Magharebia	Morocco reacts to terror arrests Nov. 12, 2012	Public opinion in Morocco is split over several large-scale terror arrests. The past month has seen a significant spike in reported apprehensions. While most applaud the efforts of the security services, others are sceptical and want precise and transparent information about these arrests to be released. Others are concerned that Morocco might have more terror cells hiding within the country.	0
Magharebia	Compensation Fund strains Morocco budget Nov. 13, 2012	Morocco's Compensation Fund is weighing heavily on the state budget, with officials warning reforms as an urgent necessity. The government has set a target of holding Compensation Fund expenditures to a sustainable level and seeks to target the poorest members of the population by giving them direct conditional money transfers.	0
Magharebia	Morocco launches job training projects Nov. 15, 2012	New training centers aim to improve the employability of young Moroccans. King Mohammed VI opened one such facility in Marrakech. The site will offer vocational instruction in the building trades and public works sector. Another new center will focus on training for the handicraft industry.	0
Green Prophet	Morocco is Building a Mega "Green City" Named After King Mohammed VI Nov. 12, 2012	Mohammed VI Green City, a future "eco" development is being built just outside of Benguerir. Exactly what will make the Mohammed VI Green City so green has yet to be established, though plans are underway to develop a 4km, 80 hectare corridor between this new development and Benguerir that will be planted with 50,000 trees. The project sounds much like another so-called "eco-city" in the Middle East, namely Masdar City.	0
Green Prophet	Spain Ditches Morocco's Desertec	Morocco's ambitious Desertec solar energy project received a setback after Spain failed to show for the official signing of the agreement that aims to transform

	Solar Project Meeting Nov. 13, 2012	North Africa's energy market. Spain is a key partner in the Desertec project.
All Africa	Morocco: Polisario Denounces Expulsion of International Observers =

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, November 23, 2012 9:39 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Biographies of House Freshman
Attachments: Biographies of House Freshmen.pdf

FYI, attached is a listing of all new members of the House Freshmen, that will come into office with the new Congress in January. Ed

Biographies of House Freshmen

November 14, 2012

Roadmap

Biographies of House Freshmen: Republicans

(In Alphabetical Order, by Last Name)

Biographies of House Freshmen: Democrats

(In Alphabetical Order, by Last Name)

Freshmen Republicans

Andy Barr

R-Ky. (06)

Born: July 24, 1973

Family: Married, Carol Barr; one daughter

Religion: Episcopalian

Education: University of Virginia, B.A. 1996; University of Kentucky, J.D. 2001

Career: Practicing attorney, 2008-12; attorney, Kentucky Governor's office, 2004-07; legislative assistant, U.S.

Rep. Jim Talent, 1996-98

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Yet to be determined

erry Bentivolio

R-Mich. (11)

Born: Oct. 6, 1951

Family: Married, Karen Bentivolio; two children

Religion: Christian

Education: St. Mary's College, B.A.; Marygrove College, M.Ed

Career: Car designer; homebuilder; teacher; farmer

Military Service: Army; Michigan Army National Guard

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Conservative hard lines on spending, tax cuts, and abortion

Freshmen Republicans

Jim Bridenstine

R-Okla. (01)

Born: June 15, 1975

Family: Married, Michelle Ivory Bridenstine; three children

Religion: Baptist

Education: Rice University, B.A., 1998; Cornell University, M.B.A., 2009

Career: Director, Tulsa Air and Space Museum, 2008-10; defense consultant, Wyle Laboratories, 2007-08

Military Service: Navy pilot, 1998-2007; Afghanistan, 2002; Iraq, 2003

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Expected conservative; backed by tea party

David M. Brooks

R-Ind. (05)

Born: Aug. 25, 1960

Family: Married, David M. Brooks; two children

Religion: Catholic

Education: Miami University in Ohio, B.A., 1982; Indiana University, J.D., 1985

Career: Senior vice president, general counsel, Ivy Tech Community College, 2007-present; U.S. attorney, Southern District of Indiana, 2001-07; practicing attorney, 2000-01; deputy mayor, Indianapolis, 1998-99

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Channels understated conservatism akin to Governor Mitch Daniels; previous experience working to prosecute crime such as homicides, human trafficking, and drugs, as well as consolidating the counterterrorism apparatus of the Southern District of Indiana

Freshmen Republicans

Chris Collins

R-N.Y. (27)

Born: May 20, 1950

Family: Married, Mary Sue Collins; three children

Religion: Catholic

Education: North Carolina State University, B.S., 1972; University of Alabama (Birmingham), M.B.A., 1975

Career: Entrepreneur, 1998-2007; general manager, CEO, Nuttall Gear Corp., 1983-97; Westinghouse Electric, 1972-83

Elected Office: Erie County executive, 2007-11

On the issues: Promised to bring business acumen to D.C.; known as “the fix-it guy”, helping to turn around Erie County’s budget problems and infrastructure while serving office; wants to instill budget efficiency at the federal level; opposes Obama’s tax increase proposals

Doug Collins

R-Ga. (09)

Born: Aug. 16, 1966

Family: Married, Lisa Collins; three children

Religion: Baptist

Education: North Georgia College & State University, B.S., 1988; New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, M.Div., 1996; John Marshall Law School, J.D., 2008

Career: Practicing attorney, 2008-present; pastor, Chicopee Baptist Church, 1994-2005

Military Service: Chaplain, Air Force Reserve, 2002-present; Iraq, 2008

Elected Office: Georgia House, 2006-present

On the issues: Deeply conservative; campaign drew on legislative experience crafting budgets and anti-Obama sentiment

Freshmen Republicans

Paul Cook

R-Calif. (08)

Born: March 3, 1943

Family: Married, Jeanne Cook; two children

Religion: Catholic

Education: Southern Connecticut State University, B.S., 1966; California State University-San Bernardino, MPA, 1996; University of California-Riverside, M.A., 2000

Career: Professor, University of California-Riverside, 2002-present; assistant professor, Copper Mountain College, 1998-2002; executive director, Yucca Valley Chamber of Commerce, 1993-94

Military Service: Marine Corps, 1966-92

Elected Office: California Assembly, 2006-12; Yucca Valley Town Council, 1998-2006

On the issues: Campaigned on promises not to raise taxes and as an advocate for veteran and military families; while on state assembly, worked on issues related to retirement homes, child custody, higher education, and veteran services; pushed legislation to protect children from sexual predators

Tom Cotton

R-Ark. (04)

Born: May 13, 1977

Family: Single

Religion: Christian

Education: Harvard University, B.A., 1999; J.D., 2002

Career: Management consultant, McKinsey & Co., 2010-11; practicing attorney, 2003-04

Military: Army, 2004-09

Elected Office: None

On the issues: While in military, known for a hardline anti-terrorism stance; endorsed by an anti-tax group, Club for Growth, as well as the National Republican Congressional Committee and John McCain

Freshmen Republicans

Kevin Cramer R-N.D. (At Large)

Born: Jan. 21, 1961

Family: Married, Kris Cramer; five children

Religion: Evangelical Christian

Education: Concordia College (Minn.), B.A., 1983; University of Mary, M.S., 2003

Career: Director, Harold Schafer Leadership Foundation, 2001-03; director, North Dakota tourism, 1993-97; North Dakota Republican Party, 1990-93

Elected Office: North Dakota Public Service Commission, 2003-present

On the issues: Deeply-held social conservative values, inspired by Ronald Reagan; guided an energy boom in state's economy; ran on commitment to Christian faith

Steve Daines -Mont. (At Large)

Born: August 20, 1962

Family: Married, Cindy Daines; four children

Religion: Presbyterian

Education: Montana State University, B.S., 1984

Career: Vice president, Clair Daines Construction, 1997-2000; general manager/vice president, RightNow Technologies; operations management, Procter & Gamble, 1984-1997

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Traditionally Republican; supports across-the-board spending cuts and a freeze in federal spending at 2008 levels to fix deficit; calls for repeal of Obama's health care act and an evaluation of Dodd-Frank-like regulations; proposes a market-based, all-inclusive approach to new energy sources

Freshmen Republicans

Rodney Davis

R-Ill. (13)

Born: Jan. 5, 1970

Family: Married; Shannon Davis; three children

Religion: Catholic

Education: Millikin University, B.A., 1992

Career: Projects director; Rep. John Shimkus, 1997-2012; executive director, Illinois Republican Party, 2011; staff assistant, Illinois Secretary of State, 1992-96

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Emphasized interest in small businesses; emphasized his work on the board of education for his local church while campaigning; calls for a repeal of Obama's health care act and a cut in government spending, excepting Pell Grants

Ron DeSantis

R-Fla. (06)

Born: Sept. 14, 1974

Family: Married, Casey Black DeSantis

Religion: Catholic

Education: Yale University, B.A., 2001; Harvard University, J.D., 2004

Career: Practicing attorney, 2004-present

Military Service: Navy, 2004-present

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Ran for Congress with goal of tackling domestic issues, touting military experience and strong conservative views; believes Obama and allies "have charted a course that is alien to our Republic's philosophical foundations;" backed by tea party; promotes eliminating lawmaker incentives, such as pensions, to foster a citizen-leader body in the House

Freshmen Republicans

George Holding R-N.C. (13)

Born: April 17, 1968

Family: Married, Lucy Herriot; four children

Religion: Baptist

Education: Wake Forest University, B.A., 1990; J.D., 1996

Career: U.S. attorney, Eastern District of North Carolina, 2006-11; assistant U.S. attorney, Eastern District of North Carolina, 2002-06; practicing attorney, 2001-02; legislative aide, Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., 1999-2001; practicing attorney, 1996-99

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Campaign focused on core family values and responsibility; conservative views inspired by Reagan

Richard Hudson R-N.C. (08)

Born: Nov. 4, 1971

Family: Married, Renee Hudson

Religion: Christian

Education: University of North Carolina-Charlotte, B.A., 1996

Career: President, Cabarrus Marketing Group, 2011-present; chief of staff, Rep. Mike Conaway, R-Texas, 2008-11; chief of staff, Rep. John Carter, R-Texas, 2006-08; chief of staff, Rep. Virginia Foxx, R-N.C., 2005-06; deputy chief of staff, Rep. Robin Hayes, R-N.C.

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Emphasized experience on Capital Hill working behind-the-scenes cultivating connections; promised to work to fully fund retraining programs for laid-off textile workers

Freshmen Republicans

David Joyce
R-Ohio (14)

Born: March 17, 1957
Family: Married, Kelly Joyce; three children
Religion: Catholic
Education: University of Dayton, B.S., 1979; J.D., 1982
Career: Public defender, Gauga County, Ohio, 1985-88; public defender, Cuyahoga County, Ohio, 1983-84
Elected Office: Prosecutor, Gauga County, 1988-present
On the issues: Views more conservative than predecessor Rep. Steve LaTourette's but not as conservative as many GOP newcomers; believes federal government central for infrastructure; not entirely opposed to raising revenue to curtail deficit; opposes abortion except in cases of rape, incest, and the life of the woman, though understanding of pro-choice stances

Doug LaMalfa
R-Calif. (01)

Born: July 2, 1960
Family: Married, Jill LaMalfa; four children
Religion: Christian
Education: California Polytechnic State University, B.S., 1982
Career: Owner, rice farm, 1982-present
Elected Office: California Senate, 2010-present; California Assembly, 2002-08
On the issues: Endorsed by retiring predecessor Rep. Wally Herger; has promoted agricultural interests whole career in policy; fought government spending and regulation, leading effort to freeze funding for California's high-speed rail project; opposed state-level Dream Act proposal

Freshmen Republicans

Thomas Massie

R-Ky. (04)

Born: Jan. 13, 1971

Family: Married, Rhonda Massie; four children

Religion: Christian

Education: Massachusetts Institute of Technology, B.S., 1993; M.S., 1996

Career: Farmer, 2003-present; founder, chairman, chief technology officer, SenseAble Technologies, 1993-2003

Elected Office: Judge-executive, Lewis County, 2010-12

On the issues: Self-described “conservative with common sense;” campaigned on his business background and budget-cutting experience as a county official; has attracted the support of tea party activists

Mark Meadows

R-N.C. (11)

Born: July 28, 1959

Family: Married, Debbie Meadows; two children

Religion: Christian

Education: University of South Florida, B.S., 1983

Career: Real estate developer, 1990-present; owner, sandwich shop, 1986-1990; director, customer relations and public safety, Tampa Electric, 1983-86

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Longtime Republican activist; ran ads emphasizing his opposition to many of President Obama’s policies in his run for current House seat

Freshmen Republicans

Luke Messer

R-Ind. (06)

Born: Feb. 27, 1969

Family: Married, Jennifer Messer; three children

Religion: Presbyterian

Education: Wabash College, B.A., 1991; Vanderbilt University, J.D., 1994

Career: President, Hoosiers for Economic Growth Network, 2010-present; practicing attorney, 2006-present; executive director, Indiana Republican Party, 2001-05; legal counsel, House Government Reform and Oversight Committee, 1999; legal counsel, Reps. Dan Burton, R-Ind., and David McIntosh, R-Ind., 1998-99; press secretary, Rep. Ed Bryant, R-Tenn., 1997; legal counsel, Koch Industries, 1995-96

Elected Office: Indiana House, 2003-06

On the issues: Values hard work and self-sufficiency; aligned with policies of departing Rep. Mike Pence; in state House, focused on education, mostly aimed at curbing high school dropouts

rkwayne Mullin

R-Okla. (02)

Born: July 26, 1977

Family: Married, Christie Mullin; three children

Religion: Christian

Education: Oklahoma State University Institute of Technology, A.D., 2010; Missouri Valley College, attended, 1996

Career: Owner, Mullin Plumbing, 1996-present

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Opposes overregulation and Obama's policies, such as Dodd-Frank and the stimulus package

Freshmen Republicans

Scott Perry R-Pa. (04)

Born: May 27, 1962

Family: Married, Christy Perry; two children

Religion: Christian

Education: Pennsylvania State University, B.A., 1991; U.S.Army War College, M.S.P., 2012

Career: Co-owner, Hydrotech Mechanical Services, 1993-present; insurance sales agent, 1984-85; dock worker, Dauphin Distribution, 1981-82

Military Service: Pennsylvania Army National Guard, 1980-present; Iraq, 2009

Elected Office: Pennsylvania House, 2006-present

On the issues: More conservative than predecessor; retiring Rep. Todd Platts; supports a leaner federal government; gun rights, and traditional marriage; opposes Obama's health care reform

bert Pittenger R-N.C. (09)

Born: Aug. 15, 1948

Family: Married, Suzanne Bahakel Pittenger; four children

Religion: Christian

Education: University of Texas, B.A., 1970

Career: Owner, Robert Pittenger Co., 1989-present; assistant to the president, Campus Crusade for Christ, 1970-1985

Elected Office: North Carolina Senate, 2002-08

On the issues: Conservative values, deeply concerned about nation's budget deficit

Updated
Nov. 14, 2012

Freshmen Republicans

Trey Radal
R-Fla. (19)

Born: April 20, 1976

Family: Married, Amy Wegmann Radel; one child

Religion: Catholic

Education: Loyola University-Chicago, B.A., 1999

Career: Radio talk-show host, 2010-12; founder, Trey Communications, 2009-12; anchor, WINK-TV, 2007-09; owner, Naples Journal, 2006-07; reporter, WINK-TV, 2001-06

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Supported by tea party; endorsed by predecessor Rep. Connie Mack, his father Sen. Connie Mack, and Sen. Marco Rubio

Tom Rice
R-S.C. (07)

Born: Aug. 4, 1957

Family: Married, Wrenzie Rice; three children

Religion: Episcopalian

Education: University of South Carolina, B.A., 1975; M.A., 1979; J.D., 1982

Career: Practicing attorney, 1984-present; staff accountant, Deloitte, Haskins and Sells, 1982-84

Elected Office: Horry County Council, 2010-present

On the issues: Focus on business and conservative values; endorsed by Gov. Nikki Haley; defines self as fiscal conservative who believes in smaller government; wants to bring jobs back from overseas by creating a more business-friendly domestic environment with less regulations; campaign focused on job creation, increasing military spending, protecting gun owners' rights, and simplifying immigration laws; opposes abortion; supported by tea party; wants to address political polarization in Congress

Freshmen Republicans

Keith Rothfus
R-Pa. (12)

Born: April 25, 1962

Family: Married, Elsie Rothfus; six children

Religion: Catholic

Education: State University of New York-Buffalo, B.S., 1984; Notre Dame, J.D., 1990

Career: Practicing attorney, 1991-2010; Bush administration faith-based initiatives official, 2004-07; associate dean, Regent University School of Law, 1993-97; systems programmer, IBM, 1985-88

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Admires Reagan's traditional conservative values; opposes the widening budget deficit and Obama's stimulus bill; cites "three Rs" as priorities: repeal Obamacare, reform tax and spending policies, and roll back regulation

Matt Salmon
R-Ariz. (05)

Born: Jan. 21, 1958

Family: Married, Nancy Salmon; four children

Religion: Mormon

Education: Arizona State University, B.A., 1981; Brigham Young University, M.P.A., 1986

Career: President, Upstream Consulting, 2003-present; president, COMPTEL, 2008-09; lobbyist, Greenberg Traurig, 2005-07; chairman, Arizona Republican Party, 2004-07; public affairs manager, US West, 1981-94

Elected Office: U.S. House, 1994-2000; Arizona Senate, 1990-94

On the issues: In this campaign, placed special emphasis on national debt and pushed for less regulation and lower taxes; during first stint in Congress, criticized China's human rights violations and coauthored law that used financial measures to discourage states from releasing incarcerated rapists and murderers

Freshmen Republicans

Chris Stewart

R-Utah. (02)

Born: July 15, 1960

Family: Married, Evie Stewart; six children

Religion: Mormon

Education: Utah State University, B.A., 1984

Career: Owner, Shipley Group, 2000-present

Military Service: U.S. Air Force, 1984-1998

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Fervent believer in American exceptionalism; thinks Americans' traditional freedoms are threatened and that Washington is very dishonest; favors a balanced-budget amendment, a 25% top marginal income-tax rate, and a dramatically reduced federal budget; his list of federal spending programs that can be cut includes stimulus spending, bailouts for Wall Street, local education, Amtrak, farm subsidies, medical research, alternative-energy development, and transportation programs

Evie Stockman

R-Tex. (36)

Born: Nov. 14, 1956

Family: Married, Patti Stockman

Religion: Baptist

Education: University of Houston, B.S., 1990

Career: Director, campus leadership program, Leadership Institute, 2005-07; accountant, 1990-94

Elected Office: U.S. House, 1994-96

On the issues: Very conservative; agenda includes demand for a balanced budget, smaller government, and lower taxes; emphasized need to curb illegal immigration; cosponsored the Defense of Marriage Act and a ban on partial-birth abortion

Updated
Nov. 14, 2012

Freshmen Republicans

David Valadao

R-Calif. (21)

Born: April 14, 1977

Family: Married, Terra Valadao; three children

Religion: Catholic

Education: College of the Sequoias, attended 1996-98

Career: Partner, Valadao Dairy, 1992-present

Elected Office: California Assembly, 2010-present

On the issues: Interested in dairy farming and agricultural issues; sponsored legislation that called for eliminating millions of dollars in state funding to subsidize production of corn-based ethanol; supported bill that placed restrictions on people with criminal convictions who care for the elderly or disabled

Ann Wagner

R-Mo. (02)

Born: Sept. 13, 1962

Family: Married, Raymond Wagner; three children

Religion: Catholic

Education: University of Missouri, B.S., 1984

Career: Chairwoman, Roy Blunt for Senate campaign, 2009-10; U.S. ambassador to Luxembourg, 2005-09; cochair, Republican National Committee, 2001-05; chair, Missouri Republican Party, 1999-2005; Missouri director, George H. W. Bush reelection campaign, 1992

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Yet to be determined

Freshmen Republicans

Jackie Walorski

R-Ind. (02)

Born: Aug. 17, 1963

Family: Married, Dean Swihart

Religion: Christian

Education: Taylor University, B.A., 1985

Career: Founder, Impact International, 1999-2003; director of annual giving, Indiana University, 1997-98; director of institutional advancement, Ancilla College, 1991-96; executive director, St. Joseph County Humane Society, 1989-91; television reporter; WSBT-TV, 1985-89

Elected Office: Indiana House, 2004-10

On the issues: Believes in a very limited role of government; cosponsored Indiana's voter-identification law; priorities are to push for full repeal of the Affordable Care Act and for deficit reduction; said she wants to try to work across the aisle

Randy Weber

R-Tex. (14)

Born: July 2, 1953

Family: Married, Brenda Weber; three children

Religion: Christian

Education: University of Houston-Clear Lake, B.S., 1977

Career: Owner, Weber's Air and Heat, 1981-present

Elected Office: Texas House of Representatives, 2008-present; Pearland City Council, 1990-96

On the issues: Inspired by Reagan's message of limited government; has worked on issues ranging from veteran's affairs to domestic human trafficking

Freshmen Republicans

Brad Wenstrup

R-Oh. (02)

Born: June 17, 1958

Family: Married, Monica Klein Wenstrup

Religion: Catholic

Education: University of Cincinnati, B.A., 1980; William M. Scholl College of Podiatric Medicine, B.S., D.P.M., 1985

Career: Physician, Wellington Orthopedic & Sports Medicine, 1999-present; private practice, 1986-99

Military Service: Army Reserve, 1998-2011; combat surgeon, Iraq, 2005-06

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Decided to become involved in politics because he disliked that people in Washington who had never served were making military decisions, and people who had never seen a patient or dealt with Medicare or Medicaid or insurance companies were making health care plans

Roger Williams

R-Tex. (25)

Born: Sept 13, 1949

Family: Married, Patty Williams; two children

Religion: Christian

Education: Texas Christian University, B.S., 1971

Career: Owner, Roger Williams Chrysler Dodge Jeep Ram, 1971-present; Texas secretary of state, 2005-07; baseball coach, Texas Christian University, 1974-76; Atlanta Braves farm team, 1971-74

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Ran on the platform of “lower taxes, less government, cut the spending, defend the borders, listen to your generals, and understand the 10th Amendment”

Updated
Nov. 14, 2012

Freshmen Republicans

Ted Yoho

R-Fla. (03)

Born: April 13, 1955

Family: Married, Carolyn Yoho; three children

Religion: Catholic

Education: University of Florida, B.S., 1979; D.V.M., 1983

Career: Veterinarian, 1983-present

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Embraced his tea party backing; railed against “career politicians” and “the mess” in Washington; wants to repeal the Affordable Care Act; opposes raising taxes, but won’t sign a no-tax pledge in case certain events leave no other alternatives

Roadmap

Biographies of House Freshmen: Republicans

(In Alphabetical Order, by Last Name)

Biographies of House Freshmen: Democrats

(In Alphabetical Order, by Last Name)

Freshmen Democrats

Joyce Beaty

D-Ohio (03)

Born: March 12, 1950

Family: Married, Otto Beaty, Jr.; two stepchildren

Religion: Baptist

Education: Central State University, B.A., 1972; Wright State University, M.S., 1975

Career: Senior vice president, Ohio State University, 2008-present; president, Joyce Beaty & Associates, 1992-present; director, Montgomery County Department of Community Human Services, 1983-92

Elected Office: Ohio House, 1999-2008

On the issues: Proponent of labor unions; made education central to campaign; advocates for women's healthcare and employment

Julia Brownley

D-Calif. (26)

Born: Aug. 28, 1952

Family: Divorced; two children

Religion: Episcopalian

Education: Mount Vernon College, B.A., 1975; American University, M.B.A., 1979

Career: Product manager, Steelcase, 1984-92; sales manager, Pitney Bowes, 1981-84; sales manager, Burroughs Corporation, 1976-81

Elected Office: California Assembly, 2006-present; member, Santa Monica Malibu Unified School District, 1994-2006

On the issues: Campaign focused on improving educational opportunities to fix poor economy; advocated greater investment in California's public schools; worked on legislation to prevent human trafficking, improve foster-care system, increase green awareness; tried to pass a state version of the Disclose Act to improve campaign finance transparency

Freshmen Democrats

Cheri Bustos

D-III. (17)

Born: Oct. 17, 1961

Family: Married, Gerry Bustos; two children

Religion: Catholic

Education: Illinois College; University of Maryland, B.S., 1983; University of Illinois-Springfield, M.A., 1985

Career: Vice president, Iowa Health Systems, 2008-12; senior director, Trinity Regional Health System, 2002-08; reporter, Quad City Times, 1985-2002.

Elected Office: East Moline City Council, 2007-11

On the issues: On City Council, focused on economic development, founding and chairing the East Moline Downtown Revitalization Committee; backed by labor unions in campaign; advocate of women's health issues

ony Cárdenas D-Calif. (29)

Born: March 31, 1963

Family: Married, Norma Cárdenas; four children

Religion: Christian

Education: University of California-Santa Barbara, B.A., 1986

Career: Real estate broker, 1987-96; life insurance salesman, 1986-87; electrical engineer, Hewlett-Packard, 1986

Elected Office: Los Angeles City Council, 2004-12; California Assembly, 1996-2002

On the issues: Known for laboring to reform state's gang prevention and intervention programs, including passing the Schiff-Cárdenas Crime Prevention Act; active in creating opportunities for minority-owned businesses to compete for city's bond underwriting work; promoted policies fighting human trafficking and animal mistreatment

Freshmen Democrats

Matt Cartwright

D-Pa. (17)

Born: Oct. 17, 1961

Family: Married, Marion Munley Cartwright; two children

Religion: Catholic

Education: Hamilton College, B.A., 1983; University of Pennsylvania, J.D., 1986

Career: Practicing attorney, 1986-2012

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Ran on a liberal, progressive platform, pushing for environmental protections and attacking corporate tax breaks; supports Obama's Affordable Health Care Act; as an attorney, represented consumers against corporations

Joaquín Castro

D-Texas (20)

Born: Sep. 16, 1974

Family: Single

Religion: Catholic

Education: Stanford University, B.A., 1996; Harvard University, J.D., 2000

Career: Practicing attorney, 2000-present

Elected Office: Texas House of Representatives, 2002-12

On the issues: Passionate about civil rights, pro-affirmative action; has focused on education as a component of the American dream, restoring education funding even during budget cuts; very pro-Obama

Freshmen Democrats

John Delaney D-Md. (06)

Born: April 16, 1963

Family: Married, April McClain-Delaney; four children

Religion: Catholic

Education: Columbia University, B.S., 1985; Georgetown University, J.D., 1988

Career: Founder, CEO, CapitalSource, 2000-10; founder, CEO, Healthcare Financial Partners, 1993-2000

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Campaigned as a social liberal, championing same-sex marriage and women's issues; aligns himself with centrist-leaning, business-minded Democrats like Bill Clinton, who is a friend, as well as Sen. Mark Warner, on fiscal issues

Suzan DelBene D-Wash. (01)

Born: Feb. 17, 1963

Family: Married, Kurt DelBene; two children

Religion: Episcopalian

Education: Reed College, B.A., 1983; University of Washington, M.B.A., 1990

Career: Director, state Department of Revenue, 2010-12; consultant, Global Partnerships, 2008-09; vice president, Microsoft, 2004-07; president, CEO, Nimble Technology, 2000-03

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Tours business background; wants to use policy to create opportunities for families; supports new economic-stimulus spending, as well as Obama's plan to let Bush's tax cuts for the wealthy expire

Freshmen Democrats

Case [REDACTED] 02/19 Page 76 of 1649
Tammy Duckworth
D-Ill. (08)

Born: March 12, 1968

Family: Married, Bryan Bowsbey

Religion: Deist

Education: University of Hawaii; B.A., 1989; George Washington University, M.A., 1992

Career: Assistant secretary, U.S. Veterans Affairs Department, 2009-11; director, Illinois Veterans Affairs

Department, 2006-09; manager, Rotary International, 2003-04

Military Service: Army National Guard, 1992-present

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Emphasized her military service and experience in veterans' affairs

Bill Enyart
D-Ill. (12)

Born: Sept. 22, 1949

Family: Married, Annette Eckert; two children

Religion: United Church of Christ

Education: University of Illinois; Southern Illinois University (Edwardsville), B.A., 1974; Southern Illinois

University (Carbondale), J.D., 1979; U.S. Army War College, M.S.S., 2000

Career: Adjutant general, Illinois National Guard, 2007-12; practicing attorney, 1979-2007; president and COO,

Doc's Distributing, 1991-97

Military Service: Army National Guard, 1982-2012; Air Force Reserves, 1973-75; Air Force 1969-73

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Emphasized necessity of job creation in downtrodden 12th district; criticized opponent for refusing to release tax returns; tied to Obama's campaign

Freshmen Democrats

Elizabeth Esty D-Conn. (05)

Born: Aug. 25, 1959

Family: Married; Dan Esty; three children

Religion: Congregationalist

Education: Harvard University, B.A., 1981; Yale Law School, J.D., 1985

Career: Senior research scholar, Yale Law School, 1994-2009; health care policy analyst, 1990-2002; adjunct professor, American University, 1991-92; practicing attorney, 1986-1990

Elected Office: Connecticut House, 2008-10; Cheshire Town Council, 2005-08

On the issues: Pushed to reinvigorate manufacturing in her ailing factory-dominated district by working for infrastructure improvements, creating internships to train future manufacturers, and creating better access to credit for small businesses; defended women's reproductive rights as attorney; on Cheshire Town Council, worked on providing tax relief for senior citizens and reducing town's debt; as state representative, voted to abolish death penalty

Bill Foster D-Ill. (11)

Born: Oct. 7, 1955

Family: Married, Aesook Byon; two children

Religion: No affiliation

Education: University of Wisconsin, B.A., 1976; Harvard University, Ph.D., 1983

Career: Scientist, Fermi National Accelerator Laboratory, 1990-2006; cofounder, Electronic Theatre Controls, 1975-2007

Elected Office: U.S. House, 2008-10

On the issues: On House Financial Services Committee, supported financial market bailouts; restored $62.5M in funding for Fermilab; voted for Obama's stimulus act and health care reform

Freshmen Democrats

Lois Frankel
D-Fla. (22)

Born: May 16, 1948

Family: Divorced; one child

Religion: Jewish

Education: Boston University, B.A., 1970; Georgetown University, J.D., 1973

Career: Practicing attorney, 1978-2003; assistant public defender, West Palm Beach, 1974-78

Elected Office: Mayor, West Palm Beach, 2003-11; Florida House, 1986-1992, 1994-2002

On the issues: Opposes Rep. Paul Ryan's budget plan; pro-choice; also opposed to privatizing Medicare; as state minority leader, wrote Florida's first AIDS law, ensuring confidentiality in testing

Tulsi Gabbard
D-Hawaii (02)

Born: April 12, 1981

Family: Divorced

Religion: Hindu

Education: Hawaii Pacific University, B.S., 2009

Career: Founder, Kanu Productions, 2011-present; cofounder, Healthy Hawaii Coalition, 2000-present; legislative aide, Sen. Daniel Akaka, 2006-07

Military Service: Army National Guard, 2003-present; Iraq, 2003-04

Elected Office: Honolulu City Council, 2010-present; Hawaii House, 2002-04

On the issues: Pro-gay marriage; focuses on energy and environmental issues, running on a platform for investing in alternative energy as a way of diversifying Hawaii's tourism-dependent economy, as well as making the state's energy supply more secure

Freshmen Democrats

Pete Gallego
D-Texas (23)

Born: Dec. 2, 1961

Family: Married, Maria Elena Ramon; one child

Religion: Catholic

Education: Sul Ross State University, B.A., 1982; University of Texas, J.D., 1985

Career: Practicing attorney, 1990-present; assistant attorney general, 1986-89

Elected Office: Texas House, 1990-present

On the issues: Promised to remain tied to district; backed by League of Conservation Voters; sides with Catholic views, opposing gay marriage and voting in favor of parental-consent laws for minors seeking abortions

Joe Garcia
D-Fla. (26)

Born: Oct. 12, 1963

Family: Divorced, one child

Religion: Catholic

Education: University of Miami, B.A., 1987; J.D., 1991

Career: Director, Office of Minority Economic Impact and Diversity, U.S. Department of Energy, 2008-10; executive vice president, New Democrat Network, 2004-08; executive director, Cuban American National Foundation, 2000-04; commissioner, Florida Public Service Commission, 1993-2000

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Promotes Cuban-American rights; believes energy is the most important sector in America

Freshmen Democrats

Alan Grayson D-Fla. (09)

Born: March 13, 1958

Family: Married, Lolita Grayson; five children

Religion: Jewish

Education: Harvard University, B.A., 1978, J.D.; M.P.P., 1983

Career: Writer; commentator, 2011-present; partner, Grayson & Kubli, 1991-2008; president, IDT Corp., 1990-91; practicing attorney, 1985-90; law clerk, D.C. Court of Appeals, 1984-85, Colorado Supreme Court, 1983

Elected Office: U.S. House, 2008-10

On the issues: Progressive liberal views; touted experience fighting corrupt defense contractors; stubborn Federal Reserve critic—joined with Rep. Ron Paul of Texas to pass the “Audit the Fed” bill; promised to protect entitlements

Denny Heck D-Wash. (10)

Born: July 29, 1952

Family: Married, Paula Heck; two children

Religion: Lutheran

Education: Evergreen State College, B.A., 1973

Career: Cofounder, board member, Intrepid Learning Solutions, 1999-present; cofounder and CEO, TVW, 1993-2003; chief of staff, Gov. Booth Gardner, 1989-93

Elected Office: Washington House, 1976-1986

On the issues: Strong background in education support, helping to write the Washington Basic Education Act in 1988 as well as previously owning an education and worker-training company; in unsuccessful 2010 campaign, ran as a moderate Democrat, championing business experience creating jobs; in 2012 campaign, called for ending tax breaks for the wealthy and establishing a lower estate-tax rate

Updated
Nov. 14, 2012

Freshmen Democrats

Steven Horsford

D-Nev. (04)

Born: April 29, 1973

Family: Married, Sonya Horsford; three children

Religion: Baptist

Education: University of Nevada-Reno, attended, 1992-97, 2009

Career: CEO, Culinary Training Academy, 2001-present

Elected Office: Nevada Senate, 2004-present

On the issues: Emphasized experience in aiding Nevada's largest industry, hospitality; attacked opponent for hard line on immigration

Jared Huffman
D-Calif. (02)

Born: Feb. 18, 1964

Family: Married, Susan Huffman; two children

Religion: No religious affiliation

Education: University of California-Santa Barbara, B.A., 1986; Boston College, J.D., 1990

Career: Senior attorney, Natural Resources Defense Council, 2001-06; practicing attorney, 1990-2001

Elected Office: California Assembly, 2006-present; board member, Marin Municipal Water District, 1994-2006

On the issues: As attorney, worked on antitrust litigation and made a name for self in Title IX cases pursuing gender equity; on state Assembly, blocked efforts by Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to construct death-row complex at San Quentin

Freshmen Democrats

Hakem Jeffries D-N.Y. (08)

Born: Aug. 4, 1970

Family: Married, Kennisandra Jeffries; two children

Religion: Baptist

Education: Binghamton University, B.A., 1992; Georgetown University, M.P.P., 1994; New York University, J.D., 1997

Career: Assistant general counsel, CBS Broadcasting, 2006; counsel, Viacom, 2004-05; practicing attorney, 1999-2003

Elected Office: New York Assembly, 2006-present

On the issues: On state Assembly, worked on affordable housing issues and passed a bill forcing the elimination of the NYPD's "stop-and-frisk" database, as well as introduced legislation to establish an independent redistricting authority

Joe Kennedy D-Mass. (04)

Born: Oct. 4, 1980

Family: Single

Religion: Catholic

Education: Stanford University, B.S., 2003; Harvard University, J.D., 2009

Career: Assistant district attorney, Middlesex County, 2011-12; assistant district attorney, Cape & Islands, 2009-11; Peace Corps, 2004-06

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Continues Kennedy political legacy; made "fairness" central to campaign, emphasizes need to level economic playing field and create equal opportunity for education and jobs; pro-choice

Updated
Nov. 14, 2012

Freshmen Democrats

Daniel Kildee D-Mich. (05)

Born: August 11, 1958

Family: Married, Jennifer Kildee; three children

Religion: Catholic

Education: University of Michigan-Flint, 1976-1982; Central Michigan University, B.S., 2007

Career: President and CEO, Center for Community Progress, 2009-present; youth specialist; Whaley Children's Center, 1976-1985

Elected Office: Genesee County treasurer, 1997-2009; Genesee County Commission, 1985-1997

On the issues: Will follow in the footsteps of retiring uncle Rep. Dale Kildee; urban planning views seen as radical; on Flint Board of Education, fought for ban on corporal punishment; has expressed desire to sit on committees that deal with urban policy, such as the Financial Services Committee and the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee

Derek Kilmer D-Wash. (06)

Born: Jan. 1, 1974

Family: Married, Jennifer Kilmer; two children

Religion: Methodist

Education: Princeton University, B.A., 1996; Oxford University, Ph.D., 2003

Career: Vice president, Economic Development Board, Tacoma-Pierce County, 2002-present; management consultant, McKinsey and Co., 1999-2002

Elected Office: Washington Senate, 2007-present; Washington House, 2005-07

On the issues: Will follow in footsteps of mentor and predecessor Rep. Norm Dicks; strong background in economic development and continued interest in using skills to foster growth; promoted job creation legislation, education, and veterans' affairs while in state Senate

Freshmen Democrats

Ann Kirkpatrick D-Ariz. (01)

Born: March 14, 1950

Family: Married, Roger Curley; four children.

