loans.

The Hon. John Bruton, as a former Irish Prime Minister and EU Ambassador to the United States, brought a unique portfolio to his presentation. In leading a discussion of Europe and the United States, he suggested three key differences that define the relationship: expectations of government, confidence in the use of force to address international challenges and the importance of state sovereignty and autonomy. Further, he noted that the Europeans nations and the United States have a mutual interest in the strength of the European Union. On Saturday, David Marsh of the London and Oxford Group and author of Europe and the European Union offered insights into where the EU came from and where it is going. Most interestingly, he indicated that because of different regional economic prospects, the future of the union may have to rely on two monetary units, one for Northern countries and one for Southern members.

In addition to these highly informative sessions, participants also enjoyed all that Ireland has to offer including a walking tour of historic Dublin, a trip to the countryside and a tour and dinner at the Guinness Storehouse. Perhaps the highlight of the trip was an official dinner in St. Patrick's Hall of the famous Dublin Council (where England turned over power to Michael Collins in 1922 establishing Irish independence). It was, by all accounts, an amazing conference for one and all.

The Hon. Seamus Kirk TD,
Speaker of the Irish Parliament

L-R: Hon. Darko Fras, The National Council of Slovenia; Hon. Lois DeBerry, Speaker Pro Tem, Louisiana House of Representatives; Hon. Ferdinand Riederer, Switzerland; Stephen Lakis, President, SLLF; Dr. Karl W. Edtstadler, Chief Clerk of Salzburg House, Austria

Senator Phil Prendergast, County Tipperary; Gerry Been, Lord Mayor of Dublin

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, June 08, 2012 2:59 PM
To: Bouhlal, Rachad
Cc: Jordan Paul
Subject: Good News
Attachments: IRL letter June 2012.pdf

Very good news from Congresswomen Ileana Ros-Lehtinen. See her letter to Hillary Clinton. Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN, Florida
Chairman

CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH, New Jersey
DAN BURTON, Indiana
ELTON GALI EGLEY, California
DANA ROHRBACH, California
DONALD A. MANZULLO, Illinois
EDWARD R. ROYCE, California
STEVE CHABOT, Ohio
RON PAUL, Texas
MIKE PENCE, Indiana
JOE WILSON, South Carolina
CONNIE MCKE, Florida
JEFF FORTENBERRY, Nebraska
MICHAEL T. MCANULTY, Texas
TED POE, Texas
GUS M. BILIRAKIS, Florida
JEAN SCHMIDT, Ohio
BILL JOHNSON, Ohio
DAVID RIVERA, Florida
MIKE KELLY, Pennsylvania
TIM GRIFFIN, Arkansas
TOM MARINO, Pennsylvania
JEFF DUNCAN, South Carolina
ANN MARIE BUEKLE, New York
RENÉE ELLMERS, North Carolina
ROBERT TURNER, New York

YLEEN D. S. POBLETE
Staff Director

One Hundred Twelfth Congress
U.S. House of Representatives
Committee on Foreign Affairs
2170 Rayburn House Office Building
Washington, DC 20515
www.hcfa.house.gov

HOWARD L. BERMAN, California
Ranking Democratic Member

GARY L. ACKERMAN, New York
ENI F.H. FALEGMAVAAGA, American Samoa
BRAD SHERMAN, California
ELIOT L. ENGEL, New York
GREGORY W. MEeks, New York
RUSS CARRAHAN, Missouri
ALBIO SIRES, New Jersey
GERALD E. CONNOLLY, Virginia
THEODORE E. DEUTCH, Florida
DENNIS CARDÓZA, California
BEN CHANDLER, Kentucky
BRIAN HIGGINS, New York
ALLYSON SCHWARTZ, Pennsylvania
CHRISTOPHER S. MURPHY, Connecticut
FREDERICA WILSON, Florida
KAREN BASS, California
WILLIAM KEATING, Massachusetts
DAVID O'DILLINE, Rhode Island

RICHARD J. KESBLER
Democratic Staff Director

June 8, 2012

The Honorable Hillary Rodham Clinton
Secretary of State
Washington, DC 20520

Dear Madam Secretary:

I am writing to reiterate my concern over the lack of progress in resolving the current stalemate over the Western Sahara. Protracted United Nations negotiations over the Western Sahara have failed to produce substantive progress, while refugee camps nominally managed by the UN have persisted for decades, at the expense of over $1 billion from international donors. Reports also indicate that some activities in the camps may be contributing to regional instability.

I would appreciate your views as to what new actions (including offering relocation opportunities for those refugees who wish to do so) that the U.S. can encourage the UN to take to end this impasse, mitigate the refugee crisis, reduce the costs to the U.S. and international donors of the UN's activities regarding Western Sahara, and seek a fair, just, and enduring solution to the status of the Western Sahara—which is the objective of the proposal for autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty—in order to promote regional integration and protect U.S. security interests in the region.

Sincerely,

ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN
Chairman

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, June 18, 2012 7:18 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS situtiaton report

The information contained in this report is from a generally reliable source but has not been corroborated by third party sources.

(i)According to a Moroccan senior civil servant who attended sessions of the Morocco-Tunisia High Commission, chaired by the two countries' Islamist prime ministers in Rabat on June 15, the Sahara question was raised in these meetings. Morocco's PJD, which until it came to power had little to say about the Sahara issue, now wants to place it at the heart of the government's North Africa policy. Moroccan Prime Minister Benkirane told his Tunisian counterpart that the coming Maghreb countries summit, slotted for October 10, 2012 in Tunisia, will not have the desired outcome unless the countries of North Africa succeed in settling the Sahara conflict via the only viable option — that is autonomy for the territory under Moroccan sovereignty. Noting that the UN has not succeeded in imposing a solution, Benkirane argued that the Maghreb countries have to find a way to end the Sahara conflict. The Moroccans were surprised to find that Tunisia's prime minister, Hamadi Jebali, appeared convinced by their approach, which would represent a major evolution in Tunisia's traditional position of neutrality on the Sahara issue.

(ii)According to a journalist at the UN headquarters, where the Special Committee of the 24 on Decolonisation is currently looking into the Sahara conflict, Morocco has officially asked the UN Secretary General for a "assessment pause" in negotiations with Polisario. Talks will go nowhere as long as Polisario persists in rejecting everything and proposing nothing, argue the Moroccans. Moroccan diplomats hinted that without such an assessment, it would be "pointless" for their country to participate in a new negotiations session.

(iii)A member of Polisario's national secretariat tells us that during their recent visit to Tindouf, a delegation of African foreign ministers (including those of South Africa, Zimbabwe and Zambia) asked Polisario leaders, including Mohamed Abdelaziz, to keep a lower profile than usual at the African summit of July 9, 2012. According to the source, who expressed some concern at this development, members of the Polisario national secretariat interpreted this as a first step towards a reconsideration of Sadr's position in the African Union.

(iv)According to a member of a Sahrawi NGO in Algiers who was present at the Sahrawi Martyrs Day commemorations in Tindouf, Sadr defence minister Mohamed Lamine Bouhali is working with his close aides on a reorganisation of Sahrawi armed forces and security services, aimed at shifting their focus from a doctrine of war and military operations against Moroccan positions to a strategy of "destabilisation" on the whole of Moroccan territory. The reason for such a shift is clear: Polisario no longer has the means to purchase weapons of war and Algeria is not disposed to assist it in procurement. Algeria no longer supplies Polisario with heavy war weaponry, providing only side arms used by security services and for policing purposes.

END

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, June 26, 2012 8:22 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: May 2012 Events Bulletin
Attachments: SR_May2012EventsBulletin.docx

Dear Team,

Below please find the May 2012 MAC Events Bulletin. Our team compiles a monthly list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

May 2012 Events Bulletin

May 7

Islamism and the Arab Spring

May 9

Crisis in the Sahel: Bitter Fruit of the Arab Spring

May 10

The Arab Awakening: Implications for al-Qaeda and the Future of Terrorism

May 10

Security Sector Transformation in North Africa and the Middle East

May 11

Opportunities to Advance Human Rights Reporting

May 14

Is the Arab Spring Marginalizing Women?

May 15

Delivering Dignity in the Arab World through Political and Economic Reform

May 24

Welcome Luncheon for Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal

May 31

The Crisis in Northern Mali: Implications for a Region in Flux

.....

Islamism and the Arab Spring

Date: 7 May 2012

1. Title: Islamism and the Arab Spring

Hosted by Foreign Policy Research Institute (FPRI) and the Reserve Officers Association

Participants:

Michael Doran: Senior Fellow, The Brookings Institution

Samuel Helfont: Associate Scholar, FPRI; Ph. D. Candidate, Princeton University

Marina Ottaway: Senior Associate, Middle East Program, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Eric Trager: Ira Weiner Fellow, Washington Institute for Near East Policy

Tally Helfont: Moderator: FPRI

2. Overview

Despite the secular nature of many of the protest movements associated with the Arab uprisings, Islamist parties have swept democratic elections across the region, contributing to unease and uncertainty both domestically and abroad. US policymakers and analysts are divided thus far in their responses to this turn of events. How should the US deal with the new regimes that bear a distinctly Islamist character? What will be the state of US alliances in the new Middle East and North Africa and how will they affect core American interests in the region? It is critical for Washington to understand the individual groups that are gaining power in the Middle East and North Africa and to define its interests and goals in dealing with these new power holders. FPRI's panel discussion addressed these challenges and their implications for US foreign policy.

3. Summary

Tally Helfont asked the panelists to address a few specific questions: What has the Arab Spring taught observers about the nature of Islamism? What are the Islamists' objectives? What is the future of Islamism in the region? What does it mean to be a moderate Islamist?

Michael Doran replied that all of Ms. Helfont's questions lead to one central concern: "Is Islamism a strategic threat to the US?" It is not, he concluded. Washington's four vital national interests—free flow of oil, nuclear non-proliferation, counter-terrorism, and protection of Israel—are not jeopardized by the emergence of powerful Islamist actors in the Middle East and North Africa. Oil is concentrated in the Gulf, which has proved very stable in comparison with the rest of the region. Some would argue that the Islamists' electoral success represents a net victory for al-Qaeda, and thus a blow to US counter-terror operations. However, recent events have failed to disrupt the gradual trend of al-Qaeda's political marginalization. The group finds a happy home in Afghanistan, failed states, and semi-failed states, but its willingness to kill fellow Muslims has pushed it to the periphery elsewhere. Local populations simply will not stand for this kind of violence, and the group cannot maintain a political foothold. Protection of Israel, Doran admitted, is a thornier subject. Mubarak was a staunch supporter of the Camp David Accords, but in his absence, the demilitarization of Sinai appears less certain. However, the Egyptian military is loath to engage in a war with Israel at the expense of its aid relationship with the US. Doran noted that his insights rest on the premise that the US doesn't have a competitor for regional influence; if China, for example, decided to intervene and undermine American interests as the Soviet Union did in the 1950s, the situation would change radically.

Samuel Helfont focused on Islamism's impact on regional politics. He divided the pre-Arab Spring Middle East into two camps: Pro-Western moderates supporting the status quo and the Islamists. Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and most of the GCC comprised the first bloc while Iran, Hezbollah, Syria, and the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and

Jordan comprised the second. Throughout the region, Islamists rebelling against their secular Arab governments have attracted mostly uniform responses, except in Syria, where rapidly-escalating conflicts have prevented shared interests from coalescing into a lasting alliance. The old Islamist bloc is breaking down. Tehran's unwavering support for Assad has stressed its relations with former friends. Hamas and Turkey, for example, have alienated Iran as they shift support from Assad to the opposition. Iran's actions have adopted a certain discontinuity, as it claims that the Arab Spring is its brainchild while simultaneously backing Assad. Many Gulf regimes are non-democratic autocrats like Assad, but they support the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood. As the conflict in Syria persists, Helfont warned, it will be increasingly difficult for these groups to come together. Negative ripple effects will shape the future Middle East, and could create conflicts elsewhere. There is already a proxy war between Saudi Arabia and Iran, and Syria has stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction. The US has a very strong interest in resolving this issue, or at least "keeping it at a simmer." Washington's only real option is to make its interests explicit. "We need to establish red lines, particularly concerning anti-terrorism and support for foreign wars." The US cannot intervene militarily, but must be clear about what is and what is not acceptable to avoid any misunderstandings.

Marina Ottaway shifted the discussion to defining Islamism. Islamist movements are very much national movements, she explained. They share certain ideas and characteristics, but are specific to each country; there is no established consensus among them. She reflected on her personal exposure to Islamist groups: "A few years ago at Carnegie we held periodic meetings with leaders of various Islamist movements. We discovered that they were having similar internal debates without realizing it." Some Islamists are democratic, like Turkey's AKP, while others talk about establishing a Caliphate. The two principal Islamist groups that concern the US and its policy interests are the Muslim Brotherhood and the Salafists. Members of the Brotherhood are familiar with the political process and believe in democratic government. The Salafists, conversely, have traditionally avoided politics. They historically believed that a society must adhere to the tenets of the Qur'an and the Sunna, which stipulate obedience to the ruler. They are gradually entering the political arena and will most likely increase their presence in the coming years.

Throughout the region, the Islamists' recent electoral successes can be attributed more to their organizational superiority and political experience than their ideology, Ottaway continued. In Morocco, for example, the PJD was the only party that released a comprehensive manifesto and followed an effective campaign strategy. The PJD organized people rather than "politicizing" them. Moroccan Salafists are also gaining support and political skills. In Tunisia and Egypt, for example, a palpable tension is growing between the Islamists and the secularists. They mix neither socially nor politically; the Islamists see the secularists as par of the old elite, and the secularists feel their interests and influence threatened by these new actors.

Eric Trager spoke briefly about various ideologies that characterize Islamists as a group and then argued that Egypt is the most important country vis-à-vis American interests. Liberalism is mutually exclusive with theocracy, and the basic tenet of Islamism is that Sharia should be implemented as the basis of law, Trager asserted. However, interpretations vary among different groups. Salafists seek to recreate the community during the time of the Prophet by directly implementing Sharia. The Muslim Brothers follow a broader interpretation of Sharia. They understand freedom as the freedom to live under religious law, and thus, see the secularists as oppressive. Both groups intend to craft political systems in which law derives from Sharia, which means that all political dialogue will arise from religion. This can only lead to a competitive theocracy, not a competitive democracy.

Trager then compared recruitment processes for the Muslim Brotherhood and the Salafists. In Egypt, being a member of the Muslim Brotherhood is not comparable to being a Democrat or a Republican in the US. The group imposes a very strict and rigorous recruitment system. All together it is a five to eight year process and prospective members are tested at every level. Those who eventually join the Brotherhood are very unlikely to leave it. Joining the Salafists, conversely, is much easier. One simply declares that he is committed to living according to the life of the Prophet and to follow a sheikh. The group is lacking a structured hierarchy; they are less organized and less political. The recruitment process clearly favors the Salafists, Trager concluded. If they are able to organize, they will be very successful politically. He concluded by reiterating that Egypt is heading toward a competitive theocracy between two very anti-American parties.

4. Q & A

Q: (Tally Helfont) Could each panelist briefly respond to the other panelists' comments and give suggestions for future US engagement in the region?

A: (Doran) I agree with Eric's refutation of Islamists as a homogenous group, but I do not think that the Salafists are capable of presenting a unified front or working toward a common strategic goal. They will fight amongst themselves, and with the Brotherhood, and in the end, they will hate each other more than they hate the US. In terms of American engagement, I agree with Sam. Washington's priority need to be deciding on red lines and making them perfectly clear. The US should also focus on Syria, where it has an opportunity to shift the balance against Iran.

(Samuel Helfont) I also agree with Eric's basic points, but I don't think debating Sharia is productive from a policy standpoint. Sharia is used in the Arab world as a catch-all; it is comparable to being in favor of "freedom" here in the US and gives little indication of a group's actual political concerns. Washington needs to focus on establishing red lines in terms of concrete policies rather than Sharia, which is so ambiguous. Regardless of whether or not policies are part of Sharia, we need to have a position on them.

(Ottaway) I disagree with Eric. Some Islamists are looking to implement a version of Sharia that is consistent with 13th century interpretations of Islam, but it is impossible to define what it means to different Islamist groups. I also don't agree with his description of the Muslim Brotherhood. A minority of the Brotherhood's supporters actually went through the recruitment process. The US should not automatically take a hard line against Islamists, or jump to the conclusion that they will undoubtedly pursue policies antithetical to American interests.

(Trager) Sharia can be interpreted many ways, but there are some critical sentiments. It is plausible that the Salafists will not be able to keep it together, and the Brotherhood does have many more supporters than members. However, this is due to their ability to organize. The groups within the Brotherhood are small and Islamist, and they show no signs of breaking off and creating new liberal factions. The US needs to maintain a certain realism about its communications with the Muslim Brotherhood.

Q: What is the future of the Egypt's Coptic Christians? Where can they go? Is it reasonable to expect them to go on living in Egypt?

A: (Trager) Reliable figures about how many Coptic Christians have already emigrated are not available, but it is probably about 100,000. Wealthier Egyptians are considering moving to the US, Canada, or Europe. However, many are extremely poor and don't have this option. Church burnings have exacerbated sectarian tensions and intensified fears of persecution and exclusion from the political process.

(Ottaway) The position of the Copts was not great before the Islamists, and there are some positive developments that should be acknowledged. The Brotherhood made an effort to protect the churches on Christmas, so the Christians could attend services. Sharia was already the driving ideology behind Egypt's constitution, and there is nothing in Sharia that stipulates depriving Christians of their rights. This question should be approached with an open mind; they could be fine.

Q: Can you comment on economic concerns?

A: (Doran) I think the state of affairs is not as disturbing as it may seem. These countries, especially Egypt, need things that only the US can provide. The Egyptian economy is on the verge of collapse and it desperately needs the support of the US. There are no external supporters waiting in the wings to replace US assistance. Anti-Americanism may appear prevalent, but this movement is really about changing Egypt. Our vital interests are secure for the most part.

(Trager) Reserves are low and this presents a real problem. That the Islamists need Washington to bail them out will probably benefit US interests in the long run. So far they have held up an IMF loan, but that concerned an internal struggle with the military. At the end of the day, Egypt needs the US, and that will make any emerging leaders more receptive to American policy there.

Q: How do you picture the region after 10 years of Islamist governance?

A: (Ottaway) The Islamists will unquestionably lose votes in the next election. They cannot solve all of their countries' problems. Whether or not a viable secular opposition will materialize is a different issue. They secularists continue to insult those they should be courting.

(Trager) There is a benefit to ongoing competition, but the US should not want something for Egypt more than the Egyptians want it for themselves. The more Washington gets involved, the more American interests become a political foothold.

Q: (Tally Helfont): Can you speak about developments that could jeopardize our military considerations?

A: (Samuel Helfont) There is a proxy war in Syria between Iran and the Gulf States. If this escalates, Saudi arms could very well be used against Iranian troops in Syria. If chemical weapons go missing, there will be serious issues. Syrian refugees flowing into Turkey also present a troubling situation. Opposition forces are actively organizing within Turkey's borders, and Syrian forces are staging open attacks in Turkey. Turkey could invoke article 5 of NATO, as they are technically under attack from a foreign country. If the US fails to respond, it would undermine the treaty.

(Doran): The Obama Administration seeks to reduce its Gulf presence. A war in Syria, revolution or instability in Saudi Arabia, or an Israeli attack in Iran would all compel Washington to intervene. If the US fails to curb Iran's nuclear aspirations, nuclear weapons could proliferate in the region, which would inherently change American military engagement there.

Q: Is establishing the Caliphate a unifying goal among Islamists?

A: (Doran) The Caliphate is more symbolic than an aspiration. It is like Americans wanting everyone to be free and rich.

(Ottaway) It's like worrying about the Holy Roman Empire making a comeback, it isn't going to happen.

Q: How far can Washington push Turkey to advance American interests with respect to the Arab Spring?

A: (Doran) As I said before, the Obama Administration wants to extricate the US from the region. The Arab Spring presents Washington with a strategic opportunity, and acting multilaterally will not suffice. The US needs to put together another "coalition of the willing" and work with the Turks, the Saudis, and the French. Assad is far from finished, and a prolonged period of violence and disruption in Syria presents strategic threats to surrounding countries such as Israel, Turkey, and Lebanon.

(Samuel Helfont) The US must be very clear with Turkey considering what it is willing to do. The Turks want to stop the inflow of refugees; if the US is not willing to help, Washington needs to leave no room for misunderstandings.

(Ottaway) The Turks have their own interests and will not help the US pursue its own.

5. Observation

This event was a webcast. The panelists focused on the Muslim Brotherhood and the Salafists as the two principal competing Islamist groups and only briefly touched on other parties like the PJD or Ennahda. Marina Ottaway argued that the PJD has been successful because they are effective organizers and skilled politicians, not Islamist ideologues. She suggested that Benkirane's party will most likely lose votes in the next election, as other parties—including the Salafists—gain political experience. In terms of American foreign policy in the region, the panelists agreed that Washington must put forward coherent and concrete policies, clearly communicating its stance on various issues so as to avoid any misunderstandings. With the exception of Ms. Ottaway, they insisted that establishing "red lines" should be a principal tenet of US engagement in the region. Ms. Ottaway made an interesting point when she argued that a hard-line approach would not serve American interests and that Washington should approach these emerging actors with an open mind and willingness to collaborate.

\(Back to top\)

Crisis in the Sahel: Bitter Fruit of the Arab Spring

Date: 9 May 2012

1. Title: Crisis in the Sahel: Bitter Fruit of the Arab Spring

Hosted by the Heritage Foundation

Panelists:

Alexis Areiff: Analyst in African Affairs, Congressional Research Service

J. Peter Pham, Ph.D.: Director, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, The Atlantic Council

Manoela Borges: Desk Officer for Mauritania and Mali, Department of State

James Philips: Senior Research Fellow for Middle Eastern Affairs, The Heritage Foundation

Morgan Roach: Moderator: Research Associate, The Heritage Foundation

2. Overview

As one of Africa's least governed spaces, the Sahel region offers militant groups the advantage of operating with relative ease. Last year's civil war in Libya, resulting in the demise of the Qaddafi regime, has exacerbated this long-standing problem. With a gaping power vacuum across the region, terrorist groups such as al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and regional rebel and criminal groups have the opportunity to expand their influence. This poses significant security concerns not only for the region, but also for the United States. At this event, panelists discussed the implications the crisis in the Sahel on US foreign policy and provided recommendations on how the US should respond to this growing threat.

3. Summary

Morgan Roach opened the event by detailing the current crisis in Mali. She noted that the return of 2,000 armed

Tuaregs who had been fighting for Qaddafi in Libya exacerbated the ongoing conflict between the Movement for the Liberation of Azawad (MNLA) and the central government, which in turn led to the coup in Bamako. The situation in the North quickly descended into chaos as Azawad has been unable to assert leadership over the various actors in the region, including Ansar al-Dine, AQIM, and other independent criminal network. The violence has caused thousands of civilians to flee, thus exacerbating a food and humanitarian crisis across the Sahel. Roach underscored that the situation in Mali threatens to distort regional stability and asked the panelists to provide their own assessment of the situation, as well as recommendations for US policy toward Mali and the Sahel.

James Phillips primarily analyzed events in Libya, arguing that what is happening in the Sahel is largely fallout from the conflict in Libya. The availability of arms from Qaddafi's warehouses and the return of heavily armed Tuaregs to the region have bolstered dissident political and criminal movements, creating serious security problems. Phillips likewise detailed some of the primary actors operating in this zone of lawlessness, which in his estimation includes Libya. Although AQIM is one of weaker al-Qaeda franchises according to Phillips, it has been strengthened by its acquisition of Libyan weapons, including MANPADS. Phillips argued that AQIM is nevertheless limited in its attempts to spread across the Sahel because of its domination by Algerian Islamists. How its involvement in Mali plays out is yet to be seen – at present, it appears that AQIM is splintering into disparate groups, with some cells remaining dominated by Algerians, and others becoming more open to members from the Sahelian countries. Phillips' primary recommendation was that the US must help the countries of the region reclaim missing Libyan weapons.

Dr. J. Peter Pham explored two primary issues: current challenges to states in the Sahel region and the current crisis in Mali. With regard to the former, he stated that there are three primary challenges to governance in the Sahelian countries. First, the weakness of state institutions and the prevalence of corruption present a serious challenge to governance in the Sahel. Second, internal divisions across the Sahel belt make it difficult for states to exert control over the entirety of their territory. In Mali, for example, there are divisions not only between the North and South, but also within the North between the "black" tribes (Fulani, Songhai) and the "white" tribes (Tuareg, Moors). Third, the radicalization of youth, due to a large demographic bulge and a lack of economic opportunities, presents a threat to the stability of these states.

Turning to Mali, Dr. Pham argued that the country is a failing, if not failed state. He drew three primary lessons from the current situation in Mali and provided a number of recommendations for confronting the current crisis. First, the primary lesson learned is that pragmatism is required in US policy responses because pragmatism is the primary strategy of groups operating in the North. Pham argued that experts should stop labeling groups under one grouping or another, such as "Islamist" or "separatist" or "nationalist" because doing so means making assumptions about their actions that limit our understanding of these groups. In the case of Mali, because experts had labeled groups as nationalist or Islamist, they assumed that they wouldn't work together because they had different interests. In actuality, they did link up and work together toward a common cause because they had a pragmatic rather than ideological strategy. The MNLA didn't have enough manpower despite the influx of Libyan weapons, so it turned to Iyad Ag Ghaly, a former Tuareg nationalist turned Salafist leader and founder of Ansar al-Dine, which in turn had connections with the former GSPC and current AQIM (Ghaly is the cousin of AQIM commander Hamada Ag Hama). Ghaly lent his support and thus a wall of separation between "nationalists" and "Islamists" came down. The MNLA nevertheless got more than it asked for, as Ansar al-Dine has asserted its authority in Kidal and AQIM has done so in Gao and Timbuktu. Who has the upper hand now? According to Dr. Pham, it seems that the Islamists do. Sharia law and Islamic punishments have been imposed in Kidal and Gao. Likewise the recent burning of a Sufi mausoleum indicates that the Islamists are indeed in charge. Second, the diversity of ethnic groups and the divisions between them cannot be understated. Northern Mali is a scarcely inhabited place populated by a number of groups. Although Tuaregs represent the plurality of inhabitants, there are various militant groups operating in the region, both "black" vs. "white" as well as "Arab" versus "Islamist." Third, the situation in Northern Mali is at the very least an indictment of US counterterrorism policy in the region. The situation happened so quickly that it calls into question US assistance efforts on security issues. There is nothing wrong with the Trans-Saharan Counterterrorism Partnership (TSCTP), but the model must be questioned given recent events. Dr. Pham questioned how the Malian army fights terrorism when it is unable to control a counterinsurgency.

Given these challenges, Dr. Pham called for a long-term commitment to the Sahel, both for security assistance and development assistance. For Mali specifically, Dr. Pham stressed that there needs to be a commitment to stopping the crisis from spreading beyond its borders to other insecure states in the region, including Niger, Mauritania, Libya, and Algeria – all states that are facing instability and security threats. The borders in this region are fluid and it does not appear that there is a force capable of restoring the Malian government at this time, but the threat must be contained at all costs. Dr. Pham called on the US to work with ECOWAS and the African Union to reconstitute a legitimate government in Bamako and retrain the military. Only then can one think about addressing the situation in the North, where no one really knows who is in charge. Dr. Pham noted that resolving the conflict with the North will be a multi-year endeavor and that in the meantime restoring order and leadership in Bamako is the most important thing that needs to be done.

Manoela Borges detailed current US engagement with Sahelian countries to address both the security crisis in Mali and the humanitarian crisis across the Sahel. The US is working to build the capacity of these states to handle threats on their own; however, the current capacity of these states to do so is low. The TSCTP helps with building security capacity, but more regional cooperation is needed. Although security threats to the Sahel are of concern to the US and its interests, Borges did highlight that because AQIM has not made threats against the US, the State Department is being extraordinarily careful to not “Americanize” the threat. In Mali specifically, State is pursuing diplomatic engagement at the regional level through ECOWAS, and the bi-lateral level through direct engagement with concerned countries. Borges reiterated Dr. Pham’s recommendation that the priority of the US is, as it must be, to restore democratic governance to Mali and establish a timeline for elections before turning to the North. Mali first needs a legitimate government in order to address longer-term concerns.

Alexis Areiff focused on US policy in the region. She noted that the Sahel has only become an area of concern to the US from a security perspective in the last decade; there has been a growing focus on the region because of the attacks of September 11th and the growing influence of the theory linking weak and failing states to terrorism, insecurity, and transnational security threats. Areiff expressed similar concerns to Dr. Pham as to the relevance of US counterterrorism policy in the aftermath of the coup in Mali. She posited, “Who are the US partners in the region if we can no longer work with militaries after they have led coups, such as in Mali, Niger, and Mauritania?” Debates over the US military presence are thus understandable. Areiff also mentioned that the US has competing policy objectives in the region – one the one hand it wants to work with democratically elected governments to counter terrorism in the region, but on the other hand, it wants to counter terrorism in the region with national partners to build their capacity – two issues that are not always in synch given coups in Mali, Mauritania, and Niger. Areiff questioned how viable the TSTCP policy was given its need for partner governments in the region.

4. Q & A

Q: (Roach) The Malian coup leader was trained by the US military. Do you have any comments or insights on the implications of this?

A: (Borges) Following the coup, the US undertook a policy review of all forms of assistance to Mali. We terminated security assistance and applied legal sanctions to the military following the review. We still have a policy hold on other forms of assistance, with the exception of humanitarian assistance and assistance for democratic elections. As for the military training of Captain Sanogo, the US trains future leaders in countries with very little capacity. This was an unfortunate coincidence.

(Pham) We need not paint everything with one broad stroke – we need more flexible policy vehicles for dealing with coups.

Q: (Daniel Moro, SAIS) What is your assessment of Algeria’s reaction to the situation in Mali?

A: (Areiff) The crisis in Libya pushed all of Algeria’s buttons. Algeria wasn’t helpful in promoting Western policy on Libya because it supported Qaddafi, feared a security vacuum, and opposed a NATO intervention on its borders. This was indicative of its reaction to the Arab Spring – just this weekend the Prime Minister called the Arab Spring a catastrophe. With regards to the security threat, Algeria has tried to marshal a regional response to terrorism, taking the leadership role with smaller Sahelian nations and excluding Morocco. But this has not always been welcome by Sahel states, which have a love/hate relationship with Algeria and its meddling. The threat to Algeria is nevertheless very real – the kidnapping of aid workers from the camps in Tindouf and the kidnapping of diplomats in Mali by the AQIM-splinter group, the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in Africa (MUJAO), highlights how Algeria has been hit on all sides. I don’t, however, see a strategic response from Algeria.

(Pham) Algeria has been ambivalent. It has not yet been hit by the Arab Spring, which has affected all of its neighbors in various ways. There was a relatively peaceful revolution in Tunisia, a violent one in Libya, and Morocco tried to get ahead of the parade through reforms. Algeria’s response to regional issues is heavily influenced by its rivalry with Morocco, which obstructs not only counterterrorism cooperation but also economic integration, which is urgently required to address the security threats we have been talking about today. What is particularly interesting is that Algeria clearly doesn’t want an independent Azawad, but has for thirty years supported the creation of an “Azawad on the sea” while supporting independence for the Western Sahara.

(Borges) Algeria’s involvement in the region is complex, but very important. Its relationship with the Tuaregs and its mediation in previous Tuareg conflicts has been essential. The US is engaged with Algeria and ECOWAS to coordinate a response to the situation in Mali.

Q: (H.E.M. Maman S. Sidikou, Ambassador of Niger to the US) We have heard allegations of links between Boko

Haram and AQIM and now are hearing reports that in addition to the presence of those two groups in Mali, there are reportedly Pakistanis and other jihadis arriving in Mali. What is al-Qaeda's strategy for the region? We need to understand it in order for countries to provide solutions for themselves.

A: (Pham) AQIM's strategy has two principal pillars. First, it uses the Sahel as a real base for its primary target – the Kabilye region in northern Algeria. It also uses the Sahel to bring in money for its aims by engaging in trafficking and kidnapping for ransom. Second, it wants to spread its ideology and bolster its connections with other armed groups. We have seen this in its links with Boko Haram. However, there have been divisions within AQIM. Some cells have been accused of being too interested in making money and not focusing enough on ideology. In detailing the reasons for its split, MUJAO has claimed both the AQIM was not extremist enough and that it was too Arab. So, what can be done? It will be a long-time before Mali is sorted out, so our priorities have to be about containing it. We need to prioritize resources to strengthen the government in Bamako.

(Arieff) This gets back to the pragmatism and the opportunism of different actors. AQIM has been opportunistic in getting involved in northern Mali. But it may have overreached by jumping in without much thought. We need to find a way to turn it into a setback.

(Borges) Every week it seems as though there are new groups popping up in Mali. We need to understand them in order to be able to develop an appropriate policy response.

5. Observation

Approximately 40 policymakers and regional experts attended the event at the Heritage Foundation. The panelists all discussed the current security crisis in Mali and the Sahel, echoing concerns about the fallout from the revolution in Libya that have been present in the media and in think tank circles for over a year. Although spreading the message about the importance of the Sahel and advocating for US engagement on this issue among a wider audience is always helpful, the panelists did not add much new to current thinking on the security threat in the Sahel, nor did they provide novel recommendations for how to confront it. The representative from the State Department provided the usual statement about all that the US is doing in the region in order to justify its actions to date. Interestingly, following Dr. Pham's important reference and warning about the possibility of an Azawad on the sea in the Western Sahara, Borges appeared almost defensive about Algeria's role and leadership on security issues in the region. Rather than weakening Algeria's position in the region, it appears that the events of Libya and Mali have in fact strengthened it, at least in the minds of some policymakers, despite widespread acknowledgement of Algeria's obstinacy to US interests in Libya and to a negotiated resolution of the Western Sahara.

The panel highlighted yet again that the threat of security in the Sahel is at last receiving widespread attention and that there is increased engagement from the think tank and policy community on the region. However, with the exception of Dr. Pham, no one acknowledged the obstacle of the Western Sahara to regional counterterrorism cooperation, nor did anyone recommend US efforts to promote Algerian-Moroccan cooperation. Arieff mentioned Algeria's explicit decision to leave Morocco out of its regional counterterrorism initiative, but unfortunately did not detail the implications of that decision. The security argument alone is thus not enough to spur US action on the Western Sahara; it will need to be continually linked to the importance of regional counterterrorism cooperation and economic integration in order to be effective in promoting a resolution of the Western Sahara.

For a video of the event and a complete copy of the report, please visit:

<http://www.heritage.org/events/2012/05/crisis-in-the-sahel>

\(Back to top\)

The Arab Awakening: Implications for al-Qaeda and the Future of Terrorism

Date: 10 May 2012

1. Title: The Arab Awakening: Implications for al-Qaeda and the Future of Terrorism

Hosted by Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars

Panelists:

Jon Alterman: Brzezinski Chair in Global Security and Director, Middle East Program, Center for Strategic and International Studies

Barak Barfi: Research Fellow, New America Foundation

Daniel Byman: Professor, School of Foreign Service, Georgetown University

Daveed Gartenstein-Ross: Fellow, Foundation for Defense of Democracies

Bruce Hoffman: Moderator: Professor and Director, Center for Peace and Security Studies and Security Studies Program, Georgetown University

2. Overview

The Arab Awakening has raised a number of questions about the future viability of al-Qaeda in the region. Many analysts claimed that the revolutions that took place in Tunisia, Libya, and Egypt were a blow to al-Qaeda's ideology – mass protests resulting in regime change showed that civilians could affect popular change without violence. In addition, the presence and victory of Islamist parties highlighted that those seeking a greater role for Islam in the political space could do so through political parties and elections, rather than through terror. Others argued that the fall of governments that were strong allies in the global war on terror and the violence used to achieve some of these revolutions could only result in increased insecurity. Even if new governments are willing to take a hard line against Islamic terrorism, they are much weaker than their predecessors who ruled autocratically. At this event, expert panelists explored whether the Arab Awakening has marginalized al-Qaeda or whether it has presented opportunities, such as sectarian tensions, that it can exploit.

3. Summary

Jane Harman, President of the Wilson Center, introduced the event. She underscored that the threat of al-Qaeda is different, but that it is still out there. She likewise noted that the rise of Islamist parties as a "game changer." Al-Qaeda's polling number are currently very low and Harman posited that this was perhaps due to the success of Islamist political parties, who have shown that there is another way for people to express their views – through the political process.

Jon Alterman spoke first about al-Qaeda's primary failure. The real threat of the organization was that it would go from the extreme fringe to the mainstream of Islamic thinking, capitalizing on popular dissatisfaction that was real and present. That has failed; al-Qaeda has been unable to win broad support. Why not? Alterman noted three primary reasons. First, it killed a lot of Muslims – more than non-Muslims in fact. Second, it never presented a positive agenda. Third, states linked up strongly against al-Qaeda, mobilizing the cleric establishment to delegitimize al-Qaeda's Islamic message. Taking away its religious legitimacy was essential in limiting al-Qaeda's mass appeal. However, because these latter efforts were state-led, what do you do now that these states have failed and popular grievances have not gone away? Alterman suggested that despite this primary failure, the durability of al-Qaeda's ideas remain. He argued that there will not be an al-Qaeda insurgency as a global organization, but that its ideas will ensure on a smaller level. For example, continued chaos in Syria and Yemen will boost al-Qaeda, but it will be forced to operate on a smaller scale because politics by and large has set al-Qaeda back. Alterman offered his conclusions on the legacy of all of this. For one, the Arab Awakening signifies the demise of Salafi jihadism. However, it also signifies the end of Salafi "quietism." Previously, those Salafis who were not involved in terrorism stayed out of politics and avoided criticizing the ruler because of an unspoken agreement between the clerics and the state. The Arab Awakening has changed that agreement and now the Salafis engage in politics and criticize leaders. The rise of Salafi politics may thus be the long term impact of al-Qaeda.

Barak Barfi talked about al-Qaeda's challenges and opportunities as a result of the Arab Awakening and then focused on the specific case of al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM). Barfi stressed that al-Qaeda's propaganda against rulers no longer holds because the Arab Awakening has proven that change can come about without violent rebellions. Al-Qaeda has thus suffered setback in the short-term. Barfi cautioned, however, that in the long-term, al-Qaeda might benefit from inevitable political and economic problems that result from the potential failings of democracy. He stressed that democracy is not a cure all and that will be a gap between expectations and realities in many countries that have experienced a transition – this gap will be a recruiting tool from al-Qaeda. Barfi also warned that many Salafi scholars argue that Islam is not compatible with democracy and that Islamist groups are in fact using their current power to create constitutions based on sharia law. If they fail to do so, al-Qaeda will again have a raison d'être.

Turning to its regional affiliate in North Africa, Barfi argued that the political arena AQIM works in differs from that of the other affiliates. Although its home country of Algeria has not been impacted by the Arab Spring, it has still had to grapple with its outcomes. It is nevertheless well-placed to benefit from insecurity and instability in North Africa because AQIM exploits ungoverned spaces and conflict zones. The crisis in northern Mali, an area that has never known government because it is simply too large of a space to govern, illustrates the potential of al-Qaeda, which is now out of hiding and operating in plain sight in Timbuktu. Barfi nevertheless sees a silver lining in the Mali coup:

Amadou Toumani Touré was never really a strong supporter of the global war on terrorism against AQIM and there were allegations that some senior officials were involved in drug trafficking and smuggling operations with the group. Touré's government likewise never had a strategy for dealing with the Tuaregs. While the situation is too much in flux to make predictions, there is the potential to have a stronger counterterrorism ally in Mali as a result of the coup and subsequent chaos.

Daniel Byman expressed concern with the "good news story" experts have been telling about counterterrorism in the aftermath of the Arab Spring and cautioned that counterterrorism efforts may in fact suffer because of the revolutions for three primary reasons. First, as governments are changing, there is the potential for less counterterrorism cooperation. For example, Egypt is much more focused on other threats to the regime than it is on cooperation with the United States. Second, new governments are weaker than their predecessors, who ruled with an iron fist and enforced order at the expense of liberty. It is not yet evident that new governments will be as able to enforce order and thus limit the impact of small extremist groups. Third, it's possible that the transitions will fail and that people may be willing to try alternative means of political change. Byman argued that people may feel that they tried the political process and failed and therefore turn to more radical means, as was the case in Algeria. Thus, while the al-Qaeda core is weakened, the power of the affiliates is growing at a local and regional level. These affiliates have the potential to exploit the Arab Spring and tap into some of the inevitable failings of the Arab Spring revolutions.

Daveed Gartenstein-Ross presented a study he completed on al-Qaeda statements during the Arab Spring. Recognizing a critical gap in Western understanding of al-Qaeda's reaction to the Arab Spring, Gartenstein-Ross sought to understand whether the Arab Spring had strengthened or weakened al-Qaeda. The study found a surprising amount of agreement among jihadi observers of the Arab Spring, likely because it only assessed the first year. Gartenstein-Ross predicted that this would not be the case in the years to come, but that nevertheless the study provided a number of themes important for our understanding of al-Qaeda today. First, jihadi observers viewed the Arab Spring as a pan-Islamic uprising, which is spreading because Arab leaders failed. This is a good thing in their minds. Second, there was broad agreement about the geopolitical implications of regime change: US influence in the region is weak or at least on the decline; America is a bad ally (ex: Mubarak); the Arab Spring is a strategic setback for Israel; surviving apostate regimes are the biggest losers of the Arab Spring; and the clergy that supported these regimes have been de-legitimized. Third, al-Qaeda and the jihadi movement will gain from the Arab Spring. Statements indicate that al-Qaeda expects greater freedom of mobility under new regimes, both because they are not as repressive and because they will not be able to control territory as effectively. Fourth, al-Qaeda is aware of its need for a strategic response to the Arab Spring. In conclusion, the study revealed that al-Qaeda does not view the upheaval as a death knell and that it is optimistic about its ability to capitalize on it.

4. Q & A

Q: (Hoffman) Could al-Qaeda exploit sectarian tensions in the region?

A: (Byman) This is a double-edged sword. The core wants to focus on the United States and on overthrowing governments, but among the affiliates, sectarian tensions matter more. It could drive affiliate groups in a way the core has resisted, but it's risky.

(Barfi) It could lead to a backlash – al-Qaeda's killing of Muslims is one of the primary reasons why people have turned against it.

Q: (Oxford Analytica) Are you concerned about the institutionalization of terrorism because of the presence of Salifis in power?

A: (Alterman) Salafi politics is based on populism, rather than violence. Salafi parties want to make Islam a total part of people's lives. What is concerning, however, is the rise of anti-intellectual trends and intolerance among Salafi groups.

(Gartenstein-Ross) I'm not concerned about groups in government turning to violence, but whether or not they will shelter violent groups or actors. If those governments fail, it may strengthen al-Qaeda. In that case, Islamists may argue that the revolutions didn't go far enough and were in fact only a half-measure. Likewise, if there are no real changes in these governments, we may see violence; Islamist parties have made electoral gains, but if they have no real power, as happened in 1991 Algeria, they may resort to violence.

(Barfi) We are starting to see important terrorist leaders entering into politics – putting down their guns to campaign. It will be harder for some terrorist groups to continue to be against participating in politics when their leaders are. However, this could also create vacuums for more extreme groups to operate. This was the case in Gaza. When Hamas joined the political process, other, more extreme Salafist groups emerged on the street.

Q: (Wilson Center) How will al-Qaeda central respond to movements among its affiliates?

A: (Hoffman) As discussed, there are opportunities for the affiliates to exploit and capitalize on instability in the Middle East and North Africa. How al-Qaeda central is able to capitalize on their movement is unclear. But, the global war on terror is going to be important for at least the next decade.

Q: (Hoffman) Where will al-Qaeda as a movement be in the next ten years?

A: (Alterman) It will be its set of ideas that lasts. It will be harder to find the center and hard to stamp out.

(Byman) A lot depends on whether or not it is given a cause like it has been given before [Iraq]. Al-Qaeda has made mistakes, but it is a learning organization.

(Gartenstein-Ross) It will be influenced by global trends like the increasingly common presence of weak and failing states and increased resource scarcity. But, al-Qaeda will only continue to present a robust regional challenge, not a strategic challenge.

(Barfi) It is going to come down to the affiliates to take the mantle from al-Qaeda central and the old generation. We may even see the creation of new affiliates – for example in Syria. If the West doesn't get involved, the jihadists will step in.

5. Observation

Approximately 30 policymakers and experts attended the event, including Jane Harman, the President of the Wilson Center. Her presence indicates that the issue of terrorism in the aftermath of the Arab Spring is a core area of interest for the Wilson Center. Unfortunately, the speakers focused primarily on al-Qaeda central and not on affiliates operating in the region where the revolutions of the Arab Spring took place. With the exception of Barfi's discussion of AQIM, panelists did not provide insight on al-Qaeda's future in North Africa. Likewise, they did not provide any recommendations on how to engage new governments on counterterrorism cooperation. While it's obvious that the implications of the Arab awakening on al-Qaeda's operation is not yet clear, a discussion on moving forward with US counterterrorism policy would have been helpful, particularly for our issue. The panelists were nevertheless all well-informed and Barfi in particular may be potential new resource for MAC on security issues.

For a video of the event, please visit:

<http://www.wilsoncenter.org/event/the-arab-awakening-implications-for-al-qaeda-and-the-future-terrorism>

\(Back to top\)

Security Sector Transformation in North Africa and the Middle East

Date: 10 May 2012

1. Title: Security Sector Transformation in North Africa and the Middle East

Hosted by the USIP Center of Innovation for Security Sector Governance

Participants:

Panel 1: Panel of Representatives from the Region

Magda Boutros: Director, Egyptian Initiative for Personal Rights

Najla Elmangoush: Former Member, Public Engagement Unit, Libyan National Transitional Council

Dr. Murhaf Jouejati: Chairman, National Consensus Movement; Member, Syrian National Council

Dr. Radwan Masmoudi: President, Center for the Study of Islam and Democracy

Hesham Sallam: Researcher - Egypt

Robert Perito: Moderator: Director, Security Sector Governance Center, US Institute of Peace

Panel 2: Panel of Former U.S. Ambassadors to the Region

Ambassador Barbara Bodine: Former US Ambassador to Yemen (1997-2001)

Ambassador Rust Deming: Former US Ambassador to Tunisia (2000-2003)

Ambassador Deborah Jones: Former US Ambassador to Kuwait (2008-2011)

Ambassador Thomas Riley: Former US Ambassador to Morocco (2003-2009)

Robert Perito: Moderator: Director, Security Sector Governance Center, US Institute of Peace

2. Overview

Much has changed in the region over the last year: Libya and Yemen joined Tunisia and Egypt on the path toward democratic reform, Syria hangs in the balance. The security challenges and needed reforms vary by country, from establishing street-level security and disarming militias to ministerial reform and transitional justice. Yet, across the region, transforming the mandate and institutions of the security forces and regulatory bodies that oversee them will be a vital step toward establishing peace and democratic rule. For the USIP Center of Innovation for Security Sector Governance 3rd annual conference, current practitioners, government leaders, and former ambassadors gathered to discuss the pressing question of security sector reform in North Africa and the Middle East.

3. Summary

Panel 1:

Dr. Radwan Masmoudi addressed the crucial balance between justice and stability, a vexing goal for all post-revolutionary states. Those who served the regime in a brutal capacity must be punished, but in a way that avoids igniting a civil war. Furthermore, the skilled bureaucrats who served the regime in isolation from its corrupt practices must be integrated into the new government in order to preserve precious talent.

Madga Boutros argued that an overlooked component of the Egyptian revolution has been a popular repudiation of the security apparatus, comprising the police, the military, and the intelligence services. The primary goal of activists, she said, is to increase accountability within the security services while limiting their role in Egypt's political economy. As part of a civil society group dedicated to passing security reform legislation through the new parliament, Boutros confirmed that the SCAF wishes to hand over power to a new president, provided the generals are allowed to preserve the military's interests in manufacturing and natural resources. Boutros concluded with a warning that economic development and democracy could follow only in the wake of security sector reform.

Dr. Murhaf Jouejati insisted that the Syrian National Council's priority was not the fall of Bashar al-Assad, but the cessation of hostilities. Nevertheless, he discussed the kinds of challenges that would face Syrians should Assad's regime implode. Priorities would include securing Assad's biological and chemical weapons; corralling the remnants of the Baathist regime and its allies in the security services; stopping any looting; and shrinking the army into a small, disciplined, apolitical force whose sole function is to safeguard the sovereignty of Syrian territory. Jouejati was adamant that the most important reforms depend upon a total change in mentality in that the Syrian people must begin to see their government as accountable before meaningful progress can be made.

Najla Elmangoush played an integral part in the Libyan revolution and she recounted the enormous impact of propaganda on the evolution of hostilities. Turning to security sector reform, Elmangoush expressed concern that Qaddafi loyalists, some of whom fled Libya, continue to actively destabilize the country. Despite a dire need for coordinated security forces, militias and other armed groups continue to clash at the local level. Thus, Libya's most pressing problem is one of integrating militants and former rebels into a unified military and police command.

Hesham Sellam reiterated that Hosni Mubarak's old security apparatus remains intact and largely shielded from security sector reforms. He expressed skepticism that a new president would be able to rein in the security ministries, particularly when considering the fact that a new parliament did very little to weaken the SCAF. Consequently, many activists favor a full focus on making the military, police, and intelligence services more transparent and subservient to civilian leadership.

Panel 2:

The second panel began with the former Ambassador to Tunisia, Rust Deming, who is convinced that a prerequisite for the overthrow of any autocratic government is a politically motivated, economically empowered middle class. Yet Tunisia, with its famously vibrant middle class, had until recently failed to make that transformation. Deming found that government officials provided two arguments against a full-fledged democratic reform program: 1) caution and a slow pace would avoid a collapse of the transition process; 2) a democratic government would inevitably empower Islamists. According to Deming, the attacks of September 11, 2001 only vindicated these fears, which may or may not have been an excuse to avoid any reform at all. In addition, the Ben Ali's had massive commercial interests that might be damaged by democratic reforms, and Ben Ali himself fretted over the persecution he may face should he relinquish power. Thus, Deming left his post in Tunisia wondering when some sort of revolution might occur. When it finally did, Deming observed that Ennahda appeared to be the only party structure with deep roots, that young people were quickly alienated from the political process, and that the security services were rendered dysfunctional. Despite this, Deming remained optimistic that Tunisians could draft a constitution, reconcile religious freedom with a free press, employ underutilized graduates, and initiate a national reconciliation process to reintegrate valuable technocrats from the old regime.

Serving US Ambassador to Kuwait, Deborah Jones asked why those nations that are party to the Gulf Cooperation

Council (GCC) have yet to experience the same widespread upheaval seen in Tunisia or Syria. She acknowledged that US actions in Afghanistan and Iraq, as well as President Obama's "abandonment" of Hosni Mubarak set off alarm bells in Riyadh and Kuwait City, where monarchs wondered how far such activism might extend. Their response was to quell unrest in Bahrain and court partnerships with close American allies, including Morocco and Jordan. Jones cautioned the audience against assuming that the people of the Gulf want an Egypt-style uprising. Many of them see royal families as having distributed wealth and improved access to housing and education—this relationship between the rulers and the people forms one of the most important institutions among the GCC nations. Former Ambassador to Morocco Thomas Riley framed the issue of security sector reform in terms of North Africa's broader, long-term problems: high unemployment, the youth bulge, and a lack of opportunity. According to Riley, ignoring the underlying economic challenges will directly undermine all other efforts. He noted that those nations with extensive resources, such as Algeria or Saudi Arabia, are simply buying time until the day when their oil and gas disappear, at which point they will have to provide fulfilling employment opportunities to their people. Without investment in economic diversification and education, however, such governments might find themselves toppled. Riley complained that the US repeatedly fails to follow up on political or economic programs with audits to determine their effectiveness, and encouraged local populations to push for more oversight.

Former Ambassador to Yemen Barbara Bodine recalled that before Ben Ali stepped down in Tunisia, planning was already underway in Yemen to launch demonstrations and bring the government into paralysis. Yet even after Ben Ali's regime fell, events in Yemen defied expectations, as successive "turning points" failed to push out Saleh and his coterie. Bodine detailed how the security service essentially split into three groups controlled by their respective families. The resulting stalemate produced a distinctly Yemeni approach to the problem, complete with long, extended, somewhat theatrical negotiations. Bodine thought the Yemenis were wise, once an agreement was brokered, to schedule a referendum that could signal a clear break with the past. This was essential, for one of Saleh's closest advisers served in a transitional role. Moving on to Yemen's acute security crisis in the South and North, Bodine thought any political settlements with the Houthi rebels would have to wait until the new government had established bona fides with the majority of the population. She concluded by warning US policymakers not to overemphasize the counter-terror aspects of US-Yemen relations. In the near-term, the regular armed forces will be unable to handle al-Qaeda or the Houthi, and the US must examine other development-centric approaches to quelling extremism. For Yemen, al-Qaeda is increasingly a counterinsurgency matter, and it would be a mistake for the US to remain wholly focused on counterterrorism.

4. Q & A

Q: Does the US legacy of supporting authoritarian regimes hinder it in establishing effective relations now?

A: (Jones) Those of us sitting in our positions as of February 2011 got an earful from host governments on our fecklessness. In Kuwait, there was great concern, as stability is a critical factor for any country that relies on exporting a resource to survive. When we went into Iraq, we actually caused a bit of a transformation in the GCC states—a problem that was previously approached through cooperation with non-government actors became dominated by security considerations and concern for domestic stability above all. Obviously we have long faced a tension between our economic interests and our moral obligations, but the best thing we can do is to focus on pragmatic programs that will help states develop.

(Riley) The answer is yes. But I would make an observation, which is that in Tunisia, Wikileaks actually improved many people's perception of the US because all of a sudden they had clear evidence that US officials were accurately reporting on corruption and that they understood what was really going on. So with that unexpected transparency also came the fact that we were not being fooled by these governments.

(Bodine) Over the last decade, our attention was so focused on security that we lost the rhetoric of development and governance, and in many places we lost the programs on development and governance. If we return to having a security centric approach, and we miss these two other factors, that is how we will be judged going forward.

Q: In Egypt, Syria, and Tunisia, the security institutions are large and entrenched, whereas in Libya and in Yemen the problem is the opposite. So what is the biggest problem these countries face?

A: (Bodine) Libya and Yemen actually face very different security sector reform issues. In Libya you have freestanding militias that must be integrated into a newly created defense and security system. In Yemen, there are existing units that must be reformed and restructured, but we are not building from the ground up.

5. Observation

The event was attended by over 100 representatives from US government agencies, NGOs, and foreign governments. All of the speakers agreed that security sector reform is vital if Arab nations are to move forward with economic liberalization and a broader political transformation. Unfortunately, the recommendations were extremely vague, and no speakers gave any details on exactly how security sector reform is to take place when the most powerful institutions in most of these nations are, in fact, the security services. In places like Yemen and Libya, where the military is a weak institution, where is the body capable of controlling disparate militias? Ambassador Riley stated that the most important pressure comes from the bottom up because it is difficult for military leaders who are trying to appear nationalist to ignore the cries of millions. However, we have seen massive demonstrations in Egypt in past weeks that suggest the military does not give in easily when it comes to issues about which it cares deeply.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Opportunities to Advance Human Rights Reporting

Date: 11 May 2012

1. Title: Opportunities to Advance Human Rights Reporting

Hosted by the Fund for Peace

Participants:

Mark P. Lagon: Adjunct Senior Fellow for Human Rights, Council on Foreign Relations; International Relations and Security Chair, Master of Science in Foreign Service Program, Georgetown University

David Keyes: Executive Director, Advancing Human Rights

Jean AbiNader: Senior Adviser, Moroccan American Center

Krista Hendry: Moderator: Executive Director, the Fund for Peace

2. Overview

As the global human rights discourse evolves to confront today's challenges, there continue to be a number of limitations in the capacity of organizations to effectively promote and protect human rights throughout the world. These limitations include weak global compliance, uneven regional efforts, and the inability of human rights organizations to apply punitive measures or provide technical advice to actually address human rights violations, rather than just highlight them. Too often organizations may find themselves investing significant time reporting on human rights at the expense of concrete programs that can turn rhetoric into real, positive change. In addition, the global human rights discourse continues to be challenged by those that argue that universal reporting fails to take into account local cultures or social values, and treats open countries more harshly than closed nations. As a result, while the global human rights movement has achieved much success in promoting a human rights culture through international treaties, laws, and institutions, progress in the implementation of human rights norms across the world has been much more limited. This event explored the current challenges of human rights reporting with the aim of developing practical recommendations on how to translate an increased awareness of norms into effective implementation.

3. Summary

Krista Hendry opened the event by explaining that although the Fund for Peace primarily focuses on underlying conditions of conflict, human rights are both a condition of conflict and a symptom of conflict, so the topic is an essential part of its work. Presenting the topic of the panel discussion, she asked two questions: are human rights organizations doing reporting accurately enough? Are they doing enough to implement human rights and put reporters and monitors out of jobs?

Mark Lagon discussed the conclusions of a recent CFR report on human rights reporting and implementation. The report assessed how global institutions are doing overall in promoting and protecting human rights. It found that overall there is heightened attention and discussion of human rights, but uneven regional efforts. Implementation also lags way behind, as the focus remains on treaties and norm creation, which are overemphasized. Lagon noted that monitoring is broad and deep and that there is increasing peer-based security of human rights violations. Capacity building nevertheless remains a real problem and more effort is needed to realize human rights, not just talk about them.

Turning to more specific conclusions, Lagon noted that there has been a recent backlash on freedom of expression throughout the world as well as against other political and civil rights. In addition, there has been a skewed dialogue about some rights at the United Nations and there thus needs to be a rebalancing of rights. On the positive side, the report found that the business community is becoming involved in human rights promotion and protection beyond corporate social responsibility because the community is at last realizing it is in their self-interest.

Lagon made several recommendations. First, more needs to be done to empower regional organizations, NGOs, and civil society to act. Second, inter-governmental organizations need to focus more on technical assistance and implementation. Third, the global architecture at the UN needs to be refined, particularly the Human Rights Council. Fourth, the system needs to be less uptight on economic and social rights. Fifth, democracy and human rights are not separate and one of the most important things the international community can do to promote human rights is to bolster democratic institutions. Finally, there is plenty of human rights reporting and monitoring of varying quality, and more attention needs to be paid to economic and social rights.

David Keyes spoke about the philosophy of his organization, Advancing Human Rights, with a quote from famed Soviet dissident Natan Sharansky, which emphasized the role of democracy in promoting human rights and the distortion created by treating open and closed societies as equal when assessing human rights. Advancing Human Rights thus works for a clear and compelling focus on human rights violations in closed societies.

Keyes provided a number of examples of this contradiction in human rights reporting. For example, the UN Human Rights Council has nations like Saudi Arabia assessing human rights in democracies, something that Keyes and others believe undermines the Council's legitimacy. He also noted that the largest human rights group in the world did as many reports about Israel during the last year as it did about Libya, Syria, and Iran combined, further undermining their human rights reporting. Turning to misconceptions about the disparity between human rights reporting in open versus closed societies, he argued that the US would not lose credibility by reporting on totalitarian societies. Likewise, the argument that human rights organizations need to be even-handed in reporting on democracies and dictatorships is a fallacy. It is easier to focus on open societies because it is difficult to get information from closed societies. Human rights organizations likewise argue in favor of the idea that open societies are "low-hanging fruit" for improvement. For the former argument, Keyes stressed that this is less true given new online tools available. For the latter, he argued that this argument is simply not sufficient. Human rights organizations must therefore shift their focus to closed countries, arguing that they no longer have an excuse to say they weren't aware of the violations. Keyes called for a return to the basis of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and a renewed focus on the individual.

Jean AbiNader provided insights from an ongoing study about human rights reporting across North Africa. The study examined ways to advance human rights reporting by looking at North Africa as a case for what works and what can be done better. The study is also examining if a regional analysis of human rights would be helpful. AbiNader underscored that a case study on North Africa was particularly timely given the events of the Arab Spring. Many experts have expressed qualms about human rights under Islamist-led governments. AbiNader questioned how these new governments were going to approach human rights and how they would define it. Based on a central tenet of his report about life (individual rights), liberty (collective rights), and the pursuit of happiness (economic and social rights), AbiNader noted that it seems that at present the focus of many uprisings is on economic rights as countries work to confront basic problems of health, education, and jobs. This seems to likewise be the focus of the US response to the Arab Spring, which has been based on economic aid rather than demands for political reconciliation or justice.

These competing challenges are a real concern in the aftermath of the Arab Spring and underscored two primary concerns about human rights reporting that emerge from the study. First, AbiNader stressed that human rights reporting is done from a Western perspective, assuming the universality of human rights. AbiNader argued that organizations should look at human rights in context, if only to help countries better promote human rights within the unique set of circumstances defined by their countries laws, institutions, customs, and societies. Second, the study revealed that although democracies are a guarantor for human rights, it isn't clear whether or not democracy is the only political system that can effectively protect human rights. In conclusion, AbiNader recommended that human rights organizations take context into account when assessing human rights in order to better inform responses according to local, often competing priorities. He also emphasized more capacity building in order to move from rhetoric to implementation.

4. Q & A

Q: (Hendry) There seems to be a debate between the panelists about whether or not human rights and democracy go hand in hand. What are the ways in which you can best protect human rights?

A: (Lagon) They are not one and the same – it's like a chicken and egg type situation. But democracies mean more than elections – they mean the creation of real institutions that protect the rights of citizens and a flexibility in governing so that governments can incorporate the will of pluralistic groups. It is in that sense that democracies best protect human rights.

(AbiNader) Compare, for example, Tunisia and Morocco. Our study found that Morocco, a monarchy, was a better guarantor of religious dialogue, human rights, and civil unity than say Tunisia where the leader [ben Ali] was “elected.”

(Keyes) I am a believer in unalienable rights, but these rights will look different in different places. It won't always look exactly like in America, but that's okay.

Q: (Robert Holley, Moroccan American Center) I have never been fond of democracy promotion efforts because democracy is a process, just as human rights is a process. It takes time to get from A-Z and while you have to judge progress, you should do so in a way that helps the process rather than criticizes it, particularly since there is always misinformation that ends up getting included. Governments are not the only ones adept at disinformation and misinformation; local political actors are also good at that. What do you do to sort out information from disinformation and misinformation?

A: (Keyes) It is the hardest part of my job. Distilling information is difficult, particularly in the internet age where it's almost impossible. I don't have a comprehensive answer to your questions, but we rely on word of mouth to build a network of people will trust and hope that the power of the people will come across (Hendry) Triangulation of data is how we do it. Polls and blogs can lie, but if you compare the information across various sources, it is at least a start. We also work to build local capacity to get information more regularly.

Q: Civil society actors also have their own agenda. I work in the development field and I feel like sometimes there is almost a racism about it – if someone is poor and black, they must be innocent and telling the truth. But there is a difference between facts and opinion so there is a requirement to filter even voices from the field. How do you respond to that?

A: (Lagon) First, it's important to remember that NGOs have their own agenda, everyone has their own agenda. Second, lenses for how you see the world matter. Third, the bigotry you speak of is also the soft bigotry of low expectations. There is of course the question of capacity, but we can't forget the question of will either.

(AbiNader) There needs to be an open discussion about this issue that you are talking about how there is a difference between fact and opinion and how perceptions from the field need to be seen in context.

(Lagon) Yes, we need to start a dialogue about universal human rights and what they mean. And about human dignity.

(Hendry) The dignity and welfare aspect is really important because if we can improve those things then we can better protect human rights. We found through our work that human rights abusers are often people who have been abused themselves.

(Keyes) I have seen that in my work as well. And we don't do civil society building even though that is important. I would also say that we can and must exert more pressure at the governmental level.

(AbiNader) Part of the problem is that the US has competing foreign policy priorities throughout the world. It has multiple concerns of security, stability, and promoting human dignity.

(Keyes) There is a challenge in balancing security concerns with some of the issues we are talking about, but we have swung very very far from the balance on that one. Look at the US relationship with Mubarak for example where the US was willing to ignore abuses because of the security relationships. I would like to see human rights issues brought up more in today's diplomacy.

Q: Is public education part of capacity building? It is not just governments and civil society that need better capacity.

A: (AbiNader) Groups that I have worked with like Civitas and Street Law are doing exactly that – they have great programs, but they lack funding. These issues are also generational, that is why public education is so important.

Q: What is the role and responsibility of the private sector in promoting human rights? For example, you can talk about the quality of Transparency International's rankings, but it has gone far in forcing companies to talk about and tackle corruption if only because it limits their profits. This idea of risk analysis is thus helpful.

A: (Lagon) Corporations are taking on a more substantial role, but companies are also so focused on their “green” rankings right now that it is not the priority at the moment. If you can focus on rule of law, you can mobilize the market. That will be a driver for businesses to promote and protect human rights.

(AbiNader) It is a great driver, but there are issues with the findings because they only are able to document cases of corruption from those who come forward.

(Hendry) We need all sectors to become involved because the challenge is so great. The Fund for Peace works with the oil and mining sectors in rural areas – they have a great economic impact and the ability to promote human rights, but they have to believe it is in their interest.

Q: (Jordan Paul, Moroccan American Center) The “see” and “feel” test is often helpful in assessing freedom in a country – when you get off the plane in Tripoli it feels different than in Rabat, and that’s not really reflected in the reports, which focus on violations across the board without this “sense” of a place. How do we ensure that this is accurately reflected in human rights reports?

A: (Keyes) Organizations need to speak more about this and make it clear that there is a difference between a democracy and a dictatorship. We can start by challenging human rights groups. Right now, some operate by finding human rights abuses and then following them - it’s crazy. Fundamental values are universal, but there is a huge difference between open and closed societies. We could start by gearing the work of human rights organizations toward closed societies clearly and unapologetically. Governments in between democracies and dictatorships also need to be addressed on their own merits.

(Lagon) There is a distinction between different types of governments, but we need to raise these issues with everyone because there does need to be balance.

(Keyes) We do care about human rights abuses in open societies, but we also need to care about them in closed societies. We have a role to play in pressuring governments to do more. The only long-term guarantor of peace and stability is human rights protection, of course with balancing realpolitik concerns.

(AbiNader) We need to learn how to ask questions that take into consideration local context and perceptions and then figure out how that process can fit into and impact implementation.

5. Observation

Approximately 20 experts and development workers attended the panel discussion on opportunities for improving human rights reporting. The panelists each had a unique perspective and expertise on the issue of global human rights, which made for an interesting and insightful discussion. There was general consensus that much can be done to improve human rights reporting and implement widely-acknowledged human rights norms. Although there was some debate about the importance of democratic governance for human rights protections, the panelists agreed that human rights reporting should focus more on closed societies, can do more to appreciate the local context of universal human rights, and should work to improve capacity building to help countries improve their human rights records.

\(Back to top\)

Is the Arab Spring Marginalizing Women?

Date: 14 May 2012

1. Title: Is the Arab Spring Marginalizing Women?

Hosted by the Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars

Participants:

Jane Harman: Director, President, and CEO, Woodrow Wilson Center

Rend Al-Rahim: Co-founder, Executive Director, Iraq Foundation

Rola Dashti: Chairwoman, Kuwait Economic Society

Rangita de Silva de Alwis: Director, Women in Public Service Project 2012, Wellesley College

Haleh Esfandiari: Director, Middle East Program, Woodrow Wilson Center

Moushira Khattab: Public Policy Scholar, Woodrow Wilson Center

Lilia Labidi: Visiting Research Professor, Middle East Institute, National University of Singapore

Caryle Murphy: Public Policy Scholar, Woodrow Wilson Center

Fatima Sbaity Kassem: Former Director, UN Center for Women, Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (UN-ESCWA) in Baghdad, Amman, and Beirut

Robin Wright: Journalist, Foreign Correspondent at notable publications

2. Overview

There is a concern that a year after the Arab uprisings, women across the region are at risk of becoming marginalized politically and economically. There is a growing rift between secular and Islamist women amidst worries of Salafists undermining women’s rights. Yet, it is clear that no society can do without the active participation of its women. In a conference addressing the role of women in the aftermath of the Arab uprisings, women leaders from the Middle East and the United States discussed the implications for women’s rights under the emerging Islamist regimes.

3. Summary

Panel 1:

Following a brief introduction by moderator Haleh Esfandiari, Fatima Sbaity-Kassem began the discussion by stating that the Arab uprisings raised aspirations for equality and expectations of imminent social change. In Tunisia, Libya, Egypt, and Yemen, popular movements successfully toppled repressive regimes. However, in Syria and Bahrain, and to a lesser extent in Morocco, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Oman, popular demands are being crushed or co-opted by ruling autocrats and monarchs. Everywhere these social movements are a clear indication that the “wall of fear” of lifelong rulers and despots has been irreversibly razed. The uprisings were not religious or feminist movements, but women played a visible and vocal role in the protests. Yet, the emergence of Islamist actors after the uprisings has relegated women in many countries to the periphery of the political process. They are losing ground on women’s rights and political participation. Political parties’ concern with retaining new found power overshadows the advancement of women’s rights, and many of the Islamists downplay their religiosity to retain popular support. Nevertheless, reforms increasing female political participation, the withdrawal of reservations on CEDAW (Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination Against Women), and a more connected network of vocal women provide hope in advancing women’s issues.

Lilia Labidi focused her presentation on problems on the ground in Tunisia and possible solutions to resolve them. She described a “second Tunisia” consisting of rural areas where women face high poverty and illiteracy rates and lack the legal and economic rights. The illiteracy rate of women over 15 living in rural Tunisia is 40%; they are effectively second-class citizens. For decades, the state has taken care of urban women and it has not been present in rural areas, leaving the work to NGOs. If even the government—specifically the Ministry of Women’s Affairs—lacks the means to service these areas, NGOs will not be able to compensate and play the role of the state in working for these women. Labidi stated that the government must work to increase its presence in all parts of the country to provide public services and remedy this pressing issue.

Moushira Khattab’s titled her presentation “Lost in Translation: The Case of Egyptian Women.” She compared the condition of women’s legal rights and their participation in the economic and political spheres before and after the revolution. Egyptian women played an instrumental role in the revolution, representing nearly 50% of the protesters on Tahrir Square. After Mubarak’s fall, they emerged hopeful and confident. A short 15 months later, however, they were excluded from the constitutional assembly and made up fewer parliamentary seats than before the uprising. Women’s issues have been washed away amidst a surging sea of Islamist politics, Khattab lamented. This increased religiosity has led to an open criticism at the highest levels of government of laws guaranteeing women’s most basic rights. Presidential hopeful Mohamed Morsi publicly stated that laws barring female genital mutilation overstep their bounds and this issue should be a parent’s choice. A two-pronged approach—working on both the grassroots level and the policy level—is necessary to improve the state of women’s rights in Egypt. Women’s status should not be linked to regime; states that adopted CEDAW are bound by law to protect their rights, and this fact needs to become embedded in their societies.

Panel 2:

To start the second panel, Rend Al-Rahim illustrated the situation in Iraq. Iraq experienced its own awakening in 2003. Until 2005, the situation of women in Iraq was rapidly improving. The country instituted a progressive family law code, as well as a 25% parliamentary quota for women. Parliamentary gender quotas are somewhat controversial, but Al-Rahim insisted that they are beneficial. “They show women in action, bring their faces to the public domain, and familiarize society to women in positions of power.” The December 2005 elections, however, brought Islamist parties to power and led to a resurgence of tribal culture. They conflated Islam, conservatism, and tradition. Polygamy, which is legal but constrained in Iraq, became more prevalent. Illegal practices such as unregistered, temporary, and child marriages increased, along with honor killings and the practice of giving girls to settle tribal disputes. Today laws are weakly enforced and even women who know they can seek legal redress fear to do so because they fear backlash. However, alliances between religious and secular women on specific issues and the activism of women’s NGOs are acting to promote women’s rights.

Rola Dashti expressed concern that women are going from being marginalized to being excluded, relegated to the home and traditional jobs. The women who played a role in the protests are no longer visible in the public sphere, leaving women to try and regain the progress they made previously before they can move forward. Extremist agendas always focus on social issues, Dashti explained. The so-called “moderate” Islamists will always become more radical and more repressive. Women and the youth were the drivers behind the revolution, asking for justice, freedom, and human dignity. According to Dashti, political Islamists are the beneficiaries of revolutions they did not start, using women's issues to polarize society and avoid addressing economic issues. She questioned the assumption that Islamists would become more moderate and accommodate women's rights for fear of being voted out of power, explaining that laws may be altered so that fair elections may not take place in the future.

Caryle Murphy explained that Saudi women, who have lived under Islamist rule for centuries, were encouraged by other women in the region to launch protest movements. Due to a low tolerance for female activism, Murphy continued, Saudi women prefer to work behind the scenes, avoiding street protest, confrontation, and outside aid. The Arab Awakening made the Saudi government realize that they have to act. Murphy noted that progress has been made possible by the king, who issued a soft response to the driving campaign, decreed that women can vote and compete in the 2015 elections, and backed reforms to promote women's employment and reduce domestic violence.

Rangita De Silva de Alwis discussed women's roles in post-conflict situations. She explained that post-conflict situations are opportunities for constitutions to be rewritten, problems to be addressed, and legal transformations to occur. De Silva de Alwis said legal reform must embody international law and inclusive security that ensures safety for women. Both Morocco and Tunisia have raised reservations to CEDAW, she noted. Women's rights activists bear the burden of holding their governments accountable to CEDAW. In post-conflict situations, strong and powerful women's movements are needed to mobilize women against rights violations. She stressed that women cannot wait to demand their rights after a revolution; instead, they need to anticipate problems and be proactive to ensure they are not excluded. She cited Iran as a cautionary tale, where women waited until it was too late to demand their rights.

4. Q & A

Q: (Paulette Lee, communications consultant) Could Islam and its various interpretations be employed to improve the situation of women in the region?

A: (Labidi) Ben Ali was always a steadfast promoter of women's rights. Immediately after the revolution, women who had never before worn the hijab began to cover their heads. Women, especially those living in rural areas, voted overwhelmingly in favor of the Islamists.

(Esfandiari) The changes that took place under the old regimes in Egypt and Tunisia really only affected upper-class women. The situation in Iran was very different, because women's rights had permeated throughout society. Immediately after the revolution, Khomeini repealed the family law code in the name of religion. In response, women staged protests and wrote letters. Interestingly, most of the protestors were not secular, well-educated, cosmopolitan women, but the more conservative, less-educated, women living in rural areas. They didn't want to lose their rights to divorce or child custody.

Q: (Barbara Slavin, Atlantic Council) To what extent are women's rights promoters tainted as pro-western or aligned with the old regimes?

A: (Kassem) I'd like to briefly go back to the question concerning interpretations of Islam. We tend to assume that all Muslims are extremists or Salafists. Islamist parties vary, and some are genuinely moderate. Interestingly, studies show that women, especially poor or uneducated women, are more religious than men. They are especially vulnerable to misinterpretations of Islam, as Sharia is often conflated with traditions. When religious clerics become leaders of Islamist parties, women find themselves in a double jeopardy. In response to Barbara's question, yes, people tend to turn toward the Islamists because they are anti-western. People want their laws to grow from their own roots, not from the West. An imported democracy will never succeed in the Middle East.

(Khattab) There are many interpretations of Islam and they are used to pursue varying agendas. A hard-lined interpretation is effective for killing an issue, and an "enlightened" interpretation can be used to promote something.

Q: For the entire region, what would be the most effective target area, social reform, or program for integrating more women into business and politics, for example, to improve women's rights?

A: (Khattab) Social, economic, and political reforms are all critical and equally important. One cannot happen without the others. If I were to pick one area, however, I would say we should focus on education. It is the basic requisite for any effective citizen. Going back to the perception of women's rights activists as pro-western, it is true. CEDAW is a dirty word in Egypt; people say that it encourages extramarital affairs, or children born to single mothers.

Q: (Wright) More women than ever in the region are wearing the hijab. It seems to me that it is more about identity than piety. To what can we attribute this increase?

A: (Rahim) I was struck to see how many women in Iraq are wearing it these days. In that country, I would contribute it to a lot of issues including an increased religiosity in society as a whole. It is also in part a response to years of oppression, sanctions, wars, and violence. Religion is a host that can bring comfort in a very difficult time. The public domain was dangerous, and women turned to the private domain, which included prayer, religion, solidarity, and safety. More recently, with the retreat of al-Qaeda, fewer women are covering their heads. (Dashti) The hijab is also a source of freedom for many women, strange as that may sound. Families are more lenient with daughters who go out covered, which encourages young women to wear a hijab in order to leave their homes. Additionally, the hijab has become a kind of a fashion trend. Girls wear colorful veils, with a lot of makeup and tight jeans. I don't think it has very much to do with religion.

Q: (Freelance journalist from Saudi Arabia) Many women seem to actually go against their own interests and assert that pushing for women's rights is in some way antithetical to Islam?

A: (Rahim) Pushing for women's rights is in no way against Islam. The problem is in Islam's various interpretations. There is a serious issue of chauvinism among those who interpret the Qur'an; they are all men and they conflate the religion with tradition, perpetuating a system that represses women. Women in the Iraqi Parliament have said that women's rights are against Islam, but in reality, they are part of Islamist parties and they cannot go against party lines.

Q: (Didi Cutler) During the Iraq war, a group of women drivers in Saudi were punished very severely. They were arrested, lost their jobs, had their passports confiscated. Can the more gentle punishment enforced by the Saudi government this time be attributed to an evolution, or to King Abdullah?

A: (Murphy) After the first incident, the Mufti issued a Fatwa claiming that women driving is against Islam. Today, no one believes this. They oppose women driving on a cultural and traditional basis.

Q: (Josh Polcheck, State Department) It is important to note that no political force—nationalist, secularist, or Islamist—in the region is empowering women. Not a single party in Morocco or Tunisia nominated a woman to a ministerial position. Why has modernity as an ideology which calls for political citizenship lost its hold in the Arab world?

A: (Wright): It all depends on your definition of modernity; we should not conflate it with Westernization. I would argue a majority of women in the region want to be part of the 21st century.

(Dashti) Modernists, or liberals, have traditionally been more concerned with spreading ideology than seeking power. The Islamists, conversely, are very focused on maintaining power. Liberals need to rethink their strategy, and focus on political power.

(Rend) I have to disagree. The modernizers were in power. Mubarak, Ben Ali, and Assad were secular modernizers. Today, there is a stigma associated with modernizers because they are associated with these regimes. The word "modernizer" invokes corruption, authoritarianism, and rentier economics.

Q: (Margaret Rodgers) We've come to the conclusion that the Arab Awakening is excluding women, but I want to know why.

A: (Dashti) We've never come to a conclusion about where women belong in our societies. Educational curriculum is segregated and teaches that women are meant to be mothers, wives, teachers, or caregivers. Women in the Middle East are not citizens. In Kuwait, a 50-year-old woman needs permission from a male guardian to get married. Political Islamists cannot deliver on economic and development issues, so they engage society in social issues, which polarizes people and distracts them from real problems.

5. Observation

This event was attended by approximately 35 professionals, students, NGO employees, journalists, women's rights activists, and members of the policy community. All of the panelists were very critical of emerging Islamist parties, insisting that they shift focus from pressing economic problems to social issues in order to polarize their societies and retain political power. Morocco was not a focal point of the discussion, but the panelists did refer to the country a few times. Fatima Sbaity-Kassem said that "popular demands are being crushed or co-opted by ruling autocrats and monarchs" in Morocco, Jordan, Syria, and Bahrain. Rangita De Silva de Alwis noted that both Morocco and Tunisia are pushing back against CEDAW, and women's rights groups in both countries must hold their governments accountable. A member of the audience from the State Department, Josh Polcheck, noted—inaccurately—that not a single party in Morocco or Tunisia nominated a woman to a ministerial position.

\(Back to top\)

Date: 15 May 2012

1. Delivering Dignity in the Arab World through Political and Economic Reform

Hosted by the Center for International Private Enterprise

Participants:

Larry Diamond: Director, Center on Democracy, Development, and the Rule of Law, Stanford University

Michele Dunne: Director, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, the Atlantic Council

John D. Sullivan: Executive Director, Center for International Private Enterprise

Steve Clemons: Moderator: Editor at Large, The Atlantic; Publisher, The Washington Note

2. Overview

Last year's uprisings made clear that people were willing to make great sacrifices to build states and societies capable of delivering dignity to their citizens. This event sought to explore the key linkages between political and economic reform in the Arab world and identify the opportunities and challenges to institutionalizing democratic values in economies throughout the region.

3. Summary

Steve Clemons opened by marking his skepticism of the objectives of such organizations as the National Endowment for Democracy (NED). He characterized these organizations as focusing too much on democratic rather than economic reforms. Remarking upon Hernando de Soto's work, which characterizes the Arab Spring as "an entrepreneurial revolution," Clemons argued that the price of wheat was as much a cause for the uprisings in Tunisia and Egypt as any one of the trending indicators that have consumed the academic spotlight, such as the youth bulge or the rise of connecting media. He expressed his hope that the panelists would explore the economics of the Arab Spring in their talking points.

Larry Diamond agreed, saying that the transition of Arab states from authoritarian rule was a series of many transitions at once, both political and economic. Despite undergoing a revolution, the "failed logic" of statism and socialism survives today in Arab countries. Diamond stated that open and competitive politics alone would not satisfy populations, nor would broad commitments to democracy carry them through a time of crisis. Diamond argued that a successful transition from authoritarian rule would require a break from the fundamental core of the Arab social contract, and that populations must dismantle the old systems of trading freedom for economic stability. Underlining that political freedom must be accompanied by economic freedom, Diamond emphasized the necessity of a number of reforms. "Paring down" (if not eliminating) corruption would be paramount, as would be the implementation of "social shock absorbers" – perhaps along the lines of the cash transfer programs that have recently gained traction in Latin America. He also declared that the assault on corruption should take place from two vectors: from the top down, through powerful anti-corruption committees, and from the bottom up, with an engaged populace reporting demands for bribes.

Michelle Dunne, whose focus in the Arab Spring has been upon Tunisia and Egypt, expressed a slightly different interpretation of events. She characterized those regimes as having achieved a measure of economic reform without having yet delivered on the political. Both, she declared, would be necessary if the new governments are to retain legitimacy. With issues like the failure of the private sector to generate income, the youth bulge, and inflation still hampering goals for economic prosperity, populations are less likely to be patient with regimes when confronted with their records of human rights abuse, political stagnation, and police brutality.

In a sense this disenchantment was inevitable, Dunne cautioned. Even prior to the revolution, states like Egypt had been attempting to make the transition to a cash transfer system over the past decade. Shifts at the macroeconomic level can sometimes take decades to take effect and changes in the system often amount to "political dynamite" for the very reason that they are so closely associated with the population's livelihood. Regimes in Egypt and Tunisia, she stated, must be aware that while the "bloom is off the rose" in terms of enthusiasm for the revolution, the population remains committed to change. Those in power must be sure that they do not squander what opportunity they have to retain legitimacy.

In his discussion of political and economic reform, John Sullivan chose to highlight the insuperable layers of bureaucracy that separate the average business from success in the region. For Muhammad Bouazizi (the Tunisian street merchant whose self-immolation set the Arab Spring in motion) the process to legally register his business required that he go through 55 individual steps, a process lasting 150 days and requiring more than twelve times his monthly income, said Sullivan. In addition to creating a dual-layered economy, one that fast-tracked those with the means to bribe their way through the bureaucracy, the Tunisian system stymied growth at the poorest levels. Sullivan maintained that problems like these are still to be found in every sector of Tunisian and Egyptian economies, from small and medium enterprises to state-owned companies. The frustration that many Arab populations experience is due to the fact that reforms have yet to eliminate the crony capitalist system that prompted the revolutions in the first place.

Steve Clemons remarked that the issues of economic reform currently confronting new governments are not new problems – regimes have been attempting to deal with these challenges for decades. The panel uniformly attributed the longevity of the region’s economic troubles to the fact that regimes depended on the crony capitalist system for their survival. “When the nature of rule is predatory extraction,” said Larry Diamond, “it is very hard to tinker on the margins” for reform. This prompted a discussion on the fact that regimes today face the same issue as their predecessors and that many would prefer to appear to be democratic reformers while still defending the old authoritarian system. Drawing upon Morocco as an example, Diamond stated that King Mohammad VI “was in no way serious about economic reform.” This prompted a discussion between the panelists as to whether the China model of delivering economic without political reforms was an applicable model for the Arab World. The panel remained skeptical on this point.

4. Q & A

Q: What role can the international community, particularly the United States, play in encouraging economic reforms?

A: (Sullivan) I want to underline the importance of international initiatives such as the “Know Your Banker” program, an anti-bribery convention in the UN that targets corrupt multinationals and greater enforcement of existing policies through the mobilizing of NGOs such as Transparency International.

(Clemons) I feel that it must be born in mind that the relative size of the US economy – and therefore its power – has diminished compared to the older system.

(Dunne) This should not be used as an excuse for inaction. The US is still a key player. The US should examine incentivizing aid that it delivers to states like Jordan and Morocco.

Q: What role is there for women in the new societies of the Middle East – especially in Egypt and Tunisia?

A: (Dunne) There are both positive and negative trends to be found in these societies. In some sense, women’s causes have been marginalized during the revolution by figures, particularly Islamists and Salafists, dismantling progressive action taken in the past with regards to women’s rights. Yet in this new environment of expanded political freedom, women’s organizations have begun to form and play a political role.

(Diamond) I want to add that female empowerment over the coming decade may be inevitable, as women often make up 60% of the population of universities.

(Sullivan) The revolutions also prompted the rise of women’s associations in the informal sector.

Q: What do we know about the new regimes and their economic policies?

A: (Sullivan) Much still remains uncertain. Many Islamist candidates come from a business background and may be well-suited to recognize economic reform problems.

(Dunne) Thus far Tunisian economic policies have been moderately effective.

5. Observation

Approximately 40 scholars and think tank representatives attended this event. The general theme of the event was that more attention should be given to economic reforms in post-revolutionary states, both by the academics studying them and by the states themselves. While the focus of both the panel and the audience remained for the most part on Egypt and Tunisia, to the extent Morocco was mentioned the coverage was negative. A consensus seems to have arisen among the panelists that the Moroccan monarchy desires to perform limited economic and political reforms at the margins while leaving the old system effectively intact.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Welcome Luncheon for Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal

Date: 24 May 2012

1. Title: Welcome Luncheon for Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal

Hosted by the National US-Arab Chamber of Commerce

Speaker:

H.E. Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal: Ambassador to the United States, Kingdom of Morocco

2. Overview

The National US-Arab Chamber of Commerce hosted a luncheon to welcome Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal. The Ambassador briefly discussed Morocco's current state of affairs, economic challenges, and political reforms. He then responded to questions from the audience members.

3. Summary

Ambassador Bouhlal began his address by thanking the audience for their engagement and investments in Morocco. He explained that Morocco is in a period of progressive political reform and substantial changes are being carried out across the board. The Kingdom ratified a new constitution in July 2011, which brought about political reforms including a balance of powers between the King and the Parliament. Responsibility and accountability in government, protection of individual liberties, and promotion of human rights are all values enshrined in the new constitution. Following its victory in November's Parliamentary elections, the moderate Islamist Party for Justice and Development has built a coalition government; the parties in power are working together to stimulate growth and enact important social reforms. Recent events in during the Arab Spring and the Euro Crisis, however present this new government with difficult challenges. Instability in the region led to a drop in revenue from the tourism industry. Economic problems in Europe, Morocco's largest trade partner, have spilled into the kingdom. A severe drought has diminished this year's wheat yield. Ambassador Bouhlal concluded by noting that, despite these difficulties, there are very promising business developments taking place in the automotive, renewable energy, aeronautic, and agricultural industries.

4. Q & A

Q: (Audience Member from Northrop Grumman) What can Morocco, in conjunction with the United States and other Sahel countries, do to improve security in the Sahel region?

A: (Bouhlal) After the fall of Gaddafi, a proliferation of weapons flowed into the Sahel region. This adds another troubling element in a region where governance is already difficult. We are working closely with the US as well as other countries in the region to promote stability there.

Q: (Audience Member from USDA) Other than wheat and grains, which other food products present promising trade prospects?

A: (Bouhlal) Morocco is becoming a big producer of olive oil. The US imports a lot of olive oil, and growers in California only produce enough to satisfy a small percentage of the market. In the other direction, Morocco imports a lot of food products from the US. We also export large amounts of fish to Europe.

Q: (Audience Member from AIAC Investment) What countries represent most of the tourists who visit Morocco?

A: (Bouhlal) In 1943 when General Patton came to Morocco, he said that the country is a combination of the bible and Hollywood. Because of its proximity, most of Morocco's tourists come from Europe—France, Spain, Italy, etc. Recently, however, there has been a surge in American visitors. They love to invest in hotels in Marrakesh and elsewhere. Additionally, more people from Russia and India have been visiting.

Q: (Audience Member from Emerald Planet TV) I know that Morocco hopes to get 38% of its energy from renewable sources by 2020; could you expand on investment in renewable energy technology there?

A: (Bouhlal) We don't have oil reserves, so we have always looked toward renewable energy for the future. As technology progresses, this has become an attainable goal. We are investing in wind and solar energy. We have also changed regulations and are encouraging renewably energy companies to sell their excess production back to the grid. Additionally, we are connected to Europe and Algeria, so we can actually export energy internationally. We don't want investors to simply build plants, we want to continue to develop the technology and improve the program.

Q: (Audience Member from a construction company) Could you touch on the construction industry in Morocco? Are there opportunities for activities in the residential or hotel and hospitality sector?

A: (Bouhlal) The construction business is doing very well in Morocco. We are trying to eradicate the slums and are constructing approximately 120 – 150 thousand new homes per year. Companies from all over the world are involved in these initiatives. Cities and infrastructure in Morocco are undergoing a rapid modernization. The new Mediterranean port, a huge investment, is already handling 3 million containers.

Q: What is happening with the youth? Is the economy growing rapidly enough to provide jobs?

A: (Bouhlal) We are doing our best. Growth averaged 5% in the past, and we need 7% to provide the necessary employment. If we are able to build on what we already have and improve our strongest sectors, I have no doubt we will be able to create jobs.

5. Observation

Approximately 60 professionals from businesses engaged or invested in Morocco attended the event. They represented various industries, including aeronautics, automobiles, renewable energy, construction, and agriculture, among others. The event was a luncheon, and, before the Ambassador’s address, guests had an opportunity to meet other professionals involved in business with Morocco. The National US-Arab Chamber of Commerce circulated fact sheets detailing trade between US States and Morocco and the Free Trade Agreement.

\(Back to top\)

The Crisis in Northern Mali: Implications for a Region in Flux

Date: 31 May 2012

1. Title: The Crisis in Northern Mali: Implications for a Region in Flux

Hosted by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and the Atlantic Council

Participants:

Rudolph Atallah: Senior Fellow, The Atlantic Council

Anouar Boukhars: Co-Project Leader, Mauritania Working Group, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace; Assistant Professor of International Relations, McDaniel College

H.E. Maman Sidikou: Ambassador of Niger to the United States

J. Peter Pham: Moderator: Director, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, The Atlantic Council

2. Overview

Much international attention has focused on Mali’s capital Bamako in the wake of the March 22nd coup overthrowing Mali’s elected government, but developments in the northern part of the country may have greater regional implications. Separatist Tuareg rebels, bolstered by militants and weapons flowing from Libya, have succeeded in driving out government forces. As a result, a number of Islamist groups are expanding their presence in the region. The Carnegie Endowment hosted a panel of experts to provide an update on the situation and discuss the broader regional implications for the Sahel, North Africa, and West Africa.

3. Summary

Dr. J. Peter Pham opened with a synopsis of recent events in Mali. He discussed the March 22 “accidental coup” and the international community’s role in resolving the political crisis and rebuilding the government. He explained briefly that the north of Mali has been experiencing prolonged conflict as a result of separatist aims to take control. “Northern Mali is turning into a Star Wars bar of extremists from across the region. The last thing Africa needs right now is another failed state.” He added that “pragmatism” unifies the ideologically diverse groups in power—Tuareg-led separatists, Ansar Dine Islamists, AQIM, and MUJAO.

Following Pham’s introduction, Rudolph Atallah gave a historical overview of revolts in Mali. During the 1950’s “wave of change” in Africa, the Tuaregs began to look toward independence. Mali’s independence in 1960 resulted in the first Tuareg rebellion in 1962.

They feared that control from Bamako would lead to modernization and henceforth “exterminate” their culture. Mali’s military responded with force, effectively “alienating all Tuaregs.” Drought pushed the Tuaregs to move into neighboring countries Algeria and Libya. These events laid the foundation for the current turmoil, Atallah argued. In the summer of 1990, Aghali Alambo and his Popular Movement for the Liberation of Aghad (MPLA) led another

Tuareg uprising. Algeria successfully mediated peace accords between Mali and the insurgents, but another uprising led to a coup in 1992, ousting the president. That year, ethnic groups signed a national pact which integrated Tuareg youth into the military. A period of relative stability followed the pact, until 2006 when another uprising broke out. Atallah explained that this series of insurgencies laid the foundation for the most recent crisis. Anouar Boukhars pointed out that Mali's military does not represent the Malian people, and the country has never been so divided. He noted that the current crisis was triggered by the Libyan revolution, but its roots lie in longstanding domestic tensions. Gradual political decay and breakdown of state institutions, a lack of a credible settlement to historic Tuareg grievances, increased terrorist activity, the fall of Gaddafi, and a political vacuum are all factors that contributed to the success of the insurgents' coup. The Malian government's legitimacy was minimized by democratic stagnation, an overreliance on the patronage of its neighbors, including Libya, an illicit drug trade, and an undersized military. The coup was effectively a collective rejection of political elites; rebel leaders are gaining popular support by denouncing corruption in the Malian government. Boukhars concluded by enumerating some challenges Mali will face in the future: (1) supporting a civil government and keeping the army intact; (2) the heterogeneous nature of the insurgency; and (3) the threat of coexistence of Islamist movements (groups are trying to outsource a 'more authentic' form of Islam).

Maman Sidikou, Nigerien Ambassador to the US, presented a regional perspective and shed light on ways in which the crisis affects neighboring countries. He cited the influx of Libyan arms, kidnappings, and control by AQIM of drug-smuggling routes. The situation is of global concern and correspondingly requires a global response; it could potentially destabilize the entire region, he argued. "Terrorists are consolidating their position by the day in northern Mali and the international community just talks." The African Union and ECOWAS need to intervene. The US could provide training, intelligence, and logistical support. Algeria should also assist. He explained that al-Qaeda is the "driving force" behind the crisis, and that Mali could "turn into another Afghanistan." The Ambassador asked why the US and its allies were willing to intervene in Libya, but have failed to do so in Mali. He warned that if the international community does not act soon its credibility could be jeopardized.

4. Q & A

Q: We need to look back. Only a few people saw this coming. Before we go forward, why and how did we miss seeing this crisis in advance?

A: (Boukhars) There were definitely red flags; it was only a matter of time before something would break out.

(Atallah) The investments in the northern area of Mali were going to military infrastructure therefore upsetting Tuaregs who believed that they needed to strike before anything happened to them.

(Sidikou) Rebellions happen in many countries, including Niger, but the difference with Mali is that the international community tends to close its eyes to this one in particular. We need to ask about the responsibilities of regional powers. It's not that we didn't see the coming crisis, but the pace went very fast.

Q: (Malian Ambassador to the US) I would like to make a few clarifications. The constitution and institutional structure of Mali allow the military to occupy 2/3 of the country and army and terrorist groups operate their own prisons across the state. Secondly, there are fewer Tuaregs in the country than you think; they originate from Amazil and Berber people and are therefore from Morocco/Libya etc. Lastly, I must contend with your description of popular ambition against the elites in Mali. The military was not all against the elites because the highest ranks of soldiers did not join this movement.

A: (Boukhars) People are trying to capitalize on momentum of anger at the political elite. The highest soldiers did not join the movement because they were exactly the targets. Legitimacy in this case stems from never having been associated with power.

(Pham) We need to be pragmatic and not get lost in ideologies. Some groups needed a boost and made alignments as a result rather than because of beliefs.

Q: Will the groups start fighting each other? Where does Colonel Gamou stand?

A: (Atallah) The colonel is resting for now. Until things are pulled together in the south, it will be quiet. The MNLA is concentrating on their image in the media for right now. Trying to resolve differences will be hard.

(Sidikou) Gamou sees al-Qaeda's presence in Northern Mali as a result of all this. Al-Qaeda has resources and ideology that are helping to determine the outcome.

(Boukhars) The multiplicity of jihad groups present in Mali doesn't mean that the extremist groups erode differences in Mali. People support them not because of ideology but because of material and security delivery.

Q: (Bob Holley) Given the depth, intensity, and longevity of problems, do you think that there is a prospect that autonomy might heal the rift and provide structure? In addition, what would neighboring countries think of this solution?

A: (Atallah) I hope they would go back to the pact of 1992, in all honesty the south has to get its act together before anything can happen.

(Boukhars) The political order needs to be restored before anything else. But autonomy is the only game in town. This could set a bad precedent.

(Sidikou) In Niger, most heads of regions are Tuaregs. No one wants the same thing. An institutional framework is needed to restore normalcy, the problem is the actors who shouldn't be there.

(Pham) It would need to be decision of Malians. The last thing Africa needs is another failed state.

(The Malian Ambassador) The leaders are already Tuaregs and no coup can be justified.

Q: Can the panel speak of military integration? Tuaregs joining into the larger military? What do Tuaregs as a whole think and what does the rest of the military think? What lessons did we learn for the future?

A: (Sidikou) We integrated Tuaregs into the army in Niger and all I can really tell you is that results tend to be context-specific.

(Atallah) The area of Mali is so big and so vast that it is impossible to control. Large army numbers are imperative, making integration a necessity.

Q: (Marina Ottaway) I hear two points of view in this discussion. The first is that negotiation needs to happen or improvement is impossible. The other is that the first step is a military solution. Who will have to intervene?

A: (Sidikou) Negotiation would have to be done fast. I don't understand why countries aren't taking action in Mali when they know it's worse than Afghanistan in terms of harboring terrorists.

(Atallah) Algeria's amnesty program had some success in getting bad guys to work for the government. The USA has worked with all these governments, but the problem is that if American troops intervened, they would be considered foreign fighters. The USA can't just go into Mali. By doing so, it would give terrorists a raison d'être. I think we need to leverage guys to turn on the bad groups.

(Boukhars) No military intervention would be useful until the mess in the South is solved. Distrust of the French is still there, so they can't do anything. Niger and Mauritania wouldn't be able to give many soldiers because their armies are so small, but Algeria could probably help out.

5. Observation

The proceedings were attended 50-60 people from think tanks, press agencies, and federal offices. The experts provided valuable insight into the crisis in Mali, but failed to give much prediction about the future or possible solutions. Comments tended to focus on the Tuaregs and their impact on the Northern part of the country. Although Morocco and the Western Sahara were not mentioned, the event underscored that experts are increasingly paying attention to security issues in the Sahel.

\(Back to top\)

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

May 2012 Events Bulletin

May 7

Islamism and the Arab Spring

May 9

Crisis in the Sahel: Bitter Fruit of the Arab Spring

May 10

The Arab Awakening: Implications for al-Qaeda and the Future of Terrorism

May 10

Security Sector Transformation in North Africa and the Middle East

May 11

Opportunities to Advance Human Rights Reporting

May 14

Is the Arab Spring Marginalizing Women?

May 15

Delivering Dignity in the Arab World through Political and Economic Reform

May 24

Welcome Luncheon for Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal

May 31

The Crisis in Northern Mali: Implications for a Region in Flux

Islamism and the Arab Spring

Date: 7 May 2012

1. Title: Islamism and the Arab Spring

Hosted by Foreign Policy Research Institute (FPRI) and the Reserve Officers Association

Participants:

Michael Doran: Senior Fellow, The Brookings Institution

Samuel Helfont: Associate Scholar, FPRI; Ph. D. Candidate, Princeton University
Marina Ottaway: Senior Associate, Middle East Program, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace
Eric Trager: Ira Weiner Fellow, Washington Institute for Near East Policy
Tally Helfont: Moderator: FPRI

2. Overview

Despite the secular nature of many of the protest movements associated with the Arab uprisings, Islamist parties have swept democratic elections across the region, contributing to unease and uncertainty both domestically and abroad. US policymakers and analysts are divided thus far in their responses to this turn of events. How should the US deal with the new regimes that bear a distinctly Islamist character? What will be the state of US alliances in the new Middle East and North Africa and how will they affect core American interests in the region? It is critical for Washington to understand the individual groups that are gaining power in the Middle East and North Africa and to define its interests and goals in dealing with these new power holders. FPRI's panel discussion addressed these challenges and their implications for US foreign policy.

3. Summary

Tally Helfont asked the panelists to address a few specific questions: What has the Arab Spring taught observers about the nature of Islamism? What are the Islamists' objectives? What is the future of Islamism in the region? What does it mean to be a moderate Islamist?

Michael Doran replied that all of Ms. Helfont's questions lead to one central concern: "Is Islamism a strategic threat to the US?" It is not, he concluded. Washington's four vital national interests—free flow of oil, nuclear non-proliferation, counter-terrorism, and protection of Israel—are not jeopardized by the emergence of powerful Islamist actors in the Middle East and North Africa. Oil is concentrated in the Gulf, which has proved very stable in comparison with the rest of the region. Some would argue that the Islamists' electoral success represents a net victory for al-Qaeda, and thus a blow to US counter-terror operations. However, recent events have failed to disrupt the gradual trend of al-Qaeda's political marginalization. The group finds a happy home in Afghanistan, failed states, and semi-failed states, but its willingness to kill fellow Muslims has pushed it to the periphery elsewhere. Local populations simply will not stand for this kind of violence, and the group cannot maintain a political foothold. Protection of Israel, Doran admitted, is a thornier subject. Mubarak was a staunch supporter of the Camp David Accords, but in his absence, the demilitarization of Sinai appears less certain. However, the Egyptian military is loath to engage in a war with Israel at the expense of its aid relationship with the US. Doran noted that his insights rest on the premise that the US doesn't have a competitor for regional influence; if China, for example, decided to intervene and undermine American interests as the Soviet Union did in the 1950s, the situation would change radically.

Samuel Helfont focused on Islamism's impact on regional politics. He divided the pre-Arab Spring Middle East into two camps: Pro-Western moderates supporting the status quo and the Islamists. Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and most of the GCC comprised the first bloc while Iran, Hezbollah, Syria, and the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and Jordan comprised the second. Throughout the region, Islamists rebelling against their secular Arab governments have attracted mostly uniform responses, except in Syria, where rapidly-escalating conflicts have prevented shared interests from coalescing into a lasting alliance. The old Islamist bloc is breaking down. Tehran's unwavering support for Assad has stressed its relations with former friends. Hamas and Turkey, for example, have alienated Iran as they shift support from Assad to the opposition. Iran's actions have adopted a certain discontinuity, as it claims that the Arab Spring is its brainchild while simultaneously backing Assad. Many Gulf regimes are non-democratic autocrats like Assad, but they support the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood. As the conflict in Syria persists, Helfont warned, it will be increasingly difficult for these groups to come together. Negative ripple effects will shape the future Middle East, and could create conflicts elsewhere. There is already a proxy war between Saudi Arabia and Iran, and Syria has stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction. The US has a very strong interest in resolving this issue, or at least "keeping it at a simmer." Washington's only real option is to make its interests explicit. "We need to establish red lines, particularly concerning anti-terrorism and support for foreign wars." The US cannot intervene militarily, but must be clear about what is and what is not acceptable to avoid any misunderstandings.

Marina Ottaway shifted the discussion to defining Islamism. Islamist movements are very much national movements, she explained. They share certain ideas and characteristics, but are specific to each country; there is no established consensus among them. She reflected on her personal exposure to Islamist groups: "A few years ago at Carnegie we held periodic meetings with leaders of various Islamist movements. We discovered that they were having similar internal debates without realizing it." Some Islamists are democratic, like Turkey's AKP, while others talk about establishing a Caliphate. The two principal Islamist groups that concern the US and its policy interests are the Muslim Brotherhood and the Salafists. Members of the Brotherhood are familiar with the political process and believe in democratic government. The Salafists, conversely, have traditionally avoided politics. They historically believed that a society must adhere to the tenets of the Qur'an and the Sunna, which stipulate obedience to the ruler. They are gradually entering the political arena and will most likely increase their presence in the coming years.

Throughout the region, the Islamists' recent electoral successes can be attributed more to their organizational superiority and political experience than their ideology, Ottaway continued. In Morocco, for example, the PJD was the only party that released a comprehensive manifesto and followed an effective campaign strategy. The PJD organized people rather than "politicizing" them. Moroccan Salafists are also gaining support and political skills. In Tunisia and Egypt, for example, a palpable tension is growing between the Islamists and the secularists. They mix neither socially nor politically; the Islamists see the secularists as par of the old elite, and the secularists feel their interests and influence threatened by these new actors.

Eric Trager spoke briefly about various ideologies that characterize Islamists as a group and then argued that Egypt is the most important country vis-à-vis American interests. Liberalism is mutually exclusive with theocracy, and the basic tenet of Islamism is that Sharia should be implemented as the basis of law, Trager asserted. However, interpretations vary among different groups. Salafists seek to recreate the community during the time of the Prophet by directly implementing Sharia. The Muslim Brothers follow a broader interpretation of Sharia. They understand freedom as the freedom to live under religious law, and thus, see the secularists as oppressive. Both groups intend to craft political systems in which law derives from Sharia, which means that all political dialogue will arise from religion. This can only lead to a competitive theocracy, not a competitive democracy.

Trager then compared recruitment processes for the Muslim Brotherhood and the Salafists. In Egypt, being a member of the Muslim Brotherhood is not comparable to being a Democrat or a Republican in the US. The group imposes a very strict and rigorous recruitment system. All together it is a five to eight year process and prospective members are tested at every level. Those who eventually join the Brotherhood are very unlikely to leave it. Joining the Salafists, conversely, is much easier. One simply declares that he is committed to living according to the life of the Prophet and to follow a sheikh. The group is lacking a structured hierarchy; they are less organized and less political. The recruitment process clearly favors the Salafists, Trager concluded. If they are able to organize, they will be very successful politically. He concluded by reiterating that Egypt is heading toward a competitive theocracy between two very anti-American parties.

4. Q & A

Q: (Tally Helfont) Could each panelist briefly respond to the other panelists' comments and give suggestions for future US engagement in the region?

A: (Doran) I agree with Eric's refutation of Islamists as a homogenous group, but I do not think that the Salafists are capable of presenting a unified front or working toward a common strategic goal. They will fight amongst themselves, and with the Brotherhood, and in the end, they will hate each other more than they hate the US. In terms of American engagement, I agree with Sam. Washington's priority need to be deciding on red lines and making them perfectly clear. The US should also focus on Syria, where it has an opportunity to shift the balance against Iran.

(Samuel Helfont) I also agree with Eric's basic points, but I don't think debating Sharia is productive from a policy standpoint. Sharia is used in the Arab world as a catch-all; it is comparable to being in favor of "freedom" here in the US and gives little indication of a group's actual political concerns. Washington needs to focus on establishing red lines in terms of concrete policies rather than Sharia, which is so ambiguous. Regardless of whether or not policies are part of Sharia, we need to have a position on them.

(Ottaway) I disagree with Eric. Some Islamists are looking to implement a version of Sharia that is consistent with 13th century interpretations of Islam, but it is impossible to define what it means to different Islamist groups. I also don't agree with his description of the Muslim Brotherhood. A minority of the Brotherhood's supporters actually went through the recruitment process. The US should not automatically take a hard line against Islamists, or jump to the conclusion that they will undoubtedly pursue policies antithetical to American interests.

(Trager) Sharia can be interpreted many ways, but there are some critical sentiments. It is plausible that the Salafists will not be able to keep it together, and the Brotherhood does have many more supporters than members. However, this is due to their ability to organize. The groups within the Brotherhood are small and Islamist, and they show no signs of breaking off and creating new liberal factions. The US needs to maintain a certain realism about its communications with the Muslim Brotherhood.

Q: What is the future of the Egypt's Coptic Christians? Where can they go? Is it reasonable to expect them to go on living in Egypt?

A: (Trager) Reliable figures about how many Coptic Christians have already emigrated are not available, but it is probably about 100,000. Wealthier Egyptians are considering moving to the US, Canada, or Europe. However, many are extremely poor and don't have this option. Church burnings have exacerbated sectarian tensions and intensified fears of persecution and exclusion from the political process.

(Ottaway) The position of the Copts was not great before the Islamists, and there are some positive developments that should be acknowledged. The Brotherhood made an effort to protect the churches on Christmas, so the Christians could attend services. Sharia was already the driving ideology behind Egypt's constitution, and there is nothing in Sharia that stipulates depriving Christians of their rights. This question should be approached with an open mind; they could be fine.

Q: Can you comment on economic concerns?

A: (Doran) I think the state of affairs is not as disturbing as it may seem. These countries, especially Egypt, need things that only the US can provide. The Egyptian economy is on the verge of collapse and it desperately needs the support of the US. There are no external supporters waiting in the wings to replace US assistance. Anti-Americanism may appear prevalent, but this movement is really about changing Egypt. Our vital interests are secure for the most part.

(Trager) Reserves are low and this presents a real problem. That the Islamists need Washington to bail them out will probably benefit US interests in the long run. So far they have held up an IMF loan, but that concerned an internal struggle with the military. At the end of the day, Egypt needs the US, and that will make any emerging leaders more receptive to American policy there.

Q: How do you picture the region after 10 years of Islamist governance?

A: (Ottaway) The Islamists will unquestionably lose votes in the next election. They cannot solve all of their countries' problems. Whether or not a viable secular opposition will materialize is a different issue. They secularists continue to insult those they should be courting.

(Trager) There is a benefit to ongoing competition, but the US should not want something for Egypt more than the Egyptians want it for themselves. The more Washington gets involved, the more American interests become a political foothold.

Q: (Tally Helfont): Can you speak about developments that could jeopardize our military considerations?

A: (Samuel Helfont) There is a proxy war in Syria between Iran and the Gulf States. If this escalates, Saudi arms could very well be used against Iranian troops in Syria. If chemical weapons go missing, there will be serious issues. Syrian refugees flowing into Turkey also present a troubling situation. Opposition forces are actively organizing within Turkey's borders, and Syrian forces are staging open attacks in Turkey. Turkey could invoke article 5 of NATO, as they are technically under attack from a foreign country. If the US fails to respond, it would undermine the treaty.

(Doran): The Obama Administration seeks to reduce its Gulf presence. A war in Syria, revolution or instability in Saudi Arabia, or an Israeli attack in Iran would all compel Washington to intervene. If the US fails to curb Iran's nuclear aspirations, nuclear weapons could proliferate in the region, which would inherently change American military engagement there.

Q: Is establishing the Caliphate a unifying goal among Islamists?

A: (Doran) The Caliphate is more symbolic than an aspiration. It is like Americans wanting everyone to be free and rich.

(Ottaway) It's like worrying about the Holy Roman Empire making a comeback, it isn't going to happen.

Q: How far can Washington push Turkey to advance American interests with respect to the Arab Spring?

A: (Doran) As I said before, the Obama Administration wants to extricate the US from the region. The Arab Spring presents Washington with a strategic opportunity, and acting multilaterally will not suffice. The US needs to put together another "coalition of the willing" and work with the Turks, the Saudis, and the French. Assad is far from finished, and a prolonged period of violence and disruption in Syria presents strategic threats to surrounding countries such as Israel, Turkey, and Lebanon.

(Samuel Helfont) The US must be very clear with Turkey considering what it is willing to do. The Turks want to stop the inflow of refugees; if the US is not willing to help, Washington needs to leave no room for misunderstandings.

(Ottaway) The Turks have their own interests and will not help the US pursue its own.

5. Observation

This event was a webcast. The panelists focused on the Muslim Brotherhood and the Salafists as the two principal competing Islamist groups and only briefly touched on other parties like the PJD or Ennahda. Marina Ottaway argued that the PJD has been successful because they are effective organizers and skilled politicians, not Islamist ideologues. She suggested that Benkirane’s party will most likely lose votes in the next election, as other parties—including the Salafists—gain political experience. In terms of American foreign policy in the region, the panelists agreed that Washington must put forward coherent and concrete policies, clearly communicating its stance on various issues so as to avoid any misunderstandings. With the exception of Ms. Ottaway, they insisted that establishing “red lines” should be a principal tenet of US engagement in the region. Ms. Ottaway made an interesting point when she argued that a hard-line approach would not serve American interests and that Washington should approach these emerging actors with an open mind and willingness to collaborate.

\(Back to top\)

Crisis in the Sahel: Bitter Fruit of the Arab Spring

Date: 9 May 2012

1. Title: Crisis in the Sahel: Bitter Fruit of the Arab Spring

Hosted by the Heritage Foundation

Panelists:

Alexis Areiff: Analyst in African Affairs, Congressional Research Service

J. Peter Pham, Ph.D: Director, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, The Atlantic Council

Manoela Borges: Desk Officer for Mauritania and Mali, Department of State

James Philips: Senior Research Fellow for Middle Eastern Affairs, The Heritage Foundation

Morgan Roach: Moderator: Research Associate, The Heritage Foundation

2. Overview

As one of Africa’s least governed spaces, the Sahel region offers militant groups the advantage of operating with relative ease. Last year’s civil war in Libya, resulting in the demise of the Qaddafi regime, has exacerbated this long-standing problem. With a gaping power vacuum across the region, terrorist groups such as al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and regional rebel and criminal groups have the opportunity to expand their influence. This poses significant security concerns not only for the region, but also for the United States. At this event, panelists discussed the implications the crisis in the Sahel on US foreign policy and provided recommendations on how the US should respond to this growing threat.

3. Summary

Morgan Roach opened the event by detailing the current crisis in Mali. She noted that the return of 2,000 armed Tuaregs who had been fighting for Qaddafi in Libya exacerbated the ongoing conflict between the Movement for the Liberation of Azawad (MNLA) and the central government, which in turn led to the coup in Bamako. The situation in the North quickly descended into chaos as Azawad has been unable to assert leadership over the various actors in the region, including Ansar al-Dine, AQIM, and other independent criminal network. The violence has caused thousands of civilians to flee, thus exacerbating a food and humanitarian crisis across the Sahel. Roach underscored that the situation in Mali threatens to distort regional stability and asked the panelists to provide their own assessment of the situation, as well as recommendations for US policy toward Mali and the Sahel.

James Phillips primarily analyzed events in Libya, arguing that what is happening in the Sahel is largely fallout from the conflict in Libya. The availability of arms from Qaddafi's warehouses and the return of heavily armed Tuaregs to the region have bolstered dissident political and criminal movements, creating serious security problems. Phillips likewise detailed some of the primary actors operating in this zone of lawlessness, which in his estimation includes Libya. Although AQIM is one of weaker al-Qaeda franchises according to Phillips, it has been strengthened by its acquisition of Libyan weapons, including MANPADS. Phillips argued that AQIM is nevertheless limited in its attempts to spread across the Sahel because of its domination by Algerian Islamists. How its involvement in Mali plays out is yet to be seen – at present, it appears that AQIM is splintering into disparate groups, with some cells remaining dominated by Algerians, and others becoming more open to members from the Sahelian countries. Phillips' primary recommendation was that the US must help the countries of the region reclaim missing Libyan weapons.

Dr. J. Peter Pham explored two primary issues: current challenges to states in the Sahel region and the current crisis in Mali. With regard to the former, he stated that there are three primary challenges to governance in the Sahelian countries. First, the weakness of state institutions and the prevalence of corruption present a serious challenge to governance in the Sahel. Second, internal divisions across the Sahel belt make it difficult for states to exert control over the entirety of their territory. In Mali, for example, there are divisions not only between the North and South, but also within the North between the "black" tribes (Fulani, Songhai) and the "white" tribes (Tuareg, Moors). Third, the radicalization of youth, due to a large demographic bulge and a lack of economic opportunities, presents a threat to the stability of these states.

Turning to Mali, Dr. Pham argued that the country is a failing, if not failed state. He drew three primary lessons from the current situation in Mali and provided a number of recommendations for confronting the current crisis. First, the primary lesson learned is that pragmatism is required in US policy responses because pragmatism is the primary strategy of groups operating in the North. Pham argued that experts should stop labeling groups under one grouping or another, such as "Islamist" or "separatist" or "nationalist" because doing so means making assumptions about their actions that limit our understanding of these groups. In the case of Mali, because experts had labeled groups as nationalist or Islamist, they assumed that they wouldn't work together because they had different interests. In actuality, they did link up and work together toward a common cause because they had a pragmatic rather than ideological strategy. The MNLA didn't have enough manpower despite the influx of Libyan weapons, so it turned to Iyad Ag Ghaly, a former Tuareg nationalist turned Salafist leader and founder of Ansar al-Dine, which in turn had connections with the former GSPC and current AQIM (Ghaly is the cousin of AQIM commander Hamada Ag Hama). Ghaly lent his support and thus a wall of separation between "nationalists" and "Islamists" came down. The MNLA nevertheless got more than it asked for, as Ansar al-Dine has asserted its authority in Kidal and AQIM has done so in Gao and Timbuktu. Who has the upper hand now? According to Dr. Pham, it seems that the Islamists do. Sharia law and Islamic punishments have been imposed in Kidal and Gao. Likewise the recent burning of a Sufi mausoleum indicates that the Islamists are indeed in charge. Second, the diversity of ethnic groups and the divisions between them cannot be understated. Northern Mali is a scarcely inhabited place populated by a number of groups. Although Tuaregs represent the plurality of inhabitants, there are various militant groups operating in the region, both "black" vs. "white" as well as "Arab" versus "Islamist." Third, the situation in Northern Mali is at the very least an indictment of US counterterrorism policy in the region. The situation happened so quickly that it calls into question US assistance efforts on security issues. There is nothing wrong with the Trans-Saharan Counterterrorism Partnership (TSCTP), but the model must be questioned given recent events. Dr. Pham questioned how the Malian army fights terrorism when it is unable to control a counterinsurgency.

Given these challenges, Dr. Pham called for a long-term commitment to the Sahel, both for security assistance and development assistance. For Mali specifically, Dr. Pham stressed that there needs to be a commitment to stopping the crisis from spreading beyond its borders to other insecure states in the region, including Niger, Mauritania, Libya, and Algeria – all states that are facing instability and security threats. The borders in this region are fluid and it does not appear that there is a force capable of restoring the Malian government at this time, but the threat must be contained at all costs. Dr. Pham called on the US to work with ECOWAS and the African Union to reconstitute a legitimate government in Bamako and retrain the military. Only then can one think about addressing the situation in the North, where no one really knows who is in charge. Dr. Pham noted that resolving the conflict with the North will be a multi-year endeavor and that in the meantime restoring order and leadership in Bamako is the most important thing that needs to be done.

Manoela Borges detailed current US engagement with Sahelian countries to address both the security crisis in Mali and the humanitarian crisis across the Sahel. The US is working to build the capacity of these states to handle threats on their own; however, the current capacity of these states to do so is low. The TSCTP helps with building security capacity, but more regional cooperation is needed. Although security threats to the Sahel are of concern to the US and its interests, Borges did highlight that because AQIM has not made threats against the US, the State Department is being extraordinarily careful to not "Americanize" the threat. In Mali specifically, State is pursuing diplomatic engagement at the regional level through ECOWAS, and the bi-lateral level through direct engagement with concerned countries. Borges reiterated Dr. Pham's recommendation that the priority of the US is, as it must be, to restore democratic governance to Mali and establish a timeline for elections before turning to the North. Mali first needs a legitimate government in order to address longer-term concerns.

Alexis Areiff focused on US policy in the region. She noted that the Sahel has only become an area of concern to the US from a security perspective in the last decade; there has been a growing focus on the region because of the attacks of September 11th and the growing influence of the theory linking weak and failing states to terrorism, insecurity, and transnational security threats. Areiff expressed similar concerns to Dr. Pham as to the relevance of US counterterrorism policy in the aftermath of the coup in Mali. She posited, "Who are the US partners in the region if we can no longer work with militaries after they have led coups, such as in Mali, Niger, and Mauritania?" Debates over the US military presence are thus understandable. Areiff also mentioned that the US has competing policy objectives in the region – on the one hand it wants to work with democratically elected governments to counter terrorism in the region, but on the other hand, it wants to counter terrorism in the region with national partners to build their capacity – two issues that are not always in synch given coups in Mali, Mauritania, and Niger. Areiff questioned how viable the TSTCP policy was given its need for partner governments in the region.

4. Q & A

Q: (Roach) The Malian coup leader was trained by the US military. Do you have any comments or insights on the implications of this?

A: (Borges) Following the coup, the US undertook a policy review of all forms of assistance to Mali. We terminated security assistance and applied legal sanctions to the military following the review. We still have a policy hold on other forms of assistance, with the exception of humanitarian assistance and assistance for democratic elections. As for the military training of Captain Sanogo, the US trains future leaders in countries with very little capacity. This was an unfortunate coincidence.

(Pham) We need not paint everything with one broad stroke – we need more flexible policy vehicles for dealing with coups.

Q: (Daniel Moro, SAIS) What is your assessment of Algeria’s reaction to the situation in Mali?

A: (Areiff) The crisis in Libya pushed all of Algeria’s buttons. Algeria wasn’t helpful in promoting Western policy on Libya because it supported Qaddafi, feared a security vacuum, and opposed a NATO intervention on its borders. This was indicative of its reaction to the Arab Spring – just this weekend the Prime Minister called the Arab Spring a catastrophe. With regards to the security threat, Algeria has tried to marshal a regional response to terrorism, taking the leadership role with smaller Sahelian nations and excluding Morocco. But this has not always been welcome by Sahel states, which have a love/hate relationship with Algeria and its meddling. The threat to Algeria is nevertheless very real – the kidnapping of aid workers from the camps in Tindouf and the kidnapping of diplomats in Mali by the AQIM-splinter group, the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in Africa (MUJAO), highlights how Algeria has been hit on all sides. I don’t, however, see a strategic response from Algeria.

(Pham) Algeria has been ambivalent. It has not yet been hit by the Arab Spring, which has affected all of its neighbors in various ways. There was a relatively peaceful revolution in Tunisia, a violent one in Libya, and Morocco tried to get ahead of the parade through reforms. Algeria’s response to regional issues is heavily influenced by its rivalry with Morocco, which obstructs not only counterterrorism cooperation but also economic integration, which is urgently required to address the security threats we have been talking about today. What is particularly interesting is that Algeria clearly doesn’t want an independent Azawad, but has for thirty years supported the creation of an “Azawad on the sea” while supporting independence for the Western Sahara.

(Borges) Algeria’s involvement in the region is complex, but very important. Its relationship with the Tuaregs and its mediation in previous Tuareg conflicts has been essential. The US is engaged with Algeria and ECOWAS to coordinate a response to the situation in Mali.

Q: (H.E.M. Maman S. Sidikou, Ambassador of Niger to the US) We have heard allegations of links between Boko Haram and AQIM and now are hearing reports that in addition to the presence of those two groups in Mali, there are reportedly Pakistanis and other jihadis arriving in Mali. What is al-Qaeda’s strategy for the region? We need to understand it in order for countries to provide solutions for themselves.

A: (Pham) AQIM’s strategy has two principal pillars. First, it uses the Sahel as a real base for its primary target – the Kabilye region in northern Algeria. It also uses the Sahel to bring in money for its aims by engaging in trafficking and kidnapping for ransom. Second, it wants to spread its ideology and bolster its connections with other armed groups. We have seen this in its links with Boko Haram. However, there have been divisions within AQIM.

Some cells have been accused of being too interested in making money and not focusing enough on ideology. In detailing the reasons for its split, MUJAO has claimed both the AQIM was not extremist enough and that it was too Arab. So, what can be done? It will be a long-time before Mali is sorted out, so our priorities have to be about containing it. We need to prioritize resources to strengthen the government in Bamako.

(Arieff) This gets back to the pragmatism and the opportunism of different actors. AQIM has been opportunistic in getting involved in northern Mali. But it may have overreached by jumping in without much thought. We need to find a way to turn it into a setback.

(Borges) Every week it seems as though there are new groups popping up in Mali. We need to understand them in order to be able to develop an appropriate policy response.

5. Observation

Approximately 40 policymakers and regional experts attended the event at the Heritage Foundation. The panelists all discussed the current security crisis in Mali and the Sahel, echoing concerns about the fallout from the revolution in Libya that have been present in the media and in think tank circles for over a year. Although spreading the message about the importance of the Sahel and advocating for US engagement on this issue among a wider audience is always helpful, the panelists did not add much new to current thinking on the security threat in the Sahel, nor did they provide novel recommendations for how to confront it. The representative from the State Department provided the usual statement about all that the US is doing in the region in order to justify its actions to date. Interestingly, following Dr. Pham's important reference and warning about the possibility of an Azawad on the sea in the Western Sahara, Borges appeared almost defensive about Algeria's role and leadership on security issues in the region. Rather than weakening Algeria's position in the region, it appears that the events of Libya and Mali have in fact strengthened it, at least in the minds of some policymakers, despite widespread acknowledgement of Algeria's obstinacy to US interests in Libya and to a negotiated resolution of the Western Sahara.

The panel highlighted yet again that the threat of security in the Sahel is at last receiving widespread attention and that there is increased engagement from the think tank and policy community on the region. However, with the exception of Dr. Pham, no one acknowledged the obstacle of the Western Sahara to regional counterterrorism cooperation, nor did anyone recommend US efforts to promote Algerian-Moroccan cooperation. Arieff mentioned Algeria's explicit decision to leave Morocco out of its regional counterterrorism initiative, but unfortunately did not detail the implications of that decision. The security argument alone is thus not enough to spur US action on the Western Sahara; it will need to be continually linked to the importance of regional counterterrorism cooperation and economic integration in order to be effective in promoting a resolution of the Western Sahara.

For a video of the event and a complete copy of the report, please visit:
<http://www.heritage.org/events/2012/05/crisis-in-the-sahel>

\(Back to top\)

The Arab Awakening: Implications for al-Qaeda and the Future of Terrorism

Date: 10 May 2012

1. Title: The Arab Awakening: Implications for al-Qaeda and the Future of Terrorism

Hosted by Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars

Panelists:

Jon Alterman: Brzezinski Chair in Global Security and Director, Middle East Program, Center for Strategic and International Studies

Barak Barfi: Research Fellow, New America Foundation

Daniel Byman: Professor, School of Foreign Service, Georgetown University

Daveed Gartenstein-Ross: Fellow, Foundation for Defense of Democracies

Bruce Hoffman: Moderator: Professor and Director, Center for Peace and Security Studies and Security Studies Program, Georgetown University

2. Overview

The Arab Awakening has raised a number of questions about the future viability of al-Qaeda in the region. Many analysts claimed that the revolutions that took place in Tunisia, Libya, and Egypt were a blow to al-Qaeda's ideology – mass protests resulting in regime change showed that civilians could affect popular change without violence. In addition, the presence and victory of Islamist parties highlighted that those seeking a greater role for Islam in the political space could do so through political parties and elections, rather than through terror. Others argued that the fall of governments that were strong allies in the global war on terror and the violence used to achieve some of these revolutions could only result in increased insecurity. Even if new governments are willing to take a hard line against Islamic terrorism, they are much weaker than their predecessors who ruled autocratically. At this event, expert panelists explored whether the Arab Awakening has marginalized al-Qaeda or whether it has presented opportunities, such as sectarian tensions, that it can exploit.

3. Summary

Jane Harman, President of the Wilson Center, introduced the event. She underscored that the threat of al-Qaeda is different, but that it is still out there. She likewise noted that the rise of Islamist parties as a "game changer." Al-Qaeda's polling numbers are currently very low and Harman posited that this was perhaps due to the success of Islamist political parties, who have shown that there is another way for people to express their views – through the political process.

Jon Alterman spoke first about al-Qaeda's primary failure. The real threat of the organization was that it would go from the extreme fringe to the mainstream of Islamic thinking, capitalizing on popular dissatisfaction that was real and present. That has failed; al-Qaeda has been unable to win broad support. Why not? Alterman noted three primary reasons. First, it killed a lot of Muslims – more than non-Muslims in fact. Second, it never presented a positive agenda. Third, states linked up strongly against al-Qaeda, mobilizing the cleric establishment to delegitimize al-Qaeda's Islamic message. Taking away its religious legitimacy was essential in limiting al-Qaeda's mass appeal. However, because these latter efforts were state-led, what do you do now that these states have failed and popular grievances have not gone away? Alterman suggested that despite this primary failure, the durability of al-Qaeda's ideas remain. He argued that there will not be an al-Qaeda insurgency as a global organization, but that its ideas will ensure on a smaller level. For example, continued chaos in Syria and Yemen will boost al-Qaeda, but it will be forced to operate on a smaller scale because politics by and large has set al-Qaeda back. Alterman offered his conclusions on the legacy of all of this. For one, the Arab Awakening signifies the demise of Salafi jihadism. However, it also signifies the end of Salafi "quietism." Previously, those Salafis who were not involved in terrorism stayed out of politics and avoided criticizing the ruler because of an unspoken agreement between the clerics and the state. The Arab Awakening has changed that agreement and now the Salafis engage in politics and criticize leaders. The rise of Salafi politics may thus be the long term impact of al-Qaeda.

Barak Barfi talked about al-Qaeda's challenges and opportunities as a result of the Arab Awakening and then focused on the specific case of al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM). Barfi stressed that al-Qaeda's propaganda against rulers no longer holds because the Arab Awakening has proven that change can come about without violent rebellions. Al-Qaeda has thus suffered setback in the short-term. Barfi cautioned, however, that in the long-term, al-Qaeda might benefit from inevitable political and economic problems that result from the potential failings of democracy. He stressed that democracy is not a cure all and that will be a gap between expectations and realities in many countries that have experienced a transition – this gap will be a recruiting tool from al-Qaeda. Barfi also warned that many Salafi scholars argue that Islam is not compatible with democracy and that Islamist groups are in fact using their current power to create constitutions based on sharia law. If they fail to do so, al-Qaeda will again have a raison d'être.

Turning to its regional affiliate in North Africa, Barfi argued that the political arena AQIM works in differs from that of the other affiliates. Although its home country of Algeria has not been impacted by the Arab Spring, it has still had to grapple with its outcomes. It is nevertheless well-placed to benefit from insecurity and instability in North Africa because AQIM exploits ungoverned spaces and conflict zones. The crisis in northern Mali, an area that has never known government because it is simply too large of a space to govern, illustrates the potential of al-Qaeda, which is now out of hiding and operating in plain sight in Timbuktu. Barfi nevertheless sees a silver lining in the Mali coup: Amadou Toumani Touré was never really a strong supporter of the global war on terrorism against AQIM and there were allegations that some senior officials were involved in drug trafficking and smuggling operations with the group. Touré's government likewise never had a strategy for dealing with the Tuaregs. While the situation is too much in flux to make predictions, there is the potential to have a stronger counterterrorism ally in Mali as a result of the coup and subsequent chaos.