Religion: Catholic

Education: University of Arizona, B.A., 1972; J.D., 1979

Career: Practicing attorney, 2011-12; instructor, Coconino Community College, 2005; Sedona city attorney, 1990-91; Pima deputy county attorney, 1981-85; Coconino deputy county attorney, 1980-81

Elected Office: U.S. House, 2008-10; Arizona House, 2004-07

On the issues: Promotes Native American rights and welfare, having previously worked to provide tribes with money to build communications infrastructure; in tenure in House, supported Obama's agenda, voting for stimulus and health care reform

Ann Kuster D-N.H. (02)

Born: Sept. 5, 1956

Family: Married, Brad Kuster; two children

Religion: Episcopalian

Education: Dartmouth College, B.A., 1978; Georgetown University, J.D., 1984

Career: Owner, Newfound Strategies, 2011-present; practicing attorney, 1984-2010; legislative aide, U.S. Rep. Pete McCloskey, 1978-81

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Calls for a return to Clinton-era tax rate; supports Obama's health care reform

Freshmen Democrats

Alan Lowenthal D-Calif. (47)

Born: March 8, 1941

Family: Married, Deborah Lowenthal; two children

Religion: Jewish

Education: Hobart College, B.A., 1962; Ohio State University, M.S., 1965; Ph.D., 1967

Career: Professor, California State University (Long Beach), 1969-98

Elected Office: California Senate, 2004-present; Assembly, 1998-2004; Long Beach City Council, 1992-98

On the issues: Ran campaign on record as pragmatic problem-solver; has worked to reduce air pollution and protect public health; wants to protect Social Security and help the federal government invest resources in the people

Michelle Lujan Grisham D-N.M. (01)

Born: Oct. 24, 1959

Family: Widowed; two children

Religion: Catholic

Education: University of New Mexico, B.A., 1981; J.D., 1987

Career: Co-owner, Delta Consulting Group, 2008-present; secretary, New Mexico Department of Health, 2004-07; secretary, New Mexico Aging & Long-Term Services Department, 2004; director, New Mexico State Agency on Aging, 1991-2004

Elected Office: Commissioner, Bernalillo County, 2010-present

On the issues: Stresses bipartisan background; in career, focused on issues of the aging and health

Freshmen Democrats

Dan Maffei
D-N.Y. (24)

Born: July 4, 1968

Family: Married, Abby Davidson Maffei

Religion: Catholic

Education: Brown University, B.A., 1990; Columbia University, M.S., 1991; Harvard University, M.P.P., 1995

Career: Instructor, SUNY College of Environmental Science and Forestry, 2011-12; senior vice president, Pinnacle Capital Management, 2006-08; campaign coordinator, Matt Driscoll for Syracuse mayor, 2005; press aide, House Ways and Means Committee, 1999-2005; press secretary, Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, D-N.Y., 1997-98

Elected Office: U.S. House, 2008-10

On the issues: Strong opponent of Iraq War; fought to include billions of dollars for school construction in the Democrats' economic stimulus bill during his term in the House of Representatives from 2008-10

Sean Patrick
Maloney
D-N.Y. (18)

Born: July 30, 1966

Family: Partner, Randy Florke

Religion: Catholic

Education: University of Virginia, B.A., 1988; J.D., 1992

Career: Practicing attorney, 2009-present, 2004-06, 1993-97; first deputy secretary, New York State, 2007-08; COO, Kiodex, 2000-03; special assistant/deputy assistant, White House, 1997-2000

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Self-described "Bill Clinton Democrat;" aligns himself with centrist Democratic politics

Freshmen Democrats

Grace Meng
D-N.Y. (06)

Born: Oct. 1, 1975

Family: Husband, Wayne Kye; two children

Religion: Christian

Education: University of Michigan, B.A., 1997; Yeshiva University, J.D., 2002

Career: Practicing attorney, 2003-present

Elected Office: New York Assembly, 2009-present

On the issues: Prioritizes bolstering Queens' transportation infrastructure and expanding the borough's potential for tourism; calls for higher income taxes for the rich; promises to hire more police officers and firefighters to improve public safety; supports anti-discrimination efforts and senior citizens' issues

Ioria Negrete
McLeod
D-Cali. (35)

Born: Sept. 6, 1941

Family: Married, Gilbert McLeod; 10 children

Religion: Catholic

Education: Chaffey College, A.A., 1975

Career: Instructional aide, Chaffey College, 1986-95

Elected Office: California Assembly, 2000-06; California Senate, 2006-12

On the issues: Supports gun control; accused opponent Rep. Joe Baca of not doing enough to help veterans, young people, and the disabled

Freshmen Democrats

Rick Nolan
D-Minn. (08)

Born: Dec. 17, 1943

Family: Married, Mary Nolan; four children

Religion: Catholic

Education: University of Minnesota, B.A., 1966

Career: President, Emily Forest Products, 1994-2011; president, Minnesota World Trade Center Corp., 1987-1994; president, U.S. Export Corp., 1981-86; teacher, 1968-69; Head Start education director, 1968; staff assistant, Sen. Walter Mondale, D-Minn., 1966-68

Elected Office: U.S. House, 1974-1980; Minnesota House, 1969-1973

On the issues: Liberal voting record; previously battled large-farm favoritism by the federal government, pushed legislation proposing education programs, equipment loans, and tax-code changes for small farmers; record of job creation and international diplomacy; inspired to return to Congress by lack of local jobs; will push for small-business tax breaks and infrastructure investment

eto O' Rourke
D-Texas (06)

Case [REDACTED] 02/19 Page 780 of 1649

Born: Sept. 26, 1972

Family: Married, Amy Sanders; three children

Religion: Catholic

Education: Columbia University, B.A., 1995

Career: Owner, Stanton Street Technology Group, 1999-present

Elected Office: El Paso City Council, 2005-11

On the issues: Promotes economic development, trying to reverse trend of youth moving from El Paso; on City Council, worked to save the primary form of public transportation from a fiscal meltdown; accused primary opponent Rep. Silvestre Reyes of not doing enough on the Veterans' Affairs Committee and failing to find a solution to reduce bridge traffic; supports legalizing marijuana

Freshmen Democrats

Donald Payne, Jr.
D-N.J. (10)

Born: Dec. 17, 1958

Family: Married, Bea Payne; three children

Religion: Baptist

Education: Kean College, attended

Career: District leader, Newark's South Ward, 1992-present

Elected Office: Newark Municipal Council, 2006-present; freeholder-at-large, Essex County, 2006-present

On the issues: Cites job creation as chief priority

Mark Pocan
D-Wis. (02)

Born: Aug. 14, 1964

Family: Married, Philip Frank

Religion: No affiliation

Education: University of Wisconsin-Madison, B.A., 1986

Career: Owner, Budget Signs & Specialties, 1988-present; public relations specialist, Wisconsin Realtors Association, 1986-88

Elected Office: Wisconsin Assembly, 1998-2012; Dane County Board of Supervisors, 1991-96

On the issues: Progressive liberal values similar to predecessor, Rep. Tammy Baldwin; openly gay and promotes gay rights; interested in health care and extending insurance coverage; in state assembly, voted for business tax credit bills and helped pass a law to help sexual assault victims

Updated
Nov. 14, 2012

Freshmen Democrats

Raul Ruiz
D-Calif. (36)

Born: Aug. 25, 1972

Family: Single

Religion: Seventh-Day Adventist

Education: University of California-Los Angeles, B.S., 1994; Harvard University, M.D., M.P.P., 2001, M.P.H., 2007

Career: Senior associate dean, University of California Riverside School of Medicine, 2011-present; emergency physician, Eisenhower Medical Center, 2007-present

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Concentrates on health issues; supports Obama's health care reform

rad Schneider
D-Ill. (10)

Born: Aug. 20, 1961

Family: Married; Julie Dann; two children

Religion: Jewish

Education: Northwestern University, B.S., 1983; M.B.A., 1988

Career: Founder, managing principal, Cadence Consulting Group, 2008-present; interim COO, Transportation Solutions Group, 2007-08; director, Blackman Kallick, 2003-08; managing principal, Davis Dann Adler Schneider, 1997-2003; founder, managing principal, Schneider Consulting Group, 1994-97; head of strategy/mergers and acquisitions, Commerce Clearing House, 1993-94

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Aims for greater bipartisanship; touts pro-business stance, arguing that government needs to help companies by investing in education and upgrading infrastructure; strongly supports Israel and advocates for peace in the Middle East

Freshmen Democrats

Carol Shea-Porter

D-N.H. (01)

Born: Dec. 2, 1952

Family: Married, Gene Porter; two children

Religion: Catholic

Education: University of New Hampshire, B.A., 1975; M.P.A., 1979

Career: Social worker; community college instructor

On the issues: Centrist voting record in the House; anti-Iraq war; advocated for creation of a federal institute dedicated to reducing dependence on foreign oil; sought major changes in the No Child Left Behind law; defended importance of federal programs such as Social Security

Kristen Sinema

D-Ariz. (09)

Born: July 12, 1976

Family: Single

Religion: No affiliation

Education: Brigham Young University, B.A., 1995; Arizona State University, M.A., 1999; J.D., 2004; Ph.D., 2012

Career: Instructor; Center for Progressive Leadership, 2006-present; practicing attorney, 2005-present; social worker, 1995-2002

Elected Office: Arizona Senate, 2011-12; Arizona House, 2005-11

On the issues: Known for liberal politics, balanced by willingness to work with Republicans to pass legislation on human trafficking and other issues; active on gay rights issues

Freshmen Democrats

Eric Swalwell

D-Calif. (15)

Born: Nov. 16, 1980

Family: Single

Religion: Christian

Education: University of Maryland, B.A., 2003; J.D., 2006

Career: Deputy district attorney, Alameda County, 2006-present

Elected Office: Dublin City Council, 2010-present

On the issues: Self-described solid Democrat, but reached out to Republicans and Independents by saying he would at least listen as their congressman; made the case that it was time for a change when running against 40-year tenured Dem incumbent Pete Star

Mark Takano

D-Calif. (41)

Born: Dec. 10, 1960

Family: Single

Religion: Methodist

Education: Harvard University, B.A., 1983; University of California-Riverside, teaching certificate, 1987; M.F.A., 2010

Career: Teacher, Rialto Unified School District, 1988-present; substitute teacher, Boston, 1984-85

Elected Office: Board of Trustees, Riverside Community College District, 1990-present

On the issues: Ran as a populist, attacking lobbyists and powerful oil and insurance companies; stressed job creation, job training, and education reform; hopes victory will be breakthrough for LGBT rights

Freshmen Democrats

Dina Titus

D-Nev. (01)

Born: May 23, 1950

Family: Married, Tom Wright

Religion: Greek Orthodox

Education: College of William and Mary, B.A., 1970; University of Georgia, M.A., 1973; Florida State University, Ph.D., 1976

Career: Professor, University of Nevada-Las Vegas, 1977-2011; professor, North Texas State University, 1975-76
Elected Office: U.S. House, 2008-10; Nevada Senate, 1988-2008

On the issues: Advocate for people with disabilities

Juan Vargas

D-Calif. (51)

Born: March 7, 1961

Family: Married, Adrienne Vargas; two children

Religion: Catholic

Education: University of San Diego, B.A., 1983; Fordham University, M.A., 1987; Harvard University, J.D., 1991
Career: Vice president, external affairs, Safeco Insurance, 2006-08; vice president, corporate legal, Liberty Mutual Group, 2008-2010

Elected Office: California Senate, 2010-present; California Assembly, 2000-06; San Diego City Council, 1993-2000

On the issues: Took pro-union stances and advocated government support for children and the elderly; sponsored bill mandating the reporting of child abuse by athletics coaches in California

Freshmen Democrats

Marc Yeasey

D-Tex. (33)

Born: Jan. 3, 1971

Family: Married, Tonya Yeasey; one child

Religion: Baptist

Education: Texas Wesleyan University, B.S., 1995

Career: Staffer, Rep. Martin Frost, D-Texas, 1998-2004; commercial real estate broker

Elected Office: Texas House, 2004-present

On the issues: Worked to bring a grocery store to a poor section of Fort Worth; worked to secure transportation funding for the district's roads; spent much of his time in the Texas House dealing with banking and pension issues; served on an environmental-regulations committee; interested in joining the Financial Services and Armed Services committees and the Congressional Black Caucus

Filemon Vela

D-Tex. (34)

Born: Feb. 13, 1963

Family: Married, Rose Vela

Religion: Catholic

Education: Georgetown University, B.A., 1985; University of Texas, J.D., 1987

Career: Practicing attorney, 1988-2012

Elected Office: None

On the issues: Has at times backed GOP office-seekers, but aligned himself with the Democratic agenda; called for a "realistic and fair way" to deal with illegal immigration, protection of Medicare and Social Security benefits, and tax cuts for small businesses as incentive to hire workers

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, November 23, 2012 9:39 PM
To: ed.gabriel@moroccanamericancenter.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitor November Week 3

Blog Name	Update Title/Date	Summary	Comments	Respond
Magharebia	Rains add to worries of Moroccans in shantytowns Nov. 11, 2012	Recent rain in Morocco is a boon to farmers but devastating to the urban poor, making life in shantytowns and dilapidated buildings even more unpleasant and difficult. Travel is more difficult and there is always the danger of the shanty falling down on the heads of residents. The rainy season also draws attention to the "aging worn-out structures" in Rabat and Casablanca. Morocco's 2004 initiative to eliminate shanty towns, costing $25 billion dirhams, is 70% complete.	0
Magharebia	Morocco reacts to terror arrests Nov. 12, 2012	Public opinion in Morocco is split over several large-scale terror arrests. The past month has seen a significant spike in reported apprehensions. While most applaud the efforts of the security services, others are sceptical and want precise and transparent information about these arrests to be released. Others are concerned that Morocco might have more terror cells hiding within the country.	0
Magharebia	Compensation Fund strains Morocco budget Nov. 13, 2012	Morocco's Compensation Fund is weighing heavily on the state budget, with officials warning reforms as an urgent necessity. The government has set a target of holding Compensation Fund expenditures to a sustainable level and seeks to target the poorest members of the population by giving them direct conditional money transfers.	0
Magharebia	Morocco launches job training projects Nov. 15, 2012	New training centers aim to improve the employability of young Moroccans. King Mohammed VI opened one such facility in Marrakech. The site will offer vocational instruction in the building trades and public works sector. Another new center will focus on training for the handicraft industry.	0
Green Prophet	Morocco is Building a Mega "Green City" Named After King Mohammed VI Nov. 12, 2012	Mohammed VI Green City, a future "eco" development is being built just outside of Benguerir. Exactly what will make the Mohammed VI Green City so green has yet to be established, though plans are underway to develop a 4km, 80 hectare corridor between this new development and Benguerir that will be planted with 50,000 trees. The project sounds much like another so-called "eco-city" in the Middle East, namely Masdar City.	0
Green Prophet	Spain Ditches Morocco's Desertec Solar Project	Morocco's ambitious Desertec solar energy project received a setback after Spain failed to show for the official signing of the agreement that aims to transform North Africa's energy market. Spain is a key partner in Meeting Nov. 13, 2012	the Desertec project.

All Africa	Morocco: Polisario Denounces Expulsion of International Observers =

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, November 23, 2012 9:39 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: October 2012 Events Bulletin

Dear Team,

Below please find the October 2012 MAC Events Bulletin. Our team compiles a monthly list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

October 2012 Events Bulletin

October 2

Women after the Arab Awakening

October 11

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, November 28, 2012 3:23 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Morocco: Troops in Mali?

FYI: While in no way wishing to vouch for its accuracy, we thought you might be interested in the following item

A number of the "countries calling for military intervention in northern Mali" have officially asked Morocco to participate in operations, given the long experience of Moroccan forces in desert war.

Sources told Assabah (27/11) that Moroccan participation would allow the country's intelligence services "to have a foothold" in this area "long dominated by Algeria, which keeps nourishing the terrorist movements there".

The sources added that Morocco's participation should not exceed 300 special forces soldiers, as the jihadists, some of which come from Polisario camps, are digging in for a long war.

300 من نخبة القوات المسلحة تشارك في حرب العصابات وتكشف تجنيد البوليساريو للقتال في "ساحلستان"

21:02 فبراير.كوم في الاثنين 26 نونبر 2012 الساعة

طلبت مجموعة من الدول التي تتبنى خيار التدخل العسكري في شمال مالي لتحريره من قيضة التنظيمات الإرهابية، رسمياً من المغرب المشاركة في هذه الحرب، بالنظر إلى خبرة وتجربة القوات المسلحة في حروب الرمال.

وكشفت مصادر "الصباح" في عدد الثلاثاء 27 نونبر الجاري، أن مشاركة الجيش المغربي ستمكن المخابرات من وضع قدم لها في منطقة الساحل التي ظلت تحاصرها الجزائر، وتتعشها بمختلف ألوية الحركات الإرهابية، وخلق تهديدات أمنية تطوق بها حدود دول المنطقة.

وقالت نفس المصادر أن مشاركة القوات المغربية لن تتعدى 300 عنصر، من نخبة عناصر القوات المسلحة، مدربين على القتال في حروب الصحراء، وهو الأمر الذي يطلبه التحالف العسكري للتدخل في شمال مالي، بالنظر إلى أن حركات الجهاد تتوقع "حرب رمال" قد تطول مدتها في منطقة أصبحت تحمل اسم "ساحلتان"، يتم فيها تجنيد مقاتلين مقابل تعويضات تصل إلى ثلاثة آلاف أورو للمجنّد الواحد، بعضهم قدم من مخيمات بوليساريو، وسبق له أن عمل في جبهات عسكرية بتندوف.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Cell: +1 202 744 6810

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, December 01, 2012 2:08 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian Situation Report

The information contained in this report are from open and reliable closed sources, but has not been corroborated by third parties.

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

November 30, 2012

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- The municipal and provincial elections have passed off amid the usual indifference.
- Interior Minister Ould Kablia has indicated that the process of constitutional reform should begin soon with the appointment of a commission in charge of drafting amendments.
- At least three figures previously identified as possible successors to Bouteflika – former Prime Ministers Ahmed Ouyahia and Abdelaziz Bouteflika, and Public Works Minister Amar Ghoul – seem for various reasons to be out of the running for the 2014 presidential election.
- Ali Benflis, Bouteflika's unlucky challenger in 2004, may now be emerging as a serious contender, possibly enjoying the support of DRS chief Tewfik.
- On the other hand, the regime's need for stability and continuity may mean that President Bouteflika will run for a fourth term of office after all.

Foreign Relations

- Despite the ECOWAS resolution approving military action, there will be no quick solution to the crisis in northern Mali. At least six months' preparation are thought to be necessary for an military intervention, once it has been okayed by the UNSC in mid-December.
- Algiers has been restating its opposition to military “adventures” in northern Mali, and has been engaging the Ansar Dine and MNLA rebel groups in dialogue, with at least superficial success.
- As French President François Hollande's visit to Algeria draws near, differences between Algiers and Paris on the way forward in northern Mali are thus increasingly open.
- Algiers will not be reassured by an apparent warming of relations between France and Morocco, amid unconfirmed reports that Paris has sought the participation of Moroccan special forces in any military operation to reconquer northern Mali.

Security

- Jihadist activity has continued to decline, dropping to particularly low levels in November.
- Although there was one minor incident in Algiers, the bulk of jihadist activity has been recorded in AQMI's heartland in Kabylia.
- There have been sporadic incidents, mostly involving suspected gun-runners on Algeria's southern borders, notably with Libya.
- Towards the end of November, security forces rounded up over 60 suspected sympathisers of MUJAO in the Wilaya of Tamanrasset.

Political Trends

On Nov. 29, Algerians went to the polls for the second time this year, this time to elect municipal and provincial councils. As is now usual, the election was greeted with indifference and cynicism by large swathes of the population – with the added disincentives, this time round, of torrential rain in many areas and, in the Béjaïa region, two moderately sized earthquakes. Interior Minister Dahou Ould Kablia nonetheless announced a turnout of 44.26% - very slightly higher than the turnout in the last local elections in 2007, and very close (many would say suspiciously close) to the forecast Ould Kablia himself had made two days previously. As usual, according to the official results, the FLN came out on top, with the RND not very far behind. Also as usual, there have been claims of fraud and ballot rigging by officials, which have been dismissed by the Interior Ministry.

True to form if not to reality, official news agency APS proclaimed the local elections “another step forward in strengthening democracy”. Those interested in the path the Algerian state is really taking, however, will have been looking to other, more meaningful events on the political calendar. On the one hand, there is the process of constitutional reform – as promised in President Bouteflika's famous televised address of April 2011, in the midst of the first wave of the “Arab spring”. Ould Kablia announced on Nov. 21 that the ball is to be set rolling in the coming weeks with the appointment of a commission to draft proposed amendments to the constitution; the commission's recommendations will be discussed by the government, perhaps in the second quarter of 2013 according to Ould Kablia, before being submitted for approval either by parliament or by referendum. And on the other hand, there is the presidential election – now less than a year and a half away.

Over the past few months, we have watched the fortunes of a number of possible contenders for the presidency unfold – or, perhaps, unwind. FLN leader Abdelaziz Belkhadem's ambitions, it will be recalled, were an open secret, but his chances have been badly damaged by the open revolt against his leadership which has been festering within his party for months now. At the same time, RND leader Ahmed Ouyahia, long thought to have been DRS chief Mohamed Tewfik Médiène's favoured candidate to succeed Bouteflika, seems to have been pushed into the background, especially since he was replaced as Prime Minister at the beginning of September. More recently, there had been some speculation that Public Works Minister Amar Ghoul, who this autumn set up his new party, the TAJ, apparently with the connivance of the authorities, was perhaps being groomed as a docile successor to Bouteflika – the skeletons in his closet from the corruption-ridden episode of the East-West motorway project making him all the easier for the DRS to control^[1]. In mid-November, however, French-language daily Algérie News began to bring those skeletons out into the public eye, printing revelations of bribe-taking in connection with the East-West motorway project, implicating not only Ghoul, but also Belkhadem and Industry Minister Cherif Rahmani. The daily claimed to be in possession of “confidential files” and hinted that more revelations were to come, which suggests that it may have been fed the compromising information by the DRS, or elements within it, in a deliberate move to puncture any presidential ambitions Ghoul may have been harbouring. A former DRS officer and one-time presidential advisor says that Ghoul is now “toast” and Belkhadem marginalised, and confirms that the waning of Ouyahia's star followed a serious falling-out between him and Tewfik.

The same former DRS officer went on to claim that Tewfik is now grooming Ali Benflis, Bouteflika's unlucky challenger in the 2004 presidential election, to succeed him in the 2014 poll, describing Benflis as the "dominant figure" now within the FLN^[2]. Interestingly, some days after the source made this claim in a private conversation, leading Arabic-language daily Al-Khabar (27/11/12) published an account of a meeting Ali Benflis had purportedly convened at his family home with a number of leading members of the FLN to announce his intention of running for president in 2014, now that he had received "assurances" that Bouteflika would not be standing for a fourth term of office due to ill-health. Benflis is reported to have phoned Al-Khabar with a denial the same day, but the former FLN Secretary General is nonetheless clearly a man to watch over the coming months.

As it happens, same issue of Al-Khabar carried, on the page opposite the article on Ali Benflis' alleged presidential bid, a full-page advertisement paid for by millionaire member of parliament for Annaba Bahaeddine Tliba^[3], beseeching President Bouteflika to run for a fourth term of office in 2014. While it is conceivable that this is no more than a personal initiative of Tliba's, it is worth remembering that pseudo-spontaneous appeals for an ostensibly reluctant head of state to reconsider his supposed plans for retirement have long been a set-piece of pre-electoral periods in autocratic republics across the Arab world. And while Bouteflika did seem to be signalling his readiness to bow out when he gave his now famous "tab djenanena"^[4] speech in Setif in May of this year, there has been mounting speculation that he may not be ready to give up the presidency yet after all. Indeed, the same ex-DRS source cited above suggests that until recently, Bouteflika was in two minds about running again in 2014, though his family had been urging him to do so, but may now be inclined to stay on for a fourth term of office because of developments in Mali and the South: in the turmoil that is afflicting the region and threatening Algeria itself, Bouteflika would, it is argued, be a symbol of the stability and continuity of the Algerian state.

Foreign Relations

If the situation in Mali and the Sahel is impinging on the calculations made at the top of the Algerian state with regard to the 2014 presidential election, it is because it is becoming increasingly clear that the crisis set in motion by the Tuareg rebellion in northern Mali in the first months of 2012 will not be short-lived. On the contrary, despite the best efforts of various concerned parties – the Malian government, ECOWAS, France, the United Nations – to set deadlines and timetables for 'solving' the north Mali crisis, the real time scale for any kind of meaningful action keeps stretching further and further into the future. In accordance with UNSC Resolution 2071, passed in mid-October, ECOWAS duly convened on Nov. 11 to approve military intervention by its member states' armed forces, with the support of Western powers, and France is now pushing hard for a new UNSC resolution approving this, to be voted on it is hoped in mid-December. France and other EU states, including Germany and it is thought Great Britain, are already involved in discussions of the practicalities of military intervention with ECOWAS governments. But in contrast to the bold prognoses made by French Defence Minister Jean-Yves Le Drian in the early autumn, according to which a military intervention was then only "a matter of weeks" away, there is a growing realisation that it will take at least six months to equip and prepare the ECOWAS force and plan its mission properly; at the UN and in military-to-military discussions, the United States appears to be urging greater caution and an even longer time scale, on the grounds that the 3,500 men promised by ECOWAS will simply not be sufficient to take on the job. Meanwhile, UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, reporting to the Security Council at the end of November, has expressed the view that, while military action may ultimately be necessary against the “most extremist” elements in northern Mali, any such intervention requires far more preparation if a humanitarian and human rights catastrophe is to be averted, and that in the meantime “political dialogue” must be given pride of place.

Tactically speaking, this is to the advantage of Algiers, which, while vacillating somewhat on the rights and wrongs of the principle of military intervention against the hard core AQMI and MUJAO in northern Mali, has consistently foregrounded dialogue with those rebel groups that can be engaged as the best way forward – an approach which enables the Algerians, and in particular the DRS^[5], to leverage their extensive knowledge of and contacts in northern Mali. And indeed the Algerian authorities have lost no time in initiating talks with both the Tuareg separatist MNLA and the Islamist Ansar Dine, both in Algiers and in Ouagadougou (under the auspices of President Blaise Compaoré of Burkina Faso, ECOWAS' designated mediator). Superficially at least, this approach seems to have borne fruit remarkably quickly. MNLA spokesmen have made concessions on the group's central demand of independence, claiming that a form of autonomy within a federation may be acceptable, and have engaged the hardcore Islamist MUJAO in battle in the Gao region as of mid-November. Spokesmen for Ansar Dine, meanwhile, have claimed^[6] that the organisation has “broken with terrorism” and enjoys “very good relations” with the MNLA, and renounced the goal of conquering the whole of Mali to establish sharia law across the entire country; furthermore, the group has on at least one occasion intercepted cigarette smugglers in the Malian desert who are believed to have been raising funds on behalf of AQMI and/or MUJAO. Gratifyingly for the Algerian authorities, Cheikh Awisa, one of Ansar Dine's political and military leaders, has recently stated that the organisation insists that any “decisive solution” must be “found and signed in Algiers.”

In this context, as forecast in our last report, the differences between the French and Algerian positions are again becoming increasingly visible, even as French President François Hollande's visit to Algiers approaches. Questioned by reporters in Paris on Nov. 20, Hollande continued to foreground the military solution and categorically ruled out any talks with “groups linked with terrorism” (which, by French definitions, ought to encompass Ansar Dine); speaking at the same time on Algerian radio, Algerian Interior Minister Dahou Ould Kablia laid out a diametrically opposite position, insisting that “trying to reconstitute Mali's territorial unity by force would be an adventure that will never succeed.”

Hollande is due to visit Algiers in mid-December, around the time the Security Council meets to approve the ECOWAS intervention plan. This in itself does not bode well for efforts to build a new entente between France and Algeria – all the more so given that the slight advantage Algiers may have felt it had acquired vis à vis Morocco, France's traditional partner in the Maghreb, appears to be evaporating. After six months of silence on the question following the election of the new centre-left government, Paris has reaffirmed its support for the Moroccan autonomy plan in for Western Sahara, while Rabat has finally appointed a new ambassador to Paris in the person of Chakib Benmoussa (former Interior Minister and one-time chief negotiator at the Manhasset talks), putting an end to rumours of a “silent crisis” in Franco-Moroccan relations. A visit to Rabat by Prime Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault accompanied by several members of his government has been scheduled for December 12-13, just before Hollande's trip to Algiers, as if to reassure the Moroccans of the continuity of their 'special relationship' with Paris. And in the meantime, rumours have begun to crop up in the Moroccan press to the effect that the contribution of Moroccan special forces has been solicited for the forthcoming northern Mali operation (according to one version, by Hollande himself, during the summit of French-speaking nations in Kinshasa in October, with the offer of debt forgiveness as an incentive). While these reports remain for the time being unconfirmed, they can scarcely be reassuring for Algiers, for whom recognising that Morocco has a legitimate interest in the Sahara-Sahel region would in effect amount to recognising Rabat's claim to Western Sahara.

Security

The level of jihadist activity continued to decline in October, and slumped heavily in November. Only three AQMI operations were reported in November, down from ten in October and 13 in September, making it the quietest month Algeria has seen in several years in terms of jihadist activity. The reason for the abrupt fall in AQMI activity in November is most likely the inclement weather that hit northern Algeria in the middle of the month, but the clear downward trend we have observed over the past few months still holds. AQMI operations remain small-scale – roadside bombs and isolated shootings – and mostly concentrated in Kabylia: eight out of ten in October and all three of the attacks in November took place in the Kabyle wilayas to the east of Algiers. The level of army activity, meanwhile, has remained steady throughout the period from August to November, at around 10 operations per month, although the municipal and provincial elections on Nov. 29 did see a special mobilisation of the security forces (notably the police, with 76,000 men detailed to protecting the 27,000 polling stations across the country).

In ALGIERS the security forces on November 9 detained “two armed men, suspected of being terrorists” at a checkpoint between Zeralda and Ben Aknoun, to the west of the capital. The two men reportedly “tried to resist” and “an ambulance was called to the location” though “no shots were heard,” said El-Khabar (10/11).

The oil producing areas of the south were largely quiet, as were the southern borders, which saw no incidents after the three reported early October (see previous report). The Algerian press has persistently been reporting heightened security along the country's southern borders, especially with Mali, with Al-Khabar (05/11) indicating that the Algerian army “has begun deploying a 50km-long electrified fence along the borders with Mali around the town of Bordj Baji Mokhtar” to block access for “terrorists and smugglers” (although this would still leave about 1,100km of unguarded border between Algeria and Mali). On Nov. 4, according to Al-Khabar (04/11) security forces “arrested a terrorist from Niger carrying a suicide belt near the Libyan border, Daraj sector, inside Algerian territory”. The man admitted he was a member of MUJAO and was planning a suicide attack against Algerian security targets in the southern wilayas. The Algerian press later reported that as many as 61 people (29 Malians, 18 Algerians and 14 people from other countries including Nigeria and Burkina Faso) were arrested in Tamanrasset on Nov. 23-24 on suspicion of contacts with terrorist groups in Mali, notably MUJAO; only four were reportedly charged with supporting terrorism, however.

The Libyan border, meanwhile, saw some incidents. The security forces around October 21 intercepted a Libyan armed group that had crossed into Algerian territory near In Amenas (wilaya of Illizi). The group, believed to be composed of a Libyan rebel commander and his armed escort, is thought to have been in Algeria to meet with weapons smugglers in the desert and close a deal. The Algerian security forces tracked the commander and arrested him some 200km south of Debdeb. On October 31 the army intercepted six smugglers near the Libyan border in the Djanet area (also in the wilaya of Illizi) and seized two offroaders and a quantity of weapons and ammunition believed to have been on the way to deliver to jihadists in northern Mali. On Oct. 28 Al-Khabar published a somewhat confused account of uncertain credibility of an AQMI emir arrested near the Libyan border while trying to racketeer a shepherd and who told the security forces during interrogation about stocks MANPADS smuggled from Libya and hidden somewhere on Algerian territory.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
 President and CEO
 The Gabriel Company, LLC
 1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
 Washington DC, 20005
 Phone: +1 202.887.1113
 Fax: +1 202.887.1115
 Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
 Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

[1] See AMSR #118

[2] Benflis served as Prime Minister for three years during Bouteflika's first term, becoming General Secretary of the FLN in 2003. Having fallen out with Bouteflika he stood as the FLN candidate in the 2004 presidential election, and for a time appeared well set to beat him with the Army's tacit approval, but appears to have been robbed of his victory by a last minute deal between Bouteflika and Tewfik, which led to the lasting political marginalisation of the Army chiefs and, in its wake, a coup against him within the FLN – led by Abdelaziz Belkhadem.

[3] Tliba, who also owns Annaba football club, was elected to parliament in May on the Front National Démocratique ticket, after which he promptly defected to the FLN, becoming deputy chairman of the FLN parliamentary caucus.

[4] “Our orchard has ripened”, i.e. the younger generation is ready to take over from the generation that fought in the war of independence. See AMSR#114.

[5] A former DRS officer points out, however, that DRS chief Tewfik is unsettled by the fact that the West's main interlocutor with Algeria on the situation in northern Mali is not him but Chief of Staff Maj-Gen. Ahmed Gaïd-Saleh.

[6] Ansar Dine may not have actually broken with AQMI and MUJAO on the ground in northern Mali itself, however. Ansar Dine's core objective appears to be less the establishment of sharia law than establishing and perpetuating Iyad Ag Ghaly's dominance over the Tuareg Iforas clan and the Kidal region, and it is increasingly clear that it is quite flexible – not to say opportunistic – in pursuing that goal.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, December 04, 2012 8:47 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: [New post] "Maybe Morocco can help" – Jennifer Rubin, The Washington Post

FYI. Minister Amrani in the WP

Morocco on the Move posted: " Washington Post, by Jennifer Rubin, Right Turn (Washington, DC, Dec. 3, 2012) -- The United States is short on allies and effective means of influencing events in the Middle East. Syria is still a bloodbath. Libya is threatened by jihadists. Egy"

Respond to this post by replying above this line

New post on Morocco On The Move

"Maybe Morocco can help" – Jennifer Rubin, The Washington Post

by Morocco on the Move

Washington Post, by Jennifer Rubin, Right Turn (Washington, DC, Dec. 3, 2012) -- The United States is short on allies and effective means of influencing events in the Middle East. Syria is still a bloodbath. Libya is threatened by jihadists. Egypt has taken a turn toward dictatorship. Mali is a non-functioning state in which jihadist separatists control much of the country. The "peace process" (for good reason) is going nowhere.

To break up the monotony of bad news, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is no doubt delighted to be hosting Morocco's Deputy Foreign Minister Youssef Amrani who is in Washington D.C to prepare for Clinton's upcoming trip to Morocco. Morocco will be chairing the United Nations Security Council in December when all of these issues are likely to be swirling and will be hosting a critical international gathering on Syria.

Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton

I spoke with Amrani by phone this morning. If the United States is happy to have pro-American friends in the region, Morocco is obviously delighted to have an elevated relationship, dubbed a "strategic partnership" that launched this fall. Amrani told me: "We have a longstanding relationship. Today we want to upgrade relations and deepen our dialogue. Tomorrow we will have a business conference called by Secretary Clinton." As part of this and future discussion, Amrani told me, "We would like to include new players -- civil society [leaders], business leaders. We want a unique relationship . . . a mode of cooperation, consultation and understanding. We think we can be a model."

Certainly the region could use a model of gradual evolution toward gender equality, rule of law, human rights and democracy, which in Morocco has been accelerated under King Mohammed VI. And the Obama administration could use some advice and assistance on a range of issues including Syria, Libya and Egypt.

Clinton will visit with the king on December 11 in a meeting expected to touch on Syria, the Palestinians and Mali where jihadists now control the northern part of the country ("It is a situation that is deteriorating," Amrani said.) Morocco supports a "double track" approach in Mali that includes both political negotiations and "military pressure" on the terror groups. On this one, Armani said, "Africans will take the lead."

When I ask him about fears that Libya may be headed in the same direction -- a weak central government overrun by jihadists. He took the long view. "Transitions in the region -- in Tunis, Libya, Egypt -- will be long, complicated and will take time." In Libya as in other countries, Amrani cautioned, there are "no institutions, no civil societies, no political parties." In perhaps the most memorable comment in our conversation he said simply, "Democracy is culture."

That sentiment indisputable. Critics of the Obama administration point to the lack of staying power, the failure to work over the long haul on civil society building and inconsistency in opposing autocracy that hinder U.S. influence in the region. Morocco in the past has been hesitant to step forward as a model for the region but with its newly intensified relationship with the United States and the deteriorating situation throughout the region, Morocco is becoming less reticent. Amrani explained, "We can share our modest experience. We need to have success stories . . . otherwise extremists will take the lead."

On December 12, Clinton will attend the Friends of Syria meeting hosted by Morocco. Approximately 100 international delegations are expected to attend along with representatives of the Syrian opposition. Amrani deflected a question about whether there is room for optimism that Bashar al-Assad will soon be gone. He insisted, "The future of Syria should be democracy or there is no future. . . . There is no other choice." He didn't offer a view on whether the Syrian opposition has what it needs to prevail, but said, "We have to support the opposition politically and financially. Through the [United Nations] Security Council and other organizations, we need to put pressure on the regime." He added, "We should not forget the human dimension." In addition to some 38,000 dead Syrians, Turkey and other countries now feel pressure from refugees fleeing the violence.

Throughout the interview Amrani reiterated that the United States and Morocco would discuss the peace process and should try to get the parties "back on track." From the view of many in the United States this seems Pollyannish, especially in light of the Palestinian Authority's decision to bypass bilateral negotiations and go to the United Nations General Assembly for recognition. Amrani showed his diplomatic skill: "We know that in some countries and the [United] States, some were opposed [to the unilateral declaration]. But we feel a vote could be an opportunity to bring the parties back together." He affirmed that the goal should be "two independent states, living side by side with secure frontiers." While many in the United States see this as a fruitless exercise, Morocco remains convinced that "it is important to give a positive signal," as Amrani described it.

It is with a measure of frustration that Amrani expressed the plight of moderate Arab countries. "We are fed up with conflict, with crisis. We need peace. Peace can be achieved through political will."

It is, of course, the $64,000 question whether there is the will for peace in the Palestinian Authority, which has repeatedly walked away from the bargaining table and has abrogated the Oslo Accords in going to the United Nations. That said, even the appearance of progress is better than nothing, one supposes.

Meanwhile, if nothing else, the trip to Morocco should impress upon Clinton that the "Arab Spring" is not a one season episode, but a multi-year and probably multi-decade process in which the United States will have to find ways to maximize its leverage, promote reform, aid in the development of civil institutions and find new allies that can fill the breach while others (such as Egypt) may be in turmoil. For a president that too often has seemed annoyed with national security intrusions into his domestic agenda and has sought to minimize the U.S. role on the world stage, this is an inconvenient reality. Nevertheless, President Obama, Clinton and Clinton's successor would do well to develop an actual policy for the Middle East that consists of more than simply lurching from one crisis to another. If that realization is driven home on the Morocco trip, then it will be a worthwhile visit for both countries.

Morocco on the Move | December 3, 2012 at 4:04 pm | Tags: featured | Categories: Elections and Reform, General, Politics, Security | URL: <http://wp.me/p1Gm1x-1YW>

Comment See all comments

Unsubscribe or change your email settings at Manage Subscriptions.

Trouble clicking? Copy and paste this URL into your browser:

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2012/12/03/maybe-morocco-can-help-jennifer-rubin-the-washington-post/>

Thanks for flying with  WordPress.com

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, December 04, 2012 8:47 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: [New post] "Maybe Morocco can help" – Jennifer Rubin, The Washington Post

FYI. Minister Amrani in the WP

Morocco on the Move posted: " Washington Post, by Jennifer Rubin, Right Turn (Washington, DC, Dec. 3, 2012) -- The United States is short on allies and effective means of influencing events in the Middle East. Syria is still a bloodbath. Libya is threatened by jihadists. Egy"

Respond to this post by replying above this line

New post on Morocco On The Move

"Maybe Morocco can help" – Jennifer Rubin, The Washington Post

by Morocco on the Move

Washington Post, by Jennifer Rubin, Right Turn (Washington, DC, Dec. 3, 2012) -- The United States is short on allies and effective means of influencing events in the Middle East. Syria is still a bloodbath. Libya is threatened by jihadists. Egypt has taken a turn toward dictatorship. Mali is a non-functioning state in which jihadist separatists control much of the country. The "peace process" (for good reason) is going nowhere.

To break up the monotony of bad news, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is no doubt delighted to be hosting Morocco's Deputy Foreign Minister Youssef Amrani who is in Washington D.C to prepare for Clinton's upcoming trip to Morocco. Morocco will be chairing the United Nations Security Council in December when all of these issues are likely to be swirling and will be hosting a critical international gathering on Syria.

Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton

I spoke with Amrani by phone this morning. If the United States is happy to have pro-American friends in the region, Morocco is obviously delighted to have an elevated relationship, dubbed a "strategic partnership" that launched this fall. Amrani told me: "We have a longstanding relationship. Today we want to upgrade relations and deepen our dialogue. Tomorrow we will have a business conference called by Secretary Clinton." As part of this and future discussion, Amrani told me, "We would like to include new players -- civil society [leaders], business leaders. We want a unique relationship . . . a mode of cooperation, consultation and understanding. We think we can be a model."

Certainly the region could use a model of gradual evolution toward gender equality, rule of law, human rights and democracy, which in Morocco has been accelerated under King Mohammed VI. And the Obama administration could use some advice and assistance on a range of issues including Syria, Libya and Egypt.

Clinton will visit with the king on December 11 in a meeting expected to touch on Syria, the Palestinians and Mali where jihadists now control the northern part of the country ("It is a situation that is deteriorating," Amrani said.) Morocco supports a "double track" approach in Mali that includes both political negotiations and "military pressure" on the terror groups. On this one, Amrani said, "Africans will take the lead."

When I ask him about fears that Libya may be headed in the same direction -- a weak central government overrun by jihadists. He took the long view. "Transitions in the region -- in Tunisia, Libya, Egypt -- will be long, complicated and will take time." In Libya as in other countries, Amrani cautioned, there are "no institutions, no civil societies, no political parties." In perhaps the most memorable comment in our conversation he said simply, "Democracy is culture."

That sentiment indisputable. Critics of the Obama administration point to the lack of staying power, the failure to work over the long haul on civil society building and inconsistency in opposing autocracy that hinder U.S. influence in the region. Morocco in the past has been hesitant to step forward as a model for the region but with its newly intensified relationship with the United States and the deteriorating situation throughout the region, Morocco is becoming less reticent. Amrani explained, "We can share our modest experience. We need to have success stories . . . otherwise extremists will take the lead."

On December 12, Clinton will attend the Friends of Syria meeting hosted by Morocco. Approximately 100 international delegations are expected to attend along with representatives of the Syrian opposition. Amrani deflected a question about whether there is room for optimism that Bashar al-Assad will soon be gone. He insisted, "The future of Syria should be democracy or there is no future. . . . There is no other choice." He didn't offer a view on whether the Syrian opposition has what it needs to prevail, but said, "We have to support the opposition politically and financially. Through the [United Nations] Security Council and other organizations, we need to put pressure on the regime." He added, "We should not forget the human dimension." In addition to some 38,000 dead Syrians, Turkey and other countries now feel pressure from refugees fleeing the violence.

Throughout the interview Amrani reiterated that the United States and Morocco would discuss the peace process and should try to get the parties "back on track." From the view of many in the United States this seems Pollyannish, especially in light of the Palestinian Authority's decision to bypass bilateral negotiations and go to the United Nations General Assembly for recognition. Amrani showed his diplomatic skill: "We know that in some countries and the [United] States, some were opposed [to the unilateral declaration]. But we feel a vote could be an opportunity to bring the parties back together." He affirmed that the goal should be "two independent states, living side by side with secure frontiers." While many in the United States see this as a fruitless exercise, Morocco remains convinced that "it is important to give a positive signal," as Amrani described it.

It is with a measure of frustration that Amrani expressed the plight of moderate Arab countries. "We are fed up with conflict, with crisis. We need peace. Peace can be achieved through political will."

It is, of course, the $64,000 question whether there is the will for peace in the Palestinian Authority, which has repeatedly walked away from the bargaining table and has abrogated the Oslo Accords in going to the United Nations. That said, even the appearance of progress is better than nothing, one supposes.

Meanwhile, if nothing else, the trip to Morocco should impress upon Clinton that the "Arab Spring" is not a one season episode, but a multi-year and probably multi-decade process in which the United States will have to find ways to maximize its leverage, promote reform, aid in the development of civil institutions and find new allies that can fill the breach while others (such as Egypt) may be in turmoil. For a president that too often has seemed annoyed with national security intrusions into his domestic agenda and has sought to minimize the U.S. role on the world stage, this is an inconvenient reality. Nevertheless, President Obama, Clinton and Clinton's successor would do well to develop an actual policy for the Middle East that consists of more than simply lurching from one crisis to another. If that realization is driven home on the Morocco trip, then it will be a worthwhile visit for both countries.

Morocco on the Move | December 3, 2012 at 4:04 pm | Tags: featured | Categories: Elections and Reform, General, Politics, Security | URL: <http://wp.me/p1Gm1x-1YW>

Comment

See all comments

Unsubscribe or change your email settings at Manage Subscriptions.

Trouble clicking? Copy and paste this URL into your browser:

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2012/12/03/maybe-morocco-can-help-jennifer-rubin-the-washington-post/>

Thanks for flying with  WordPress.com

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, December 04, 2012 1:06 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: [New post] King Mohammed VI, Clinton to meet on Strategic Partnership – Morocco urges political will to build peace in region

FYI, Minister Amrani's event at the Atlantic Council.

Respond to this post by replying above this line

New post on Morocco On The Move

King Mohammed VI, Clinton to meet on Strategic Partnership – Morocco urges political will to build peace in region

by Morocco on the Move

HM King Mohammed VI and Secretary of State Clinton will meet on Dec. 11 in Morocco to discuss security challenges in Mali & Syria, Middle East peace process, and Morocco-US Strategic Partnership

Morocco Deputy Foreign Minister Amrani meets in DC with US officials, Atlantic Council on Mali, Syria

Washington, DC (Dec. 4) — Morocco Deputy Foreign Minister Youssef Amrani met with US officials today in Washington to prepare for strategic talks in Morocco on December 11 between His Majesty King Mohammed VI and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. King Mohammed VI and Secretary Clinton will discuss concrete steps Morocco and the US can take in their strategic partnership to address crises in Mali and Syria, advance the Middle East peace process and regional humanitarian concerns, and deepen US-Morocco bilateral ties.

Morocco Minister Delegate of Foreign Affairs, Youssef Amrani, speaks at Atlantic Council Dec. 3

At an Atlantic Council forum, Mr. Amrani said Morocco and the US are working together closely on a number of specific initiatives resulting from the formal Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue agreed to in September, including a US-Moroccan Business Development Conference that convened in Washington for the first time today.

In December, Morocco assumes the rotating Presidency of the UN Security Council, where it is working with the US and allies on the deteriorating situations in Mali and Syria. On December 12, Morocco is hosting the next international “Friends of Syria” meeting in Marrakech, which Secretary Clinton is expected to attend.

“We know what has to be done to build peace,” said Mr. Amrani. “We need to show the political will to do it.”

He said “the interconnection between drug-trafficking and al-Qaeda-linked extremists” in the Sahel and Central Africa “poses a great threat to the international community. If we don’t fight it, it will create instability and failed states across the region. What happened in Mali can happen in other countries.” Amrani said “African nations must take the lead,” pointing to the current two-track approach of dialogue and military pressure.

Mr. Amrani said that economic development and job creation are crucial parts of a multi-prong strategy to “build peace and prosperity and curb the rise of violent extremism in the region.” So too are political freedoms and democratic reforms. But he added, “democracy is a culture and expression of political will. Countries without a history of civil society need transition time to build it, which can be complicated, long, and difficult.”

Amrani said that Morocco, which began its reforms more than a decade ago under the leadership of King Mohammed VI, can play an important role as a regional leader with its strong civil society, tradition of tolerance and consensus-building, and respect for individual rights.

Morocco on the Move | December 4, 2012 at 12:41 pm | Tags: featured | Categories: Business, Culture, Elections and Reform, General, Politics, Religious Tolerance, Security | URL: <http://wp.me/p1Gm1x-1Ze>

Comment

See all comments

Unsubscribe or change your email settings at Manage Subscriptions.

Trouble clicking? Copy and paste this URL into your browser:

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2012/12/04/king-mohammed-vi-clinton-to-meet-on-strategic-partnership-morocco-urges-political-will-to-build-peace-in-region/>

Thanks for flying with  WordPress.com

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, December 04, 2012 6:25 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: FOX interview with Morocco's Youssef Amrani posted to MOTM

Here's the FOX News story, which is excellent once you get past the advertisement up front. The last few minutes showcase Morocco's reforms and stability under HM King Morocco VI and the reporter loves Morocco. We like to see that occasionally from the press.

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2012/12/04/fox-news-highlights-marrakech-summit-on-syria-moroccos-remarkable-reforms/>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, December 05, 2012 1:06 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Good news on Next Chairman of the MENA subcommite in the House

The next chairman of the Subcommittee on the Middle East and North Africa, which will now include both the ME and North Africa as its combined mandate, will be Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a great friend of Morocco. This is very good news for Morocco. You will recall that previously Morocco fell under the mandate of Africa. Now it is combined with the ME. Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, December 05, 2012 2:16 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Updated NPR story with Amrani (w/transcript)
Attachments: MOTM post - 'Morocco Warns Of Growing Terrorist Threat In Mali - NPR All Things Considered' 4Dec2012.pdf

Team -- Here's last night's NPR story on audio interviewing Minister Amrani, which now has a transcript. The story is generally about Mali and puts Morocco in key position as the Minister responds to key questions of the reporter. As posted at MOTM, at link below and attached:

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2012/12/04/morocco-warns-of-growing-terrorist-threat-in-mali-npr-all-things-considered/>

Morocco on the Move

LATEST NEWS

Tuesday, December 4, 2012

MOROCCO WARNS OF GROWING TERRORIST THREAT IN MALI – NPR ALL THINGS CONSIDERED

*Click here to listen to NPR story
(See full Transcript below)

National Public Radio, All Things Considered, by Michele Kelemen (Washington, DC, Dec. 4, 2012)

— The U.N. Security Council is expected to take action soon to approve an African military intervention force for Mali. Morocco is nervous about the al-Qaida affiliate based in Northern Mali, a group that is now training and supporting extremists across the continent. That's a fear the head of U.S. Africa Command, General Carter Ham, is also raising. But both he and officials in Morocco say there needs to be a two-tracked approach — a military intervention to root out al-Qaida and a big diplomatic push to reunite Mali. A coup led to a power vacuum with al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb now controlling the north.

Morocco's Deputy Foreign Minister, Youssef Amrani, speaks at Atlantic Council forum on Dec. 3

NPR's Michele Kelemen interviewed Morocco's Deputy Foreign Minister, Youssef Amrani, on Monday following his remarks at a forum hosted by the Atlantic Council in Washington, DC. She also spoke with the Atlantic Council's Ansari Africa Center Director J. Peter Pham, who welcomed Mr. Amrani to the forum along with the Atlantic Council's Fred Kempe.

Amrani is in Washington meeting with US officials to prepare for strategic talks in Morocco on December 11 between His Majesty King Mohammed VI and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. King Mohammed VI and Secretary Clinton will discuss substantive steps Morocco and the US can take in their strategic partnership to address crises in Mali and Syria, advance the Middle East peace process and regional humanitarian concerns, and deepen US-Morocco bilateral ties.

Transcript of Program (from NPR)

AUDIE CORNISH, HOST: From NPR News, this is ALL THINGS CONSIDERED. I'm Audie Cornish.

MELISSA BLOCK, HOST: And I'm Melissa Block. The African nation of Mali is one of the many pressing topics facing the U.N. Security Council this month. After a coup in Mali back in March, an al-Qaida affiliate seized control of the northern part of the country, and the terrorist threat there is growing. As NPR's Michele Kelemen reports, U.S. officials aren't the only ones raising alarms.

MICHELE KELEMEN, BYLINE: A top Moroccan official was making the rounds in Washington this week, warning of a growing extremist threat in Africa from the Gulf of Guinea to the Gulf of Yemen. Speaking in between meetings, the minister delegate for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation Youssef Amrani says the international community needs to do something and fast about northern Mali, which has become a safe haven for al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: It's urgent because if we don't find appropriate solutions, the situation will get worse. This will reinforce the extremist movement who are working today for the instability for the whole region.

KELEMEN: Morocco is the current president of the U.N. Security Council, and Amrani says his country will make sure that the council passes a resolution to authorize an African intervention force for Mali.

AMRANI: We need people who knows the region and the country. And Africans have taken the lead. That's good.

KELEMEN: But the Africans have offered just 3,000 troops to battle extremists in a region the size of Texas. And that's just not enough, says J. Peter Pham of the Atlantic Council, who points out that even the U.N. secretary general isn't ready to put U.N. funds behind that African plan.

J. PETER PHAM: It's like a child who keeps turning in the same piece of homework over and over and over trying to wear the teacher down into accepting it. I don't think that's a helpful strategy. I think the Security Council really has to take the leadership role here.

KELEMEN: Pham says it will take several more months to get a force trained, funded, and ready to intervene. The top U.S. military commander for Africa, General Carter Ham, was asked at George Washington University this week whether that's too late.

GENERAL CARTER HAM: As each day goes by, al-Qaida and other organizations are strengthening their hold in northern Mali.

KELEMEN: Ham says there's evidence that extremists from other countries, including Nigeria, have gone to northern Mali for training. And the AFRICOM commander says al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb is one of the best-funded and well-armed al-Qaida affiliates these days. But he cautions against premature military action, saying the real challenge is countering al-Qaida's ideology.

HAM: The military is a – an essential but non-decisive component of countering that ideology. It will be more successful when there's good governance, when there's economic development, when there's medical care, when there's hope and opportunity for people so that they foresee a better future and are not susceptible to a more extremist ideology which presently seems to be gaining traction.

KELEMEN: On Mali, diplomats are trying to help reunite the country. The Moroccan foreign ministry official, Amrani, says the goal is to reach out to indigenous Tuareg rebels in the north to peel them away from al-Qaida in Islamic Maghreb.

AMRANI: If they agree to play the game, if I may say so, that will be a good opportunity to help the Malians to reinforce their national cohesion.

KELEMEN: But for negotiations to succeed there also needs to be a legitimate government in Mali. And that hasn't been the case since a coup earlier this year, says Pham of the Atlantic Council.

PHAM: One of the reasons for the Tuareg uprising in northern Mali was previous peace deals were broken. If the Tuaregs had grievances about broken deals with legitimate governments, why would they ever sign a deal with a government that's not supported?

KELEMEN: That's one more problem for the countries in the region and the international community to help solve to try to prevent al-Qaida from digging themselves in. Michele Kelemen, NPR News, Washington.

Global concern grows on Jihadists' reach in region: Al-Qaeda-linked extremists seize town 50 miles from Mauritania a week after taking Ménaka near Niger border/NPR. AFP reports hundreds of jihadists pour into N. Mali from Algeria, including Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Sudan, and elsewhere.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, December 10, 2012 10:21 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS report

Commenting on Christopher Ross's briefing of the Security Council on November 28, a member of Polisario's National Secretariat (said) it contained only two positive points as far as Polisario is concerned. The first is that it recognises, albeit implicitly, the Sahrawi people's right to self-determination; the second is that it admits that direct and indirect talks have reached a dead end. What is missing is the obvious: the human rights violations committed by the Moroccan authorities in the "occupied territories". Ross has sketched out a way of restarting talks that is, from Polisario's point of view, erroneous and inappropriate, insofar as he is arguing that re-launching the talks depends on improved relations between Algeria and Morocco, as do any subsequent chances of success. In other words, Ross is saying that only Morocco and Algeria can, by improving their bilateral relations, implement a solution to the Sahara conflict within the framework of these relations. That is Morocco's position, says the National Secretariat member. Rabat has always held that the Sahara question is an artificial conflict created by Algeria to settle scores with Morocco. Now, if talks are at a dead end and the UN is incapable of forcing Morocco to organise a self-determination referendum, the situation becomes untenable and an explosion might become inevitable. Contrary to what some people might think, the tensions in the Sahel region are not an obstacle against reverting to armed struggle and might even be a facilitating factor, argues the National Secretariat leader, adding that if there were to be a resumption of armed struggle, neither Polisario nor any one else could prohibit or prevent a link-up between armed action in the Sahara and the armed action already going on in the Sahel.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, December 12, 2012 5:55 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring December Week 1

Blog Name	Update Title/ Date	Summary	Comments	Respond?
All Africa	Morocco: Spanish PM Urges Government to Support Western Sahara's Membership At UN Dec. 1, 2012	The Spanish Deputy from the Compromis-Equo coalition, Mr. Joan Baldoví, has called on the Government of his country to support Western Sahara UN membership. In a statement published Friday by Europa Press News Agency, Mr. Baldovi said "we want the UN to adopt a decision similar to that taken on Thursday with regard to the state of Palestine", considering that "a way in the recognition of Saharawi state at the UN level."	1
All Africa	Morocco: EU-Morocco Agriculture Agreement Does Not Include Western Sahara Territories. Confirms Dutch Minister Dec. 1, 2012	"The agricultural agreement... is legitimate only at the level of Moroccan territory, " Foreign Minister of the Netherlands Uri Rosenthal stated. "This statement coincides with the convictions of other countries outside the European Union, such as Norway and the United States of America, on the grounds that Western Sahara is not part of Morocco."	0
All Africa	Morocco: HM the King Congratulates Mahmoud Abbas On UN GA Vote in Favor of Palestine Status On UN Dec. 2, 2012	HM King Mohammed VI sent a congratulatory message to the President of the Palestinian National Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, on the vote by the UN General Assembly in favor of granting Palestine the status of non-member observer state. The Sovereign expressed to Mr Abbas and to the Palestinian people his warm congratulations, voicing satisfaction with this international recognition "which is the culmination of your tremendous efforts and	0

		your ongoing initiatives designed to recover all looted national rights."
All Africa	Morocco: There Is No Solution to Western Sahara Conflict Out of Referendum. Confirms Khatri Addouh Dec. 3, 2012	"It is out of question to design a solution (to the Saharawi conflict) apart from those relating to the holding of a free, fair and transparent referendum on self-determination for the Saharawi people," said Mr. Khatri Addouh, Speaker for the Saharawi National Council and Head of the Saharawi negotiating delegation with Morocco. He said in this context that "the Moroccan autonomy project could not achieve success," because, he said, "it is in total contradiction with UN decisions and resolutions on Western Sahara." "Moroccan autonomy proposal has convinced, ultimately, no country in the world," he said.	0
All Africa	Morocco: Conference in Swedish Parliament On Looting Natural Resources of Western Sahara Dec. 5, 2012	A conference held in the Swedish Parliament focused on the looting of Western Sahara's natural resources and illegal exploitation of these resources by Moroccan occupation, according to the Polisario Representation in Sweden. The conference was attended by politicians and representatives of several Swedish parties. Conference participants urged the EU to exclude all producers that exported from the occupied Western Sahara from any trade agreement with Morocco.	0
The African Bulletin	Morocco to assume rotating Security Council presidency for December Dec. 2, 2012	Mohammed Loulichki, the permanent representative of Morocco to the United Nations, will take over the rotating security council presidency. Some observers believe the Moroccan presidency will expedite discussion of two current SC issues; Syria and the Sahel.	0
Middle East Online	Morocco turns Marchica	The King launched the construction of hotels and a	0

	lagoon into paradise of water and greenery Dec. 2, 2012	golf course in Atalayoun. The project is intended to promote economic development and tourism in the Nador province and to provide an example of sustainable urban planning.
Washington Post	Maybe Morocco can help Dec. 3, 2012	Jennifer Rubin writes about her phone interview with Minister Amrani, during which they discussed the strategic partnership, Morocco's advancements in terms of gender equality, rule of law, human rights and democracy, and prospects for cooperation.	24
Reuters	Portugal's Galp buys operatorship in Moroccan bloc Dec. 3, 2012	Portuguese oil company Galp Energia has agreed to buy a 50 percent stake in Morocco's shallow-water Tarfaya offshore bloc from Australia's Tangiers. The first well is to be drilled by mid-2014 in the Trident prospect of the Tarfaya area. Galp said Trident is estimated to contain 450 million barrels of recoverable reserves.	0
Reuters	MIDEAST DEBT- Morocco under pressure to plug budget gap, avert more protests Dec. 5, 2012	There are daily protests about wasteful government spending, some of which focus on the spending habits of the royal family. The article claims that "[t]hough King Mohammed's royal expenditure is higher than those of European monarchies, it amounts to less than 1 percent of Morocco's budget....in the face of simmering unrest the government is hurriedly trying to find cash to avoid having to roll back subsidies, which account for 15 percent of total public spending".	0
Des Maux à Dire	Malgré les critiques soulevées par l'usage disproportionné de la force : Benkirane défend les violences policières	Benkirane believes that the use of police violence during demonstrations prevents protesters from being arrested and embarrassing their families. According to Mounir Bensalah, a member of the National Council OMDH: "Our international partners will surely be	0

	contre les manifestants Despite the criticisms raised by the disproportionate use of force: Benkirane defends police violence against demonstrators Dec. 3, 2012	shocked by these words because they call into question the willingness of the Kingdom to establish the rule of law and respect human rights". This article was translated from French to English
Ibn Kafka's obiter dicta	Laïcité à la marocaine Moroccan Secularism Dec. 3, 2013	It may seem surprising in a country that is considered Muslim, and where most citizens self-identify as religious, that elections are invalidated due to the inclusion of a minaret in the background of campaign materials. Article 118 of the Moroccan constitution prohibits such actions. The goal is to prevent the manipulation of religious sentiments of voters. This article was translated from French to English	0
Magharebia	Moroccan women protest sexual harassment Dec. 3, 2012	Morocco's Democratic League for Women's Rights organized a sit-in in Rabat to demand the criminalization of all forms of sexual harassment. Protesters called for laws to protect the dignity of girls and women.	0
Magharebia	Global report hails Algeria security progress Dec. 5, 2012	Algeria, the United States and Colombia have made the greatest progress over the past decade in reducing the impact of terrorism. "Algeria has experienced a steady decline in terrorist operations from 2002 to 2011," the Institute for Economics and Peace said.	0
Magharebia	Morocco delays Tamazight implementation - Dec. 6, 2012	The rector of Royal Institute for Amazigh Culture (IRCAM), Ahmed Boukousa, said that the granting of official status to Amazigh by the coconstitution was a historic	0

		milestone and that the government must now take the necessary steps to implement this decision. Tamazight is not yet being taught at all primary schools and certain difficulties have been encountered, such as a shortage of specialist teachers. The Minister of Higher Education and Scientific Research, Lahcen Daoudi, who is himself an Amazigh, says that running language holiday camps would be a more convenient way of helping children to master the language than teaching it.
Magharebia	Morocco terror cell suspects appear in court Dec. 7, 2012	A Sale court arraigned 27 alleged members of a terror recruitment cell reports MAP. Individuals were seized in Casablanca, Laayoune, Nador, Guercif and Kelaat Sraghna and are accused of sending more than 20 young Moroccans to join al-Qaeda and the Movement for Tawhid and Jihad (MUJAO) in northern Mali. One of the suspects is a Malian national.	0
Magharebia	Benkirane answers rights complaints Dec. 7, 2012	Benkirane responded to criticisms about civil rights in Morocco by saying the fact that there are so many protests is a testament to the rights Moroccans enjoy.	0
African Manager	EU, Morocco, Tunisia discuss free trade agreement Dec. 4, 2012	The European Union (EU) will open talks with Morocco and Tunisia to conclude a free trade agreement with the two North African countries in order to "improve market access, investment climate and support economic reforms in these countries while taking into account the specifics of each of them". The EU will also do preparatory work with Egypt to achieve a free trade agreement there.	0
Eurasia Review	Morocco: Political Reform And Economic	The author emphasizes Morocco's social and economic progress while	0