Daniel Byman expressed concern with the "good news story" experts have been telling about counterterrorism in the aftermath of the Arab Spring and cautioned that counterterrorism efforts may in fact suffer because of the revolutions for three primary reasons. First, as governments are changing, there is the potential for less counterterrorism cooperation. For example, Egypt is much more focused on other threats to the regime that it is on cooperation with the United States. Second, new governments are weaker than their predecessors, who ruled with an iron fist and enforced order at the expense of liberty. It is not yet evident that new governments will be as able to enforce order and thus limit the impact of small extremist groups. Third, it's possible that the transitions will fail and that people may be willing to try alternative means of political change. Byman argued that people may feel that they tried the political process and failed and therefore turn to more radical means, as was the case in Algeria. Thus, while the al-Qaeda core is weakened, the power of the affiliates is growing at a local and regional level. These affiliates have the potential to exploit the Arab Spring and tap into some of the inevitable failings of the Arab Spring revolutions.

Daveed Gartenstein-Ross presented a study he completed on al-Qaeda statements during the Arab Spring. Recognizing a critical gap in Western understanding of al-Qaeda's reaction to the Arab Spring, Gartenstein-Ross sought to understand whether the Arab Spring had strengthened or weakened al-Qaeda. The study found a surprising amount of agreement among jihadi observers of the Arab Spring, likely because it only assessed the first year. Gartenstein-Ross predicted that this would not be the case in the years to come, but that nevertheless the study provided a number of themes important for our understanding of al-Qaeda today. First, jihadi observers viewed the Arab Spring as a pan-Islamic uprising, which is spreading because Arab leaders failed. This is a good thing in their minds. Second, there was broad agreement about the geopolitical implications of regime change: US influence in the region is weak or at least on the decline; America is a bad ally (ex: Mubarak); the Arab Spring is a strategic setback for Israel; surviving apostate regimes are the biggest losers of the Arab Spring; and the clergy that supported these regimes have been de-legitimized. Third, al-Qaeda and the jihadi movement will gain from the Arab Spring. Statements indicate that al-Qaeda expects greater freedom of mobility under new regimes, both because they are not as repressive and because they will not be able to control territory as effectively. Fourth, al-Qaeda is aware of its need for a strategic response to the Arab Spring. In conclusion, the study revealed that al-Qaeda does not view the upheaval as a death knell and that it is optimistic about its ability to capitalize on it.

4. Q & A

Q: (Hoffman) Could al-Qaeda exploit sectarian tensions in the region?

A: (Byman) This is a double-edged sword. The core wants to focus on the United States and on overthrowing governments, but among the affiliates, sectarian tensions matter more. It could drive affiliate groups in a way the core has resisted, but it's risky.

(Barfi) It could lead to a backlash – al-Qaeda's killing of Muslims is one of the primary reasons why people have turned against it.

Q: (Oxford Analytica) Are you concerned about the institutionalization of terrorism because of the presence of Salifis in power?

A: (Alterman) Salafi politics is based on populism, rather than violence. Salafi parties want to make Islam a total part of people's lives. What is concerning, however, is the rise of anti-intellectual trends and intolerance among Salafi groups.

(Gartenstein-Ross) I'm not concerned about groups in government turning to violence, but whether or not they will shelter violent groups or actors. If those governments fail, it may strengthen al-Qaeda. In that case, Islamists may argue that the revolutions didn't go far enough and were in fact only a half-measure. Likewise, if there are no real changes in these governments, we may see violence; Islamist parties have made electoral gains, but if they have no real power, as happened in 1991 Algeria, they may resort to violence.

(Barfi) We are starting to see important terrorist leaders entering into politics – putting down their guns to campaign. It will be harder for some terrorist groups to continue to be against participating in politics when their leaders are. However, this could also create vacuums for more extreme groups to operate. This was the case in Gaza. When Hamas joined the political process, other, more extreme Salafist groups emerged on the street.

Q: (Wilson Center) How will al-Qaeda central respond to movements among its affiliates?

A: (Hoffman) As discussed, there are opportunities for the affiliates to exploit and capitalize on instability in the Middle East and North Africa. How al-Qaeda central is able to capitalize on their movement is unclear. But, the global war on terror is going to be important for at least the next decade.

Q: (Hoffman) Where will al-Qaeda as a movement be in the next ten years?

A: (Alterman) It will be its set of ideas that lasts. It will be harder to find the center and hard to stamp out.

(Byman) A lot depends on whether or not it is given a cause like it has been given before [Iraq]. Al-Qaeda has made mistakes, but it is a learning organization.

(Gartenstein-Ross) It will be influence by global trends like the increasingly common presence of weak and failing states and increased resource scarcity. But, al-Qaeda will only continue to present a robust regional challenge, not a strategic challenge.

(Barfi) It is going to come down to the affiliates to take the mantel from al-Qaeda central and the old generation. We may even see the creation of new affiliates – for example in Syria. If the West doesn't get involved, the jihadists will step in.

5. Observation

Approximately 30 policymakers and experts attended the event, including Jane Harman, the President of the Wilson Center. Her presence indicates that the issue of terrorism in the aftermath of the Arab Spring is a core area of interest for the Wilson Center. Unfortunately, the speakers focused primarily on al-Qaeda central and not on affiliates operating in the region where the revolutions of the Arab Spring took place. With the exception of Barfi's discussion of AQIM, panelists did not provide insight on al-Qaeda's future in North Africa. Likewise, they did not provide any recommendations on how to engage new governments on counterterrorism cooperation. While it's obvious that the implications of the Arab awakening on al-Qaeda's operation is not yet clear, a discussion on moving forward with US counterterrorism policy would have been helpful, particularly for our issue. The panelists were nevertheless all well-informed and Barfi in particular may be potential new resource for MAC on security issues.

For a video of the event, please visit:

<http://www.wilsoncenter.org/event/the-arab-awakening-implications-for-al-qaeda-and-the-future-terrorism>

\(Back to top\)

Security Sector Transformation in North Africa and the Middle East

Date: 10 May 2012

1. Title: Security Sector Transformation in North Africa and the Middle East

Hosted by the USIP Center of Innovation for Security Sector Governance

Participants:

Panel 1: Panel of Representatives from the Region

Magda Boutros: Director, Egyptian Initiative for Personal Rights

Najla Elmangoush: Former Member, Public Engagement Unit, Libyan National Transitional Council

Dr. Murhaf Jouejati: Chairman, National Consensus Movement; Member, Syrian National Council

Dr. Radwan Masmoudi: President, Center for the Study of Islam and Democracy

Hesham Sallam: Researcher - Egypt

Robert Perito: Moderator: Director, Security Sector Governance Center, US Institute of Peace

Panel 2: Panel of Former U.S. Ambassadors to the Region

Ambassador Barbara Bodine: Former US Ambassador to Yemen (1997-2001)

Ambassador Rust Deming: Former US Ambassador to Tunisia (2000-2003)

Ambassador Deborah Jones: Former US Ambassador to Kuwait (2008-2011)

Ambassador Thomas Riley: Former US Ambassador to Morocco (2003-2009)
Robert Perito: Moderator: Director, Security Sector Governance Center, US Institute of Peace

2. Overview

Much has changed in the region over the last year: Libya and Yemen joined Tunisia and Egypt on the path toward democratic reform, Syria hangs in the balance. The security challenges and needed reforms vary by country, from establishing street-level security and disarming militias to ministerial reform and transitional justice. Yet, across the region, transforming the mandate and institutions of the security forces and regulatory bodies that oversee them will be a vital step toward establishing peace and democratic rule. For the USIP Center of Innovation for Security Sector Governance 3rd annual conference, current practitioners, government leaders, and former ambassadors gathered to discuss the pressing question of security sector reform in North Africa and the Middle East.

3. Summary

Panel 1:

Dr. Radwan Masmoudi addressed the crucial balance between justice and stability, a vexing goal for all post-revolutionary states. Those who served the regime in a brutal capacity must be punished, but in a way that avoids igniting a civil war. Furthermore, the skilled bureaucrats who served the regime in isolation from its corrupt practices must be integrated into the new government in order to preserve precious talent.

Madga Boutros argued that an overlooked component of the Egyptian revolution has been a popular repudiation of the security apparatus, comprising the police, the military, and the intelligence services. The primary goal of activists, she said, is to increase accountability within the security services while limiting their role in Egypt's political economy. As part of a civil society group dedicated to passing security reform legislation through the new parliament, Boutros confirmed that the SCAF wishes to hand over power to a new president, provided the generals are allowed to preserve the military's interests in manufacturing and natural resources. Boutros concluded with a warning that economic development and democracy could follow only in the wake of security sector reform.

Dr. Murhaf Jouejati insisted that the Syrian National Council's priority was not the fall of Bashar al-Assad, but the cessation of hostilities. Nevertheless, he discussed the kinds of challenges that would face Syrians should Assad's regime implode. Priorities would include securing Assad's biological and chemical weapons; corralling the remnants of the Baathist regime and its allies in the security services; stopping any looting; and shrinking the army into a small, disciplined, apolitical force whose sole function is to safeguard the sovereignty of Syrian territory. Jouejati was adamant that the most important reforms depend upon a total change in mentality in that the Syrian people must begin to see their government as accountable before meaningful progress can be made.

Najla Elmangoush played an integral part in the Libyan revolution and she recounted the enormous impact of propaganda on the evolution of hostilities. Turning to security sector reform, Elmangoush expressed concern that Qaddafi loyalists, some of whom fled Libya, continue to actively destabilize the country. Despite a dire need for coordinated security forces, militias and other armed groups continue to clash at the local level. Thus, Libya's most pressing problem is one of integrating militants and former rebels into a unified military and police command.

Hesham Sellam reiterated that Hosni Mubarak's old security apparatus remains intact and largely shielded from security sector reforms. He expressed skepticism that a new president would be able to rein in the security ministries, particularly when considering the fact that a new parliament did very little to weaken the SCAF. Consequently, many activists favor a full focus on making the military, police, and intelligence services more transparent and subservient to civilian leadership.

Panel 2:

The second panel began with the former Ambassador to Tunisia, Rust Deming, who is convinced that a prerequisite for the overthrow of any autocratic government is a politically motivated, economically empowered middle class. Yet Tunisia, with its famously vibrant middle class, had until recently failed to make that transformation. Deming found that government officials provided two arguments against a full-fledged democratic reform program: 1) caution and a slow pace would avoid a collapse of the transition process; 2) a democratic government would inevitably empower Islamists. According to Deming, the attacks of September 11, 2001 only vindicated these fears, which may or may not have been an excuse to avoid any reform at all. In addition, the Ben Ali's had massive commercial interests that might be damaged by democratic reforms, and Ben Ali himself fretted over the persecution he may face should he relinquish power. Thus, Deming left his post in Tunisia wondering when some sort of revolution might occur. When it finally did, Deming observed that Ennahda appeared to be the only party structure with deep roots, that young people were quickly alienated from the political process, and that the security services were rendered dysfunctional. Despite this, Deming remained optimistic that Tunisians could draft a constitution, reconcile religious freedom with a free press, employ underutilized graduates, and initiate a national reconciliation process to reintegrate valuable technocrats from the old regime.

Serving US Ambassador to Kuwait, Deborah Jones asked why those nations that are party to the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) have yet to experience the same widespread upheaval seen in Tunisia or Syria. She acknowledged that US actions in Afghanistan and Iraq, as well as President Obama's "abandonment" of Hosni Mubarak set off alarm bells in Riyadh and Kuwait City, where monarchs wondered how far such activism might extend. Their response was to quell unrest in Bahrain and court partnerships with close American allies, including Morocco and Jordan. Jones cautioned the audience against assuming that the people of the Gulf want an Egypt-style uprising. Many of them see royal families as having distributed wealth and improved access to housing and education—this relationship between the rulers and the people forms one of the most important institutions among the GCC nations.

Former Ambassador to Morocco Thomas Riley framed the issue of security sector reform in terms of North Africa's broader, long-term problems: high unemployment, the youth bulge, and a lack of opportunity. According to Riley, ignoring the underlying economic challenges will directly undermine all other efforts. He noted that those nations with extensive resources, such as Algeria or Saudi Arabia, are simply buying time until the day when their oil and gas disappear, at which point they will have to provide fulfilling employment opportunities to their people. Without investment in economic diversification and education, however, such governments might find themselves toppled. Riley complained that the US repeatedly fails to follow up on political or economic programs with audits to determine their effectiveness, and encouraged local populations to push for more oversight.

Former Ambassador to Yemen Barbara Bodine recalled that before Ben Ali stepped down in Tunisia, planning was already underway in Yemen to launch demonstrations and bring the government into paralysis. Yet even after Ben Ali's regime fell, events in Yemen defied expectations, as successive “turning points” failed to push out Saleh and his coterie. Bodine detailed how the security service essentially split into three groups controlled by their respective families. The resulting stalemate produced a distinctly Yemeni approach to the problem, complete with long, extended, somewhat theatrical negotiations. Bodine thought the Yemenis were wise, once an agreement was brokered, to schedule a referendum that could signal a clear break with the past. This was essential, for one of Saleh’s closest advisers served in a transitional role. Moving on to Yemen’s acute security crisis in the South and North, Bodine thought any political settlements with the Houthi rebels would have to wait until the new government had established bona fides with the majority of the population. She concluded by warning US policymakers not to overemphasize the counter-terror aspects of US-Yemen relations. In the near-term, the regular armed forces will be unable to handle al-Qaeda or the Houthi, and the US must examine other development-centric approaches to quelling extremism. For Yemen, al-Qaeda is increasingly a counterinsurgency matter, and it would be a mistake for the US to remain wholly focused on counterterrorism.

4. Q & A

Q: Does the US legacy of supporting authoritarian regimes hinder it in establishing effective relations now?

A: (Jones) Those of us sitting in our positions as of February 2011 got an earful from host governments on our fecklessness. In Kuwait, there was great concern, as stability is a critical factor for any country that relies on exporting a resource to survive. When we went into Iraq, we actually caused a bit of a transformation in the GCC states—a problem that was previously approached through cooperation with non-government actors became dominated by security considerations and concern for domestic stability above all. Obviously we have long faced a tension between our economic interests and our moral obligations, but the best thing we can do is to focus on pragmatic programs that will help states develop. (Riley) The answer is yes. But I would make an observation, which is that in Tunisia, Wikileaks actually improved many people’s perception of the US because all of a sudden they had clear evidence that US officials were accurately reporting on corruption and that they understood what was really going on. So with that unexpected transparency also came the fact that we were not being fooled by these governments.

(Bodine) Over the last decade, our attention was so focused on security that we lost the rhetoric of development and governance, and in many places we lost the programs on development and governance. If we return to having a security centric approach, and we miss these two other factors, that is how we will be judged going forward.

Q: In Egypt, Syria, and Tunisia, the security institutions are large and entrenched, whereas in Libya and in Yemen the problem is the opposite. So what is the biggest problem these countries face?

A: (Bodine) Libya and Yemen actually face very different security sector reform issues. In Libya you have freestanding militias that must be integrated into a newly created defense and security system. In Yemen, there are existing units that must be reformed and restructured, but we are not building from the ground up.

5. Observation

The event was attended by over 100 representatives from US government agencies, NGOs, and foreign governments. All of the speakers agreed that security sector reform is vital if Arab nations are to move forward with economic liberalization and a broader political transformation. Unfortunately, the recommendations were extremely vague, and no speakers gave any details on exactly how security sector reform is to take place when the most powerful institutions in most of these nations are, in fact, the security services. In places like Yemen and Libya, where the military is a weak institution, where is the body capable of controlling disparate militias? Ambassador Riley stated that the most important pressure comes from the bottom up because it is difficult for military leaders who are trying to appear nationalist to ignore the cries of millions. However, we have seen massive demonstrations in Egypt in past weeks that suggest the military does not give in easily when it comes to issues about which it cares deeply.

\(Back to top\)

Opportunities to Advance Human Rights Reporting

Date: 11 May 2012

1. Title: Opportunities to Advance Human Rights Reporting

Hosted by the Fund for Peace

Participants:

Mark P. Lagon: Adjunct Senior Fellow for Human Rights, Council on Foreign Relations; International Relations and Security Chair, Master of Science in Foreign Service Program, Georgetown University

David Keyes: Executive Director, Advancing Human Rights

Jean AbiNader: Senior Adviser, Moroccan American Center

Krista Hendry: Moderator: Executive Director, the Fund for Peace

2. Overview

As the global human rights discourse evolves to confront today's challenges, there continue to be a number of limitations in the capacity of organizations to effectively promote and protect human rights throughout the world. These limitations include weak global compliance, uneven regional efforts, and the inability of human rights organizations to apply punitive measures or provide technical advice to actually address human rights violations, rather than just highlight them. Too often organizations may find themselves investing significant time reporting on human rights at the expense of concrete programs that can turn rhetoric into real, positive change. In addition, the global human rights discourse continues to be challenged by those that argue that universal reporting fails to take into account local cultures or social values, and treats open countries more harshly than closed nations. As a result, while the global human rights movement has achieved much success in promoting a human rights culture through international treaties, laws, and institutions, progress in the implementation of human rights norms across the world has been much more limited. This event explored the current challenges of human rights reporting with the aim of developing practical recommendations on how to translate an increased awareness of norms into effective implementation.

3. Summary

Krista Hendry opened the event by explaining that although the Fund for Peace primarily focuses on underlying conditions of conflict, human rights are both a condition of conflict and a symptom of conflict, so the topic is an essential part of its work. Presenting the topic of the panel discussion, she asked two questions: are human rights organizations doing reporting accurately enough? Are they doing enough to implement human rights and put reporters and monitors out of jobs?

Mark Lagon discussed the conclusions of a recent CFR report on human rights reporting and implementation. The report assessed how global institutions are doing overall in promoting and protecting human rights. It found that overall there is heightened attention and discussion of human rights, but uneven regional efforts. Implementation also lags way behind, as the focus remains on treaties and norm creation, which are overemphasized. Lagon noted that monitoring is broad and deep and that there is increasing peer-based security of human rights violations. Capacity building nevertheless remains a real problem and more effort is needed to realize human rights, not just talk about them.

Turning to more specific conclusions, Lagon noted that there has been a recent backlash on freedom of expression throughout the world as well as against other political and civil rights. In addition, there has been a skewed dialogue about some rights at the United Nations and there thus needs to be a rebalancing of rights. On the positive side, the report found that the business community is becoming involved in human rights promotion and protection beyond corporate social responsibility because the community is at last realizing it is in their self-interest.

Lagon made several recommendations. First, more needs to be done to empower regional organizations, NGOs, and civil society to act. Second, inter-governmental organizations need to focus more on technical assistance and implementation. Third, the global architecture at the UN needs to be refined, particularly the Human Rights Council. Fourth, the system needs to be less uptight on economic and social rights. Fifth, democracy and human rights are not separate and one of the most important things the international community can do to promote human rights is to bolster democratic institutions. Finally, there is plenty of human rights reporting and monitoring of varying quality, and more attention needs to be paid to economic and social rights.

David Keyes spoke about the philosophy of his organization, Advancing Human Rights, with a quote from famed Soviet dissident Natan Sharansky, which emphasized the role of democracy in promoting human rights and the distortion created by treating open and closed societies as equal when assessing human rights. Advancing Human Rights thus works for a clear and compelling focus on human rights violations in closed societies.

Keyes provided a number of examples of this contradiction in human rights reporting. For example, the UN Human Rights Council has nations like Saudi Arabia assessing human rights in democracies, something that Keyes and others believe undermines the Council's legitimacy. He also noted that the largest human rights group in the world did as many reports about Israel during the last year as it did about Libya, Syria, and Iran combined, further undermining their human rights reporting. Turning to misconceptions about the disparity between human rights reporting in open versus closed societies, he argued that the US would not lose credibility by reporting on totalitarian societies. Likewise, the argument that human rights organizations need to be even-handed in reporting on democracies and dictatorships is a fallacy. It is easier to focus on open societies because it is difficult to get information from closed societies. Human rights organizations likewise argue in favor of the idea that open societies are "low-hanging fruit" for improvement. For the former argument, Keyes stressed that this is less true given new online tools available. For the latter, he argued that this argument is simply not sufficient. Human rights organizations must therefore shift their focus to closed countries, arguing that they no longer have an excuse to say they weren't aware of the violations. Keyes called for a return to the basis of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and a renewed focus on the individual.

Jean AbiNader provided insights from an ongoing study about human rights reporting across North Africa. The study examined ways to advance human rights reporting by looking at North Africa as a case for what works and what can be done better. The study is also examining if a regional analysis of human rights would be helpful. AbiNader underscored that a case study on North Africa was particularly timely given the events of the Arab Spring. Many experts have expressed qualms about human rights under Islamist-led governments. AbiNader questioned how these new governments were going to approach human rights and how they would define it. Based on a central tenet of his report about life (individual rights), liberty (collective rights), and the pursuit of happiness (economic and social rights), AbiNader noted that it seems that at present the focus of many uprisings is on economic rights as countries work to confront basic problems of health, education, and jobs. This seems to likewise be the focus of the US response to the Arab Spring, which has been based on economic aid rather than demands for political reconciliation or justice.

These competing challenges are a real concern in the aftermath of the Arab Spring and underscored two primary concerns about human rights reporting that emerge from the study. First, AbiNader stressed that human rights reporting is done from a Western perspective, assuming the universality of human rights. AbiNader argued that organizations should look at human rights in context, if only to help countries better promote human rights within the unique set of circumstances defined by their countries laws, institutions, customs, and societies. Second, the study revealed that although democracies are a guarantor for human rights, it isn't clear whether or not democracy is the only political system that can effectively protect human rights. In conclusion, AbiNader recommended that human rights organizations take context into account when assessing human rights in order to better inform responses according to local, often competing priorities. He also emphasized more capacity building in order to move from rhetoric to implementation.

4. Q & A

Q: (Hendry) There seems to be a debate between the panelists about whether or not human rights and democracy go hand in hand. What are the ways in which you can best protect human rights?

A: (Lagon) They are not one and the same – it's like a chicken and egg type situation. But democracies mean more than elections – they mean the creation of real institutions that protect the rights of citizens and a flexibility in governing so that governments can incorporate the will of pluralistic groups. It is in that sense that democracies best protect human rights.

(AbiNader) Compare, for example, Tunisia and Morocco. Our study found that Morocco, a monarchy, was a better guarantor of religious dialogue, human rights, and civil unity than say Tunisia where the leader [ben Ali] was "elected."

(Keyes) I am a believer in unalienable rights, but these rights will look different in different places. It won't always look exactly like in America, but that's okay.

Q: (Robert Holley, Moroccan American Center) I have never been fond of democracy promotion efforts because democracy is a process, just as human rights is a process. It takes time to get from A-Z and while you have to judge progress, you should do so in a way that helps the process rather than criticizes it, particularly since there is always misinformation that ends up getting included. Governments are not the only ones adept at disinformation and misinformation; local political actors are also good at that. What do you do to sort out information from disinformation and misinformation?

A: (Keyes) It is the hardest part of my job. Distilling information is difficult, particularly in the internet age where it's almost impossible. I don't have a comprehensive answer to your questions, but we rely on word of mouth to build a network of people will trust and hope that the power of the people will come across (Hendry) Triangulation of data is how we do it. Polls and blogs can lie, but if you compare the information across various sources, it is at least a start. We also work to build local capacity to get information more regularly.

Q: Civil society actors also have their own agenda. I work in the development field and I feel like sometimes there is almost a racism about it – if someone is poor and black, they must be innocent and telling the truth. But there is a difference between facts and opinion so there is a requirement to filter even voices from the field. How do you respond to that?

A: (Lagon) First, it's important to remember that NGOs have their own agenda, everyone has their own agenda. Second, lenses for how you see the world matter. Third, the bigotry you speak of is also the soft bigotry of low expectations. There is of course the question of capacity, but we can't forget the question of will either.

(AbiNader) There needs to be an open discussion about this issue that you are talking about how there is a difference between fact and opinion and how perceptions from the field need to be seen in context.

(Lagon) Yes, we need to start a dialogue about universal human rights and what they mean. And about human dignity.

(Hendry) The dignity and welfare aspect is really important because if we can improve those things then we can better protect human rights. We found through our work that human rights abusers are often people who have been abused themselves.

(Keyes) I have seen that in my work as well. And we don't do civil society building even though that is important. I would also say that we can and must exert more pressure at the governmental level.

(AbiNader) Part of the problem is that the US has competing foreign policy priorities throughout the world. It has multiple concerns of security, stability, and promoting human dignity.

(Keyes) There is a challenge in balancing security concerns with some of the issues we are talking about, but we have swung very very far from the balance on that one. Look at the US relationship with Mubarak for example where the US was willing to ignore abuses because of the security relationships. I would like to see human rights issues brought up more in today's diplomacy.

Q: Is public education part of capacity building? It is not just governments and civil society that need better capacity.

A: (AbiNader) Groups that I have worked with like Civitas and Street Law are doing exactly that – they have great programs, but they lack funding. These issues are also generational, that is why public education is so important.

Q: What is the role and responsibility of the private sector in promoting human rights? For example, you can talk about the quality of Transparency International's rankings, but it has gone far in forcing companies to talk about and tackle corruption if only because it limits their profits. This idea of risk analysis is thus helpful.

A: (Lagon) Corporations are taking on a more substantial role, but companies are also so focused on their "green" rankings right now that it is not the priority at the moment. If you can focus on rule of law, you can mobilize the market. That will be a driver for businesses to promote and protect human rights.

(AbiNader) It is a great driver, but there are issues with the findings because they only are able to document cases of corruption from those who come forward.

(Hendry) We need all sectors to become involved because the challenge is so great. The Fund for Peace works with the oil and mining sectors in rural areas – they have a great economic impact and the ability to promote human rights, but they have to believe it is in their interest.

Q: (Jordan Paul, Moroccan American Center) The “see” and “feel” test is often helpful in assessing freedom in a country – when you get off the plane in Tripoli it feels different than in Rabat, and that’s not really reflected in the reports, which focus on violations across the board without this “sense” of a place. How do we ensure that this is accurately reflected in human rights reports?

A: (Keyes) Organizations need to speak more about this and make it clear that there is a difference between a democracy and a dictatorship. We can start by challenging human rights groups. Right now, some operate by finding human rights abuses and then following them - it’s crazy. Fundamental values are universal, but there is a huge difference between open and closed societies. We could start by gearing the work of human rights organizations toward closed societies clearly and unapologetically. Governments in between democracies and dictatorships also need to be addressed on their own merits.

(Lagon) There is a distinction between different types of governments, but we need to raise these issues with everyone because there does need to be balance.

(Keyes) We do care about human rights abuses in open societies, but we also need to care about them in closed societies. We have a role to play in pressuring governments to do more. The only long-term guarantor of peace and stability is human rights protection, of course with balancing realpolitik concerns.

(AbiNader) We need to learn how to ask questions that take into consideration local context and perceptions and then figure out how that process can fit into and impact implementation.

5. Observation

Approximately 20 experts and development workers attended the panel discussion on opportunities for improving human rights reporting. The panelists each had a unique perspective and expertise on the issue of global human rights, which made for an interesting and insightful discussion. There was general consensus that much can be done to improve human rights reporting and implement widely-acknowledged human rights norms. Although there was some debate about the importance of democratic governance for human rights protections, the panelists agreed that human rights reporting should focus more on closed societies, can do more to appreciate the local context of universal human rights, and should work to improve capacity building to help countries improve their human rights records.

\(Back to top\)

Is the Arab Spring Marginalizing Women?

Date: 14 May 2012

1. Title: Is the Arab Spring Marginalizing Women?

Hosted by the Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars

Participants:

Jane Harman: Director, President, and CEO, Woodrow Wilson Center

Rend Al-Rahim: Co-founder, Executive Director, Iraq Foundation

Rola Dashti: Chairwoman, Kuwait Economic Society

Rangita de Silva de Alwis: Director, Women in Public Service Project 2012, Wellesley College

Haleh Esfandiari: Director, Middle East Program, Woodrow Wilson Center

Moushira Khattab: Public Policy Scholar, Woodrow Wilson Center

Lilia Labidi: Visiting Research Professor, Middle East Institute, National University of Singapore

Caryle Murphy: Public Policy Scholar, Woodrow Wilson Center

Fatima Sbaity Kassem: Former Director, UN Center for Women, Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (UN-ESCWA) in Baghdad, Amman, and Beirut

Robin Wright: Journalist, Foreign Correspondent at notable publications

2. Overview

There is a concern that a year after the Arab uprisings, women across the region are at risk of becoming marginalized politically and economically. There is a growing rift between secular and Islamist women amidst worries of Salafists undermining women's rights. Yet, it is clear that no society can do without the active participation of its women. In a conference addressing the role of women in the aftermath of the Arab uprisings, women leaders from the Middle East and the United States discussed the implications for women's rights under the emerging Islamist regimes.

3. Summary

Panel 1:

Following a brief introduction by moderator Haleh Esfandiari, Fatima Sbaity-Kassem began the discussion by stating that the Arab uprisings raised aspirations for equality and expectations of imminent social change. In Tunisia, Libya, Egypt, and Yemen, popular movements successfully toppled repressive regimes. However, in Syria and Bahrain, and to a lesser extent in Morocco, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Oman, popular demands are being crushed or co-opted by ruling autocrats and monarchs. Everywhere these social movements are a clear indication that the "wall of fear" of lifelong rulers and despots has been irreversibly razed. The uprisings were not religious or feminist movements, but women played a visible and vocal role in the protests. Yet, the emergence of Islamist actors after the uprisings has relegated women in many countries to the periphery of the political process. They are losing ground on women's rights and political participation. Political parties' concern with retaining new found power overshadows the advancement of women's rights, and many of the Islamists downplay their religiosity to retain popular support. Nevertheless, reforms increasing female political participation, the withdrawal of reservations on CEDAW (Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination Against Women), and a more connected network of vocal women provide hope in advancing women's issues.

Lilia Labidi focused her presentation on problems on the ground in Tunisia and possible solutions to resolve them. She described a "second Tunisia" consisting of rural areas where women face high poverty and illiteracy rates and lack the legal and economic rights. The illiteracy rate of women over 15 living in rural Tunisia is 40%; they are effectively second-class citizens. For decades, the state has taken care of urban women and it has not been present in rural areas, leaving the work to NGOs. If even the government—specifically the Ministry of Women's Affairs—lacks the means to service these areas, NGOs will not be able to compensate and play the role of the state in working for these women. Labidi stated that the government must work to increase its presence in all parts of the country to provide public services and remedy this pressing issue.

Moushira Khattab's titled her presentation "Lost in Translation: The Case of Egyptian Women." She compared the condition of women's legal rights and their participation in the economic and political spheres before and after the revolution. Egyptian women played an instrumental role in the revolution, representing nearly 50% of the protesters on Tahrir Square. After Mubarak's fall, they emerged hopeful and confident. A short 15 months later, however, they were excluded from the constitutional assembly and made up fewer parliamentary seats than before the uprising. Women's issues have been washed away amidst a surging sea of Islamist politics, Khattab lamented. This increased religiosity has led to an open criticism at the highest levels of government of laws guaranteeing women's most basic rights. Presidential hopeful Mohamed Morsi publicly stated that laws barring female genital mutilation overstep their bounds and this issue should be a parent's choice. A two-pronged approach—working on both the grassroots level and the policy level—is necessary to improve the state of women's rights in Egypt. Women's status should not be linked to regime; states that adopted CEDAW are bound by law to protect their rights, and this fact needs to become embedded in their societies.

Panel 2:

To start the second panel, Rend Al-Rahim illustrated the situation in Iraq. Iraq experienced its own awakening in 2003. Until 2005, the situation of women in Iraq was rapidly improving. The country instituted a progressive family law code, as well as a 25% parliamentary quota for women. Parliamentary gender quotas are somewhat controversial, but Al-Rahim insisted that they are beneficial. "They show women in action, bring their faces to the public domain, and familiarize society to women in positions of power." The December 2005 elections, however, brought Islamist parties to power and led to a resurgence of tribal culture. They conflated Islam, conservatism, and tradition. Polygamy, which is legal but constrained in Iraq, became more prevalent. Illegal practices such as unregistered, temporary, and child marriages increased, along with honor killings and the practice of giving girls to settle tribal disputes. Today laws are weakly enforced and even women who know they can seek legal redress fear to do so because they fear backlash. However, alliances between religious and secular women on specific issues and the activism of women's NGOs are acting to promote women's rights.

Rola Dashti expressed concern that women are going from being marginalized to being excluded, relegated to the home and traditional jobs. The women who played a role in the protests are no longer visible in the public sphere, leaving women to try and regain the progress they made previously before they can move forward. Extremist agendas always focus on social issues, Dashti explained. The so-called "moderate" Islamists will always become more radical and more repressive. Women and the youth were the drivers behind the revolution, asking for justice, freedom, and human dignity. According to Dashti, political Islamists are the beneficiaries of revolutions they did not start, using women's issues to polarize society and avoid addressing economic issues. She questioned the assumption that Islamists would become more moderate and accommodate women's rights for fear of being voted out of power, explaining that laws may be altered so that fair elections may not take place in the future.

Caryle Murphy explained that Saudi women, who have lived under Islamist rule for centuries, were encouraged by other women in the region to launch protest movements. Due to a low tolerance for female activism, Murphy continued, Saudi women prefer to work behind the scenes, avoiding street protest, confrontation, and outside aid. The Arab

Awakening made the Saudi government realize that they have to act. Murphy noted that progress has been made possible by the king, who issued a soft response to the driving campaign, decreed that women can vote and compete in the 2015 elections, and backed reforms to promote women's employment and reduce domestic violence.

Rangita De Silva de Alwis discussed women's roles in post-conflict situations. She explained that post-conflict situations are opportunities for constitutions to be rewritten, problems to be addressed, and legal transformations to occur. De Silva de Alwis said legal reform must embody international law and inclusive security that ensures safety for women. Both Morocco and Tunisia have raised reservations to CEDAW, she noted. Women's rights activists bear the burden of holding their governments accountable to CEDAW. In post-conflict situations, strong and powerful women's movements are needed to mobilize women against rights violations. She stressed that women cannot wait to demand their rights after a revolution; instead, they need to anticipate problems and be proactive to ensure they are not excluded. She cited Iran as a cautionary tale, where women waited until it was too late to demand their rights.

4. Q & A

Q: (Paulette Lee, communications consultant) Could Islam and its various interpretations be employed to improve the situation of women in the region?

A: (Labidi) Ben Ali was always a steadfast promoter of women's rights. Immediately after the revolution, women who had never before worn the hijab began to cover their heads. Women, especially those living in rural areas, voted overwhelmingly in favor of the Islamists.

(Esfandiari) The changes that took place under the old regimes in Egypt and Tunisia really only affected upper-class women. The situation in Iran was very different, because women's rights had permeated throughout society. Immediately after the revolution, Khomeini repealed the family law code in the name of religion. In response, women staged protests and wrote letters. Interestingly, most of the protestors were not secular, well-educated, cosmopolitan women, but the more conservative, less-educated, women living in rural areas. They didn't want to lose their rights to divorce or child custody.

Q: (Barbara Slavin, Atlantic Council) To what extent are women's rights promoters tainted as pro-western or aligned with the old regimes?

A: (Kassem) I'd like to briefly go back to the question concerning interpretations of Islam. We tend to assume that all Muslims are extremists or Salafists. Islamist parties vary, and some are genuinely moderate. Interestingly, studies show that women, especially poor or uneducated women, are more religious than men. They are especially vulnerable to misinterpretations of Islam, as Sharia is often conflated with traditions. When religious clerics become leaders of Islamist parties, women find themselves in a double jeopardy. In response to Barbara's question, yes, people tend to turn toward the Islamists because they are anti-western. People want their laws to grow from their own roots, not from the West. An imported democracy will never succeed in the Middle East.

(Khattab) There are many interpretations of Islam and they are used to pursue varying agendas. A hard-lined interpretation is effective for killing an issue, and an "enlightened" interpretation can be used to promote something.

Q: For the entire region, what would be the most effective target area, social reform, or program for integrating more women into business and politics, for example, to improve women's rights?

A: (Khattab) Social, economic, and political reforms are all critical and equally important. One cannot happen without the others. If I were to pick one area, however, I would say we should focus on education. It is the basic requisite for any effective citizen. Going back to the perception of women's rights activists as pro-western, it is true. CEDAW is a dirty word in Egypt; people say that it encourages extramarital affairs, or children born to single mothers.

Q: (Wright) More women than ever in the region are wearing the hijab. It seems to me that it is more about identity than piety. To what can we attribute this increase?

A: (Rahim) I was struck to see how many women in Iraq are wearing it these days. In that country, I would contribute it to a lot of issues including an increased religiosity in society as a whole. It is also in part a response to years of oppression, sanctions, wars, and violence. Religion is a host that can bring comfort in a very difficult time. The public domain was dangerous, and women turned to the private domain, which included prayer, religion, solidarity, and safety. More recently, with the retreat of al-Qaeda, fewer women are covering their heads.

(Dashti) The hijab is also a source of freedom for many women, strange as that may sound. Families are more lenient with daughters who go out covered, which encourages young women to wear a hijab in order to leave their homes. Additionally, the hijab has become a kind of a fashion trend. Girls wear colorful veils, with a lot of makeup and tight jeans. I don't think it has very much to do with religion.

Q: (Freelance journalist from Saudi Arabia) Many women seem to actually go against their own interests and assert that pushing for women's rights is in some way antithetical to Islam?

A: (Rahim) Pushing for women's rights is in no way against Islam. The problem is in Islam's various interpretations. There is a serious issue of chauvinism among those who interpret the Qur'an; they are all men and they conflate the religion with tradition, perpetuating a system that represses women. Women in the Iraqi Parliament have said that women's rights are against Islam, but in reality, they are part of Islamist parties and they cannot go against party lines.

Q: (Didi Cutler) During the Iraq war, a group of women drivers in Saudi were punished very severely. They were arrested, lost their jobs, had their passports confiscated. Can the more gentle punishment enforced by the Saudi government this time be attributed to an evolution, or to King Abdullah?

A: (Murphy) After the first incident, the Mufti issued a Fatwa claiming that women driving is against Islam. Today, no one believes this. They oppose women driving on a cultural and traditional basis.

Q: (Josh Polcheck, State Department) It is important to note that no political force—nationalist, secularist, or Islamist—in the region is empowering women. Not a single party in Morocco or Tunisia nominated a woman to a ministerial position. Why has modernity as an ideology which calls for political citizenship lost its hold in the Arab world?

A: (Wright): It all depends on your definition of modernity; we should not conflate it with Westernization. I would argue a majority of women in the region want to be part of the 21st century.

(Dashti) Modernists, or liberals, have traditionally been more concerned with spreading ideology than seeking power. The Islamists, conversely, are very focused on maintaining power. Liberals need to rethink their strategy, and focus on political power.

(Rend) I have to disagree. The modernizers were in power. Mubarak, Ben Ali, and Assad were secular modernizers. Today, there is a stigma associated with modernizers because they are associated with these regimes. The word "modernizer" invokes corruption, authoritarianism, and rentier economics.

Q: (Margaret Rodgers) We've come to the conclusion that the Arab Awakening is excluding women, but I want to know why.

A: (Dashti) We've never come to a conclusion about where women belong in our societies. Educational curriculum is segregated and teaches that women are meant to be mothers, wives, teachers, or caregivers. Women in the Middle East are not citizens. In Kuwait, a 50-year-old woman needs permission from a male guardian to get married. Political Islamists cannot deliver on economic and development issues, so they engage society in social issues, which polarizes people and distracts them from real problems.

5. Observation

This event was attended by approximately 35 professionals, students, NGO employees, journalists, women's rights activists, and members of the policy community. All of the panelists were very critical of emerging Islamist parties, insisting that they shift focus from pressing economic problems to social issues in order to polarize their societies and retain political power. Morocco was not a focal point of the discussion, but the panelists did refer to the country a few times. Fatima Sbaity-Kassem said that "popular demands are being crushed or co-opted by ruling autocrats and monarchs" in Morocco, Jordan, Syria, and Bahrain. Rangita De Silva de Alwis noted that both Morocco and Tunisia are pushing back against CEDAW, and women's rights groups in both countries must hold their governments accountable. A member of the audience from the State Department, Josh Polcheck, noted—inaccurately—that not a single party in Morocco or Tunisia nominated a woman to a ministerial position.

\(Back to top\)

Delivering Dignity in the Arab World through Political and Economic Reform

Date: 15 May 2012

1. Delivering Dignity in the Arab World through Political and Economic Reform

Hosted by the Center for International Private Enterprise

Participants:

Larry Diamond: Director, Center on Democracy, Development, and the Rule of Law, Stanford University

Michele Dunne: Director, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, the Atlantic Council

John D. Sullivan: Executive Director, Center for International Private Enterprise

Steve Clemons: Moderator: Editor at Large, The Atlantic; Publisher, The Washington Note

2. Overview

Last year's uprisings made clear that people were willing to make great sacrifices to build states and societies capable of delivering dignity to their citizens. This event sought to explore the key linkages between political and economic reform in the Arab world and identify the opportunities and challenges to institutionalizing democratic values in economies throughout the region.

3. Summary

Steve Clemons opened by marking his skepticism of the objectives of such organizations as the National Endowment for Democracy (NED). He characterized these organizations as focusing too much on democratic rather than economic reforms. Remarking upon Hernando de Soto's work, which characterizes the Arab Spring as "an entrepreneurial revolution," Clemons argued that the price of wheat was as much a cause for the uprisings in Tunisia and Egypt as any one of the trending indicators that have consumed the academic spotlight, such as the youth bulge or the rise of connecting media. He expressed his hope that the panelists would explore the economics of the Arab Spring in their talking points.

Larry Diamond agreed, saying that the transition of Arab states from authoritarian rule was a series of many transitions at once, both political and economic. Despite undergoing a revolution, the "failed logic" of statism and socialism survives today in Arab countries. Diamond stated that open and competitive politics alone would not satisfy populations, nor would broad commitments to democracy carry them through a time of crisis. Diamond argued that a successful transition from authoritarian rule would require a break from the fundamental core of the Arab social contract, and that populations must dismantle the old systems of trading freedom for economic stability. Underlining that political freedom must be accompanied by economic freedom, Diamond emphasized the necessity of a number of reforms. "Paring down" (if not eliminating) corruption would be paramount, as would be the implementation of "social shock absorbers" – perhaps along the lines of the cash transfer programs that have recently gained traction in Latin America. He also declared that the assault on corruption should take place from two vectors: from the top down, through powerful anti-corruption committees, and from the bottom up, with an engaged populace reporting demands for bribes.

Michelle Dunne, whose focus in the Arab Spring has been upon Tunisia and Egypt, expressed a slightly different interpretation of events. She characterized those regimes as having achieved a measure of economic reform without having yet delivered on the political. Both, she declared, would be necessary if the new governments are to retain legitimacy. With issues like the failure of the private sector to generate income, the youth bulge, and inflation still hampering goals for economic prosperity, populations are less likely to be patient with regimes when confronted with their records of human rights abuse, political stagnation, and police brutality.

In a sense this disenchantment was inevitable, Dunne cautioned. Even prior to the revolution, states like Egypt had been attempting to make the transition to a cash transfer system over the past decade. Shifts at the macroeconomic level can sometimes take decades to take effect and changes in the system often amount to "political dynamite" for the very reason that they are so closely associated with the population's livelihood. Regimes in Egypt and Tunisia, she stated, must be aware that while the "bloom is off the rose" in terms of enthusiasm for the revolution, the population remains committed to change. Those in power must be sure that they do not squander what opportunity they have to retain legitimacy.

In his discussion of political and economic reform, John Sullivan chose to highlight the insuperable layers of bureaucracy that separate the average business from success in the region. For Muhammad Bouazizi (the Tunisian street merchant whose self-immolation set the Arab Spring in motion) the process to legally register his business required that he go through 55 individual steps, a process lasting 150 days and requiring more than twelve times his monthly income, said Sullivan. In addition to creating a dual-layered economy, one that fast-tracked those with the means to bribe their way through the bureaucracy, the Tunisian system stymied growth at the poorest levels. Sullivan maintained that problems like these are still to be found in every sector of Tunisian and Egyptian economies, from small and medium enterprises to state-owned companies. The frustration that many Arab populations experience is due to the fact that reforms have yet to eliminate the crony capitalist system that prompted the revolutions in the first place.

Steve Clemons remarked that the issues of economic reform currently confronting new governments are not new problems – regimes have been attempting to deal with these challenges for decades. The panel uniformly attributed the longevity of the region's economic troubles to the fact that regimes depended on the crony capitalist system for their survival. "When the nature of rule is predatory extraction," said Larry Diamond, "it is very hard to tinker on the margins" for reform. This prompted a discussion on the fact that regimes today face the same issue as their predecessors and that many would prefer to appear to be democratic reformers while still defending the old authoritarian system. Drawing upon Morocco as an example, Diamond stated that King Mohammad VI "was in no way serious about economic reform." This prompted a discussion between the panelists as to whether the China model of delivering economic growth without political reforms was an applicable model for the Arab World. The panel remained skeptical on this point.

4. Q & A

Q: What role can the international community, particularly the United States, play in encouraging economic reforms?

A: (Sullivan) I want to underline the importance of international initiatives such as the "Know Your Banker" program, an anti-bribery convention in the UN that targets corrupt multinationals and greater enforcement of existing policies through the mobilizing of NGOs such as Transparency International.

(Clemons) I feel that it must be born in mind that the relative size of the US economy – and therefore its power – has diminished compared to the older system.

(Dunne) This should not be used as an excuse for inaction. The US is still a key player. The US should examine incentivizing aid that it delivers to states like Jordan and Morocco.

Q: What role is there for women in the new societies of the Middle East – especially in Egypt and Tunisia?

A: (Dunne) There are both positive and negative trends to be found in these societies. In some sense, women's causes have been marginalized during the revolution by figures, particularly Islamists and Salafists, dismantling progressive action taken in the past with regards to women's rights. Yet in this new environment of expanded political freedom, women's organizations have begun to form and play a political role.

(Diamond) I want to add that female empowerment over the coming decade may be inevitable, as women often make up 60% of the population of universities.

(Sullivan) The revolutions also prompted the rise of women's associations in the informal sector.

Q: What do we know about the new regimes and their economic policies?

A: (Sullivan) Much still remains uncertain. Many Islamist candidates come from a business background and may be well-suited to recognize economic reform problems.

(Dunne) Thus far Tunisian economic policies have been moderately effective.

5. Observation

Approximately 40 scholars and think tank representatives attended this event. The general theme of the event was that more attention should be given to economic reforms in post-revolutionary states, both by the academics studying them and by the states themselves. While the focus of both the panel and the audience remained for the most part on Egypt and Tunisia, to the extent Morocco was mentioned the coverage was negative. A consensus seems to have arisen among the panelists that the Moroccan monarchy desires to perform limited economic and political reforms at the margins while leaving the old system effectively intact.

\(Back to top\)

Welcome Luncheon for Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal

Date: 24 May 2012

1. Title: Welcome Luncheon for Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal

Hosted by the National US-Arab Chamber of Commerce

Speaker:

H.E. Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal: Ambassador to the United States, Kingdom of Morocco

2. Overview

The National US-Arab Chamber of Commerce hosted a luncheon to welcome Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal. The Ambassador briefly discussed Morocco's current state of affairs, economic challenges, and political reforms. He then responded to questions from the audience members.

3. Summary

Ambassador Bouhlal began his address by thanking the audience for their engagement and investments in Morocco. He explained that Morocco is in a period of progressive political reform and substantial changes are being carried out across the board. The Kingdom ratified a new constitution in July 2011, which brought about political reforms including a balance of powers between the King and the Parliament. Responsibility and accountability in government, protection of individual liberties, and promotion of human rights are all values enshrined in the new constitution. Following its victory in November's Parliamentary elections, the moderate Islamist Party for Justice and Development has built a coalition government; the parties in power are working together to stimulate growth and enact important social reforms. Recent events in during the Arab Spring and the Euro Crisis, however present this new government with difficult challenges. Instability in the region led to a drop in revenue from the tourism industry. Economic problems in Europe, Morocco's largest trade partner, have spilled into the kingdom. A severe drought has diminished this year's wheat yield. Ambassador Bouhlal concluded by noting that, despite these difficulties, there are very promising business developments taking place in the automotive, renewable energy, aeronautic, and agricultural industries.

4. Q & A

Q: (Audience Member from Northrop Grumman) What can Morocco, in conjunction with the United States and other Sahel countries, do to improve security in the Sahel region?

A: (Bouhlal) After the fall of Gaddafi, a proliferation of weapons flowed into the Sahel region. This adds another troubling element in a region where governance is already difficult. We are working closely with the US as well as other countries in the region to promote stability there.

Q: (Audience Member from USDA) Other than wheat and grains, which other food products present promising trade prospects?

A: (Bouhlal) Morocco is becoming a big producer of olive oil. The US imports a lot of olive oil, and growers in California only produce enough to satisfy a small percentage of the market. In the other direction, Morocco imports a lot of food products from the US. We also export large amounts of fish to Europe.

Q: (Audience Member from AIAC Investment) What countries represent most of the tourists who visit Morocco?

A: (Bouhlal) In 1943 when General Patton came to Morocco, he said that the country is a combination of the bible and Hollywood. Because of its proximity, most of Morocco's tourists come from Europe—France, Spain, Italy, etc. Recently, however, there has been a surge in American visitors. They love to invest in hotels in Marrakesh and elsewhere. Additionally, more people from Russia and India have been visiting.

Q: (Audience Member from Emerald Planet TV) I know that Morocco hopes to get 38% of its energy from renewable sources by 2020; could you expand on investment in renewable energy technology there?

A: (Bouhlal) We don't have oil reserves, so we have always looked toward renewable energy for the future. As technology progresses, this has become an attainable goal. We are investing in wind and solar energy. We have also changed regulations and are encouraging renewable energy companies to sell their excess production back to the grid. Additionally, we are connected to Europe and Algeria, so we can actually export energy internationally. We don't want investors to simply build plants, we want to continue to develop the technology and improve the program.

Q: (Audience Member from a construction company) Could you touch on the construction industry in Morocco? Are there opportunities for activities in the residential or hotel and hospitality sector?

A: (Bouhlal) The construction business is doing very well in Morocco. We are trying to eradicate the slums and are constructing approximately 120 – 150 thousand new homes per year. Companies from all over the world are involved in these initiatives. Cities and infrastructure in Morocco are undergoing a rapid modernization. The new Mediterranean port, a huge investment, is already handling 3 million containers.

Q: What is happening with the youth? Is the economy growing rapidly enough to provide jobs?

A: (Bouhlal) We are doing our best. Growth averaged 5% in the past, and we need 7% to provide the necessary employment. If we are able to build on what we already have and improve our strongest sectors, I have no doubt we will be able to create jobs.

5. Observation

Approximately 60 professionals from businesses engaged or invested in Morocco attended the event. They represented various industries, including aeronautics, automobiles, renewable energy, construction, and agriculture, among others. The event was a luncheon, and, before the Ambassador's address, guests had an opportunity to meet other professionals involved in business with Morocco. The National US-Arab Chamber of Commerce circulated fact sheets detailing trade between US States and Morocco and the Free Trade Agreement.

\(Back to top\)

The Crisis in Northern Mali: Implications for a Region in Flux

Date: 31 May 2012

1. Title: The Crisis in Northern Mali: Implications for a Region in Flux

Hosted by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and the Atlantic Council

Participants:

Rudolph Atallah: Senior Fellow, The Atlantic Council

Anouar Boukhars: Co-Project Leader, Mauritania Working Group, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace; Assistant Professor of International Relations, McDaniel College

H.E. Maman Sidikou: Ambassador of Niger to the United States

J. Peter Pham: Moderator: Director, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, The Atlantic Council

2. Overview

Much international attention has focused on Mali's capital Bamako in the wake of the March 22nd coup overthrowing Mali's elected government, but developments in the northern part of the country may have greater regional implications. Separatist Tuareg rebels, bolstered by militants and weapons flowing from Libya, have succeeded in driving out government forces. As a result, a number of Islamist groups are expanding their presence in the region. The Carnegie Endowment hosted a panel of experts to provide an update on the situation and discuss the broader regional implications for the Sahel, North Africa, and West Africa.

3. Summary

Dr. J. Peter Pham opened with a synopsis of recent events in Mali. He discussed the March 22 "accidental coup" and the international community's role in resolving the political crisis and rebuilding the government. He explained briefly that the north of Mali has been experiencing prolonged conflict as a result of separatist aims to take control. "Northern Mali is turning into a Star Wars bar of extremists from across the region. The last thing Africa needs right now is another failed state." He added that "pragmatism" unifies the ideologically diverse groups in power—Tuareg-led separatists, Ansar Dine Islamists, AQIM, and MUJAO.

Following Pham's introduction, Rudolph Atallah gave a historical overview of revolts in Mali. During the 1950's "wave of change" in Africa, the Tuaregs began to look toward independence. Mali's independence in 1960 resulted in the first Tuareg rebellion in 1962. They feared that control from Bamako would lead to modernization and henceforth "exterminate" their culture. Mali's military responded with force, effectively "alienating all Tuaregs." Drought pushed the Tuaregs to move into neighboring countries Algeria and Libya. These events laid the foundation for the current turmoil, Atallah argued. In the summer of 1990, Aghali Lambo and his Popular Movement for the Liberation of Aghad (MPLA) led another Tuareg uprising. Algeria successfully mediated peace accords between Mali and the insurgents, but another uprising led to a coup in 1992, ousting the president. That year, ethnic groups signed a national pact which integrated Tuareg youth into the military. A period of relative stability followed the pact, until 2006 when another uprising broke out. Atallah explained that this series of insurgencies laid the foundation for the most recent crisis.

Anouar Boukhars pointed out that Mali's military does not represent the Malian people, and the country has never been so divided. He noted that the current crisis was triggered by the Libyan revolution, but its roots lie in longstanding domestic tensions. Gradual political decay and breakdown of state institutions, a lack of a credible settlement to historic Tuareg grievances, increased terrorist activity, the fall of Gaddafi, and a political vacuum are all factors that contributed to the success of the insurgents' coup. The Malian government's legitimacy was minimized by democratic stagnation, an overreliance on the patronage of its neighbors, including Libya, an illicit drug trade, and an undersized military. The coup was effectively a collective rejection of political elites; rebel leaders are gaining popular support by denouncing corruption in the Malian government. Boukhars concluded by enumerating some challenges Mali will face in the future: (1) supporting a civil government and keeping the army intact; (2) the heterogeneous nature of the insurgency; and (3) the threat of coexistence of Islamist movements (groups are trying to outsource a 'more authentic' form of Islam).

Maman Sidikou, Nigerien Ambassador to the US, presented a regional perspective and shed light on ways in which the crisis affects neighboring countries. He cited the influx of Libyan arms, kidnappings, and control by AQIM of drug-smuggling routes. The situation is of global concern and correspondingly requires a global response; it could potentially destabilize the entire region, he argued. "Terrorists are consolidating their position by the day in northern Mali and the international community just talks." The African Union and ECOWAS need to intervene. The US could provide training, intelligence, and logistical support. Algeria should also assist. He explained that al-Qaeda is the "driving force" behind the crisis, and that Mali could "turn into another Afghanistan." The Ambassador asked why the US and its allies were willing to intervene in Libya, but have failed to do so in Mali. He warned that if the international community does not act soon its credibility could be jeopardized.

4. Q & A

Q: We need to look back. Only a few people saw this coming. Before we go forward, why and how did we miss seeing this crisis in advance?

A: (Boukhars) There were definitely red flags; it was only a matter of time before something would break out.

(Atallah) The investments in the northern area of Mali were going to military infrastructure therefore upsetting Tuaregs who believed that they needed to strike before anything happened to them.

(Sidikou) Rebellions happen in many countries, including Niger, but the difference with Mali is that the international community tends to close its eyes to this one in particular. We need to ask about the responsibilities of regional powers. It's not that we didn't see the coming crisis, but the pace went very fast.

Q: (Malian Ambassador to the US) I would like to make a few clarifications. The constitution and institutional structure of Mali allow the military to occupy 2/3 of the country and army and terrorist groups operate their own prisons across the state. Secondly, there are fewer Tuaregs in the country than you think; they originate from Amazil and Berber people and are therefore from Morocco/Libya etc. Lastly, I must contend with your description of popular ambition against the elites in Mali. The military was not all against the elites because the highest ranks of soldiers did not join this movement.

A: (Boukhars) People are trying to capitalize on momentum of anger at the political elite. The highest soldiers did not join the movement because they were exactly the targets. Legitimacy in this case stems from never having been associated with power.

(Pham) We need to be pragmatic and not get lost in ideologies. Some groups needed a boost and made alignments as a result rather than because of beliefs.

Q: Will the groups start fighting each other? Where does Colonel Gamou stand?

A: (Atallah) The colonel is resting for now. Until things are pulled together in the south, it will be quiet. The MNLA is concentrating on their image in the media for right now. Trying to resolve differences will be hard.

(Sidikou) Gamou sees al-Qaeda's presence in Northern Mali as a result of all this. Al-Qaeda has resources and ideology that are helping to determine the outcome.

(Boukhars) The multiplicity of jihad groups present in Mali doesn't mean that the extremist groups erode differences in Mali. People support them not because of ideology but because of material and security delivery.

Q: (Bob Holley) Given the depth, intensity, and longevity of problems, do you think that there is a prospect that autonomy might heal the rift and provide structure? In addition, what would neighboring countries think of this solution?

A: (Atallah) I hope they would go back to the pact of 1992, in all honesty the south has to get its act together before anything can happen.

(Boukhars) The political order needs to be restored before anything else. But autonomy is the only game in town. This could set a bad precedent.

(Sidikou) In Niger, most heads of regions are Tuaregs. No one wants the same thing. An institutional framework is needed to restore normalcy, the problem is the actors who shouldn't be there.

(Pham) It would need to be decision of Malians. The last thing Africa needs is another failed state.

(The Malian Ambassador) The leaders are already Tuaregs and no coup can be justified.

Q: Can the panel speak of military integration? Tuaregs joining into the larger military? What do Tuaregs as a whole think and what does the rest of the military think? What lessons did we learn for the future?

A: (Sidikou) We integrated Tuaregs into the army in Niger and all I can really tell you is that results tend to be context-specific.

(Atallah) The area of Mali is so big and so vast that it is impossible to control. Large army numbers are imperative, making integration a necessity.

Q: (Marina Ottaway) I hear two points of view in this discussion. The first is that negotiation needs to happen or improvement is impossible. The other is that the first step is a military solution. Who will have to intervene?

A: (Sidikou) Negotiation would have to be done fast. I don't understand why countries aren't taking action in Mali when they know it's worse than Afghanistan in terms of harboring terrorists.

(Atallah) Algeria's amnesty program had some success in getting bad guys to work for the government. The USA has worked with all these governments, but the problem is that if American troops intervened, they would be considered foreign fighters. The USA can't just go into Mali. By doing so, it would give terrorists a raison d'être. I think we need to leverage guys to turn on the bad groups.

(Boukhars) No military intervention would be useful until the mess in the South is solved. Distrust of the French is still there, so they can't do anything. Niger and Mauritania wouldn't be able to give many soldiers because their armies are so small, but Algeria could probably help out.

5. Observation

The proceedings were attended 50-60 people from think tanks, press agencies, and federal offices. The experts provided valuable insight into the crisis in Mali, but failed to give much prediction about the future or possible solutions. Comments tended to focus on the Tuaregs and their impact on the Northern part of the country. Although Morocco and the Western Sahara were not mentioned, the event underscored that experts are increasingly paying attention to security issues in the Sahel.

\(Back to top\)

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, July 14, 2012 9:20 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS situation report

The following information is from a generally reliable source but has not been corroborated by third party sources. I find the information herein important. Ed

WESTERN SAHARA / SITUATION REPORT

13/07/12

On July 2, SADR President and Polisario General Secretary Mohamed Abdelaziz, in his capacity as commander in chief of the SADR armed forces, presided over a graduation ceremony for special forces trainees at the Smara camp near Tindouf. After the usual military parade and martial arts display, SADR Defence Minister Mohamed Lamine Bouhali delivered a speech in which he proclaimed that a return to armed struggle had become “unavoidable”. The special forces graduation ceremony, he said, was a reflection of “the spirit of the youth, who are convinced that what has been taken by force [i.e. the independence of Western Sahara] can only be restored by force.” Bouhali's remarks were reproduced in a dispatch by Polisario's SPS news agency^[1], and subsequently picked up on by Algeria's APS. Although not entirely without precedent, the SADR Defence Minister's statement about the inevitability of war is unusually categorical and comes after an extended period in which Polisario leaders had by and large dropped any references to armed struggle^[2].

Discussing Bouhali's speech with us, a leading member of one of Polisario's civil society organisations initially dismissed the surprisingly bellicose tone as a mere rhetorical flourish, dictated by the context in which it was made (i.e. a passing-out ceremony for supposedly elite troops). When pressed, the source conceded that there was perhaps something more to it than that: with nothing to show for all their efforts to push the Western Sahara question forward via United Nations channels, the Polisario leadership finds itself under pressure from the increasingly frustrated youth in the camps, who have raised the slogan of a resumption of armed struggle; in response, members of the leadership from time to time take up the same slogan by way of demonstrating their undiminished and uncompromising radicalism.

The source goes on to argue that “nobody in the Tindouf camps” really believes in a return to armed struggle, for the simple reason that “the Sahrawi refugees, and especially the youth, are not motivated by this option”. And if some young dissidents – by which the source seems to mean the Youth of the Sahrawi Revolution group which emerged in the camps last year in the early days of the Arab Spring– go on about the need to go back to war, it is only in order to embarrass the present leadership. This rather dismissive attitude towards the young dissidents is perhaps above all indicative of the source's own pro-leadership inclinations, and it would no doubt be a mistake to write off the challenge of the Youth of the Sahrawi Revolution and other such groupings altogether. Despite the leadership's attempts to quash the movement^[3], there were renewed clashes between young protesters and Polisario security in the camps on July 8, according to as yet unconfirmed reports from pro-Moroccan news sources .

^[4]

Nonetheless, the source's basic evaluation of Bouhali's comments – that they were intended to ward off pressure from below and do not reflect a sincere conversion to a pro-war line – appears to be essentially correct. Polisario's leadership is well aware that there can be no return to armed struggle without Algiers' assent. During Polisario's 13th congress in December of last year, a source quoted General Secretary Mohamed Abdelaziz as admitting, in private, that a return to war could not be envisaged because “as soon as the first shot is fired” against the Moroccans, all of Polisario's friends – including Algeria – would withdraw their support for the Saharawi cause. There is no indication that Algeria has become any more inclined to support military action since then. Indeed, Sahrawi sources told us in June that Algiers is now starving Polisario of arms: it stopped supplying heavy weaponry some time ago, and now only provides side arms, essentially for policing purposes.

Worse still, the confused and highly dangerous situation which has opened up in northern Mali seems to be causing the Polisario leadership to look over its shoulder at Algiers more anxiously than ever. In the run-up to the 19th African Union assembly being held this month in Addis Ababa, a member of Polisario's National Secretariat confided to us that the Front's leadership fears moves to have the SADR's membership suspended^[5]. The source claimed that certain parties – whom he did not name^[6] – had been lobbying the diplomatic missions of various African countries with documents containing what they claimed was proof of the involvement of Polisario members in armed groups active in northern Mali. According to the National Secretariat member, these lobbyists, while recognising that some countries such as South Africa will remain steadfast in their support for Polisario, believe that Algeria would not oppose the SADR's suspension from the African Union if confronted with proof that members of Polisario and of the SADR's armed forces have been implicated in the takeover of northern Mali by Tuareg separatist and radical Islamist groups.

A North African diplomat at AU headquarters in Addis Ababa asserts that in the northern Mali conflict, Polisario had been rooting for a victory by the Tuareg-separatist MNLA^[7] - a losing bet, as it turns out, the MNLA having been swiftly sidelined by the Tuareg Islamist Ansar Dine group and its allies AQMI and MUJAO. The North African diplomat adds that, although there have been no formal discussions on the question of the SADR's membership during the preparatory meetings for the AU assembly, non-official documents written by various “observers and analysts” attacking the SADR's full membership of the African Union as anomalous have indeed been doing the rounds. These anti-SADR screeds highlight allegations of Polisario involvement not only in northern Mali but also in last year's Libyan conflict, when Sahrawi military personnel were said to have fought on the side of the Qaddafi regime. If these allegations were backed up with incontrovertible evidence, the diplomat argues, the SADR would find itself in a “very difficult position” within the African Union.