	Growth. Hand In Hand – OpEd Dec. 4, 2012	drawing a favorable comparison against other North African countries. He defends the monarchy, asserting that “the monarchy possesses a special measure of legitimacy owing to its descent from the Prophet Muhammad”.
Blogma Aggregator	Xenophobia in FIFM against Moroccan journalists Dec. 4, 2012	Moroccan journalists were allegedly beaten by French security guards at the International Film Festival in Marrakech. Festival policy appears to be somewhat xenophobic, with Moroccans being barred from certain hotels and restaurants.	0
Nuwire Investor	Rentals. Home Prices Improving in Morocco Dec. 4, 2012	Residential property prices rose by 1% in 2012 based on the real estate price indexes constructed by Bank Al-Maghrib and the National Land Registry Office. The housing market was weakened by local and global crises in 2007 and 2008, and in Marrakesh it had dropped by 40 percent.	0
Over Blog	Peine de mort: "le Maroc doit voter le moratoire" Death penalty: Morocco should vote on the moratorium Dec. 4, 2012	This article is an interview between Menara and Abderrahim Jamaï, coordinator of the Moroccan Coalition for the Abolition of the death penalty. Jamaï states that “It is unfortunate that Morocco has once again refused to vote (in the UN to support a moratorium)”. Morocco has not used the death penalty in years, yet there are 111 death row prisoners in Moroccan jails, four of whom were imprisoned in 2012. “Voting on the moratorium would be a symbolic gesture of Morocco moving forward” Jamaï said. This article was translated from French to English	0
Fox News	Morocco honorary consul in Syria reportedly	The official Moroccan news agency says the North African country's honorary consul in Aleppo, Syria, has

	killed in Aleppo — Dec. 5, 2012	been killed by armed men as he left a hotel in the city. The MAP agence reported that Mohamed Alae Eddinne was killed after armed men in a taxi attacked him. The report said Eddinne, a Syrian national, was born in 1961 and had been the honorary consul of Morocco since 2001. Such posts are largely ceremonial.
AG Professional	Morocco poised to shift phosphate markets Dec. 5, 2012	The Moroccan government has been aggressively pursuing bilateral and multilateral negotiations with European, Middle Eastern and North American governments to secure market access for its mineral and agricultural products. It is currently the world's largest exporter of phosphate rock ore and phosphate production, and is expected to increase its outputs. Negotiations have been made with Canada for a free trade agreement between the two nations. However, regional instability remains a concern to many companies and governments.	0
POMED	Clinton Announces Visit to Morocco, Tunisia, and UAE Dec. 5, 2012	POMED reports, "Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's plans to travel to Morocco, Tunisia, and the United Arab Emirates later this month. Clinton will lead a U.S. delegation at the Friends of the Syrian People meeting in Marrakesh on December 12, where she is expected designate a Syrian rebel group with reported ties to al-Qaeda as a terrorist organization in the hopes of decreasing the influence of extremists with the Syrian opposition. After Morocco, Clinton will then travel to Tunisia to co-host the 9th Forum for the Future Ministerial with the Tunisian government on December 13, and will finish her trip by attending a global counterterrorism forum in the United Arab Emirates on December 14.	0

POMED	Western Sahara May Seek U.N. Observer Status Dec. 7, 2012	According to an article translated by Al-Monitor, president of the Sahara National Council and head of the Polisario Front's negotiating team Khatri Eddouh "did not rule out that the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic may request U.N. recognition as an observer state as Palestine did". Eddouh said Palestine's successful bid is "a moral and psychological victory for the Sahrawi people".	0
France 24	Little hope in Morocco shanty town, despite promises Dec. 6, 2012	Around 10,000 people living in the Saab Al-Kaid shanty town outside Sale have lost hope in governmental promises of improving their living situation. Nearly one in six Moroccan citizens is without "decent" accommodation, Housing Minister Mohamed Nabil Benabdallah admitted at a recent press conference.	0
Financial Times	Investors pile in on Morocco's $1.5bn issue [updated] Dec. 6, 2012	The Financial Times writes that, "the specter of political risk hasn't deterred investors from piling in on Morocco's maiden dollar- denominated bond. The North African country, which is under pressure to plug budget gap and contain the kind of protests that have brought down regimes in other parts of the Middle East, raised $1.5bn in a dual-tranche offering on Wednesday."	1
Morocco News Board	Spain's EU Residency For Real-Estate Investment Plan Worries Morocco Dec. 6, 2012	Spanish secretary of state for commerce, Jaime García-Legaz, announced last month that the government was contemplating granting temporary residency cards to foreigners who buy homes valued over 160,000 euros. He was primarily targeting the Chinese and Russian investors to revive Spain's housing market. However, it is Moroccans who have truly taken interest due to the difficulty of getting a visa to enter the EU.	1
Rappler	Pinays in	Young women from the	2

	Morocco cry rape, abuse Dec. 6, 2012	Philippines working as housemaids in Morocco described being exploited, physically abused and raped by their employers in the North African kingdom.
Naharnet	Morocco NGOs Launch Campaign to Free Jailed Activists Dec. 7, 2012	Moroccan human rights groups have announced the launch of a national campaign to free more than 70 "political prisoners," particularly jailed members of the "February 20" protest movement.
The National	Morocco cashes in on its investment grade Dec. 7, 2012	Morocco retained its investment-grade status, unlike Tunisia who S&P demoted as "junk" in May, and Egypt, which has been downgraded four times to a "B", since the Arab Spring started at the end of 2010.	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, December 12, 2012 5:56 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Twitter Monitoring December Week 1

Title/ Date	Summary
Europe Hot for Algerian Shale Gas Dec. 3, 2012	The Sahara Desert is a potential cure for the European Union's gas problems, and all eyes are on Algeria's 321 trillion cubic feet of recoverable shale gas.
Scotland and Catalonia bellwethers for Western Sahara? Dec. 3, 2012	This piece suggests that other regional independence movements could set a precedent for Western Sahara independence.
L'Istiqlal tance encore une fois M. Laenser Istiqlal distances itself again by M. Laenser Dec. 3, 2012	The Istiqlal party requests a definitive timetable of forthcoming legislative deadlines from its partner, PJD. Abdallah Bakkali, MP and editor of the party's newspaper, compares the attitude of the current Minister of the Interior to that of former minister Driss Basri, notorious for announcing last minute meetings at his convenience.
Chabat Warns against 'Social Explosion' in Morocco Dec. 3, 2012	Hamid Chabat, Secretary General of the Istiqlal party, criticized Benkirane's intention to raise water and electricity prices, and says Morocco needs "concrete solutions to put an end to further strikes".
Morocco Ranks First Country in Arab World in English Proficiency Dec. 4, 2012	According to the latest report of the EF English Proficiency Index conducted by the Swiss-based Education First, Morocco ranks as the first country in the Arab world in terms of English proficiency. At the global level, it ranks 35th.
Morocco ranks Low in the Environmental Performance	According to the Environmental Performance Index, issued by Yale University, Morocco ranks 105th position among 132 countries. The study gauges 22 criteria including the level of pollution in the air, the availability of water resources, biodiversity, forest exploitation and the impact of climate change. Moroccan policy makers are urged to protect biodiversity where Morocco ranks

Index Dec. 6, 2012	117th position and the quality of potable water where it ranks 116th. Morocco's environmental record is more positive in agriculture where it ranks 19th position and climate change where it is ranks 47th
Mali : Probable intervention militaire au début de 2013 (Mali: Military intervention likely in the beginning of 2013) Dec. 6, 2013	The president of ECOWAS has urged the UNSC to adopt a resolution to allow a military intervention in northern Mali in the first part of 2013.
Corruption: Le Maroc toujours «champion» (Corruption: Morocco still the champion) Dec. 6, 2012	According to the Index of Perception of Corruption, published by Transparency International, Morocco is "very corrupt".
Mali counts on Morocco support in current crisis. Malian Minister Dec. 6, 2012	Malian Minister of Territorial Administration and Local Government, Sinko Kolibaly Moussa said Wednesday in Dakar that his country depends on Morocco's support to face the current crisis in the north of the country. "Since the start of the sad events in Northern Mali, we have appreciated Morocco's presence to our side through its support to our country, including the shipping of humanitarian aid to the affected Malian population," Moussa told MAP following a meeting with Interior Minister, Mohaned Laenser on the sidelines of the 6th Africities Summit held in Dakar.
La fréquentation touristique au Maroc a légèrement augmenté à fin octobre 2012 (ODA) Tourism increases slightly in Morocco by the end of October 2012 Dec. 6, 2012	Despite the eurozone crisis, tourism has increased by one percent in Morocco, according to the l'Observatoire du Tourisme (ODT).
Electricité: Une	The government is examining the possibility of increasing electricity taxes, according to the Minister of Energy, Fouad Douiri. These tariffs have not changed since 2006.

éventuelle hausse des tarifs est prévue

Electricity:
Expected increase in tariffs

Dec. 7, 2012

Desertec : le Maroc, avenir des énergies renouvelables

-

Desertec: A future for Morocco in renewable energy

Dec. 7, 2012

Desertec is a German energy concept which involves the construction of solar panels throughout the Middle East and North Africa, including Morocco. The goal is to produce enough electricity for all of North Africa and some of Europe.

PRELIMINARY RESULTS REPORT

Minister Youssef Amrani visit to US to prepare for HM King Mohammed VI/ Secretary of State Clinton Meeting in Morocco on December 11

Communications/Press Coverage

PRELIMINARY RESULTS REPORT

Minister Youssef Amrani visit to US to prepare for HM King Mohammed VI/ Secretary of State Clinton Meeting in Morocco on December 11

Communications/Press Coverage

Objectives

The key communications goals for this trip were twofold: 1) to generate press coverage of Minister Amrani in the US and generate publicity for the December 11 strategic discussions between HM King Mohammed VI and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton in Morocco, and 2) to provide background briefings and drive interest amongst media that will report and write next week about Secretary Clinton's trip to Morocco to meet with HM the King and also participate in the December 12 "Friends of Syria" meeting in Marrakech.

A key challenge, again, was getting the attention of US press, which has traditionally shown little interest in covering strategic discussions, dialogues, or partnerships with other nations that don't appear to have a direct link to breaking news or issues followed closely by the US public. MAC conducted broad outreach to US print and broadcast media, prepared press briefing materials, coordinated a think tank forum, and communicated aggressively through online and social media channels. Importantly, MAC leveraged and linked external messaging on Minister Amrani's visit and the upcoming December 11 meeting in Morocco with breaking news about the ongoing crises in Mali, and Syria, as well as the Middle East Peace process.

Results

As a result, Morocco and Minister Amrani generated significant visibility in mainstream US press for his December 3-4 visit and for the upcoming meeting between HM the King and Secretary Clinton. CNN International and FOX News.com broadcast live interviews with Minister Amrani that publicized the upcoming meeting between King Mohammed VI and Secretary Clinton and positioned Morocco as a leader with regard to the upcoming "Friends of Syria" summit in Marrakech. FOX News.com, one of the largest news sites in the US with several million daily viewers, devoted the second part of its interview to a recitation of HM King Mohammed VI's visionary reforms that helped keep Morocco a relative oasis of stability through the turmoil of the Arab Spring. The FOX News correspondent went so far as to express how much he personally likes Morocco - even highly recommending it as a place for viewers to visit. Such advocacy is not standard practice among US news journalists. The Washington Post published a very positive commentary on Morocco by influential columnist Jennifer Rubin, who is one of the most widely-read conservative commentators in Washington.

National Public Radio's most popular program 'All Things Considered' — which airs on more than 950 radio stations in virtually every market across the US — broadcast a story to millions of US listeners that featured Minister Amrani with the Commander of AFRICOM General Carter Ham and respected Africa security expert J. Peter Pham expressing their shared concern about the growing danger from the extremist takeover of northern Mali, which is a threat to North Africa, the US, and the international community.

Minister Amrani was also able to brief a number of other journalists — Christiane Amanpour from CNN, as well as journalists from the Associated Press, TIME magazine, BBC, The Washington Times, The Washington Post editorial board, and Voice of America — which will help shape their news coverage of Secretary Clinton's travels to Morocco next week for both her meeting with HM the King and the "Friends of Syria" meeting. These pre-briefings are very important and critical to positively influencing stories that will be written next week during Secretary Clinton's visit.

While the numbers are very preliminary, this news coverage and two MAC press releases resulted in hundreds of positive stories and postings at news media sites, and generated more than 30 million impressions in English-speaking media, raising awareness among the US press, public, and policymakers of the deepening strategic partnership between Morocco and the US.

PRELIMINARY MEDIA COVERAGE RESULTS

For December 3-4 Visit to Washington, DC by H.E. Minister Delegate for Foreign Affairs Youssef Amrani

CNN Live Interview

Tuesday, Dec.4

* Live interview CNN International with Minister Amrani on upcoming Clinton trip to meet HM the King and “Friends of Syria” (Audience: A daily, global broadcast show with more than a million daily viewers)

CNN Interviews Youssef Amrani on Clinton’s upcoming Morocco trip, “Friends of Syria” summit

CNN International (Dec. 4, 2012) — CNN International today interviewed Morocco’s Delegate Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, Youssef Amrani, about upcoming Dec. 11-12 trip [...]

CNN with Christiane Amanpour

Tuesday, Dec.4

* Background interview conducted with Christiane Amanpour. Will inform any coverage of Clinton’s trip to Morocco, Friends of Syria, and Mali. Amanpour is the Chief International Correspondent for CNN and host of CNN International's nightly interview program Amanpour. She's also a Global Affairs Anchor of ABC News.

Background interview with CNN Reporter Christiane Amanpour

FOX NEWS Live Interview

Tuesday, Dec.4

* Live interview on FOX News with Minister Amrani on upcoming Clinton trip to meet HM the King and “Friends of Syria” (Audience: One of the largest news sites in America with several million daily viewers)

FOX News Interviews Youssef Amrani, highlights Marrakech summit on Syria and Morocco’s remarkable record of reform

FOX News Channel, On the Hunt (New York City, NY, Dec. 4, 2012) – FOX News correspondent Jonathan Hunt today interviewed Youssef Amrani, Morocco’s Deputy Foreign Minister, [...]

NPR 'All Things Considered'

Tuesday, Dec.4

* Taped interview with Minister Amrani for broadcast on National Public Radio's 'All Things Considered' (Audience: One of the most popular daily programs for elite policy makers and several million listeners across the US)

Morocco Warns Of Growing Terrorist Threat In Mali – NPR 'All Things Considered' Interviews Y. Amrani

National Public Radio, All Things Considered, by Michele Kelemen (Washington, DC, Dec. 4, 2012) — The U.N. Security Council is expected to take action soon to approve an African military intervention force for Mali. Morocco is nervous about the al-Qaida affiliate based in Northern [...]

AP Associated Press

Tuesday, Dec.4

* Background interview conducted with AP reporter to shape upcoming coverage next week on trip with Clinton to Morocco. Lee plans to meet with Amrani again while in Marrakesh. AP stories will have largest total US audience of all coverage of trip.

Interview with Matt Lee, Associated Press, who will join Clinton trip to Morocco to meet HM the King and "Friends of Syria

MAC Press Release

Tuesday, Dec.4

* Sent to PR Newswire, reporters, posted at 241 US news media websites, including Reuters, Wall Street Journal Market Watch, Boston Globe, Yahoo News and many more

King Mohammed VI, Clinton to meet Dec 11, Morocco urges 'political will to build peace in region'

Morocco Deputy Foreign Minister Amrani meets with US officials, Atlantic Council

Washington, DC (Dec. 4) — Morocco Deputy Foreign Minister Youssef Amrani met with US officials today in Washington to prepare for strategic talks in Morocco on December 11 between His Majesty King Mohammed VI and Secretary of State [...]

Washington Times reporter

Tuesday, Dec.4

* Interview with Washington Times reporter Shaun Waterman. Expected to result in coverage leading up to Clinton trip to Morocco. Influential conservative readership in US capital.

Interview with Washington Times reporter Shaun Waterman

Washington Post Commentary

Monday, Dec.3

* Interview with Minister Amrani and columnist Jennifer Rubin posted at Washington Post online “Right Turn” forum (Audience: The Washington policy community and over 2 million viewers daily)

“Maybe Morocco can help” – Jennifer Rubin talks with Youssef Amrani / The Washington Post

Washington Post, by J. Rubin, Right Turn (Washington, DC, Dec. 3, 2012) — The US is short on allies and effective means of influencing events in the Middle East. Syria is still a bloodbath. Libya is threatened by jihadists. Egypt has taken a turn toward dictatorship. [...]

Atlantic Council Forum

Monday, Dec.3

* Two dozen experts and policymakers joined Minister Amrani at a think tank forum hosted by the influential Atlantic Council think tank. Attended by reporters from NPR, VOA.

H.E. Youssef Amrani at the Atlantic Council

The Michael S. Ansari Africa Center hosted a discussion today with H.E. Youssef Amrani, minister-delegate for foreign affairs and cooperation of the Kingdom of Morocco. The minister-delegate is in Washington in advance of Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton’s travel to Morocco next week for the “Friends of Syria” meeting in Marrakesh as well as strategic discussions with His Majesty King Mohammed VI [...]

VOA Voice of America

Monday, Dec.3

* Taped interview with Minister Amrani following Atlantic Council forum with VOA host Carol Castiel will air next week for Clinton trip to Morocco, to VOA audience of millions worldwide.

Interview with VOA host Carol Castiel for radio program to air during Clinton trip to Morocco

BBC

Monday, Dec.3

* Background interview with Kim Ghattas, BBC, for report that will air next week around time of Clinton trip to Morocco, to BBC audience of millions worldwide.

Background interview with BBC reporter Kim Ghattas for coverage to air next week during Clinton trip to Morocco

TIME Magazine

Monday, Dec.3

* Background interview with Jay Newton-Small, TIME, the largest news weekly in America, for a story that will be published next week around time of Clinton trip to Morocco, to TIME audience of several millions in US & worldwide

Background interview with TIME reporter Jay Newton-Small expected to run next week before Clinton trip to Morocco

Washington Post editorial board

Monday, Dec.3

* Briefing with Washington Post editorial writer Jackson Diehl. Will inform any editorials on Clinton's trip to Morocco, Friends of Syria, and Mali. Readership is several million and the Washington Post is the among most respected publication in the US capital.

Introduction and briefing with Washington Post editorial writer Jackson Diehl

MOTM Blog Post

Sunday, Dec.2

* Posted advisory at MoroccoOnTheMove. Picked up and published from MOTM by AllAfrica.com. Helped spread word about Strategic Dialogue business conference

United States to Host US-Moroccan Business Development Conference

US State Department, Notice to the Press (Washington, DC, Dec. 2, 2012) — On December 4, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic and Business Affairs Jose W. Fernandez and Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs Beth Jones, in cooperation with the Bureau of Energy Resources, will convene a business development conference [...]

MAC Press Advisory

Thursday, Nov.29

* Sent to PR Newswire, reporters, posted at 252 US news media websites including Reuters, Wall Street Journal Market Watch, Boston Globe, Yahoo News and many more

King Mohammed VI, Secretary Clinton to Meet in Morocco on Mali, Syria, and Strategic Partnership

Morocco Deputy Foreign Minister Amrani in DC Dec. 3 for preparations

MACP (Washington, DC, Nov. 29) — Morocco's Deputy Foreign Minister Youssef Amrani will be in Washington, DC on December 3 to prepare for Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's upcoming strategic discussions in Morocco with His Majesty King Mohammed VI. King Mohammed VI and [...]

Delegate-Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation Youssef Amrani

Washington, DC Media and Think Tank Visit Schedule
December 3-4, 2012

Monday, December 3

9:30 AM – 10:00 AM

Media Interview via Phone with Jen Rubin, The Washington Post

Contact: 703-476-2422; Naomi Decter (MAC Media Consultant) 202-321-3654

12:00 PM – 12:45 PM

Media Interview with Al-Jazeera

1:00 PM

Editorial Board Interview led by Jackson Diehl, The Washington Post

Location: 1150 15th Street, N.W., Washington, DC 20005

Attendees: Minister Amrani

Contact: TBD; Naomi Decter (MAC Media Consultant) 202-321-3654

2:00 PM

Media Interview with Jay Newton-Small, TIME

Location: 1130 Connecticut Avenue, N.W., 9th Floor, Washington, DC 20036

Attendees: Minister Amrani

Contact: Ms. Newton-Small (Reporter) 202-861-4069; Naomi Decter (MAC Media Consultant) 202-321-3654

3:00 PM

Background Media Interview with Kim Ghattas, BBC

Location: MAC Offices, 1220 L Street, N.W., Suite 411, Washington, DC 20005

Attendees: Minister Amrani

Contact: 202-247-0368; Naomi Decter (MAC Media Consultant) 202-321-3654

4:00 PM – 5:15 PM

Think Tank Event – The Atlantic Council

Location: The Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, 888 16th Street, 8th Floor Conference Room, Washington, DC 20005

Attendees: Minister Amrani, Ambassador Bouhlal, Ambassador Gabriel

Contact/Host: Dr. J. Peter Pham, 202-778-4952

5:15 PM

Media Interview with Michele Keleman, National Public Radio (NPR)

Location: The Michael S. Ansari Africa Center

Attendees: Minister Amrani

Contact: 202-513-2292; Naomi Decter (MAC Media Consultant) 202-321-3654

Moroccan American Center for Policy

December 6, 2012

5:30 PM

Media Interview with Carol Castiel, Voice of America

Location: The Michael S. Ansari Africa Center

Attendees: Minister Amrani

Contact: 202-382-7438 (Office)/202-841-9925 (Mobile); Naomi Decter (MAC Media Consultant) 202-321-3654

Tuesday, December 4

6:10 AM

Media Interview with Max Foster, CNN International

Location: CNN Washington Studio, 820 1st Street, N.E., Washington, DC 20002

Attendees: Minister Amrani

Contact: +44 771 281 3663; Naomi Decter (MAC Media Consultant) 202-321-3654

Note: Upon arrival, just tell the host that you are there for "World One"

Media Interview via phone with Christiane Amanpour

11:00 AM

Media Interview via Phone with Matt Lee, Associated Press

Contact: 409-777-9000, Passcode 365614#

11:20 AM

Media Interview via Phone with Shaun Waterman, The Washington Times

Contact: 732-832-7512, Passcode: 5467#

11:45 AM – 12:10 PM

Media Interview with Jonathan Hunt, FoxNews.com LIVE

Location: 400 N Capitol St NW Suite 550

Attendees: Minister Amrani

Contact: Naomi Decter (MAC Media Consultant) 202-321-3654

<http://mediacenter.tveyes.com/downloadgateway.aspx?UserID=61834&MDID=1361415&MDSed=6519&Type=Media>

CNN International LIVE

Tuesday, December 4, 2012

Interview with:

Morocco's Delegate Minister for Foreign Affairs & Cooperation, Youssef Amrani

FRIENDS OF SYRIA – Delegates to discuss political transition, aid for refuges, and security

CNN (Anchor from CNN Hong Kong): US Sec. of State Hillary Clinton is to discuss Syria's future next week at an international meeting. A smooth political transition, aid to refugees, and the future stability of the region will be on the agenda at the "Friends of Syria" meeting in Morocco. We want to cross over to Morocco's Delegate Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation. He joins us now from Washington. Thank you very much for being with us.

CNN: What do you hope to accomplish with this meeting with the Secretary of State?

Amrani: First of all, we waited for a long time before convening this meeting. Today we think the conditions are gathered. There is a coalition of the Syrian opposition. And I think we need to build on this moment and to move forward. We need to support the Syrian civil society towards a democratic transition. This is I think the major outcome of the visit of Mrs. Clinton to Morocco. She will also have within the Strategic Dialogue with King Mohammed VI, to discuss not only the Syrian issue, but other issues with are today in the agenda of the Security Council that Morocco is chairing this month.

CNN: When we look at specifically Syria, you said "moving forward" and you said "support." What specifically are you talking about when you say moving forward especially at time when it seems as though things are not moving forward in Syria. What are you talking about when you say support? Are you talking about material support? Financial support? Military support for the opposition?

Amrani: I think we should give all the necessary support to Syria, to the Syrian opposition in order to lead the democratic transition in Syria. Because the future of Syria should be democratic. There is no other choice. And we need to help them stop the violence. We should continue pressure within the Security Council on Bashar Assad and to be able to allow the Syrian people to decide over its future, respect its sovereignty, its independence, and the democratic values that we share together. Today we have no more choice than to support the Syrian people and we cannot stand any conflict in the region.

CNN: How optimistic are you of a smooth political transition, of a smooth political future for Syria post-Assad?

Amrani: I think it is up to the Syrian people to decide. I think that today they have shown the will to move forward towards national reconciliation, joining and associating all the civil society and political parties in the shaping up and making up of the future of Syria. It should be democratic and we should now support it internationally. Don't forget also the human dimension of this conflict. It's important because today there are a lot of refugees in the neighboring countries – in Turkey and in Jordan – and the need to help these people in order to live in decent conditions.

CNN: Alright, Morocco Delegate Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, Youssef Amrani. Thank you very much for your time.

Amrani: Thank you very much. You're welcome.

<http://video.foxnews.com/v/2011161830001/>

Tuesday, December 4, 2012

Interview with:

Morocco's Delegate Minister for Foreign Affairs & Cooperation, Youssef Amrani

FOX News correspondent Jonathan Hunt today interviewed Youssef Amrani, Morocco's Deputy Foreign Minister, about reports that Syria may be considering using chemical weapons and next week's milestone international conference in Marrakech, Morocco for the "Friends of Syria" group of nations.

After discussing Syria, Hunt and Amrani turn their focus to Morocco and note how its decade of reforms under King Mohammed VI has made Morocco a model for stability and progress in the region, and a leader on critical international issues.

<http://www.npr.org/2012/12/04/166519642/morocco-warns-of-growing-terrorist-threat-in-mali>

Tuesday, December 4, 2012

Morocco Warns Of Growing Terrorist Threat In Mali

by Michele Kelemen

The U.N. Security Council is expected to take action soon to approve an African military intervention force for Mali. Morocco is nervous about the al-Qaida affiliate based in Northern Mali, a group that is now training and supporting extremists across the continent. That's a fear the head of U.S. Africa Command is also raising. But both he and officials in Morocco say there needs to be a two-tracked approach — a military intervention to root out al-Qaida and a big diplomatic push to reunite Mali. A coup led to a power vacuum with al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb now controlling the north.

TRANSCRIPT:

AUDIE CORNISH, HOST:

From NPR News, this is ALL THINGS CONSIDERED. I'm Audie Cornish.

MELISSA BLOCK, HOST:

And I'm Melissa Block.

The African nation of Mali is one of the many pressing topics facing the U.N. Security Council this month. After a coup in Mali back in March, an al-Qaida affiliate seized control of the northern part of the country, and the terrorist threat there is growing. As NPR's Michele Kelemen reports, U.S. officials aren't the only ones raising alarms.

MICHELE KELEMEN, BYLINE: A top Moroccan official was making the rounds in Washington this week, warning of a growing extremist threat in Africa from the Gulf of Guinea to the Gulf of Yemen. Speaking in between meetings, the minister delegate for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation Youssef Amrani says the international community needs to do something and fast about northern Mali, which has become a safe haven for al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb.

YOUSSEF AMRANI: It's urgent because if we don't find appropriate solutions, the situation will get worse. This will reinforce the extremist movement who are working today for the instability for the whole region.

KELEMEN: Morocco is the current president of the U.N. Security Council, and Amrani says his country will make sure that the council passes a resolution to authorize an African intervention force for Mali.

AMRANI: We need people who knows the region and the country. And Africans have taken the lead. That's good.

KELEMEN: But the Africans have offered just 3,000 troops to battle extremists in a region the size of Texas. And that's just not enough, says J. Peter Pham of the Atlantic Council, who points out that even the U.N. secretary general isn't ready to put U.N. funds behind that African plan.

J. PETER PHAM: It's like a child who keeps turning in the same piece of homework over and over and over trying to wear the teacher down into accepting it. I don't think that's a helpful strategy. I think the Security Council really has to take the leadership role here.

KELEMEN: Pham says it will take several more months to get a force trained, funded, and ready to intervene. The top U.S. military commander for Africa, General Carter Ham, was asked at George Washington University this week whether that's too late.

GENERAL CARTER HAM: As each day goes by, al-Qaida and other organizations are strengthening their hold in northern Mali.

KELEMEN: Ham says there's evidence that extremists from other countries, including Nigeria, have gone to northern Mali for training. And the AFRICOM commander says al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb is one of the best-funded and well-armed al-Qaida affiliates these days. But he cautions against premature military action, saying the real challenge is countering al-Qaida's ideology.

HAM: The military is a - an essential but non-decisive component of countering that ideology. It will be more successful when there's good governance, when there's economic development, when there's medical care, when there's hope and opportunity for people so that they foresee a better future and are not susceptible to a more extremist ideology which presently seems to be gaining traction.

KELEMEN: On Mali, diplomats are trying to help reunite the country. The Moroccan foreign ministry official, Amrani, says the goal is to reach out to indigenous Tuareg rebels in the north to peel them away from al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb.

AMRANI: If they agree to play the game, if I may say so, that will be a good opportunity to help the Malians to reinforce their national cohesion.

KELEMEN: But for negotiations to succeed there also needs to be a legitimate government in Mali. And that hasn't been the case since a coup earlier this year, says Pham of the Atlantic Council.

PHAM: One of the reasons for the Tuareg uprising in northern Mali was previous peace deals were broken. If the Tuaregs had grievances about broken deals with legitimate governments, why would they ever sign a deal with a government that's not supported?

KELEMEN: That's one more problem for the countries in the region and the international community to help solve to try to prevent al-Qaida from digging themselves in. Michele Kelemen, NPR News, Washington.

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/press-releases/press-release-morocco-urges-political-will/>

CONTACT: Garth Neuffer
202.470.2055

gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE:

Tuesday, December 4, 2012

King Mohammed VI, Sec. Clinton to meet on Strategic Partnership, Morocco urges 'political will to build peace, curb extremism in region'

Morocco Deputy Foreign Minister Amrani meets with US officials, Atlantic Council on Mali, Syria

Washington, DC (Dec. 4) — Morocco Deputy Foreign Minister Youssef Amrani met with US officials today in Washington to prepare for strategic talks in Morocco on December 11 between His Majesty King Mohammed VI and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. King Mohammed VI and Secretary Clinton will discuss concrete steps Morocco and the US can take in their strategic partnership to address crises in Mali and Syria, advance the Middle East peace process and regional humanitarian concerns, and deepen US-Morocco bilateral ties.

At an Atlantic Council forum, Mr. Amrani said Morocco and the US are working together closely on a number of specific initiatives resulting from the formal Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue agreed to in September, including a US-Moroccan Business Development Conference that convened in Washington for the first time today.

In December, Morocco assumes the rotating Presidency of the UN Security Council, where it is working with the US and allies on the deteriorating situations in Mali and Syria. On December 12, Morocco is hosting the next international "Friends of Syria" meeting in Marrakech, which Secretary Clinton is expected to attend.

"We know what has to be done to build peace," said Mr. Amrani. "We need to show the political will to do it."

He said "the interconnection between drug-trafficking and al-Qaeda-linked extremists" in the Sahel and Central Africa "poses a great threat to the international community. If we don't fight it, it will create instability and failed states across the region. What happened in Mali can happen in other countries." Amrani said "African nations must take the lead," pointing to the current two-track approach of dialogue and military pressure.

Mr. Amrani said that economic development and job creation are crucial parts of a multi-prong strategy to "build peace and prosperity and curb the rise of violent extremism in the region." So too are political freedoms and democratic reforms. But he added, "democracy is a culture and expression of political will. Countries without a history of civil society need transition time to build it, which can be complicated, long, and difficult."

Amrani said that Morocco, which began its reforms more than a decade ago under the leadership of King Mohammed VI, can play an important role as a regional leader with its strong civil society, tradition of tolerance and consensus-building, and respect for individual rights.

For more on Morocco and the region, visit <http://www.moroccoonthemove.com/>.

Also follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

###

The Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP) is a non-profit organization whose principal mission is to inform opinion makers, government officials, and interested publics in the United States about political and social developments in Morocco and the role being played by the Kingdom of Morocco in broader strategic developments in North Africa, the Mediterranean, and the Middle East. For more, please visit www.moroccoonthemove.com

This material is distributed by the Moroccan American Center for Policy on behalf of the Government of Morocco. Additional information is available at the Department of Justice in Washington, DC.

<http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn>

The Washington Post

Monday, December 03, 2012

Right Turn

By Jennifer Rubin

Maybe Morocco can help

By Jennifer Rubin

The United States is short on allies and effective means of influencing events in the Middle East. Syria is still a bloodbath. Libya is threatened by jihadists. Egypt has taken a turn toward dictatorship. Mali is a non-functioning state in which jihadist separatists control much of the country. The "peace process" (for good reason) is going nowhere.

To break up the monotony of bad news, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is no doubt delighted to be hosting Morocco's Deputy Foreign Minister Youssef Amrani who is in Washington D.C to prepare for Clinton's upcoming trip to Morocco. Morocco will be chairing the United Nations Security Council in December when all of these issues are likely to be swirling and will be hosting a critical international gathering on Syria.

I spoke with Amrani by phone this morning. If the United States is happy to have pro-American friends in the region, Morocco is obviously delighted to have an elevated relationship, dubbed a "strategic partnership" that launched this fall. Amrani told me: "We have a longstanding relationship. Today we want to upgrade relations and deepen our dialogue. Tomorrow we will have a business conference called by Secretary Clinton." As part of this and future discussion, Amrani told me, "We would like to include new players -- civil society [leaders], business leaders. We want a unique relationship . . . a mode of cooperation, consultation and understanding. We think we can be a model."