END

1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

-
- [1] Strikingly, SPS published the dispatch in Arabic only, neglecting to translate it into English, Spanish or French.
 - [2] One Saharawi source alluded to a somewhat similar declaration by an unspecified member of the Polisario leadership in early June, but we have not been able to track this down in the public record.
 - [3] In January of this year, the Youth of the Saharawi Revolution set up a small 'protest camp' near the seat of the General Secretariat of the Polisario Front in the Tindouf camps, which was broken up by Polisario security forces; three of the protesters were arrested and detained by the SADR Gendarmerie.
 - [4] www.sahara-news.org
 - [5] In mid-June, the same source told us that a delegation of African foreign ministers visiting Tindouf had asked Polisario's leaders to keep a lower profile than usual at the African Union gathering in July 9. According to the source, members of the Polisario National Secretariat interpreted this as a first step towards a possible challenge to SADR's full membership of the African Union.
 - [6] Similarly, addressing a meeting of political commissars of the Polisario Front on June 9, General Secretary Mohamed Abdelaziz accused the Moroccan intelligence services of "attempting to compromise the struggle of the Saharawi people by linking it to terrorism and drug trafficking."
 - [7] It may be recalled that a member of the Saharawi National Council, speaking to us shortly after the fall of Timbuktu at the beginning of April, described the victory of the rebellion in northern Mali as a "major event" from the point of view of the Saharawi people. On the one hand, it would be to the SADR's advantage to establish solid relations with a new Tuareg state – it would no longer be a matter for the Saharawis of choosing whether (or how) to deal with armed islamist groups but rather of building relations with legitimate structures representing the Tuareg people. On the other, if the Tuaregs were able to exercise their right to self-determination, then the case in favour of the Saharawis exercising the same right could only be strengthened.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, July 14, 2012 9:34 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: additional point on WS situation report

According to a Saharawi journalist in Tindouf, Polisario's security services have for the past few weeks been imposing a nighttime curfew in the refugee camps (8 p.m. to 6 a.m.), for "security reasons" relating to the "fight against organised crime, theft and armed attacks", which are said to have increased noticeably of late.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, July 24, 2012 5:16 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian press story on Polisario

You may be interested in the following, a translation of Algérie Presse Service's account of an interview with SADR Foreign Minister Mohamed Salem Ould Salek. Most pertinent sections in bold.

Ould Salek on the liberation of hostages and stalled talks with Morocco

(APS) Saturday, July 21, 2012.

rome — Mohamed Salem Ould Salek, Sadr's foreign minister, talked to Italian geopolitics periodical Limes about the liberation of European aid workers kidnapped from the Sahrawi refugee camps in Tindouf and the stalled peace talks after Morocco withdrew confidence in the United Nation's mediator, Christopher Ross.

On the Sahrawis' role in the liberation of the three European hostages — an Italian woman and two Spaniards — Ould Salek said he was “moved and immensely happy” for the release of these three aid workers “who have been part of our family for quiet some time”. He added that “immediately” after the kidnapping, Sadr officials established contacts with their counterparts in Mauritania, Mali, Niger and Burkina Faso, as well as the Italian and Spanish governments.

“Our sole objective was to liberate the hostages,” he said. “We decided to use diplomacy and intelligence work and avoid military action; the Spanish and Italian authorities had asked us to be extremely careful”. He added that there was constant exchange of information on the hostages' health conditions and whereabouts, declaring that Sahrawi leaders knew perfectly well in what region of Mali they were held.

He pointed out that the serious instability that hit Mali and the Sahel region “dramatically complicated” negotiations with the kidnapers. “This whole region is a powder keg; at one moment between May and June we feared the worst” for the hostages.

“Mali is in a state of total anarchy. In this corridor that goes from Chad through Niger, Mali and Mauritania to the Western Sahara the partisans of radical Islam were trying to spread chaos. In that region conflicts, terrorist attacks and kidnappings proliferate, and some end in a bad way,” explained Mr. Salek.

Sahrawi leaders, he continued, have always argued that efforts to resolve the Sahrawi conflict go in the direction of greater stability for the whole region.

“There is no doubt that Moroccan occupation of our territories is a destabilising factor,” he stressed. “You can't take it out of my head that Moroccan intelligence services are behind that strange group that formed specifically to kidnap the aid workers. Moroccan intelligence has been trying to destabilise the region since 2005 to reduce humanitarian aid and thus pressure Polisario into accepting political concessions.”

Asked about the current state of affairs in the Sahara conflict, Ould Salek said Morocco's rejection of Sahrawis' demands and its disrespect of so many un resolutions gives rise to a “growing desire” to return to armed struggle on the part of the Sahrawi people, especially the younger generation. “But I rule out the existence of sleeper jihadist cells in the refugee camps or the occupied territories”.

Describing Morocco's unilateral decision to withdraw confidence in Christopher Ross as “a very grave step”, he recalled that the United States and the un have reiterated their confidence in the man “who was always in the service of a much hoped-for just resolution of this conflict”.

Morocco defied the international community and stopped negotiations, declared the Sahrawi minister. These talks advanced slowly and showed minimal results but, he argued, at least they kept the path of dialogue open and helped contain demands for a return to armed struggle. “I fear it will become increasingly difficult to resist the call to arms”.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, July 25, 2012 3:40 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian situation report

The information contained in this report are from public news and private sources, none of which has been corroborated by third parties. Ed

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

July 25, 2012

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- The newly elected parliament has gone into summer recess without having discussed any laws or constitutional issues or taken a single vote on any matter.
- There is still no new government and President Bouteflika has begun his annual performance-evaluation interviews with the 'interim' ministers.
- With Ahmed Ouyahia reportedly ruled out, the main sticking point in selecting a new government appears to be the choice of prime minister.
- With the political reform process looking increasingly irrelevant, there has been some speculation that President Bouteflika may not bow out in 2014 after all and opt to run for a fourth successive term of office.

Foreign Relations

- Bouteflika and France's newly elected President Hollande have exchanged letters which tentatively look beyond the sterile dispute over official declarations relating to the colonial period which has been a blockage in Franco-Algerian relations.
- French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius visited Algiers in mid-July, and is now talking of a possible official visit by Hollande at the end of this year, during which a new "very high-level partnership" might be signed.
- Paris' most urgent imperative is to bring Algeria on board with international moves to crush the hardline islamist entity in northern Mali, but Algiers is reluctant to either give its assent to an intervention by French troops or commit troops of its own to a potentially destabilising adventure.
- The need to secure Algerian cooperation in northern Mali may be one reason behind perceived shifts in the French government's attitude towards Morocco, notably on the Western Sahara question. Another may be efforts to persuade Algeria to mobilise its considerable hard currency reserves in support of international financial bail-out funds.

Security

- Levels of violence dipped in June but rose again in July, as jihadist groups geared up for Ramadan, seen as a particularly propitious period for jihad.
- AQMI split-off MUJAO has carried out another suicide bombing against a gendarmerie facility in the south of the country.
- In light of the threat of MUJAO launching attacks against oil and gas installations in the south, the authorities have reportedly stepped up security around facilities in and around the Hassi Rmel gas hub, and are evaluating advanced electronic surveillance systems for the southern borders.

Political Trends

On July 2, the parliament that elected in May in what was supposed to be a key step in the process of political and institutional reform, went into summer recess, without having discussed a single law or taken a single vote on any issue. Neither had it had the chance to see in the long-awaited new government – which three weeks later has still not been formed. Indeed, the very idea of naming a new prime minister and cabinet has effectively been pushed back until after the summer break: on July 22 Bouteflika launched the round of performance-evaluation interviews with cabinet members that he holds every year during Ramadan, regardless of the fact that they are technically only caretaker ministers, in a clear sign that he is in no hurry to announce a new line-up.

There have been suggestions in the Algerian press that the delay in forming a new cabinet is chiefly due to the refusal of the various political parties with representation in the new parliament to join a coalition government. But there have been few signs of any real negotiations or even active attempts to persuade parties hitherto in the opposition to come on board, and it ought to have been possible for the Presidency and the DRS to pull together a cabinet from the FLN and the RND, which together have a clear majority, had the will existed. True, both the FLN and, to a somewhat lesser extent, the RND remain riven with internal crises, as are virtually all of Algeria's political parties (the moderate islamist MSP, having withdrawn from the ruling coalition, is facing a minor split led by former Public Works Minister Amar Ghoul, precisely over the question of participation in government). But the biggest sticking point is doubtless the choice of Prime Minister, insofar as this risks being widely interpreted – rightly or wrongly – as an indication of the regime's choice of successor for Bouteflika. Discussing the issue towards the end of June – at which time they claimed a new government would be unveiled “soon” – usually candid sources close to the Presidency were somewhat cagey, although they did seem adamant that Ouyahia would not be reappointed. In this sense, the continued delay in choosing a new Prime Minister underlines the fact that, with Ouyahia out of the running, there is no obvious successor to Bouteflika. Candidates who are now being considered for the position of Prime Minister – the name of Abdelmalek Sellal, currently Minister of Water Resources, has been floated by sources – appear to be compromise figures, probably lacking presidential stature.

Such is the impasse that there is now rising speculation in the Algerian media that President Bouteflika may not bow out at the end of his current term of office, as has been generally assumed for some time, and could instead seek to embark on a fourth term of office. Given Bouteflika's declining vigour this may not be the most likely scenario, and it would certainly be at variants with the perceived message of his May 8 speech in Setif (see previous reports), in which he seemed to indicate that the time had come for his generation to hand over the reins of power to the post-independence generations. But the very fact that such a scenario is now being seriously discussed is testimony to just how sclerotic the Algerian political system is. Promises to reform it now seem increasingly irrelevant: although the initial plan unveiled by Bouteflika in April 2011 (and to which he continues, on occasion, to pay lip-service) was to have the newly elected parliament propose constitutional amendments which might then be submitted to approval by referendum, there was no discussion whatsoever of constitutional matters in the two short months the new parliament sat before breaking up for the summer, the constitutional reform committee that was supposed to generate ideas and proposals has not been established, and it is widely assumed that the whole process has been postponed until a later, and unspecified, date.

In the meantime, Bouteflika has been officiating over the celebrations to mark the first 50 years of Algeria's independence, and over the military promotions ceremony which coincides every year with independence day. For such a momentous date, Algeria's 50th anniversary celebrations were on the whole surprisingly low-key. Neither were the military promotions particularly spectacular, but they did in their quiet way mark another step in the generational shift within the armed forces and the all-important DRS – as exemplified by the elevation of Gen. Bachir Tartag, who took over as head of the DRS's crucial Directorate of Internal Security at the end of last year, to the rank of major-general.

Foreign Relations

Freshly installed in the Elysée Palace, France's new Socialist President François Hollande, on whom great hopes have been pinned in terms of breaking the deadlock in relations with Algeria, marked the historically charged 50th anniversary of Algeria's independence with a short but polite letter to President Bouteflika. While it was by no means earth-shattering, Hollande's missive marked a tentative step in the direction of at least recognising, if not apologising for, the crimes of colonialism:

I heard your call, on May 8, for an objective reading of history, uninfluenced by wars of remembrance or by passing differences [between France and Algeria]. Frenchmen and Algerians have a shared responsibility: to tell the truth.

They owe it to their forebears, but also to their youth. France considers that there is now space for a lucid and responsible examination of its painful colonial past, as well as for a confident momentum forward.

President Bouteflika reciprocated with a letter to mark France's national day on July 14 that showed some readiness to engage with Hollande's overture:

Relations between Algeria and France pre-date the colonial period, which left a particularly strong mark our common history, and lasting scars on both our peoples. For Algerians, the resulting wounds are deep, but we wish, like you, to look to tomorrow and try to build a future of peace and prosperity for the youth of both our countries. To that end, it is time to exorcise the past by submitting it, together and in the appropriate frameworks, to a brave and lucid examination that will strengthen our bonds of esteem and friendship.

Whether this will be sufficient to wipe the slate clean and “reset” relations between Paris and Algiers remains to be seen, but the tone is certainly a positive one. In the new Socialist administration's first days in office, when ministerial teams were still settling in and no clear schedules had yet been established, there was even some speculation that Hollande might visit Algiers this summer, although the tentative date for an official visit has since been pushed back several times. French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius is now talking about a presidential visit “at the end of the year”, during which a “new, very high-level partnership” between the two countries might be signed.

Ostensibly, it was largely to prepare for just such a trip that two high-level French delegations jetted into Algiers in July. On closer examination, however, other, more pressing matters topped the agenda. The first visit took place on the eve of Algerian independence day, when a team headed by François Hollande's African affairs advisor Hélène Le Gall arrived for talks with top officials. The fact that it was Le Gall – a career diplomat whose main area of interest and expertise is sub-Saharan Africa^[1] – who headed the delegation was in itself a pointer to the most urgent issue at stake: the intractable crisis opened up in northern Mali by the Tuareg revolt, the coup in Bamako and the hardline Islamist takeover in Timbuktu, Gao and Kidal. Northern Mali seems also to have been one of the most important topics raised by Fabius when he visited on July 15-16.

Extremely concerned at the prospect of AQMI and its allies Ansar Dine and MUJAO establishing an 'Afghanistan in the Sahel', Paris has been urging Algeria to make an active contribution to multilateral efforts to restore the authority of the central government in the north of Mali. This much has been discussed openly in the press, on both sides of the Mediterranean, and indeed François Hollande himself has been quoted as telling a council of ministers meeting on July 13 that any solution to the problem of Mali “must pass through Algiers”. Less publicly, French intelligence sources have hinted that the successive French visitors have been lobbying Algiers to give at least tacit assent to an intervention by French special forces (perhaps under the cover of an agreement with the African Union^[2]).

In its public pronouncements, Algiers has so far held fast to its rejection of outside involvement in the region, as well as to its long-established doctrine of refusing to conduct military operations of its own beyond its borders. Consolidation of a jihadist entity on their southern frontiers may yet force their hand, but the Algerians certainly have powerful reasons to be wary of sending their own troops over the border. There is the danger of becoming bogged down in an unwinnable conflict that would almost certainly have a destabilising effect at home, to begin with. On top of that, in the case of a multilateral operation Algiers fears that its armed forces would effectively be used as auxiliaries by outside powers (France, of course, but perhaps also the United States, which is reported to have been exerting similar pressure), to which it would effectively be surrendering a fragment of its cherished sovereignty.

In parallel to these contacts with Algiers, Parisian diplomatic and political circles have begun to notice a subtle shift in the French government's attitude towards Morocco. More specifically, there is a feeling that under Hollande, Paris is no longer prepared to back Rabat unconditionally and to the hilt on the Western Sahara question. And this is seen as flowing precisely from the drive to mend fences with Algiers.

Following this logic, Paris salons perceive two imperatives at work. On the one hand, and plausibly enough, the need to secure Algiers' acquiescence for a military intervention, in one form or another, in northern Mali. On the other hand, and rather less obviously, it is suggested that the incoming Socialist government, anticipating a further worsening of the European monetary and financial crisis that might stretch the French state's finances to near breaking point, could be seeking to prepare the way for Algeria – whose foreign currency reserves hit $200bn earlier this year and are still growing – to contribute to a bailout in one form or another, if and when necessary.

The idea of Algeria lending directly to the French Treasury would almost certainly prove too unpalatable to public opinion on either side of the Mediterranean to be politically feasible. But it is by no means out of the question that Paris may be involved in persuading Algeria to lend more money to the International Monetary Fund, as was requested in April, in order to shore up its ability to provide emergency assistance to governments facing financial meltdown.

Security

Levels of violence in June were below average, with 23 incidents overall including 11 jihadist operations proper (i.e. initiated by AQMI or MUJAO). Jihadist activity picked up somewhat in July, with 12 operations in the first three weeks of the month (against only four operations initiated by the security forces). The first week of July was particularly busy, with six jihadist operations reported. Past experience suggests that the coming few weeks may see intense jihadist activity programmed to coincide with the holy month of Ramadan (began on July 20), which is seen as particularly auspicious for jihad^[3].

While Algiers and its environs remained quiet, on June 29 Algeria's southern provinces saw their second suicide bombing since early March (see AMSR #113 of April 3). This time it was the city of Ouargla, in the centre of Algeria's largest oil basin, that was hit: a suicide car bomber targeted the town's Gendarmerie headquarters, killing one gendarme and wounding two others, in addition to the bomber himself. The operation, like the Tamanrasset suicide car bombing in March, was claimed by MUJAO the following day. On July 10, El-Khabar said security forces reinforced their presence in the nearby oil town of Hassi Messaoud, looking for "terrorist elements" that might have "taken refuge" there.

Although the Ouargla bombing was operationally speaking relatively unsuccessful — the car could not break through the concrete barriers at the building's entry, hence the low death toll — it remains a worrying development for Algerian authorities. MUJAO, a recently established organisation based across the border in northern Mali, has now proved capable of planning and carrying out two suicide attacks in four months in Algeria's deep south, a region where suicide bombings were hitherto unknown and terrorist activity was limited to mostly smuggling or, at worst, kidnapping of foreign nationals. In both operations, MUJAO targeted security forces, but the possibility that it might attempt to hit oil and gas installations cannot be discounted. Since the Ouargla attack, it has been reported that the security forces in Hassi Rmel, Algeria's main gas hub, have begun stepping up security at production sites and other facilities.

Along Algeria's southern border itself, the situation was remarkably quiet. The only incident reported came on June 25 when the army intercepted a group of jihadists, believed to belong to MUJAO, south of Reggane (wilaya of Adrar). Two jihadists were killed, one wounded and one captured. This makes June the quietest month on Algeria's southern borders for at least the past two years (for comparison, there were five incidents in this area in May alone). There is no clear explanation for this sudden lull, and a media blackout is not to be ruled out. In the meantime, a group of experts from the Defence and Interior Ministries is reported to have been examining the feasibility of installing advanced electronic border control systems, inspired by systems used along the US-Mexico and Saudi Arabia-Iraq borders, and is said to be due to submit its report to the two ministries and the presidency in the near future.

Beyond Algeria's southern border, the most notable development was MUJAO's liberation of several hostages. Three European hostages — two Spanish aid workers and one Italian — it kidnapped from Tindouf, Algeria, in October 2011 (see AMSR #108 of October 24, 2011) were freed in mid-July. A MUJAO spokesman told AFP (quoted in El-Khabar, 19/7) that the organisation released them because "our conditions have been met", amid reports that the jihadist group had received a hefty ransom and had three detainees in Mauritanian prisons set free. Two days earlier, MUJAO had released three of the seven Algerian diplomats it took hostage in Gao, northern Mali, in early April. The Algerian authorities deny having paid a ransom, but there are strong suspicions that money did change hands in exchange for the diplomats — which would represent a major dent in Algiers' longstanding policy of opposition of ransom payments to terrorist groups.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW
Suite 411
Washington, DC 20005
Ph: +1 202 887 1113
Fax: +1 202 887 1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: www.thegabrielco.com

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

-
- [1] Le Gall had been appointed ambassador to Kigali in late 2011, but in February of this year it emerged that the Rwandan government had refused to accept her letter of credence, apparently because that she was held to be too close to then Foreign Minister Alain Juppé.
- [2] There had been suggestions that the French – and indeed the Algerians – could participate in an operation launched under the auspices of the Community of West African States (ECOWAS), but Algeria is believed to have been hostile to the idea. French diplomacy seems to believe that the African Union – of which Algeria is a member, unlike ECOWAS – might be a more promising channel.
- [3] Last year the month of August, which coincided with Ramadan, saw nearly double the usual level of jihadist activity and a major suicide bombing against the military academy in Cherchell, Tipaza (see AMSR #107 of September 23, 2011).

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, July 26, 2012 9:43 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: PBS NewsHour interviews Morocco's Youssef Amrani - "Arab Nations Consider How to Apply More Diplomatic Pressure on Syria"
Attachments: PBS NewsHour 'Arab Nations Consider How to Apply More Diplomatic Pressure on Syria' 25July2012.pdf

In the News

FYI – Last night, PBS NewsHour senior correspondent Judy Woodruff interviewed Yousseff Amrani, Morocco's Minister Delegate for Foreign Affairs, live during the 6:00 PM PBS NewsHour program, discussing the subject of Syria and international efforts to address the worsening situation.

See below and attached for transcript and link to video replay.

http://www.pbs.org/newshour/bb/world/july-dec12/syria2_07-25.html

PBS NEWSHOUR

Wednesday, July 25, 2012

ANALYSIS

Arab Nations Consider How to Apply More Diplomatic Pressure on Syria

PBS NewsHour's senior correspondent Judy Woodruff interviews Youssef Amrani, Morocco's Minister Delegate for Foreign Affairs

For Video Replay, go to: http://www.pbs.org/newshour/bb/world/july-dec12/syria2_07-25.html

Transcript

JUDY WOODRUFF: A White House spokesman said today that the use of heavy weapons in Aleppo showed the -- quote -- "depth of depravity" by the government of Bashar al-Assad. For more on the conflict in Syria, we turn to Youssef Amrani. He is Morocco's minister delegate for foreign affairs, the second highest ranking official in the ministry. Morocco is a member of the Arab League and currently is the only Arab country with a seat on the United Nations Security Council. Mr. Minister, thank you for being with us.

YOUSSEF AMRANI, Moroccan Minister Delegate for Foreign Affairs: Thank you very much. It's a pleasure.

JUDY WOODRUFF: What is your understanding right now of where the conflict in Syria stands, who has the upper hand?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Today, I think the situation is worsening.

"We should work with the opposition, we should work with the neighboring countries to see -- to find a political solution, because a humanitarian crisis will be not -- could not be managed."

- Youssef Amrani, Moroccan minister and diplomat

We are witnessing a humanitarian crisis, and if nothing is done right away, the country will go into civil war. We have tried. Morocco, as a member of the Security Council, we have tried. We have taken the lead in the Security Council, but we were vetoed by Russia and China. Now the importance and priority must be given to save the civilians, to stop the violence against civilians and to prepare the necessary conditions for a political and democratic transition.

JUDY WOODRUFF: And how should that be done? You're here in Washington today. You met with congressional leaders. You were at the White House meeting with White House officials. What are you looking for? What are you asking for?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: We're looking for the strengthening of the opposition, that it should have the necessary measures to be able to build up in a sovereign way its future. Then we need to support all the...

JUDY WOODRUFF: Build up, and in what manner? What sort of help...

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Well, the future of Syria must be democratic and should include all different groupings of the Syrian society. And, of course, the independence and the national integrity of Syria should be respected. Of course, this means that we need to -- that the current regime is not able to lead the democratic transition.

JUDY WOODRUFF: And are you asking the United States for more help? As you know, the U.S., other Western countries have been reluctant to get involved militarily.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Yes. Listen, the U.S. has been committed since the beginning as far as a political solution. Morocco, also, as you correctly stated, the only Arab country in the Security Council, we have taken all the decisions taken by the Arab League to the Security Council. Today, we need more pressure and we need to see, because we think that we are stuck in the Security Council with these vetoes, and we think... I think to move forward.

JUDY WOODRUFF: And when you say more pressure, what kind of pressure are you talking about?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Well, more sanctions, more international support and to work with the Russians to see if they can help to find a political solution and a way out, because the status quo actually is not acceptable for the Syrian community.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Now, we know that some members of the Arab League, some of the Gulf states, are actually sending military support, military help to the opposition.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Yes.

JUDY WOODRUFF: We know that Turkey has closed the border to prevent trucks from going from Turkey -- from Iran into Turkey.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: The borders.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Are you asking in any way for military -- more military support for the opposition?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: You see, for us, the priority is a negotiated solution to move forward, because we don't forget that there are a lot of weapons in Syria, and especially even chemical weapons. We need to avoid any catastrophe. So, that's why we are giving every chance to peace and negotiation. Then, if we fail on this issue, maybe we can think about alternative solutions.

JUDY WOODRUFF: And at what point do you decide that diplomacy isn't working? Because this has been tried and tried and tried again.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: We have to continue trying, because it is important, in the Security Council and elsewhere. But we should work with the opposition, we should work with the neighboring countries to see -- to find a political solution, because a humanitarian crisis will be not -- could not be managed.

JUDY WOODRUFF: So, are you saying it's a mistake for any outside country right now to send more military support to the opposition?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Let's give...

JUDY WOODRUFF: Or intelligence support?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Of course, intelligence is essential. It's important. Let's give some more chance to negotiation. We hope that Russia and China will understand that, for their own interests, it is better to have a safe and political outcome to this crisis, because nobody can manage the humanitarian issue knowing the interconnection between the terrorist organizations in the neighboring countries.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Well, that brings me to the question. One of the reasons the U.S. and other countries have been reluctant to get involved, to support the opposition is because they don't know what a successor government is going to look like. We just saw in that report al-Qaida starting to show up among the opposition. How can you be sure that the next government won't be as repressive as this government?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Listen, we had some experiences in Libya, in Tunisia, in the Maghreb, that were successful. I think that we have to believe that, thanks to dialogue, thanks to negotiation, we will be able to move forward, because any escalation in violence won't be a solution. And we -- as Morocco, we believe we give more chance to this dialogue and we hope to succeed. We know today we are a little bit stuck in the Security Council because of these vetoes, but we will try. Morocco is hosting the next meeting of the Friend of Syria. We are thinking...

JUDY WOODRUFF: Friends of Syria.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Friends of Syria. We are thinking of some ideas, because I think we should continue to make more pressure on the regime. And maybe we find out. As you know, two, three days ago, the Arab League has sent some messages to Bashar al-Assad to try to see if he can leave.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Any response from him?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Not yet.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Do you think there will be one?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: I actually cannot answer this question. I hope that the Syrian people continue to fight.

JUDY WOODRUFF: You agree with those who say it's just a matter of time before his government falls?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: It is also a matter of time. And we have to continue believing that -- believing in -- the Syrian people are trying their best to overcome this dictator regime.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Minister Youssef Amrani of Morocco, we thank you very much for talking with us.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Thank you very much.

PBS NEWSHOUR

AIR DATE: Wednesday, July 25, 2012

ANALYSIS

Arab Nations Consider How to Apply More Diplomatic Pressure on Syria

Though the League of Arab States approved NATO's intervention in Libya, it is still unclear whether the 22-member organization will take action in Syria, where conflict began 16 months ago. Judy Woodruff talks to Youssef Amrani, Morocco's delegate-minister for foreign affairs, about the role of the Arab League in Syria.

Transcript

JUDY WOODRUFF: A White House spokesman said today that the use of heavy weapons in Aleppo showed the -- quote -- "depth of depravity" by the government of Bashar al-Assad. For more on the conflict in Syria, we turn to Youssef Amrani. He is Morocco's minister delegate for foreign affairs, the second highest ranking official in the ministry. Morocco is a member of the Arab League and currently is the only Arab country with a seat on the United Nations Security Council. Mr. Minister, thank you for being with us.

YOUSSEF AMRANI, Moroccan Minister Delegate for Foreign Affairs: Thank you very much. It's a pleasure.

JUDY WOODRUFF: What is your understanding right now of where the conflict in Syria stands, who has the upper hand?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Today, I think the situation is worsening.

"We should work with the opposition, we should work with the neighboring countries to see -- to find a political solution, because a humanitarian crisis will be not -- could not be managed."

- Youssef Amrani, Moroccan minister and diplomat

We are witnessing a humanitarian crisis, and if nothing is done right away, the country will go into civil war. We have tried. Morocco, as a member of the Security Council, we have tried. We have taken the lead in the Security Council, but we were vetoed by Russia and China. Now the importance and priority must be given to save the civilians, to stop the violence against civilians and to prepare the necessary conditions for a political and democratic transition.

JUDY WOODRUFF:

re in Washington today. You met with congressional leaders. You were at the White House meeting with White House officials. What are you looking for? What are you asking for?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: We're looking for the strengthening of the opposition, that it should have the necessary measures to be able to build up in a sovereign way its future. Then we need to support all the...

JUDY WOODRUFF: Build up, and in what manner? What sort of help...

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Well, the future of Syria must be democratic and should include all different groupings of the Syrian society. And, of course, the independence and the national integrity of Syria should be respected. Of course, this means that we need to -- that the current regime is not able to lead the democratic transition.

JUDY WOODRUFF: And are you asking the United States for more help? As you know, the U.S., other Western countries have been reluctant to get involved militarily.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Yes. Listen, the U.S. has been committed since the beginning as far as a political solution. Morocco, also, as you correctly stated, the only Arab country in the Security Council, we have taken all the decisions taken by the Arab League to the Security Council. Today, we need more pressure and we need to see, because we think that we are stuck in the Security Council with these vetoes, and we think... I think to move forward.

JUDY WOODRUFF: And when you say more pressure, what kind of pressure are you talking about?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Well, more sanctions, more international support and to work with the Russians to see if they can help to find a political solution and a way out, because the status quo actually is not acceptable for the Syrian community.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Now, we know that some members of the Arab League, some of the Gulf states, are actually sending military support, military help to the opposition.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Yes.

JUDY WOODRUFF: We know that Turkey has closed the border to prevent trucks from going from Turkey -- from Iran into Turkey.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: The borders.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Are you asking in any way for military -- more military support for the opposition?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: You see, for us, the priority is a negotiated solution to move forward, because we don't forget that there are a lot of weapons in Syria, and especially even chemical weapons. We need to avoid any catastrophe. So, that's why we are giving every chance to peace and negotiation. Then, if we fail on this issue, maybe we can think about alternative solutions.

JUDY WOODRUFF: And at what point do you decide that diplomacy isn't working? Because this has been tried and tried and tried again.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: We have to continue trying, because it is important, in the Security Council and elsewhere. But we should work with the opposition, we should work with the neighboring countries to see -- to find a political solution, because a humanitarian crisis will be not -- could not be managed.

JUDY WOODRUFF: So, are you saying it's a mistake for any outside country right now to send more military support to the opposition?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Let's give...

JUDY WOODRUFF: Or intelligence support?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Of course, intelligence is essential. It's important. Let's give some more chance to negotiation. We hope that Russia and China will understand that, for their own interests, it is better to have a safe and political outcome to this crisis, because nobody can manage the humanitarian issue knowing the interconnection between the terrorist organizations in the neighboring countries.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Well, that brings me to the question. One of the reasons the U.S. and other countries have been reluctant to get involved, to support the opposition is because they don't know what a successor government is going to look like. We just saw in that report al-Qaida starting to show up among the opposition. How can you be sure that the next government won't be as repressive as this government?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: [REDACTED] in Tunisia, in the Maghreb, that were successful. I think that we have to believe that, thanks to dialogue, thanks to negotiation, we will be able to move forward, because any escalation in violence won't be a solution. And we -- as Morocco, we believe we give more chance to this dialogue and we hope to succeed. We know today we are a little bit stuck in the Security Council because of these vetoes, but we will try. Morocco is hosting the next meeting of the Friend of Syria. We are thinking...

JUDY WOODRUFF: Friends of Syria.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Friends of Syria. We are thinking of some ideas, because I think we should continue to make more pressure on the regime. And maybe we find out. As you know, two, three days ago, the Arab League has sent some messages to Bashar al-Assad to try to see if he can leave.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Any response from him?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Not yet.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Do you think there will be one?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: I actually cannot answer this question. I hope that the Syrian people continue to fight.

JUDY WOODRUFF: You agree with those who say it's just a matter of time before his government falls?

YOUSSEF AMRANI: It is also a matter of time. And we have to continue believing that -- believing in -- the Syrian people are trying their best to overcome this dictator regime.

JUDY WOODRUFF: Minister Youssef Amrani of Morocco, we thank you very much for talking with us.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: Thank you very much.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, July 26, 2012 11:27 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: INTERVIEW with Minister Amrani: Washington Post: "Morocco: A new strategic partner?"

Right Turn

By Jennifer Rubin

Posted at 10:30 AM ET, 07/26/2012

Morocco: A new strategic partner?

By Jennifer Rubin

At a time when the United States is struggling to devise an "Arab Spring" policy and is running low on strategic allies (as Egypt evolves as a wild card rather than a reliable ally), Morocco's deputy foreign minister, Youssef Amrani, was at the Brookings Institute to talk about the Middle East, the U.S-Morocco relationship and more.

The soft-spoken diplomat has a degree from Boston University and more than 30 years in Morocco's foreign ministry. In a 30-minute interview I asked him why he is in the United States. He answered: "I'm here to strengthen this relationship between Morocco and the United States." Indeed, he doesn't conceal his aims. "We're ambitious and want to move toward a larger partnership, more strategic."

Relations between the United States and Morocco are solid, but what Amrani's kingdom is after is a more comprehensive relationship rather than simply a discrete list of agreements. His country is looking for "political dialogue, joint dialogue," he explains, on a whole range of issues concerning Africa and the Middle East.

There is good reason for both sides to work cooperatively. Amrani is quick to remind me, "We bring some vision from Africa and from the Arab world."

Morocco is attempting a peaceful transition to a constitutional democracy while also devolving power to local authorities and modernizing its schools and judiciary. Along with a family code that provides for greater rights for women, Morocco is trying to accomplish in a decade what took centuries in Western Europe. He recalls that for 10 years Morocco has been working for reform under the auspices of a reformist king, Mohammed VI. "The king had the leadership to promote reform," he explains. This meant that both economic and political reforms were required. "It was his top priority," Amrani said. The dual track of political and economic reform included the realization that Morocco must "share values with the West, democracy and free trade." He then launched into a defense of free markets that would make U.S. economic conservatives blush. Today the most important factor, he told me enthusiastically, is the private sector. When he told me that is "where the jobs are," he sounded a bit like Bibi Netanyahu, also a Western-educated Middle East leader who understood private-sector growth was the key to economic success.

When we turn to the Middle East more generally, he is, well, diplomatic. Morocco has traditionally been reticent about offering advice or serving as a “model” for the region. He won’t comment on the specifics of the Egyptian election, but he did say, “To be successful it needs civil society, political parties and political will.” He continued, sounding much like some Brookings Institute fellows: “Egypt needs leadership, needs the association of all the Egyptian sensibilities [an inclusive political system] and development of institutions.” (I wonder if the Obama administration has thought about Egypt this systematically.)

Syria is a far different situation, of course. He began with a caveat: “We must be respectful of national sovereignty.” But then he added that that Syrians need “their own system based on democracy and respect for human rights.” He said, “There is no choice but to speed up the process.” He warned that bloodshed “only encourages extremists.”

Indeed, evidence of opportunistic extremists abounds. He cited Iraq. (“The country was collapsing and al-Qaeda came in to create instability.” And he ran through the situation in Mali, where a failed state allowed a separatist, extremist movement to take hold.

There is a reason, of course, that Morocco is so concerned about the vacuum into which extremists rush when regimes break down. Morocco has been struggling to reach a resolution of the dispute over the Western Sahara, which the Polisario, a popular-front type terror group, seeks to make into an independent state. The United States has praised Morocco’s proposal for autonomy, but the Algerian government (where camps of refugee are held in camps run by the Polisario) has balked. He says, “Now we need compromise, pragmatism . . . We need countries to be engaged to find a solution.”

There is urgency for Morocco in resolving the dispute, not only to alleviate the humanitarian crisis but also to doff the toxic alliance that has developed between the Polisario and al-Qaeda of Islamic Maghreb. “It is a major security threat,” he says of the Polisario-AQIM partnership. “Not only for Africa and the Maghreb, but for Europe.” The brew of drug trafficking, human trafficking, kidnapping and terrorism, if allowed to bubble over, has the potential to undermine government throughout the Maghreb and beyond.

I ask him what the United States should be doing in the Arab world more generally. “What I say will surprise you, “ he began. “We should do our own homework first. We need order in our own countries. Then we can ask for partners to help us. ” He cautioned again, “Help should accompany these reforms to support transition [to democratic rule].”

Morocco hasn’t generally been a political football in the United States. Politicians from both parties have praised the new constitution and urged that the autonomy plan be implemented. Amrani said, “We have a stable relationship that transcends political parties.”

Amrani vouches for shared values between the countries. In doing so it is hard not to see Morocco as the exception to the rule of violence, extremism and anti-Western sentiment in the Arab world. Maybe the U.S. should take him up on his suggestion for a “strategic partnership.” The U.S. can use all the help in the Middle East it can get these days.

By Jennifer Rubin | 10:30 AM ET, 07/26/2012

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, August 19, 2012 4:46 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: July 2012 Events Bulletin
Attachments: SR_July2012EventsBulletin.docx

Dear Team,
Below please find the July 2012 MAC Events Bulletin. Our team compiles a monthly list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

July 2012 Events Bulletin

July 12

Democratic Transition in the Middle East: Between Authoritarianism and Islam

July 19

The Federal Budget and Appropriations for FY2013: Democracy, Governance, and Human Rights in the Middle East and North Africa

July 31

Finding a Way Forward: The US, Morocco, and a Changing North Africa

.....

Democratic Transition in the Middle East: Between Authoritarianism and Islam

Date: 12 July 2012

1. Title: Democratic Transition in the Middle East: Between Authoritarianism and Islam

Hosted by the National Endowment for Democracy

Participants:

Mokhtar Benabdallaoui: Reagan-Fascell Democracy Fellow, the National Endowment for Democracy; Director, Doctoral Center for Studies for Politics and Religion, Hassan II University

Samer Shehata: Assistant Professor, Georgetown University

Zerxes Spencer: Moderator: Fellowship Manager, Reagan-Fascell Democracy Program, the National Endowment for Democracy

2. Overview

This event highlighted the research of Mokhtar Benabdallaoui, a Spring 2012 Reagan-Fascell Democracy Fellow at NED. Benabdallaoui addressed why Islamists have embraced democracy instead of fundamentalism and why the appeal of Islamists exceeds that of leftists and liberals in the Arab world. He assessed the challenges of shaping Islamist political thought in a democratic direction, the prospects of Islamist governments accepting diversity and differences of opinion, and the ways in which Islamists may reconcile conflicting religious and political ideas from across the Arab world. Drawing upon the example of Islamist political parties in four countries—Morocco, Tunisia, Egypt, and Lebanon—Benabdallaoui considered how ascendant Islamists have influenced societies across the Middle East and concluded with an assessment of the main stakeholders in the Arab Spring, their propensity for reform, and the prospects for further change in the region. Samer Shehata provided comments on the presentation and the paper.

3. Summary

Benabdallaoui began with a description of the similar characteristics of the revolts within the Middle East. These uprisings were all spontaneous, which the governments of the region and the world failed to predict, they all had minimal central planning, the protests were organic, and the people involved were from a diverse background. The uprisings were unpredictable due to the prevalent, but wrong idea, especially among the Arab regimes, that Arab culture and democracy were incompatible. The new forms of media, like facebook and twitter, along with new social factors, like rising levels of education, urbanization, the nuclear family structure, and women's involvement in society, also went largely unnoticed by the regimes and increased the chances for popular uprisings.

Benabdallaoui next discussed the reasons for the different outcomes of these revolutions - why some resolved peacefully and others descended into violence. A strong allegiance to tribe, sect, and religion caused some of these revolts to slip into bloodshed and civil war, like in Libya, Syria, and Yemen, because societal participation was based narrowly around these factors. High levels of social integration on the other hand caused successful, non-violent transitions. Social integration caused identity to be formed around citizenship and allegiance to the nation, thus allowing for smoother transitions. Another important variable was the level of institutionalization among these societies. Low levels of institutionalization, marked by unpopular "inherited presidencies," encouraged disaffected citizenry to join in protests and become heavily involved with the Arab Spring. An institutionalized military, with loyalty to the nation over tribe or sect, encouraged smoother transitions as they were less likely to shoot their countrymen on orders of a discredited leadership.

Benabdallaoui felt that it was important to distinguish between social Islamization and traditional political Islamism, which Western scholars often conflate. Social Islamization is spontaneous, is a source of collective and individual identity, and can be an assertion of modernity. Traditional political Islamism, in contrast, is imposed from the top-down, is used to mobilize and govern instead of being an expression of belief, and is a complete model for behavior and governance. Political Islamism is a political order, a social model, an economic theory, and an ethical framework. Once a political group focuses on a single aspect of political Islam there is the real danger of radicalization. Groups with a narrow focus tend to boil identity down to a narrow issue, which limits the expression of more complete identities. An emphasis on ethnicity leads to racism while an emphasis on religion leads to fundamentalism. Benabdallaoui underscored that democracy is good form of governance, particularly in this context, because the emphasis is on diversity and the dangers of a narrow focus are averted.

Benabdallaoui went on to discuss the transition from classic/traditional political Islamism to what he called the new Islamism. Traditional Islamism is rigidly orthodox, dogmatic, fundamentalist, and totalitarian. These trends are not tied to Islam; any system that bases its legitimacy on religion will exhibit these characteristics. Society has begun to shift to a more inclusive version of Islamism, the new Islamism. This shift can be seen in the changing goals of Islamists; for example, many have dropped the idea of a religious caliphate and are moving towards an acceptance of democracy. New Islamism has also dropped the idea of implementation of Sharia, considers mosques as purely places of worship instead of political or propaganda centers, and has accepted the idea of a civil state, which offers, among other things, legal equality to all citizens and women's rights. He also stressed that political Islam is a diverse movement based on numerous interpretations of religious texts.

Benabdallaoui next discussed the state of Arab countries and provided an analysis of major trends in the Arab world, classifying groups of countries according to six distinct categories. First, he began by evaluating several individual countries that have revolted, but that cannot yet be placed in any definitive category. Tunisia has had the best transition by far, largely due to its excellent leadership, well-integrated society, and historical ties to Europe. Egypt has also had a fairly good transition. Libya's transition was dependent on NATO and external actors, without which it would have descended into civil war, thus showing the continued importance of the international community. Due to tribal divisions, Yemen has been mired in civil war. Second are those countries in the Throes of Change, including Bahrain and Syria. These countries were characterized by high levels of sectarianism. Third, Countries of Reform were Jordan and Morocco, which were characterized by a fast and reform-focused regime response to internal unrest followed by inadequate implementation. He highlighted Morocco's reforms as being limited, especially in areas like human rights and press freedoms. Fourth, Countries of Continuity, which includes GCC countries. These countries can buy-off their populations, but this is a quick-fix and unsustainable in the long-term. These countries have merely postponed the day when they will have to address the grievances of their populaces. Fifth were the Countries of Ostensible Exception: Algeria, Sudan, and Iraq. These are countries which have largely escaped large-scale protests, but this is due to recent and devastating wars/civil wars which left the populations more concerned with day to day survival than democracy. Once there is stability within these countries they will most likely have to face protests and civilian unrest. Finally, there is the Exception, which is Lebanon. Lebanon is the only Arab state which is "controlled by society". There is a democratic oligarchy within Lebanon which brings about stagnation and decay in the political system, but also a certain amount of tolerance among the sects which are forced to work together.

Benabdallaoui next went more in-depth about the issues which Egypt, Tunisia, and Morocco have to face in the near future. The primary concern of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt is the economy and job creation. The Brotherhood may be willing to make concessions to the US, on Israel for example, in order to gain economic support. The problem is that any Israel concession would make them unpopular so the Brotherhood must weigh these two priorities and carefully balance them. He believes that the military can play a constructive role and will push the Brotherhood to be more open to political opponents. He views Tunisia and the Ennahda party as a model for other countries in transition. Turning to Morocco, Benabdallaoui stressed that the PJD is a group that wants to solve the economic and social problems of the country. The problem is that they have been given no real power and the party serves as the scapegoat for the King. The weakness of the PJD is due to the fact that the party has a weak mobilization capacity and there is a fractured political arena, which limits the capacity for change in the country. The Justice and Charity movement in Morocco bears further study as a group which focuses on bottom-up change and has distanced itself from the February 20th Movement.

Benabdallaoui next discussed where political Islam stands today and what the future holds for these groups. It must be kept in mind that many votes for Islamists were protest votes against the existing regime and these groups are not as popular as they appear. He believes that inclusion of Islamists will moderate them and they should therefore be included in the political process. The fact that Islamist parties are in power in much of the region is a good thing because they will spur intra-regional trade because of friendly connections between these movements. The religious identity of these movements gives them the maneuvering room to launch reforms touching on religion that secularists would be unable to accomplish. He is confident that the new Islamism is spreading and that Islamists are on the path to democracy.

Benabdallaoui concluded his presentation with an overview of US policy options in the region. The US has two options: it can either continue to rely on authoritarianism at an increasingly high cost, with poorer results, or the US can rely on democracy. Democracy will promote cultural exchange, freedom, and economic opportunities because all Islamists share free market ideas. Democracy will also serve the US goal of regional stability.

Samer Shehata gave a critique of the paper and presentation. He began by saying that both were excellent and he had only small points to make. One was that the project was very ambitious and expansive, perhaps too much so, and he stressed that political Islam was extremely important and understudied. Shehata critiqued the lack of an examination of distinctions and differences between the states saying, that "Egypt is not equivalent to Tunisia". He also wanted more discussion of the differences between the various Islamist groups, mentioning that the PJD is very different than Hezbollah and the local context quite different as well. He lamented the lack of a discussion on political economy and the related question of a youth bulge, which is vital to understanding the Arab Spring, and mentioned that the discussion of the militaries within the region could be expanded upon. He also pointed out that the reasons for the inclusion of the distinctions between social and political Islam was unclear. Benabdallaoui concluded by quickly responding to a few points; he mentioned that he included a discussion of political and social Islam because the two seemed so often conflated in the West.

4. Q & A

Q: (Yaffine Borffman, Asia Center) Does Hezbollah have a chance to introduce Sharia in Lebanon?

A: It is not a possibility or a goal for Hezbollah. In Lebanon, one sect can't govern alone and needs the support of several other groups, which increases the political openness and tolerance for other groups in the country.

Q: (William Zartman, SAIS) What is the role of the salafists in these various countries?

A: Their role is crucial. Salafists consider religion to be a personal choice and have only become political very recently. Salafists have very different religious interpretations depending on the country.

Q: (Lahita Fennale, Female Muslim Lawyers for Human Rights) There is a lot of talk about 'principles of Islamic law,' but these are not written anywhere. What are these principles?

A: Things like justice and equality. The sentences in various documents, like constitutions, are very different from the principles of Sharia, which are more general.

Q: (Mark Platter, International Forum for Democratic Studies) How does Iran fit into your categories?

A: Iran's position is weaker and weaker within the region, Hezbollah's as well. Hezbollah will have difficulties remaining in power, especially with Syria in conflict. In fact, Hezbollah is one of the few ways for the Syrian regime to get support or have a safe haven. Syria might start relying on Hezbollah instead of the former situation.

Q: (Jonathan Potton, Stimson Center) How have the monarchies of Morocco and Jordan managed to survive?

A: It relates to the lack of legitimacy, which drove the popular response. In the monarchies, the response to popular dissatisfaction was very fast and the regimes had a high level of legitimacy because they could claim descent from the Prophet. This is another reason why Islamists are important. As religious actors they can compete with the monarchies for their religious role. The interaction and debate over religion will serve to de-sacrilize the public sphere because it opens Islam up for debate.

Q: (Dan Liebermann) Do you think that external influence would push civil war into revolution in countries like Yemen and Syria?

A: It is certain that without NATO, Qaddafi would have won. In some cases like Libya, external actors are vital. Yemen is different though. In Yemen, the splits are within groups, within tribes - not between groups.

Q: What of the youth? How much do leaders understand dignity and youth engagement?

A: Dignity is important; there is no answer without dignity. This is why the GCC can't resolve its problems with money. They can only put off the time when their populations will demand dignity and respect.

Q: (Georgetown University) What is the role of the security forces and the impact on legitimacy due to the use of these forces?

A: Security operations can limit legitimacy. In Morocco, the 1970's were very difficult times, but didn't impact the legitimacy of the regime. The issue of inherited presidencies is more important when looking at legitimacy. Also the fast response of the crown in Morocco to unrest convinced people that there was a chance for reform.

Q: (Mahjid al-Salaami, journalist from Palestine and Gaza) Is the democratic transition in Gaza with Hamas a possible example for the region?

A: Hamas and Fatah have actually lost a lot of credibility in the last two years. The majority of the people do not support either Hamas or Fatah. The issue of the Sinai border is going to be determined by Morsi depending on if the Brotherhood will prioritize the economy or its popularity.

5. Observation

This event was attended by around 60-70 people who formed a good mix of interns, students, professionals, and academics. This presentation was a very good overview of the results of the Arab Spring at this particular moment and provided a good categorization of the countries in the region. The discussion on political Islam was very informative and descriptive, addressing some concerns with political Islam without equating political Islamism with the broader religion. This presentation can address, and refute, many claims and denigrations of Islam as being incompatible with democracy and Islamists being equated with terrorists. The presentation did gloss over much of the potential for back-sliding in the region and underplayed certain negative aspects to the Arab Spring, like the role of the Egyptian military for example. The presentation is a good optimistic viewpoint on the Arab Spring, Islamists, and the future outlook for democracy in region.

\(Back to top\)

Date: 19 July 2012

1. Title: The Federal Budget and Appropriations for FY2013: Democracy, Governance, and Human Rights in the Middle East and North Africa

Hosted by the Project On Middle East Democracy (POMED)

Panelists:

Stephen McInerney: Executive Director, POMED

Tamara Cofman Wittes: Senior Fellow and Director, Saban Center for Middle East Policy, the Brookings Institution

Jennifer Winsor: Associate Dean for Programs and Studies, School of Foreign Service, Georgetown

Cole Bockenfeld: Moderator: Director of Advocacy, POMED

2. Overview

As many countries in the Arab world embark on political transitions of various types and others continue to protest authoritarian rule, US funding and assistance for the Middle East will have far-reaching implications for the region's future as well as the nature of American policy and relations. As uprisings broke out across the Arab world, President Obama promised in May 2011 that the US would support democratic principles with "all of the diplomatic, economic, and strategic tools at our disposal," and that this support would take precedence to other strategic interests. Though the Administration deserves credit for intensifying its focus on support for democracy, it has failed to fulfill the commitments of last May's lofty pronouncement. POMED's event brought together experts to analyze and discuss the Administration's approach to budgets, spending, and foreign assistance in the region, and to also interpret what that means in terms of the Administration's broader priorities and thinking vis-à-vis US policy against the backdrop of dramatic political changes.

3. Summary

Steve McInerney, author of POMED's report on the Federal Budget and Appropriations for FY13: Democracy, Governance, and Human Rights in the Middle East and North Africa, opened by touting the Obama Administration's successes in Tunisia. Considering the virtual nonexistence of a bilateral aid package between Washington and Tunis before Ben Ali's ouster, American policymakers mobilized resources incredibly quickly, demonstrating impressive agility and creativity in providing much-needed support. US aid to Tunisia increased from $2 million in January 2011 to approximately $200 million today. US aid has also been critical in supporting transitions in Libya and Yemen. US support for Jordan has also dramatically increased, where the Obama Administration is energetically supporting reform. Assistance elsewhere, however, has undergone few dramatic changes. In fact, the administration's commitment to supporting serious democracy and governance promotion in many GCC states, Lebanon, and the West Bank and Gaza has diminished. The past year has seen a dramatic escalation of tensions between the US and Egypt driven in large part by Egyptian government attacks on NGOs, including the criminal prosecution of employees of American democracy promotion organizations. As a result, US assistance to Egypt, which traditionally has occupied the center focus in the region, is colored by a troubling uncertainty. Funds aimed at bolstering the Egyptian economy rather than democracy promotion, however, are met with less resistance.

The structure of military aid to the region is excessively rigid and inflexible, making any adjustments or rebalancing between military aid and economic aid extremely difficult. While the Arab uprisings have sparked some discussion among key actors about the possibility of shifting a greater proportion of US assistance to economic aid as opposed to military aid, that process is greatly impeded by long-term agreements on military aid and by the influence of US defense manufacturing companies. This holds especially true in Egypt, where policymakers encountered difficulties revising the aid relationship to properly respond to the facts on the ground.

Tamara Wittes discussed the broader challenges posed by the current budget environment and presented several recommendations for maximizing assistance funds to the region. The US must leverage its funds, devising a creative and flexible strategy to get the most out of investments. Money should be lumped into a regional fund and allotted to specific countries upon satisfaction of certain requirements; this will "incentivize good behavior" and provide policymakers with flexibility. The Administration requested $9 billion in foreign assistance for the Middle East and North Africa—an 11.6 percent increase over the current levels for FY12. Most of this increase can be attributed to the request of $700 million in funding for the MEPI Incentive Fund. Congress has slashed international affairs budgets in recent years, resulting in decreases in funding for every other region in the world; as such, the Administration has shown creativity in finding sufficient resources for the MENA region within a decreasing overall budget. Wittes also echoed McInerney's call to shift away from military assistance and toward support for enterprise, democracy efforts, and civil society capacity-building.

“The US responds to crises, not opportunities,” Jennifer Winsor began. This trend transcends Presidents. After the fall of the Berlin wall, American policymakers doled out massive amounts of money in an attempt to transform the countries of Central and Eastern Europe into democracies. However, the process did not happen overnight as policymakers as hoped. Democratic transformation takes place over decades, not in the heat of a crisis. The US must invest in a country’s civil society to properly build the foundation for democracy, rather than endeavoring to enact immediate change. The situation in the Arab countries is even more complex than post-Cold War Europe; there is no clear-cut “good guys vs. bad guys” dichotomy. American Administrations never do enough to promote human rights and democracy. US objectives in Egypt, for example, are completely unclear. Policymakers’ activities there are conflicting and inconsistent.

4. Q & A

Q: Democratic transitions can be slow and grueling. How should the US remain patient and engaged in such a difficult environment?

A: (Wittes) This is true, the US must practice strategic patience to ride out a bumpy transition. In the past, however, we supported democratic transitions in South Korea, the Philippines, and Taiwan, after having supported autocrats in those countries quite robustly. We need to consistently and clearly articulate universal democratic principles and core political rights—equality, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, etc.

Q: US-Egypt bilateral relations desperately need to be reset, but the SCAF vehemently opposes any reduction in military assistance. Is conditionality in this instance an effective tool for leveraging US assistance?

A: (Wittes) There are two possible ways to leverage US assistance—retrospectively, which essentially involves sanctions and tends to produce some negative feelings on the part of the recipient, or prospectively, which requires recipients to meet conditions to continue receiving aid. The prospective model is increasingly attractive and employed by projects like the Millennium Challenge Fund and the MEPI Incentive Fund.

(Winsor) We want to get the most bang for our buck. Even if they are ultimately unsuccessful, Congress must pressure the Administration to put more emphasis on human rights and democracy.

(McInerney) Support for democratic principles absolutely must be a priority. In Morocco, for example, more support would go far. We can no longer afford to waive conditions for human rights and democracy in the name of national security. Algeria’s most recent elections, for example, were fraudulent at best, and the US said nothing.

Q: Is interest in Libya waning as the country moves from a conflict zone to a post-conflict country?

A: (McInerney) More assistance to Libya would be helpful. Substantial direct support in conjunction with civil society organizations focused efforts on the elections and election monitoring, which already happened. Prior to US assistance, Libyan political parties and civil society organization had little to no capacity. The US played a modest, but critical role in the success of Libya’s elections. Now that the elections have passed, the proper strategy and focus for engaging in Libya is not entirely clear.

(Wittes) Until last October, Libya was a conflict zone so aid centered on humanitarian supplies. We were successful in our efforts to help Libya implement a social infrastructure. Now, moving past the conflict situation, Libya is a wealthy country. Money to invest in the country can come from within—from the government. US assistance can focus on civil society organizations that the government neglects to assist.

Q: Is this the time to discuss changing aid to Israel from a more regional perspective?

A: (Wittes) I don’t see a failure to bringing Israel into the picture. Military assistance undoubtedly dominates economic assistance, and this needs to be redressed. A balance must be struck, just as in other countries in the region.

Q: The US-Egypt aid relationship desperately needs revisiting—the average Egyptian is not even aware that Egypt receives US aid—what does this tell us?

A: (Wittes) Our aid relationship to Egypt has been almost exclusively government-to-government. The NGO crisis reflects the SCAF’s reluctance to alter the nature of assistance; they want assistance, but only in a manner they can control. However, it is crucial to remember that none of our interests can be met if we fail to invest in democracy and good governance. Stability in Egypt and in the region as a whole—which is absolutely crucial to achieving our security interests—will not be established until governments undergo democratic reforms; conflict will persist until the people feel their demands are being heard. The question of how to invest is not an interests-versus-values issue. Promoting democracy and good governance benefits both our interests and our values.

5. Observation

Approximately 40 professionals, journalists, students, and members of the policy community attended this event, which launched POMED's FY2013 report on US foreign assistance to the Middle East and North Africa. The panelists' remarked that the Administration's ability to continue to provide foreign assistance to the Middle East and North Africa at relatively consistent levels, with moderate and steady increases, represents a success in today's constrained budget environment. Looking beyond the numbers, however, US assistance to the region relies too heavily on funds for security support rather than democracy and human rights efforts. In his testimony, Stephen McNerney said that more direct assistance for governance and democracy programs in Morocco would go far, and in his report, he wrote that the Morocco is a "permissive" environment for this kind of work. Compared to countries like Egypt and many of the Gulf States, where US governance programs have been met with resistance, Morocco has been a receptive partner. The event and report cast Morocco in a very positive light, and made a case for increasing US direct assistance to Rabat.

POMED Report Morocco Section:

In general, Morocco appears to have undertaken more serious reform in the past 18 months than most other states in the region, but without seriously shifting political power from the monarchy to elected institutions as demanded by protesters. US assistance to Morocco is rather modest and has not seen any significant changes in reaction to the events of 2011; it is the smallest aid recipient of the seven Arab countries with a USAID mission and a longstanding assistance relationship. Funding requests for FY13 are consistent with what has been provided over the past few years—a total of $32.6 million, including $15.1 million in security assistance, $7.7 million in assistance for democracy and governance programming, and $9.7 million in other economic aid. The democracy and governance program in Morocco is the smallest such program in any country in the region with a significant aid relationship. This is surprising given Morocco's sizable population, the very high demand for civil society and political party development aid, and the relatively permissive environment for such work. The next year, however, will offer some real opportunities to reconsider the structure of US assistance to Morocco and address concerns that governance and democracy programs are too small in scope and excessively focused on improving the technical expertise of government institutions. In the next year, USAID is scheduled to complete a five-year strategy to guide its programming from 2012-2017. Several of USAID's multiyear programs in Morocco will be completed in FY13, which will leave room for new projects to begin in FY14 in line with the new five-year strategy.

For a complete copy of the report, please visit:

<http://pomed.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2012/07/FY2013-Budget-Report-web.pdf>

\(Back to top\)

.....

Finding a Way Forward: The US, Morocco, and a Changing North Africa

Date: 31 July 2012

1. Finding a Way Forward: The US, Morocco, and a Changing North Africa

Hosted by Kosmos Energy
 Capitol Visitors Center, Congress

Participants:

- Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal: Ambassador to the United States, the Kingdom of Morocco
- Alexis Arieff: Analyst in African Affairs, Congressional Research Service
- Dr. Audra Grant: Political Scientist, RAND Corporation
- Dr. J. Peter Pham: Director, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, the Atlantic Council
- Haim Malka: Moderator: Deputy Director and Senior Fellow, Middle East Program, Center for Strategic and International Studies

2. Overview

This educational event provided a forum for discussing current events in Morocco and the broader Maghreb region.

The targeted audience included legislative assistants, as well as senior foreign policy and homeland security staffers to Members of the House and Senate.

3. Summary

Haim Malka mentioned that Morocco typically has a low priority in news and for policymakers because Morocco rarely has crises. This is a mistake since Morocco is an important regional ally for the US in a region that is increasingly "consequential" for US policy. The goal of the discussion was to examine the public debates and the socio-economic challenges that Morocco faces.

Ambassador Bouhhal gave a brief history of the bilateral relationship that Morocco has enjoys with the US. Her stressed Morocco's commitment to reform under Mohammad VI, and emphasized that in all these reforms Morocco has been careful to include public participation and encourage feedback.

Audra Grant focused on the changes that Morocco has undergone since the Arab Spring. She stressed that Morocco has a long history of liberalization under both King Mohammad VI and his father King Hassan II. The regime's constitutional reforms in 2011 helped to prevent the destabilization that occurred in other parts of the Arab world. According to Grant, what prompted these reforms was the February 20th movement, which, unlike other Arab Spring protest movements, was peaceful and wasn't focused on ending the regime. The reforms prompted by the protests liberalized the political system and limited monarchical power. Grant emphasized that Morocco is unique in the Arab World because the regime has legitimacy due to the monarchy's historic religious legitimacy, the fact that it has promoted stable governance, and that the monarchy has promoted sustained liberalization. The protest movement was also fractured in terms of its goals and methods and the quick reaction of the monarch in offering reforms served to limit the political crisis. Morocco traditionally absorbs political dissent through reforms. Despite these reforms, the King maintains supremacy in critical policy areas and the populace has shown less confidence in the political institutions in recent years. Problems of high unemployment, poverty, and the Western Sahara issue must be overcome.

Dr. J. Peter Pham discussed the specifics of the constitutional reform and what they mean for Morocco. He stressed that keeping the context of these reforms in mind was important to understanding the importance of Morocco. Due to the constant reformist nature of King Mohammad VI and the final years of King Hassan II, issues that drove populations to revolt in other countries were often already dealt with in Morocco. Human rights abuses were dealt with by the reconciliation commission and reparation payments, for example. The Arab Spring sped up the reform process with the new constitution. Pham stressed the uniqueness of these reforms compared to the rest of the Arab World. Morocco is the only country to acknowledge multiple sources of its culture - Arab, Berber, African, and others - in its constitution. Morocco also puts forward a more liberal version of Islam in its constitution, stating only that Islam is the religion of the state, instead of basing law solely on Sharia as in being raised in most other Maghreb countries. The new constitution also put the Amazigh language on an equal footing with Arabic and placed limits on the King's power.

Alexis Arieff examined both the nature of the reforms and the US-Moroccan relationship. She agreed that the reforms have strengthened the Prime Minister, the legislature, and the judiciary, but stressed that the King still retains his position as the "ultimate arbiter" in the Moroccan system. Due to the quick reforms offered by the King, he nevertheless still retains his public popularity and legitimacy. The wrangling of the PJD with the palace over many issues has shown that the new arrangements in the constitution have been put into practice.

Arieff stressed that the US views Morocco as a strong ally and partner in the region. The Administration has been very supportive of the reforms and is comfortable working with the PJD, operating on the idea of 'actions being more important than words/philosophy.' Morocco has been supported by Presidents from both parties and has been cooperative on issues ranging from Syria to trade and terrorism. In terms of Western Sahara, the US continues to support a negotiated solution that keeps the stability of Morocco in mind.

4. Q & A

Q: (Malka) Are the Moroccan people satisfied with the reforms? Is a new wave of protest inevitable if there is no political accommodation between the PJD and the monarchy that allows the government to fix what it needs to?

A: (Grant) There are fears that the primacy of the King could lead to a circumventing of the reform process. Future protests are largely dependent on economic performance. If the PJD is unable to improve the economy then protests are likely. The government response to the economic situation is key.

(Arieff) It is difficult to gauge the satisfaction with the reforms. The populace seems willing to give the PJD a chance, especially since the rest of the region provides such a negative example of what happens with violent protests that set out to overturn regimes.

Q: (Malka) What of Islamist movements, do they have a chance to reinvigorate the protest movements?

A: (Pham) Moroccans are largely happy with the direction of reforms - there may be arguments about the speed, but the government has maneuvering room. It is also important to keep in mind that the "Moroccan street" is really a varied bunch that has a broad range of desires. Some protesters are protesting so that the ministries will offer them jobs, while others are genuine protesters in the American sense of the term. Moroccans by and large reject extremism although there is always a small fraction of the populace that will buy-in, especially in such an extremist region.

Q: (This was a comment about the situation in Western Sahara and the refugee camps. No question was asked.)

A: (Pham) I just want to comment on this situation. One of the important things to keep in mind is that the US pays for these camps, but lacks basic information about how that money is spent. The US doesn't even have information on the number of people in these camps. This is an interesting situation I don't think you see anywhere else.

Q: (Kevin Coin, Project on Middle East Democracy) What about the changes in freedom of expression in Morocco with the recent beatings and arrests?

A: (Arieff) There are two issues which are limited in Morocco; one is direct criticism of the King and the other Western Sahara issue. In practice, tolerance for expression has waxed and waned. Broadly there has been acceptance of expression in Morocco, especially over the February 20 Movement. Recently, it seems the government has gotten more extreme in its response to smaller protestors, although there has been no official policy change. Interestingly the PJD has prosecuted more people both for insulting the King as well as insulting Islam.

(Grant) The King, Western Sahara, and Islam are the three taboos in Morocco. The press has been allowed more freedom, but there are clear redlines. There are no real rules - the lines are somewhat arbitrary. There has been progress in recent years, but limits remain on press freedoms.

(Pham) I think it's important for the regional context to be kept in mind. The amount of information, range of information, and the tolerance in Morocco are substantially better than in any other country in the region.

Q: (Malka) What of Algeria and the regional relationship?

A: (Grant) There is always an opportunity, the recent confidence building measures are a good start. There is, however, a broader conflict between the two than just the Western Sahara. This is over regional dominance and status.

(Arieff) The potential is there. High level Algerians have often mentioned a "new start," but there have been few concrete signs.

(Pham) Regional cooperation is in the interests of all states. This shouldn't be made at the expense of the realities on the ground. The US has soft-pedaled the Algerian relationship because Algeria is important to the region. The US has downplayed the connections to Malian rebels and this needs to be addressed before regional cooperation.

Q: (Tony Bullock, Ogilvy) What is the view of the Moroccan government and the Polisario on groups in Mali?

A: (Grant) The MNLA was condemned by Morocco as an independent state in northern Mali. This antagonized the Berber population in Morocco. There might be the potential here for a transnational Berber identity. This is something that bears watching.

(Pham) I don't know about the Polisario, they haven't released anything yet. There are real dangers of a new failed state within the region. While the record of the Malian government towards its Tuareg population wasn't great, the dangers of a failed state in the area are much greater. The breakdown of the state will open the region for many terrorist and drug trafficking groups and has the potential to destabilize the entire region.

(Grant) Secession would not be viewed kindly by any African government.

(Arieff) At this point we're looking at either consolidation or conflict between the Islamist groups. The issue has moved past the Tuareg issue. Morocco is really worried about this situation, which could provide impetus for increased regional cooperation. Kidnappings in the camps also threaten the international image of the Polisario. This situation is threatening to everyone in the region.