Certainly the region could use a model of gradual evolution toward gender equality, rule of law, human rights and democracy, which in Morocco has been accelerated under King Mohammed VI. And the Obama administration could use some advice and assistance on a range of issues including Syria, Libya and Egypt.

Clinton will visit with the king on December 11 in a meeting expected to touch on Syria, the Palestinians and Mali where jihadists now control the northern part of the country ("It is a situation that is deteriorating," Amrani said.) Morocco supports a "double track" approach in Mali that includes both political negotiations and "military pressure" on the terror groups. On this one, Amrani said, "Africans will take the lead."

When I ask him about fears that Libya may be headed in the same direction -- a weak central government overrun by jihadists. He took the long view. "Transitions in the region -- in Tunisia, Libya, Egypt -- will be long, complicated and will take time." In Libya as in other countries, Amrani cautioned, there are "no institutions, no civil societies, no political parties." In perhaps the most memorable comment in our conversation he said simply, "Democracy is culture."

That sentiment indisputable. Critics of the Obama administration point to the lack of staying power, the failure to work over the long haul on civil society building and inconsistency in opposing autocracy that hinder U.S. influence in the region. Morocco in the past has been hesitant to step forward as a model for the region but with its newly intensified relationship with the United States and the deteriorating situation throughout the region, Morocco is becoming less reticent. Amrani explained, "We can share our modest experience. We need to have success stories . . . otherwise extremists will take the lead."

On December 12, Clinton will attend the Friends of Syria meeting hosted by Morocco. Approximately 100 international delegations are expected to attend along with representatives of the Syrian opposition. Amrani deflected a question about whether there is room for optimism that Bashar al-Assad will soon be gone. He insisted, "The future of Syria should be democracy or there is no future. . . . There is no other choice." He didn't offer a view on whether the Syrian opposition has what it needs to prevail, but said, "We have to support the opposition politically and financially. Through the [United Nations] Security Council and other organizations, we need to put pressure on the regime." He added, "We should not forget the human dimension." In addition to some 38,000 dead Syrians, Turkey and other countries now feel pressure from refugees fleeing the violence.

Throughout the interview Amrani reiterated that the United States and Morocco would discuss the peace process and should try to get the parties "back on track." From the view of many in the United States this seems Pollyannish, especially in light of the Palestinian Authority's decision to bypass bilateral negotiations and go to the United Nations General Assembly for recognition. Amrani showed his diplomatic skill: "We know that in some countries and the [United] States, some were opposed [to the unilateral declaration]. But we feel a vote could be an opportunity to bring the parties back together." He affirmed that the goal should be "two independent states, living side by side with secure frontiers." While many in the United States see this as a fruitless exercise, Morocco remains convinced that "it is important to give a positive signal," as Amrani described it.

It is with a measure of frustration that Amrani expressed the plight of moderate Arab countries. "We are fed up with conflict, with crisis. We need peace. Peace can be achieved through political will."

It is, of course, the $64,000 question whether there is the will for peace in the Palestinian Authority, which has repeatedly walked away from the bargaining table and has abrogated the Oslo Accords in going to the United Nations. That said, even the appearance of progress is better than nothing, one supposes.

Meanwhile, if nothing else, the trip to Morocco should impress upon Clinton that the "Arab Spring" is not a one season episode, but a multi-year and probably multi-decade process in which the United States will have to find ways to maximize its leverage, promote reform, aid in the development of civil institutions and find new allies that can fill the breach while others (such as Egypt) may be in turmoil. For a president that too often has seemed annoyed with national security intrusions into his domestic agenda and has sought to minimize the U.S. role on the world stage, this is an inconvenient reality. Nevertheless, President Obama, Clinton and Clinton's successor would do well to develop an actual policy for the Middle East that consists of more than simply lurching from one crisis to another. If that realization is driven home on the Morocco trip, then it will be a worthwhile visit for both countries.

<http://www.acus.org/event/discussion-moroccan-minister-delegate-foreign-affairs-and-cooperation>

Monday, December 03, 2012

Discussion with Moroccan Minister-Delegate for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation

The Michael S. Ansari Africa Center hosted a discussion today with H.E. Youssef Amrani, minister-delegate for foreign affairs and cooperation of the Kingdom of Morocco. The minister-delegate is in Washington in advance of Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton’s travel to Morocco next week for the “Friends of Syria” meeting in Marrakesh as well as strategic discussions with His Majesty King Mohammed VI on the various current crises in North Africa, West Africa, and the Middle East.

Ambassador Amrani spoke about the recently-launched US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue as well as on regional issues, including the precarious security situation in the Sahel following the takeover of northern Mali by extremist groups linked to Al-Qaeda and the need for greater economic integration in the Maghreb.

Council President Fred Kempe welcomed participants to and chaired the event, while Ansari Center Director J. Peter Pham moderated the discussion, which included US government officials, representatives of nongovernmental organizations, leading academic and think tank Africa experts, and members of the business community.

ATLANTIC COUNCIL

IDEAS. INFLUENCE. IMPACT.

MICHAEL S. ANSARI AFRICA CENTER

Discussion with H.E. Youssef Amrani, Minister-Delegate for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation of the Kingdom of Morocco

December 3, 2012 • 4:00 p.m. – 5:15 p.m.

Atlantic Council • Washington, DC

H.E. Youssef Amrani

Minister-Delegate for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation Kingdom of Morocco

Rudolph Atallah

*Senior Fellow, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center
Atlantic Council*

Mamadou Beye

Manager, International Government Affairs Chevron Corporation

H.E. Rachad Bouhial

Ambassador of the Kingdom of Morocco to the US Embassy of the Kingdom of Morocco

Bronwyn Bruton

*Deputy Director, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center
Atlantic Council*

Gretchen Birkle

Deputy Director, Middle East and North Africa International Republican Institute

Caitlin Dearing

*Senior Vice President of Research, Projects, and Programs
Moroccan American Center*

Michele Dunne

*Director, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East
Atlantic Council*

Melvin Foote

*President and CEO
Constituency for Africa*

Edward Gabriel

Former US Ambassador to Morocco

Audra Grant

*Political Scientist
Rand Corporation*

Hanane Zelouani Idrissi

Assistant Program Officer, Middle East & North Africa Program National Endowment for Democracy

Frederick Kempe^

*President and CEO
Atlantic Council*

Mohsin Khan

*Senior Fellow, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East
Atlantic Council*

Karim Mansouri

Ministry of Foreign Affairs Kingdom of Morocco

Sean McFate

*Vice President, TD International, LLC
Adjunct Professor, Adjunct Researcher,
National Defense University*

Anne Moisan

*Professor, Near East-South Asia Center for Strategic Studies
National Defense University*

Alexei Monsarrat

*Director, Global Business and Economics Program
Atlantic Council*

Garth Neuffer

*Director of Media
Moroccan American Center*

Jordan Paul

*Executive Director
Moroccan American Center*

J. Peter Pham

*Director, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center
Atlantic Council*

Morgan Roach

*Research Associate, Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom
The Heritage Foundation*

Lawrence Velte

*Professor, Near East-South Asia Center for Strategic Studies
National Defense University*

William E. Ward

Former Commander US Africa Command

Mary Carlin Yates

*Former Special Assistant to the President and Senior Director for Africa
The White House*

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2012/12/02/united-states-to-host-us-moroccan-business-development-conference/>

Morocco on the Move

Sunday, December 2, 2012

United States to Host US-Moroccan Business Development Conference

US State Department, Notice to the Press (Washington, DC, Dec. 2, 2012) — On December 4, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic and Business Affairs Jose W. Fernandez and Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs Beth Jones, in cooperation with the Bureau of Energy Resources, will convene a business development conference in Washington D.C. that will bring together representatives from both U.S. and Moroccan business communities.

The Moroccan delegation will be led by Minister of Industry, Trade and New Technologies Abdelkader Aamara, Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries Aziz Akhannouch, and Minister Delegate for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation Youssef Amrani.

Deputy Secretary of State Thomas R. Nides will provide opening remarks. The conference will take place at the U.S. Department of State in Washington, D.C. Attendees will discuss ways to increase bilateral trade and enhance business development in sectors such as aerospace, agriculture, automotive, and renewable energy and infrastructure.

The U.S.-Morocco Free Trade Agreement, implemented in 2006, is one of the United States' most comprehensive free trade agreements; it eliminated tariffs on 95 percent of traded goods. The FTA has bolstered trade and investment between our two countries, resulting in two-way trade valued at $3.79 billion in 2011.

Currently, there are more than 120 American businesses operating in Morocco, which have invested $2.2 billion and have created more than 100,000 direct and indirect jobs. However, in order to achieve the FTA's full potential, the United States is providing $1.5 million in assistance designed to attract foreign investors to Morocco, to foster local economic development, and strengthen the legal and regulatory framework.

Secretary of State Clinton has set a goal of increasing trade from Morocco to the United States, and the Morocco Business Development Conference aims to do just that by raising awareness among U.S. businesses of opportunities to trade with, and invest in Morocco.

The Opening Plenary of the U.S.-Morocco Business Development Conference will take place on Tuesday, December 4, in the Department of State's Loy Henderson Auditorium from 9:00 a.m. to 9:45 a.m. This session is open to credentialed members of the media.

Pre-set time for cameras: 8:10 a.m. from the 23rd Street entrance

Final access time for journalists and still photographers: 8:45 a.m. from the 23rd Street entrance.

Media representatives may attend this event upon presentation of one of the following: (1) A U.S. Government-issued identification card (Department of State, White House, Congress, Department of Defense, or Foreign Press Center), (2) a media-issued photo identification card, or (3) a letter from their employer on letterhead verifying their employment as a journalist, accompanied by an official photo identification card (driver's license, passport).

For more information, please see the Bilateral Fact Sheet at: <http://www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/bgn/5431.htm>

PRESS CONTACT: Kerry Humphrey: 202-647-0677 | EPPDMedia@state.gov

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/press-releases/press-release-king-mohammed-vi-sec-clinton/>

CONTACT: Garth Neuffer
202.470.2055
gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE:
2012

Thursday, November 29,

King Mohammed VI, Sec. Clinton to Meet in Morocco on Mali, Syria Crises, Strategic Partnership

Morocco Deputy Foreign Minister Amrani in Washington week of Dec. 3 for preparations

Washington, DC (Nov. 29) — Morocco’s Deputy Foreign Minister Youssef Amrani will be in Washington, DC on December 3 to prepare for Secretary of State Hillary Clinton’s upcoming strategic discussions in Morocco with His Majesty King Mohammed VI. Secretary Clinton and King Mohammed VI will meet on December 11 in Morocco to discuss specific steps Morocco and the US can take within their strategic partnership to overcome security challenges in Mali and Syria, address the Middle East peace process and regional humanitarian concerns, and deepen the US-Morocco bilateral relationship.

Morocco has become an increasingly important strategic partner for the US since King Mohammed VI began, more than a decade ago, to advance democratic reforms in a progressive manner, successfully avoiding the chaos and uncertainties that have troubled much of the region over the past two years.

In addition, as a non-permanent member of the UN Security Council and a bilateral partner in the new Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue, Morocco and King Mohammed VI have recently played an increasingly important role on the international stage, helping the US and its allies to address the pressing crisis in Syria and now Mali.

On December 12, Secretary Clinton will join the fourth “Friends of Syria” meeting, which Morocco is hosting in Marrakech. More than 100 delegations are expected to attend. The goal is to reach agreement on a common strategy for ensuring a political transition, mobilizing aid for refugees caught in the humanitarian crisis, and addressing regional security implications. Morocco has worked closely with the US to advance a common and progressive position among Arab nations on the crisis.

 To set up an interview with Mr. Youssef Amrani, Morocco’s Minister Delegate of Foreign Affairs, please contact: Garth Neuffer at 202.470.2055, gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com.

For more on Morocco and the region, visit <http://www.moroccoonthemove.com/>.

Also follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

###

The Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP) is a non-profit organization whose principal mission is to inform opinion makers, government officials, and interested publics in the United States about political and social developments in Morocco and the role being played by the Kingdom of Morocco in broader strategic developments in North Africa, the Mediterranean, and the Middle East. For more, please visit www.moroccoonthemove.com

This material is distributed by the Moroccan American Center for Policy on behalf of the Government of Morocco. Additional information is available at the Department of Justice in Washington, DC.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, December 14, 2012 5:41 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: News Alert: Susan Rice withdraws from consideration for secretary of state

FYI

From: The Washington Post [<mailto:newsletters@email.washingtonpost.com>]
Sent: Thursday, December 13, 2012 4:05 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: News Alert: Susan Rice withdraws from consideration for secretary of state

Thursday, December 13, 2012 4:04:05 PM

National News Alert

Susan Rice withdraws from consideration for secretary of state

U.N. Ambassador Susan Rice has withdrawn her name for consideration for secretary of state, the White House has announced.

"While I deeply regret the unfair and misleading attacks on Susan Rice in recent weeks, her decision demonstrates the strength of her character, and an admirable commitment to rise above the politics of the moment to put our national interests first," President Obama said in a statement.

Read more at:

<http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/post-politics/wp/2012/12/13/susan-rice-withdraws-name-from-consideration-for-secretary-of-state/>

Unsubscribe

©2012 The Washington Post

Help & Contact Info

Privacy Policy

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, December 14, 2012 11:45 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Washington Post: "Rice Pulls Out of Running" and other appointment rumors
Attachments: WPost - Rice Pulls Out of Running 14Dec2012.pdf

Please note in this article about Susan Rice resigning, there are references to John Kerry being the likely candidate now, as well as hints on other possible security positions. Ed http://www.washingtonpost.com/world/national-security/susan-rice-withdraws-as-candidate-for-secretary-of-state/2012/12/13/17ad344e-4567-11e2-8e70-e1993528222d_story.html

The Washington Post

Friday, December 14, 2012

A1

Rice Pulls Out of Running

Kerry in line to be Secretary

Charges over Libya proved too distracting

By Karen DeYoung and Anne Gearan

U.N. Ambassador Susan E. Rice withdrew her name Thursday as President Obama's leading candidate for secretary of state, saying the administration could not afford a "lengthy, disruptive and costly" confirmation fight over statements she made about the extremist attack in Libya that killed four Americans.

Rice called Obama on Thursday morning, before sending him a letter officially withdrawing from consideration. Rice said in an interview that she had concluded early this week that what she and Obama considered "unfair and misleading" charges against her over the Sept. 11 attack in Benghazi, Libya, would impede the president's second-term agenda. "This was my decision," Rice said. When asked if Obama had tried to dissuade her, she said that he "understood that this was the right decision, and that I made it for the right reasons."

Her withdrawal leaves Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) with no apparent rivals to take over from Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton. A senior administration official said that "something strange would have to happen" for Kerry not to be the choice.

The official also said that former senator Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) has emerged as a "solid" candidate to run the Pentagon, although a final decision has not been made. For the CIA, the official said, Obama is deciding between Acting Director Michael J. Morell and deputy national security adviser John O. Brennan, who has yet to tell the president whether he would accept the job.

As Obama assembles his second-term national security team, formal announcements are due as early as next week. National security adviser Thomas E. Donilon will remain in his job, according to officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss internal White House deliberations.

Rice said in the interview that "after a long, grueling battle, in all likelihood, I would be confirmed." The assessment was shared by White House officials and by senior Democratic congressional aides who said they were confident that a majority of senators would have voted for her. "But I really came to believe this would not be weeks, but potentially months, and incredibly distracting and disruptive," Rice said. The first few months of any president's second term, she said, are "your high-water mark of influence."

"If my nomination meant that the odds of getting comprehensive immigration reform passed or any other major priority were substantially reduced, I couldn't live with myself," she said. Rice's withdrawal was a retreat by Obama, who had repeatedly voiced support for her. In a statement issued by the White House, Obama described her as "an extraordinarily capable, patriotic, and passionate public servant."

But her removal from the scene is unlikely to quell the controversy that led to it: the extremist attack on the U.S. diplomatic mission in Libya that killed U.S. Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens and three other Americans.

Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) have focused on what they called Rice's intentionally misleading description, in television interviews five days after the attack, of an anti-American demonstration that turned violent. The administration later revised that assessment, using what it said was updated intelligence information, to blame organized extremists.

Rice's withdrawal, Graham said in a statement, "will not end questions about what happened in Benghazi." Clinton is scheduled to appear before House and Senate committees next week to discuss an independent State Department review of possible security lapses that is nearing completion.

Rice and Obama made clear that she will continue at the United Nations. But administration officials said Obama left open a door when he spoke of her "limitless capability to serve our country now and in the years to come."

In the weeks before the Nov. 6 presidential election, as Republican criticism of Rice crystallized, the White House initially portrayed the fight over her as nakedly partisan. Congressional Republicans were unfairly attacking the ambassador simply because she represented the White House, administration spokesmen said. GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney also criticized the White House over the attack and suggested there had been a cover-up.

But the controversy over Rice's portrayal of the attack did not evaporate after Obama won, and some congressional Democrats became worried about the cost of a nomination battle that probably would make negotiations over taxes and spending more difficult. The White House insisted that Rice's television appearances had been closely coordinated with the intelligence community, and senior intelligence officials came forth with background statements supporting her.

Obama did not disguise his anger in defending Rice at a news conference after the election. "If Senator McCain and Senator Graham and others want to go after somebody, they should go after me," he said. "I'm happy to have that discussion with them. But for them to go after the U.N. ambassador who had nothing to do with Benghazi, and was simply making a presentation based on intelligence that she had received, and besmirch her reputation is outrageous."

But White House attempts to mollify critics and round up support by sending Rice to Capitol Hill for two days of meetings last month backfired when moderates such as Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) declined to endorse her.

Collins's criticism was a red flag for the administration. Along with new Republican charges this week that Rice had mishandled diplomatic tasks when she served as the Bill Clinton administration's chief diplomat on Africa, Rice and the White House began to believe that the cause was not worth the price.

The Africa charges, a senior Obama official said, "indicated that they were going to keep going — once they ran out of one issue, they would manufacture another." By last Sunday, Rice said in the interview, "I started very seriously thinking that the costs really outweighed the benefits. That no number of facts or rationality or reason was going to deter those who were determined to make this a political issue.” In its schedule, the White House said Obama will meet with Rice in the Oval Office on Friday.

Throughout the controversy, Kerry has said little about Rice. On Thursday, he called her “an extraordinarily capable and dedicated public servant.” “As someone who has weathered my share of political attacks and understands on a personal level just how difficult politics can be,” he said, “I’ve felt for her throughout these last difficult weeks, but I also know that she will continue to serve with great passion and distinction.”

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said Rice could have been confirmed by the Senate but for the actions of certain Republicans. “The politically motivated attacks on her character from some of my Republican colleagues were shameful,” he said in a statement Thursday.

Rice, 48, was an early Obama backer among Democratic national security experts who had worked in the Clinton White House, where she served on the National Security Council staff. During the 2008 campaign, Hillary Clinton’s team considered Rice’s support for Obama a defection.

After Obama won, he gave Rice the U.N. job, a plum among policy wonks but a post that is not well known nationally. There, she quickly became a White House insider with strong connections among Obama’s close circle of policy advisers. Rice has worked alongside Hillary Clinton without any public hint of discord, although the two were never close.

In a statement issued by the State Department, Clinton called Rice an “indispensable partner” and said they had worked together on difficult issues such as Iran, North Korea, Libya and South Sudan. “Susan has worked tirelessly to advance our nation’s interests and values,” Clinton said. “I am confident that she will continue to represent the United States with strength and skill.” Rice said she does not think the secretary of state battle will undermine her effectiveness at the United Nations. “They know, because they’ve seen it firsthand, that I have the full confidence of the president,” she said.

Scott Wilson and Ed O’Keefe contributed to this report

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

The Washington Post

Friday, December 14, 2012

A1

Rice Pulls Out of Running Kerry in line to be Secretary Charges over Libya proved too distracting

By Karen DeYoung and Anne Gearan

U.N. Ambassador Susan E. Rice withdrew her name Thursday as President Obama's leading candidate for secretary of state, saying the administration could not afford a "lengthy, disruptive and costly" confirmation fight over statements she made about the extremist attack in Libya that killed four Americans.

Rice called Obama on Thursday morning, before sending him a letter officially withdrawing from consideration. Rice said in an interview that she had concluded early this week that what she and Obama considered "unfair and misleading" charges against her over the Sept. 11 attack in Benghazi, Libya, would impede the president's second-term agenda. "This was my decision," Rice said. When asked if Obama had tried to dissuade her, she said that he "understood that this was the right decision, and that I made it for the right reasons."

Her withdrawal leaves Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) with no apparent rivals to take over from Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton. A senior administration official said that "something strange would have to happen" for Kerry not to be the choice.

The official also said that former senator Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) has emerged as a "solid" candidate to run the Pentagon, although a final decision has not been made. For the CIA, the official said, Obama is deciding between Acting Director Michael J. Morell and deputy national security adviser John O. Brennan, who has yet to tell the president whether he would accept the job.

As Obama assembles his second-term national security team, formal announcements are due as early as next week. National security adviser Thomas E. Donilon will remain in his job, according to officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss internal White House deliberations.

Rice said in the interview that "after a long, grueling battle, in all likelihood, I would be confirmed." The assessment was shared by White House officials and by senior Democratic congressional aides who said they were confident that a majority of senators would have voted for her. "But I really came to believe this would not be weeks, but potentially months, and incredibly distracting and disruptive," Rice said. The first few months of any president's second term, she said, are "your high-water mark of influence."

"If my nomination meant that the odds of getting comprehensive immigration reform passed or any other major priority were substantially reduced, I couldn't live with myself," she said. Rice's withdrawal was a retreat by Obama, who had repeatedly voiced support for her. In a statement issued by the White House, Obama described her as "an extraordinarily capable, patriotic, and passionate public servant."

But her removal from the scene is unlikely to quell the controversy that led to it: the extremist attack on the U.S. diplomatic mission in Libya that killed U.S. Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens and three other Americans.

Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) have focused on what they called Rice's intentionally misleading description, in television interviews five days after the attack, of an anti-American demonstration that turned violent. The administration later revised that assessment, using what it said was updated intelligence information, to blame organized extremists.

Rice's withdrawal [REDACTED] questions about what happened in Benghazi." Clinton is scheduled to appear before House and Senate committees next week to discuss an independent State Department review of possible security lapses that is nearing completion.

Rice and Obama made clear that she will continue at the United Nations. But administration officials said Obama left open a door when he spoke of her "limitless capability to serve our country now and in the years to come."

In the weeks before the Nov. 6 presidential election, as Republican criticism of Rice crystallized, the White House initially portrayed the fight over her as nakedly partisan. Congressional Republicans were unfairly attacking the ambassador simply because she represented the White House, administration spokesmen said. GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney also criticized the White House over the attack and suggested there had been a cover-up.

But the controversy over Rice's portrayal of the attack did not evaporate after Obama won, and some congressional Democrats became worried about the cost of a nomination battle that probably would make negotiations over taxes and spending more difficult. The White House insisted that Rice's television appearances had been closely coordinated with the intelligence community, and senior intelligence officials came forth with background statements supporting her.

Obama did not disguise his anger in defending Rice at a news conference after the election. "If Senator McCain and Senator Graham and others want to go after somebody, they should go after me," he said. "I'm happy to have that discussion with them. But for them to go after the U.N. ambassador who had nothing to do with Benghazi, and was simply making a presentation based on intelligence that she had received, and besmirch her reputation is outrageous."

But White House attempts to mollify critics and round up support by sending Rice to Capitol Hill for two days of meetings last month backfired when moderates such as Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) declined to endorse her.

Collins's criticism was a red flag for the administration. Along with new Republican charges this week that Rice had mishandled diplomatic tasks when she served as the Bill Clinton administration's chief diplomat on Africa, Rice and the White House began to believe that the cause was not worth the price.

The Africa charges, a senior Obama official said, "indicated that they were going to keep going — once they ran out of one issue, they would manufacture another." By last Sunday, Rice said in the interview, "I started very seriously thinking that the costs really outweighed the benefits. That no number of facts or rationality or reason was going to deter those who were determined to make this a political issue." In its schedule, the White House said Obama will meet with Rice in the Oval Office on Friday.

Throughout the controversy, Kerry has said little about Rice. On Thursday, he called her "an extraordinarily capable and dedicated public servant." "As someone who has weathered my share of political attacks and understands on a personal level just how difficult politics can be," he said, "I've felt for her throughout these last difficult weeks, but I also know that she will continue to serve with great passion and distinction."

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said Rice could have been confirmed by the Senate but for the actions of certain Republicans. "The politically motivated attacks on her character from some of my Republican colleagues were shameful," he said in a statement Thursday.

Rice, 48, was an early Obama backer among Democratic national security experts who had worked in the Clinton White House, where she served on the National Security Council staff. During the 2008 campaign, Hillary Clinton's team considered Rice's support for Obama a defection.

After Obama won, he gave Rice the U.N. job, a plum among policy wonks but a post that is not well known nationally. There, she quickly became a White House insider with strong connections among Obama's close circle of policy advisers. Rice has worked alongside Hillary Clinton without any public hint of discord, although the two were never close.

In a statement issued by the State Department, Clinton called Rice an "indispensable partner" and said they had worked together on difficult issues such as Iran, North Korea, Libya and South Sudan. "Susan has worked tirelessly to advance our nation's interests and values," Clinton said. "I am confident that she will continue to represent the United States with strength and skill." Rice said she does not think the secretary of state battle will undermine her effectiveness at the United Nations. "They know, because they've seen it firsthand, that I have the full confidence of the president," she said.

Scott Wilson and Ed O'Keefe contributed to this report.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, December 15, 2012 5:13 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Twitter Monitoring December Week 2

Subject: Twitter Monitoring December Week 2

Title/Date	Summary
Benkirane Sacrifices the well-being of Moroccans to balance the state's budget Dec. 9, 2012	This article criticizes Benkirane's intention to end government subsidies on fuel and basic goods.
Moroccans Fear That Flickers of Democracy Are Fading Dec. 10, 2012	"More and more Moroccans are questioning [Benkirane's] ability to [strengthen the middle class] and are wondering whether Morocco's version of the Arab Spring brought anything more than cosmetic changes to this impoverished country, which has been one of America's most stable and staunch allies in a region marked by turmoil."
Religion et Déclaration universelle des droits de l'Homme Religion and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights Dec. 10, 2012	In an article published by the newspaper "Akhbar Al Yaoum" Abdelilah Hami Eddine, a member of PJD, defends the central thesis that "secularism" is not "a prerequisite to building democracy." Translated from French
Mali : Le Maroc ne sait pas ce qu'il veut Mali: Morocco doesn't know what it wants Dec. 11, 2012	Morocco is incapable, despite its temporary presidency of the UNSC, of taking a clear position on Mali. Supporter of an African military intervention without being a member of the African Union, Morocco is not involved in the crucial discussions about Mali. Translated from French
Saisie de plus de 700 kg de drogue sur la route entre Meknès et El Hajeb	According to Meknes Customs officials, 701 kg of drugs were seized in two cars near Loudaya on the National Road No. 13. The drugs consisted of 547 kg of cannabis resin, 153 kg tobacco leaves and 1.1 kg of chira. The cars used were a Ford Mondeo and a Partner, and both drivers fled the scene. The market value of the drugs seized is estimated to be 711,000 dhs. Translated from French

Seizure of over 700kg of drugs on the road between Meknes and El Hajeb Dec. 11, 2012
«L'Algérie veut voir les frères maliens régler leurs problèmes» “Algeria wants to see its Malian brothers fix their problems” Dec. 11, 2012	Algeria’s vision for Mali’s future relies on the preservation of the territorial integrity, preservation of national unity, promoting a peaceful solution, and fighting against terrorism and transnational organized crime. Algeria believes that the Malian army must be strengthened and consolidated to play its necessary role in safeguarding these principles. Finally, Algeria has provided a significant amount of logistic support as well as securing institutions and facilities in Bamako and donating $10 million. Translated from French
Two former presidents of the Meknes Chamber of Commerce under arrest Dec. 11, 2012	Two former presidents and an official of the Chamber of Commerce, Industry and Services of Meknes have been accused of embezzlement. Translated from French
O Maghreb: Where Art Thou in US Foreign Policy? Dec. 11, 2012	“Given the current political climate, US foreign policy needs to address the political challenges facing the Maghreb region, in the context of a vibrant “freedom agenda” that would promote meaningful reforms. The new U.S. administration needs to further press for good governance, rule of law and accountability in order to increase the scope of individual and group liberties. The relevance of the region to US foreign policy is intrinsically linked to a successful resolution of the Western Sahara conflict, which continues to stand as an albatross for regional cooperation. “
Benkirane: La lutte contre la corruption est prioritaire Benkirane: The fight against corruption is a priority Dec. 11, 2012	Corruption has been a long standing issue, particularly within audit institutions. PM Benkirane says great steps have been taken since the implementation of the new Constitution. Translated from French
Kuwait, Morocco discuss further industrial cooperation Dec. 11, 2012	The Kuwait Industries Union (KIU) discussed ways of boosting economic cooperation between the two countries, especially industrial opportunities available in Morocco. Banani, Moroccan Ambassador to Kuwait, added that Morocco is keen to provide several advantages for investment, including tax exemptions and flexible laws. He emphasized Morocco's stability within the region, a major attraction for foreign investment.

Les intérêts économiques de la France au Maroc empêchent l'aboutissement du dossier sahraoui France's economic interests prevent a result on the Western Sahara issue. Dec. 12, 2012	"The economic and material interests of France impede reaching an agreement on the question of Western Sahara, and [it leaves] the Saharawi people unable to access their independence," said the delegate from the Greater Chantereine-Marne Area council (Seine-et-Marne). According to Mr. Kabeya Nkashama, political commentator, the industrialized countries and France "want to safeguard their own interests in Morocco trampling human values of freedom, emancipation and the right of peoples to self-determination." He stressed, in this regard, "the hypocrisy" of France consisting of "preaching freedom and human rights", while in the case of Western Sahara, it "does not apply [those values] on the ground" . Translated from French
NPR: Many Cups Of Tea: The Business Of Sipping In Western Sahara Dec. 13, 2012	In an article about the custom of sipping tea while conducting business, NPR referred to Western Sahara as Moroccan territory. They had posted the following retraction when DK revisited the piece on Dec. 14. "An earlier version of this blog post identified Western Sahara as a territory of Morocco. In fact, the territory has been under dispute since 1976. The United Nations designates Western Sahara as a non-self-governing territory."
Morocco slams Javier Bardem's "biased picture" about situation in Sahara Dec. 13, 2012	Moroccan Communications Minister and Spokesman for the Government, Mustapha El Khalfi, slammed the "biased picture" presented in an article by Javier Bardem on the Sahara.
Morocco king must not be implicated in political rivalry: PM Dec. 13, 2012	Moroccan Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane said Thursday the kingdom would not tolerate the media implicating the king in political party rivalry, in reference to the withdrawal of an AFP journalist's accreditation. The government decided to suspend Omar Brouksy's press accreditation on October 4, in response to a story he wrote that referred to the participation in a Tangiers by-election of candidates "close to the royal palace."
Francia es parte del problema y debe ser parte de la solución (responsable sahraoui) France is part of the problem and should be part of the solution (Saharawi rep)	In an interview with the Spanish journal Sahara Libre, member of the National Secretariat of the Polisario Front and coordinator with MINURSO Mhamed Jadad said France prevents the U.N. Security Council from exercising MINURSO's mandate for the supervision and protection of human rights. Translated from Spanish

Dec. 13, 2012
Maroc : Le PJD veut mettre fin au Mariage des -16 ans Morocco: The PJD wants to end marriage of people under 16 Dec. 13, 2012	The PJD is preparing a constitutional amendment (in articles 20 and 21 of the family code) to ban marriage under age 16, which is still possible in Morocco with permission from a judge. Translated from French
Huge crowds gather for funeral of Morocco Islamist leader Dec. 14, 2012	Tens of thousands of devotees gathered on Friday at the historic Sunna mosque in central Rabat for the funeral of Abdessalam Yassine, founder of a radical Moroccan Islamist movement. The funeral of Sheikh Yassine, an outspoken critic of the monarchy who died on Thursday aged 84, was to take place after weekly prayers, with his body to be buried in Martyrs Cemetery next to the Kasbah in the capital.
Beating bribery: International Anticorruption Day in Morocco Dec. 14, 2012	Drummers and dancers filled the streets of Casablanca as part of International Anticorruption Day festivities organized by Transparency International's chapter Transparency Maroc. [Transparency Maroc's] open letter [to PM Benkirane] suggested recommendations for a revised national anticorruption strategy including concrete measures that guarantee no impunity for corrupt officials. Our chapter also called upon the government to encourage civil society and the private sector to speak up about corruption and protect whistleblowers.
Chambre des représentants, le conseil constitutionnel annule l'élection de 12 membres House of representatives, the constitutional council cancels the election of 12 members Dec. 14, 2012	The Constitutional council has nullified some election results due to use of religious imagery in campaign materials, in addition to what it refers to as "fraudulent maneuvers". Translated from French
Maroc : La pauvreté est la véritable cause de la déforestation Morocco: Poverty is a real cause of deforestation Dec. 14, 2012	Some in Morocco are so poor that they are cutting down trees to burn in their homes for warmth, particularly in the Atlas mountains. Translated from French

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, December 15, 2012 5:16 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring December Week 2

Blog Name	Update Title/Date	Summary	Comments	Response?
PR.com	Electronic Journalism: New Anglophone Newspaper Launched in Morocco Dec. 8, 2012	A group of Moroccan Anglophone journalists have recently launched a new news website that will be dedicated to writing about and covering mainly political, economic, social and sports events. It was launched to fill the gap left by the closure of Morocco Times (which was the only Morocco-based online newspaper) and to compensate for the lack of professional Moroccan-English newspapers either online or printed.	0
All Africa	Morocco: French Associations Denounce Illegal Presence of Company Total in Western Sahara Dec. 8, 2012	Several associations, trade unions and French political parties denounced the contract signed by the company Total and Morocco for oil exploration in the occupied territories of Western Sahara. Total in 2001 signed a similar agreement that prompted the UN Security Council to conclude that "any development or exploration of natural resources of Western Sahara violates international law if does not take into account the Saharawi people and their legitimate representative, the Polisario Front".	0
All Africa	Morocco: WSRW Asks Total to Reconsider Its Licence in Occupied Western Sahara Dec. 9, 2012	Western Sahara Resource Watch appealed Saturday to the French corporation TOTAL to reconsider signing a contract with Morocco involving oil exploration activities in the occupied Saharawi territories.	0
All Africa	Morocco: New U.S.-Morocco	The United States and the Kingdom of Morocco have signed new agreements that	0

	Agreements Seen as Boost to Trade Relations Dec. 11, 2012	will stimulate significant additional commercial activity between the two countries and within the broader Middle East-North Africa region. The agreements were reached December 5 in Washington at the third joint committee meeting under the U.S.-Morocco Free Trade Agreement (FTA), which entered into force on January 1, 2006.
All Africa	Tunisia: Nation. Morocco Receive EU Funding Dec. 11, 2012	The EU has approved funding for development programs in Tunisia and Morocco. Morocco will receive 2.8 million euros for the promotion of human rights. The funds will support the work of the National Council for Human Rights and the Inter-ministerial Delegation for Human Rights.	0
Blogma Aggregator	Le textile tunisien fait mieux que le textile marocain! Tunisian textiles better made than Moroccan textiles Dec. 10, 2012	According to an article from the Moroccan site Lavieeco, the textiles sector has developed faster in Tunisia than in Morocco, particularly in terms of exports to the EU and other foreign markets. Translated from French	0
The Voice of Russia	Clinton Delays Visit to Morocco due to stomach virus Dec. 10, 2012	Hillary Clinton has been forced to delay her trip to Morocco due to a stomach virus, according to a State Department spokesperson.	0
Yahoo News	Morocco opposition says monarchy still calls the shots Dec. 10, 2012	"A recent tour of Gulf Arab states that was led by the king exposed where real power lies," said Fathallah Aarsalane, a senior member of al-Adl Wal Ihsane (Justice and Spirituality), a sect-like organization steeped in Morocco's Sufi Islamic tradition that opposes the Alawite	1

		family's rule. "People are now convinced the steps taken in Morocco are more or less superficial, which is exactly how the regime responded to pressure in the past," Arsalane told Reuters. "It's become clear that it is the monarchy in control."
Daily Markets	Lear Corporation Announces Agreement To Construct Automotive Wiring Facility In Morocco Dec. 10, 2012	Lear Corporation announced its new automotive wiring plant is scheduled to open in 2013 in Morocco's Amer Saffia area and create approximately 700 jobs, expected to increase significantly over upcoming years based on the projected growth in Lear's Electrical Power Management Systems business.	0
Platts	New Frontiers: the buzz about oil in Morocco Dec. 10, 2012	This article provides an in depth look at which oil companies are operating in Morocco and where.	0
Business Day Live	Hacker defends Morocco from SA villainy Dec. 10, 2012	Three South African government websites were hacked last weekend by a lone activist who was apparently angered at South Africa's support for the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic in Western Sahara.	1
OMCT.org	Morocco: OMCT begins mission to Morocco to assess anti-torture progress Dec. 10, 2012	Today a delegation of experts of the World Organization Against Torture (OMCT) is beginning its mission to Morocco. The objective of the mission is to assess the level of implementation of the UN Committee Against Torture's conclusion and recommendation issued one year ago.	0
Magharebia	Moroccans protest gender violence Dec. 9, 2012	Hundreds of people formed a human chain in Rabat on Saturday Dec. 8 to denounce all forms of violence against women, AFP reported. "We are here to denounce physical, verbal and moral	0

		violence, as well as the harassment of women," a demonstrator said. The protest was organized by "Spring of Dignity", a coalition of 22 groups focused on the defense of women's rights. "Morocco's laws should be adapted to the international conventions that Morocco has ratified, particularly those dealing with the rights of women," one organizer said.
Magharebia	Morocco chairs UN talks on Mali Dec. 10, 2012	Morocco will chair a UN Security Council meeting on the crisis in Mali and the Sahel region, MAP reported. Moroccan Foreign Minister Saadeddine El Othmani will head the talks, which will also be attended by UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, UN Sahel envoy Romano Prodi and UN High Commissioner for Refugees Antonio Guterres.	0
Magharebia	'Friends of Syria' set for Marrakech Dec. 10, 2012	The "Friends of Syria" group will meet in Morocco on Wednesday, AFP reports. Arab and Western states will consider two key issues concerning the 21-month Syria conflict: the political transition in the event of President Bashar al-Assad's exit, and the mobilization of humanitarian aid as winter sets in. More than 100 delegations are expected to attend the Marrakech event. Wednesday's meeting will reportedly address ways of supporting the National Coalition.	0
Magharebia	French PM to visit Morocco Dec. 10, 2012	French Prime Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault will arrive in Morocco on Wednesday, Maghreb Emergent reports. During his 2-day visit, Ayrault is expected to sign several cooperation agreements with his Moroccan counterpart Abdelilah Benkirane. The French PM will also attend a meeting of Moroccan and French businessmen and co-chair the launch of the Casablanca tram.	0

Magharebia	'5+5 Defence' meeting opens in Rabat Dec. 10, 2012	The 8th meeting of the "5+5 Defence" initiative opens on Monday (Dec 10) in Rabat, APS reports. Algeria, Libya, Morocco, Mauritania and Tunisia, along with European partners Spain, France, Italy, Malta and Portugal, will sign a joint declaration on defense and security cooperation. Founded in 2004, the "5+5" initiative includes regular dialogue and military drills by the armed forces of member states.	0
Magharebia	Morocco, Algeria bloggers want open border Dec. 10, 2012	Moroccan and Algerian bloggers are calling for their shared border to be reopened. They argue that the two nations have been linked for centuries by blood, marriage, proximity, mutual interests, literature and music. The border has been closed for nearly 18 years.	0
Magharebia	Morocco jails customs officers Dec. 12, 2012	More than 40 customs officials and police are facing prosecution for fraud and "harassment". Of the forty, seven former officers were sentenced to one year in prison on Tuesday December 11th by a Tetouan court.	0
Magharebia	Morocco leads Sahel security drive Dec. 13, 2012	Morocco is using its United Nations Security Council presidency to rally international attention to the Mali conflict, terrorism, transnational crime and other threats to Sahel security.	0
Kuwait News Agency	US goal is offer additional support at Morocco meeting of Friends of Syria Dec. 11, 2012	Secretary Clinton "will want to hear from [the Syrian Opposition Council], both in her own meeting and in the broader meeting, about how they see things going forward, both in terms of their own internal organization, about their connectivity with Syrians inside Syria, about their transitional planning, about the needs that they see for external support, how they would have us best direct the nonlethal support and humanitarian support that we are providing," State Sept. spokesperson	0

		Victoria Nuland said.
Bloomberg	Syrian Rebels Seek More Global Support at Morocco Meeting Dec. 11, 2012	The Syrian Opposition Coalition has been steadily gaining support, and they will make their case to more than 100 delegations on Dec. 13 in Marrakesh.	1
Voice Of America	Nations Supporting Syrian Opposition to Meet in Morocco Dec.11, 2012	There is mounting concern that Islamic extremists are becoming a significant force among armed opposition groups within Syria. Morocco's Deputy Foreign Minister Youssef Amrani told VOA's Press Conference that the longer the violence continues in Syria, the more Islamic extremists will benefit. Nations at the Friends of Syria meeting will discuss regional security implications of the conflict and efforts to mobilize aid for refugees caught in the humanitarian crisis.	0
The Star Online	Clinton cancels Morocco trip due to illness Dec. 11, 2012	US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has canceled a planned trip to Morocco due to a stomach virus, her office said Monday. Philippe Reines, a Clinton aide, said that Deputy Secretary of State William Burns would travel in her place to Marrakesh for a meeting of the Friends of the Syrian People. At the talks, the United States may recognize the new Syrian National Coalition as the sole representative of the Syrian people, as the group struggles to present itself as a legitimate alternative to President Bashar al-Assad's regime.	0
The Daily Nation	Morocco King Mohammed urges security council's Syria action Dec. 12, 2012	King Mohammed VI, has urged the United Nations Security Council to urgently adopt a unified resolution in support of transfer of power in Syria. The King emphasizes his country's support for the Syrian people's demands for freedom, democracy and dignity.	0

Al Jazeera	'Friends of Syria' recognise opposition Dec. 12, 2012	The world's major powers have given full political recognition to the Syrian National Coalition, an opposition bloc, as the fourth conference for the "Friends of the Syrian People" opens in Morocco. More than a hundred government delegates, including from the US, France, Britain and the Gulf countries, have gathered in the Moroccan city of Marrakesh to unveil measures to support the newly formed Syrian group.	0
Al Monitor	How Dangerous Are Morocco's Salafists? Dec. 12, 2012	In Tangier on Nov. 27, 2012, a "bearded" demonstration turned into an open confrontation between the police and one hundred Salfists. The Salafists demanded the release of one of their own who allegedly tried to kill a policeman and is thought to be one of 24 suspected terrorists specializing in sending jihadists to northern Mali.	0
Reuters	Morocco police arrest protester who impersonated king Dec. 13, 2012	A Moroccan anti-government protester who dressed up as King Mohammed has been arrested and accused of possessing drugs, the man's lawyer and human rights activists said on Thursday. Idris Boutarada, a member of the 'February 20' movement that led Arab Spring protests in Morocco last year, was detained by police after taking part in an anti-government protest near parliament in Rabat two days earlier.	0
Eurasia Review	France Favors A Strong Win-Win Partnership With Morocco – OpEd Dec. 14, 2012	This piece discusses the recent visit of high-level French ministers to Morocco and the strengthening of ties between the two countries.	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, December 20, 2012 1:41 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: November/December Event Report Bulletin
Attachments: SR_NovemberDecember2012EventsBulletin.docx

November/December 2012 Events Bulletin

November 15

Politics and Power in Maghreb: Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco from Independence to the Arab Spring - A conversation with Michael Willis

November 29

Prospects for Maghreb Economic Integration

December 5

Assessing Developments in Mali: Restoring Democracy and Reclaiming the North

Politics and Power in the Maghreb: Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco from Independence to the Arab Spring – A Conversation with Michael Willis

Date: 15 November 2012

1. Title: Politics and Power in the Maghreb: Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco from Independence to the Arab Spring – A Conversation with Michael Willis

Hosted by Project on Middle East Political Science at the Elliott School of International Affairs

Participants:

Michael Willis: University Research Lecturer and King Mohammed VI Fellow in Moroccan and Mediterranean Studies, University of Oxford

2. Overview

Professor Willis discussed his new book, Politics and Power in the Maghreb: Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco from Independence to the Arab Spring.

3. Summary

Professor Willis began by discussing why he wanted to write a book. He noted that the Maghreb is not a focal area for many scholars, not even for those you study the MENA region. It thus does not receive a lot of attention. This is also because the region does not have conflicts on the scale of the Mashreq countries, although Willis noted that the Maghreb certainly has conflicts of importance, most notably the conflict over the Western Sahara. Willis characterized the Western Sahara as one of the longest unresolved conflicts that, “no one outside of the corridors of the UN has ever heard of, let alone addressed its causes and effects.” Willis also noted that he wanted to write a book about the Maghreb as a region, because when the area has been covered, it has been at the individual country level, rather than at the region level. Given the absence of a book on the politics and history of the region, Willis set out to write a broad and comparative study of the region as a whole, thus integrating texts on individual countries.

Through his research (and prior to the Arab Spring), Professor Willis drew two primary conclusions about the region as a whole: it has had continuity in its political system and continuity in its forms of political power – although there are different faces, the structures have remained largely the same. With regard to the former, Morocco has maintained a monarchy, Tunisia has historically had an all-powerful President back by a political party, and Algeria has had a civilian president and a strong military, with the intelligence services serving as kingmaker. With regard to the second conclusion, in Morocco, the real wielders of power are not the elected officials and a shadow government operates to some extent, while the real decisions being taken by people outside of the government. In Algeria, unelected officials likewise hold the real power. In the 1990s, there was some political opening in Morocco and Algeria and the establishment of political processes that mimicked liberal democracy, but there was no real change. In Tunisia, the political structures remained the same from Bourguiba to Ben Ali.

The events of the Arab Spring, particularly in Tunisia, forced Willis to reevaluate his initial conclusions and question whether the countries of the Maghreb are really as similar and continuous as originally thought. Certainly, for Morocco and Algeria, whether or not these conclusions have changed after the Arab Spring is still unclear. Willis noted that Algeria and Morocco felt the impact of the Arab Spring, but the revolutions seemed to go east rather than west. In Algeria, several factors mitigated a revolution, including the previous history of revolt that reduced the appetite for radical political change, oil wealth that allowed the government to buy off protestors, and the pluralistic leadership structure, which meant that there was no single, dominant leader for the population to revolt against. In addition, Algerian protests tended to be at the local, socio-economic level. Such protests serve to relieve some pressure on the system. In Morocco, the creation of the February 20th movement was a clear reaction to the Arab Spring, but its momentum was halted to some degree by constitutional reform and early elections. Willis noted that Moroccan opinion is divided as to whether the palace sees this current situation as the end of the Arab Spring or that start of something else – perhaps a period of ongoing reform. He questioned whether the current strategy of governing with the PJD was the same as that during the period of alternance, when the Palace brought the socialists into government to neutralize them. In any event, Willis argued that Morocco has long claimed to be the most liberal in the region and that is now uncomfortable with the possibility of losing that claim to Tunisia. Whether or not that will inspire further reform is unclear, though Willis believes there has been a change in atmosphere – at least on the street. There is a new appetite for change and it appears that the population is not prepared to accept the failings of the state as before – this may be the biggest fallout of the Arab Spring in Morocco. Turning to Tunisia, Willis said that if it does succeed, it will stand apart from its autocratic neighbors and encourage change across the Maghreb.

In conclusion, Willis noted that the Arab Spring has certainly led to one important shift in the Maghreb, even if the continuity from independence to present has been interrupted by the change in Tunisia. Before, Algeria was revolutionary, Tunisia was reformist, and Morocco was conservative. Now, Tunisia is revolutionary Morocco is reformist, and Algeria is conservative.

4. Q & A

Q: Does the book address the Western Sahara?

A: It is not possible to understand Morocco’s foreign policy without understanding the Western Sahara. The issue is vital to the survival of the Moroccan regime and to some extent the Algerian region. As of yet, I can’t see a resolution between the Polisario, Algeria, and Morocco, unless there is some breakthrough in convincing them to reassess what they all perceive as their vital strategic interests.

Q: What is the role of external actors in the Maghreb?

A: France has failed in the region. The US and Britain are starting to get involved and they need to. The countries of the region will still have to deal with France, but because of France’s colonial history and its support of past dictators, its influence has waned. For example, more and more people are expressing themselves in Arabic, rather than French.

Q: Is there a future for the Arab Maghreb Union?

A: We are seeing a revival right now, particularly by Tunisia. There is certainly a compelling economic case for it, but the problem is the Western Sahara. Morocco lost interest in the AMU when it became clear it wasn’t going to resolve the Western Sahara. Now, most of the interest is coming from Libya and Tunisia. However, I am not optimistic because of the Algeria-Morocco divide.

Q: What is your assessment of the new Moroccan Constitution and whether it meets the aspirations of the Moroccan people for a better system?

A: What was voted on was not what was proposed in March, and what was implemented was not what was voted on. It has been watered down in the process. There are some importance advances, but it isn't enough. As they say in Morocco, chouia, chouia.

5. Observation

Approximately 30 people attended the book discussion, primarily students and those interested in Maghreb affairs. Professor Willis was an engaging speaker and offered some interesting insights on politics in the Maghreb. While much of what he said was not entirely new, his focus on and passion for the Maghreb is apparent and he is clearly an expert on the region. His promotion of the importance of the Maghreb region for US and UK strategic interests makes him a useful ally for MAC. Furthermore, his title at Oxford University would indicate that he collaborates closely with Morocco. Despite some of his skepticism about reforms in Morocco, he clearly loves the country and has spent much time there. If possible, it might be worth cultivating a relationship with him to see if he would be able to serve as a third party expert.

\(Back to top\)

Prospects for Maghreb Economic Integration

Date: 29 November 2012

1. Title: Prospects for Maghreb Economic Integration

Hosted by the Atlantic Council

Speakers:

Gary Hufbauer: Reginald Jones Senior Fellow, Peterson Institute for International Economics

Jonathan Walters: Director for Regional Strategy and Programs in the Middle East and North Africa Region, World Bank

John Entelis: Professor of Political Science and Director of the Middle East Studies Program, Fordham University

Mohsin Khan: Moderator: Senior Fellow, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, Atlantic Council

Roundtable Participants:

Abdulwahab AlKebisi: Center for International Private Enterprise

Ghazi Ben Ahmed: Club de Tunis

Caitlin Dearing: Moroccan American Center

Michele Dunne: Atlantic Council

Mohammed El Qorchi: International Monetary Fund

Clément Gillet: Institute for International Finance

Danya Greenfield: Atlantic Council

Eric Knecht: Atlantic Council

Haim Malka: Center for Strategic and International Studies

Amine Mati: International Monetary Fund

Stephen McInerney: Project on Middle East Democracy

Karim Mezran: Atlantic Council

Svetlana Milbert: Atlantic Council

Mustapha Rouis: World Bank

Amor Tahiri: International Monetary Fund

Mona Yacoubian: Stimson Center

I. William Zartman: School of Advanced International Studies

2. Overview

The aftermath of the Arab Spring has created a new political environment in the Middle East and North Africa. Not only have internal politics changed, but relations between the countries of the region have also changed. There likewise appears to have been a shift in thinking about economic integration in the region. In light of these developments, this discussion addressed whether in the aftermath of the Arab Spring it is time once again to examine economic integration in the Maghreb. A recent major study by the World Bank on trade and infrastructure in the Maghreb provided an entry point for discussion on the issue.

3. Summary

Mohsin Khan defined the parameters of the discussion, asking the speakers to provide their assessment on whether or not it is a good time to have another look at economic integration, both from an economic perspective and a political perspective. He noted that both elements are an essential point of view because despite convincing evidence of the economic benefits of such integration, political realities have stalled the process.

Gary Hufbauer provided an overview of the current economic status in the region and made the economic case for further integration. He noted that the primary economic goal of the Maghreb countries is sustained 6%+ GDP growth in order to employ young people and converge towards EU per capita income, but that all of the Maghreb countries have fallen far short of this goal. Morocco's projected growth rate for 2013 is 4.5%, Algeria's 2.5%, and Tunisia's 1.8%, and their per capita incomes are one-tenth of what they are in Europe. Hufbauer questioned why the Maghreb countries were doing so poorly despite trade agreements, macroeconomic stability, and reasonable inward foreign direct investment in trade.

According to Hufbauer, there are both internal and external reasons. Externally, trade agreements have failed to deliver additional trade and investment, both within the region and internationally. The Agadir and PAFTA agreements have had a weak effect in promoting regional trade, and the EU-Med and US-Morocco agreements haven't done much. Internally, the countries suffer from a multitude of problems. First, they have failed to fully implement important fiscal and economic reforms, despite some progress. As Hufbauer put it, "the Maghreb is not a poster region for the Washington consensus, but neither is it completely off track. Second, the countries suffer from low rankings in competitiveness, enabling trade, doing business, and corruption. Third, the education systems are oriented towards government service, not business. Despite similar spending as a percentage of GDP to the US and France, the education systems are just not delivering, as they focus on literature, law, and religion, rather than technical training, science, and business. In sum, Hufbauer stressed that the second and third reasons were the primary problems, noting that social infrastructure surrounding business and government, including monopolies, soft cartels, barriers to entry, and corruption costs, is a huge growth killer, as is an achronistic education system. Given this rather challenging economic environment, Maghreb economic integration makes sense, as it will allow economic diversification and improve changes for growth.

Jonathan Walters provided context about trade in the Maghreb and discussed the findings of two recent reports on the Maghreb – one from the World Bank on Trade Facilitation and Infrastructure in the Maghreb, the other a study the World Bank did for the Deauville partnership on trade and foreign direct investment in the region. In terms of context, Walters argued that the current economic drivers in the region are jobs, jobs, jobs, noting that the countries of the region will not be able to achieve the kind of growth required for jobs without integration. However, Walters views integration in a much broader context. In order to achieve sustainable growth, the countries must not only integrate regionally, but also with Europe. He noted that trade as a percentage of GDP within the Maghreb is only 2%, compared with 10% in West Africa and 15% in Central America. Trade costs within the Maghreb are also twice as expensive as trade between Maghreb countries in Europe, indicating that infrastructure and trade barriers are serious impediments to intra-Maghrebi trade.

Turning to the reports, Walters noted that the first study found that in the Maghreb, markets are fragmented, there are no economies of scale, trade costs are high, and the Arab Maghreb Union (AMU) is ineffective. Non-tariff barriers are likewise high due to border closures and arbitrary regulations. The region nevertheless has some assets – a common technical heritage, free trade agreements (although they are yet to be realized), and some tariff reductions. The study also found that if there was integration, complementarities would start to emerge. Walters noted that global supply chains start because of sub-regional supply chains and that if the Maghreb could integrate to start such chains at the sub-regional level, the economic potential would be huge. Economic reform and integration is thus essential to promote regional growth.

The second study addressed economic challenges in the Maghreb in light of the Arab Spring, concluding that an economic awakening to accompany the political awakening and economic integration to promote jobs were essential. It noted that there was some skepticism in the region about liberal economic policies because of the abuse of those policies in crony capitalist societies like Egypt and Tunisia under Mubarak and Ben Ali respectively. The challenge is for these countries is to thus overcome that skepticism and also bridge the gap between the political focus on the short-term and the economic focus on the long-term. The study also concluded that the European Union needs to be an external anchor for economic integration in the Maghreb by establishing a common vision for the region and confidence building measures between the Maghreb countries.

John Entelis addressed whether or not the political environment is better for economic integration in the aftermath of the Arab Spring. Regarding the political feasibility going forward, Entelis noted that the principle obstacle in the past has indeed been largely political, but even more so that it was individual; the AMU didn't work because it was composed of a diverse set of political leaders and systems, and conflicting personalities that never came close to agreeing on or meeting the goals of the organization. Now, political conditions have changed enormously, even in Morocco and Algeria. There has been a transformation in Libya and Tunisia, and Morocco and Algeria are responding to challenges. A new political consciousness about the need for accountability, democracy, and transparency is beginning to develop. As a result, Entelis argued that we should start to see a convergence of economic diversity and political changes. He stressed, however, that political changes would set the tone for economic changes.

Despite the change in the political environment in the Maghreb, Entelis was only mildly optimistic about the political prospects for Maghreb economic integration – even though politics is changing, serious political obstacles remain that will not, at least for the moment, be solved by new governments. For example, the border closure between Morocco and Algeria is a political decision that seems unlikely to change after the Arab Spring. The same applies to the decision taken by Algeria to have more flights to Paris than Morocco. Entelis stated that, “he can't explain it, just like he can't explain Algeria's refusal to change its stance on the Western Sahara.”

What, therefore, are the prospects for integration in the future? Entelis argued that complementarity of political systems is a requirement for sustained economic development and integration. This will require institutional changes, including elections, political party development, and institutional building, as well as renewed trust in political institutions. The region has experience as long period of social distrust of political institutions that cannot be overcome quickly. This shift toward political socialization, the willingness to trust leaders through accountability and to accept transfers of power will take time. The region is currently seeing the early signs of changes in political culture, as noted in the start of a renewed political consciousness. A true shift will also require the establishment of the rule of law in the business sense. In closing, Entelis argued that if the fundamental characteristics of politics change and the characteristics that flow out of that, including transparency, accountability, improved education, and improved civil society, then there may be better prospects for Maghreb economic integration.

4. Q & A/Discussion

C: (Ahmed) Maghreb economic integration is a core focus of the work of the Club de Tunis, which is a new think tank that aims to help policymakers and the private sector form economic development strategies. We believe that the government does not have to dictate private investment and that much can be done in spite of political obstacles between governments. Right now we are working to set up a North Africa private sector network. We can use external support for these initiatives – there is a critical role for the US in driving increased regional economic cooperation, but there will also have to be a push from above. We may not have complete integration, but bilateral trade is a start and there is bilateral trade happening between the Maghreb countries that is not being captured by statistics. Going forward, the private sector will have to convince governments that this is in their interest.

C: (Tahiri) The main answers to the questions raised by this forum are yes and yes – yes for economic reasons and yes for political reasons. Economic integration is not a choice, but a necessity for the Maghreb countries, and political changes, albeit ongoing, will push this reality forward. The main reason why economic integration has not progressed well is because of politics, primarily the absence of political will and the absence of a perceived benefit from increased integration for all countries. We have to change this mindset and convince people that this is not a zero-sum game. The private sector will play a key role in this, as they can help convince countries that they will benefit from this. However, international institutions also need to change their approach – no more studies need to be done to show the importance of integration. Rather, the IMF and the World Bank, among others need to be candid about the challenges and be willing to tackle political issues rather than just ignore them.

C: (Entelis) The new situation offers hope because Maghrebis want integration and if they are empowered, through democracy, they may push for it, particularly as political systems are increasingly responding to the demands of the people.

Q: (Zartman) Economic integration isn't just going to happen. Is the US ready to push for it?

Q: (Yacoubian) Is there not a chance for economic drivers to push this rather than waiting on political changes?

Q: (Malka) Do these bureaucracies have the capacity to implement the reforms require for integration?

C: (El Qorchi) Has the international community done enough to push the benefits of regional economic integration? It has to demonstrate that there is a benefit. The private sector tries this approach through Chambers of Commerce, etc., but it did not work. Civil society is trying, but there is an obstacle in centralized power. The push has to come from international institutions doing these studies. They have to be willing to take a political stance.

C: (Dunne) The rationale for this is obvious and well-worn. The question is whether the attitude has changed. Is there a possibility for a shock from the inside rather than the outside? Tunisia and Libya are already engaging economically. Could they not start a revived Arab Maghreb Union without the other countries and then, if successful, Morocco and Algeria would be convinced to join?

C: (Rouis) Is the timing right? Internally, there is certainly a changing political landscape. Externally, there has also been shock to the Maghreb countries with the crisis in Europe. They have to integrate now in order to address both the demands of the population and the external economic crisis. The Maghreb also doesn't have to move as a whole – if Algeria isn't budging, then the rest of the Maghreb countries should move ahead without it.

C: (Entelis) There is a practical and an ideological reason for the Algerian people to want integration – not just for goods, but for tourism and services. Oil is only benefitting the state. In terms of circumventing the state to jumpstart progress, this doesn't need to be done in Tunisia and Libya. If you do such a thing in Morocco or Algeria, you either go to jail or are co-opted into cooperating with the state (crony capitalism). So what is really needed in these countries is transparency to allow ordinary people to have opportunities.

C: (Walters) The discussion about regional integration is a bit of a time warp in the Maghreb. The debate is about regional trade instead of global trade, rather than regional trade and integration and/as a means for global trade and integration.

C: (Hufbauer) Political liberalization will unfortunately reinforce the current problem in the Maghreb that economic solutions come in more government jobs, which is not really the solution. Likewise, the informal sector is not the answer, the formal sector is. Another problem is a lot of old-style economic thinking in these countries. Economists cannot convince them of the benefits, they can't even convince the US to push for integration. It's possible that you could convince Algeria to become a champion of integration for reasons of power politics and Maghreb political domination.

5. Observation

The roundtable discussion was attended by prominent Maghreb experts from the most important economic institutions and political think tanks in DC – it was thus the right group of participants for a discussion on the future of Maghreb economic integration. Despite some degree of optimism about the prospects for regional integration the Maghreb, the majority of the discussants concluded that there would be little movement on the AMU or other regional integration initiatives in the near future, even though it makes sense both politically and economically in the current Maghreb landscape. Revolutionary changes in Libya and Tunisia, as well as evolutionary changes in Morocco, have indeed altered the political environment in the Maghreb, but not enough so to fundamentally alter intra-Maghrebi relations and increased cooperation. Another challenge is that societies have not been transformed merely by regime change. Many of the elements necessary for citizen empowerment in both economics and politics are not yet present, and despite some political changes, both crony capitalism and the economic policy of alleviating discontent with more government jobs still prevails. Until transparency and accountability become the norm in the Maghreb, it is unlikely that there will be much regional integration, however convincing the argument is for it from an economic standpoint.

The challenge for Morocco is to demonstrate that it has the political will to overcome the truculence of Algeria in promoting regional integration. Morocco is responding quite effectively to bilateral openings with Tunisia and Libya, but has yet to define a broad and proactive strategy with regard to economic integration. Giving the private sector more support and leeway to pursue stronger trade ties, and by leveraging the FTA rules of cumulation, Morocco may develop a comparative edge to offset Algeria's energy assets.

\(Back to top\)

Assessing Developments in Mali: Restoring Democracy and Reclaiming the North

Date: 5 December 2012

1. Title: Assessing Developments in Mali: Restoring Democracy and Reclaiming the North

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Subcommittee on African Affairs

Participants:

Panel One

Ambassador Johnnie Carson: Assistant Secretary for African Affairs, Department of State

Earl Gast: Assistant Administrator for Africa, USAID

Amanda Dory: Deputy Assistant Secretary for Africa, Department of Defense

Panel Two

Dr. Christopher Formunyoh: Regional Director for Central and West Africa, National Democratic Institute

Corinne Dufka: Senior Researcher Africa Division, Human Rights Watch

Nii Akuetteh: Independent Policy Researcher

Senators

Senator Chris Coons: Committee Chairman (D-DE)

Senator Johnny Isakson: Ranking Member (R-GA)

2. Overview

The Senate hearing addressed the future of the crisis in Mali as a result of the Touareg rebellion in March 2012, the subsequent coup in Bamako, and the takeover of large swaths of the northern part of the country by al-Qaeda affiliated groups. In framing the hearing, Senator Chris Coons said there are three separate, but overlapping crises occurring at the same time - security, political, and humanitarian. The testimony presented at this hearing was meant to inform the subcommittee on the situation in Mali and to present options on how best to move forward.

3. Summary

Panel One

Senator Coons opened the hearing with a brief description of the situation on the ground. He expressed the opinion that there should be an intervention by a multilateral, regionally-led military force. Though the US had previously provided various types of aid and support to Mali, most aid has been frozen since the Touareg uprising and subsequent conflict; only emergency health care and food assistance remain. The first panel presented US government views of the crisis.

Johnnie Carson identified four main goals to achieve a sustainable solution in Mali. First, legitimacy must be restored to the central government. This is the most important step because it precedes the opening of negotiations with the Touaregs in the north to address historical grievances and find common ground. Third, there must be significant emphasis placed on countering al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM); and fourth, there must be a response to the ongoing humanitarian crisis. Carson argues these issues should be addressed simultaneously. In terms of military intervention, he believes it should be an 'African-led, Malian-led' group. He claims that the threat of military action has gotten some results; groups who had previously voiced intentions to establish a extremist-backed state have backed off that goal. In terms of what the US can and is doing, Carson noted that the US has been involved in various capacities: sending military planners to ECOWAS, working with its regional partners through the Trans Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership, and pledging $445 million for emergency humanitarian aid.

Earl Gast spoke about the humanitarian elements of the crisis and USAID's response. He noted that 4.6 million Malians are affected by the unfolding food crisis. In terms of responding to that need, in the disputed northern territories aid workers negotiate access on a case by case basis to deliver essential life-saving assistance. To support the aim of establishing a legitimate central government in Bamako, USAID would like to engage in electoral stabilization programs such as educating voters, strengthening political parties, and overseeing elections. Gast says they plan to support national reconciliation and they are examining the feasibility and appropriateness of post-conflict programs.

Amanda Dory addressed the security concerns. The Department of Defense is focused on countering AQIM and affiliates, and they are doing everything possible to enable ECOWAS to degrade AQIM. She corroborated what

Senator Coons said about cutting off most US assistance to Mali, including military to military capacity building programs. In terms of destabilizing factors, she laments the continued involvement of Captain Sanogo, who was a leading figure in the Touareg separatist movement and who continues to influence policy. Dory said the conflict threatens US interests in the region, primarily because the terrorists frequently kidnap Westerners for ransom. She stressed this despite the fact that AQIM has not called for striking targets inside the US, it has expressed a desire to hit Europe. She believes the strategic concept for military intervention is sound, and she anticipates more planning. She confirmed that the US plans to contribute logistical support, training, and equipment, but not boots on the ground in Mali.

Panel Two

The second panel was comprised of non-governmental political analysts.

Christopher Formunyoh distributed a paper at the hearing, so he only spoke briefly. He focused his comments mainly on potential problems of governmental legitimacy.

Corinne Dufka gave a very disturbing account of human rights abuses taking place in northern Mali. She explained that she has conducted interviews on the ground and has daily phone contact with people reporting human rights abuses. She described instances of beatings, executions, stoning, amputations, stabbings, gang rapes, and pillaging at the hands of AQIM and its affiliates. In terms of the organized military force, there appears to be little command and control. Dufka identified four ways the United States can help improve the situation:

1. Widening criticism of the military;
2. Conducting an American-led investigation of human rights abuses and ensuring that no amnesty for criminals in included agreements;
3. Supporting civil society and discouraging hate speech; and,
4. Encouraging a strong human rights component in a future intervention.