Q: What is the US and international policy on resource extraction from the Western Sahara?

A: (Arieff) I am not a lawyer - that is a question for the State Department.

5. Observation

There were about 60 people attending this event. The audience was comprised predominately of interns and staffers from Congress, but a few regional experts attended as well. This was an excellent panel about the status of Morocco's reforms. The discussion of these reforms was comprehensive and very supportive to Morocco. The uniqueness of the Moroccan reform path in a region known for repression was stressed again and again. There was brief discussion of the dangers and hurdles that Morocco faces in the near future, but these were downplayed.

July 2012 Events Bulletin

July 12

Democratic Transition in the Middle East: Between Authoritarianism and Islam

July 19

The Federal Budget and Appropriations for FY2013: Democracy, Governance, and Human Rights in the Middle East and North Africa

July 31

Finding a Way Forward: The US, Morocco, and a Changing North Africa

Democratic Transition in the Middle East: Between Authoritarianism and Islam

Date: 12 July 2012

1. Title: Democratic Transition in the Middle East: Between Authoritarianism and Islam

Hosted by the National Endowment for Democracy

Participants:

Mokhtar Benabdallaoui: Reagan-Fascell Democracy Fellow, the National Endowment for Democracy; Director, Doctoral Center for Studies for Politics and Religion, Hassan II University

Samer Shehata: Assistant Professor, Georgetown University

Zerxes Spencer: Moderator: Fellowship Manager, Reagan-Fascell Democracy Program, the National Endowment for Democracy

2. Overview

This event highlighted the research of Mokhtar Benabdallaoui, a Spring 2012 Reagan-Fascell Democracy Fellow at NED. Benabdallaoui addressed why Islamists have embraced democracy instead of fundamentalism and why the appeal of Islamists exceeds that of leftists and liberals in the Arab world. He assessed the challenges of shaping Islamist political thought in a democratic direction, the prospects of Islamist governments accepting diversity and differences of opinion, and the ways in which Islamists may reconcile conflicting religious and political ideas from across the Arab world. Drawing upon the example of Islamist political parties in four countries—Morocco, Tunisia, Egypt, and Lebanon—Benabdallaoui considered how ascendant Islamists have influenced societies across the Middle East and concluded with an assessment of the main stakeholders in the Arab Spring, their propensity for reform, and the prospects for further change in the region. Samer Shehata provided comments on the presentation and the paper.

3. Summary

Benabdallaoui began with a description of the similar characteristics of the revolts within the Middle East. These uprisings were all spontaneous, which the governments of the region and the world failed to predict, they all had minimal central planning, the protests were organic, and the people involved were from a diverse background. The uprisings were unpredictable due to the prevalent, but wrong idea, especially among the Arab regimes, that Arab culture and democracy were incompatible. The new forms of media, like facebook and twitter, along with new social factors, like rising levels of education, urbanization, the nuclear family structure, and women's involvement in society, also went largely unnoticed by the regimes and increased the chances for popular uprisings.

Benabdallaoui next discussed the reasons for the different outcomes of these revolutions - why some resolved peacefully and others descended into violence. A strong allegiance to tribe, sect, and religion caused some of these revolts to slip into bloodshed and civil war, like in Libya, Syria, and Yemen, because societal participation was based narrowly around these factors. High levels of social integration on the other hand caused successful, non-violent transitions. Social integration caused identity to be formed around citizenship and allegiance to the nation, thus allowing for smoother transitions. Another important variable was the level of institutionalization among these societies. Low levels of institutionalization, marked by unpopular "inherited presidencies," encouraged disaffected citizenry to join in protests and become heavily involved with the Arab Spring. An institutionalized military, with loyalty to the nation over tribe or sect, encouraged smoother transitions as they were less likely to shoot their countrymen on orders of a discredited leadership.

Benabdallaoui felt that it was important to distinguish between social Islamization and traditional political Islamism, which Western scholars often conflate. Social Islamization is spontaneous, is a source of collective and individual identity, and can be an assertion of modernity. Traditional political Islamism, in contrast, is imposed from the top-down, is used to mobilize and govern instead of being an expression of belief, and is a complete model for behavior and governance. Political Islamism is a political order, a social model, an economic theory, and an ethical framework. Once a political group focuses on a single aspect of political Islam there is the real danger of radicalization. Groups with a narrow focus tend to boil identity down to a narrow issue, which limits the expression of more complete identities. An emphasis on ethnicity leads to racism while an emphasis on religion leads to fundamentalism. Benabdallaoui underscored that democracy is good form of governance, particularly in this context, because the emphasis is on diversity and the dangers of a narrow focus are averted.

Benabdallaoui went on to discuss the transition from classic/traditional political Islamism to what he called the new Islamism. Traditional Islamism is rigidly orthodox, dogmatic, fundamentalist, and totalitarian. These trends are not tied to Islam; any system that bases its legitimacy on religion will exhibit these characteristics. Society has begun to shift to a more inclusive version of Islamism, the new Islamism. This shift can be seen in the changing goals of Islamists; for example, many have dropped the idea of a religious caliphate and are moving towards an acceptance of democracy. New Islamism has also dropped the idea of implementation of Sharia, considers mosques as purely places of worship instead of political or propaganda centers, and has accepted the idea of a civil state, which offers, among other things, legal equality to all citizens and women's rights. He also stressed that political Islam is a diverse movement based on numerous interpretations of religious texts.

Benabdallaoui next discussed the state of Arab countries and provided an analysis of major trends in the Arab world, classifying groups of countries according to six distinct categories. First, he began by evaluating several individual countries that have revolted, but that cannot yet be placed in any definitive category. Tunisia has had the best transition by far, largely due to its excellent leadership, well-integrated society, and historical ties to Europe. Egypt has also had a fairly good transition. Libya's transition was dependent on NATO and external actors, without which it would have descended into civil war, thus showing the continued importance of the international community. Due to tribal divisions, Yemen has been mired in civil war. Second are those countries in the Throes of Change, including Bahrain and Syria. These countries were characterized by high levels of sectarianism. Third, Countries of Reform were Jordan and Morocco, which were characterized by a fast and reform-focused regime response to internal unrest followed by inadequate implementation. He highlighted Morocco's reforms as being limited, especially in areas like human rights and press freedoms. Fourth, Countries of Continuity, which includes GCC countries. These countries can buy-off their populations, but this is a quick-fix and unsustainable in the long-term. These countries have merely postponed the day when they will have to address the grievances of their populaces. Fifth were the Countries of Ostensible Exception: Algeria, Sudan, and Iraq. These are countries which have largely escaped large-scale protests, but this is due to recent and devastating wars/civil wars which left the populations more concerned with day to day survival than democracy. Once there is stability within these countries they will most likely have to face protests and civilian unrest. Finally, there is the Exception, which is Lebanon. Lebanon is the only Arab state which is "controlled by society". There is a democratic oligarchy within Lebanon which brings about stagnation and decay in the political system, but also a certain amount of tolerance among the sects which are forced to work together.

Benabdallaoui next went more in-depth about the issues which Egypt, Tunisia, and Morocco have to face in the near future. The primary concern of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt is the economy and job creation. The Brotherhood may be willing to make concessions to the US, on Israel for example, in order to gain economic support. The problem is that any Israel concession would make them unpopular so the Brotherhood must weigh these two priorities and carefully balance them. He believes that the military can play a constructive role and will push the Brotherhood to be more open to political opponents. He views Tunisia and the Ennahda party as a model for other countries in transition. Turning to Morocco, Benabdallaoui stressed that the PJD is a group that wants to solve the economic and social problems of the country. The problem is that they have been given no real power and the party serves as the scapegoat for the King. The weakness of the PJD is due to the fact that the party has a weak mobilization capacity and there is a fractured political arena, which limits the capacity for change in the country. The Justice and Charity movement in Morocco bears further study as a group which focuses on bottom-up change and has distanced itself from the February 20th Movement.

Benabdallaoui next discussed where political Islam stands today and what the future holds for these groups. It must be kept in mind that many votes for Islamists were protest votes against the existing regime and these groups are not as popular as they appear. He believes that inclusion of Islamists will moderate them and they should therefore be included in the political process. The fact that Islamist parties are in power in much of the region is a good thing because they will spur intra-regional trade because of friendly connections between these movements. The religious identity of these movements gives them the maneuvering room to launch reforms touching on religion that secularists would be unable to accomplish. He is confident that the new Islamism is spreading and that Islamists are on the path to democracy.

Benabdallaoui concluded his presentation with an overview of US policy options in the region. The US has two options: it can either continue to rely on authoritarianism at an increasingly high cost, with poorer results, or the US can rely on democracy. Democracy will promote cultural exchange, freedom, and economic opportunities because all Islamists share free market ideas. Democracy will also serve the US goal of regional stability.

Samer Shehata gave a critique of the paper and presentation. He began by saying that both were excellent and he had only small points to make. One was that the project was very ambitious and expansive, perhaps too much so, and he stressed that political Islam was extremely important and understudied. Shehata critiqued the lack of an examination of distinctions and differences between the states saying, that "Egypt is not equivalent to Tunisia". He also wanted more discussion of the differences between the various Islamist groups, mentioning that the PJD is very different than Hezbollah and the local context quite different as well. He lamented the lack of a discussion on political economy and the related question of a youth bulge, which is vital to understanding the Arab Spring, and mentioned that the discussion of the militaries within the region could be expanded upon. He also pointed out that the reasons for the inclusion of the distinctions between social and political Islam was unclear. Benabdallaoui concluded by quickly responding to a few points; he mentioned that he included a discussion of political and social Islam because the two seemed so often conflated in the West.

4. Q & A

Q: (Yaffine Borffman, Asia Center) Does Hezbollah have a chance to introduce Sharia in Lebanon?

A: It is not a possibility or a goal for Hezbollah. In Lebanon, one sect can't govern alone and needs the support of several other groups, which increases the political openness and tolerance for other groups in the country.

Q: (William Zartman, SAIS) What is the role of the salafists in these various countries?

A: Their role is crucial. Salafists consider religion to be a personal choice and have only become political very recently. Salafists have very different religious interpretations depending on the country.

Q: (Lahita Fennale, Female Muslim Lawyers for Human Rights) There is a lot of talk about 'principles of Islamic law,' but these are not written anywhere. What are these principles?

A: Things like justice and equality. The sentences in various documents, like constitutions, are very different from the principles of Sharia, which are more general.

Q: (Mark Platter, International Forum for Democratic Studies) How does Iran fit into your categories?

A: Iran's position is weaker and weaker within the region, Hezbollah's as well. Hezbollah will have difficulties remaining in power, especially with Syria in conflict. In fact, Hezbollah is one of the few ways for the Syrian regime to get support or have a safe haven. Syria might start relying on Hezbollah instead of the former situation.

Q: (Jonathan Potton, Stimson Center) How have the monarchies of Morocco and Jordan managed to survive?

A: It relates to the lack of legitimacy, which drove the popular response. In the monarchies, the response to popular dissatisfaction was very fast and the regimes had a high level of legitimacy because they could claim descent from the Prophet. This is another reason why Islamists are important. As religious actors they can compete with the monarchies for their religious role. The interaction and debate over religion will serve to de-sacrilize the public sphere because it opens Islam up for debate.

Q: (Dan Liebermann) Do you think that external influence would push civil war into revolution in countries like Yemen and Syria?

A: It is certain that without NATO, Qaddafi would have won. In some cases like Libya ,external actors are vital. Yemen is different though. In Yemen, the splits are within groups, within tribes - not between groups.

Q: What of the youth? How much do leaders understand dignity and youth engagement?

A: Dignity is important; there is no answer without dignity. This is why the GCC can't resolve its problems with money. They can only put off the time when their populations will demand dignity and respect.

Q: (Georgetown University) What is the role of the security forces and the impact on legitimacy due to the use of these forces?

A: Security operations can limit legitimacy. In Morocco, the 1970's were very difficult times, but didn't impact the legitimacy of the regime. The issue of inherited presidencies is more important when looking at legitimacy. Also the fast response of the crown in Morocco to unrest convinced people that there was a chance for reform.

Q: (Mahjid al-Salaami, journalist from Palestine and Gaza) Is the democratic transition in Gaza with Hamas a possible example for the region?

A: Hamas and Fatah have actually lost a lot of credibility in the last two years. The majority of the people do not support either Hamas or Fatah. The issue of the Sinai border is going to be determined by Morsi depending on if the Brotherhood will prioritize the economy or its popularity.

5. Observation

This event was attended by around 60-70 people who formed a good mix of interns, students, professionals, and academics. This presentation was a very good overview of the results of the Arab Spring at this particular moment and provided a good categorization of the countries in the region. The discussion on political Islam was very informative and descriptive, addressing some concerns with political Islam without equating political Islamism with the broader religion. This presentation can address, and refute, many claims and denigrations of Islam as being incompatible with democracy and Islamists being equated with terrorists. The presentation did gloss over much of the potential for back-sliding in the region and underplayed certain negative aspects to the Arab Spring, like the role of the Egyptian military for example. The presentation is a good optimistic viewpoint on the Arab Spring, Islamists, and the future outlook for democracy in region.

\(Back to top\)

.....

The Federal Budget and Appropriations for FY2013: Democracy, Governance, and Human Rights in the Middle East and North Africa

Date: 19 July 2012

1. Title: The Federal Budget and Appropriations for FY2013: Democracy, Governance, and Human Rights in the Middle East and North Africa

Hosted by the Project On Middle East Democracy (POMED)

Panelists:

Stephen McInerney: Executive Director, POMED

Tamara Cofman Wittes: Senior Fellow and Director, Saban Center for Middle East Policy, the Brookings Institution

Jennifer Winsor: Associate Dean for Programs and Studies, School of Foreign Service, Georgetown

Cole Bockenfeld: Moderator: Director of Advocacy, POMED

2. Overview

As many countries in the Arab world embark on political transitions of various types and others continue to protest authoritarian rule, US funding and assistance for the Middle East will have far-reaching implications for the region's future as well as the nature of American policy and relations. As uprisings broke out across the Arab world, President Obama promised in May 2011 that the US would support democratic principles with "all of the diplomatic, economic, and strategic tools at our disposal," and that this support would take precedence to other strategic interests. Though the Administration deserves credit for intensifying its focus on support for democracy, it has failed to fulfill the commitments of last May's lofty pronouncement. POMED's event brought together experts to analyze and discuss the Administration's approach to budgets, spending, and foreign assistance in the region, and to also interpret what that means in terms of the Administration's broader priorities and thinking vis-à-vis US policy against the backdrop of dramatic political changes.

3. Summary

Steve McInerney, author of POMED's report on the Federal Budget and Appropriations for FY13: Democracy, Governance, and Human Rights in the Middle East and North Africa, opened by touting the Obama Administration's successes in Tunisia. Considering the virtual nonexistence of a bilateral aid package between Washington and Tunis before Ben Ali's ouster, American policymakers mobilized resources incredibly quickly, demonstrating impressive agility and creativity in providing much-needed support. US aid to Tunisia increased from $2 million in January 2011 to approximately $200 million today. US aid has also been critical in supporting transitions in Libya and Yemen. US support for Jordan has also dramatically increased, where the Obama Administration is energetically supporting reform. Assistance elsewhere, however, has undergone few dramatic changes. In fact, the administration's commitment to supporting serious democracy and governance promotion in many GCC states, Lebanon, and the West Bank and Gaza has diminished. The past year has seen a dramatic escalation of tensions between the US and Egypt driven in large part by Egyptian government attacks on NGOs, including the criminal prosecution of employees of American democracy promotion organizations. As a result, US assistance to Egypt, which traditionally has occupied the center focus in the region, is colored by a troubling uncertainty. Funds aimed at bolstering the Egyptian economy rather than democracy promotion, however, are met with less resistance.

The structure of military aid to the region is excessively rigid and inflexible, making any adjustments or rebalancing between military aid and economic aid extremely difficult. While the Arab uprisings have sparked some discussion among key actors about the possibility of shifting a greater proportion of US assistance to economic aid as opposed to military aid, that process is greatly impeded by long-term agreements on military aid and by the influence of US defense manufacturing companies. This holds especially true in Egypt, where policymakers encountered difficulties revising the aid relationship to properly respond to the facts on the ground.

Tamara Wittes discussed the broader challenges posed by the current budget environment and presented several recommendations for maximizing assistance funds to the region. The US must leverage its funds, devising a creative and flexible strategy to get the most out of investments. Money should be lumped into a regional fund and allotted to specific countries upon satisfaction of certain requirements; this will “incentivize good behavior” and provide policymakers with flexibility. The Administration requested $9 billion in foreign assistance for the Middle East and North Africa—an 11.6 percent increase over the current levels for FY12. Most of this increase can be attributed to the request of $700 million in funding for the MEPI Incentive Fund. Congress has slashed international affairs budgets in recent years, resulting in decreases in funding for every other region in the world; as such, the Administration has shown creativity in finding sufficient resources for the MENA region within a decreasing overall budget. Wittes also echoed McInerney’s call to shift away from military assistance and toward support for enterprise, democracy efforts, and civil society capacity-building.

“The US responds to crises, not opportunities,” Jennifer Winsor began. This trend transcends Presidents. After the fall of the Berlin wall, American policymakers doled out massive amounts of money in an attempt to transform the countries of Central and Eastern Europe into democracies. However, the process did not happen overnight as policymakers as hoped. Democratic transformation takes place over decades, not in the heat of a crisis. The US must invest in a country’s civil society to properly build the foundation for democracy, rather than endeavoring to enact immediate change. The situation in the Arab countries is even more complex than post-Cold War Europe; there is no clear-cut “good guys vs. bad guys” dichotomy. American Administrations never do enough to promote human rights and democracy. US objectives in Egypt, for example, are completely unclear. Policymakers’ activities there are conflicting and inconsistent.

4. Q & A

Q: Democratic transitions can be slow and grueling. How should the US remain patient and engaged in such a difficult environment?

A: (Wittes) This is true, the US must practice strategic patience to ride out a bumpy transition. In the past, however, we supported democratic transitions in South Korea, the Philippines, and Taiwan, after having supported autocrats in those countries quite robustly. We need to consistently and clearly articulate universal democratic principles and core political rights—equality, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, etc.

Q: US-Egypt bilateral relations desperately need to be reset, but the SCAF vehemently opposes any reduction in military assistance. Is conditionality in this instance an effective tool for leveraging US assistance?

A: (Wittes) There are two possible ways to leverage US assistance—retrospectively, which essentially involves sanctions and tends to produce some negative feelings on the part of the recipient, or prospectively, which requires recipients to meet conditions to continue receiving aid. The prospective model is increasingly attractive and employed by projects like the Millennium Challenge Fund and the MEPI Incentive Fund.

(Winsor) We want to get the most bang for our buck. Even if they are ultimately unsuccessful, Congress must pressure the Administration to put more emphasis on human rights and democracy.

(McInerney) Support for democratic principles absolutely must be a priority. In Morocco, for example, more support would go far. We can no longer afford to waive conditions for human rights and democracy in the name of national security. Algeria's most recent elections, for example, were fraudulent at best, and the US said nothing.

Q: Is interest in Libya waning as the country moves from a conflict zone to a post-conflict country?

A: (McInerney) More assistance to Libya would be helpful. Substantial direct support in conjunction with civil society organizations focused efforts on the elections and election monitoring, which already happened. Prior to US assistance, Libyan political parties and civil society organization had little to no capacity. The US played a modest, but critical role in the success of Libya's elections. Now that the elections have passed, the proper strategy and focus for engaging in Libya is not entirely clear.

(Wittes) Until last October, Libya was a conflict zone so aid centered on humanitarian supplies. We were successful in our efforts to help Libya implement a social infrastructure. Now, moving past the conflict situation, Libya is a wealthy country. Money to invest in the country can come from within—from the government. US assistance can focus on civil society organizations that the government neglects to assist.

Q: Is this the time to discuss changing aid to Israel from a more regional perspective?

A: (Wittes) I don't see a failure to bringing Israel into the picture. Military assistance undoubtedly dominates economic assistance, and this needs to be redressed. A balance must be struck, just as in other countries in the region.

Q: The US-Egypt aid relationship desperately needs revisiting—the average Egyptian is not even aware that Egypt receives US aid—what does this tell us?

A: (Wittes) Our aid relationship to Egypt has been almost exclusively government-to-government. The NGO crisis reflects the SCAF's reluctance to alter the nature of assistance; they want assistance, but only in a manner they can control. However, it is crucial to remember that none of our interests can be met if we fail to invest in democracy and good governance. Stability in Egypt and in the region as a whole—which is absolutely crucial to achieving our security interests—will not be established until governments undergo democratic reforms; conflict will persist until the people feel their demands are being heard. The question of how to invest is not an interests-versus-values issue. Promoting democracy and good governance benefits both our interests and our values.

5. Observation

Approximately 40 professionals, journalists, students, and members of the policy community attended this event, which launched POMED's FY2013 report on US foreign assistance to the Middle East and North Africa. The panelists' remarked that the Administration's ability to continue to provide foreign assistance to the Middle East and North Africa at relatively consistent levels, with moderate and steady increases, represents a success in today's constrained budget environment. Looking beyond the numbers, however, US assistance to the region relies too heavily on funds for security support rather than democracy and human rights efforts. In his testimony, Stephen McInerney said that more direct assistance for governance and democracy programs in Morocco would go far, and in his report, he wrote that the Morocco is a "permissive" environment for this kind of work. Compared to countries like Egypt and many of the Gulf States, where US governance programs have been met with resistance, Morocco has been a receptive partner. The event and report cast Morocco in a very positive light, and made a case for increasing US direct assistance to Rabat.

POMED Report Morocco Section:

In general, Morocco appears to have undertaken more serious reform in the past 18 months than most other states in the region, but without seriously shifting political power from the monarchy to elected institutions as demanded by protesters. US assistance to Morocco is rather modest and has not seen any significant changes in reaction to the events of 2011; it is the smallest aid recipient of the seven Arab countries with a USAID mission and a longstanding assistance relationship. Funding requests for FY13 are consistent with what has been provided over the past few years—a total of $32.6 million, including $15.1 million in security assistance, $7.7 million in assistance for democracy and governance programming, and $9.7 million in other economic aid. The democracy and governance program in Morocco is the smallest such program in any country in the region with a significant aid relationship. This is surprising given Morocco’s sizable population, the very high demand for civil society and political party development aid, and the relatively permissive environment for such work. The next year, however, will offer some real opportunities to reconsider the structure of US assistance to Morocco and address concerns that governance and democracy programs are too small in scope and excessively focused on improving the technical expertise of government institutions. In the next year, USAID is scheduled to complete a five-year strategy to guide its programming from 2012-2017. Several of USAID’s multiyear programs in Morocco will be completed in FY13, which will leave room for new projects to begin in FY14 in line with the new five-year strategy.

For a complete copy of the report, please visit:
<http://pomed.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2012/07/FY2013-Budget-Report-web.pdf>

\(Back to top\)

.....

Finding a Way Forward: The US, Morocco, and a Changing North Africa

Date: 31 July 2012

1. Finding a Way Forward: The US, Morocco, and a Changing North Africa

Hosted by Kosmos Energy
 Capitol Visitors Center, Congress

Participants:

- Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal: Ambassador to the United States, the Kingdom of Morocco
- Alexis Arieff: Analyst in African Affairs, Congressional Research Service
- Dr. Audra Grant: Political Scientist, RAND Corporation
- Dr. J. Peter Pham: Director, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, the Atlantic Council
- Haim Malka: Moderator: Deputy Director and Senior Fellow, Middle East Program, Center for Strategic and International Studies

2. Overview

This educational event provided a forum for discussing current events in Morocco and the broader Maghreb region. The targeted audience included legislative assistants, as well as senior foreign policy and homeland security staffers to Members of the House and Senate.

3. Summary

Haim Malka mentioned that Morocco typically has a low priority in news and for policymakers because Morocco rarely has crises. This is a mistake since Morocco is an important regional ally for the US in a region that is increasingly "consequential" for US policy. The goal of the discussion was to examine the public debates and the socio-economic challenges that Morocco faces.

Ambassador Bouhlal gave a brief history of the bilateral relationship that Morocco has enjoys with the US. Her stressed Morocco's commitment to reform under Mohammad VI, and emphasized that in all these reforms Morocco has been careful to include public participation and encourage feedback.

Audra Grant focused on the changes that Morocco has undergone since the Arab Spring. She stressed that Morocco has a long history of liberalization under both King Mohammad VI and his father King Hassan II. The regime's constitutional reforms in 2011 helped to prevent the destabilization that occurred in other parts of the Arab world. According to Grant, what prompted these reforms was the February 20th movement, which, unlike other Arab Spring protest movements, was peaceful and wasn't focused on ending the regime. The reforms prompted by the protests liberalized the political system and limited monarchical power. Grant emphasized that Morocco is unique in the Arab World because the regime has legitimacy due to the monarchy's historic religious legitimacy, the fact that is has promoted stable governance, and that the monarchy has promoted sustained liberalization. The protest movement was also fractured in terms of its goals and methods and the quick reaction of the monarch in offering reforms served to limit the political crisis. Morocco traditionally absorbs political dissent through reforms. Despite these reforms, the King maintains supremacy in critical policy areas and the populace has shown less confidence in the political institutions in recent years. Problems of high unemployment, poverty, and the Western Sahara issue must be overcome.

Dr. J. Peter Pham discussed the specifics of the constitutional reform and what they mean for Morocco. He stressed that keeping the context of these reforms in mind was important to understanding the importance of Morocco. Due to the constant reformist nature of King Mohammad VI and the final years of King Hassan II, issues that drove populations to revolt in other countries were often already dealt with in Morocco. Human rights abuses were dealt with by the reconciliation commission and reparation payments, for example. The Arab Spring sped up the reform process with the new constitution. Pham stressed the uniqueness of these reforms compared to the rest of the Arab World. Morocco is the only country to acknowledge multiple sources of its culture - Arab, Berber, African, and others - in its constitution. Morocco also puts forward a more liberal version of Islam in its constitution, stating only that Islam is the religion of the state, instead of basing law solely on Sharia as in being raised in most other Maghreb countries. The new constitution also put the Amazigh language on an equal footing with Arabic and placed limits on the King's power.

Alexis Arieff examined both the nature of the reforms and the US-Moroccan relationship. She agreed that the reforms have strengthened the Prime Minister, the legislature, and the judiciary, but stressed that the King still retains his position as the "ultimate arbiter" in the Moroccan system. Due to the quick reforms offered by the King, he nevertheless still retains his public popularity and legitimacy. The wrangling of the PJD with the palace over many issues has shown that the new arrangements in the constitution have been put into practice.

Arieff stressed that the US views Morocco as a strong ally and partner in the region. The Administration has been very supportive of the reforms and is comfortable working with the PJD, operating on the idea of 'actions being more important than words/philosophy.' Morocco has been supported by Presidents from both parties and has been cooperative on issues ranging from Syria to trade and terrorism. In terms of Western Sahara, the US continues to support a negotiated solution that keeps the stability of Morocco in mind.

4. Q & A

Q: (Malka) Are the Moroccan people satisfied with the reforms? Is a new wave of protest inevitable if there is no political accommodation between the PJD and the monarchy that allows the government to fix what it needs to?

A: (Grant) There are fears that the primacy of the King could lead to a circumventing of the reform process. Future protests are largely dependent on economic performance. If the PJD is unable to improve the economy then protests are likely. The government response to the economic situation is key.

(Arieff) It is difficult to gauge the satisfaction with the reforms. The populace seems willing to give the PJD a chance, especially since the rest of the region provides such a negative example of what happens with violent protests that set out to overturn regimes.

Q: (Malka) What of Islamist movements, do they have a chance to reinvigorate the protest movements?

A: (Pham) Moroccans are largely happy with the direction of reforms - there may be arguments about the speed, but the government has maneuvering room. It is also important to keep in mind that the "Moroccan street" is really a varied bunch that has a broad range of desires. Some protesters are protesting so that the ministries will offer them jobs, while others are genuine protesters in the American sense of the term. Moroccans by and large reject extremism although there is always a small fraction of the populace that will buy-in, especially in such an extremist region.

Q: (This was a comment about the situation in Western Sahara and the refugee camps. No question was asked.)

A: (Pham) I just want to comment on this situation. One of the important things to keep in mind is that the US pays for these camps, but lacks basic information about how that money is spent. The US doesn't even have information on the number of people in these camps. This is an interesting situation I don't think you see anywhere else.

Q: (Kevin Coin, Project on Middle East Democracy) What about the changes in freedom of expression in Morocco with the recent beatings and arrests?

A: (Arieff) There are two issues which are limited in Morocco; one is direct criticism of the King and the other Western Sahara issue. In practice, tolerance for expression has waxed and waned. Broadly there has been acceptance of expression in Morocco, especially over the February 20 Movement. Recently, it seems the government has gotten more extreme in its response to smaller protestors, although there has been no official policy change. Interestingly the PJD has prosecuted more people both for insulting the King as well as insulting Islam.

(Grant) The King, Western Sahara, and Islam are the three taboos in Morocco. The press has been allowed more freedom, but there are clear redlines. There are no real rules - the lines are somewhat arbitrary. There has been progress in recent years, but limits remain on press freedoms.

(Pham) I think it's important for the regional context to be kept in mind. The amount of information, range of information, and the tolerance in Morocco are substantially better than in any other country in the region.

Q: (Malka) What of Algeria and the regional relationship?

A: (Grant) There is always an opportunity, the recent confidence building measures are a good start. There is, however, a broader conflict between the two than just the Western Sahara. This is over regional dominance and status.

(Arieff) The potential is there. High level Algerians have often mentioned a "new start," but there have been few concrete signs.

(Pham) Regional cooperation is in the interests of all states. This shouldn't be made at the expense of the realities on the ground. The US has soft-pedaled the Algerian relationship because Algeria is important to the region. The US has downplayed the connections to Malian rebels and this needs to be addressed before regional cooperation.

Q: (Tony Bullock, Ogilvy) What is the view of the Moroccan government and the Polisario on groups in Mali?

A: (Grant) The MNLA was condemned by Morocco as an independent state in northern Mali. This antagonized the Berber population in Morocco. There might be the potential here for a transnational Berber identity. This is something that bears watching.

(Pham) I don't know about the Polisario, they haven't released anything yet. There are real dangers of a new failed state within the region. While the record of the Malian government towards its Tuareg population wasn't great, the dangers of a failed state in the area are much greater. The breakdown of the state will open the region for many terrorist and drug trafficking groups and has the potential to destabilize the entire region.

(Grant) Secession would not be viewed kindly by any African government.

(Arieff) At this point we're looking at either consolidation or conflict between the Islamist groups. The issue has moved past the Tuareg issue. Morocco is really worried about this situation, which could provide impetus for increased regional cooperation. Kidnappings in the camps also threaten the international image of the Polisario. This situation is threatening to everyone in the region.

Q: What is the US and international policy on resource extraction from the Western Sahara?

A: (Arieff) I am not a lawyer – that is a question for the State Department.

5. Observation

There were about 60 people attending this event. The audience was comprised predominately of interns and staffers from Congress, but a few regional experts attended as well. This was an excellent panel about the status of Morocco's reforms. The discussion of these reforms was comprehensive and very supportive to Morocco. The uniqueness of the Moroccan reform path in a region known for repression was stressed again and again. There was brief discussion of the dangers and hurdles that Morocco faces in the near future, but these were downplayed.

\(Back to top\)

.....

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, August 31, 2012 6:48 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring

FYI

Blog Name	Update Title/Date	Summary	Comments	Respond?
The View From Fez	More Turbulence for Morocco's Troubled Airline Industry August 25, 2012	Royal Air Maroc has been fined for violating baggage handling rules and imposing additional undisclosed fees to customers. This issue was also at the root of ONDA's recent problems with Easyjet and Ryanair. Both airlines complain of increased costs to fly to Morocco, Ryanair declaring that Morocco violated a contract and "impos[ed] a new monopoly handling company" which drove up costs. This has increased the damage to Morocco's tourism industry which "is being rocked by the withdrawal of a large number of flights by low cost airlines" like Ryanair and Easyjet.	0
Magharebia	Libya opens doors to Moroccan workers August 24, 2012	Moroccans who fled Libya after the outbreak of the revolution are now returning. With a poor job market at home many Moroccans have sometimes been forced to look abroad. Ahlam Chenbouti's husband "struggled to find a job and after several long months of being out of work, he has decided to return to Libya." The recent visit of the Libyan Prime Minister, who promised to improve working conditions encouraged this trend. Moroccans living in Europe are returning to their home country because of the economic crisis and Morocco has put "support mechanisms" in place for those returning permanently.	0
Magharebia	Morocco postpones trial of M20F activists August 26, 2012	A Casablanca court, on August 24, postponed the trial of six activists from the youth-led February 20 Movement until August 31. The defendants were arrested on July 22 and charged with participation in an unauthorised rally. The court also rejected a defence request for the provisional release of the detainees.	0
Magharebia	Moroccans stage peaceful marches August 27, 2012	Morocco's youth-led February 20 Movement staged demonstrations on August 26 to demand the release of detained activists and political prisoners. Under heavy police presence, about 400 protesters marched through the streets of Casablanca's Bernoussi quarter. Some 200 people also rallied in Rabat. "We want to peacefully express our demands for greater social justice," activist Younis Fikri said. According to the Moroccan Human Rights Association, nearly seventy February 20th members are currently detained in various cities of the kingdom.	0

Magharebia	School year puts budget strain on Moroccans August 28, 2012	With the beginning of the school year falling just after the end of Ramadan, many Moroccan families find their budgets strained. School expenses have been increasing. At the same time equal access to education and the quality of the system are beginning to be questioned by political parties like the Socialist Union of Popular Forces. National Education Minister Mohamed El Ouafa has promised upgrades to educational infrastructure and teaching standards.	0
Magharebia	Power cuts transformed Ramadan in Algeria August 29, 2012	Residents of Algeria were frustrated with the government over "repeated blackouts" during the month of Ramadan due to higher than normal demand. Blackouts, often followed by a cut-off of water services, generated a wave of protests and riots in Algeria this summer. In response, the government "decided to launch a major investment programme worth $2.5 billion" which will more than double power generation by 2016. Sonelgaz, the company running the power grid, "was expecting assistance from the government for the expansion programme in light of [the companies] obligation to hold prices steady."	0
Magharebia	Rabat man jailed for public eating August 29, 2012	A young Moroccan protester received a three-month jail sentence for eating in public during the holy month of Ramadan, AFP reported on August 28. The Rabat court on Friday also ordered him to pay a fine. Young Moroccans formed an online protest group last month called Masayminch ("We're not fasting") to defend the right of non-believers to eat, drink or smoke in public during Ramadan.	0
Magharebia	Families of kidnapped Algerian diplomats hope for release August 30, 2012	Al-Qaeda splinter group Movement for Tawhid and Jihad in West Africa (MUJAO) extended the deadline given to Algerian authorities to August 31st before carrying out its threat to kill one of the Algerian diplomats held since April. The group is asking for the release of several members held in Algerian custody. Maraouan Ezzi, a lawyer close to the reconciliation file in Algeria, said ransom is unlikely given the UN initiative to criminalise the practice. "Algeria will use its good relations with dignitaries and tribal chiefs in northern Mali to reach a solution to the case and ensure the return of diplomats."	0
Mamkafinch	James Traub Responds August 27, 2012	James Traub responds to Mamkafinch's critique of his Foreign Policy piece which, he says, misunderstood his position on Morocco's "third way." Traub was "not endorsing either the attitude of the outside world or Moroccan policy." Traub differs from the critics saying that the new Constitution does provide meaningful changes, assuming the legislature and executive "have the will to grasp them." Traub believes that if the PJD doesn't "seize its mandate" popular protests will resume and Moroccans will, over time, lose reverence for the King making him " a more direct target of their criticism."	0
Reuters	Jailed Western Sahara activists stage 48-hour hunger	Twelve activists from the disputed Western Sahara began a 48-hour hunger strike inside a prison in the Moroccan-controlled city of Laayoune to denounce their detention conditions. Morocco's Communication Minister Mustafa el-Khalfi said authorities were not aware of the hunger strike.	0

	strike
	August 24, 2012
AllAfrica	Morocco: Ban Ki-Moon Welcomes Leadership of HM King Regarding Lofty International Ideals	"Ban Ki-Moon commended the leadership of HM King regarding the lofty international ideals and highlighted the significant contribution of the Kingdom of Morocco, an active member of the Security Council and a major contributor to peacekeeping operations." Ban also praised the King for his international commitments to "preventing conflict and consolidating sustainable peace." The UN will not, however, be removing Chris Ross as envoy to Western Sahara.	0
	August 25, 2012
AllAfrica	Morocco: Moroccan Journalist Wears His Heart On His Sleeve	Journalist Omar Radi, a member of the February 20 Movement, has challenged the Moroccan government over controversial laws like public eating during Ramadan and the sexual laws of the country. He was a spokesman for MALI a group which "open[ly] flaunt[ed]... the Islamic obligation to fast during the daylight hours of Ramadan." He also supports greater press freedoms but says there has been no improvement since Benkirane took over as PM since "[t]he government has no power whatsoever.... [i]t is the Palace which decides on the limits of what is allowed."	0
	August 29, 2012
Bikyamasr	UN rebukes Morocco calls for Western Sahara envoy change	The United Nations has refused pressure from the Moroccan government to change its peace envoy to the Western Sahara. Morocco accused UN envoy Christopher Ross of being "unbalanced and biased." Ban Ki-moon's office reported that "the United Nations does not intend to modify the terms of its mediation, whose purpose is to promote the achievement of a mutually acceptable political solution to this conflict."	1
	August 26, 2012
Morocco News Board	RFK Ctr's Kerry Kennedy: Political Operative or HR Activist?	Kerry Kennedy, the President of the Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights, arrived in Laayoune leading a human rights delegation to "Moroccan Sahara" and the refugee camps. "Our delegation will seek to assess the human rights situation on the ground," said Kennedy. The Center's statements, "may seem... to encourage the United Nations to create a new human rights entity in the region but the truth is that it will hurt the Moroccan territorial integrity and promote a totally negative image of Morocco as a brutal violator of human rights in the region." The RFK Center has "become a political broker" instead of a human rights group.	2
	August 26, 2012
Morocco News Board	RFK Center Kerry Kennedy Champions Western	The Robert Kennedy Center has been heavily biased against Morocco and in favor of the Western Sahara separatists during its trip to Laayoune, excluding groups from its meetings "that don't agree with their point of view." Leaders of the delegation, Kerry Kennedy and Mary	0

	Sahara Separatists Position August 28, 2012	Lawlaor, show "blatant bias." "It is unclear on what basis Kerry Kennedy and the RFK center claim to be 'independent'" as Algeria finances the RFK Center. The Center seeks to support the Polisario by creating a "biased report on human rights situation" in the Tindouf camps.
The Daily Star	Morocco economic crisis weighs on consumer confidence August 27, 2012	Morocco's consumer confidence index fell for the third straight quarter. A majority of households expected food prices to continue rising over the next 12 months, alongside a decline in the standard of living. The European economic crisis is cutting growth forecasts amid price rises and simmering social discontent.	0
The Blog	A Brush With Morocco's Secret Police in Laayoune, Moroccan-Occupied Western Sahara (Photos) August 27, 2012	Kerry Kennedy writes about an incident where she witnessed the beating of Soukaina Jed Ahlou, President of Sahrawi Women Forum by Moroccan police. The police were both uniformed and undercover and several other Sahrawi's witnessed the beating. Kennedy's daughter snapped several photos of the incident and other photos of Ahlou were taken after her release from the hospital.	42
New York Times	Morocco Is on the Path to Change August 28, 2012	The Arab monarchies have survived the Arab Spring because they are linked to national identity and are the traditional arbiters of society. Monarchies have stayed above the fray of politics by creating other institutions to represent the people. "Morocco and Jordan... are trying to satisfy their citizens by liberalizing instead of democratizing." These countries are attempting to keep the status quo with limited reforms. This can't "indefinitely quiet the restive middle classes" who want real pluralism and participation, but it's a start.	8
Defence Professionals	Lockheed Martin Delivers Final F-16s to Morocco August 30, 2012	The final three of 24 F-16 fighter aircraft for the Royal Moroccan Air Force have departed Lockheed Martin's facility in Texas on their way to their new home in Morocco. "We are modernizing our fleet and we've chosen the F-16, not only because it is a high-quality airplane, but also because of the close relationship we have with the United States," said Deputy Inspector of the Royal Moroccan Air Force, Brigadier General Abdelali Houari. "The delivery of these aircraft places Morocco among the very elite group of air forces of the world who operate the advanced multirole F-16," said Ralph D Heath, executive vice president of Lockheed Martin's Aeronautics business.	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, September 09, 2012 4:34 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algeria situation report

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

September 4, 2012

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- Ahmed Ouyahia has been replaced by Abdelmalek Sellal as Prime Minister, at the head of a new government.
- Sellal is close to Bouteflika – in whose successive election victories he has played a key role – and also to DRS chief Tewfik, a sign that the Bouteflika-Tewfik tandem is still functioning.
- A clutch of old-guard Bouteflika loyalists, including FLN leader Belkhadem and former Interior Minister Zerhouni, have left the government, signalling the decline of the once powerful clan of western Algerians around the President.
- All key ministries – Finance, Foreign Affairs, Interior, Energy, Defence – stay in the same hands as before, and overall there has been little change in the make-up of the government, with just three leaders of tiny, newly established parties, being rewarded with portfolios.
- The departure of Ouyahia may, however, augur a shift in economic strategy, towards more investor-friendly policies.

Foreign Relations

- One of the jihadist groups that now hold sway in northern Mali claims to have executed one of the Algerian diplomats it is holding hostage.
- Algiers remains reluctant either to get involved in military action beyond its own borders or to give its assent for an operation involving French or other non-African forces.
- With Paris pressing for an ECOWAS-led operation with French logistical and air support, Algiers' unease continues to grow.

Security

- Contrary to expectations, there has been no “Ramadan surge” by AQMI, suggesting that the group may be suffering the effects of attrition.
- The south of the country, including the borders with Libya and Mali, have been largely quiet – although it is possible that an undeclared news blackout may be in force.
- The security forces are reported to have captured the head of AQMI's judicial council, who was allegedly on his way to join up with the group's units in northern Mali.

Political Trends

Finally, more than four months after the parliamentary elections that were supposed to be a major way-station on the path to political change, Algeria has a new Prime Minister, in the person of former Minister for Water Resources Abdelmalek Sellal, and a new government. The cabinet line-up unveiled on September 4, exactly 24 hours after it was announced that Sellal would be replacing Ahmed Ouyahia as head of government, is scarcely a radical transformation, however.

All key ministries stay in the same hands as before: Daho Ould Kablia stays on as Interior Minister, Mourad Medelci as Foreign Minister, Karim Djoudi as Finance Minister, Youcef Yousfi as Minister of Energy and Mining and Abdelmalek Guenaïzia as Assistant Defence Minister. Many lesser ministries have likewise failed to change hands, and while technically 15 out of 35 cabinet members are new entries, almost all have either held ministerial positions in the past or worked as senior civil servants in the departments they now head. There is no real political opening: the scenario of handing power (or the appearance of power) to tame Islamist parties, à la marocaine, turned out to be a non-starter long ago, and reported soundings since the elections of parties across the political spectrum with a view to bringing them into government appear to have come to nought, or near to nought: three leaders of tiny, newly established parties who have agreed to play ball – Amara Benyounes of the Mouvement Populaire Algérien, Mohand Oussaïd Belaïd of the Parti des Libertés et de la Justice, and Amar Ghoul^[1] of the TAJ – have been rewarded with cabinet positions, the remainder of the government being made up of members of the RND and the FLN and non-party technocrats, as before. Neither is there much by the way of generational renewal – the average age of incoming cabinet members may be slightly lower than the outgoing government, but scarcely enough for President Bouteflika to be able to claim that he has made good on his implied promise to clear the way for the rising, post-independence generations.

Overall, therefore, the whole operation is more of a reshuffle than a radical break with the past. This is very much in keeping with the established pattern under Bouteflika's presidency, when changes of government have generally been the occasion for at best incremental change. Even so, on closer inspection the advent of the Sellal government does entail some subtle yet potentially significant shifts.

Arguably the most important changes are the departures rather than the new arrivals. Ahmed Ouyahia's removal – expected for months, including by Ouyahia himself – was in a sense balanced by the departure of Abdelaziz Belkhadem, hitherto Minister of State without portfolio and personal representative of the President: on the one hand, this pre-empts speculation that the RND, of which Ouyahia is General Secretary, is losing out to the FLN, headed by Belkhadem; on the other hand, and perhaps more importantly, it removes from government simultaneously both the figures credited with ambitions to succeed Bouteflika in 2014. There have been some suggestions in the Algerian media that leaving government frees Ouyahia to start working seriously on preparing for the presidency, but there is no real indication that this was what Bouteflika intended. Indeed, there has been no sign yet that the succession question has been settled one way or another, and it seems likely that the tops of the regime – Bouteflika, DRS chief Tewfik, and their closest advisors – would rather postpone a decision on this matter (just as they seem to be pushing back to next year, or even beyond, the promised constitutional reform, which, if it were to include the creation of the position of Vice-President, might provide the occasion for designating a de facto successor).

Also of note is the departure of a clutch of ministers who, along with Belkhadem, made up the bulk of the Bouteflika old guard, having served the President faithfully and held ministerial office for the most part uninterrupted since shortly after he came to power in 1999. Belkhadem himself entered government as Foreign Minister in 2000 and took over the FLN from the 'renegade' Ali Benflis in 2005. Other ousted old guard members include Yazid Zerhouni, once Bouteflika's right-hand man as Interior Minister from 1999 to 2010^[2]; Abdelhamid Temmar, who had held various portfolios connected with economic reform since 1999; Hachemi Djiar, a presidential advisor from 1999 to 2004, minister as of 2006; Nacer Mehal, loyal director of official news agency APS from 2000 and Minister of Communications as of 2010; Saïd Barkat and Djamel Ould Abbes, both ministers since 1999. Of these, furthermore, Zerhouni, Temmar, Mehal and Ould Abbes all hail from western Algeria and could be said to one degree or another to be part the clique of westerners that was seen as monopolising power after Bouteflika – himself born in Oujda, Morocco, into a family hailing from Nedroma in the Wilaya of Tlemcen – became President. Belkhadem, although originally from Aflou in the Hauts Plateaux, has also long been associated with this group. There have been signs for some years already that the cohesion and relevance of this “presidential clan” were on the decline; the Bouteflika old guard's exit from government would seem to provide further confirmation that it is largely a thing of the past^[3].

Sellal himself, it is worth noting, hails not from the west of Algeria but from Constantine in the east. In some respects he might be seen as a long-standing Bouteflika loyalist, having served as his campaign manager in the 2004 and 2009 presidential elections and been a member of each successive government of the Bouteflika presidency (generally holding comparatively low-profile portfolios: Youth & Sport, Transport, Public Works and Water Resources). But he is above all understood to be very close to the DRS and to its head, Tewfik – indeed it appears to have been through this channel that his relationship with Bouteflika began, back in 1999, when as interim Interior Minister Sellal played an important role in orchestrating the election of Bouteflika (who owed his selection as the candidate of the military in large part to Tewfik). The elevation of Sellal – a faithful servant of the state rather than a politician in the usual sense of the word, who has no known presidential ambitions – can thus be seen as another sign that the Bouteflika-Tewfik tandem is still operational.

It has been widely suggested that the switch from Ouyahia to Sellal does not augur any changes in terms of policy. In light of the minimal changes in the government line-up that have followed the appointment of Sellal, this might seem to be a reasonable assumption. However it is an assumption that is not shared by one source – a friend of Sellal's who also has regular access to the Presidency – at least as far as economic policy is concerned.

With Ouyahia gone, the source suggests, the “economic nationalist” line that he^[4] championed will be dropped, and Sellal will inaugurate a new swing back to policies that are more accommodating for foreign investors. A more or less abrupt U-turn on investment policy would, once again, be entirely consistent with the pattern established over the years by Bouteflika, who is remarkably un-dogmatic when it comes to economics and who appears to have been subject to lobbying for almost a year now from economic advisors such as Abdellatif Benachenhou to ditch Ouyahia's “failed” eco-nationalist line^[5].

Foreign Relations

As the crisis in northern Mali drags on, it becomes increasingly poisonous for Algiers. On September 1, the AQMI spin-off calling itself the Mouvement pour l'Unité et le Jihad en Afrique de l'Ouest (MUJAO) announced that it had executed one of the Algerian diplomats it kidnapped in Gao this spring, after the Algerian authorities rejected its demands for the freeing of jihadists arrested in Ghardaia on August 15 (see below). The Algerian authorities say they are still trying to verify the reports, but have promised a “painful response” if they turn out to be true. In the meantime, another even more shadowy group, calling itself the Mouvement des fils du Sahara pour la Justice Islamique^[6] has popped up unexpectedly with a video message lambasting the Algerian authorities for failing to take action to protect rank and file Algerian diplomats, demanding the application of sharia in Algeria and threatening to resume armed struggle.

Although it would doubtless like to have done with the Islamist pseudo-state on its southern border, Algiers is in a quandary as to what to do about it. For the time being, Algiers is sticking to its doctrine of no military deployments outside of Algerian territory (which in this case would almost certainly entail the execution of the remaining Algerian hostages), but at the same time seems reluctant to give its assent to anyone else to do the job. In the early summer, Paris and Washington both reportedly pressed Algiers to either take part in an operation against the Ansar Dine-MUJAO-AQMI entity in northern Mali, or at least to give its assent to a joint French-ECOWAS intervention, but the Algerians seem to have been extremely reluctant to agree to any non-African (and a fortiori French) involvement.

In July French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius let slip that the use of force in northern Mali was “probable, at some point or another”, and since then there have been repeated claims that an intervention involving French forces is “imminent”. At the end of July, Alassane Ouattara, President of Ivory Coast and current ECOWAS chairman, told the French press that a military intervention, most likely to be carried out by ECOWAS forces on the ground with logistical and air support from the French, was a matter of urgency and could be expected “within weeks rather than months”. More recently, Algerian daily El-Khabar (31/08) claims to have obtained “leaked Libyan documents” that reveal a French military presence at the Karadabiya air base near Sirt, northern Libya, in which the newspaper sees a sign of French preparations for war in northern Mali^[7].

At the beginning of September, Mali's interim President Dioncounda Touré is reported to have formally requested a military intervention by ECOWAS forces to reconquer the northern half of his country from the jihadist groups that now hold sway there – an initiative that was announced, rather tellingly, via the French Foreign Ministry's website. There seems to be some hope that an intervention sanctioned by both ECOWAS and the African Union (together, perhaps, with the United Nations), as opposed to a joint French-ECOWAS operation, might win Algeria's approval. But the fact remains that ECOWAS will be hard pushed, in terms of personnel and logistics not to mention air power, to put together an adequate force, and so the question of French involvement remains posed, at least implicitly.

And the Algerians still appear to be extremely wary of this. The French involvement in overthrowing Col. Qaddafi in neighbouring Libya is still a fresh and bitter memory, and Algiers takes an equally dim view of Paris' support for the opposition to President Bashar Al-Assad of Syria. Viewed from Algiers, developments on Algeria's borders and in the broader region merely confirm apprehensions which, viewed from the outside, appear almost paranoiac. As Algerian daily L'Expression (07/09) puts it, when discussing the role of MUJAO:

The geopolitical situation in Mali is, of course, complex. Nonetheless, it is worth pointing out that there are unmistakable clues. Why are the Sahrawis mentioned by MUJAO every time [it makes a statement], amplified by Agence France Presse? “Who, apart from Morocco,” asks Sahrawi Foreign Minister Mohamed Salem Ould Salek, “has been trying for 30 years to sully the reputation of the Sahrawis and, by extension, Algeria, which supports the independence of the Western Sahara in accordance with the will of the UN?” Even so, at the level of the UN Security Council, Morocco enjoys the protection of a world power, which has major interests in Mali, and also in Morocco. Since the Libyan episode, that same power has been the ally of Qatar and is hostile towards Algeria, which represents a genuine stumbling-block for its neo-colonialist strategy.

Security

After a relatively quiet June, jihadist activity picked up in July and August, returning to levels comparable with the average recorded over previous months. July saw a total of 25 reported security incidents, of which 19 were AQMI-initiated operations, and August saw a total of 25 incidents, of which 15 AQMI operations. Contrary to expectations, the “Ramadan effect” failed to materialise this year: the holy month of fasting, seen as particularly propitious for jihad and martyrdom, has often been the occasion for AQMI to intensify its efforts, and in particular to launch suicide bombings, but this year’s Ramadan (July 20 to Aug. 20) saw 19 AQMI operations, barely higher than average, and no suicide operations at all^[8]. This stands in remarkable contrast to last year’s Ramadan, which coincided with August and saw 30 AQMI operations and 40 incidents over all, including two suicide bombings, suggesting that AQMI’s operational capabilities in the north of the country are being worn down – giving the lie to last year’s alarmist reports that the organisation was being strengthened by inflows of weaponry and explosives from Libya.

Apart from the killing of a jihadist by the army near the town of Meftah on the southern approaches to the capital, on August 21, Algiers and its environs remained quiet. Even AQMI’s stronghold in Kabylia was unusually calm in August, with only three operations initiated by AQMI recorded for the whole month; the security forces, on the other hand, were relatively active in tracking jihadists down (in just one incident on August 30, according to a Defence Ministry statement^[9], the army killed as many as nine jihadists in the area of Béni Amrane in central Boumerdès).

The south has also been remarkably quiet – although it is possible that this may in part be due to an undeclared news blackout. Only one incident was recorded on Algeria’s southern borders over the summer: according to Echorouk, on July 23 the security forces using helicopters intercepted “a convoy of AQMI and MUJAO fighters” near Tinzaouaten, wilaya of Tamanrasset, on the border with Mali, destroyed three offroaders and killed all 12 men on board and recovered 14 Kalashnikovs. The jihadists “had been trying to hijack fuel tankers”, according to the Arabic-language daily – seemingly in order to supply the AQMI/MUJAO/Ansar Dine alliance which controls northern Mali, which has been subjected to a fuel embargo since their takeover in April. Three weeks later, on August 15, security forces manning a roadblock at Berriane, Wilaya of Ghardaia, arrested three members of AQMI heading for northern Mali, reportedly including Tayeb Necib (aka Abderrahmane Abou Ishak Essoufi), head of AQMI’s “judicial council” and a member of the organisation’s council of elders.

For his part, AQMI’s national emir Abdelmalik Droukdel (aka Abou Mosaab Abdelouadoud) issued an audio recording around August 28 in which he berated the Algerian authorities for their treatment of Syrian refugees in Algeria, “which borders on persecution”. “These brothers came to Bouteflika seeking refuge from Bashar,” he said, “only to find they have jumped from the frying pan into the fire”. Syrian refugees “were taken in” by the Algerian regime’s lip service to “self determination and national liberation” and failed to notice that the Algerian government “has opposed all Arab revolutions and considered the revolutionaries to be criminals; so no wonder it is treating Syrian refugees like criminals”.

END

^[1] Ghoul, who was a member of the MSP, broke with Bouguerra Soltani’s moderate Islamist party when it opted to quit the government, essentially to be able to hold onto his ministerial position, subsequently founding the TAJ on no clear ideological basis.

^[2] The position of Deputy Prime Minister that was created for him after he gave up the Interior portfolio in 2010 has now been abolished, its prerogatives never having been clearly defined.

^[3] It is, however, worth noting that there are a couple of throwbacks to the early years of the Bouteflika presidency among the newly appointed ministers, notably the new Health Minister Abdelaziz Ziari and the new Housing Minister Abdelmadjid Tebboune, who both held various ministerial positions in the first years of Bouteflika’s presidency as well as serving as presidential advisors and/or diplomatic messengers.

^[4] And, it might be added, Yazid Zerhouni.

^[5]

See AMSR #109, September 30, 2011.

- [6] Movement of the Sons of the Sahara for Islamic Justice. An organisation going by a similar name was said to have been responsible for a handful of raids on oil companies in south-east Algeria in 2007, and possibly also for an attack against military aircraft on the tarmac at In Amenas airport in the same region, but had not been heard of since.
- [7] Even though, according to El-Khabar, the Libyan document says French “experts” are there to train and aid Libyan forces. On September 3 the same newspaper said a “Western manned surveillance plane” crashed in the Hamada Hamra area in the Libyan desert, close to the border with Algeria. The crew “was immediately rescued by helicopters”. The newspaper did not say what country the aircraft or personnel belonged to.
- [8] Shortly before the beginning of Ramadan, on August 1, police foiled what appears to have been an attempted vehicle-borne suicide bomb attack against the security headquarters of Khenchela (east).
- [9] The very fact that the Defence Ministry issued a formal statement is unusual: the Algerian authorities generally do not report terrorist or security incidents officially and newspaper reports are usually attributed to “informed security sources”.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, September 09, 2012 5:09 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: 2nd Quarter 2012 Journal Article Review
Attachments: SR_2QJournalArticleMailingAugust2012.docx

Please find our 2nd Quarter 2012 Journal Article Review. Our research team compiles and reviews recent journal publications relating to Morocco, the Maghreb, and MENA on a quarterly basis. Clicking on any article title below will link you to the executive summary for the article as well as MAC recommendations on the relevance of the article. You can also find publication information, and, where available, a link to a copy of the article. In the event that no link is posted, please email me for a copy of the article. We hope that this information will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on recent journal articles and help to keep you up-to-date on publications and academic trends.

Please do not forward this bulletin as it contains our evaluations of the articles and is proprietary information.

'Change Within Continuity': The Equity and Reconciliation Commission and Political Reform in Morocco

Emerging Order in the Middle East

Le Maroc et le printemps arabe dans un monde en plein changement \(Morocco and the Arab Spring in a Changing World\)

Morocco's New Constitution and the Western Sahara Conflict – a Missed Opportunity?

The Rise of Islamist Actors: Formulating a Strategy for Sustained Engagement

Silent Complicity: The International Community and Algeria's Democratic Façade

The Ties that do not Bind: The Union for the Mediterranean and the Future of Euro-Arab Relations

The Union for the Mediterranean, or the Changing Context of Euro-Mediterranean Relations

Writing as Resistance: Berber Literature and the challenges surrounding the Emergence of a Berber Literary Field in Morocco

Youth Perceptions in Morocco: Political Parties in the wake of Legislative Elections: Findings from Qualitative Research in Morocco Conducted in March and April 2012

.....
'Change Within Continuity': The Equity and Reconciliation Commission and Political Reform in Morocco

Rachel Linn
 The Journal of North African Studies, Vol. 16, No. 1, March 2011

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article examines the Instance Equite et Reconciliation (IER) in Morocco. The article argues that the IER, formed by royal decree, represents "an attempt by the palace to co-opt a critical public discourse on past abuses into a state-managed forum". The opposition was willing to go along with this cooption because they felt that it would increase the opportunities for democratization. This divergence in objectives greatly impacts the chances for implementation of the commission's recommendations, but the commission has responded to the demands of the majority of the victims and reflects the social and cultural values of Moroccan society.

The IER was established by King Mohammed VI in January 2004 and was the first Truth Commission to be held in Arab-Islamic country. The IER was formed to investigate four decades of “forced disappearances, arbitrary detention, and torture from Moroccan independence in 1956 to 1999.” The regime presented the IER as proof to the international community that Morocco was enlightened on human rights and was committed to democratic reform. Controversially, the IER was limited by a stipulation that no individual perpetrators were to be implicated in its work. The IER was unique amongst Truth Commissions for several reasons. The IER did not occur following a regime change, but instead from an “unbroken, powerful regime.” All other Truth Commissions had been preceded by regime change up until this point. The IER was also the first explicit Truth Commission to be held by an Arab/Islamic state.

The article argues that the IER was undertaken due to palace strategies for managing discontent, which “gave rise both to the abuses that necessitated the IER and a gradual reform process” in the 1990’s “that eventually enabled a commission.” The Moroccan King inherited from the French colonial authority a powerful modern state as well as a set of repressive and undemocratic emergency laws. Once the state faced discontent and riots, the “prerequisites for widespread abuse were already available.” King Hassan II launched a repressive campaign from the 1950s until the 1970s, when he began a process of limited political inclusion. This process picked up in the 1990s as King Hassan began permitting consultation and reform in areas that didn’t impact royal prerogatives. During the 1990s, there was increased Western criticism of human rights and democratization, which set the stage for the formation of the IER once King Mohammed VI took over from his father in 1999.

The IER enabled King Mohammed VI to position himself as a reformer, which he solidified by removing hard-line figures from the old regime, such as Interior Minister Driss Basri. The IER was a subject of much debate between regime hardliners, who saw it as showing weakness, and softliners, largely made up of King Mohammed VI’s appointees who argued that targeted reforms could strengthen the monarchy. The King ultimately went with the softliners, perceiving the IER “as a means to disarm public criticism and strengthen his image as a modern, compassionate monarch.”

The IER also served to co-opt many local groups that had previously been in opposition to the monarchy. Many opposition groups/individuals, such as Driss Benzekri, a human rights activist, believed that even though the IER was somewhat gutted and had flaws, it could also “have a positive impact through its ability to propose institutional reforms” and therefore decided to support the commission. The IER was seen as the “best opportunity since independence to push democratic reform”.

The decision not to allow the naming of guilty individuals in the IER was made for several reasons: other examples of similar commissions, like South Africa’s, had succeeded without apportioning guilt, the opposition was skeptical of the judicial system in Morocco, and there was often a lack of evidence to get convictions even if the judicial system were used. Many commissioners felt that it was more important to establish institutional responsibility, for future institutional reform, instead of focusing on criminal sanctions. This focus on social justice and fair treatment, over retribution and punishment, is a cultural and social norm within Islamic societies that encouraged opposition groups to support the lack of prosecution for guilty parties.

The article nevertheless concludes that the ultimate impacts of the IER have been limited. Individual reparations were completed quickly and completely, but reforms to the judiciary, state security sector, and political system have not been implemented. This mixed bag of results is due to the monarchy’s control of implementation of the IER recommendations and the desire of the palace to secure the monarch’s power and societal position. The “majority of the IER recommendations related to institution reform would...involve introducing substantial limits on royal prerogatives” and are therefore blocked. The war on terror has shielded Morocco from outside pressure as both Europe and the US “prioritize concerns for security...and [the] stability of western-friendly regimes in the Middle East and North Africa over concerns for human rights.” The Casablanca suicide bombings of 2003 also dampened some of the internal pressures for reform. The palace uses this freedom of maneuver, in the context of the war on terror, to apply state repression broadly and not limit it to terrorist suspects.

The regional implications of the IER are not yet clear. Immediately after the IER report was published, Morocco sent the commissioners to numerous regional and international conferences, but they were met with limited interest, especially from other Middle Eastern countries. Regional implications are probably limited and the ultimate significance for the IER will depend on the reform process within Morocco itself, largely driven by a King who has “yet [to] demonstrate that [he] is ready to abandon [his] monopoly on power.”

RECOMMENDATION

This piece focuses on Morocco and the IER; however, it is not especially flattering towards the King or the progress that Morocco has made on human rights or democracy. The article does refer to steady reform and liberalization of the country and regime and also points out the King Mohammed VI is very different from his father. The fact that the IER is the first Truth Commission to be launched by the regime which committed the abuses is certainly a bragging point for Morocco. The article criticizes the King for cynical motives and a desire to hold onto power. This article can be used for brief quotes to show marked improvement in the areas of human rights over time as well as some flattering regional comparisons, but the overall impression is rather negative towards the Moroccan monarchy.

\(Back to top\)

Emerging Order in the Middle East

Sinan Ulgen, Nathan J. Brown, Marina Ottaway, and Paul Salem
 Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Policy Outlook, May 2012
http://carnegieendowment.org/files/middle_east_order1.pdf

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article examines the recent rise of Islamist movements and the decline of secular groups in the Middle East. The article looks at some of the underlying causes and broad impacts this rise has had, and gives recommendations for the appropriate Western response. While primarily focused on Egypt and Tunisia, the article examines these changes with a broad regional focus.

Islamic political movements have risen throughout the region on a wave of popular discontent. Islamist movements were the best placed to take advantage of this discontent because they had an “extensive social presence and organizational capacities.” These Islamist movements arose in an oppositional role, challenging the old secular elite. Morocco is posited as a unique case where the monarchy remains firmly in control, but was "forced" to allow the PJD "to form a new government and thus to some extent challenge the old elite."

Islamists, the article claims, are the major winners of the limited democratic changes in the region. They have successfully managed this transition and have begun to build up "structures and comprehensive programs addressing a host of political, economic, and public policy issues" and begun adapting themselves to a democratic system. Even in countries, like Morocco, where the old regime is still in place, the PJD has "accepted limited constitutional reform and taken a leading role in the cabinet." The PJD, like other Islamist groups, has also been insistent on "joining the ruling elite" and becoming politically engaged, which is a break from much of the rhetoric of Salafi groups when they were in opposition. Islamist groups throughout the region have begun to "embrace democratic mechanisms and politics more generally" and they "have ceased to regard themselves as opposition movements and increasingly see themselves as actual or potential governing parties."

Governance, and public notoriety both in the domestic and international scenes, has also pushed these groups to "become more cautious with their rhetoric" to reassure international actors that they can work together, primarily in the economic sphere. Islamic groups do want Western economic help and support, and groups have expressed a willingness to participate in international economic fora. For example, the PJD has already "demonstrated [its] readiness to participate in international platforms of economic dialogue such as the World Economic Forum." That said, there is little that outside actors can do to shape the development of Islamist movements. These groups are not "looking for ideological guidance" and the group solidarity is strong so they are unlikely to fracture due to western "flirtations."

In addition, Islamist movements are primarily domestically focused, which severely limits the West's ability to influence them. In the areas of security sector reform and economics, where instability has adversely impacted economic performance, these movements "show a real interest in learning from the experience of other countries." Demands for acceptance of a "broad ideological agenda" endorsing secularism, for "commitments to core values such as women's rights," or for "cooperation with a full Western security agenda" are all unlikely to succeed. More limited goals, such as maintenance of existing treaty obligations and a general commitment to a peaceful settlement of international disputes, however, might be effective. Western pressure will be most effective if it is "uniform;" the West must begin to "build bridges to entire societies" instead of a small number of elite political actors.

The West must nevertheless be concerned about the rise of these movements for two reasons. First, there are questions about the ultimate goals of these parties and how they will react to holding power. There are dangers that the Arab-Israeli conflict could heat up again and that Islamists could undermine/rollback gains in women's rights. Second, the West should concern itself with the deep divisions between the Islamists and the secular/modernist forces, which were the traditional allies of the West and are now being marginalized. The Arab Spring and the rise of Islamist groups have increased regional instability and created "new risks from terrorist networks." These factors have also had dramatic repercussions for every actor in the region, sinking the popularity of states like China, Russia, and Iran while providing a new starting point for others like Egypt.

The article concludes that the West should attempt short-term oriented policies in order help Arab governments, which are faced with short-term pressures of job creation and fiscal constraints. In order to do this the West can increase financial assistance, provide technical experts on debt management, and help to establish secure and predictable regulatory frameworks for public-private partnerships. The most important consideration for the West, however, is to remain consistent in including Islamists in any discussion of bilateral or multilateral issues. The West must acknowledge that democratic transitions are "long-term complicated processes that do not follow straight-forward trajectories" and act accordingly by supporting a long-term transition to democracy to help countries overcome short-term difficulties.

RECOMMENDATION

This article is helpful for understanding the larger issues of Islamist movements and how their rise during the Arab Spring has impacted the region. There is little specifically on Morocco as the article focused instead on Tunisia and Egypt, which experienced mass protests and regime change. This article does remain broad enough to inform on Morocco and the PJD, but is not specific enough to be distributed widely within MAC. The small bits there are on Morocco are rather anti-monarchy making it seem that King Mohammed VI and Mubarak are on the same level. I would not recommend this article for the MAC site.

\(Back to top\)

Le Maroc et le printemps arabe dans un monde en plein changement (Morocco and the Arab Spring in a Changing World)

Bernabé López García
EUROMESCO

<http://www.euromesco.net/images/papers/papersiemed11.pdf>

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article analyzes political developments in Morocco within the context of the Arab Spring. The author argues that the one uniting factor at the heart of demonstrations – whether in Cairo or Casablanca – was the presence of the youth with shared objectives: more rights, more social justice, more transparency, more control of the political system. This was the situation in Morocco, but there, the government reacted much differently. The author argues that Morocco responded to the protestors' demands the quickest, the smartest, and the most flexibly in the region. However, this does not mean that Morocco should be praised for its reaction, as Western governments and Moroccan political parties jumped to do in the aftermath of the March 9th speech. Although this speech did address many of the demands of the protest movement, including the separation of powers, increased powers for the Prime Minister and Parliament, and independence for the judiciary, among others, the King clearly led the process of constitutional reform, despite the appearance of a consultative process through the Constitutional Commission.

In detailing developments after the March 9th speech, the author makes similar pronouncements. He argues that the new Constitution "incontestably brings significant improvements over the previous one." Notable changes include the supremacy of international law over Moroccan law, the institutionalization of equality between men and women, and the increased responsibility of the head of government and the Parliament. However, for the moment, these are merely statements of intention, as considerable efforts are required to concretize these changes as was the case with the reform of the family code, which clashes with the views of conservative judges and many of society. In addition, despite some obvious improvements, the author argues that the makeup of the political system remains intact: the King reigns and governs, directs the council of ministers, controls religious discourse, and presides over the superior council of the judiciary, thus not granting significantly more power to the people. The author likewise disagrees with the official results of the constitutional referendum – although the voter participation rate was 73%, the government failed to note that the participation rate was only 45% of people of voting age.

He applies the same logic to the victory of the PJD in the November 2011 elections – claiming that the PJD received only 5% of the vote when calculating voter participation of eligible, rather than registered, voters. Nevertheless, the PJD victory was at least symbolically important as the group doubled its share of the votes from previous parliamentary elections. It has a difficult path ahead as it seeks to implement the Constitution and develop a working relationship with the King, who will be consulted on all major decisions. The author views the King's appointment of five royal advisors (Menouni, Azziman, El Himma, Zenagui, and Fasshi Fihri) as evidence that there will be a battle for power between the Palace and the Parliament, but also notes that Benkirane's strong personality and the PJD's relative power within the Cabinet (12 out of 31 ministers) indicate some balance of power. Regardless, it is obvious that the PJD will have to work hard to implement reforms and work to improve the economy in order to meet the demands of the protestors. While they have been isolated, many of their core grievances remain and they will likely reappear if the promises of the Constitution are not realized.

RECOMMENDATION

Despite some words of praise for Morocco's response to the Arab Spring, the author is largely critical of both the process and the outcome, arguing that the political system in Morocco remains relatively intact in spite of the reform of the Constitution and that both the "yes" on the Constitutional referendum and the PJD victory were not indicative of widespread support. It is important to acknowledge that these kinds of arguments are being made, in Europe and the US alike, but I would not recommend this article for further review.

\(Back to top\)

Morocco's New Constitution and the Western Sahara Conflict – a Missed Opportunity?

Anna Theofilopoulou
The Journal of North African Studies, 2012

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article examines Morocco's attempts to introduce political reform following the February 20th Movement protests and also analyzes Morocco's handling of the Western Sahara conflict. In both cases she argues that the Moroccan government has pursued short-term and short-sighted goals that serves to both limit reforms and prevent the ultimate solution to Western Sahara. The article claims that "real democracy in Morocco and the Western Sahara could help both the Kingdom and its adversaries in resolving the conflict."

The article argues that, following the Arab Spring protests in Morocco, the King quickly "tried to pre-empt and co-opt the protestors" by promising change and constitutional revisions. The promises of reform quieted the protests, but the King failed to follow through on the promised changes. Mohammad VI appointed a committee of experts to draft the constitution, which was "headed by a constitutional law professor with a history of condoning autocracy." The King also set up a consultative body, which was deemed illegitimate by many protest groups who refused to participate. Once submissions to the consultative body were made "there was no follow up or debate" and the constitutional draft was only shown to the group only one day before the King presented the constitution in a televised speech during which he announced the date for the Constitutional referendum to take place two weeks later.

The referendum was similarly stacked against the protestors by the King. Muhammad VI quoted a passage of the Qur'an "[enjoining] the public to follow his 'way'" and the Ministry of Religious Affairs "instructed imams to urge a 'yes' vote during Friday sermons." The mainstream parties all supported the Constitution, with the PJD saying that the Constitution contained enough safeguards for democracy. Protestors against the new Constitution staged demonstrations that were met with pro-monarchy crowds, which protestors claimed were "organized and paid by the Ministry of Interior." Voting was also widely seen as fraudulent.

The author notes that the text of the new Constitution "addresses all key demands of the protestors," but "the changes made are less than meets the eye." The events of the 2011 elections show that the Constitution shows that Morocco "has a long way to go towards a real parliamentary monarchy." The 45% turnout for voting in the parliamentary elections, while 8% higher than previous elections, shows the "cynicism, indifference, and apathy" of Moroccans who felt that "it would not really matter whether they voted or not." Benkirane, leader of the PJD party that won the most seats in the election, formed his coalition with the caveat that the only party definitely excluded from talks was the royalist PAM. On December 7, the King appointed Fouad Ali El Himma, founder of the PAM, as one of his advisors, which served to end Benkirane's hopes that he would have direct contact with the King. The formation of the new government "followed the pattern of previous such formations in Morocco with the palace having a strong hand" in the choice of ministers. The changes of the new Constitution can thus be seen as purely cosmetic changes while the monarchical system remained firmly in place.

The article argues that Morocco's handling of the Western Sahara conflict has followed a similar trend of seeking to do the bare minimum without offering fundamental change. For example, Morocco has accepted UN proposals for resolving the conflict "in principle," but with the intention of interpreting them to secure Moroccan interests. Morocco relocated thousands of people into Western Sahara in order to create facts on the ground and to skew voting lists to be used in a referendum to determine the status of Western Sahara, in Morocco's favor. Morocco also attempted to influence MINURSO to accept this population as legitimate residents of Western Sahara while proceeding to "inject resources into [Western Sahara], by building up its cities, developing its infrastructure, and by providing financial aid and other incentives to thousands of Moroccans to move [into Western Sahara]." Internationally, Morocco attempted to influence the Security Council, specifically France, so that "decisions would benefit the Moroccan position."

During all this time the primary goal of Morocco was to deadlock and "delay the process" while expecting friendly nations to step in to support Morocco's interests. Once MINURSO had settled on the voting lists, Morocco appealed all rejected voters as a stalling tactic. King Hassan II was willing to consider alternative solutions to the “zero-sum game of the [UN] Settlement Plan,” but the Minister of the Interior, Driss Basri, “convinced the King to remain with the Settlement Plan.” Upon ascending the throne, Mohammad VI was willing to consider new plans, but “it was a case of too little too late.” Autonomy plans, put forward by each of the actors, were rejected by the Polisario, Morocco, or both. James Baker, Personal Envoy for Western Sahara, put forward an autonomy plan which Morocco stalled on and “employ[ed] all means in its disposal...to get Baker to change the proposal” until finally rejecting it in 2004. Morocco’s stalling and negative reactions to several proposals led the UN to attempt to salvage something of MINURSO’s efforts by passing Resolution 1541, which “weakened the [Security] Council’s support of the Peace Plan” and led Baker to resign. These two events were hailed as “a triumph of Moroccan diplomacy” by the Foreign Minister.

The Moroccan autonomy plan was announced in 2007, but the Security Council was “not quite prepared to recognize Moroccan sovereignty over Western Sahara.” Instead the Security Council passed Resolution 1754, which set the stage for formal and informal meetings between the conflicting parties where “nothing resembling negotiations” happened in either the formal or informal setting. Instead, Resolution 1754 “set the path for irresolution for the conflict,” which served Morocco’s short-term interests in preventing any non-Moroccan solution to the conflict. In furtherance of this, Morocco has also expanded its lobbying efforts in the US Congress and news media where “individuals without real grasp of the conflict present simplistic views on how the conflict could be resolved using solely the Moroccan proposal,” which shows Morocco’s continued “strategy of short-sighted inflexibility.”

In conclusion, the article states that the new Constitution has failed to change the Moroccan political system in any meaningful way. The Constitution’s impact “depends on the way it is implemented,” as “the text has potential.” Realizing this potential requires the Parliament to adopt legislation and provide the maximum space for “political forces,” which Parliament is unlikely to be able to accomplish. Those in power in Morocco still believe that “cosmetic changes and repression will bring the desired results” obviating the need for real reforms. Similarly, “Morocco never had a long-term strategy for resolving the Western Sahara conflict, other than to insist on its sovereignty over the Territory,” and has actively avoided referendums which Morocco would have won had it “followed a well-thought strategy of winning over the local Saharan population.” Given Morocco’s history, it is now impossible to trust that Morocco will negotiate fairly or stand by its promises in the Western Sahara, dooming its own autonomy plan. As a study on autonomy arrangements in non-democracies by Khakke shows “autonomy can only truly exist within a democratic system,” which is a conclusion that Moroccan authorities continue to ignore. Moroccan supporters must stop “blindly supporting [Morocco’s] every position” and instead must demand more “in terms of its internal politics” and “in its handling of the Western Sahara conflict.”

RECOMMENDATION

This article is very critical about both Morocco’s recent constitutional reforms as well as Morocco’s handling of the Western Sahara issue. While the tone of the article is very negative, many of the facts cited and the history presented show Morocco in a favorable light. Morocco is mentioned specifically as pouring money into infrastructure and development of Western Sahara and there are quotes from opposition members praising the constitutional reforms. Even the article admits that much of the impetus for reform has been left to the Parliament and that the text of the Constitution provides an opening for meaningful change to occur. This article shows even those negatively disposed towards Morocco admit that Morocco has its bright spots. The article really fails to prove its thesis and fails to make a connection between the Western Sahara conflict and the democratic reforms. The two topics seem very much divided in the paper; it isn’t until the conclusion that the Khakke study, which apparently shows a link, is even mentioned and even that is briefly and poorly explained. The discussion of Western Sahara ends in 2009, well before the protests even occurred. The connection between the two issues, the crux of the paper, is very vague and anomalous. While the tone is very negative, this article provides a source for favorable quotes and facts that come from a source biased against Morocco and can be useful in that regard.

\(Back to top\)

.....

The Rise of Islamist Actors: Formulating a Strategy for Sustained Engagement

Quinn Mecham

Project on Middle East Democracy Policy Brief, April 27, 2012

http://pomед.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2012/04/POMED-Policy-Brief_Mecham.pdf

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Recent electoral victories among Islamist political parties as well as the emergence of new Islamist actors across the Middle East and North Africa necessitate a new strategy for American engagement in the region. In the past, US policymakers prioritized their relationships with singular actors in authoritarian regimes, taking little stock of Arab countries’ domestic politics. These regimes opposed US engagement with Islamist parties—many of whom comprise the groups rising to power today—and American diplomats chose to prioritize their existing relationships with regime leaders. As a result, the US has found itself ill-prepared to understand the rise of these now victorious political parties in the context of a new political dynamism. US policymakers must abandon the old model and reach out to new actors based on the degree of their political relevance, rather than their perceived alignment with US positions. Meaningful engagement with Islamist groups provides the opportunity to support pluralism, strengthen evolving political institutions, and positively impact political processes in Muslim countries.

Some Islamist groups like Somalia’s al-Shabaab or transnational groups like al-Qaeda use political violence to achieve their ends, but the last decade has witnessed an explosion of Islamist political parties which reject violence and have competed in elections in over 20 countries worldwide. The success of Turkey’s Justice and Development Party (AKP), for example, has highlighted the political opportunities that exist for moderate Islamist parties which focus on more universal political values rather than strict implementation of Sharia. Increased political openness throughout the Muslim world has encouraged Islamist groups to blend religious and cultural authenticity with pragmatic political strategies.

US policy toward non-violent Islamist movements and political parties has been inconsistent both across countries and between groups within countries. This has left the US vulnerable to charges of hypocrisy and political discrimination against Islamists. Most frequently, American diplomats rejected engagement with these groups primarily to avoid upsetting existing relationships with autocratic allies. Another motivation underlying this reluctance, however, is American policymakers’ fear that their engagement with Islamists could be perceived as an endorsement of their ideology—an ideology that may differ from US preferences in social or cultural norms, or in support for violence. With the ouster of several long-standing US allies as a result of the Arab uprisings, emerging governments could prove less friendly to a number of US interests, including human rights, liberal democratic values, long-standing economic relationships, and the security of Israel. This new “Islamist challenge” requires a meaningful shift in American policy toward consistent engagement on a wide range of political concerns with some traditionally marginalized, but non-violent Islamist groups.

This shift toward engagement was codified in Secretary Clinton's address to the National Democratic Institute in late 2011—she articulated a belief that Islamist politics can be compatible with democracy and affirmed support for a full democratic transition in Egypt, even if it leads to a government led by members of the Muslim Brotherhood. This shift in US rhetoric has also been met with regular high-level meetings between American policymakers and officials from Islamist parties throughout the region. This is a practical step in the right direction, but it fails to fully recognize the new opportunities that engagement with a broad range of Islamist actors—even those with anti-Western views—can provide to the US. Just as the US misunderstands many Islamist groups, Islamists often misunderstand US interests and behavior. As these Islamist parties begin to formulate foreign policy in their respective countries, their misconceptions about the US could have negative implications for longstanding bilateral relationships. For that reason, consistent engagement on a wide range of issues provides an opportunity to clarify American values and priorities that Islamist groups often fail to sufficiently grasp.

Policy Recommendations:

1. Recognize the similarities between Islamist groups and other political groups, including the way they respond to the political incentives of their systems.
2. Proactively engage with a wide range of Islamist organizations, particularly those that have committed themselves to competing in electoral processes.
3. Distinguish the appropriate level of political engagement based on the political relevance of the Islamic group, not on the basis of its religious ideology.
4. Support political pluralism and equal treatment, without distinction for religion or gender.
5. Promote an independent media and freedom of speech.
6. Work to strengthen legal systems that provide equal access regardless of religious ideology.
7. Publicly reinforce US support for democracy and good governance where Islamist parties operate.
8. Work together with Islamist groups to support freedom of association.

RECOMMENDATION

POMED's analysis and recommendations represent a prevalent narrative in the policy community: US engagement in the Middle East and North Africa must evolve to accommodate a rapidly growing and diversifying body of political actors and must shift from military to economic assistance. The notion that American diplomatic engagement in the region requires reexamination and redesign is a relatively non-contentious issue, but American policymakers disagree on how exactly to proceed. POMED argues that the US should focus efforts on specific actors and groups based purely on their political relevance, while others insist that US engagement should target groups based on their alignment with American policy positions. Morocco's PJD represents the convergence of these two camps—it is the most powerful, politically relevant party in the country, and its moderate Islamic ideology and democratic trajectory coincides with American policy positions. This article is useful in that it highlights the advantageous position of the PJD for engagement with the US; that being said, the article does not directly discuss the PJD.

\(Back to top\)

Silent Complicity: The International Community and Algeria's Democratic Façade

John P. Entelis

Project on Middle East Democracy, Policy Brief, June 28, 2012

http://pomed.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2012/06/POMED-Policy-Brief_Entelis-Algeria.pdf

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Although Algeria suffers from many of the same problems that led to uprisings in other parts of North Africa, the country has not experienced significant political change in the past year. In this article, John Entelis analyzes Algerian politics over the past year to explain this "exception," condemns the international community's failure to engage Algeria to spur political reform, and provides recommendations for renewed US engagement with Algeria.

The conditions that created mass discontent elsewhere in North Africa are present in Algeria, including prevalent youth unemployment, limits on political expression, and widespread corruption. In spite of this, Algeria has not witnessed significant political upheaval in the aftermath of the Arab uprisings. To be sure, protests are a regular feature of Algerian political life and have been long before the Arab uprisings started in late 2010, but they have not yet escalated to demands for regime change. According to Entelis, this is largely because Algeria remains afflicted by the legacy of its civil war in the 1990s, when election results were upset by a military coup; this legacy, combined with oil generated wealth, has inhibited uprisings similar to those in Tunisia, Egypt, and Algeria. In the past year, the anti-regime activity nevertheless intensified, forcing the government to respond, which it did so by lifting the 19-year-old emergency laws, increasing food subsidies, and promising parliamentary elections.

The government sought to portray the latter as genuinely democratic and politically legitimate – a model of democratic participation on par with the experiences of Egypt and Tunisia. They allowed international election monitors and pushed a voter mobilization campaign, stressing voting as a national duty. Yet, in the run-up to the election, two counter narratives also existed, according to Entelis. The first projected the illegitimacy of the election based on low voter turnout of 25-30%, figures based on declining participation rates over the last few elections and widespread political malaise. The second narrative focused on the expected victory of Islamist parties should the elections be free and fair; Islamist-oriented parties developed strong campaigns to get out the vote. When the elections took place in May 2012, both of these narratives proved false. Voter turnout was suspiciously high at 43% and Islamist parties won only 47 seats in the 462-member national assembly, leading many to believe that the vote was seriously fraudulent. As Entelis notes, rather than a step towards democracy, the May 2012 elections were yet another example of political maneuvering from the top, "a smoke and mirrors strategy intended to give the appearance of authentic contestation while preserving the status quo."

The regime pointed to the election results as proof of its legitimacy and was aided by influential members of the international community's in pushing this narrative. Both the US and the EU praised the elections despite widespread reports of fraud. According to Entelis, this is because the US relationship with Algeria is narrowly focused on security cooperation and oil; the US is the largest purchaser of Algerian oil. This policy has come at the expense of democracy and human rights, leading many Algerians to view the US as complicit in the political status quo.

Entelis argues that this policy is a mistake and concludes his paper with several policy recommendations for the US:

- If an opportunity arises, publicly acknowledge the allegations of fraud in the recent parliamentary elections and insist that, as similar events in neighboring countries have proven, manipulating elections in order to preserve an authoritarian political order can have disastrous consequences.
- Establish a bilateral economic assistance package to Algeria, which includes democracy and governance assistance.
- Encourage the Algerian regime to take seriously the need to resolve the Western Sahara conflict with its Moroccan neighbor; failure to do so will both sustain terrorist activity in the region and forestall the transition to a genuine democracy in both countries. In making this recommendation, Entelis argues that Algeria is complicit in the conflict through its financial support of the Polisario despite its claims of neutrality. Its primary objective in its support is to limit Morocco's power in North Africa. Entelis underscores that Algeria must be held accountable for arming and training Polisario fighters and that it can help deescalate the conflict by removing support for the guerilla movement. Entelis also makes reference to language in the FY2013 foreign appropriations bills and advocates including both in a final draft in order to improve human rights in Morocco and force Algeria to take a more accommodating role in the Western Sahara conflict in order to advance regional stability.
- Encourage the Algerian government to explore opportunities for strengthening ties and expanding trade with neighboring countries in North Africa.

RECOMMENDATION

The article is important in highlighting Algeria's veiled attempts at political reform – something that is not as widely discussed as it should be by DC-based think tanks and other experts. It is also important in calling out the United States for its contradictory policies in the Maghreb region – calling for democratic reform on human rights issues in most of the other countries in the region, while remaining silent on Algeria and going so far as praising it. Entelis' argument that this is largely due to the economic and security relationship between the US-Algeria is widely acknowledged, but bears repeating. The article also makes several points that help MAC's messaging on politics in the Maghreb and on the Western Sahara. His recommendation on the Western Sahara is particularly poignant, as it supports much of what MAC has been trying to do over the past few years: force the US to call out Algeria for its support of the Polisario and play a more mediating role in the conflict. Although Entelis recommends that US military aid to Morocco be conditioned, because he also mentions the importance of the House language, this report should be disseminated to our target audiences (and has in fact already been posted on the MOTM website).

\(Back to top\)

.....

The Ties that do not Bind: The Union for the Mediterranean and the Future of Euro-Arab Relations

Oliver Schlumberger
Journal of North African Studies, Vol. 16, No.1, March 2011

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Oliver Schlumberger challenges the viability of the Union for the Mediterranean (UfM) to serve as a normative power with regards to its influence on Arab state members. A primary purpose of the UfM, after it replaced the Euro-Mediterranean Partnership (EMP) in 2008, was to encourage democratization and a closer relationship with Israel. By being a "norm entrepreneur," it was supposed that Europe could encourage "respect for human rights, the rule of law, and pluralistic, inclusive, transparent and accountable modes of political decision making." It fails in these objectives, says Schlumberger, because the structure of the UfM and the actors participating in the institutions all empower, rather than challenge, authoritarian regimes.

Arab regimes have been resistant to pan-Mediterranean economic and political institutions, for two reasons:

- (a) Deteriorated Arab-Israeli relations and an unwillingness, on the Arab side, to enter into what might become a creeping normalization of relations with Israel; and
- (b) Fears about a renewal of what in the past was sometimes perceived as European paternalism.

Cooperation between the Arab members of the EMP and Israel deteriorated at periods of peak Arab-Israeli tensions, such as the 2006 Israeli invasion of Lebanon and the 2008 bombing of the Gaza strip. Arab leaders also pushed against EU dominance of the initiative. As Schwarzer (2009) put it: "No equal partnership has been established between the northern and southern states. The Mediterranean Union is still seen in the southern region primarily as an EU project, if not as a project of French political interests."

Because of Arab leaders' resistance to an institution that they perceived as a challenge to their authority, they were able to insist in changes to the new UfM that broadened their powers and provided checks to European influence. As a result, through actors, institutions, and policies pursued, the UfM has empowered rather than curtailed the authoritarian leaders of the Arab member states.

This resulted from the constituent makeup of the organization. Rather than representing societies within the member nations, "the UfM's institutions almost exclusively represent their respective governments, or rather: heads of state in the majority of Arab cases where these do not form part of the respective governments." This stands in stark contrast to pre-UfM organizations such as the EMP, which favored cooperation at the societal and cultural levels.

Institutionally, actors in the UfM were given greater "ownership" of projects and programs in comparison to the EMP. Effectively this gives the Arab regimes veto power over programs that would support civil society and generate competitors or instability within their respective nations. Given that level of control, "the UfM cannot become a vehicle for any sort of meaningful political reform. By contrast, institutional reform has created an instrument for Arab regimes that makes it yet easier to avoid any reform of domestic autocratic governance."

European actors in the EU have also curtailed their political objectives. "Emphasis," says Schlumberger, "is now placed on joint projects as opposed to larger-scale and more macro-level programmes." Mutual interests in technical co-operation seem to deliberately gain in importance compared to political areas of dissent between north and south.

Accounting for these factors, Schlumberger provides two possible trajectories for the EU – Arab relationship as a result of the UfM. The first, the 'Schuman–Sarkozy Scenario', predicts that admittedly modest foundational links will over time result in deeper integration among UfM parties. The logic of this argument states that after a long period of low-level functional co-operation the UfM may eventually grow and come to "convince Arab rulers to cede power in favour of their hitherto disenfranchised populations. Normalization of relations with Israel and democratization, then, will not come about tomorrow, but they can and will come about."

The alternative, which Schlumberger prefers and dubs the "Realist Scenario" is more grim in its assessment of the UfM's chances to bring about change. Schlumberger reasons that "even a power that might consider itself 'normative' by nature will eventually not run the risk of devising (let alone implementing) policies that contradict its own material interests and preferred policy outcomes in international relations. It will therefore prefer pragmatism and self interest over a normative vision, even if that latter was grounded in a functional logic."

Given this limitation, EU leaders have given up on the spread of democratic reforms beyond rhetorical challenges directed at their own populations. The EU, says Schlumberger, has "largely given up on previously established larger and normatively based foreign policy goals in its relations with the Arab world."

RECOMMENDATION

Significant events have come to pass in the Mediterranean Arab states since the writing of this article. Several of the authoritarian regimes that Schlumberger had believed so entrenched have been toppled. The world is waiting to see whether the democratically elected bodies that have arisen to replace them will significantly differ in their foreign policy towards the European Union. Yet despite the recent uprisings at least two factors will remain the same: the new Arab governments are as reticent to engage with Israel as the old, and they are likely to continue to resist foreign influence in the shaping of their political institutions. Despite the advent of new democracies it is possible that the UfM may encounter similar resistance from Arab actors as in the past.

The article has little bearing on Morocco. The country is not mentioned and the impact of the UfM on Moroccan policies is not explored. A case can be made that the King, who has taken significant steps to empower his nation's parliamentary system since the writing of this article, is not justifiably lumped into the same category as highlighted dictators Ben Ali and Colonel Qaddafi. Ultimately the article is not recommended as reading for MAC at large.

\(Back to top\)

The Union for the Mediterranean, or the Changing Context of Euro-Mediterranean Relations

Federica Bicchi

Mediterranean Politics, 16:1, March 2011

<http://www.tandfonline.com/doi/pdf/10.1080/13629395.2011.547365>

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article examines the formation of the Union for the Mediterranean (UfM), launched in July 2008, and its impacts on relationships within the region. The article argues that the formation of the UfM presents a substantial change in the pattern of Euro-Mediterranean relations away from the previous Euro-Mediterranean Partnership (EMP). The UfM came about because of "the efforts of a minority of countries cajoling a majority into accepting a new initiative". The creation of the UfM was primarily due to the insistence of France, occasionally supported by Spain and Italy. This plan received the acquiescence of Germany and other northern and eastern European countries after changing some provisions to limit the number of changes in shifting between the EMP and UfM. Israel and Turkey have been less supportive of the UfM because of fears that its acceptance would dilute their special relationship with the EU.

The UfM does impose changes on the institutional structure left by the EMP. UfM marks a shift "away from the region-building strategy of the EU," which the EMP supported. The Arab-Israeli conflict also had a greater impact on the formation of the UfM than the EMP, often influencing the speed and substance of the negotiations surrounding the UfM.

RECOMMENDATION

This article has very little to do with Morocco, instead focusing on internal EU negotiations and the impact that regional issues had on these internal negotiations. There is nothing in the article that would warrant putting it on the MAC site or spreading it among the staff.

\(Back to top\)

Writing as Resistance: Berber Literature and the challenges surrounding the Emergence of a Berber Literary Field in Morocco

Stephanie Pousset

The Journal of Nationalism and Ethnicity, Vol. 40, No. 3, May 2012, pp. 373-394

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article examines the creation of a contemporary Berber/Amazigh literature and language, which are politically synonymous, and the attempts by the Moroccan state to deal with this emerging field. This article attempts to show that Moroccan state policies have driven Berber writers to attempt to affirm "Moroccanness" exclusive of "Arabness."

Initially the Moroccan state viewed Berbers as people with “a marginal identity in need of rehabilitation” into the Arab culture of Morocco. The state thus attempted to Arabize education and the public space, thereby eliminating all three major Amazigh dialects. This stance changed in 1994 when King Hassan II allowed broadcasting in the Berber language on national radio. The states acceptance of the Amazigh language(s) has only increased since then with its incorporation into the public school system and the founding, in 2001, of the Royal Institute for Amazigh Culture (IRCAM).

IRCAM has sought to standardize the Amazigh language, partly in order to introduce it into the school curriculum, and to reverse the long-standing association of “Berber” with “opposition.” Activists claim that IRCAM serves to divide the literary field into those that worked for the state and those, declared by the article to be the majority, who radically opposed the “takeover’ of Berber identity by the State.” IRCAM has attempted to impose a uniform alphabet for the writing of Amazigh called Tifinagh. As it stands ,Amazigh can be written in Arabic script, which identifies the author with the Arabo-Muslim regime, or Latin script, which identifies the author as modern, but has negative colonial associations. The creation of a Tifinagh script divorced from any oral tradition has been condemned by many who see it as “a State strategy to fence off the Berber language and confine it to an ‘unreadable’ alphabet for the rest of the world.” The standardization of the language has been met with calls for a “return to local” by many activists. Amazigh writers see this standardization as an attempt at modernization, while activists fear it will create a division between the literary/educated class and the masses, much as Modern Standard Arabic and its many local variations have caused throughout much of the Arab world. The article concludes by stating that contemporary Amazigh literature “has been evolving in parallel with the Berber identity and political movement,” which has linked this literary field with the ethnic and political demands of Berbers.

RECOMMENDATION

This article deals with literary and cultural development, much of it historical, which is of little relevance to MAC. The discussion of the efforts of the State to incorporate Berber language and identity, specifically in public schooling and broadcasting, is interesting, but is brief with no analysis. The author also fails to really examine if/how Berber writers have “affirm[ed] an alternative definition of Moroccanness” and in many instances seems to contradict this assertion. There is little in this article that would be helpful either for dissemination or distribution purposes.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Youth Perceptions in Morocco: Political Parties in the wake of Legislative Elections: Findings from Qualitative Research in Morocco Conducted in March and April 2012

The National Democratic Institute, July 2012

<http://www.ndi.org/files/Morocco-Youth-FG-Report-070212.pdf>

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This report, drawing upon 18 focus group discussions with 160 Moroccans aged 18 to 25 years, “examines attitudes of young Moroccan citizens towards the current situation in their country, major political actors, and recent and upcoming elections.” Drawing on participants of both genders and from across the social spectrum in various areas of the country, the report finds surprisingly consistent attitudes on the topics discussed. The research was conducted between March and April 2012, four months after legislative elections were held.

General Mood

Many young Moroccans are positive about the current political direction of the country. “Constitutional reforms, elections perceived as more transparent, and the victory of the PJD are mentioned by most focus groups participants as positive indicators.” This notwithstanding, some participants express doubt that elections may spur significant change, with some positing that the victory of the PJD was engineered by the regime to calm the streets. Nevertheless, a significant number of participants believe the new government can succeed, and that patience is required - the PJD must be given time to achieve its goals.

Of particular interest to the young respondents was the matter of unemployment. One urban woman declared that unemployment is, “a ghost threatening every graduate.” Another commented on the prevalence of nepotism. “If you go to the United States or France and look for a job, they check and ask about the things you can do; but in Morocco, they ask, ‘who sent you here,’ if you understand what I mean.”

Perspectives on Elections

The overwhelming majority of focus group participants characterized the recent legislative elections as a step forward. The fact that a historic opposition party won the largest number of seats in the Parliament and formed the first government following a constitutional revision is seen as a significant and positive development. Most believe that the elections were conducted in a fair and transparent manner. Yet despite this view, most participants confessed a lack of knowledge about how elections are conducted and the role of elected officials in office. “Bad knowledge about [MP] roles,” said one rural woman, “We haven’t even studied that in school. We studied the history of, say, Britain and France, but never Morocco.” Although most focus group participants acknowledge that they themselves did not vote in the November election, they suggest that they have greater intention to vote in upcoming communal elections.

Attitudes Toward Political Parties

Despite the positive characterization of elections, most participants characterized the general performance of political parties as extremely unsatisfactory. “[Political parties] are always seeking self-interest,” said one respondent. “They promise people lots of things but never act when they win.” This belief is prevalent, despite the fact that participants generally have a very superficial knowledge of party ideologies or platforms. They know and appreciate that most parties have vowed to tackle government corruption, and there is some perception that efforts have been made in this regard. The exceptions to this rule are the PJD and Istiqlal - both parties are universally recognized and can be described by participants in some detail.

Focus group participants link their intention to vote in upcoming elections “to the degree of responsiveness they feel from political parties in listening to and acting on the needs of citizens.”

Perceptions of the New Government

Participants generally hold a positive attitude towards the new government and “associate it with a sense of transparency and urgency.” The PJD is perceived to be a credible party buoyed by its Islamic credentials and legitimate in its efforts to combat corruption. A lack of women in government is disheartening to some. “One thing I don’t like is that while Morocco has been struggling for women’s rights, the party chose only one lady for the new government, which is not fair.”

Participants expressed hopes that the opposition would be productive and work with the new government, rather than just criticize it. There is division over the February 20th movement. Many desire February 20th to remain a force applying pressure from outside the government, and many desire it to be a political party. Others question why the movement is still active now that a constitutional referendum has passed. “Thanks to the movement, lots of things have changed,” said one urban woman. “I think the movement precipitated the reform of the constitution. But I don’t understand why the movement still demonstrates and protests given that lots of reforms are done.”

RECOMMENDATION

This report reveals a relatively positive perception of the PJD - at the time of the focus test. In March and April of 2012 the party, burnished by its Islamic credentials and its promises to reform the government, combat corruption, and reduce unemployment, was still broadly perceived as representing the people and genuinely attempting to resolve the country’s crises. Yet the data is somewhat out of date. In the intervening six months, the PJD’s credibility has suffered - perhaps unavoidably - as corruption and economic difficulties in the country persist.

The value of a focus group is the depth of an explanation it provides on public opinion rather than the statistical data generated by a public opinion poll. While the general favorability of the PJD has faded somewhat since this poll was taken, the information about the issues motivating Moroccan youth still remain pertinent. In this case, the youth express frustration with continuing corruption and unemployment. The PJD, and any other party seeking to hold office, must make a credible and meaningful attempt to combat these problems.

The document is somewhat dated but provides valuable insight into the perspectives of Moroccan youth. As it was effective in bringing about the constitutional reforms of 2011, this demographic is likely to continue to be a meaningful player in future politics. For this reason, the report is recommended reading.

\(Back to top\)

'Change Within Continuity': The Equity and Reconciliation Commission and Political Reform in Morocco

Emerging Order in the Middle East

Le Maroc et le printemps arabe dans un monde en plein changement (Morocco and the Arab Spring in a Changing World)

Morocco's New Constitution and the Western Sahara Conflict – a Missed Opportunity?

The Rise of Islamist Actors: Formulating a Strategy for Sustained Engagement

Silent Complicity: The International Community and Algeria's Democratic Façade

The Ties that do not Bind: The Union for the Mediterranean and the Future of Euro-Arab Relations

The Union for the Mediterranean, or the Changing Context of Euro-Mediterranean Relations

Writing as Resistance: Berber Literature and the challenges surrounding the Emergence of a Berber Literary Field in Morocco

Youth Perceptions in Morocco: Political Parties in the wake of Legislative Elections: Findings from Qualitative Research in Morocco Conducted in March and April 2012

.....
'Change Within Continuity': The Equity and Reconciliation Commission and Political Reform in Morocco

Rachel Linn

The Journal of North African Studies, Vol. 16, No. 1, March 2011

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article examines the Instance Equite et Reconciliation (IER) in Morocco. The article argues that the IER, formed by royal decree, represents "an attempt by the palace to co-opt a critical public discourse on past abuses into a state-managed forum". The opposition was willing to go along with this cooption because they felt that it would increase the opportunities for democratization. This divergence in objectives greatly impacts the chances for implementation of the commission's recommendations, but the commission has responded to the demands of the majority of the victims and reflects the social and cultural values of Moroccan society.

The IER was established by King Mohammed VI in January 2004 and was the first Truth Commission to be held in Arab-Islamic country. The IER was formed to investigate four decades of "forced disappearances, arbitrary detention, and torture from Moroccan independence in 1956 to 1999." The regime presented the IER as proof to the international community that Morocco was enlightened on human rights and was committed to democratic reform. Controversially, the IER was limited by a stipulation that no individual perpetrators were to be implicated in its work. The IER was unique amongst Truth Commissions for several reasons. The IER did not occur following a regime change, but instead from an "unbroken, powerful regime." All other Truth Commissions had been preceded by regime change up until this point. The IER was also the first explicit Truth Commission to be held by an Arab/Islamic state.

The article argues that the IER was undertaken due to palace strategies for managing discontent, which "gave rise both to the abuses that necessitated the IER and a gradual reform process" in the 1990's "that eventually enabled a commission." The Moroccan King inherited from the French colonial authority a powerful modern state as well as a set of repressive and undemocratic emergency laws. Once the state faced discontent and riots, the "prerequisites for widespread abuse were already available." King Hassan II launched a repressive campaign from the 1950s until the 1970s, when he began a process of limited political inclusion. This process picked up in the 1990s as King Hassan began permitting consultation and reform in areas that didn't impact royal prerogatives. During the 1990s, there was increased Western criticism of human rights and democratization, which set the stage for the formation of the IER once King Mohammed VI took over from his father in 1999.

The IER enabled King Mohammed VI to position himself as a reformer, which he solidified by removing hard-line figures from the old regime, such as Interior Minister Driss Basri. The IER was a subject of much debate between regime hardliners, who saw it as showing weakness, and softliners, largely made up of King Mohammed VI's appointees who argued that targeted reforms could strengthen the monarchy. The King ultimately went with the softliners, perceiving the IER "as a means to disarm public criticism and strengthen his image as a modern, compassionate monarch."

The IER also served to co-opt many local groups that had previously been in opposition to the monarchy. Many opposition groups/individuals, such as Driss Benzekri, a human rights activist, believed that even though the IER was somewhat gutted and had flaws, it could also "have a positive impact through its ability to propose institutional reforms" and therefore decided to support the commission. The IER was seen as the "best opportunity since independence to push democratic reform".

The decision not to allow the naming of guilty individuals in the IER was made for several reasons: other examples of similar commissions, like South Africa's, had succeeded without apportioning guilt, the opposition was skeptical of the judicial system in Morocco, and there was often a lack of evidence to get convictions even if the judicial system were used. Many commissioners felt that it was more important to establish institutional responsibility, for future institutional reform, instead of focusing on criminal sanctions. This focus on social justice and fair treatment, over retribution and punishment, is a cultural and social norm within Islamic societies that encouraged opposition groups to support the lack of prosecution for guilty parties.

The article nevertheless concludes that the ultimate impacts of the IER have been limited. Individual reparations were completed quickly and completely, but reforms to the judiciary, state security sector, and political system have not been implemented. This mixed bag of results is due to the monarchy's control of implementation of the IER recommendations and the desire of the palace to secure the monarch's power and societal position. The "majority of the IER recommendations related to institution reform would...involve introducing substantial limits on royal prerogatives" and are therefore blocked. The war on terror has shielded Morocco from outside pressure as both Europe and the US "prioritize concerns for security...and [the] stability of western-friendly regimes in the Middle East and North Africa over concerns for human rights." The Casablanca suicide bombings of 2003 also dampened some of the internal pressures for reform. The palace uses this freedom of maneuver, in the context of the war on terror, to apply state repression broadly and not limit it to terrorist suspects.

The regional implications of the IER are not yet clear. Immediately after the IER report was published, Morocco sent the commissioners to numerous regional and international conferences, but they were met with limited interest, especially from other Middle Eastern countries. Regional implications are probably limited and the ultimate significance for the IER will depend on the reform process within Morocco itself, largely driven by a King who has "yet [to] demonstrate that [he] is ready to abandon [his] monopoly on power."

RECOMMENDATION

This piece focuses on Morocco and the IER; however, it is not especially flattering towards the King or the progress that Morocco has made on human rights or democracy. The article does refer to steady reform and liberalization of the country and regime and also points out the King Mohammed VI is very different from his father. The fact that the IER is the first Truth Commission to be launched by the regime which committed the abuses is certainly a bragging point for Morocco. The article criticizes the King for cynical motives and a desire to hold onto power. This article can be used for brief quotes to show marked improvement in the areas of human rights over time as well as some flattering regional comparisons, but the overall impression is rather negative towards the Moroccan monarchy.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Emerging Order in the Middle East

Sinan Ulgen, Nathan J. Brown, Marina Ottaway, and Paul Salem
 Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Policy Outlook, May 2012
http://carnegieendowment.org/files/middle_east_order1.pdf

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article examines the recent rise of Islamist movements and the decline of secular groups in the Middle East. The article looks at some of the underlying causes and broad impacts this rise has had, and gives recommendations for the appropriate Western response. While primarily focused on Egypt and Tunisia, the article examines these changes with a broad regional focus.

Islamic political movements have risen throughout the region on a wave of popular discontent. Islamist movements were the best placed to take advantage of this discontent because they had an "extensive social presence and organizational capacities." These Islamist movements arose in an oppositional role, challenging the old secular elite. Morocco is posited as a unique case where the monarchy remains firmly in control, but was "forced" to allow the PJD "to form a new government and thus to some extent challenge the old elite."

Islamists, the article claims, are the major winners of the limited democratic changes in the region. They have successfully managed this transition and have begun to build up "structures and comprehensive programs addressing a host of political, economic, and public policy issues" and begun adapting themselves to a democratic system. Even in countries, like Morocco, where the old regime is still in place, the PJD has "accepted limited constitutional reform and taken a leading role in the cabinet." The PJD, like other Islamist groups, has also been insistent on "joining the ruling elite" and becoming politically engaged, which is a break from much of the rhetoric of Salafi groups when they were in opposition. Islamist groups throughout the region have begun to "embrace democratic mechanisms and politics more generally" and they "have ceased to regard themselves as opposition movements and increasingly see themselves as actual or potential governing parties."

Governance, and public notoriety both in the domestic and international scenes, has also pushed these groups to "become more cautious with their rhetoric" to reassure international actors that they can work together, primarily in the economic sphere. Islamic groups do want Western economic help and support, and groups have expressed a willingness to participate in international economic fora. For example, the PJD has already "demonstrated [its] readiness to participate in international platforms of economic dialogue such as the World Economic Forum." That said, there is little that outside actors can do to shape the development of Islamist movements. These groups are not "looking for ideological guidance" and the group solidarity is strong so they are unlikely to fracture due to western "flirtations."

In addition, Islamist movements are primarily domestically focused, which severely limits the West's ability to influence them. In the areas of security sector reform and economics, where instability has adversely impacted economic performance, these movements "show a real interest in learning from the experience of other countries." Demands for acceptance of a "broad ideological agenda" endorsing secularism, for "commitments to core values such as women's rights," or for "cooperation with a full Western security agenda" are all unlikely to succeed. More limited goals, such as maintenance of existing treaty obligations and a general commitment to a peaceful settlement of international disputes, however, might be effective. Western pressure will be most effective if it is "uniform;" the West must begin to "build bridges to entire societies" instead of a small number of elite political actors.

The West must nevertheless be concerned about the rise of these movements for two reasons. First, there are questions about the ultimate goals of these parties and how they will react to holding power. There are dangers that the Arab-Israeli conflict could heat up again and that Islamists could undermine/rollback gains in women's rights. Second, the West should concern itself with the deep divisions between the Islamists and the secular/modernist forces, which were the traditional allies of the West and are now being marginalized. The Arab Spring and the rise of Islamist groups have increased regional instability and created "new risks from terrorist networks." These factors have also had dramatic repercussions for every actor in the region, sinking the popularity of states like China, Russia, and Iran while providing a new starting point for others like Egypt.

The article concludes that the West should attempt short-term oriented policies in order help Arab governments, which are faced with short-term pressures of job creation and fiscal constraints. In order to do this the West can increase financial assistance, provide technical experts on debt management, and help to establish secure and predictable regulatory frameworks for public-private partnerships. The most important consideration for the West, however, is to remain consistent in including Islamists in any discussion of bilateral or multilateral issues. The West must acknowledge that democratic transitions are “long-term complicated processes that do not follow straight-forward trajectories” and act accordingly by supporting a long-term transition to democracy to help countries overcome short-term difficulties.

RECOMMENDATION

This article is helpful for understanding the larger issues of Islamist movements and how their rise during the Arab Spring has impacted the region. There is little specifically on Morocco as the article focused instead on Tunisia and Egypt, which experienced mass protests and regime change. This article does remain broad enough to inform on Morocco and the PJD, but is not specific enough to be distributed widely within MAC. The small bits there are on Morocco are rather anti-monarchy making it seem that King Mohammed VI and Mubarak are on the same level. I would not recommend this article for the MAC site.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Le Maroc et le printemps arabe dans un monde en plein changement (Morocco and the Arab Spring in a Changing World)

Bernabé López García
EUROMESCO

<http://www.euromesco.net/images/papers/papersiemed11.pdf>

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article analyzes political developments in Morocco within the context of the Arab Spring. The author argues that the one uniting factor at the heart of demonstrations – whether in Cairo or Casablanca – was the presence of the youth with shared objectives: more rights, more social justice, more transparency, more control of the political system. This was the situation in Morocco, but there, the government reacted much differently. The author argues that Morocco responded to the protestors’ demands the quickest, the smartest, and the most flexibly in the region. However, this does not mean that Morocco should be praised for its reaction, as Western governments and Moroccan political parties jumped to do in the aftermath of the March 9th speech. Although this speech did address many of the demands of the protest movement, including the separation of powers, increased powers for the Prime Minister and Parliament, and independence for the judiciary, among others, the King clearly led the process of constitutional reform, despite the appearance of a consultative process through the Constitutional Commission.

In detailing developments after the March 9th speech, the author makes similar pronouncements. He argues that the new Constitution “incontestably brings significant improvements over the previous one.” Notable changes include the supremacy of international law over Moroccan law, the institutionalization of equality between men and women, and the increased responsibility of the head of government and the Parliament.

However, for the moment, these are merely statements of intention, as considerable efforts are required to concretize these changes as was the case with the reform of the family code, which clashes with the views of conservative judges and many of society. In addition, despite some obvious improvements, the author argues that the makeup of the political system remains intact: the King reigns and governs, directs the council of ministers, controls religious discourse, and presides over the superior council of the judiciary, thus not granting significantly more power to the people. The author likewise disagrees with the official results of the constitutional referendum – although the voter participation rate was 73%, the government failed to note that the participation rate was only 45% of people of voting age.

He applies the same logic to the victory of the PJD in the November 2011 elections – claiming that the PJD received only 5% of the vote when calculating voter participation of eligible, rather than registered, voters. Nevertheless, the PJD victory was at least symbolically important as the group doubled its share of the votes from previous parliamentary elections. It has a difficult path ahead as it seeks to implement the Constitution and develop a working relationship with the King, who will be consulted on all major decisions. The author views the King’s appointment of five royal advisors (Menouni, Azziman, El Himma, Zenagui, and Fasshi Fihri) as evidence that there will be a battle for power between the Palace and the Parliament, but also notes that Benkirane’s strong personality and the PJD’s relative power within the Cabinet (12 out of 31 ministers) indicate some balance of power. Regardless, it is obvious that the PJD will have to work hard to implement reforms and work to improve the economy in order to meet the demands of the protestors. While they have been isolated, many of their core grievances remain and they will likely reappear if the promises of the Constitution are not realized.

RECOMMENDATION

Despite some words of praise for Morocco’s response to the Arab Spring, the author is largely critical of both the process and the outcome, arguing that the political system in Morocco remains relatively intact in spite of the reform of the Constitution and that both the “yes” on the Constitutional referendum and the PJD victory were not indicative of widespread support. It is important to acknowledge that these kinds of arguments are being made, in Europe and the US alike, but I would not recommend this article for further review.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Morocco’s New Constitution and the Western Sahara Conflict – a Missed Opportunity?

Anna Theofilopoulou
 The Journal of North African Studies, 2012

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article examines Morocco’s attempts to introduce political reform following the February 20th Movement protests and also analyzes Morocco’s handling of the Western Sahara conflict. In both cases she argues that the Moroccan government has pursued short-term and short-sighted goals that serves to both limit reforms and prevent the ultimate solution to Western Sahara. The article claims that “real democracy in Morocco and the Western Sahara could help both the Kingdom and its adversaries in resolving the conflict.”

The article argues that, following the Arab Spring protests in Morocco, the King quickly "tried to pre-empt and co-opt the protestors" by promising change and constitutional revisions. The promises of reform quieted the protests, but the King failed to follow through on the promised changes. Mohammad VI appointed a committee of experts to draft the constitution, which was "headed by a constitutional law professor with a history of condoning autocracy." The King also set up a consultative body, which was deemed illegitimate by many protest groups who refused to participate. Once submissions to the consultative body were made "there was no follow up or debate" and the constitutional draft was only shown to the group only one day before the King presented the constitution in a televised speech during which he announced the date for the Constitutional referendum to take place two weeks later.

The referendum was similarly stacked against the protestors by the King. Muhammad VI quoted a passage of the Qur'an "[enjoining] the public to follow his 'way'" and the Ministry of Religious Affairs "instructed imams to urge a 'yes' vote during Friday sermons." The mainstream parties all supported the Constitution, with the PJD saying that the Constitution contained enough safeguards for democracy. Protestors against the new Constitution staged demonstrations that were met with pro-monarchy crowds, which protestors claimed were "organized and paid by the Ministry of Interior." Voting was also widely seen as fraudulent.

The author notes that the text of the new Constitution "addresses all key demands of the protesters," but "the changes made are less than meets the eye." The events of the 2011 elections show that the Constitution shows that Morocco "has a long way to go towards a real parliamentary monarchy." The 45% turnout for voting in the parliamentary elections, while 8% higher than previous elections, shows the "cynicism, indifference, and apathy" of Moroccans who felt that "it would not really matter whether they voted or not." Benkirane, leader of the PJD party that won the most seats in the election, formed his coalition with the caveat that the only party definitely excluded from talks was the royalist PAM. On December 7, the King appointed Fouad Ali El Himma, founder of the PAM, as one of his advisors, which served to end Benkirane's hopes that he would have direct contact with the King. The formation of the new government "followed the pattern of previous such formations in Morocco with the palace having a strong hand" in the choice of ministers. The changes of the new Constitution can thus be seen as purely cosmetic changes while the monarchical system remained firmly in place.

The article argues that Morocco's handling of the Western Sahara conflict has followed a similar trend of seeking to do the bare minimum without offering fundamental change. For example, Morocco has accepted UN proposals for resolving the conflict "in principle," but with the intention of interpreting them to secure Moroccan interests. Morocco relocated thousands of people into Western Sahara in order to create facts on the ground and to skew voting lists to be used in a referendum to determine the status of Western Sahara, in Morocco's favor. Morocco also attempted to influence MINURSO to accept this population as legitimate residents of Western Sahara while proceeding to "inject resources into [Western Sahara], by building up its cities, developing its infrastructure, and by providing financial aid and other incentives to thousands of Moroccans to move [into Western Sahara]." Internationally, Morocco attempted to influence the Security Council, specifically France, so that "decisions would benefit the Moroccan position."

During all this time the primary goal of Morocco was to deadlock and "delay the process" while expecting friendly nations to step in to support Morocco's interests. Once MINURSO had settled on the voting lists, Morocco appealed all rejected voters as a stalling tactic. King Hassan II was willing to consider alternative solutions to the "zero-sum game of the [UN]

Settlement Plan," but the Minister of the Interior, Driss Basri, "convinced the King to remain with the Settlement Plan." Upon ascending the throne, Mohammad VI was willing to consider new plans, but "it was a case of too little too late." Autonomy plans, put forward by each of the actors, were rejected by the Polisario, Morocco, or both. James Baker, Personal Envoy for Western Sahara, put forward an autonomy plan which Morocco stalled on and "employ[ed] all means in its disposal...to get Baker to change the proposal" until finally rejecting it in 2004. Morocco's stalling and negative reactions to several proposals led the UN to attempt to salvage something of MINURSO's efforts by passing Resolution 1541, which "weakened the [Security] Council's support of the Peace Plan" and led Baker to resign. These two events were hailed as "a triumph of Moroccan diplomacy" by the Foreign Minister.

The Moroccan autonomy plan was announced in 2007, but the Security Council was "not quite prepared to recognize Moroccan sovereignty over Western Sahara." Instead the Security Council passed Resolution 1754, which set the stage for formal and informal meetings between the conflicting parties where "nothing resembling negotiations" happened in either the formal or informal setting. Instead, Resolution 1754 "set the path for irresolution for the conflict," which served Morocco's short-term interests in preventing any non-Moroccan solution to the conflict. In furtherance of this, Morocco has also expanded its lobbying efforts in the US Congress and news media where "individuals without real grasp of the conflict present simplistic views on how the conflict could be resolved using solely the Moroccan proposal," which shows Morocco's continued "strategy of short-sighted inflexibility."

In conclusion, the article states that the new Constitution has failed to change the Moroccan political system in any meaningful way. The Constitution's impact "depends on the way it is implemented," as "the text has potential." Realizing this potential requires the Parliament to adopt legislation and provide the maximum space for "political forces," which Parliament is unlikely to be able to accomplish. Those in power in Morocco still believe that "cosmetic changes and repression will bring the desired results" obviating the need for real reforms. Similarly, "Morocco never had a long-term strategy for resolving the Western Sahara conflict, other than to insist on its sovereignty over the Territory," and has actively avoided referendums which Morocco would have won had it "followed a well-thought strategy of winning over the local Saharan population." Given Morocco's history, it is now impossible to trust that Morocco will negotiate fairly or stand by its promises in the Western Sahara, dooming its own autonomy plan. As a study on autonomy arrangements in non-democracies by Khakke shows "autonomy can only truly exist within a democratic system," which is a conclusion that Moroccan authorities continue to ignore. Moroccan supporters must stop "blindly supporting [Morocco's] every position" and instead must demand more "in terms of its internal politics" and "in its handling of the Western Sahara conflict."

RECOMMENDATION

This article is very critical about both Morocco's recent constitutional reforms as well as Morocco's handling of the Western Sahara issue. While the tone of the article is very negative, many of the facts cited and the history presented show Morocco in a favorable light. Morocco is mentioned specifically as pouring money into infrastructure and development of Western Sahara and there are quotes from opposition members praising the constitutional reforms. Even the article admits that much of the impetus for reform has been left to the Parliament and that the text of the Constitution provides an opening for meaningful change to occur. This article shows even those negatively disposed towards Morocco admit that Morocco has its bright spots. The article really fails to prove its thesis and fails to make a connection between the Western Sahara conflict and the democratic reforms. The two topics seem very much divided in the paper; it isn't until the conclusion that the Khakke study, which apparently shows a link, is even mentioned and even that is briefly and poorly explained. The discussion of Western Sahara ends in 2009, well before the protests even occurred. The connection between the two issues, the crux of the paper, is very vague and anomalous. While the tone is very negative, this article provides a source for favorable quotes and facts that come from a source biased against Morocco and can be useful in that regard.

\(Back to top\)

.....

The Rise of Islamist Actors: Formulating a Strategy for Sustained Engagement

Quinn Mecham

Project on Middle East Democracy Policy Brief, April 27, 2012

http://pomed.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2012/04/POMED-Policy-Brief_Mecham.pdf

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Recent electoral victories among Islamist political parties as well as the emergence of new Islamist actors across the Middle East and North Africa necessitate a new strategy for American engagement in the region. In the past, US policymakers prioritized their relationships with singular actors in authoritarian regimes, taking little stock of Arab countries' domestic politics. These regimes opposed US engagement with Islamist parties—many of whom comprise the groups rising to power today—and American diplomats chose to prioritize their existing relationships with regime leaders. As a result, the US has found itself ill-prepared to understand the rise of these now victorious political parties in the context of a new political dynamism. US policymakers must abandon the old model and reach out to new actors based on the degree of their political relevance, rather than their perceived alignment with US positions. Meaningful engagement with Islamist groups provides the opportunity to support pluralism, strengthen evolving political institutions, and positively impact political processes in Muslim countries.

Some Islamist groups like Somalia's al-Shabaab or transnational groups like al-Qaeda use political violence to achieve their ends, but the last decade has witnessed an explosion of Islamist political parties which reject violence and have competed in elections in over 20 countries worldwide. The success of Turkey's Justice and Development Party (AKP), for example, has highlighted the political opportunities that exist for moderate Islamist parties which focus on more universal political values rather than strict implementation of Sharia. Increased political openness throughout the Muslim world has encouraged Islamist groups to blend religious and cultural authenticity with pragmatic political strategies.

US policy toward non-violent Islamist movements and political parties has been inconsistent both across countries and between groups within countries. This has left the US vulnerable to charges of hypocrisy and political discrimination against Islamists. Most frequently, American diplomats rejected engagement with these groups primarily to avoid upsetting existing relationships with autocratic allies. Another motivation underlying this reluctance, however, is American policymakers' fear that their engagement with Islamists could be perceived as an endorsement of their ideology—an ideology that may differ from US preferences in social or cultural norms, or in support for violence. With the ouster of several long-standing US allies as a result of the Arab uprisings, emerging governments could prove less friendly to a number of US interests, including human rights, liberal democratic values, long-standing economic relationships, and the security of Israel. This new “Islamist challenge” requires a meaningful shift in American policy toward consistent engagement on a wide range of political concerns with some traditionally marginalized, but non-violent Islamist groups.

This shift toward engagement was codified in Secretary Clinton’s address to the National Democratic Institute in late 2011—she articulated a belief that Islamist politics can be compatible with democracy and affirmed support for a full democratic transition in Egypt, even if it leads to a government led by members of the Muslim Brotherhood. This shift in US rhetoric has also been met with regular high-level meetings between American policymakers and officials from Islamist parties throughout the region. This is a practical step in the right direction, but it fails to fully recognize the new opportunities that engagement with a broad range of Islamist actors—even those with anti-Western views—can provide to the US. Just as the US misunderstands many Islamist groups, Islamists often misunderstand US interests and behavior. As these Islamist parties begin to formulate foreign policy in their respective countries, their misconceptions about the US could have negative implications for longstanding bilateral relationships. For that reason, consistent engagement on a wide range of issues provides an opportunity to clarify American values and priorities that Islamist groups often fail to sufficiently grasp.

Policy Recommendations:

1. Recognize the similarities between Islamist groups and other political groups, including the way they respond to the political incentives of their systems.
2. Proactively engage with a wide range of Islamist organizations, particularly those that have committed themselves to competing in electoral processes.
3. Distinguish the appropriate level of political engagement based on the political relevance of the Islamic group, not on the basis of its religious ideology.
4. Support political pluralism and equal treatment, without distinction for religion or gender.
5. Promote an independent media and freedom of speech.
6. Work to strengthen legal systems that provide equal access regardless of religious ideology.
7. Publicly reinforce US support for democracy and good governance where Islamist parties operate.
8. Work together with Islamist groups to support freedom of association.

RECOMMENDATION

POMED’s analysis and recommendations represent a prevalent narrative in the policy community: US engagement in the Middle East and North Africa must evolve to accommodate a rapidly growing and diversifying body of political actors and must shift from military to economic assistance. The notion that American diplomatic engagement in the region requires reexamination and redesign is a relatively non-contentious issue, but American policymakers disagree on how exactly to proceed. POMED argues that the US should focus efforts on specific actors and groups based purely on their political relevance, while others insist that US engagement should target groups based on their alignment with American policy positions. Morocco’s PJD represents the convergence of these two camps—it is the most powerful, politically relevant party in the country, and its moderate Islamic ideology and democratic trajectory coincides with American policy positions. This article is useful in that it highlights the advantageous position of the PJD for engagement with the US; that being said, the article does not directly discuss the PJD.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Silent Complicity: The International Community and Algeria's Democratic Façade

John P. Entelis

Project on Middle East Democracy, Policy Brief, June 28, 2012

http://pomed.org/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2012/06/POMED-Policy-Brief_Entelis-Algeria.pdf

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Although Algeria suffers from many of the same problems that led to uprisings in other parts of North Africa, the country has not experienced significant political change in the past year. In this article, John Entelis analyzes Algerian politics over the past year to explain this "exception," condemns the international community's failure to engage Algeria to spur political reform, and provides recommendations for renewed US engagement with Algeria.

The conditions that created mass discontent elsewhere in North Africa are present in Algeria, including prevalent youth unemployment, limits on political expression, and widespread corruption. In spite of this, Algeria has not witnessed significant political upheaval in the aftermath of the Arab uprisings. To be sure, protests are a regular feature of Algerian political life and have been long before the Arab uprisings started in late 2010, but they have not yet escalated to demands for regime change. According to Entelis, this is largely because Algeria remains afflicted by the legacy of its civil war in the 1990s, when election results were upset by a military coup; this legacy, combined with oil-generated wealth, has inhibited uprisings similar to those in Tunisia, Egypt, and Algeria. In the past year, the anti-regime activity nevertheless intensified, forcing the government to respond, which it did so by lifting the 19-year-old emergency laws, increasing food subsidies, and promising parliamentary elections.

The government sought to portray the latter as genuinely democratic and politically legitimate – a model of democratic participation on par with the experiences of Egypt and Tunisia. They allowed international election monitors and pushed a voter mobilization campaign, stressing voting as a national duty. Yet, in the run-up to the election, two counter narratives also existed, according to Entelis. The first projected the illegitimacy of the election based on low voter turnout of 25-30%, figures based on declining participation rates over the last few elections and widespread political malaise. The second narrative focused on the expected victory of Islamist parties should the elections be free and fair; Islamist-oriented parties developed strong campaigns to get out the vote. When the elections took place in May 2012, both of these narratives proved false. Voter turnout was suspiciously high at 43% and Islamist parties won only 47 seats in the 462-member national assembly, leading many to believe that the vote was seriously fraudulent. As Entelis notes, rather than a step towards democracy, the May 2012 elections were yet another example of political maneuvering from the top, "a smoke and mirrors strategy intended to give the appearance of authentic contestation while preserving the status quo."

The regime pointed to the election results as proof of its legitimacy and was aided by influential members of the international community's in pushing this narrative. Both the US and the EU praised the elections despite widespread reports of fraud. According to Entelis, this is because the US relationship with Algeria is narrowly focused on security cooperation and oil; the US is the largest purchaser of Algerian oil. This policy has come at the expense of democracy and human rights, leading many Algerians to view the US as complicit in the political status quo.

Entelis argues that this policy is a mistake and concludes his paper with several policy recommendations for the US:

- If an opportunity arises, publicly acknowledge the allegations of fraud in the recent parliamentary elections and insist that, as similar events in neighboring countries have proven, manipulating elections in order to preserve an authoritarian political order can have disastrous consequences.
- Establish a bilateral economic assistance package to Algeria, which includes democracy and governance assistance.
- Encourage the Algerian regime to take seriously the need to resolve the Western Sahara conflict with its Moroccan neighbor; failure to do so will both sustain terrorist activity in the region and forestall the transition to a genuine democracy in both countries. In making this recommendation, Entelis argues that Algeria is complicit in the conflict through its financial support of the Polisario despite its claims of neutrality. Its primary objective in its support is to limit Morocco’s power in North Africa. Entelis underscores that Algeria must be held accountable for arming and training Polisario fighters and that it can help deescalate the conflict by removing support for the guerilla movement. Entelis also makes reference to language in the FY2013 foreign appropriations bills and advocates including both in a final draft in order to improve human rights in Morocco and force Algeria to take a more accommodating role in the Western Sahara conflict in order to advance regional stability.
- Encourage the Algerian government to explore opportunities for strengthening ties and expanding trade with neighboring countries in North Africa.

RECOMMENDATION

The article is important in highlighting Algeria’s veiled attempts at political reform – something that is not as widely discussed as it should be by DC-based think tanks and other experts. It is also important in calling out the United States for its contradictory policies in the Maghreb region – calling for democratic reform on human rights issues in most of the other countries in the region, while remaining silent on Algeria and going so far as praising it. Entelis’ argument that this is largely due to the economic and security relationship between the US-Algeria is widely acknowledged, but bears repeating. The article also makes several points that help MAC’s messaging on politics in the Maghreb and on the Western Sahara. His recommendation on the Western Sahara is particularly poignant, as it supports much of what MAC has been trying to do over the past few years: force the US to call out Algeria for its support of the Polisario and play a more mediating role in the conflict. Although Entelis recommends that US military aid to Morocco be conditioned, because he also mentions the importance of the House language, this report should be disseminated to our target audiences (and has in fact already been posted on the MOTM website).