Nii Akuetteh added that the US should be aware of a fifth dimension to the Mali problem, in addition to the already addressed issues of political and electoral legitimacy, separatism, ethnic tensions and terrorism; contagion. People in the region are concerned the conflict in Mali could spread beyond its borders. He hopes there will be elections, negotiations between the north and the south, and "an intervention maybe," but he was adamant that preference not be shown to the Touaregs for fear of reinforcing or rewarding their behavior. He closed his comments by saying there needs to be an emphasis placed on a return to civilian leadership.

4. Q & A

Panel One

Q: (Coons) It seems to me that sequencing is very important here, because we have a lot of interrelated, complex problems, considering the historical grievances, security objectives, and political/electoral objectives. What's the correct sequence?

A: (Carson) All of the objectives you mentioned need to be approached simultaneously and in parallel. However, we shouldn't hold some objectives hostage if we can't move forward on another. The bottom line is we must have a central government that can make good on promises made to the Touaregs.

Q: (Coons) There have been four Northern rebellions. How can we increase Northern participation in the general election and decision-making process?

A: (Carson) It would be difficult, but it's possible. Only 10% of Mali's population is in the northern part of the country. I realize it's important to include those 800,000-1,000,000 people, but half have left due to the conflict. We could hold elections in refugee camps administered by UNHCR.

Q: (Isakson) It seems to be AQIM's modus operandi to attack and kidnap. Was AQIM involved in what happened in Benghazi?

A: (Dory) We are investigating the extent of AQIM's involvement in that incident, but haven't reached a conclusion yet. I would prefer to discuss that further in a closed session.

Q: (Isakson) Can West Africans really take on AQIM themselves?

A: (Dory) I believe they can. All it requires is the will, the equipment, and the intent.

Q: (Isakson) What was the cause of the coup?

A: (Carson) There were a series of military defeats in northern Mali at the hands of the Touregs. The government's forces were underequipped, so the government didn't fulfill their obligation to arm and train them adequately. There was also a growing discontent in the south due to widespread corruption. So to answer your question, it was really about poor governance and poor delivery of services.

Q: (Isakson) So Africa's oldest problem, corruption, is alive and well in Mali?

A: (Carson) The ex-president wasn't doing a good job.

Q: (Chris Coons) Under what timeline could Mali have an effective military force?

A: (Dory) Feasibility is a key component of planning. In general, you don't engage until risk is low enough and we've had time for force generation.

(Gast) In the best of times, Mali is in crisis. What's important is to establish a connection between the government and the people. Historically, we've developed partnerships in tandem with the government to establish some regularity and legitimacy, but that moves too slowly in this case.

Q: (Coons) How can we wait a year to intervene?

A: (Dory) At DoD we have a sense of moving as fast as circumstances will allow.

Q: (Isakson) What is Captain Sanogo capable of?

A: (Dory) He is a field grade officer. He cannot remake institutions.

Panel 2

Q: (Coons) What is the most important thing for the United States government to do in this situation?

A: (Akuetteh) The US should promote legitimate elections, create regional strategy for combating terrorism, and work to promote a culture that is rooted in democracy and social justice in order to remove grievances.

(Dufka) The rule of law institutions are very weak and need to be repaired. Encouraging dialogue amongst all Malians and working to address the culture of impunity are also important measures that need to be take.

(Formanyoh) Elections do not make democracies. They need to build sustainable partnerships.

5. Observations

This hearing was sparsely attended by members of Congress, but heavily attended by an audience of about 100 professionals and students in the international affairs community. Though the hearing was informative about US perspectives on the crisis in Mali, none of the panelists provided any additional news or insight into what the best process was for addressing the crisis.

\(Back to top\)

November/December 2012 Events Bulletin

November 15

Politics and Power in Maghreb: Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco from Independence to the Arab Spring - A conversation with Michael Willis

November 29

Prospects for Maghreb Economic Integration

December 5

Assessing Developments in Mali: Restoring Democracy and Reclaiming the North

.....

Politics and Power in the Maghreb: Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco from Independence to the Arab Spring – A Conversation with Michael Willis

Date: 15 November 2012

1. Title: Politics and Power in the Maghreb: Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco from Independence to the Arab Spring – A Conversation with Michael Willis

Hosted by Project on Middle East Political Science at the Elliott School of International Affairs

Participants:

Michael Willis: University Research Lecturer and King Mohammed VI Fellow in Moroccan and Mediterranean Studies, University of Oxford

2. Overview

Professor Willis discussed his new book, Politics and Power in the Maghreb: Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco from Independence to the Arab Spring.

3. Summary

Professor Willis began by discussing why he wanted to write a book. He noted that the Maghreb is not a focal area for many scholars, not even for those you study the MENA region. It thus does not receive a lot of attention. This is also because the region does not have conflicts on the scale of the Mashreq countries, although Willis noted that the Maghreb certainly has conflicts of importance, most notably the conflict over the Western Sahara. Willis characterized the Western Sahara as one of the longest unresolved conflicts that, "no one outside of the corridors of the UN has ever heard of, let alone addressed its causes and effects." Willis also noted that he wanted to write a book about the Maghreb as a region, because when the area has been covered, it has been at the individual country level, rather than at the region level. Given the absence of a book on the politics and history of the region, Willis set out to write a broad and comparative study of the region as a whole, thus integrating texts on individual countries.

Through his research (and prior to the Arab Spring), Professor Willis drew two primary conclusions about the region as a whole: it has had continuity in its political system and continuity in its forms of political power – although there are different faces, the structures have remained largely the same. With regard to the former, Morocco has maintained a monarchy, Tunisia has historically had an all-powerful President back by a political party, and Algeria has had a civilian president and a strong military, with the intelligence services serving as kingmaker. With regard to the second conclusion, in Morocco, the real wielders of power are not the elected officials and a shadow government operates to some extent, while the real decisions being taken by people outside of the government. In Algeria, unelected officials likewise hold the real power. In the 1990s, there was some political opening in Morocco and Algeria and the establishment of political processes that mimicked liberal democracy, but there was no real change. In Tunisia, the political structures remained the same from Bourguiba to Ben Ali.

The events of the Arab Spring, particularly in Tunisia, forced Willis to reevaluate his initial conclusions and question whether the countries of the Maghreb are really as similar and continuous as originally thought. Certainly, for Morocco and Algeria, whether or not these conclusions have changed after the Arab Spring is still unclear. Willis noted that Algeria and Morocco felt the impact of the Arab Spring, but the revolutions seemed to go east rather than west. In Algeria, several factors mitigated a revolution, including the previous history of revolt that reduced the appetite for radical political change, oil wealth that allowed the government to buy off protestors, and the pluralistic leadership structure, which meant that there was no single, dominant leader for the population to revolt against. In addition, Algerian protests tended to be at the local, socio-economic level. Such protests serve to relieve some pressure on the system. In Morocco, the creation of the February 20th movement was a clear reaction to the Arab Spring, but its momentum was halted to some degree by constitutional reform and early elections. Willis noted that Moroccan opinion is divided as to whether the palace sees this current situation as the end of the Arab Spring or that start of something else – perhaps a period of ongoing reform. He questioned whether the current strategy of governing with the PJD was the same as that during the period of alternance, when the Palace brought the socialists into government to neutralize them. In any event, Willis argued that Morocco has long claimed to be the most liberal in the region and that is now uncomfortable with the possibility of losing that claim to Tunisia. Whether or not that will inspire further reform is unclear, though Willis believes there has been a change in atmosphere – at least on the street. There is a new appetite for change and it appears that the population is not prepared to accept the failings of the state as before – this may be the biggest fallout of the Arab Spring in Morocco. Turning to Tunisia, Willis said that if it does succeed, it will stand apart from its autocratic neighbors and encourage change across the Maghreb.

In conclusion, Willis noted that the Arab Spring has certainly led to one important shift in the Maghreb, even if the continuity from independence to present has been interrupted by the change in Tunisia. Before, Algeria was revolutionary, Tunisia was reformist, and Morocco was conservative. Now, Tunisia is revolutionary Morocco is reformist, and Algeria is conservative.

4. Q & A

Q: Does the book address the Western Sahara?

A: It is not possible to understand Morocco’s foreign policy without understanding the Western Sahara. The issue is vital to the survival of the Moroccan regime and to some extent the Algerian region. As of yet, I can’t see a resolution between the Polisario, Algeria, and Morocco, unless there is some breakthrough in convincing them to reassess what they all perceive as their vital strategic interests.

Q: What is the role of external actors in the Maghreb?

A: France has failed in the region. The US and Britain are starting to get involved and they need to. The countries of the region will still have to deal with France, but because of France’s colonial history and its support of past dictators, its influence has waned. For example, more and more people are expressing themselves in Arabic, rather than French.

Q: Is there a future for the Arab Maghreb Union?

A: We are seeing a revival right now, particularly by Tunisia. There is certainly a compelling economic case for it, but the problem is the Western Sahara. Morocco lost interest in the AMU when it became clear it wasn’t going to resolve the Western Sahara. Now, most of the interest is coming from Libya and Tunisia. However, I am not optimistic because of the Algeria-Morocco divide.

Q: What is your assessment of the new Moroccan Constitution and whether it meets the aspirations of the Moroccan people for a better system?

A: What was voted on was not what was proposed in March, and what was implemented was not what was voted on. It has been watered down in the process. There are some importance advances, but it isn’t enough. As they say in Morocco, chouia, chouia.

5. Observation

Approximately 30 people attended the book discussion, primarily students and those interested in Maghreb affairs. Professor Willis was an engaging speaker and offered some interesting insights on politics in the Maghreb. While much of what he said was not entirely new, his focus on and passion for the Maghreb is apparent and he is clearly an expert on the region. His promotion of the importance of the Maghreb region for US and UK strategic interests makes him a useful ally for MAC. Furthermore, his title at Oxford University would indicate that he collaborates closely with Morocco. Despite some of his skepticism about reforms in Morocco, he clearly loves the country and has spent much time there. If possible, it might be worth cultivating a relationship with him to see if he would be able to serve as a third party expert.

\(Back to top\)

Prospects for Maghreb Economic Integration

Date: 29 November 2012

1. Title: Prospects for Maghreb Economic Integration

Hosted by the Atlantic Council

Speakers:

Gary Hufbauer: Reginald Jones Senior Fellow, Peterson Institute for International Economics

Jonathan Walters: Director for Regional Strategy and Programs in the Middle East and North Africa Region, World Bank

John Entelis: Professor of Political Science and Director of the Middle East Studies Program, Fordham University

Mohsin Khan: Moderator: Senior Fellow, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, Atlantic Council

Roundtable Participants:

Abdulwahab AlKebsi: Center for International Private Enterprise

Ghazi Ben Ahmed: Club de Tunis

Caitlin Dearing: Moroccan American Center

Michele Dunne: Atlantic Council

Mohammed El Qorchi: International Monetary Fund

Clément Gillet: Institute for International Finance

Danya Greenfield: Atlantic Council

Eric Knecht: Atlantic Council

Haim Malka: Center for Strategic and International Studies

Amine Mati: International Monetary Fund

Stephen McInerney: Project on Middle East Democracy

Karim Mezran: Atlantic Council

Svetlana Milbert: Atlantic Council

Mustapha Rouis: World Bank

Amor Tahiri: International Monetary Fund

Mona Yacoubian: Stimson Center

I. William Zartman: School of Advanced International Studies

2. Overview

The aftermath of the Arab Spring has created a new political environment in the Middle East and North Africa. Not only have internal politics changed, but relations between the countries of the region have also changed. There likewise appears to have been a shift in thinking about economic integration in the region. In light of these developments, this discussion addressed whether in the aftermath of the Arab Spring it is time once again to examine economic integration in the Maghreb. A recent major study by the World Bank on trade and infrastructure in the Maghreb provided an entry point for discussion on the issue.

3. Summary

Mohsin Khan defined the parameters of the discussion, asking the speakers to provide their assessment on whether or not it is a good time to have another look at economic integration, both from an economic perspective and a political perspective. He noted that both elements are an essential point of view because despite convincing evidence of the economic benefits of such integration, political realities have stalled the process.

Gary Hufbauer provided an overview of the current economic status in the region and made the economic case for further integration. He noted that the primary economic goal of the Maghreb countries is sustained 6%+ GDP growth in order to employ young people and converge towards EU per capita income, but that all of the Maghreb countries have fallen far short of this goal. Morocco's projected growth rate for 2013 is 4.5%, Algeria's 2.5%, and Tunisia's 1.8%, and their per capita incomes are one-tenth of what they are in Europe. Hufbauer questioned why the Maghreb countries were doing so poorly despite trade agreements, macroeconomic stability, and reasonable inward foreign direct investment in trade.

According to Hufbauer, there are both internal and external reasons. Externally, trade agreements have failed to deliver additional trade and investment, both within the region and internationally. The Agadir and PAFTA agreements have had a weak effect in promoting regional trade, and the EU-Med and US-Morocco agreements haven't done much. Internally, the countries suffer from a multitude of problems. First, they have failed to fully implement important fiscal and economic reforms, despite some progress. As Hufbauer put it, "the Maghreb is not a poster region for the Washington consensus, but neither is it completely off track. Second, the countries suffer from low rankings in competitiveness, enabling trade, doing business, and corruption. Third, the education systems are oriented towards government service, not business. Despite similar spending as a percentage of GDP to the US and France, the education systems are just not delivering, as they focus on literature, law, and religion, rather than technical training, science, and business. In sum, Hufbauer stressed that the second and third reasons were the primary problems, noting that social infrastructure surrounding business and government, including monopolies, soft cartels, barriers to entry, and corruption costs, is a huge growth killer, as is an achronistic education system. Given this rather challenging economic environment, Maghreb economic integration makes sense, as it will allow economic diversification and improve changes for growth.

Jonathan Walters provided context about trade in the Maghreb and discussed the findings of two recent reports on the Maghreb – one from the World Bank on Trade Facilitation and Infrastructure in the Maghreb, the other a study the World Bank did for the Deauville partnership on trade and foreign direct investment in the region. In terms of context, Walters argued that the current economic drivers in the region are jobs, jobs, jobs, noting that the countries of the region will not be able to achieve the kind of growth required for jobs without integration. However, Walters views integration in a much broader context. In order to achieve sustainable growth, the countries must not only integrate regionally, but also with Europe. He noted that trade as a percentage of GDP within the Maghreb is only 2%, compared with 10% in West Africa and 15% in Central America. Trade costs within the Maghreb are also twice as expensive as trade between Maghreb countries in Europe, indicating that infrastructure and trade barriers are serious impediments to intra-Maghrebi trade.

Turning to the reports, Walters noted that the first study found that in the Maghreb, markets are fragmented, there are no economies of scale, trade costs are high, and the Arab Maghreb Union (AMU) is ineffective. Non-tariff barriers are likewise high due to border closures and arbitrary regulations. The region nevertheless has some assets – a common technical heritage, free trade agreements (although they are yet to be realized), and some tariff reductions. The study also found that if there was integration, complementarities would start to emerge. Walters noted that global supply chains start because of sub-regional supply chains and that if the Maghreb could integrate to start such chains at the sub-regional level, the economic potential would be huge. Economic reform and integration is thus essential to promote regional growth.

The second study addressed economic challenges in the Maghreb in light of the Arab Spring, concluding that an economic awakening to accompany the political awakening and economic integration to promote jobs were essential. It noted that there was some skepticism in the region about liberal economic policies because of the abuse of those policies in crony capitalist societies like Egypt and Tunisia under Mubarak and Ben Ali respectively. The challenge for these countries is to thus overcome that skepticism and also bridge the gap between the political focus on the short-term and the economic focus on the long-term. The study also concluded that the European Union needs to be an external anchor for economic integration in the Maghreb by establishing a common vision for the region and confidence building measures between the Maghreb countries.

John Entelis addressed whether or not the political environment is better for economic integration in the aftermath of the Arab Spring. Regarding the political feasibility going forward, Entelis noted that the principle obstacle in the past has indeed been largely political, but even more so that it was individual; the AMU didn't work because it was composed of a diverse set of political leaders and systems, and conflicting personalities that never came close to agreeing on or meeting the goals of the organization. Now, political conditions have changed enormously, even in Morocco and Algeria. There has been a transformation in Libya and Tunisia, and Morocco and Algeria are responding to challenges. A new political consciousness about the need for accountability, democracy, and transparency is beginning to develop. As a result, Entelis argued that we should start to see a convergence of economic diversity and political changes. He stressed, however, that political changes would set the tone for economic changes.

Despite the change in the political environment in the Maghreb, Entelis was only mildly optimistic about the political prospects for Maghreb economic integration – even though politics is changing, serious political obstacles remain that will not, at least for the moment, be solved by new governments. For example, the border closure between Morocco and Algeria is a political decision that seems unlikely to change after the Arab Spring. The same applies to the decision taken by Algeria to have more flights to Paris than Morocco. Entelis stated that, “he can't explain it, just like he can't explain Algeria's refusal to change its stance on the Western Sahara.”

What, therefore, are the prospects for integration in the future? Entelis argued that complementarity of political systems is a requirement for sustained economic development and integration. This will require institutional changes, including elections, political party development, and institutional building, as well as renewed trust in political institutions. The region has experience as long period of social distrust of political institutions that cannot be overcome quickly. This shift toward political socialization, the willingness to trust leaders through accountability and to accept transfers of power will take time. The region is currently seeing the early signs of changes in political culture, as noted in the start of a renewed political consciousness. A true shift will also require the establishment of the rule of law in the business sense. In closing, Entelis argued that if the fundamental characteristics of politics change and the characteristics that flow out of that, including transparency, accountability, improved education, and improved civil society, then there may be better prospects for Maghreb economic integration.

4. Q & A/Discussion

C: (Ahmed) Maghreb economic integration is a core focus of the work of the Club de Tunis, which is a new think tank that aims to help policymakers and the private sector form economic development strategies. We believe that the government does not have to dictate private investment and that much can be done in spite of political obstacles between governments. Right now we are working to set up a North Africa private sector network. We can use external support for these initiatives – there is a critical role for the US in driving increased regional economic cooperation, but there will also have to be a push from above. We may not have complete integration, but bilateral trade is a start and there is bilateral trade happening between the Maghreb countries that is not being captured by statistics. Going forward, the private sector will have to convince governments that this is in their interest.

C: (Tahiri) The main answers to the questions raised by this forum are yes and yes – yes for economic reasons and yes for political reasons. Economic integration is not a choice, but a necessity for the Maghreb countries, and political changes, albeit ongoing, will push this reality forward. The main reason why economic integration has not progressed well is because of politics, primarily the absence of political will and the absence of a perceived benefit from increased integration for all countries. We have to change this mindset and convince people that this is not a zero-sum game. The private sector will play a key role in this, as they can help convince countries that they will benefit from this. However, international institutions also need to change their approach – no more studies need to be done to show the importance of integration. Rather, the IMF and the World Bank, among others need to be candid about the challenges and be willing to tackle political issues rather than just ignore them.

C: (Entelis) The new situation offers hope because Maghrebis want integration and if they are empowered, through democracy, they may push for it, particularly as political systems are increasingly responding to the demands of the people.

Q: (Zartman) Economic integration isn't just going to happen. Is the US ready to push for it?

Q: (Yacoubian) Is there not a chance for economic drivers to push this rather than waiting on political changes?

Q: (Malka) Do these bureaucracies have the capacity to implement the reforms require for integration?

C: (El Qorchi) Has the international community done enough to push the benefits of regional economic integration? It has to demonstrate that there is a benefit. The private sector tries this approach through Chambers of Commerce, etc., but it did not work. Civil society is trying, but there is an obstacle in centralized power. The push has to come from international institutions doing these studies. They have to be willing to take a political stance.

C: (Dunne) The rationale for this is obvious and well-worn. The question is whether the attitude has changed. Is there a possibility for a shock from the inside rather than the outside? Tunisia and Libya are already engaging economically. Could they not start a revived Arab Maghreb Union without the other countries and then, if successful, Morocco and Algeria would be convinced to join?

C: (Rouis) Is the timing right? Internally, there is certainly a changing political landscape. Externally, there has also been shock to the Maghreb countries with the crisis in Europe. They have to integrate now in order to address both the demands of the population and the external economic crisis. The Maghreb also doesn't have to move as a whole – if Algeria isn't budging, then the rest of the Maghreb countries should move ahead without it.

C: (Entelis) There is a practical and an ideological reason for the Algerian people to want integration – not just for goods, but for tourism and services. Oil is only benefitting the state. In terms of circumventing the state to jumpstart progress, this doesn't need to be done in Tunisia and Libya. If you do such a thing in Morocco or Algeria, you either go to jail or are co-opted into cooperating with the state (crony capitalism). So what is really needed in these countries is transparency to allow ordinary people to have opportunities.

C: (Walters) The discussion about regional integration is a bit of a time warp in the Maghreb. The debate is about regional trade instead of global trade, rather than regional trade and integration and/as a means for global trade and integration.

C: (Hufbauer) Political liberalization will unfortunately reinforce the current problem in the Maghreb that economic solutions come in more government jobs, which is not really the solution. Likewise, the informal sector is not the answer, the formal sector is. Another problem is a lot of old-style economic thinking in these countries. Economists cannot convince them of the benefits, they can't even convince the US to push for integration. It's possible that you could convince Algeria to become a champion of integration for reasons of power politics and Maghreb political domination.

5. Observation

The roundtable discussion was attended by prominent Maghreb experts from the most important economic institutions and political think tanks in DC – it was thus the right group of participants for a discussion on the future of Maghreb economic integration. Despite some degree of optimism about the prospects for regional integration the Maghreb, the majority of the discussants concluded that there would be little movement on the AMU or other regional integration initiatives in the near future, even though it makes sense both politically and economically in the current Maghreb landscape. Revolutionary changes in Libya and Tunisia, as well as evolutionary changes in Morocco, have indeed altered the political environment in the Maghreb, but not enough so to fundamentally alter intra-Maghrebi relations and increased cooperation. Another challenge is that societies have not been transformed merely by regime change. Many of the elements necessary for citizen empowerment in both economics and politics are not yet present, and despite some political changes, both crony capitalism and the economic policy of alleviating discontent with more government jobs still prevails. Until transparency and accountability become the norm in the Maghreb, it is unlikely that there will be much regional integration, however convincing the argument is for it from an economic standpoint.

The challenge for Morocco is to demonstrate that it has the political will to overcome the truculence of Algeria in promoting regional integration. Morocco is responding quite effectively to bilateral openings with Tunisia and Libya, but has yet to define a broad and proactive strategy with regard to economic integration. Giving the private sector more support and leeway to pursue stronger trade ties, and by leveraging the FTA rules of cumulation, Morocco may develop a comparative edge to offset Algeria's energy assets.

\(Back to top\)

Assessing Developments in Mali: Restoring Democracy and Reclaiming the North

Date: 5 December 2012

1. Title: Assessing Developments in Mali: Restoring Democracy and Reclaiming the North

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Subcommittee on African Affairs

Participants:
Panel One

Ambassador Johnnie Carson: Assistant Secretary for African Affairs, Department of State

Earl Gast: Assistant Administrator for Africa, USAID

Amanda Dory: Deputy Assistant Secretary for Africa, Department of Defense
Panel Two

Dr. Christopher Formunyoh: Regional Director for Central and West Africa, National Democratic Institute

Corinne Dufka: Senior Researcher Africa Division, Human Rights Watch

Nii Akuetteh: Independent Policy Researcher
Senators

Senator Chris Coons: Committee Chairman (D-DE)

Senator Johnny Isakson: Ranking Member (R-GA)

2. Overview

The Senate hearing addressed the future of the crisis in Mali as a result of the Touareg rebellion in March 2012, the subsequent coup in Bamako, and the takeover of large swaths of the northern part of the country by al-Qaeda affiliated groups. In framing the hearing, Senator Chris Coons said there are three separate, but overlapping crises occurring at the same time - security, political, and humanitarian. The testimony presented at this hearing was meant to inform the subcommittee on the situation in Mali and to present options on how best to move forward.

3. Summary

Panel One

Senator Coons opened the hearing with a brief description of the situation on the ground. He expressed the opinion that there should be an intervention by a multilateral, regionally-led military force. Though the US had previously provided various types of aid and support to Mali, most aid has been frozen since the Touareg uprising and subsequent conflict; only emergency health care and food assistance remain. The first panel presented US government views of the crisis.

Johnnie Carson identified four main goals to achieve a sustainable solution in Mali. First, legitimacy must be restored to the central government. This is the most important step because it precedes the opening of negotiations with the Touaregs in the north to address historical grievances and find common ground. Third, there must be significant emphasis placed on countering al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM); and fourth, there must be a response to the ongoing humanitarian crisis. Carson argues these issues should be addressed simultaneously. In terms of military intervention, he believes it should be an 'African-led, Malian-led' group. He claims that the threat of military action has gotten some results; groups who had previously voiced intentions to establish a extremist-backed state have backed off that goal. In terms of what the US can and is doing, Carson noted that the US has been involved in various capacities: sending military planners to ECOWAS, working with its regional partners through the Trans Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership, and pledging $445 million for emergency humanitarian aid.

Earl Gast spoke about the humanitarian elements of the crisis and USAID's response. He noted that 4.6 million Malians are affected by the unfolding food crisis. In terms of responding to that need, in the disputed northern territories aid workers negotiate access on a case by case basis to deliver essential life-saving assistance. To support the aim of establishing a legitimate central government in Bamako, USAID would like to engage in electoral stabilization programs such as educating voters, strengthening political parties, and overseeing elections. Gast says they plan to support national reconciliation and they are examining the feasibility and appropriateness of post-conflict programs.

Amanda Dory addressed the security concerns. The Department of Defense is focused on countering AQIM and affiliates, and they are doing everything possible to enable ECOWAS to degrade AQIM. She corroborated what Senator Coons said about cutting off most US assistance to Mali, including military to military capacity building programs. In terms of destabilizing factors, she laments the continued involvement of Captain Sanogo, who was a leading figure in the Touareg separatist movement and who continues to influence policy. Dory said the conflict threatens US interests in the region, primarily because the terrorists frequently kidnap Westerners for ransom. She stressed this despite the fact that AQIM has not called for striking targets inside the US, it has expressed a desire to hit Europe. She believes the strategic concept for military intervention is sound, and she anticipates more planning. She confirmed that the US plans to contribute logistical support, training, and equipment, but not boots on the ground in Mali.

Panel Two

The second panel was comprised of non-governmental political analysts.

Christopher Formunyoh distributed a paper at the hearing, so he only spoke briefly. He focused his comments mainly on potential problems of governmental legitimacy.

Corinne Dufka gave a very disturbing account of human rights abuses taking place in northern Mali. She explained that she has conducted interviews on the ground and has daily phone contact with people reporting human rights abuses. She described instances of beatings, executions, stoning, amputations, stabbings, gang rapes, and pillaging at the hands of AQIM and its affiliates. In terms of the organized military force, there appears to be little command and control. Dufka identified four ways the United States can help improve the situation:

- 1) Widening criticism of the military;
- 2) Conducting an American-led investigation of human rights abuses and ensuring that no amnesty for criminals in included agreements;
- 3) Supporting civil society and discouraging hate speech; and,
- 4) Encouraging a strong human rights component in a future intervention.

Nii Akuetteh added that the US should be aware of a fifth dimension to the Mali problem, in addition to the already addressed issues of political and electoral legitimacy, separatism, ethnic tensions and terrorism; contagion. People in the region are concerned the conflict in Mali could spread beyond its borders. He hopes there will be elections, negotiations between the north and the south, and "an intervention maybe," but he was adamant that preference not be shown to the Touaregs for fear of reinforcing or rewarding their behavior. He closed his comments by saying there needs to be an emphasis placed on a return to civilian leadership.

4. Q & A

Panel One

Q: (Coons) It seems to me that sequencing is very important here, because we have a lot of interrelated, complex problems, considering the historical grievances, security objectives, and political/electoral objectives. What's the correct sequence?

A: (Carson) All of the objectives you mentioned need to be approached simultaneously and in parallel. However, we shouldn't hold some objectives hostage if we can't move forward on another. The bottom line is we must have a central government that can make good on promises made to the Touaregs.

Q: (Coons) There have been four Northern rebellions. How can we increase Northern participation in the general election and decision-making process?

A: (Carson) It would be difficult, but it's possible. Only 10% of Mali's population is in the northern part of the country. I realize it's important to include those 800,000-1,000,000 people, but half have left due to the conflict. We could hold elections in refugee camps administered by UNHCR.

Q: (Isakson) It seems to be AQIM's modus operandi to attack and kidnap. Was AQIM involved in what happened in Benghazi?

A: (Dory) We are investigating the extent of AQIM's involvement in that incident, but haven't reached a conclusion yet. I would prefer to discuss that further in a closed session.

Q: (Isakson) Can West Africans really take on AQIM themselves?

A: (Dory) I believe they can. All it requires is the will, the equipment, and the intent.

Q: (Isakson) What was the cause of the coup?

A: (Carson) There were a series of military defeats in northern Mali at the hands of the Touaregs. The government's forces were underequipped, so the government didn't fulfill their obligation to arm and train them adequately. There was also a growing discontent in the south due to widespread corruption. So to answer your question, it was really about poor governance and poor delivery of services.

Q: (Isakson) So Africa's oldest problem, corruption, is alive and well in Mali?

A: (Carson) The ex-president wasn't doing a good job.

Q: (Chris Coons) Under what timeline could Mali have an effective military force?

A: (Dory) Feasibility is a key component of planning. In general, you don't engage until risk is low enough and we've had time for force generation.

(Gast) In the best of times, Mali is in crisis. What's important is to establish a connection between the government and the people. Historically, we've developed partnerships in tandem with the government to establish some regularity and legitimacy, but that moves too slowly in this case.

Q: (Coons) How can we wait a year to intervene?

A: (Dory) At DoD we have a sense of moving as fast as circumstances will allow.

Q: (Isakson) What is Captain Sanogo capable of?

A: (Dory) He is a field grade officer. He cannot remake institutions.

Panel 2

Q: (Coons) What is the most important thing for the United States government to do in this situation?

A: (Akuetteh) The US should promote legitimate elections, create regional strategy for combating terrorism, and work to promote a culture that is rooted in democracy and social justice in order to remove grievances.

(Dufka) The rule of law institutions are very weak and need to be repaired. Encouraging dialogue amongst all Malians and working to address the culture of impunity are also important measures that need to be take.

(Formanyoh) Elections do not make democracies. They need to build sustainable partnerships.

5. Observations

This hearing was sparsely attended by members of Congress, but heavily attended by an audience of about 100 professionals and students in the international affairs community. Though the hearing was informative about US perspectives on the crisis in Mali, none of the panelists provided any additional news or insight into what the best process was for addressing the crisis.

\(Back to top\)

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, December 26, 2012 2:05 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Twitter Monitoring December Week 3

Title/ Date	Summary
Le Conseil de l'Europe cherche à être mieux compris par le Parlement marocain The Council of Europe seeks to be better understood by the Moroccan parliament Dec. 17, 2012	Members of the Moroccan parliament took part in a Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (PACE) conference, which aims to establish institutional cooperation with the parliaments of neighboring non-EU member states.
Maroc: Le Maroc aggrave son endettement extérieur Morocco: Morocco aggravates its external debt Dec. 17, 2012	In this piece, the Minister of Economics and Finance examines why Morocco has been forced to take on more debt.
Maroc : Les USFPistes ont-ils fait le bon choix avec Driss Lachgar ? Morocco: Has the Socialist Union for Popular Forces made the right choice with Driss Laghar? Dec. 17, 2012	The political party USFP has chosen a new leader, Driss Laghar, elected with 848 Congressional votes. His opponent, Ahmed Zaydi, won 650 votes.
Une mouche Marocaine attaque la Russie A Moroccan fly	53 tons of Moroccan clementines have been put into quarantine in the commercial port of St. Petersburg by Russian authorities because they detected Mediterranean fruit flies in the shipment. The federal veterinary and plant surveillance service has recommended freezing the clementines to prevent the spread of the flies to Russia's agricultural fields, which would result in a "catastrophe of the highest order".

attacks Russia Dec. 17, 2012
Bouira : Salah Gasmi dit Mohamed Abou Salah , n° 2 d'Aqmi arrêté. Bouira: Salah Gasmi AKA Mohamed Abou Salah, No 2 of AQIM arrested Dec. 17, 2012	Salah Gasmi, AKA Mohamed Abou Salah, who was second in command of AQIM has been arrested in Cherfa, Algeria. He is the communications director for the terrorist network.
Hollande s'adressera au monde arabe depuis le Maroc. Hollande will address the Arab World from Morocco Dec. 17, 2012	French President Francois Hollande will give a speech to the Arab World from Morocco, where he will make an official visit in the beginning of 2013, according to a French diplomatic source.
IMF urges Morocco to remove fuel subsidies Dec. 18, 2012	Echoing its prescription for other struggling economies in the Middle East and North Africa, the International Monetary Fund urged Morocco to remove fuel subsidies in order to free up resources for investment.
Un député français demande au président Hollande de faire évoluer "considérablement" la question sahraouie A French deputy demands that President Hollande seriously evaluate the Saharawi issue Dec. 19, 2012	French Deputy from Meurthe-et-Moselle, M. Hervé Feron, encouraged President Hollande to evaluate the Saharawi situation during his trip to Algeria this week.
Le Maroc tenu de fournir des preuves que le Sahara occidental bénéficie de l'accord de pêche	The UK calls on the government of Morocco to provide evidence that the people of Western Sahara benefit from fisheries agreements, according to the UK Minister in charge of the MENA region, Alistair Burt.

signé avec l'UE (Alistair Burt) Morocco is required to provide evidence that the fisheries agreement with the EU benefits the Western Sahara (Alistair Burt) Dec. 19, 2012
La Chambre des représentants passe à la vitesse supérieure The House of Representatives moves at high speed Dec. 19, 2012	The House of Representatives has accelerated its rate of production by adopting 20 bills on Tuesday, including approving texts of international conventions relating to various themes. Legislation includes Bill No. 83.12 supplementing Law No. 37.80 on hospitals, Bill No. 58.12 on the establishment of the National Agricultural Advisory and Bill No. 39.12 on organic production of agricultural products and aquatic, as adopted by the House of Counselors. Other texts relate to the approval of certain international conventions, including agreements between the Kingdom and The Gambia, Liberia and Turkey, and legislation approving the Arab convention related various topics, including the fight against money laundering and the financing of terrorism and the fight against crimes related to information technology and communication (ICT). The President of the House of Representatives welcomed the approval of these bills, stating that "in adopting these texts, Morocco strengthens its role on the international stage."
Des internautes accusent l'IFOP de vouloir semer la zizanie entre le Maroc et l'Algérie Communities accuse the French Institute of Public Opinion of trying to cause further divisions between Morocco and Algeria Dec. 20, 2012	Last week the French Institute of Public Opinion, a professional polling group, released a study that showed French people "prefer" Morocco to Algeria. Now communities in both countries are saying the French entity is trying to cause more problems between the North African countries (a subheading in the article says "Divide and conquer").
L'Europe plaide pour l'intégration des pays du Maghreb Europe pleads for Maghreb integration Dec. 20, 2012	The EU presented a series of propositions to support political and economic integration of North Africa on December 19. The recommendations focus on the creation of a common market for renewable energies.
L'Assemblée générale de l'ONU adopte une	The UN General Assembly adopted a resolution on the Western Sahara issue in which it supports the negotiation process "to arrive at a solution that allows the determination of the people of Western Sahara" while praising the efforts by the Personal Envoy for Western

résolution
appuyant
l'autodétermination
du peuple
sahraoui

Sahara, Christopher Ross.