\(Back to top\)

.....

The Ties that do not Bind: The Union for the Mediterranean and the Future of Euro-Arab Relations

Oliver Schlumberger
Journal of North African Studies, Vol. 16, No.1, March 2011

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Oliver Schlumberger challenges the viability of the Union for the Mediterranean (UfM) to serve as a normative power with regards to its influence on Arab state members. A primary purpose of the UfM, after it replaced the Euro-Mediterranean Partnership (EMP) in 2008, was to encourage democratization and a closer relationship with Israel. By being a "norm entrepreneur," it was supposed that Europe could encourage "respect for human rights, the rule of law, and pluralistic, inclusive, transparent and accountable modes of political decision making." It fails in these objectives, says Schlumberger, because the structure of the UfM and the actors participating in the institutions all empower, rather than challenge, authoritarian regimes.

Arab regimes have been resistant to pan-Mediterranean economic and political institutions, for two reasons:

- (a) Deteriorated Arab-Israeli relations and an unwillingness, on the Arab side, to enter into what might become a creeping normalization of relations with Israel; and
- (b) Fears about a renewal of what in the past was sometimes perceived as European paternalism.

Cooperation between the Arab members of the EMP and Israel deteriorated at periods of peak Arab-Israeli tensions, such as the 2006 Israeli invasion of Lebanon and the 2008 bombing of the Gaza strip. Arab leaders also pushed against EU dominance of the initiative. As Schwarzer (2009) put it: "No equal partnership has been established between the northern and southern states. The Mediterranean Union is still seen in the southern region primarily as an EU project, if not as a project of French political interests."

Because of Arab leaders' resistance to an institution that they perceived as a challenge to their authority, they were able to insist in changes to the new UfM that broadened their powers and provided checks to European influence. As a result, through actors, institutions, and policies pursued, the UfM has empowered rather than curtailed the authoritarian leaders of the Arab member states.

This resulted from the constituent makeup of the organization. Rather than representing societies within the member nations, "the UfM's institutions almost exclusively represent their respective governments, or rather: heads of state in the majority of Arab cases where these do not form part of the respective governments." This stands in stark contrast to pre-UfM organizations such as the EMP, which favored cooperation at the societal and cultural levels.

Institutionally, actors in the UfM were given greater "ownership" of projects and programs in comparison to the EMP. Effectively this gives the Arab regimes veto power over programs that would support civil society and generate competitors or instability within their respective nations. Given that level of control, "the UfM cannot become a vehicle for any sort of meaningful political reform. By contrast, institutional reform has created an instrument for Arab regimes that makes it yet easier to avoid any reform of domestic autocratic governance."

European actors in the EU have also curtailed their political objectives. "Emphasis," says Schlumberger, "is now placed on joint projects as opposed to larger-scale and more macro-level programmes." Mutual interests in technical co-operation seem to deliberately gain in importance compared to political areas of dissent between north and south.

Accounting for these factors, Schlumberger provides two possible trajectories for the EU –

Arab relationship as a result of the UfM. The first, the 'Schuman-Sarkozy Scenario', predicts that admittedly modest foundational links will over time result in deeper integration among UfM parties. The logic of this argument states that after a long period of low-level functional co-operation the UfM may eventually grow and come to "convince Arab rulers to cede power in favour of their hitherto disenfranchised populations. Normalization of relations with Israel and democratization, then, will not come about tomorrow, but they can and will come about."

The alternative, which Schlumberger prefers and dubs the "Realist Scenario" is more grim in its assessment of the UfM's chances to bring about change. Schlumberger reasons that "even a power that might consider itself 'normative' by nature will eventually not run the risk of devising (let alone implementing) policies that contradict its own material interests and preferred policy outcomes in international relations. It will therefore prefer pragmatism and self interest over a normative vision, even if that latter was grounded in a functional logic."

Given this limitation, EU leaders have given up on the spread of democratic reforms beyond rhetorical challenges directed at their own populations. The EU, says Schlumberger, has "largely given up on previously established larger and normatively based foreign policy goals in its relations with the Arab world."

RECOMMENDATION

Significant events have come to pass in the Mediterranean Arab states since the writing of this article. Several of the authoritarian regimes that Schlumberger had believed so entrenched have been toppled. The world is waiting to see whether the democratically elected bodies that have arisen to replace them will significantly differ in their foreign policy towards the European Union. Yet despite the recent uprisings at least two factors will remain the same: the new Arab governments are as reticent to engage with Israel as the old, and they are likely to continue to resist foreign influence in the shaping of their political institutions. Despite the advent of new democracies it is possible that the UfM may encounter similar resistance from Arab actors as in the past.

The article has little bearing on Morocco. The country is not mentioned and the impact of the UfM on Moroccan policies is not explored. A case can be made that the King, who has taken significant steps to empower his nation's parliamentary system since the writing of this article, is not justifiably lumped into the same category as highlighted dictators Ben Ali and Colonel Qaddafi. Ultimately the article is not recommended as reading for MAC at large.

\(Back to top\)

.....
The Union for the Mediterranean, or the Changing Context of Euro-Mediterranean Relations

Federica Bicchi

Mediterranean Politics, 16:1, March 2011

<http://www.tandfonline.com/doi/pdf/10.1080/13629395.2011.547365>

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article examines the formation of the Union for the Mediterranean (UfM), launched in July 2008, and its impacts on relationships within the region. The article argues that the formation of the UfM presents a substantial change in the pattern of Euro-Mediterranean relations away from the previous Euro-Mediterranean Partnership (EMP). The UfM came about because of "the efforts of a minority of countries cajoling a majority into accepting a new initiative". The creation of the UfM was primarily due to the insistence of France, occasionally supported by Spain and Italy. This plan received the acquiescence of Germany and other northern and eastern European countries after changing some provisions to limit the number of changes in shifting between the EMP and UfM. Israel and Turkey have been less supportive of the UfM because of fears that its acceptance would dilute their special relationship with the EU.

The UfM does impose changes on the institutional structure left by the EMP. UfM marks a shift "away from the region-building strategy of the EU," which the EMP supported. The Arab-Israeli conflict also had a greater impact on the formation of the UfM than the EMP, often influencing the speed and substance of the negotiations surrounding the UfM.

RECOMMENDATION

This article has very little to do with Morocco, instead focusing on internal EU negotiations and the impact that regional issues had on these internal negotiations. There is nothing in the article that would warrant putting it on the MAC site or spreading it among the staff.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Writing as Resistance: Berber Literature and the challenges surrounding the Emergence of a Berber Literary Field in Morocco

Stephanie Poussel

The Journal of Nationalism and Ethnicity, Vol. 40, No. 3, May 2012, pp. 373-394

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This article examines the creation of a contemporary Berber/Amazigh literature and language, which are politically synonymous, and the attempts by the Moroccan state to deal with this emerging field. This article attempts to show that Moroccan state policies have driven Berber writers to attempt to affirm "Moroccanness" exclusive of "Arabness."

Initially the Moroccan state viewed Berbers as people with "a marginal identity in need of rehabilitation" into the Arab culture of Morocco. The state thus attempted to Arabize education and the public space, thereby eliminating all three major Amazigh dialects. This stance changed in 1994 when King Hassan II allowed broadcasting in the Berber language on national radio. The states acceptance of the Amazigh language(s) has only increased since then with its incorporation into the public school system and the founding, in 2001, of the Royal Institute for Amazigh Culture (IRCAM).

IRCAM has sought to standardize the Amazigh language, partly in order to introduce it into the school curriculum, and to reverse the long-standing association of "Berber" with "opposition." Activists claim that IRCAM serves to divide the literary field into those that worked for the state and those, declared by the article to be the majority, who radically opposed the "'takeover' of Berber identity by the State." IRCAM has attempted to impose a uniform alphabet for the writing of Amazigh called Tifinagh. As it stands, Amazigh can be written in Arabic script, which identifies the author with the Arabo-Muslim regime, or Latin script, which identifies the author as modern, but has negative colonial associations. The creation of a Tifinagh script divorced from any oral tradition has been condemned by many who see it as "a State strategy to fence off the Berber language and confine it to an 'unreadable' alphabet for the rest of the world." The standardization of the language has been met with calls for a "return to local" by many activists. Amazigh writers see this standardization as an attempt at modernization, while activists fear it will create a division between the literary/educated class and the masses, much as Modern Standard Arabic and its many local variations have caused throughout much of the Arab world. The article concludes by stating that contemporary Amazigh literature "has been evolving in parallel with the Berber identity and political movement," which has linked this literary field with the ethnic and political demands of Berbers.

RECOMMENDATION

This article deals with literary and cultural development, much of it historical, which is of little relevance to MAC. The discussion of the efforts of the State to incorporate Berber language and identity, specifically in public schooling and broadcasting, is interesting, but is brief with no analysis. The author also fails to really examine if/how Berber writers have "affirm[ed] an alternative definition of Moroccanness" and in many instances seems to contradict this assertion. There is little in this article that would be helpful either for dissemination or distribution purposes.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Youth Perceptions in Morocco: Political Parties in the wake of Legislative Elections: Findings from Qualitative Research in Morocco Conducted in March and April 2012

The National Democratic Institute, July 2012

<http://www.ndi.org/files/Morocco-Youth-FG-Report-070212.pdf>

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This report, drawing upon 18 focus group discussions with 160 Moroccans aged 18 to 25 years, "examines attitudes of young Moroccan citizens towards the current situation in their country, major political actors, and recent and upcoming elections." Drawing on participants of both genders and from across the social spectrum in various areas of the country, the report finds surprisingly consistent attitudes on the topics discussed. The research was conducted between March and April 2012, four months after legislative elections were held.

General Mood

Many young Moroccans are positive about the current political direction of the country. "Constitutional reforms, elections perceived as more transparent, and the victory of the PJD are mentioned by most focus groups participants as positive indicators." This notwithstanding, some participants express doubt that elections may spur significant change, with some positing that the victory of the PJD was engineered by the regime to calm the streets. Nevertheless, a significant number of participants believe the new government can succeed, and that patience is required - the PJD must be given time to achieve its goals.

Of particular interest to the young respondents was the matter of unemployment. One urban woman declared that unemployment is, "a ghost threatening every graduate."

Another commented on the prevalence of nepotism. "If you go to the United States or France and look for a job, they check and ask about the things you can do; but in Morocco, they ask, 'who sent you here,' if you understand what I mean."

Perspectives on Elections

The overwhelming majority of focus group participants characterized the recent legislative elections as a step forward. The fact that a historic opposition party won the largest number of seats in the Parliament and formed the first government following a constitutional revision is seen as a significant and positive development. Most believe that the elections were conducted in a fair and transparent manner. Yet despite this view, most participants confessed a lack of knowledge about how elections are conducted and the role of elected officials in office. "Bad knowledge about [MP] roles," said one rural woman, "We haven't even studied that in school. We studied the history of, say, Britain and France, but never Morocco." Although most focus group participants acknowledge that they themselves did not vote in the November election, they suggest that they have greater intention to vote in upcoming communal elections.

Attitudes Toward Political Parties

Despite the positive characterization of elections, most participants characterized the general performance of political parties as extremely unsatisfactory. "[Political parties] are always seeking self-interest," said one respondent. "They promise people lots of things but never act when they win." This belief is prevalent, despite the fact that participants generally have a very superficial knowledge of party ideologies or platforms. They know and appreciate that most parties have vowed to tackle government corruption, and there is some perception that efforts have been made in this regard. The exceptions to this rule are the PJD and Istiqlal - both parties are universally recognized and can be described by participants in some detail.

Focus group participants link their intention to vote in upcoming elections "to the degree of responsiveness they feel from political parties in listening to and acting on the needs of citizens."

Perceptions of the New Government

Participants generally hold a positive attitude towards the new government and "associate it with a sense of transparency and urgency." The PJD is perceived to be a credible party buoyed by its Islamic credentials and legitimate in its efforts to combat corruption. A lack of women in government is disheartening to some. "One thing I don't like is that while Morocco has been struggling for women's rights, the party chose only one lady for the new government, which is not fair."

Participants expressed hopes that the opposition would be productive and work with the new government, rather than just criticize it. There is division over the February 20th movement. Many desire February 20th to remain a force applying pressure from outside the government, and many desire it to be a political party. Others question why the movement is still active now that a constitutional referendum has passed. "Thanks to the movement, lots of things have changed," said one urban woman. "I think the movement precipitated the reform of the constitution. But I don't understand why the movement still demonstrates and protests given that lots of reforms are done."

RECOMMENDATION

This report reveals a relatively positive perception of the PJD - at the time of the focus test. In March and April of 2012 the party, burnished by its Islamic credentials and its promises to reform the government, combat corruption, and reduce unemployment, was still broadly perceived as representing the people and genuinely attempting to resolve the country's crises. Yet the data is somewhat out of date. In the intervening six months, the PJD's credibility has suffered - perhaps unavoidably - as corruption and economic difficulties in the country persist.

The value of a focus group is the depth of an explanation it provides on public opinion rather than the statistical data generated by a public opinion poll. While the general favorability of the PJD has faded somewhat since this poll was taken, the information about the issues motivating Moroccan youth still remain pertinent. In this case, the youth express frustration with continuing corruption and unemployment. The PJD, and any other party seeking to hold office, must make a credible and meaningful attempt to combat these problems.

The document is somewhat dated but provides valuable insight into the perspectives of Moroccan youth. As it was effective in bringing about the constitutional reforms of 2011, this demographic is likely to continue to be a meaningful player in future politics. For this reason, the report is recommended reading.

\(Back to top\)

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, September 18, 2012 3:14 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: The Hill - "Morocco: A staunch and stable ally in North Africa" by former Ambassadors Ed Gabriel and Mike Ussery
Attachments: The Hill op-ed by Gabriel-Ussery - 'Morocco-A staunch and stable ally in North Africa' 18Sept2012.pdf

FYI – The Hill today published this guest commentary, "Morocco: A staunch and stable ally in North Africa," highlighting the importance of the new Morocco-U.S. Strategic Dialogue, authored by Ed Gabriel and Michael Ussery.

See below and attached.

<http://thehill.com/blogs/congress-blog/foreign-policy/250127-morocco-a-staunch-and-stable-ally-in-north-africa>

Tuesday, September 18, 2012

Morocco: A staunch and stable ally in North Africa

By Edward M. Gabriel and Michael Ussery, former ambassadors to Morocco

The murder of U.S. Ambassador John Christopher Stevens and three other Americans in Libya, and the violence at our Cairo embassy, are sad and dreadful demonstrations that now more than ever, the United States needs reliable friends in the Middle East and North Africa.

Challenges to critically important U.S. interests in the Middle East and North Africa have steadily mounted since 9/11, and have increased even further in the wake of popular revolts throughout the region—culminating in last week's horrific developments. How to face those challenges with now less-certain alliances in the Arab World has become a serious concern for American policy-makers and others, in and out of government, who worry about future developments in the region. The United States needs reliable partners who share the same vision, values and goals for its future.

One of the oldest and most reliable American partners in the Middle East-North Africa region has been the Kingdom of Morocco. That relationship was strengthened late last week when Secretary of State Hillary Clinton launched a new Strategic Dialogue with Morocco, which she praised as "a leader and a model" in the region. This new strategic relationship will not only consolidate and elevate an already long history of close cooperation with Morocco; more importantly it will also help establish a new anchor for U.S. efforts to ensure that the vision both nations share for the future of the region can prevail against those who would undermine it through extremist violence and intolerant world views.

The Morocco-U.S. Strategic Dialogue will focus on key areas where Morocco's experience and example can help

America address changes and challenges in the Arab and Moslem worlds, as well as throughout the Mediterranean and in Central and West Africa, where Morocco has long-established relationships.

Though many believed the U.S.-Morocco relationship and its relevance to U.S. foreign policy interests was less important once the Cold War ended, Morocco's importance to the U.S. has instead increased steadily over the past ten years as challenges have mounted from hostile groups, adversarial governments, and rapid change. Throughout this period, while others in the region slipped ever deeper into the contradictions in their societies that ultimately resulted in the revolts of the Arab Spring, Morocco pushed ahead with its own ambitious reform agenda that directly addressed past human rights abuses, the status and role of women in society, the need to focus attention and resources on the most disadvantaged, insistence on religious tolerance, the need to open up political space to civil society and other non-state actors, and conducted a series of the only truly free and fair local and national elections in the Arab World.

It was this ambitious and largely successful reform agenda that resulted in the increasingly close relations between Morocco and the U.S. and led, ultimately, to the new strategic partnership launched in Washington. What makes this all the more remarkable was that Morocco's reform agenda was self-driven and not the result of any external pressure. Rather, it was the product of enlightened leadership from the Moroccan monarchy working closely with civil society and others who understood that such changes were not only necessary, but would strengthen Morocco's fortunes in a changing world.

As former U.S. Ambassadors to Morocco, we are pleased to see the US take this important step to elevate its relations with Morocco to the level of strategic cooperation. This step is the culmination of more than a decade of close cooperation between our two countries, under the leadership of King Mohammed VI and three American presidents. Already Morocco has established itself as a major non-NATO Ally, the beneficiary of a Free Trade Agreement, and a Millennium Challenge Corporation compact with the United States.

Establishing a Strategic Dialogue at this time not only makes good sense as we face common problems in the region with a common purpose, but it also sends a strong signal to the region that the United States is a willing partner with those in the Middle East and North Africa who are prepared to share a vision of a better future for the region, and who are also capable of demonstrating their own commitment to that vision through the kind of steady and progressive policies Morocco has pursued with significant success these last dozen years.

King Mohammed VI has been working hard for more than a decade to promote democratic reform, economic development, and greater regional cooperation. Changes initiated by the King, most recently in the 2011 Constitution, advance political reforms, guarantee religious freedom, protect women's rights, promote human rights, and serve as an example for other countries. Continued efforts to promote economic development and create jobs likewise offer a model for economic growth in a region where it is sorely needed.

Morocco has demonstrated, through the partnership between King Mohammed VI and the United States, that it is ready and capable of building a strong mutual response to the forces of uncertainty in the region.

Gabriel, former U.S. ambassador to Morocco under President Bill Clinton, advises the Kingdom of Morocco. Ussery, is the former U.S. ambassador to Morocco under President George H.W. Bush.

Tuesday, September 18, 2012

THE HILL'S
Congress Blog
Where lawmakers come to blog

Morocco: A staunch and stable ally in North Africa

By Edward M. Gabriel and Michael Ussery, former ambassadors to Morocco

The murder of U.S. Ambassador John Christopher Stevens and three other Americans in Libya, and the violence at our Cairo embassy, are sad and dreadful demonstrations that now more than ever, the United States needs reliable friends in the Middle East and North Africa.

Challenges to critically important U.S. interests in the Middle East and North Africa have steadily mounted since 9/11, and have increased even further in the wake of popular revolts throughout the region—culminating in last week's horrific developments. How to face those challenges with now less-certain alliances in the Arab World has become a serious concern for American policy-makers and others, in and out of government, who worry about future developments in the region. The United States needs reliable partners who share the same vision, values and goals for its future.

One of the oldest and most reliable American partners in the Middle East-North Africa region has been the Kingdom of Morocco. That relationship was strengthened late last week when Secretary of State Hillary Clinton launched a new Strategic Dialogue with Morocco, which she praised as “a leader and a model” in the region. This new strategic relationship will not only consolidate and elevate an already long history of close cooperation with Morocco; more importantly it will also help establish a new anchor for U.S. efforts to ensure that the vision both nations share for the future of the region can prevail against those who would undermine it through extremist violence and intolerant world views.

The Morocco-U.S. Strategic Dialogue will focus on key areas where Morocco's experience and example can help America address changes and challenges in the Arab and Moslem worlds, as well as throughout the Mediterranean and in Central and West Africa, where Morocco has long-established relationships.

Though many believed the U.S.-Morocco relationship and its relevance to U.S. foreign policy interests was less important once the Cold War ended, Morocco's importance to the U.S. has instead increased steadily over the past ten years as challenges have mounted from hostile groups, adversarial governments, and rapid change. Throughout this period, while others in the region slipped ever deeper into the contradictions in their societies that ultimately resulted in the revolts of the Arab Spring, Morocco pushed ahead with its own ambitious reform agenda that directly addressed past human rights abuses, the status and role of women in society, the need to focus attention and resources on the most disadvantaged, insistence on religious tolerance, the need to open up political space to civil society and other non-state actors, and conducted a series of the only truly free and fair local and national elections in the Arab World.

It was this ambitious and largely successful reform agenda that resulted in the increasingly close relations between Morocco and the U.S. and led, ultimately, to the new strategic partnership launched in Washington. What makes this all the more remarkable was that Morocco's reform agenda was self-driven and not the result of any external pressure. Rather, it was the product of enlightened leadership from the Moroccan monarchy working closely with civil society and others who understood that such changes were not only necessary, but would strengthen Morocco's fortunes in a changing world.

As former U.S. Ambassadors to Morocco, we are pleased to see the US take this important step to elevate its relations with Morocco to the level of strategic cooperation. This step is the culmination of more than a decade of close cooperation between our two countries, under the leadership of King Mohammed VI and three American presidents. Already Morocco has established itself as a major non-NATO Ally, the beneficiary of a Free Trade Agreement, and a Millennium Challenge Corporation compact with the United States.

Establishing a Strategic Dialogue at this time not only makes good sense as we face common problems in the region with a common purpose, but it also sends a strong signal to the region that the United States is a willing partner with those in the Middle East and North Africa who are prepared to share a vision of a better future for the region, and who are also capable of demonstrating their own commitment to that vision through the kind of steady and progressive policies Morocco has pursued with significant success these last dozen years.

King Mohammed VI has been working hard for more than a decade to promote democratic reform, economic development, and greater regional cooperation. Changes initiated by the King, most recently in the 2011 Constitution, advance political reforms, guarantee religious freedom, protect women's rights, promote human rights, and serve as an example for other countries. Continued efforts to promote economic development and create jobs likewise offer a model for economic growth in a region where it is sorely needed.

Morocco has demonstrated, through the partnership between King Mohammed VI and the United States, that it is ready and capable of building a strong mutual response to the forces of uncertainty in the region.

Gabriel, former U.S. ambassador to Morocco under President Bill Clinton, advises the Kingdom of Morocco. Ussery, is the former U.S. ambassador to Morocco under President George H.W. Bush.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, September 28, 2012 5:57 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: AllAfrica.com - "Morocco: A Friend, Indeed - Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue" by Bob Holley
Attachments: AllAfrica op-ed by Bob Holley - 'Morocco-A Friend, Indeed - Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue' 27Sept2012.pdf

<http://allafrica.com/stories/201209270210.html>

allAfrica.com

SEPTEMBER 27, 2012

Moroccan American Center for Policy (Washington, DC)

Opinion

Morocco: A Friend, Indeed - Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue

BY ROBERT M. HOLLEY, 24 SEPTEMBER 2012

Clearly, events in Libya, Egypt and elsewhere across the Middle East and North Africa these past weeks demonstrate the necessity of the US being able to forge reliable partnerships with nations in the region who share a common view of the challenges and vision for the future. The creation, earlier this month, of a Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue makes it clear that Morocco is that kind of viable strategic partner, and provides a new opportunity for our two nations to advance a progressive agenda for the region as threats to our common interests are increasingly evident.

The inauguration of a Strategic Dialogue between the U.S. and Morocco elevates and formalizes a longstanding relationship with a friend that shares our interests and values, recognizing more than a decade of leadership on reform under King Mohammed VI, and the increasingly close, cooperative relationship with Morocco under three US presidents.

Since King Mohammed VI ascended the throne in 1999 with a determination to expedite reform and development, Morocco has made significant advances in protecting human rights, especially the equal rights of women, building an independent judicial system, promoting religious tolerance, accelerating human development initiatives for the country's most disadvantaged, and boosting open trade and investment.

This strategic dialogue is not just another diplomatic gabfest; it is a carefully considered step by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to strengthen an anchor relationship in the Middle East and North Africa (MENA). It provides an opportunity for the two countries to work together through regular, high-level meetings to give serious consideration to real issues of concern and to formulate policies and solutions that support US global interests, as well as Morocco's objectives, in the areas of politics, security, economy, culture and education.

Morocco is the first North African country--and one of only two dozen in the world--to have such a partnership with the US. Adding Morocco to that limited group--which includes Israel, Russia, South Africa, and India--signals America's growing commitment to Morocco as an increasingly important partner in achieving our mutual ambition to create a more democratic, prosperous, and secure MENA region.

At the same time, it is a demonstration of US support for Morocco's success in advancing democratic reform at home and its commitment to partner with the US in defense of our shared values. This is a model for how we should engage our friends in that part of the world on the basis of mutual respect and common interest. It should also serve as an incentive to other countries in the region who seek a closer relationship with the United States.

Success stories like Morocco's are needed in the region, and the convening of this strategic process builds on steps already taken between the US and Morocco. Morocco is one of only 20 countries that have free trade agreements with the US. It has formed an exceptional strategic partnership on military and security issues as it participates regularly in NATO and bilateral US military exercises and training and cooperates fully in our efforts to combat terrorist activity. It is one of only 24 countries with a current Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) compact -- which is awarded on the basis of a country's commitment to democratic reform and economic openness. Morocco is also designated a major non-NATO ally, one of only 16 countries with this exceptional status.

While Morocco continues to work to bring democratic reforms to full fruition, America's support and the privileged status it offers Morocco have encouraged and expedited the very positive outcomes we are witnessing there. As "Arab Spring" turbulence and increasing terrorist activity continue in the MENA region, the US can count on Morocco as a pillar of stability and as a reliable and staunch ally.

This is the capstone to a relationship that began more than two centuries ago with the birth of our nation.

When attacks by Barbary pirates in the Mediterranean threatened our young nation's ability to export its goods to Europe, America turned to the then-Sultan of Morocco, King Mohammed III, for assistance. This new relationship was subsequently codified in the 1787 US-Morocco Treaty of Friendship and Peace, America's longest standing treaty relationship which remains in force today.

In December 1789, President George Washington sent a letter thanking the Sultan for Morocco's help, writing "our soil is bountiful, and our people industrious, and we have reason to flatter ourselves that we shall gradually become useful to our friends."

The United States has now taken yet another major step to reinforce the promise George Washington made 223 years ago by affirming our commitment to an enduring partnership where the US and Morocco will continue to stand together in the 21st century as close friends and reliable allies, something that seems so very appropriate given that Morocco was the first country in the world to recognize the independence of the United States of America in 1777.

Robert M. Holley is Senior Policy Advisor for the Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP).

SEPTEMBER 27, 2012

Moroccan American Center for Policy (Washington, DC)

OPINION

Morocco: A Friend, Indeed - Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue

BY ROBERT M. HOLLEY, 24 SEPTEMBER 2012

Clearly, events in Libya, Egypt and elsewhere across the Middle East and North Africa these past weeks demonstrate the necessity of the US being able to forge reliable partnerships with nations in the region who share a common view of the challenges and vision for the future. The creation, earlier this month, of a Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue makes it clear that Morocco is that kind of viable strategic partner, and provides a new opportunity for our two nations to advance a progressive agenda for the region as threats to our common interests are increasingly evident.

The inauguration of a Strategic Dialogue between the U.S. and Morocco elevates and formalizes a longstanding relationship with a friend that shares our interests and values, recognizing more than a decade of leadership on reform under King Mohammed VI, and the increasingly close, cooperative relationship with Morocco under three US presidents.

Since King Mohammed VI ascended the throne in 1999 with a determination to expedite reform and development, Morocco has made significant advances in protecting human rights, especially the equal rights of women, building an independent judicial system, promoting religious tolerance, accelerating human development initiatives for the country's most disadvantaged, and boosting open trade and investment.

This strategic dialogue is not just another diplomatic gabfest; it is a carefully considered step by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to strengthen an anchor relationship in the Middle East and North Africa (MENA). It provides an opportunity for the two countries to work together through regular, high-level meetings to give serious consideration to real issues of concern and to formulate policies and solutions that support US global interests, as well as Morocco's objectives, in the areas of politics, security, economy, culture and education.

Morocco is the first North African country--and one of only two dozen in the world--to have such a partnership with the US. Adding Morocco to that limited group--which includes Israel, Russia, South Africa, and India--signals America's growing commitment to Morocco as an increasingly important partner in achieving our mutual ambition to create a more democratic, prosperous, and secure MENA region.

At the same time, it is a demonstration of US support for Morocco's success in advancing democratic reform at home and its commitment to partner with the US in defense of our shared values. This is a model for how we should engage our friends in that part of the world on the basis of mutual respect and common interest. It should also serve as an incentive to other countries in the region who seek a closer relationship with the United States.

Success stories like Morocco's are needed in the region, and the convening of this strategic process builds on steps already taken between the US and Morocco. Morocco is one of only 20 countries that have free trade agreements with the US. It has formed an exceptional strategic partnership on military and security issues as it participates regularly in NATO and bilateral US military exercises and training and cooperates fully in our efforts to combat terrorist activity. It is one of only 24 countries with a current Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) compact -- which is awarded on the basis of a country's commitment to democratic reform and economic openness. Morocco is also designated a major non-NATO ally, one of only 16 countries with this exceptional status.

While Morocco continues to work to bring democratic reforms to full fruition, America's support and the privileged status it offers Morocco have encouraged and expedited the very positive outcomes we are witnessing there. As "Arab Spring" turbulence and increasing terrorist activity continue in the MENA region, the US can count on Morocco as a pillar of stability and as a reliable and staunch ally.

This is the capstone to a relationship that began more than two centuries ago with the birth of our nation.

When attacks by Barbary pirates in the Mediterranean threatened our young nation's ability to export its goods to Europe, America turned to the then-Sultan of Morocco, King Mohammed III, for assistance. This new relationship was subsequently codified in the 1787 US-Morocco Treaty of Friendship and Peace, America's longest standing treaty relationship which remains in force today.

In December 1789, President George Washington sent a letter thanking the Sultan for Morocco's help, writing "our soil is bountiful, and our people industrious, and we have reason to flatter ourselves that we shall gradually become useful to our friends."

The United States has now taken yet another major step to reinforce the promise George Washington made 223 years ago by affirming our commitment to an enduring partnership where the US and Morocco will continue to stand together in the 21st century as close friends and reliable allies, something that seems so very appropriate given that Morocco was the first country in the world to recognize the independence of the United States of America in 1777. - Robert M. Holley is Senior Policy Advisor for the Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP).

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, September 28, 2012 6:43 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: World Affairs Journal: "What a Real Alliance Looks Like"

Excellent article by Totten, who we are making arrangement with Abdel for a visit to Morocco. Notice the he mentions a visit to Morocco in his article. Ed

<http://www.worldaffairsjournal.org/blog/michael-j-totten/what-real-alliance-looks>

What a Real Alliance Looks Like - Michael J. Totten

President Barack Obama came under criticism recently for describing Egypt as neither an ally nor an enemy of the United States and then backtracking days later. Most Americans who follow the Middle East and North Africa know perfectly well that Egypt's relationship with the United States is no longer friendly. After what happened over there during the last couple of weeks, even many Americans who hardly pay any attention at all have figured it out. But it's not diplomatic for the White House or the State Department to say it out loud, so the president walked it back.

Compare and contrast Washington's poisoned relationship with Cairo to the one at the opposite end of North Africa. The United States just upgraded its relationship with Morocco to the level of what's called a Strategic Dialogue, bringing the two almost as close as possible without bringing Morocco into NATO. Americans have fewer than two dozen alliances like this in the world.

The timing could hardly be better. Since the Arab Spring began in Tunisia, North Africa and the Middle East have gone through an extraordinary period of tumultuous change, some of it good, but much of it bad. The U.S. needs friends it can count on over there and hardly has any other than Israel. Pro-American Arab governments — not that there are many of those — likewise need an alliance with the United States they can count on.

That part of the world also needs a stable rock somewhere—not the stultifying stability provided by the House of al-Saud in Arabia, and certainly not the tyrannical sort that Moammar Qaddafi managed for a few decades in Libya. No, what the Middle East and North Africa need right now is progressive stability, the kind that slowly advances human and political development without triggering the kinds of violent reactions and shocks we're seeing in so many places right now. Morocco is one of the few countries that's pulling it off.

Unlike "frenemy" states like Egypt and Pakistan, Morocco is a genuine friend of the United States and always has been. Washington and Rabat share the same strategic interests in the region and, just as importantly, the same outlook and vision.

I recently spoke with Youssef Amrani, Morocco's minister delegate for foreign affairs.

“We’ve decided to upgrade our relationship,” he said. “We have the same values. We have economic and cultural ties. The United States recognizes the commitment of Morocco to human rights and the rule of law. With all the changes in the region, we need to send the message that an Arab country can work with the United States on the basis of shared values.”

Our strong anti-communist alliance during the Cold War transitioned smoothly into a strong anti-terrorist alliance in the 21st century. Long before the terror war started in earnest, however, Morocco stood strong against Nasserism, Baathism, and the other various noxious secular “isms” that have proven such spectacular failures everywhere they’ve been tried.

Arab Nationalism, radical Islam, and anti-Americanism exist in Morocco, of course, but they find less purchase than in most other places. The ideas make less sense there. Morocco is a pluralistic blend of Arab and Berber and has been culturally influenced by southern Europe and sub-Saharan Africa throughout its entire history. The United States has never been hostile toward Morocco and Morocco has never been hostile toward the United States. Only a small percentage of Americans know that Morocco was the first country in the world to recognize our independence from Britain, but everyone in Morocco knows and is proud of it.

Egypt’s Hosni Mubarak was sort of an ally of the United States, but he wasn’t a real one. He was part of America’s security architecture in the Eastern Mediterranean, and Washington propped him up with assistance, but he did nothing—nothing—to liberalize or modernize Egypt and prepare it for a future of peaceful relations with itself, its neighbors, or with the rest of the world. Every day his state-run media cranked out as much anti-American and anti-Semitic invective as Nazi Germany, and it did so for decades. He threw liberals as well as Islamists in prison. His military regime ruthlessly repressed anything and everything that even smelled like civil society. Revolutionary Egypt was not even remotely primed for tolerant liberal democracy. “We’ve had 7,000 years of civilization,” an activist told me in Tahrir Square last year, “and 7,000 years of oppression.”

By contrast, civil society is flourishing in Morocco. The state doesn’t have a paranoid view of non-governmental organizations. It doesn’t think they’re part of a sinister foreign conspiracy like the Egyptian government did when Mubarak was running the place and like it still does today. Morocco has long had a pluralistic view of outsiders, the kind that only exists in a few isolated pockets elsewhere in the Arab world like Beirut and Tunis.

Jews live in Morocco as a protected minority. The only other Arab country where that’s true is Tunisia. King Mohammad VI had been campaigning to educate the Muslim world about the horrors of the Holocaust and to put an end to Holocaust denial once for all. It’s outrageous that he has to stand up and say the Holocaust happened and that it was bad, but that’s where we are. His government has opted out of the Arab-Israeli conflict and would, in all likelihood, sign a peace treaty with Israel tomorrow if that wouldn’t cause such a geopolitical headache for itself in the region.

While Morocco is not a democracy and Mohammad VI wasn’t elected, the country does have democratic institutions and its people are slowly developing democratic habits of mind. The king’s father, Hassan II, began liberalizing Morocco decades ago, and Mohammad VI stepped on the accelerator as soon as he came to power. He did it before widespread disgruntlement threatened to bring down the government, which is the best time to do it, not only because it’s the right thing to do on general principle, but because it’s the only way governments can maintain legitimacy over the long term. Reforms aren’t likely to placate hundreds of thousands of furious demonstrators, but genuine reforms will likely prevent hundreds of thousands of furious demonstrators from taking to the streets in the first place.

So while much of the region is boiling with turmoil, Morocco is placid and calm.

“Democratic transition and the building of institutions take time,” said Amrani from the foreign ministry. “You can’t change the world in one day. Countries that have had no institutions and no civil society are going to have problems. Democracy can’t be imposed all at once. It’s a culture. It’s something you have to do every day.”

Edward Gabriel and Michael Ussery, two former U.S. ambassadors to Morocco, put it this way on The Hill’s Congress blog [1]: “Morocco pushed ahead with its own ambitious reform agenda that directly addressed past human rights abuses, the status and role of women in society, the need to focus attention and resources on the most disadvantaged, insistence on religious tolerance, the need to open up political space to civil society and other non-state actors, and conducted a series of the only truly free and fair local and national elections in the Arab World.”

With revolution, war, sectarian bloodshed, and renascent repression roiling so much of the region, Morocco’s gradual political liberalization looks like a better model than ever. And with two hundred years of history behind it, the American-Moroccan alliance is likely to last.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, September 28, 2012 6:55 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS situation report

The information contained in this report is from a generally reliable source, although it has not been corroborated by third party sources.

(1)

According to a leading member of a Sahrawi NGO in Algiers, Polisario's activity over the coming months will focus on one central goal: having defence of the human rights of Sahrawis living under Moroccan administration included in MINURSO's mandate. This objective, which Polisario's leaders have been pushing for several months (Mohamed Abdelaziz has already written to the UN Secretary General on the subject), has been given an additional boost by the visit to the Sahara by UN Special Rapporteur on torture Juan Mendez and the Robert Kennedy Center's recent mission to the Sahara and the Tindouf camps. The impasse that the negotiation process has reached and the difficulties caused by the Moroccan veto against the Secretary General's Special Envoy Christopher Ross have together broken down the reticence of certain members of the Polisario leadership such as Bechir Mustapha Sayed with regard to the tactic of focussing all the movement's efforts on the human rights campaign alone. While agreeing that the human rights question should not be neglected, Bechir Mustapha Sayed had been arguing in favour of a policy of regionalising the Sahrawi question that would have meant pushing to put the Sahara conflict on the agenda of inter-Maghreb relations. This option was ruled out, however, because it stands in opposition to Algerian policy, which is predicated on keeping the Sahara question separate from Algeria's bilateral relations with other Maghreb countries, in particular Morocco – Algiers' line being that the conflict is between Polisario and Morocco, not between Morocco and Algeria.

(2)

On Sept. 22, SADR President and Polisario General Secretary Mohamed Abdelaziz reshuffled personnel at the President's office and SADR/Polisario representations abroad. According to an Algiers-based Sahrawi journalist, two appointments are particularly significant. The first is the removal of Mouloud Saïd from the position of Polisario representative in the United States, a position he has held for 30 years, and his appointment as Minister-Delegate for Asia. According to the source, this is a sign that Mohamed Abdelaziz intends to appoint one of his close associates to head the mission in the United States – the name should be announced before the end of the month. The second is the appointment of Malainin Sadiq as Minister-Advisor to the Presidency. The source describes Sadiq as a "pure product of the Algerian DRS", having served as coordinator with the security services in Algiers for years before being made an ambassador and, now, special advisor to Mohamed Abdelaziz with ministerial rank. In his new capacity, Sadiq will be in charge of security and coordination with the Algerian security forces, and was chosen for this sensitive role because of his longstanding closeness to Mohamed Abdelaziz, says the source. At least one figure within the Polisario hierarchy will be feeling let down after this reshuffle, the source adds: Mohamed Yeslem Baissat, who remains Polisario's representative for Europe but without the formal rank of ambassador, whereas he had been hoping for a ministerial position.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, October 16, 2012 5:01 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring October Week 1

Blog Name	Update Title/ Date	Summary	Comments	Respond?
Two Circles	Bombardier to open unit in Morocco Oct 1, 2012	A Bombardier Aerospace facility will be opened in a free trade zone that is offering a five-year financial incentive, including no taxes. Several international aviation companies have established manufacturing units in Morocco. The volume of exports of this sector has increased to $1 billion in 2011.	0
Reuters	Morocco: subsidy will not affect bread Sept 29, 2012	Najib Boulif, minister in charge of general affairs and public governance said a 15 percent cut in Morocco's subsidies on soft wheat imports in the last quarter of the year will not boost bread prices. High food prices were seen as a factor in violence which engulfed North African neighbours Tunisia, Libya and Egypt last year, and Morocco has also witnessed violence following bread price hikes in the past.	0
Reuters	Morocco selects Saudi-led group for major solar plant Oct 1, 2012	A group led by Saudi International Company for Water and Power has won a $1-billion contract to build a 160-megawatt concentrated solar power plant in the south of Morocco. Morocco hopes to be a key exporter of clean energy to Europe.	0
Reuters Africa	Morocco planning agency revises down Q2 GDP growth Oct 1, 2012	Morocco's GDP grew 2.3% in the second quarter, not 2.6% as had been estimated. It is a sign that the government's 3.4 percent growth goal for 2012 may be tough to meet. Morocco has been hit by drought and the economic slowdown in the European Union, its main trading partner.	0
Magharebia	Algeria dismantles AQIM recruiting network Sept 30, 2012	Algerian security services broke up a suspected AQIM cell that trained young fighters to join Islamist militias in Libya.	0
Magharebia	Algeria, US discuss Sahel security Sept 30, 2012	Algerian Minister Delegate for Maghreb and African Affairs Abdelkader Messahel and the head of US Africa Command met in Algiers on September 29th to examine "the situation in the Sahel, especially the Mali crisis and the prospects for its resolution."	0
Magharebia	Moroccan health sector under	The health sector needs to be reformed. It lacks equipment, human resources, training and	1

	fire Oct. 1, 2012	security, and contains rampant corruption. "We have six doctors for every 10,000 people, whereas in Algeria they have 12.9 and in Belgium they have 35," Health Minister El Ouardi said.
Magharebia	Potential cabinet reshuffle in Morocco Oct 2, 2012	Newly chosen Istiqlal leader and Fez Mayor Hamid Chabat is seeking a cabinet shakeup. The new secretary-general said a cabinet reshuffle will be a good thing, especially if it brings women into the government. The performance of Istiqlal ministers has been mediocre up to now, and yet they need to answer to party campaigners and engage more with the electorate, Chabat added.	2
Magharebia	Morocco mulls judiciary reform Oct 4, 2012	In addition to its obvious function of resolving disputes, Justice Minister Mustapha Ramid said that the judiciary is a locomotive for growth and economic prosperity because it encourages investment and guarantees the rights of individuals.	0
Telegraph UK	Our wasteful aid betrays the needy Sept 30, 2012	This opinion piece suggests that British aid goes to places that don't need it as much as others. It cites Morocco's 120 million British pounds in annual aid from the EU as an example of egregious giving.
All Africa	Morocco: Govt Calls for Firm Actions to Have Syrian Regime End Violence, Start Political Transition Sept 28, 2012	HM King Mohammed VI presented a speech to the UN in which he asked Syrian officials to end violence and embrace democratic reforms. Morocco continues to show regional solidarity by providing medical services to Syrian refugees in Jordan.	0
All Africa	Morocco: HM the King Says the Country Fully Backs UN Decision to Give Special Importance to Resolving Disputes By Peaceful Means Sept 28, 2012	HM King Mohammed VI said that Morocco supports the UN stance of resolving disputes by peaceful means, stressing that achieving international peace and security remains the core mission of the United Nations.	0
All Africa	Morocco: ANHRI Condemns Assaults On Peaceful Demonstrations Calling for Saharawis Self-Determination Oct. 1, 2012	Arabic Network for Human Rights Information criticized the failed security solutions of using excessive violence against demonstrators. They stated that it "is the only method that the Moroccan authorities recognize to address the peaceful demonstration in occupied Western Sahara."	0

All Africa	Morocco: Launch of 'Touiza' Operation in Meknès-Tafilalet Region - Royal Willingness to Put 2012-13 Crop Year Under Sign of Solidarity Affirmed Oct. 1, 2012	King Mohammed VI launched the "Touiza" operation in the Meknes-Tafilalet region, marking the beginning of 2012-2013 crop year. The operation aims at improving the socio-economic conditions of farmers, creating jobs for young people, and developing sustainable agriculture.	0
All Africa	Morocco: Court Orders Prince Moulay Hicham. Khairat Reconciliation Oct 3, 2012	A court has ended an inquiry into a complaint by Prince Moulay Hicham against Socialist Union of Popular Forces leading member Abdelhadi Khairat. The court gave the parties two weeks to reconcile.	0
AFP	Crises strengthen Spain-Morocco ties Oct. 2, 2012	The economic crises rocking Spain and Morocco may favor stronger ties between the neighboring kingdoms despite historical differences. Two Spanish firms were named to participate in construction of the five major solar plants. Morocco is seeking easing of visa restrictions.	0
The Muslim News	Morocco: Using Salafis as pawns Oct 5, 2012	The Moroccan government has realized that they can use the influence of Salafi leaders to protect themselves from popular protest. Allying with the Salafis worked well when youth-led protests occurred last year, but afterwards "the regime once more became hostile to its one-time allies."	0
Afrik News	Morocco and Spain strengthening their relations Oct 4, 2012	The Spanish Prime Minister was in Morocco for meetings with HM Mohammed VI and other government officials to discuss improving relations between the two countries. Eight bilateral agreements were signed.	0
CNN.com Blogs	Morocco navy escorts abortion vessel out of port, group says Oct 4, 2012	A ship of women's activists, seeking to help women receive abortions, was escorted out of the Moroccan port of Smir after the government initially blocked the harbor and prevented residents from accessing the vessel. Abortion is illegal in Morocco.	549
The Daily Star	Palace and Islamists wrestle in Morocco Oct 5, 2012	Prime Minister Benkirane and the Islamists of the PJD have been engaged in several disagreements with HM Mohammed VI over the divisions of power expressed in Morocco's new constitution. PJD sympathizers believe HM has overstepped his authority in many instances, such as control of television, radio, and calling meetings with ministers without Benkirane's knowledge.	0

Herald Online	JetBlue and Royal Air Maroc Partner to Bring More Access to Africa Oct 4, 2012	Jet Blue and Royal Air Maroc have agreed to integrate networks to facilitate travel between North Africa and the Americas.	0
Al Arabiya	Morocco, Spain to strengthen economic cooperation Oct 4, 2012	Spain has overtaken France as Morocco's "top economic partner." Morocco has suffered a drop in economic growth over the last year and "is looking to diversify its markets and doing all it can to attract foreign investments in a difficult climate."	0
The View from Fez	Spanish Government Support for Morocco on Sahara Issue Welcomed Oct. 2, 2012	The Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs referred to "the southern territories" instead of "Western Sahara." Spain appears to be backing Morocco's stance on the issue. The minister will face internal opposition from the Popular Party that considers Morocco an "enemy."	0
FIS	Peru and Morocco intending to increase trade flow Oct 3, 2012	The Peruvian government is investigating the possibility of a bilateral trade agreement with Morocco, in the belief that the two markets will complement each other.	0
Project on Middle East Democracy	Algeria Calls for Limits on Freedom of Expression Sept. 30, 2012	During his address to the U.N. General Assembly, Algerian Foreign Minister Mourad Medelci called for further control over free speech, a seeming response to the anti-Islam film "Innocence of Muslims."	0
Project on Middle East Democracy	Western Sahara Autonomy Discussed, Violence Condemned Oct 2, 2012	King Mohammed VI reiterated his position on creating an semi-autonomous Western Sahara, which was rejected by the Algerian- backed Polisario. U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon summarized a report on Western Sahara at the U.N. which noted "on the core issues of the future status of Western Sahara and the means by which the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara was to occur, no progress was registered."	0
Carnegie Endowment for International Peace	Party Politics for Morocco's Salafis? Oct 2, 2012	Moroccan Salafis are not interested in party politics, but the events of last year have caused a shift in attitude. Many Salafi-jihadist leaders were granted royal pardons and released from jail. With the Islamists' rise to political prominence through the PJD, Salafis and other Islamists openly expressed their hopes that the PJD would resolve the issue of "political imprisonment," and limit their systematic arrest. Their hopes rose when Mustapha al-Ramid, who once represented a number of Salafi-jihadist defendants, was named Morocco's Minister of Justice.	0

The Daily Beast	Morocco Cracks Down on Democracy Rappers Oct. 4, 2012	Moroccan rapper El Haqed is serving a one-year jail sentence for a music video and song, "Dogs of the State," that allegedly insulted Morocco's infamously corrupt police.	0
The Jakarta Post	RI can make Morocco a gateway to Europe Oct 5, 2012	Morocco and Indonesia have enjoyed good relations for several decades, and now they are evaluating the potential for a trade agreement. In addition to Morocco's strategic mineral reserves, Indonesia believes it will serve as an entryway into the European market.	0

Deborah Klodowski
 Intern, Moroccan American Center
 (202) 587-0855 ext 108

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, October 16, 2012 5:01 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring

Blog Name	Update Title/Date	Summary	Comments	Respond?
New York Times	Judges in Morocco Lead Sit-In Calling for Autonomous Judiciary Oct 6, 2012	1000 judges organized a sit-in protest outside the Supreme Court in Rabat, demanding a truly independent judiciary in addition to better working conditions and compensation. There are complaints that ministers interfere in judicial matters.	0
Sahara Press Service	U.S. Department of State criticizes Morocco's human rights violations in Western Sahara Oct. 6, 2012	The U.S. Department of State has sent a report to Congress criticizing Morocco's human rights violations in Western Sahara. Concerns "includ[e] limitation[s] on the freedom of expression and assembly, the use of arbitrary detention and physical and verbal abuse against detainees during arrest and imprisonment." The report states that Moroccan citizens must exercise self-censorship over Western Sahara in order to avoid punishment under Moroccan laws.	0
All Africa	Morocco: Polisario Condemns Aggressive Acts Against Saharawi Workers Southern France Oct 7, 2012	Saharawi workers were subjected to "aggressive and racist" acts by Moroccans in the southern French city of Medoc. The attacks, which necessitated the intervention of the Gendarmerie, were allegedly "fueled and fed" by Moroccan intelligence.	0
All Africa	Morocco: UN Fourth Committee - Entities Reaffirm Support to Process of Decolonization in Western Sahara Oct. 9, 2012	Chile's Ambassador to the UN Mr. Octavio Errazuriz reaffirmed support for the process of decolonization in Western Sahara and the right of the Saharawi people to self-determination and independence. Permanent Representative of Nicaragua, Ambassador of Costa Rica, and Ambassador of Peru agreed with his position. Representatives from Europe, Africa, and the United States are expected to give testimonies about the situation in Western Sahara.	0
Eurasia Review	Morocco: Skirmishes Flare In Tangier	One person was killed and several others injured when police responded to a protest over a court eviction ruling in the city of Tangier.	0

	Oct 9, 2012
Fresh Plaza	Morocco predicts decline in citrus prediction Oct. 9, 2012	Morocco is Africa's third largest citrus exporter, after South Africa and Egypt. This year is expected to see a 25% drop in production leading to an increase in price on these commodities in December.	0
CNN	Morocco's 'liquid gold' liberates Berbers Oct. 9, 2012	Argan oil is opening opportunities for Berber women in Morocco. The oil is mainly made by Berber women in Agadir. Zoubida Charrouf, who helped found some of the first all-women cooperatives producing the oil, said "I am very happy, economically, [because] the price is increasing; socially, because the women can get outside the house and learn; and environmentally, because we can plant these trees."	5
Reporters Without Borders	Hazards mount for freedom of information in Morocco Oct. 8, 2012	Reporters Without Borders is concerned about the increasing violations of freedom of the press in Morocco. They cite the cases of Omar Brouksy, who has been harassed because he wrote "an unprofessional dispatch about the partial legislative election in Tangiers"; and Ali Lmrabet who is being harassed for criticizing certain political leaders that directly or indirectly affect the King.	0
Magharebia	Al-Qaeda appoints new Sahara emir Oct 8, 2012	AQIM's Shura council named Al Vourghan brigade chief Jemal Oukacha, alias Yahya Abou El Hammam, as its new Sahara emir. The news came one month after former Sahara emir Nabil Makloufi was killed in a car crash. El Hammam was sentenced to death in absentia by a Biskra court in a 2006 terror case. France also accuses him of killing Michel Germaneau, a French national who was kidnapped and killed by AQIM.	0
Magharebia	Concert for Tolerance thrills Moroccans Oct 9, 2012	200,000 people were present for a concert in Agadir that promoted concepts of cross-cultural tolerance and respect. Performers came from Morocco, Algeria, and France.	0
Magharebia	Morocco issues moratorium on international adoptions Oct. 10, 2012	Moroccan Justice Minister Mustafa Ramid has issued a moratorium on international adoptions of Moroccan children. Ramid justified his decision with concerns that children adopted abroad will not be brought up to respect their culture, tradition, and religion.	0
Magharebia	Sit-in calls for re-opening Morocco-Algeria border Oct. 10, 2012	Moroccan and Algerian activists staged a symbolic sit-in October 7 seeking to reopen the Algerian-Moroccan border. Activists say that opening the border will allow families to visit and communicate with each other and will bring economic opportunities; creating jobs and opening markets.	0

Magharebia	Spain, Morocco sign co-operation deals Oct. 10, 2012	Spain and Morocco signed eight co-operation agreements during a top-level Spanish visit. The accords focused on security topics but also on "simplifying visa procedures, cooperation in tourism, sports, education, and transportation."	0
Magharebia	Morocco holds global conference on employment Oct. 10, 2012	Moroccan Employment Minister Abdelwahed Souhail highlighted Morocco's progress in shrinking its unemployment rate over the last 10 years. Looking ahead, he said that Morocco must focus on preemptive training and responsiveness to labour demands as well as ensuring jobs for degree holders.	0
Magharebia	UN chief appoints special envoy for Sahel crisis Oct 10, 2012	Ban Ki-moon appointed former Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi as his new special envoy on the Sahel crisis. Prodi will coordinate UN efforts to develop and implement an integrated regional strategy for the Sahel. He will also conduct wide-ranging consultations throughout the region.	0
Magharebia	New programme for female Moroccan entrepreneurs Oct 11, 2012	Morocco has initiated a program called "Infatih for Her" which encourages small businesses to use information technology. Female-owned small businesses constitute the base of the economy in Morocco. "Infatih for Her"'s goal is to ensure the livelihood of these small women-owned businesses by giving them support.	0
The Christian Science Monitor	Morocco admits to police abuse, tarnishing model response to Arab Spring Oct. 9, 2012	The Justice Minister's admission that torture occurs serves to undermine Morocco's position as a model of reform and shows that in Morocco, especially in the prison system, "there is little evidence of change."	0
Morocco News Board	Morocco: Islamists Failing as an Alternative Oct. 9, 2012	Morocco's Islamists claim to be reformers but "[i]t's been almost a year now and no effective political or economic agenda has been implemented." Moroccans are losing patience with the PJD. The Arab Spring, which brought Islamists to power instead of democrats, will not stand for Sharia to be implemented as the Islamists really desire.	0
Reuters	Morocco delays $1 bln sovereign bond sale: minister Oct. 10, 2012	Morocco has delayed its maiden dollar bond sale to the end of November, pending market stability. There is speculation that King Mohammed VI will soon make a rare official tour of the Gulf Arab region from where Rabat hopes to raise a substantial share of the issue.	0
The Daily Star	Democracy in Morocco advancing slowly but surely: PM	PM Benkirane said in an interview with France 24 that democracy in Morocco is slowly advancing. The Arab Spring set fire to regimes and "ours was scalded." Morocco's success "was because...we had a new constitution, we had elections, and a party	0

	Oct. 9, 2012	once harassed and marginalised" was voted to power. He rejected the idea that there was any conflict between his party and the palace.
UPI	Morocco seeks to be green energy leader Oct. 10, 2012	Morocco is trying to become the world's leading solar power state, with a 7,400-acre pilot project in the Sahara Desert it hopes will lead to vast carbon-free solar energy plants that could supply much of Europe's electricity needs.	0
Western Sahara Echo	Statement F.Polisario before the IV Commission-October-2012 Oct. 10, 2012	The Polisario addressed the UN Fourth Committee saying that Morocco has been ignoring the UN Security Council and the ICJ in the invasion and occupation of Western Sahara. Morocco is also forcing MINURSO to "live without credibility and without authority." The Polisario reaffirmed its commitment to a peaceful resolution of the conflict through the UN.	0
Washington Post	S&P ratings revises Morocco's economic outlook down to negative amid Europe's crisis Oct. 11, 2012	S&P revised Morocco's outlook downward to negative because of Europe's financial crisis, a high deficit, and lagging reforms. Morocco's rating remains at BBB- credit, which hovers just above junk bond status, but the negative outlook makes a downgrade possible. A downgrade could make it harder for Morocco to borrow money and find international investment.	0
Chicago Tribune	Ruler of cash-strapped Morocco plans Gulf Arab tour Oct 11, 2012	Morocco's King Mohammed VI is to make a rare official tour of Gulf Arab countries later this year as his cash-strapped government seeks alternatives to its crisis-hit European trade partners. Kuwait's Foreign Ministry Undersecretary Khaled al-Jarallah told Reuters the monarch would discuss investment and bilateral relations.	0
The View From Fez	Marrakech Tourism - Going Upmarket? Oct. 12, 2012	The EU crisis and air carrier issues have hurt tourism in Morocco. Property investment, however, seems to be on the rise. Despite lower prices now, there is still a property bubble in Morocco. Marrakesh and Fez have the worst overpriced properties.	0

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, October 17, 2012 7:02 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian Situation report

This information is from public and non-public sources, and has not been corroborated by third parties

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT #118

October 17, 2012

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- The new government headed by Abdelmalek Sellal will have its hands full fending off socio-economic challenges in the year and a half left before the presidential election.
- Current expenditure having been pumped up by last year's public sector pay rises, capital expenditure has been reined in for the first time in years in the 2013 budget. Even so, the government may be unable to balance the budget if oil prices weaken even moderately.
- An explosion in international grain prices is set to test the regime's strategy of 'buying' social peace to the limits.
- There are signs of a crackdown on potential 'troublemakers', in particular human rights activists and independent trade union organisers.
- Public Works Minister Amar Ghoul has established a new party, TAJ, with what seems to be the tacit complicity of the authorities.
- There is speculation that Ghoul is being groomed as a possible successor for Bouteflika in 2014, or at least as a vice president if and when the constitution is amended.

Foreign Relations

- Algiers has spent much of September and early October battling a French-backed diplomatic push in favour of military intervention in northern Mali.
- Although it has every reason to distrust the jihadist quasi-state that has emerged in northern Mali, Algiers fears the political and geopolitical consequences of military intervention and distrusts Paris' motives.
- The gap between the French and the Algerians has lessened somewhat since UNSC Res. 2017, which calls for negotiations towards a peaceful settlement in northern Mali before the use of force can be authorised as a last resort, was passed with American backing.
- But with little chance of negotiations succeeding, tensions between Paris and Algiers are likely to re-emerge before François Hollande's visit to Algiers, tentatively scheduled for early December.

Security

- With levels of violence lower than average nationwide and particularly low in Kabylia, the question of whether the jihadist organisation's capability in its historic heartland has been lastingly degraded remains open.
- On the other hand, there has been an upsurge in incidents on Algeria's southern borders, including one operation in which a number of SA-7 man-portable air defence systems, smuggled out of Libya, were reportedly seized by the security forces.
- As international discussions continue as to the possibility of a military intervention against the jihadist entity in northern Mali, Gendarmerie commanders from all the wilayas bordering on Mali and Libya have been summoned by their national command to a meeting in Tamanrasset to review border security.

Political Trends

Appointed just over a month ago, the Sellal government was convened on September 17 for the first full council of ministers meeting chaired by President Bouteflika in seven months. The new government now has a programme of sorts, coupled with a draft budget for 2013 that will soon be put to the vote in parliament. Although its programme includes no lofty ambitions for political transformation, the Sellal government will nonetheless have its hands full fending off socio-economic challenges in the coming period – all the more so given that the crucial presidential election is now just a year and a half away.

The official communiqué issued after the council of ministers meeting, which outlines the government's priorities, makes no mention of the promised reform of the constitution, or more generally of the programme of political and institutional reforms launched in April 2011. These, it would seem, are the exclusive prerogative of the Presidency. Prime Minister Sellal and his team, according to the text of the communiqué, are to concentrate on “four main areas”:

- continued improvement of governance such as to strengthen the rule of law, carry through a root and branch rehabilitation of public services and promote national cohesion;
- the consolidation of the economic and financial sphere with a view in particular to strengthening the visibility of the national development process, improving the investment environment, notably as far as land is concerned, continuing the modernization of the financial system and increasing the efficiency of government intervention in the economy;
- the development of socio-economic infrastructures, and in particular implementing scheduled house-building programmes for which all necessary resources will be mobilised, and the expansion of infrastructure networks;
- the promotion of human development through the continued implementation of the reform of the education and training sector, the fight against unemployment, developing government assistance for the less well-off, better support for young people and establishing an efficient cultural policy.

In our last report, we suggested that the replacement of Ouyahia with Sellal might augur a shift in economic strategy, away from the “economic nationalism” championed by Ouyahia and towards more investor-friendly policies. The reference to “improving the investment environment” in the government communiqué comes as partial confirmation of that, but it would seem that Sellal has been told to tread carefully on this front: presenting his plan of action to parliament on September 25, the new Prime Minister insisted that Algeria “would never become a neoliberal country, but will establish the necessary conditions to encourage direct and indirect investment”; furthermore, the rule requiring a minimum Algerian stake of 51% in all ventures established by foreign firms in Algeria, imposed by his predecessor, is to remain unchanged. This cautious, middle-of-the-road approach is very much in evidence in the government's new bill to amend the Hydrocarbons Law^[1]: on the one hand, the conditions pertaining to IOCs' exploration and production activities are to be eased, the methodology for determining the tax rate on oil revenues is to be based on a project's profitability instead of sales, and there are new tax incentives to encourage activities related to unconventional hydrocarbons, small deposits, deposits in under-explored areas, and fields with complex geology and/or lacking infrastructure; while on the other, Sonatrach's monopoly over pipeline transportation of oil and petroleum products is restored and partnership with Sonatrach in the downstream sector becomes obligatory.

The 2013 draft budget is also a cautious piece of legislation. Current expenditure having been pumped up by the public sector pay rises that were rolled out last year in a panic reaction to the wave of revolt sweeping through the Arab world, capital expenditure has had to be reined in for the first time in years; taxes, meanwhile, go up. Even so, it is by no means guaranteed that the government will be able to balance the books at the end of the year. For 2013, as for the past several years, revenue has been calculated on the basis of a reference price for crude oil of $37/barrel, and as in previous years, on paper this results in a deficit budget. $37 is of course way below actual international oil prices, and the government has for years now been able not only to wipe out the programmed deficit each year but to run a substantial surplus. By the middle of this year, however, the central bank calculated that an oil price of at least $112/barrel was needed in order to balance the 2012 budget. The 2013 budget requires broadly similar oil price levels in order to break even, and any lasting decline in oil prices in the coming year could therefore have a dramatic effect on Algeria's fiscal balance, perhaps forcing the government to draw for the first time on the Revenue Regulation Fund established in 2000. Sustained low oil prices might compel the government to review its spending commitments under its five-year infrastructure development plan – putting the regime's strategy of buying social peace at risk. On top of this, as a major importer of agricultural products Algeria is highly vulnerable to fluctuations in global food prices. Drought in the US cereals belt is currently fuelling an explosion in the price of wheat (the main staple in Algeria, in the form of bread and couscous), corn (an essential ingredient of feed for chickens, the main source of meat for ordinary Algerians) and soya (also an input for animal feed, as well as a source of cooking oil). The government's commitment, also made under the pressure of the Arab Spring, to controlling prices for basic foodstuffs means that its subsidies bill will be rising dramatically. Over the medium term, the Algerian government may therefore have to choose between making further cuts to capital expenditure to compensate for runaway spending on consumer subsidies, or cutting subsidies on food and running the risk of bread riots.

It is against this background that the authorities have begun to crack down on potential agitators, in particular human rights activists and independent trade union organisers, who have been increasingly subject to harassment, arrest and prosecution of late. With the clock now ticking on the countdown to the 2014 presidential election, the regime will be all the more inclined to try and keep a lid on social protests.

It cannot be entirely ruled out that President Bouteflika – who has been written off as dead or dying more often than can be remembered but who bounced back once again in apparently combative form at the September 17 council of ministers meeting – might yet stand for a fourth term of office^[2], notwithstanding his earlier hints that the time has come for his generation to stand aside. But a new element has emerged recently in the preparations for 2014 with the creation of Amar Ghoul's Algerian Hope Rally, more commonly known by its Arabic acronym, TAJ (meaning 'crown'). Ghoul, who has been Public Works Minister for ten years, broke with the moderate islamist MSP this year in order to hold onto his ministerial position and proceeded to establish TAJ, which was joined by around 40 members of parliament, freshly elected on the MSP ticket or under the colours of Moussa Touati's Algerian National Front (FNA). In late September, when TAJ held its founding congress, it became clear that the new party enjoys surprisingly abundant financial resources and the tacit complicity, if not outright support, of the authorities. Ghoul has proclaimed that his party, inspired by the example of the FLN during the liberation war, intends to “mobilize the living forces of the country, irrespective of ideological divisions: islamists, nationalists and democrats come together under its banner to inspire hope and build a united, promising and pioneering Algeria” - a discourse which might have come straight from the regime's copybook. The episode is reminiscent of the creation back in 1997 of the RND, which three months after it was established went on to win the parliamentary elections. This suspiciously premature success, together with the physiognomy of its General Secretary Ahmed Ouyahia, led Algiers wits to dub the RND “the baby that was born with a moustache”. The latest joke, alluding to Amar Ghoul's islamist background, casts TAJ as “the baby born with a beard”.

There is now speculation that Ghoul himself is being groomed as a possible successor for Bouteflika in 2014, or at least as a vice president if and when the Presidency finally gets around to amending the constitution. It is worth noting in this respect that Ghoul, although not particularly charismatic, offers the distinct advantage, from the point of view of the regime's power brokers and in particular DRS chief Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène, of being eminently controllable: deeply involved in corruption in his time as Minister of Public Works, notably in connection with the East-West motorway project, Ghoul has to date never been charged, and rarely even accused publicly, giving those in the know – in other words, the DRS – a potentially powerful hold over him.

Foreign Relations

Algiers, as we observed in our last report, is faced with a quandary in the festering crisis in northern Mali, where a trio of jihadist groups (AQMI, the closely related MUJAO, and the Malian Tuareg Ansar Dine) have taken power in the wake of February's revolt led by the ostensibly secular Tuareg-separatist MNLA. While it is clearly uneasy about the emergence of a jihadist quasi-state on its southern border, Algiers is leery of sending its own armed forces to attempt to quash it and is at the same time very reluctant to see other forces – especially extra-regional and a fortiori French forces – take on the job.

Algiers objects to military intervention on several levels. Operationally, the Algerian military foresees only disaster. As a high-ranking Algerian army officer quoted by French daily Le Figaro (Oct. 1) puts it:

3,000 men^[3], thrown into a theatre of more than 8,000 square kilometres, would be insignificant. What's more, the invisible, elusive enemy will conduct a war of attrition that it will win for sure, pitted against a military force such as the one ECOWAS is suggesting – a force that is not acquainted with the terrain of the Sahara, either. Finally, armed groups will be able to draw on the support of the local population, the Tuaregs, for whom an African army amounts to a foreign occupation force.

Politically, Algiers fears the destabilising effect of a military intervention, especially (but not only) if it were to commit troops of its own. Rachid Tlemceni, professor of international politics and regional security at the University of Algiers, sets it out in stark terms:

Stability is a fundamental issue for Algeria's leaders. Between now and 2014 (when the next presidential election is due) they want unity and social peace at any price... [Algeria fears] that military intervention could awaken regional, religious or ethnic extremism, and risks opening a Pandora's box. An explosion in the south would destabilise the north all the way to Morocco. That would be unavoidable. The principle of the inviolability of borders would be challenged, with the risk of implosion as happened in Somalia.

And on the geopolitical level, the involvement of forces from outside the region in any such adventure gives Algiers nightmares. As we have observed on several occasions over the past year and a half, the NATO intervention in Libya, inspired largely by the French, shocked and dismayed the Algerian regime, which saw the whole episode at best as a dangerous precedent in terms of overriding national sovereignty in the name of the 'right to protect' and at worst as proof of the neo-colonial ambitions in North Africa of France and its allies. Since then, there has been a tendency on the part of leading Algerian politicians – including notably President Bouteflika himself and, more recently, Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal^[4] – to pepper their speeches with references to sinister "foreign hands" seeking to stir up strife in Algeria and generally to prepare the way for outside intervention in the country's destiny. A person close to the Presidency quoted by Le Figaro explains that what is feared is:

the return of the old spectre of territorial amputation, as proposed by de Gaulle in 1961^[5]. Since the partition of Sudan, our new position as the largest country in Africa makes us extremely fragile – all the more so since, on our southern border, the Tuaregs broke with Bamako and declared their independence.

Such fears have been expressed with great clarity in an article in Algerian French-language daily El Watan (Oct. 10):

The fact is that Paris does not care much about the chronic instability in Tunisia, where the Salafists are now able to strut around as if they owned the place. And even less [about the situation] in Libya, where the political crisis is in full swing and where insecurity is rife. For France can barely conceal its geopolitical intentions in the Sahel. Its uranium in Niger has ended up radiating throughout the crisis in Mali, which is as complicated as that of Syria. Spoiling for a fight, under the banner of the UN, France has gone as far as to risk alienating neighboring countries, such as Algeria and Mauritania, which will inevitably suffer the blowback from any military intervention. That is why Algiers and Nouakchott are busy too, drumming up support for efforts to avoid a "French solution". Faced with the prospect of a quagmire in Mali, there are two distinct camps: the war front led by France and the rejectionist front led by Algeria.

And indeed, in September and much of the first half of October, there were very clearly two camps in competition: on the one hand the French, lobbying for support for a UN Security Council resolution authorising the ECOWAS to use force against the jihadist entity in northern Mali; and on the other hand the Algerians, lobbying equally actively for a political solution through dialogue and negotiation. To this end, Algeria's Minister-Delegate for Maghreb and African Affairs Abdelkader Messahel undertook a tour of Sahel capitals in early October, accompanied amongst others by Maj-Gen. Rachid 'Attafi' Lallali, head of the Direction du Renseignement Extérieur (foreign intelligence department) at the DRS. This served to confirm and consolidate the support of the governments of Mauritania and Niger for Algiers' approach; the government of Mali, which had earlier formally requested a UN resolution authorising the use of force, remained clearly aligned with France. Meanwhile, representatives of Ansar Dine were quietly invited to Algiers for exploratory talks, in the hope of finding at least one negotiating partner. This in turn developed into a further point of disagreement between Algiers and Paris: with the French rejecting negotiations with terrorists outright and considering Ansar Dine to be of a piece with AQMI and MUJAO in this respect, Algeria began to argue that a distinction could be made between Ansar Dine, as an indigenous Malian Tuareg organisation, and the other two groups, made up of committed jihadists from all over north-west Africa.

By the time French Interior Minister Manuel Valls arrived in Algiers for a two-day visit on Oct. 13, however, Algerian government officials had become much more placatory. This was perhaps in part because Washington, after some humming and hawing, had thrown its weight behind the French-sponsored UNSC Resolution 2071 on northern Mali (approved unanimously by the Security Council on Oct. 12). But it appears also to have been in part the result of the lobbying process of the proceeding weeks. In its attempts to win over the Malian government, Algiers had been compelled to adopt a strong and unambiguous stance in favour of Mali's territorial integrity, which it now considers "non-negotiable" (by contrast, it will be recalled, there were widespread suspicions at the beginning of the year that the Algerian authorities were backing the Tuareg rebellion). Under pressure, the MNLA announced that it was no longer insisting unconditionally on independence for the Azawad (northern Mali), leading in turn to splits in the organisation; in parallel, Algiers appears to be trying to provoke a split in Ansar Dine, between out-and-out jihadists and members of the Ifoghas clan who have joined its ranks largely out of tribal loyalty to Ibrahim Ag Ghaly but have no interest in transnational terrorism. At the same time, Resolution 2071 invites the Malian government, those rebel groups that have "cut off all ties to terrorist organisations" and representatives of the local population to "engage, as soon as possible, in a credible negotiation process in order to seek a sustainable political solution, mindful of the sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of Mali", and leaves 45 days for this before the Security Council shall "respond to the request of the Transitional authorities of Mali regarding an international military force assisting the Malian Armed Forces in recovering the occupied regions in the north of Mali".

This formulation leaves room for Paris and Algiers to express consensus that, while there can be no negotiations with terrorists, drug-traffickers and secessionists, talks are an essential first step. But Resolution 2071 also seems to leave plenty of room for the divergences between France and Algeria to re-emerge later down the line. As things stand now, it seems unlikely that Ansar Dine will really break with AQMI and MUJAO, while the divided MNLA's real strength on the ground is a matter of conjecture, leaving very little prospect for meaningful negotiations towards a “sustainable political solution”. Consequently, there seems to be every likelihood that, when the allotted 45 days run out, the UNSC will be called upon to make good on its implied promise to authorise the use of force. And while Resolution 2071 does make a show of putting the Malian army and ECOWAS forces at the centre of a hypothetical military intervention, there can be little doubt that any operation in northern Mali would require French support (in logistics, transport, probably air power and electronic intelligence) and could also entail direct participation of French special forces (notably in attempting to retrieve French hostages held by AQMI/MUJAO). All of which suggests that by late November – with President Hollande's tentatively planned visit to Algiers just days off – tensions between France and Algeria could be on the rise again.

Security

Levels of jihadist activity and related security incidents were somewhat below average in September: only 13 jihadist operations were recorded (down from 15 the previous month and 19 the month before that), out of a total incident count of 23. AQMI's traditional heartland Kabylia has been particularly quiet: only one terrorism-related incident was reported in the Kabyle wilayas for the whole month between Aug. 13 and Sept. 13^[6], and although AQMI activity resumed in Kabylia after that date it remained at a surprisingly low level, with only 8 operations reported for September and the first week of October. Algerian newspapers reported that security forces in the town of Tizi Ouzou, the largest city in Kabylia, were put on “maximum alert” on October 5 after intelligence services received “credible information” of a suicide car bomb “ready to go” in the town, but there does not appear to have been any follow-through. The question of whether AQMI's capability in its historic heartland has been lastingly degraded, raised in our last report, remains open.

In ALGIERS, meanwhile, the situation was entirely quiet apart from one incident on Sept. 13 when the authorities destroyed a “suspect package” in the Baïnem forest on the western edges of the capital. A local resident spotted the object and alerted the authorities who cordoned off the area and brought in the bomb squad. The object was destroyed in a controlled explosion and its fragments taken to the lab for inspection. It is not clear, though, whether it was a actually bomb.

While the oil- and gas-producing regions of the SOUTH were on the whole quiet, activity and clashes with smugglers on the borders resumed after a four-month hiatus (see previous report). Only two armed clashes on the southern borders were reported from May 23 to September 12, and seven since, including two firefights with smugglers/jihadists around the town of Bordj Baji Mokhtar on the border with Mali, one incident with “jihadists coming in from Libya” near the town of Deb Deb in Illizi, a clash with smugglers south of Djanet on the border with Libya, and a clash “near the border with Niger”. On Oct. 6 special forces units “on the border with Mali” captured “four MUJAO jihadists” — three originally from Niger and one Algerian — “using advanced sensing devices brought in from Russia”. The jihadists were trying to sneak their way in among a group of refugees fleeing instability in northern Mali, but they were discovered. They were found to be carrying individual weapons and “an explosive belt”. The next day (Oct. 7) an army force clashed with a group of jihadists of the Belmokhtar group that were trying to cross into Algerian near Tinzaouatin on the Malian border. The army “destroyed an offroader and killed four jihadist”. Further, L'Expression reported on October 9 that the recent dismantling of a “terror support” network in the east of the country has allowed the authorities to seize “SAM-7 missiles^[7] smuggled in from Libya”. The newspaper gave no further details, but this “revelation” came a couple of weeks after the commander of a powerful Libyan militia told the Washington Post (Sept. 24) that looters had stolen “a large number” of shoulder-fired, heat-seeking missiles (MANPADS) from the militia's base in Benghazi when protesters who called for dismantling the country's militias overran the compound. It is worth recalling here that the Algerian press has frequently talked of MANPADS seized by the authorities on the borders or smuggled into the country, but on the ground there is no firm evidence that AQMI in Algeria itself has such weapons.

Across the border in northern Mali, AQMI's "emir of the Sahara region", Nabil Makhloufi (aka, Abou Alqama, an Algerian national) was killed "in a car accident" north of Gao on September 8, according to reports on Mauritanian news sites, later confirmed by AQMI itself. On October 4 ANI, a Mauritanian news agency, said Jemal Oukacha, alias Yahya Abou El Hammam, a close aid to AQMI Emir Abdelmalik Droukdel, was named the group's emir for the Sahara region. Abou El Hammam, an Algerian national, is one of the most prominent Al-Qaeda leaders in northern Mali, and was earlier this year appointed "governor of Timbuktu" by the AQMI/MUJAO/Ansar Dine alliance which currently controls northern Mali.

The news of Abou Alqama's death set the Algerian press to speculating about clashes between the various factions in northern Mali. On Sept. 28 El-Khabar claimed that members of Belmokhtar's group clashed with MUJAO fighters, leaving eight of Belmokhtar's men dead and Belmokhtar himself "seriously wounded", supposedly because of disagreements between Belmokhtar and MUJAO over how to handle the Algerian diplomats held hostage by the latter. Belmokhtar's followers denied the news in a call to a Mauritanian news agency on Sept. 30, but the Algerian newspaper insisted its original story is true. However, reports that Belmokhtar has been killed or wounded have been legion over the years, and must always be treated with considerable caution.

Meanwhile, as Paris, Bamako, ECOWAS and the United Nations continue to debate the possibility of a military intervention against the AQMI/MUJAO/Ansar Dine alliance in northern Mali, the chief-of-staff of the Algerian Gendarmerie, Maj-Gen. Ahmed Bousteila, has convened a meeting of Gendarmerie commanders from all the wilayas bordering on Mali and Libya (Adrar, Bechar, Illizi, Ouargla, Tamanrasset and Tindouf). Held in the town of Tamanrasset on Oct. 16, the meeting appears to be mainly concerned with reviewing and optimising border patrols, the Gendarmerie's border guard units being in the front line in the fight against arms smuggling and other contraband, as well as infiltration/exfiltration of elements linked to AQMI or allied armed groups.

END

[1] As it stands, the Hydrocarbons Law is already a strange hybrid: first conceived by then Energy Minister Chakib Khelil as a very liberal piece of legislation, offering international oil companies hitherto unparalleled access to Algeria's upstream and midstream oil and gas sectors, it was to a large extent vitiated by amendments imposing a minimum 51% stake for Sonatrach in all upstream ventures and slapping a hefty 'windfall tax' on IOCs' production when global oil prices exceed $30/barrel (which of course they have ever since).

[2] The example of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who has influenced Bouteflika in the past, may conceivably have an impact on the President's personal outlook.

[3] The approximate size of the multilateral force that has been proposed by the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) to reconquer northern Mali.

[4] In his Sept. 25 speech presenting his government's programme to parliament, Sellal proclaimed that "a strong internal front will protect Algeria against malevolent hands that seek to attack the country's stability and unity of the Algerian people."

[5] See WSSR 120418.

[6] There was also an incident on Sept. 5, when police manning a checkpoint at the entry to the Béjaïa port opened fire at car that tried to force its way into the port. But it is not clear whether this was the work of jihadists or in anyway connected to terrorism.

[7] Sic. Apparently referring to the SA-7, Russian-made MANPADS, equivalent to the American Stinger.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, October 22, 2012 2:01 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Carne Ross Event Report
Attachments: ER_GUCarneRossOct2012final.docx

Dear All,

Attached please find the ER on the Carne Ross Event a few weeks ago at Georgetown. Let us know if you have any questions.

Thanks,

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

MAMS Event Report

Date: October 11, 2012

1. Title: From Both Sides Now: Carne Ross, Independent Diplomat

Hosted by the Institute for the Study of Diplomacy and the Mortara Center for International Studies, Georgetown University

Participants:

Carne Ross: Founder and Director, Independent Diplomat

Paula Newburg: Moderator: Director, Institute for the Study of Diplomacy, Georgetown University

2. Overview

Carne Ross spoke about his professional background and how he came to be the director of Independent Diplomat. He discussed his philosophy about what he refers to as the "diplomatic deficit" and how small actors can gain power and influence.

3. Summary

Paula Newberg introduced Mr. Ross as someone who tries to change the international system. She said he works with small states, failing states, new states, and not-quite states. His work makes one wonder what the international system will look like in the future.

Carne Ross started by talking about his professional background. He worked in the UK diplomatic corps until he resigned in 2003 over the Iraq war. He worked on the US-UK bilateral relationship, Iraq (including detailed work on Iraq's weapons), Afghanistan, and the UN Mission in Kosovo, among other issues. His work as a senior diplomat for the UK gave him perspectives on the diplomatic process. He said, "[t]he people we were making decisions about were not present [in the room], not consulted, and not involved." As an example of this, he described how Kosovo was not permitted to have diplomatic representation at the United Nations and the Contact Group (US, UK, France, Italy, Russia and Germany) was the only body that dealt explicitly with the Kosovo question.

Ross spent some time describing what he calls the "diplomatic deficit," which is the difference in diplomatic power and influence between large and small countries. He would like to "close the gap between institutions and people being affected by decisions." Ross' Independent Diplomat organization advises several countries and groups, such as Kosovo, Croatia, Moldova, South Sudan, and the Polisario Front, which is "the representative of the people of Western Sahara, which is to this day occupied illegally by Morocco." He described the Polisario Front as "one of the most marginalized groups in the world", despite the fact that it "has a legitimate case in representative terms and legal terms".

Ross discussed the disadvantages of working with small countries or groups, including lack of access, lack of information, and lack of institutional knowledge. Once one is in charge of setting the agenda and the language of what is being discussed, that brings more influence to an actor. Ross says, "It's fun to have the Polisario propose language to the United Nations Security Council," in that the Polisario gain influence by the act of suggesting language to be discussed in an international body.

Conversely, there are ways to “confer advantages” on small states. The first step is to focus on achieving a singular objective; for example, South Sudan focused on independence. Smaller actors normally operate in small, tight teams of people. Ross says with small teams one can inject a high degree of professionalism and effectiveness and there is less bureaucracy. His final point on strategy for small actors was that it can send a message simply and clearly, over and over. He invoked Israel, Cuba, and Singapore as examples of small, but tenacious delegations with strong, clear, and consistent messages and methods.

Ross turned his remarks to what diplomats do at Independent Diplomat. By definition, their clients are marginalized and frustrated, operating in what they perceive to be a hopeless situation. The method at Independent Diplomat, when approached by a potential client, is to research and analyze the specific situation- identify the key players (diplomats, UN officials, etc.) and to set meetings with these people where he can “ask sensible, polite questions over coffee.” As a UK diplomat he was “trained to tell people what I want; now I ask questions.” The second and final step is to build an integrated strategy with political, legal, and public diplomacy components. In Kosovo, he knew they did not have a strong legal argument, so he hammered the political strategies. He stopped people on his team from issuing legal arguments because they would have undermined the political ones.

He closed saying that he is happy to be doing diplomatic work the way he wants to. He enjoys the fact that it is pure policy work and he does not have to engage any bureaucracy—he works directly with country leaders and “develops intimacy with them.” He feels a rush from helping “very able people” express themselves diplomatically and achieve results for their home country, and admits he feels an “emotional connection” with clients. Laughingly, he said “Maybe I was bullied in school, plus I’m the youngest in my family—I like to work for the underdog.”

4. Q&A

Q: (Moderator) What work are you doing in regard to climate change?

A: (Carne Ross) Our work is all client-driven; one of our clients is the Marshall Islands, which will disappear in 50 years if we don’t do something about climate change. We are trying to inject urgency into the discussion. We are doing some work within a small island association in multilateral negotiations.

Q: (Basil Vsalky, student at Georgetown School of Foreign Service) Are you concerned about losing your UK citizenship? Sometimes you work against UK national interests.

A: (Carne Ross) No, the UK is pretty tolerant. I did receive some nasty letters after I resigned, but now things are okay. I would never take on a client like Hezbollah, Hamas, or Gaddhafi. Independent Diplomat is aligned with right thinking countries, and we do have ethical criteria. Something strange is in regards to South Sudan, the independence movement supported by America, while the US is awful on Western Sahara even though it is exactly the same case of self-determination. I did have a very nice meeting this morning at the State Department about Western Sahara. Our enemies are Morocco and Serbia, those are the only places we have no access.

Q: (Sam Ferhesla, student at Georgetown School of Foreign Service) I have an ethical question; do you ever reject clients?

A: (Carne Ross) Yes, we have dropped or refused clients. If they neglect human rights and democracy, we have the right to terminate the contract. We make sure our clients are decent people by speaking to ordinary people in the area. That’s what I did in Somaliland.

Another lesson I had from my time in the diplomatic corps was that as a high level diplomat surrounded by 25 armed guards, you don't get a full picture of the situation, and we never had a full picture in many places, like Afghanistan, for example.

Q: How are you financed during the period you are investigating potential clients, and throughout the process?

A: (Carne Ross) We are a non-profit, so we have philanthropic funding, as well as support from some governments, like the Swiss. Fees are calibrated by ability to pay.

Q: (Emily Ferguson, student at Georgetown School of Foreign Service): What is your level of involvement with states once your project is completed?

A: (Carne Ross) None. We take our clients very, very seriously, but once a project is over, it's over.

Q: (Zach Homus, student at Georgetown School of Foreign Service): How can we make the UN a more effective body?

A: (Carne Ross): I was on the ground in Kosovo and I can tell you that 90 percent of UNMIK was useless, and in some cases actually made things worse by getting into car accidents with the locals and things like that. UN incompetence is deep seated. It is an international disgrace, and it's pathetic to have an international organization like that in the 21st century. It is trapped by old-fashioned politics. Certain countries are terrible, mean bullies there: India is obstructive and unpleasant, as well as Pakistan; Cuba is unpleasant. The UN Secretary-General needs to be a stronger leader with a "back me or sack me" attitude. I can't stand the god worship of the Secretary-General.

Q: (David Galbraith, Fellow, Institute for the Study of Diplomacy) Does Independent Diplomat take non-territorial clients, like those in Bahrain, who are religiously marginalized?

A: (Carne Ross) We are talking to people in Bahrain, but we can only help in a situation where a diplomatic dialogue already exists.

Q: (Mark Lagon, Faculty, Georgetown University): Is it possible the UN could do some of what you do, in terms of coaching and helping delegations? And how do you classify yourself/ Independent Diplomat in the international system?

A: (Carne Ross) I'd classify us as a hybrid. I don't like the cultural connotation of NGOs.

Q: Can someone do your job without being a former diplomat?

A: (Carne Ross) Clients want to know how the large powers operate, and that's what they pay for. We need employees who know how the machine works.

Q: You set out to change the rules of the game. How's that going six years later?

A: (Carne Ross): We are changing the way people think of diplomacy. Serious governments support us. We have made great strides. For example, South Sudan speaking to the UN Security Council before independence; that was us. I think diplomacy is becoming more eclectic, and that nation-states' powers are declining. Democracies are being co-opted by special interests.

We are going to get Western Sahara independence. How do you get independence? Make other countries recognize you. Western Sahara has every case in international law, and yet it is not a state.

Q: (Deborah Klodowski, Intern, MAC) (Privately asked question, did not identify myself) You say Western Sahara will be independent, but you admit the US does not support that.

We can also see that the relationship between the US and Morocco is getting stronger all the time, with the Strategic Dialogue that was just signed. How do you plan to get an independent Western Sahara?

A: (Carne Ross) Well, I don't agree that the relationship between the US and Morocco is getting stronger all the time. Political situations are fluid and can be changed. Nobody except Morocco supports the occupation of Western Sahara. The rights of Sahrawis are unquestionable.

5. Observation

This event was attended by about 30 people, all students and faculty from Georgetown. Carne Ross, while certainly a person of interest, is not someone who will ever be on Morocco's side. He would like to create a negative image of Morocco. It would be interesting to know how Mr. Ross reconciles his "ethical criteria" with what has happened to Sahrawis under Polisario control.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, October 23, 2012 5:46 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: September 2012 Events Bulletin
Attachments: SR_September2012EventsBulletin.docx

Dear Team,
 Below please find the September 2012 MAC Events Bulletin. Our team compiles a monthly list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

September 2012 Events Bulletin

September 11

The Middle East and the Arab Spring: Prospects for Sustainable Peace

September 14

Morocco's Perspective on the Newly Launched US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue

The Middle East and the Arab Spring: Prospects for Sustainable Peace

Date: 11 September 2012

1. Title: The Middle East and the Arab Spring: Prospects for Sustainable Peace

Hosted by the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University

Participants:

Azizah al-Hibri: Founder and President, KARAMAH

Dr. Muqtedar Khan: Associate Professor of Political Science and International Relations, University of Delaware

Laith Kubba: Senior Director, Middle East and North Africa, The National Endowment for Democracy

Dr. Peter Mandaville: Associate Professor of Public and International Affairs, George Mason University

Joseph Montville: Moderator: Director, Program on Healing Historical Memory, School for Conflict Analysis and Resolution, George Mason University

2. Overview

This panel discussed the Arab Spring and assessed the prospects for peaceful elections and the emergence of stable democracies in the Middle East. The speakers reflected on the relevance of the role of Islamic religious values and the influence of foreign policy as democratic movements in the Middle East negotiate their futures.

3. Summary

Joseph Montville began with a brief mention of Islam and how there are religious values within Islam that support democratic transitions and traditions. The issue is that within Islam there is a fringe that feels that democracy and Islam are incompatible.

Muqtedar Khan focused on the language that is used when discussing democracy and democratic transitions. Khan pointed out that Islam can justify any type of governmental system—the key is to pick and choose within Islam. When creating a political philosophy around democracy, the focus should be on the needs of the community. If the community buys into the philosophy built up around democracy then monarchical forms of government become less likely and won't take root. He discussed two forms of political changes going on within the Arab world today. The first type was political change with regime change like that taking place in Egypt and Tunisia. The second was political change without regime change such as that occurring in Morocco and Jordan. He highlighted that Morocco has been very successful in this regard and has made real and important political changes to the system.

The ultimate outcome of these changes in the Arab world is unclear, but Khan underscored that the language used in the transition was very important and gave some hopeful signs. The term often used in political discourse is "democratic state." The strength of this term is that its meaning is nebulous. Islamists use the term to get support from secularists and liberals while liberals can advocate for a liberal state without using the term 'liberal' with its negative connotations in the Arab world. The idea of a "democratic state" has created "common ground" for all political groups to come together.

Khan next discussed how political transformation in the Arab world were unique – in the Arab world "citizens" worked to create the state, whereas traditionally in the West it has been the state which confers citizenship. Citizenship for all is assumed, creating a situation where the state can be pushed to confer equality based on a universal citizenship. In the Islamic environment today this is more difficult since equality can't be discussed as easily through an Islamic lens - gender and religious equality being thorny subjects.

In terms of the future, Khan mentioned that Islamists are being pulled in two directions by the Arab Spring. Islamist groups want to move towards the political center by accepting democracy within an Islamic tradition. This supports their international legitimacy. Islamists, however, gain domestic legitimacy from their Islamic credentials, which are being challenged for the first time by more conservative groups; pressure from the Salafists, which is pulling Islamist groups to the right. Khan believes that this is a worrying trend which might retard democratic transitions in many of these countries.

Azizah al-Hibri said that democracy must "seep into the political consciousness" of the public before there is any chance that a democratic government will survive. She mentioned that Morocco is a unique case in North Africa because there was no revolution in Morocco. Democratic change is best served by occurring gradually, as in Morocco. That said, she warned that top-down impositions of democracy will result in a reversion to the old autocratic systems. Education of the masses is the only way to ensure proper, gradual change in line with Islamic jurisprudence.

Al-Hibri also touched briefly on women in the Arab world. In most post-Arab Spring countries there are increasing constraints placed on women's rights. Many secularists are pushing for full equality for women by replacing existing Koranic law with more western-style law. Al-Hibri argued This is a poor idea; instead laws must be placed within Koranic terms. There are many historical precedents in Islam and the Ottoman Empire which could support gender equality. The early signs for permanent change within the region are not encouraging. Tunisia and Egypt are going backwards, only Libya is a positive exception where women changed the election law.

Laith Kubba re-examined the Islamic frame through which the West views the Arab Spring. He questioned whether or not Islam was the defining feature of the Middle East, arguing that Muslim communities face the same problems as other developing communities. Developing communities have to deal with the tensions between modernizing and the challenges modernizing poses to their traditional structures. The key difference in the Middle East is that Islam is a "more powerful presence" and has left a strong imprint on the region. Kubba argued that the various traditions and interpretations that have been applied to Islam over the fourteen centuries are more important than current trends in Islam for understanding the region today. Fitting these traditions and interpretations into modernity is the real challenge that many Arab states face. The core values of Islam have been disconnected from the actual practices within the region as evidenced by horrible human rights abuses and destruction of mosques in the name of Islam.

Kubba focused on two areas to determine the extent to which modernity or reactionary figures are dominant in each country. The first area is philosophical, looking for the emergence of thinkers who are examining the intersections between politics and the core values of Islam and the relation between the people and Islamic forces. This is important and where it is occurring there is a strong probability that democracy will last. The other area is the political culture which is patriarchal and fosters dependency. Civil society is too weak to encourage the development of a modern non-patriarchal state. Civil society among the youth is more promising than traditional areas. Youth are more open to modernization and technology and show real promise. The current trajectory, however, is not hopeful.

Peter Mandaville examined the implications of US foreign policy towards the Islamist rise saying that the US has taken a "non-stance" towards Islamist groups within the region. He pointed at two issues which must be kept in mind by policymakers. One is that these Islamist movements are having widespread internal debates about, for example, the practical implications of introducing sharia law and how exactly to implement sharia. This internal debate of the Islamist parties has been "interrupted by politics." The second issue is the "increased pluralization of the Islamic space." Islam is increasingly debated by society and in the political space in these countries; today there are a wide variety of groups which claim to be Islamist. The term has lost some of its utility by becoming so widespread.

Despite his characterization of the US' "non-stance," Mandaville underscored that US policy is no longer anti-Islamist, as in the early 1990's when the mantra of "one man, one vote, one time" was deemed US policy. The US has now routinized its contact with Islamist parties in countries like Morocco and Egypt. US policy was always planning on talking to these rising Islamist parties. The question for the US was what tone the US should take in its policies towards these new groups. The US pursues relationships with countries, not parties, and this view was extended to the Islamist parties rising after the Arab Spring. Mandaville was careful to point out that the US has little influence over the outcome of the Arab Spring. The most important thing for the US is to not appear hypocritical by pushing a human rights agenda on the Islamist parties when, for so long, the US was willing to overlook abuses by friendly regimes. Instead, the US should focus on promoting equality in the Arab world; Islam promotes minority "rights" to a great extent but, this is often an excuse to separate groups from the mainstream.

4. Q&A

Q: (Don Rogers, Catholic Relief Services) The media was very important in the Arab Spring. Could you explain how the media could be useful in spreading the values that you've discussed?

A: (al-Hibri) In Egypt there are private and government channels for media. Since the revolution, private channels opened up and you saw a lot of horrible patriarchal talk. It's important to remember that a free media is not always a great thing. Official media in the past was also bad, encouraging Copt-Muslim violence for example, but there is hope for the future.

(Khan) It's important to remember that social media outlets were vital to the success of the revolutions. This is pretty much the limit of its effectiveness. Media tends to reflect the sentiment of the masses and this is not always positive. Media often has its own "political baggage." The media can signal when change is occurring, but it can't shape it.

(Kubba) The youth is far more globalized than ever before, thanks to the media. The government is not able to condition this new generation.

(Mandaville) The media is unlikely to improve things. Salafists have used the media to increase their constituency, as an example. The plus is that the media provides activists a potential path to provide civic education, which is at the root of what they want for Egypt.

Q: (Don Barns, Banshee University of China): What is the role of NGOs in the transitions and moving forward?

A: (Kubba) The economies of these countries will need the help of NGOs to improve. The Nobel laureate from Yemen got her first leg up from NGOs. She has become the symbol for the uprisings in Yemen. This is only one example, every country has similar stories.

(al-Hibri) The important thing is that NGO's act as partners, not as teachers. There is a role for NGOs if they act correctly, not coming as "liberators," but as equal partners.

(Khan) I want to mention that the US supports NGOs selectively. There are many NGOs, Salafist NGOs for example, which the US doesn't support. This has created a two-tiered system of those that receive western funds and those purely local ones that don't. There are some negative consequences to putting a western-tinge on NGOs - they lose credibility. A better way would be blind funding, so long as a project is good, it gets international aid.

(Mandaville): NGOs have the ability to influence the debate on secular/liberal issues while the political parties are still engaged in the internal debate I mentioned. The issue is how to support them without tainting them with association with the West.

5. Observation

This event was attended by 40-50 people who were a mixture of interns, professors, students, and a few journalists. The discussion was a good overview of the role of Islam in Arab Spring. Morocco was only mentioned as an aside, but they were favorable asides discussing Morocco's uniqueness and the favorable way Morocco has handled the Arab Spring. Dr. Muqtedar Khan was mentioned as someone who has done field work in Morocco and the brief mention he made of Morocco was favorable. He might be a person of interest for MAC. Al-Hibri's views on gradual change being preferable to rapid change also put Morocco in a favorable light and she might also be a person of interest. Qualifyingly, however, she never mentioned Morocco and her views on Morocco's record on human rights aren't clear from this discussion.

\(Back to top\)

Morocco's Perspective on the Newly Launched US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue

Date: 14 September 2012

1. Title: Morocco's Perspective on the Newly Launched US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue

Hosted by the German Marshall Fund

Participants

Youssef Amrani: Minister Delegate, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Kingdom of Morocco

Moderator: Enders Wimbush: Senior Director, German Marshall Fund of the United States

2. Overview

Minister Delegate Youssef Amrani discussed Morocco's perspectives on the newly launched US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue. He highlighted Morocco's importance to the region and the close relationship between Morocco and the US. He also discussed Morocco's goals in the region and the future prospects for Morocco and the Strategic Dialogue.

3. Summary

Enders Wimbush opened by highlighting the importance of the Strategic Dialogue to the US and Morocco. This is in stark contrast to the chaos in Libya and the region. Morocco's relationship with the US is "vital, deep, and robust" and the two nations have close and important ties. He stressed that Morocco was a "formidable" Atlantic actor with an expanding role in the region.

Minister Delegate Amrani began his talk with two messages about Morocco. The first was that Morocco has worked hard domestically to get the Strategic Dialogue. The King has provided leadership that has brought democratic openness and values to the country. Morocco's position on the UN Security Council and the Strategic Dialogue are reflections of the real progress and ambitions of Morocco. The second message was that Morocco is ambitious and wants to expand connections with the US, expand its role in the Security Council and the UN, and make more progress in areas such as job creation. The unique free economy and political openness of Morocco has put the country in a better position than other Arab countries, but there is always room for growth.

Morocco's new constitution has created a "New Morocco," which is inclusive of women and minorities. The constitution itself was the product of "long-consultation" with society and all Moroccan political parties. There is a new "culture of listening" in Morocco that has made these domestic advances possible – Amrani noted that the Moroccan government listens to society and responds. Demonstrations in Casablanca, over an anti-Islamist film, were completely peaceful unlike protests in other Arab countries. This is representative of the "maturity" of Morocco and highlights the positive domestic situation that allowed for the Strategic Dialogue to take place.

The Minister said that the Strategic Dialogue is only the latest advance in the long-standing ties between the US and Morocco. Morocco is a major non-NATO ally of the US and there is an FTA between the two countries. The Strategic Dialogue is yet another tool which will increase the partnership between the two, expanding on long-standing historical roots. The Strategic Dialogue has many concrete benefits for Morocco, as it will include economic proposals, energy policy, and efforts to advance cooperation between the US and Morocco in Geneva over human rights and non-proliferation.

The goals which Morocco hopes to advance via the Strategic Dialogue are primarily security focused. Mali, Libya, and the Western Sahara present great challenges and are high priorities for Morocco. On the Western Sahara issue, US policy is in line with Morocco's desire for a "political solution" and both are committed to working with the UN to achieve a comprehensive solution to the conflict. Regional economic ties, including free trade agreements, would help promote security and would create jobs for Morocco.

At the UN, Morocco has been an "important and moderate" actor working closely with the US for Arab-Israeli peace and over the Syrian crisis. Morocco can act as a bridge or link between the Security Council and the Arab world. Europe is an important partner for Morocco and the Kingdom's main trading partner. Morocco is "a member without being a member" of the EU, participating in many EU institutions and maintaining strong dialogues with the EU countries.

4. Q&A

Q: (Enders Wimbush, German Marshall Fund) Where is the region going and what should US policy be?

A: In regards to Syria, any resolution by the UN has been blocked by the Security Council. There is no way forward since China and Russia block every effort. There is no future for Assad in Syria and Syria must be a democratic nation. Of course, sovereignty must be respected and the country cannot be broken up in smaller units. There are worries over extremism and the growth of al-Qaeda and other salafists groups. The Arab League is important in finding a solution and Morocco can be the link between the Arab world and the Security Council. Prospects are gloomy, but we will continue to work on China and Russia in the UN.

Q: Morocco has a "culture of compromise" unique to the region, will this be used as a model for the region?

A: I don't want to say that we're a model, but we certainly have a contribution to make to the region. The problem is that much of the leadership of other countries has been taken over by Islamists, some are moderate and some are not. The parties in the region have failed to modernize, like Morocco's have done, and the countries remain stuck. The FLN in Algeria is an example of a party stuck in the past. On the other hand, Morocco has a new culture, a modern one that respects minorities.

Q: (Alexis Arieff, Congressional Research Service) Could you clarify Morocco's position on the Arab Maghreb Union?

A: For the AMU to work, there needs to be open frontiers. Morocco doesn't want to push Algeria on this issue, but without open borders the AMU won't work. The Maghreb is an opportunity for investment and countries can't have "frozen postures" if they want to take advantage of the situation. We need some confidence building measures between Morocco and Algeria, which are the key players in the AMU. The area needs the 3D's to really succeed: diplomacy, development, and defense.

Q: (Enders Wimbush, German Marshall Fund): How does the EU crisis impact the Strategic Dialogue and how can the Strategic Dialogue help to manage the crisis?

A: The crisis highlights the investment opportunities in Morocco. Now is the time for the EU to invest in the Maghreb region and in Morocco.

Q: Morocco has an interest in investment; can the country be a link to the Gulf and investment in that region?

A: Yes, most certainly yes. Morocco has close ties to the Gulf - the GCC asked Morocco to join although Morocco decided to just keep a strategic partnership. Morocco has worked with Gulf countries on tourism and investment. Morocco pursues investment from Gulf countries as well as from Europe. Morocco has become a hub for car exports to the region, especially Egypt. Morocco can continue to act as a bridge for investment into the region.

Q: (Jean AbiNader, Moroccan American Center): How can Morocco help with the security situation in Africa?

A: There are two sides to security, one is political and the other economic. There must be a balanced engagement with both in order for there to be security. In Mali, for example, security measures alone aren't sufficient. The same thing applies with immigration issues between Spain and Morocco. The economic issues underlying the instability must be addressed.

Q: (Enders Wimbush, German Marshall Fund): Where does the Strategic Dialogue go from this point?

A: The Strategic Dialogue must continue to move forward on energy, security, and development. The US and Morocco partnership is based on shared values and this must continue.

Q: What is the greatest accomplishment in Morocco's foreign policy?

A: The two issues that have bedeviled Morocco for the past 35 years are the Sahara conflict and Algeria. In the international community, Morocco seeks respect and has been active and moderate in international affairs. Morocco was the first to help the US in the Arab-Israeli peace process and has worked with Israel for a permanent solution.

Q: (Alexis Arieff, Congressional Research Service): What are the concrete outcomes Morocco wants in the Strategic Dialogue?

A: There are many things that Morocco is pursuing in the Strategic Dialogue. Morocco and the US will work closely together on regional democracy, security, and women's rights. Morocco and the US jointly work in Geneva on human rights issues. We work together on seeking a resolution to the Sahara issue, on Maghreb dialogue, and in the South Indian Ocean We are also working to ensure that both parties benefit from the FTA, pursue food security, and energy development. Morocco and the US will work to integrate civil society and businesses into the Strategic Dialogue because the Dialogue is not just a government to government connection. Morocco looks forward to the business forum set for 2012 as well as to increased educational and cultural ties between the US and Morocco. Morocco would like to prioritize development, but these are all issues important to Morocco.

Q: Morocco's diplomats are good at "selling Morocco" compared to all other Arab countries, what's the edge?

A: Morocco always listens to the outside world. Morocco is both an Atlantic country and a Mediterranean country. We are very diverse and have respect for others. When the Jews were thrown out of Spain, they found shelter in Morocco, and this attitude continues today.

5. Observation

This event was attended by 20-30 people, mostly embassy staff and journalists. This event provided an excellent overview of Morocco's views about the Strategic Dialogue with the US. This event was excellent source of quotation material that is extremely favorable to Morocco. The close US-Moroccan relationship, Morocco's regional importance, and the strides that Morocco has made in areas such as human rights, women's rights, political openness, and respect for minority rights were all highlighted during the talk.

\(Back to top\)

September 2012 Events Bulletin

September 11

The Middle East and the Arab Spring: Prospects for Sustainable Peace

September 14

Morocco's Perspective on the Newly Launched US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue

The Middle East and the Arab Spring: Prospects for Sustainable Peace

Date: 11 September 2012

1. Title: The Middle East and the Arab Spring: Prospects for Sustainable Peace

Hosted by the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University

Participants:

Azizah al-Hibri: Founder and President, KARAMAH

Dr. Muqtedar Khan: Associate Professor of Political Science and International Relations, University of Delaware

Laith Kubba: Senior Director, Middle East and North Africa, The National Endowment for Democracy

Dr. Peter Mandaville: Associate Professor of Public and International Affairs, George Mason University

Joseph Montville: Moderator: Director, Program on Healing Historical Memory, School for Conflict Analysis and Resolution, George Mason University

2. Overview

This panel discussed the Arab Spring and assessed the prospects for peaceful elections and the emergence of stable democracies in the Middle East. The speakers reflected on the relevance of the role of Islamic religious values and the influence of foreign policy as democratic movements in the Middle East negotiate their futures.

3. Summary

Joseph Montville began with a brief mention of Islam and how there are religious values within Islam that support democratic transitions and traditions. The issue is that within Islam there is a fringe that feels that democracy and Islam are incompatible.

Muqtedar Khan focused on the language that is used when discussing democracy and democratic transitions. Khan pointed out that Islam can justify any type of governmental system—the key is to pick and choose within Islam. When creating a political philosophy around democracy, the focus should be on the needs of the community. If the community buys into the philosophy built up around democracy then monarchical forms of government become less likely and won't take root. He discussed two forms of political changes going on within the Arab world today. The first type was political change with regime change like that taking place in Egypt and Tunisia. The second was political change without regime change such as that occurring in Morocco and Jordan. He highlighted that Morocco has been very successful in this regard and has made real and important political changes to the system.

The ultimate outcome of these changes in the Arab world is unclear, but Khan underscored that the language used in the transition was very important and gave some hopeful signs. The term often used in political discourse is "democratic state." The strength of this term is that its meaning is nebulous. Islamists use the term to get support from secularists and liberals while liberals can advocate for a liberal state without using the term 'liberal' with its negative connotations in the Arab world. The idea of a "democratic state" has created "common ground" for all political groups to come together.

Khan next discussed how political transformation in the Arab world were unique – in the Arab world "citizens" worked to create the state, whereas traditionally in the West it has been the state which confers citizenship. Citizenship for all is assumed, creating a situation where the state can be pushed to confer equality based on a universal citizenship. In the Islamic environment today this is more difficult since equality can't be discussed as easily through an Islamic lens - gender and religious equality being thorny subjects.

In terms of the future, Khan mentioned that Islamists are being pulled in two directions by the Arab Spring. Islamist groups want to move towards the political center by accepting democracy within an Islamic tradition. This supports their international legitimacy. Islamists, however, gain domestic legitimacy from their Islamic credentials, which are being challenged for the first time by more conservative groups; pressure from the Salafists, which is pulling Islamist groups to the right. Khan believes that this is a worrying trend which might retard democratic transitions in many of these countries.

Azizah al-Hibri said that democracy must "seep into the political consciousness" of the public before there is any chance that a democratic government will survive. She mentioned that Morocco is a unique case in North Africa because there was no revolution in Morocco. Democratic change is best served by occurring gradually, as in Morocco. That said, she warned that top-down impositions of democracy will result in a reversion to the old autocratic systems. Education of the masses is the only way to ensure proper, gradual change in line with Islamic jurisprudence.

Al-Hibri also touched briefly on women in the Arab world. In most post-Arab Spring countries there are increasing constraints placed on women's rights. Many secularists are pushing for full equality for women by replacing existing Koranic law with more western-style law. Al-Hibri argued This is a poor idea; instead laws must be placed within Koranic terms. There are many historical precedents in Islam and the Ottoman Empire which could support gender equality. The early signs for permanent change within the region are not encouraging. Tunisia and Egypt are going backwards, only Libya is a positive exception where women changed the election law.

Laith Kubba re-examined the Islamic frame through which the West views the Arab Spring. He questioned whether or not Islam was the defining feature of the Middle East, arguing that Muslim communities face the same problems as other developing communities. Developing communities have to deal with the tensions between modernizing and the challenges modernizing poses to their traditional structures. The key difference in the Middle East is that Islam is a "more powerful presence" and has left a strong imprint on the region.

Kubba argued that the various traditions and interpretations that have been applied to Islam over the fourteen centuries are more important than current trends in Islam for understanding the region today. Fitting these traditions and interpretations into modernity is the real challenge that many Arab states face. The core values of Islam have been disconnected from the actual practices within the region as evidenced by horrible human rights abuses and destruction of mosques in the name of Islam.

Kubba focused on two areas to determine the extent to which modernity or reactionary figures are dominant in each country. The first area is philosophical, looking for the emergence of thinkers who are examining the intersections between politics and the core values of Islam and the relation between the people and Islamic forces. This is important and where it is occurring there is a strong probability that democracy will last. The other area is the political culture which is patriarchal and fosters dependency. Civil society is too weak to encourage the development of a modern non-patriarchal state. Civil society among the youth is more promising than traditional areas. Youth are more open to modernization and technology and show real promise. The current trajectory, however, is not hopeful.

Peter Mandaville examined the implications of US foreign policy towards the Islamist rise saying that the US has taken a "non-stance" towards Islamist groups within the region. He pointed at two issues which must be kept in mind by policymakers. One is that these Islamist movements are having widespread internal debates about, for example, the practical implications of introducing sharia law and how exactly to implement sharia. This internal debate of the Islamist parties has been "interrupted by politics." The second issue is the "increased pluralization of the Islamic space." Islam is increasingly debated by society and in the political space in these countries; today there are a wide variety of groups which claim to be Islamist. The term has lost some of its utility by becoming so widespread.

Despite his characterization of the US' "non-stance," Mandaville underscored that US policy is no longer anti-Islamist, as in the early 1990's when the mantra of "one man, one vote, one time" was deemed US policy. The US has now routinized its contact with Islamist parties in countries like Morocco and Egypt. US policy was always planning on talking to these rising Islamist parties. The question for the US was what tone the US should take in its policies towards these new groups. The US pursues relationships with countries, not parties, and this view was extended to the Islamist parties rising after the Arab Spring. Mandaville was careful to point out that the US has little influence over the outcome of the Arab Spring. The most important thing for the US is to not appear hypocritical by pushing a human rights agenda on the Islamist parties when, for so long, the US was willing to overlook abuses by friendly regimes. Instead, the US should focus on promoting equality in the Arab world; Islam promotes minority "rights" to a great extent but, this is often an excuse to separate groups from the mainstream.

4. Q&A

Q: (Don Rogers, Catholic Relief Services) The media was very important in the Arab Spring. Could you explain how the media could be useful in spreading the values that you've discussed?

A: (al-Hibri) In Egypt there are private and government channels for media. Since the revolution, private channels opened up and you saw a lot of horrible patriarchal talk. It's important to remember that a free media is not always a great thing. Official media in the past was also bad, encouraging Copt-Muslim violence for example, but there is hope for the future.

(Khan) It's important to remember that social media outlets were vital to the success of the revolutions. This is pretty much the limit of its effectiveness. Media tends to reflect the sentiment of the masses and this is not always positive. Media often has its own “political baggage.” The media can signal when change is occurring, but it can’t shape it.

(Kubba) The youth is far more globalized than ever before, thanks to the media. The government is not able to condition this new generation.

(Mandaville) The media is unlikely to improve things. Salafists have used the media to increase their constituency, as an example. The plus is that the media provides activists a potential path to provide civic education, which is at the root of what they want for Egypt.

Q: (Don Barns, Banshee University of China): What is the role of NGOs in the transitions and moving forward?

A: (Kubba) The economies of these countries will need the help of NGOs to improve. The Nobel laureate from Yemen got her first leg up from NGOs. She has become the symbol for the uprisings in Yemen. This is only one example, every country has similar stories.

(al-Hibri) The important thing is that NGO’s act as partners, not as teachers. There is a role for NGOs if they act correctly, not coming as “liberators,” but as equal partners.

(Khan) I want to mention that the US supports NGOs selectively. There are many NGOs, Salafist NGOs for example, which the US doesn’t support. This has created a two-tiered system of those that receive western funds and those purely local ones that don’t. There are some negative consequences to putting a western-tinge on NGOs - they lose credibility. A better way would be blind funding, so long as a project is good, it gets international aid.

(Mandaville): NGOs have the ability to influence the debate on secular/liberal issues while the political parties are still engaged in the internal debate I mentioned. The issue is how to support them without tainting them with association with the West.

5. Observation

This event was attended by 40-50 people who were a mixture of interns, professors, students, and a few journalists. The discussion was a good overview of the role of Islam in Arab Spring. Morocco was only mentioned as an aside, but they were favorable asides discussing Morocco’s uniqueness and the favorable way Morocco has handled the Arab Spring. Dr. Muqtedar Khan was mentioned as someone who has done field work in Morocco and the brief mention he made of Morocco was favorable. He might be a person of interest for MAC. Al-Hibri’s views on gradual change being preferable to rapid change also put Morocco in a favorable light and she might also be a person of interest. Qualifyingly, however, she never mentioned Morocco and her views on Morocco’s record on human rights aren’t clear from this discussion.

\(Back to top\)

Morocco’s Perspective on the Newly Launched US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue

Date: 14 September 2012

1. Title: Morocco’s Perspective on the Newly Launched US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue

Hosted by the German Marshall Fund

Participants

Youssef Amrani: Minister Delegate, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Kingdom of Morocco

Moderator: Enders Wimbush: Senior Director, German Marshall Fund of the United States

2. Overview

Minister Delegate Youssef Amrani discussed Morocco's perspectives on the newly launched US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue. He highlighted Morocco's importance to the region and the close relationship between Morocco and the US. He also discussed Morocco's goals in the region and the future prospects for Morocco and the Strategic Dialogue.

3. Summary

Enders Wimbush opened by highlighting the importance of the Strategic Dialogue to the US and Morocco. This is in stark contrast to the chaos in Libya and the region. Morocco's relationship with the US is "vital, deep, and robust" and the two nations have close and important ties. He stressed that Morocco was a "formidable" Atlantic actor with an expanding role in the region.

Minister Delegate Amrani began his talk with two messages about Morocco. The first was that Morocco has worked hard domestically to get the Strategic Dialogue. The King has provided leadership that has brought democratic openness and values to the country. Morocco's position on the UN Security Council and the Strategic Dialogue are reflections of the real progress and ambitions of Morocco. The second message was that Morocco is ambitious and wants to expand connections with the US, expand its role in the Security Council and the UN, and make more progress in areas such as job creation. The unique free economy and political openness of Morocco has put the country in a better position than other Arab countries, but there is always room for growth.

Morocco's new constitution has created a "New Morocco," which is inclusive of women and minorities. The constitution itself was the product of "long-consultation" with society and all Moroccan political parties. There is a new "culture of listening" in Morocco that has made these domestic advances possible – Amrani noted that the Moroccan government listens to society and responds. Demonstrations in Casablanca, over an anti-Islamist film, were completely peaceful unlike protests in other Arab countries. This is representative of the "maturity" of Morocco and highlights the positive domestic situation that allowed for the Strategic Dialogue to take place.

The Minister said that the Strategic Dialogue is only the latest advance in the long-standing ties between the US and Morocco. Morocco is a major non-NATO ally of the US and there is an FTA between the two countries. The Strategic Dialogue is yet another tool which will increase the partnership between the two, expanding on long-standing historical roots. The Strategic Dialogue has many concrete benefits for Morocco, as it will include economic proposals, energy policy, and efforts to advance cooperation between the US and Morocco in Geneva over human rights and non-proliferation.

The goals which Morocco hopes to advance via the Strategic Dialogue are primarily security focused. Mali, Libya, and the Western Sahara present great challenges and are high priorities for Morocco. On the Western Sahara issue, US policy is in line with Morocco's desire for a "political solution" and both are committed to working with the UN to achieve a comprehensive solution to the conflict. Regional economic ties, including free trade agreements, would help promote security and would create jobs for Morocco.

At the UN, Morocco has been an “important and moderate” actor working closely with the US for Arab-Israeli peace and over the Syrian crisis. Morocco can act as a bridge or link between the Security Council and the Arab world. Europe is an important partner for Morocco and the Kingdom’s main trading partner. Morocco is “a member without being a member” of the EU, participating in many EU institutions and maintaining strong dialogues with the EU countries.

4. Q&A

Q: (Enders Wimbush, German Marshall Fund) Where is the region going and what should US policy be?

A: In regards to Syria, any resolution by the UN has been blocked by the Security Council. There is no way forward since China and Russia block every effort. There is no future for Assad in Syria and Syria must be a democratic nation. Of course, sovereignty must be respected and the country cannot be broken up in smaller units. There are worries over extremism and the growth of al-Qaeda and other salafists groups. The Arab League is important in finding a solution and Morocco can be the link between the Arab world and the Security Council. Prospects are gloomy, but we will continue to work on China and Russia in the UN.

Q: Morocco has a “culture of compromise” unique to the region, will this be used as a model for the region?

A: I don’t want to say that we’re a model, but we certainly have a contribution to make to the region. The problem is that much of the leadership of other countries has been taken over by Islamists, some are moderate and some are not. The parties in the region have failed to modernize, like Morocco’s have done, and the countries remain stuck. The FLN in Algeria is an example of a party stuck in the past. On the other hand, Morocco has a new culture, a modern one that respects minorities.

Q: (Alexis Arieff, Congressional Research Service) Could you clarify Morocco’s position on the Arab Maghreb Union?

A: For the AMU to work, there needs to be open frontiers. Morocco doesn’t want to push Algeria on this issue, but without open borders the AMU won’t work. The Maghreb is an opportunity for investment and countries can’t have “frozen postures” if they want to take advantage of the situation. We need some confidence building measures between Morocco and Algeria, which are the key players in the AMU. The area needs the 3D’s to really succeed: diplomacy, development, and defense.

Q: (Enders Wimbush, German Marshall Fund): How does the EU crisis impact the Strategic Dialogue and how can the Strategic Dialogue help to manage the crisis?

A: The crisis highlights the investment opportunities in Morocco. Now is the time for the EU to invest in the Maghreb region and in Morocco.

Q: Morocco has an interest in investment; can the country be a link to the Gulf and investment in that region?

A: Yes, most certainly yes. Morocco has close ties to the Gulf - the GCC asked Morocco to join although Morocco decided to just keep a strategic partnership. Morocco has worked with Gulf countries on tourism and investment. Morocco pursues investment from Gulf countries as well as from Europe. Morocco has become a hub for car exports to the region, especially Egypt. Morocco can continue to act as a bridge for investment into the region.

Q: (Jean AbiNader, Moroccan American Center): How can Morocco help with the security situation in Africa?

A: There are two sides to security, one is political and the other economic. There must be a balanced engagement with both in order for there to be security. In Mali, for example, security measures alone aren't sufficient. The same thing applies with immigration issues between Spain and Morocco. The economic issues underlying the instability must be addressed.

Q: (Enders Wimbush, German Marshall Fund): Where does the Strategic Dialogue go from this point?

A: The Strategic Dialogue must continue to move forward on energy, security, and development. The US and Morocco partnership is based on shared values and this must continue.

Q: What is the greatest accomplishment in Morocco's foreign policy?

A: The two issues that have bedeviled Morocco for the past 35 years are the Sahara conflict and Algeria. In the international community, Morocco seeks respect and has been active and moderate in international affairs. Morocco was the first to help the US in the Arab-Israeli peace process and has worked with Israel for a permanent solution.

Q: (Alexis Arieff, Congressional Research Service): What are the concrete outcomes Morocco wants in the Strategic Dialogue?

A: There are many things that Morocco is pursuing in the Strategic Dialogue. Morocco and the US will work closely together on regional democracy, security, and women's rights. Morocco and the US jointly work in Geneva on human rights issues. We work together on seeking a resolution to the Sahara issue, on Maghreb dialogue, and in the South Indian Ocean . We are also working to ensure that both parties benefit from the FTA, pursue food security, and energy development. Morocco and the US will work to integrate civil society and businesses into the Strategic Dialogue because the Dialogue is not just a government to government connection. Morocco looks forward to the business forum set for 2012 as well as to increased educational and cultural ties between the US and Morocco. Morocco would like to prioritize development, but these are all issues important to Morocco.

Q: Morocco's diplomats are good at "selling Morocco" compared to all other Arab countries, what's the edge?

A: Morocco always listens to the outside world. Morocco is both an Atlantic country and a Mediterranean country. We are very diverse and have respect for others. When the Jews were thrown out of Spain, they found shelter in Morocco, and this attitude continues today.

5. Observation

This event was attended by 20-30 people, mostly embassy staff and journalists. This event provided an excellent overview of Morocco's views about the Strategic Dialogue with the US. This event was excellent source of quotation material that is extremely favorable to Morocco. The close US-Moroccan relationship, Morocco's regional importance, and the strides that Morocco has made in areas such as human rights, women's rights, political openness, and respect for minority rights were all highlighted during the talk.

\(Back to top\)

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, October 26, 2012 6:28 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: October Blog Monitory Week 4

Blog Name	Update Title/Date	Summary	Comments	Respond?
Reuters Africa	Morocco inflation rises to 1.2 pct in Sept from 1 pct in Aug Oct. 21, 2012	Morocco's consumer price inflation increased to an annual 1.2 percent in September from 1 percent in August, the High Planning Authority said.	0
Reuters	Morocco expects first Gulf aid payouts in early 2013 Oct. 22, 2012	Morocco expects to receive early next year the first part of $2.5 billion in aid promised by wealthy Gulf Arab states. The aid helps to cement ties between Arab monarchies at a time of political turmoil. Foreign aid is important to Morocco which is "heavily exposed" to the pitfalls of the EU.	1
NBCNews	Morocco denies destruction by Salafi Muslims of pagan rock carving Oct. 21, 2012	Reports of the destruction of a rock engraving in Morocco are false. The communication minister took the media to prove that they were undamaged. Morocco has generally followed a tolerant form of Sunni Islam, although there were fears of rising Salafism post-9/11. The government arrested hundreds, especially following the 2003 Casablanca bombings.	29
Washington Post	Salafists destroy ancient carvings in Morocco Oct. 18, 2012	Morocco's government has denied that ancient carvings have been destroyed. The Amazigh League for Human Rights says that Salafis destroyed ancient carvings. This is "the latest in a string of incidents in which radicals have destroyed historic and religious sites under	35

		the guise of defending religious tenets” like the shrine destruction in Mali.
The Peninsula	Moroccan FM: 'Qatar-Morocco ties are historical' Oct. 20, 2012	Othmani has praised Qatar’s standing by “Arab populations” from the beginning of the Arab Spring. He also stressed that Morocco-Qatar ties are strong “at all levels.” Talks between the two states are expected to focus on GCC developmental support for Morocco. He pointed to Morocco’s exposing of Israeli “violations” saying that Morocco and Qatar share similar views on the Palestinian conflict and on other regional crises such as Syria.	0
All Africa	Morocco: Restore AFP Reporter's Accreditation - New Move Against International Media Two Years After Al Jazeera Banned Oct. 22, 2012	Moroccan authorities should restore the accreditation of AFP journalist Omar Brouksy and stop retaliating against foreign media for what they report. 2 years ago, Morocco shut down the Morocco bureau of Al Jazeera television in response to its coverage of the disputed territory of Western Sahara. The UNHRC has said that limited accreditation can only be applied in a “non-discriminatory manner.”	0
All Africa	Africa: 18 Educators From Africa, Middle East for Microsoft PLF Oct. 23, 2012	For enhancing student success through innovative use of technology in the classroom, Microsoft announced that 18 educators from Nigeria, Ghana, Jordan, Mauritius, Oman, Pakistan, Lebanon, Qatar, Turkey, South Africa, Egypt, UAE, Lesotho, Saudi Arabia, Uganda and Morocco will represent the Middle East and Africa in the Partners in Learning Global forum which will take place in Prague later this year.	0
All Africa	Morocco: All	President of Republic and	0

	Sahrawi Men and Women Are Workers for Independence. Says President of Republic Oct. 22, 2012	Secretary General of Polisario Front Mohamed Abdelaziz has praised the role of the Saharawi workers in the national struggle, emphasizing "all Saharawi men and women are workers for independence," in a speech at the 7th Congress of Saharawi Workers Union.
All Africa	Morocco: UN Special Rapporteur On Torture Asserts Morocco Uses Torture Against Saharawi Civilians Oct. 24, 2012	UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, Juan Mendez, told the UN Security Council that Morocco uses excessive torture against human rights defenders and political prisoners in Western Sahara. "Whenever there is a sense that national security is involved, there is a tendency to use torture in interrogation. Difficult to say how pervasive or how systematic it is, but it happens frequently enough that the government of Morocco should not ignore the practice," he said. Torture occurred in both Western Sahara and in Morocco.	0
Tax News	Morocco's Governing Council Approves Budget Oct. 22, 2012	Morocco's governing council has adopted the 2013 budget. Following the meeting, Morocco's Communications Minister and government spokesman Mustapha El Khalfi revealed that the 2013 budget predicts growth next year of 4.5%, and for a reduction of the public deficit to 4.8% of GDP.	0
Magharebia	Moroccan courts hit by strikes Oct. 22, 2012	Moroccan court clerks staged a three-day strike last week to protest work-related grievances and push for reform. The clerks are members of the Democratic Justice Syndicate. This follows a sit-in by judicial officers on October 5 in Rabat.	0

		Morocco has "irrevocably" docked salaries of striking clerks. In the absence of prospects for dialogue, the strike movement among court officials could grow over the coming days.
Magharebia	Maghreb activists push for death penalty ban Oct. 23, 2012	Oct. 18-20, Rabat hosted the first regional conference seeking to eliminate the death penalty from the MENA region. Morocco was praised as being "qualified, more than any other country in the region, to [ban the death penalty] since it has stopped the implementation of death penalties for two decades" said the mayor of Rabat.	0
Magharebia	Rabat forum explores new security threats Oct. 24, 2012	A Rabat forum on security concluded that Southern Atlantic states need to work closer together to fight terrorism. Particular focus was placed on combating illicit drug trafficking and "polycriminal" threats.	0
Magharebia	Moroccan king tours Gulf countries Oct. 25, 2012	The King's Gulf trip focused on economic cooperation and development with the GCC. The GCC promised Morocco $5 billion over a period of 5 years. The focus for the funds will be on development and investment particularly in agriculture.	0
Magharebia	US Secretary of State to visit Algeria Oct. 25, 2012	US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton will visit Algeria on October 30th, the US State Department said on October 24th. Clinton will meet Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika to discuss issues of bilateral and regional concern. The visit comes after the first session of the Algerian-US Strategic Dialogue held on October 19th in Washington.	0
Christian Science	Spain loses title as	Many Moroccan migrants are leaving Spain due to	0

Monitor	Moroccans' land of opportunity Oct. 22, 2012	poor economic conditions. Moroccan workers in Spain have an unemployment rate of 50%. Many northern areas of Morocco rely on migration to Spain for remittances. This decline is symptomatic of broader EU woes which have negatively impacted the Moroccan economy and Morocco may have trouble handling this influx of people.
The Daily Star	European prisoners in Morocco 'on hunger strike' Oct. 22, 2012	European prisoners in Morocco, some of whom are also Moroccan, have begun a hunger strike to protest poor conditions. Most complain of "physical abuse" and said they were denied fair trials. Morocco has denied that a hunger strike is occurring and denied that there was any poor treatment. The UN special envoy on torture has said that inhumane treatment of prisoners in Morocco is "very frequent."	0
MENAFN	King of Morocco Mohammed VI Visits Kuwait Oct. 24, 2012	This extremely flattering editorial refers to King Mohammed as the "King of Hearts," lauds the economic progress and green reforms Morocco has made and extols its bright future.	0
BusinessWeek	Locust Plague May Spread to North Africa as Swarms Form in Chad Oct. 23, 2012	"Locusts will probably spread to North Africa in coming weeks as swarms form in Chad and are about to gather in Mali and Niger after summer rains," the United Nations' Food & Agriculture Organization said. The FAO has alerted Algeria, Morocco, Libya and Mauritania to prepare for the arrival of desert locust swarms.	0
Gulf Daily News	GFH's Morocco project is under modification	Bahrain-based Islamic investment bank Gulf Finance House (GFH) has announced that its development project in	0

	Oct. 23, 2012	Morocco, the Royal Ranches Marrakech (RRM), is undergoing critical modifications to adapt to the changing market conditions in Marrakech. The project will now shift from luxury large scale villas to small- medium apartments.
MmegiOnline	Students in Morocco feel neglected Oct. 25, 2012	Batswana students studying in Morocco have expressed dissatisfaction with the education system and the insufficient allowances given to them. They complain that the French instruction is poor and that course guidelines are ignored. There are also complaints about racism and failures to look after their social welfare. The students say their experience in Morocco has been bad. They want to return home to be offered better learning conditions.	1

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, November 18, 2012 8:01 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitor November Week 3

FYI, weekly blog reveiws

Blog Name	Update Title/Date	Summary	Comments	Respond
Magharebia	Rains add to worries of Moroccans in shantytowns Nov. 11, 2012	Recent rain in Morocco is a boon to farmers but devastating to the urban poor, making life in shantytowns and dilapidated buildings even more unpleasant and difficult. Travel is more difficult and there is always the danger of the shanty falling down on the heads of residents. The rainy season also draws attention to the "aging worn-out structures" in Rabat and Casablanca. Morocco's 2004 initiative to eliminate shanty towns, costing $25 billion dirhams, is 70% complete.	0