The UN General Assembly adopts a resolution pressing for Saharawi self-determination

Dec. 20, 2012

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, December 26, 2012 2:13 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring December Week 3

Blog Name	Title/ Date	Summary	Comments	Response
Washington Post	Abdessalam Yassine, leader of Morocco's largest opposition movement, dies at 84, says group Dec. 15, 2012	Thousands of people came to pay their respects to "the charismatic religious leader of Morocco's largest opposition movement and longtime opponent of two Moroccan kings".	0
Mamfakinch	L'avenir de l'économie marocaine sera démocratique ou ne sera pas The future of the Moroccan economy will be democratic or it won't be Dec. 15, 2012	This opinion piece discusses the distribution of wealth in Morocco and is highly critical of elites, who, according to the piece, "are exempt and live in total impunity." Translated from French	3
Al Bawaba	From micro to macro: Morocco to use mini-loan scheme to boost employment Dec. 16, 2012	The Moroccan government plans to use microcredits to create two million permanent jobs over the next ten years instead of the one million currently forecasted. Lending by microcredit associations has been exempt from value-added tax (VAT) since 2006, but the policy was due to end on December 31st, 2012. To help the microfinance sector expand and encourage entrepreneurs to	0 develop activities, the VAT exemption period should be extended to December 31st 2016, Budget Minister Idriss Azami told parliament.

All Africa	Morocco: The African Peace and Security Council Rejects Nation's Participation in a Session Devoted to Situation in Mali Dec. 15, 2012	Morocco's participation in a high-level AU meeting on Mali was denied due to "[Morocco's] occupation of parts of the SADR", as well as the fact that "several observers have noted reports of the involvement of Moroccan intelligence services with terrorist groups in northern Mali."	0
All Africa	Morocco: Local Regime Policy Based On Lust for Sahrawi Resources. Says PM Dec. 17, 2012	The [Saharawi] Prime Minister Mr. Abdelkader Taleb Omar declared that the occupation of Saharawi territories by Morocco is not motivated by "historical and political rights", [but] rather by "an expansionist policy based on the lust for the Sahrawi resources."	0
Magharebia	EU boosts Morocco health, education Dec. 17, 2012	The European Union Delegation in Rabat wrapped up a field visit to Settat and Marrakech. The purpose of the regional trip was to see whether EU-funded literacy, hospital care and education programs were working. A total of 86 million euros were allocated for health programs between 2009-2013. The financial aid granted by the EU to tackle illiteracy amounted to 27 million euros over five years.	0
Magharebia	Algeria arrests AQIM 'number two'	AQIM suffered another major blow in Algeria on Sunday (December	0

	Dec. 18, 2012	16th) when its number two boss and main spokesman was captured near Bouira.
Magharebia	African leaders call for Mali intervention Dec. 18, 2012	The AU and ECOWAS called for deploying an African force "without delay" to expel armed Islamist groups that control northern Mali. ECOWAS' chiefs of staffs said that their plan for military intervention against the terrorist groups in northern Mali has been completed in spite of the UN's reserved position on the Africans' proposed plan.	0
Magharebia	Moroccans spend hours online. new survey finds Dec. 18, 2012	A new survey released Monday (December 17th) in Casablanca found that 57.4% of young Moroccans spend more than four hours per day on the internet, MAP reported.	0
Magharebia	IMF urges Morocco to reduce unemployment - Dec. 18, 2012	Morocco must focus on reducing youth unemployment, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) said Monday (December 17th) after talks with the Moroccan government over the two-year IMF credit line. "Morocco has made substantial progress in strengthening growth and reducing poverty over the past decade. But despite such progress, much remains to be done to reduce unemployment, in particular among the youth," the IMF said.	0
Magharebia	Sahel insecurity poses global threat. study finds	Mali-based terrorists are now a greater threat to European security than al-Qaeda in Afghanistan, a recent report claims.	0

	Dec. 19, 2012
Magharebia	Moroccan Algerian activists partner for open border campaign Dec. 19, 2012	Moroccan civil society organizations are working with campaigners across the border to play the "civil society diplomacy card" and apply pressure, hoping that they will push decision-makers into lifting the barriers that separate the two countries.	0
Magharebia	Morocco jails M20F activists Dec. 19, 2012	Eight members of Morocco's February 20 Movement received prison sentences of 3-6 months for participation in an unauthorized demonstration, the Moroccan Association for Human Rights (AMDH) announced on Tuesday (December 18th) The activists were arrested September 29th during a protest in Sidi Ifni, near Agadir. "They were simply demanding the right to work," AMDH regional representative Abdallah Idrissi told AFP.	0
Magharebia	Morocco tackles youth employment Dec. 19, 2012	MP Omar Hjira said the government must find innovative solutions to get young graduates into work in a range of sectors. Hjira argued that young people had no confidence in the competitive recruitment system, which has long been tainted by favoritism.	0
Reuters	Morocco Jan-Nov trade deficit rises 11.8 pct Dec. 17, 2012	Morocco's trade deficit rose 11.8 percent in January-November from a year earlier, the foreign exchange regulator said on Monday, putting more pressure	0

		on the country's foreign currency reserves. The trade shortfall widened to 183.1 billion dirhams ($21.5 billion) from 163 billion dirhams in the same period last year. Tourism receipts fell 2.3 percent because of lower business from the euro zone, the main source of foreign visitors. Remittances from the 3 million Moroccans living abroad dropped 4 percent.
Reuters	Morocco inflation eases to 1.6 pct in November Dec. 20, 2012	Morocco's consumer price inflation eased to an annual 1.6 percent in November from 1.8 percent in October, the High Planning Authority said on Thursday.	0
KHL	EIB invests in Morocco infrastructure Dec. 18, 2012	The European Investment Bank (EIB) has committed two loans totaling € 420 million (US$ 553 million) to Morocco to support transport and energy infrastructure projects.	0
CPI Financial	Morocco's banking sector 'resilient', says IMF Dec. 18, 2012	"The banking sector has proven resilient to the global crisis and remains sound overall. We support Bank Al-Maghrib's efforts to continue to strengthen banking regulation and supervision, including through gradual adherence to Basel III standards," said International Monetary Fund (IMF) team leader Jean-François Dauphin following discussions in Morocco.	0
Bernama	IMF Says Morocco's Healthy Policies Behind Its Robust	"The solidity of Morocco's economic fundamentals and the healthy policies put in place have contributed to getting robust	0

	Macro-Economic Results Dec. 18, 2012	macro-economic results," Dauphin told a press conference here Monday following a visit by IMF officials to the north African kingdom. He noted that this performance also helped Morocco obtain an IMF precautionary liquidity line of credit of US$6.2 billion last June.
Western Sahara Echo	Incitec Pivot must stop theft of Western Sahara phosphate Dec. 18, 2012	Incitec Pivot has announced no plans to phase out their imports of phosphate from Western Sahara, sold by the Moroccan company OCP, which has no legal title over Western Sahara phosphates.	0
Medecins Sans Frontieres blog	Morocco: voices from Gourougou Dec. 19, 2012	This blog entry reports the hardship of sub-Saharan African migrants in Morocco. The author writes, "Stuck in Morocco, unable to move on or to return to their own countries, the migrants suffer constant harassment by Moroccan security forces and the Guardia Civil (the Spanish police force). Caught trying to scale the fence to Melilla, they face violence and possible expulsion to the Algerian border."	0
Fresh Plaza	"Spain and Morocco will work together to obtain good prices" Dec. 19, 2012	The Minister of Agriculture, Food and Environment, Miguel Arias Cañete, stated on Friday that "only with dialogue can we build the future" and defended the importance of having a meeting to analyze the situation of the markets, the evolution of prices and the adherence to quotas and import prices. The	0

		Minister said that the goal is "to avoid damage to either of the two countries" and assured that "both Morocco and Spain are interested in working together to obtain good prices in the European markets."
ShanghaiDaily.com	German Development Bank to fund Morocco's wind farm project Dec. 19, 2012	The German Development Bank has provided a loan of 62 million U.S. dollars to Morocco for a wind farm project, an official statement said Wednesday. The statement said the loan aimed to diversify the North African country's energy resources and promote renewable energy possibilities.	0
UPI.com	Morocco eyed for oil and gas reserves Dec. 20, 2012	Gulfsands Petroleum announced it acquired Cabre Maroc Ltd., a subsidiary of British independent Caithness Petroleum, in a deal valued at around $19 million. Gulfsands said the company has "an extensive portfolio" of around 5,100 square miles of "highly prospective oil and gas" acres in northern Morocco.	0
Arab News	$ 745 m tramway drives Morocco to new heights Dec. 20, 2012	The $ 745 million tramway was opened by King Mohammed VI in the presence of "hundreds of thousands of joyful residents". The project enhances the city's landscapes and ambience as well as reducing traffic jams and air and sound pollution.	0
Citoyen Hmida	Sommes-nous fait pour la democratie? Are we	The author writes, "In the past few days we've experienced two major political events which answer that question with a	1- "It is a categorical no"

	(Moroccans) made for democracy? Dec. 20, 2012	resounding 'NO! We aren't ready or even made for democracy!'" Translated from French
--	--	---	--	--

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, December 27, 2012 11:05 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: VERY QUICK initial analysis of John Kerry
Attachments: John Kerry SecStateED december 2012.doc; kerry jpaul meetingEdDEc doc.doc; CONGRESSIONAL MEETING NOTES.doc.docx

Attached are three documents that provide a quick look into Senator Kerry's background and how this may affect his thinking on the ME and Morocco. It is a very quick compilation of existing documents and not intended to be a final report to you. It is rather a temporary document until a complete analysis is completed of Kerry and the new Obama Administration. The attachments include:

- A background summary on Senator Kerry and the new Obama Administration, and some of his views on the ME, Morocco, the JFK Foundation and Hillary Clinton.
- Meeting notes of a meeting with Senator Kerry's staff and Jordan Paul, dated May 27, 2008
- Meeting notes of a meeting with Senator Kerry's staff with Ed Gabriel and Jordan Paul, dated May 30, 2007

A final and more complete document should be submitted to you by January 11th, depending on the appointment process to name all national security and foreign policy members in the new administration. Thank you, Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

CONGRESSIONAL MEETING NOTES

Date: May 30, 2007

Submitted by: Jordan Paul

Place: RSOB

Member of Congress: Sen. Kerry

Names of Participants: Frank Lowenstein (Foreign Policy Advisor for Sen. Kerry), Amb. Mekouar, Ed Gabriel, Jordan Paul

Synopsis of remarks, including Q&A:

Frank Lowenstein began the meeting by saying that this was his first meeting on the subject. The Ambassador then said he would start at the beginning. The Ambassador took about 15 minutes to outline the history of the region from before Spanish Colonization through Baker II. Ed then reviewed how the Clinton Administration and subsequently the George W. Bush Administration had pushed Morocco to offer the autonomy proposal as a compromise to end the 30-year problem. Ed further explained how Congressional support was critical to solving this issue and showed Frank a copy of the 173 signature letter. Ed also previewed the VIP letter to be released on June 6, 2007. Frank was impressed with both letters and said that this sounded like a fairly cutand-dried issue.

Ed said that the most recent terrorist attacks in North Africa, attributed to the rise of AQM, made it an even better issue for Sen. Kerry. Frank then asked what Senator Kerry could do to help to bring the issue to a satisfactory resolution. Ed replied that we were looking for letter of support from the Foreign Relations committee. Then, Ed mentioned that we had briefed other members of the Committee, including Lugar, Biden, Coleman, and Cardin. He said that we had received general support, but that we also had some detractors that Frank should know about.

Ed explained that Kennedy, Leahy, Feingold, and Inhofe were generally against us on this issue – though Feingold appeared to be more pragmatic. Frank said that he was glad that we mentioned this. He then asked us why the three Democrats didn't see this issue our way (he wasn't concerned about Sen. Inhofe). Ed said that it varied from member to member but that human rights and the issue of self-determination were the primary reasons. Ed went on to explain Morocco's serious efforts to curb human rights abuses were the best in the Arab world but that abuses, unfortunately, still continued. Ed mentioned that he genuinely saw the glass as half full and that he would bet on Morocco to follow through on their serious reforms. Ed mentioned the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. The Ambassador then defended Morocco's human rights record and blamed the recent events on the Polisario intentionally inciting the Moroccan security forces.

Frank said that he was very glad that we had brought this to our attention. He mentioned that he would discuss the possibility of a letter and that he thought it was something that Sen. Kerry would be willing to do.

Responses/Observations:

From Ed, "Meeting with Frank Lowenstein of Kerry staff was productive."

From Jordan Paul: it was a very long and productive meeting. Frank now has the full picture of Western Sahara as the issue relates to Congress.

Follow-up Actions: Keep Frank informed of latest developments and press him on the letter from the Senate.

Obama Foreign Policy Overview

Regardless of who will occupy the top diplomatic posts in the second Obama Administration, it is likely that most current policies will continue unless events overseas demand a readjustment. The Obama Doctrine of collaboration, negotiation, and multilateralism will continue in a second Administration. As analysts point out, presidents do not simply change their entire agenda or their personalities once they have been re-elected. Aaron David Miller, in an article in Foreign Policy, referred to the belief that presidents would suddenly adopt an entirely new approach to international relations as "The Second-Term Illusion."

When talking about the potential next term, Administration foreign policy officials mention the so-called "pivot" toward the Pacific. The Obama Administration has already sought to strengthen economic and military relations with Burma, Vietnam, the Philippines, and Thailand. Obama has also announced the stationing of Marines in Australia. Emerging and seriously conflictual problems related to competing claims to territorial waters in the South China Sea are likely to require senior policy attention early on in the next Administration. Additionally, there has been a renewed focus in recent months on developments in Europe, where the continuing financial crisis is beginning to require the kind of attention that the Obama Administration has only marginally addressed until recently.

In terms of foreign policy initiatives that require Congressional approval, Obama will quickly come to the realization that term limits are cruel to second term presidents. His best opportunities will come in 2013 and, even then, the likely GOP-controlled House and gridlocked Senate will prove to be formidable obstacles. The middle of 2014, upcoming Congressional elections, and the beginning of the 2016 presidential campaign will weaken him even more on Capitol Hill. Given the polarized environment, the likelihood of a closely divided Congress, and a probably narrow margin of victory for Obama should he win, it is highly unlikely that Obama would make any huge shifts in his foreign policy philosophy in his second term.

Key Personnel in a Second Obama Administration

Frequently, there is a substantial turnover in important senior positions in a second Administration as officials use the opportunity to transition back to (or into) the private sector where they can turn their recent government experience into advantages for themselves and their new private sector role. Even if this brings no wholesale change in policy directions or guiding philosophy, new officials inevitably attempt to put their own stamp, style, and preferences into play, and that sometimes results in significant changes, even on some key issues.

Secretary of State

Secretary Clinton will retire on or before January 20th. President Obama has nominated Sen. John Kerry to be the next secretary of state.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman John Kerry (D-MA) appears to be the first choice of Secretary Clinton, which would help explain why she has sent him on so many diplomatic missions around the world. Although his appointment would create a Democratic vacancy in the Senate, Democrats feel they would be able to hold on to that seat. Kerry has been neutral towards Morocco as Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. However, he is the product of the more liberal wing of the Democratic Party foreign policy community that has historically been critical of Morocco on issues like human rights. As the Senator from Massachusetts, Senator Kerry will certainly be aware of the RFK center and Kerry Kennedy. He was also a close associate of Senator Ted Kennedy and often deferred to the "Kennedy" policy opinions.

Biography

John Kerry was born on December 11, 1943 at Fitzsimons Army Hospital in Aurora, Colorado. Not long after Kerry was born, his family returned home to Massachusetts, where his parents, Richard and Rosemary, taught him the values of service and responsibility and the blessings of his Catholic faith, lessons he carries with him to this day.

As he was graduating from Yale University, John Kerry volunteered to serve in the United States Navy, because, as he later said, "it was the right thing to do." Lt. Kerry served two tours of duty in Vietnam. On his second tour, he volunteered to serve on a Swift Boat in the river deltas, one of the most dangerous assignments of the war. He was decorated with a Silver Star, a Bronze Star with Combat V, and three Purple Hearts.

When he came home to the United States, John Kerry spoke out against a policy he felt gave politicians political cover while soldiers bore the real burden. He also began a lifelong fight for his fellow veterans – joining with other vets to found the Vietnam Veterans of America to fight for veterans' benefits, for extension of the G.I. Bill for Higher Education, and for treatment of PTSD.

Later, John Kerry accepted another tour of duty - to serve in America's communities. After graduating from Boston College Law School in 1976, he went to work as a top prosecutor in Middlesex County, Massachusetts. He took on organized crime, fought for victims' rights and created programs for rape counseling.

John Kerry was elected Lieutenant Governor in 1982. Two years later, he was elected to the United States Senate and he has won reelection four-times since. He is now serving his fifth term.

John Kerry entered the Senate with a reputation as a man of conviction. He helped provide health insurance for millions of low-income children. He has fought to improve public education, protect our natural environment, and strengthen our economy.

From his ground-breaking work on the Iran-Contra scandal to his leadership on global AIDS, John Kerry has distinguished himself as one of our nation's most respected voices on national security and international affairs. As chairman of the Senate Select Committee on POW/MIA Affairs, he worked to learn the truth about American soldiers missing in Vietnam and to normalize relations with that country. As the ranking Democrat on the East Asian and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee, he is a leading expert on that region, including North Korea. He worked on a bipartisan basis to craft the American response to September 11th and has been a leading voice on American policy in Iraq and Afghanistan, the war on terrorism, the Middle East peace process and Israel's security.

In 2002, John Kerry announced that he would be a candidate for president of the United States -- and he went on to mount a come from behind campaign that won the Democratic nomination, and was nearly elected President in a close contest against a wartime president. (NOTE: Ambassador Gabriel was on Senator Kerry's Presidential Election Committee and served as a surrogate for both Senator and Mrs. Kerry to the Arab American community, and escorted Mrs. Kerry to a number of political functions.)

Kerry returned to the Senate, where today he continues fighting for what motivated him to enter public life in the first place: love of country. He is the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the very committee he testified before in 1971 as a veteran pushing for an end to the Vietnam War. Under Kerry's leadership, the committee is addressing the key foreign policy and national security issues facing the United States including Afghanistan and Pakistan, nuclear nonproliferation, and global climate change.

Today, Senator Kerry is the tenth most senior Senator and the second longest serving Senator in his seat. He also holds senior positions on the Finance, Commerce, and Small Business Committees.

Relationship with Hillary Clinton

"Kerry, who is rumored to be Clinton's choice to follow her to the State Department, is widely respected on the international stage and currently chairs the Senate Foreign Relations Committee"

Rumors have it that if Hillary had to choose between Rice and U.S. Sen. John Kerry, who is head of the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee, she would prefer Kerry.

"Hillary is not close to Rice, who is tough — but is not the friendliest person," said a top White House source. "And Hillary's brief comment recently that Rice had done 'a great job' was considered underwhelming and tepid," the source added.

Issues

Kerry is a strong supporter of abortion rights. During the Bush years, he refused to support the appointment of a Supreme Court justice who would overturn Roe v. Wade while the court was 5-4.

Middle East:

Kerry is one of the most pro-Israel senators. A Kerry nomination for Secretary of State would be a nomination for strengthening the U.S.-Israel partnership.

Like virtually every person in Washington, John Kerry feels that the Iranian nuclear program is a menace to regional stability. However, he is opposed to 'saber rattling' and represents the standard Beltway consensus on Iran: Voted against designating the Iranian Revolutionary Guards a terrorist organization, siding with Democrats who dubbed it needlessly antagonistic. He helped unanimously pass severe sanctions on Iran, the same ones described by Vice President Joe Biden as the toughest in history.

As quoted in the New York Times, "Some close to the administration have even called this emerging American relationship with the Brotherhood a first step toward a pattern that could take shape with the Islamist parties' coming to power around the region in the aftermath of the uprisings of the Arab Spring. Islamists have taken important roles in Morocco, Libya, Tunisia and Egypt in less than a year. "You're certainly going to have to figure out how to deal with democratic governments that don't espouse every policy or value you have," said Senator John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who is chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and recently joined with the ambassador to Egypt, Anne W. Patterson, for a meeting with top leaders of the Brotherhood's political party."

In a speech at Johns Hopkins SAIS in 2007 he said: "NATO should reach out to Muslim partners in the Mediterranean Dialogue—countries like Algeria, Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, and Tunisia."

During a 2011 speech at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, he identified Morocco as one of the countries that has responded to the imperative for immediate reform, praising King Mohammed VI's decision to conduct a popular referendum on proposed constitutional amendments. <http://www.carnegieendowment.org/2011/03/16/senator-john-kerry-on-u.s.-policy-toward-middle-east/1fd>

Kennedy Connection

In 1962, Senator Kerry was a volunteer for Ted Kennedy's first Senatorial campaign. The summer after his graduation from St. Paul's, he dated Janet Jennings Auchincloss, First Lady Jacqueline Kennedy's half-sister. Auchincloss invited Kerry to visit her family's estate, Hammersmith Farm, in Rhode Island, where Kerry met President John F. Kennedy for the first time. According to Kerry, when he told the president he was about to enter Yale University, Kennedy grimaced, because he had gone to rival Harvard University. Kerry later recalled, "He smiled at me, laughed and said: 'Oh, don't worry about it. You know I'm a Yale man too now. '" According to Kerry "The President uttered that famous comment about how he had the best of two worlds now: a Harvard education and Yale degree", in reference to the honorary degree he had received from Yale a few months earlier.

Kerry appeared at RFK event on LGBT rights in Uganda

In November of 2011, John Kerry presented Ugandan LGBTI Rights Activist Frank Mugisha with the 2011 Robert F. Kennedy Human Rights Award in the Kennedy Caucus Room. In his remarks, Kerry praised Mugisha for his fight for gay, lesbian, transgender and bisexual rights. He also praised the Kennedy Center for its unwavering fight against discrimination and injustice.

Video: <http://rfkcenter.org/videos-remarks-by-frank-mugisha-sen-john-kerry-and-kerry-kennedy>

He also Authored article w/ Kerry Kennedy (and others) for Politico: Protection for women a top foreign policy priority. The article reported that a bipartisan coalition, led by Sens. John Kerry (D-Mass.), Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) in the Senate and Congressmen Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.) and Ted Poe (R-Texas) in the House, had introduced the International Violence Against Women Act (IVAWA). Introduction of this bill supports the efforts of President Obama and Secretary Clinton to rightly put women at the very center of a broad global security agenda that factors in the great challenges of our decade and invests in the world's peacemakers.

John Kerry was very close with Ted Kennedy during his time in the Senate until Kennedy's death.

The New REPUBLIC

Published on The New Republic (<http://www.tnr.com>)

What Will Secretary of State John Kerry's Foreign Policy Look Like?

Molly Redden

December 17, 2012 | 1:15 pm

After the GOP embarrassed Susan Rice out of the running, ABC News reported on Saturday that Obama will nominate Sen. John Kerry to succeed Hillary Clinton as Secretary of State. Kerry, who chairs the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, brings with him a long record on foreign policy—and a little dirty laundry. Below is a collection of his statements and stances on recent foreign policy crises.

Syria

Before Syria's Bashar al-Assad began killing thousands of civilians, Sen. Kerry counted himself among the foreign policy minds hoping that Assad would prove a reformer. To that end, he and Assad had multiple discussions that left Kerry feeling optimistic. In April 2010, he called Syria “an essential player in bringing peace and stability to the region.” In March 2011, he said, “President Assad has been very generous with me in terms of the discussions we have had. ... So my judgment is that Syria will move; Syria will change, as it embraces a legitimate relationship with the United States and the West.” Kerry urged moderation at the start of the Syrian war; however, he has since called for discussing safe zones and arming the Syrian opposition.

Libya

In 2011, Kerry was one of the leading voices urging a no-fly zone over Libya while White House officials were still skeptical. Speaking to the Foreign Relations Committee, he said, “The international community cannot simply watch from the sidelines as this quest for democracy is met with raw violence. ... The Security Council should act now, in my judgment, to heed the Arab League's call.” He also called for nations to turn over billions in frozen Libyan assets to the rebels fighting to oust Quaddafi.

Environment

Kerry, long an advocate for the U.S. to lead on climate change prevention, has compared the threat posed by poor international effort to confront climate change to that of war. In an August speech on the Senate floor, he said, “We all know what's happening with respect to Iran, and nuclear weapons and the possibility even of a war. ... This issue actually is of as significant a level of importance, because it affects life itself on the planet. Because it affects ecosystems on which the oceans and the land depend.” As National Journal's Coral Davenport points out, “He was the only U.S. senator to attend key UN climate-change negotiations in Bali, Indonesia, in 2007, and Poznan, Poland, in 2008.”

China

Earlier this year, Kerry led a crusade to shame China over its theft of American companies' trade secrets and intellectual property. The victims of this practice included a Massachusetts wind-energy corporation that lost the majority of its business when a Chinese firm stole its most prized technology. Kerry explained, “It’s a very clear and, in our judgment, egregious, palpable demonstration of the practice that we are deeply concerned about, but it’s not the only one. There are so many things: cyberattacks, access-to-market issues, espionage, theft. These are major points of discussion between us and China.”

Afghanistan

Kerry outlined his thoughts on the end of the war in Afghanistan in a May 2011 hearing: “Despite the tremendous skill and sacrifice of our troops, there is no purely military victory to be had in Afghanistan. What we face is a political resolution. ... Our reintegration efforts have had limited impact so far. Reconciliation is more promising in the long run, but it will not be fast and it won’t be a silver bullet. ... Still, some Taliban appear willing to negotiate, so the United States must send a strong and consistent message that we support a political solution led by the Afghans.” Shortly afterwards, he called for the president to speed up the troop drawdown.

Benghazi

In the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks in Benghazi that killed Ambassador Christopher Stevens, Kerry sent a private inquiry to the State Department seeking information about the circumstances of the attacks. But he loudly objected to GOP politicization of the issue: “My view is that the people of the United States understand that when there is a tragedy that involves the loss of life in an embassy ... you bond together as a country, and you don't make it a political football. I don't remember a political football when 3,000 people died about 40 miles away from here and you had 9/11. ... The president called it an act of terror immediately. Everyone understands what happened. There's no secret here.”

PolicyMic

John Kerry Secretary of State Nomination What it Means for America

President Obama has decided to nominate Massachusetts Senator and 2004 presidential candidate John Kerry to be Hillary Clinton's successor as Secretary of State, and will make the announcement next week — according to an anonymous Democrat who spoke with CNN on Saturday.

The revelation follows the withdrawal of U.N. Ambassador Susan Rice from the nomination process. Rice was criticized for statements she made following the attack on the American consulate in Benghazi, Libya, as well as for her "aggressive personality."

Kerry is considered one of the strongest remaining choices for the position, "noted for the experience, gravitas and relationship-building" which he brings to the role. Notably, he recently traveled to Pakistan following the raid that killed Osama bin Laden, and has traveled the globe on behalf of the United States to bolster the Obama administration's relationship with key foreign leaders.

The only thing we can say with 100% certainty is that Kerry is not using his potential Secretary of State nomination to build up his resume for president.

So just where is John Kerry on the issues, and what role will he play in an Obama administration?

1. Climate Change: Secretary Kerry would likely make climate change a primary focus of the next four years in international relations. He has already made a reputation as one of the Senate's biggest climate hawks, and supports comprehensive international action to reverse global warming. Much of the chatter around his nomination reflects a debate on his commitment to elevating climate change as a foreign policy priority for this and subsequent administrations. E&E Daily claims Kerry will make this the "banner issue" of his term:

- Kerry would push China to join the U.S. in taking a long-term leadership role on Climate Change.
- Co-sponsored, with Sen. Joe Lieberman, cap-and-trade legislation.
- Believes climate change is "biggest long term threat" to security.
- Reportedly one of the most knowledgeable senators on the science and diplomacy of climate change.
- Prioritized action on the Law of the Sea treaty that addresses melting polar ice caps.
- In 2007, wrote This Moment on Earth: Today's New Environmentalists and Their Vision for the Future with his wife, Theresa.

Should we expect a major reversal of the U.S.' longstanding opposition to signing major climate change and CO₂ reduction treaties? Unclear. While Kerry is personally committed to the issue, whether or not American policy undergoes major changes will depend on what amount of time and effort the Obama administration is willing to sink into talks. That is doubtful.

2. War on Drugs: Kerry is slightly more liberal than other members of the Obama team on marijuana legalization, but leans conservative on other drugs. With Rahm Emanuel gone and Hillary Clinton planning on leaving the administration, Kerry may be a good choice to help the president transition to a more relaxed stance on the recent Colorado/Washington marijuana legalization laws, but do not expect him to be an opponent of the Drug War in general:

- Kerry admits to smoking marijuana in the past (come on, he's from Massachusetts).
- Mild support for removing criminal penalties on the possession or use of small amounts of weed, as well as similarly tepid support for medical marijuana. No particular courage on this issue.
- In favor of barring convicted drug dealers, but not users, from receiving federal loans for education.
- In 2004, tapped anti-drug "zealot" Rand Beers to serve as a security advisor, who supported defoliating the Colombian-Ecuador border and then accused farmers affected by the spraying of having relationships with Colombia's FARC.

Kerry as Secretary of State would likely support aggressive overseas action to fight drug trafficking, as well as efforts to shore up Central and Latin American countries' legal systems in pursuit of more effective anti-drug operations. However, there will be no real change to the status quo.

3. Women's Rights: Kerry is a lifetime social moderate who usually plays to his liberal Massachusetts base on those issues. However, like everything Kerry, he is far from the Senate's most fiery advocate of women's rights, instead taking a safer centre-left position:

- Kerry is a strong supporter of abortion rights. During the Bush years, refused to support the appointment of a Supreme Court justice who would overturn Roe v. Wade while the court was 5-4.
- Catholic who believes life begins at conception, but will not legislate faith.
- Either does not believe in a right to terminate "post-viability" pregnancies, or voted for Tom Daschle's Comprehensive Abortion Ban Act of 1997 as a political move.
- Strong supporter of equal pay for women.
- In 2004, told GQ what he looks for in a woman: Someone who "wears her womanhood. Who knows how to flirt and have fun. Smart. Confident. Has a sense of self. Strong. And obviously sexy and saucy and challenging" (note: PolicyMic does not endorse readers imagining John Kerry with a woman).

What does this mean for the State Department? Kerry would continue Secretary Clinton's assertive programs to assist women internationally. While Secretary Clinton has continually emphasized women's' rights in relation to the Arab Spring and establishment of new democracies in the Middle East, Secretary Kerry's record indicates he will likely make this less of a focus of his diplomatic mission.

4. Economy / Fiscal Cliff: Far from his portrayal in the 2004 campaign, Kerry is no socialist but a rather milquetoast welfare-state liberal. Kerry has supported most major Obama administration policies, including the stimulus and Obamacare, and is a relative moderate who plays to Beltway centrists on this issue, supporting the bipartisan Bowles-Simpson deficit reduction plan (despite its fuzzy math). Again, we see no signs of Kerry leaving safe territory:

- In 2004, Kerry supported raising the minimum wage to $7 (it's now $7.25). This was such a weak and overdue increase that it enjoyed broad political support: in 2006, President Bush endorsed the increase.
- Voted yes on an additional $825 billion for Obama's economic recovery package.
- As a member of the Congressional super-committee on the deficit, accused Americans for Tax Reform's Grover Norquist of acting as a de facto 13th member and thus partially responsible for derailing negotiations.
- Supports the Bowles-Simpson deficit reduction package.
- Blamed Republicans for failing to reach a deal during 2011's debt ceiling negotiations, claiming that Democrats were willing to put serious entitlement reform on the agenda.
- Strong opponent of offshore tax loopholes, and supports efforts to close them by any means possible.

Under Kerry, the U.S. would continue to liaise with organizations such as the International Monetary Fund to assure "confidence" in the U.S.' long-term fiscal stability. A deficit-reduction package signed by a bipartisan committee will doubtless be bragged about to the rest of the world as a model for ending the international financial crisis. He will likely help coordinate efforts to work with international agencies in ending overseas tax loopholes, as well as emphasize that we are getting our fiscal house in order. Kerry will be an excellent pointman in highlighting America's continued financial stability and restoring our international image as a good place to do business. Secretary Kerry will blame continued instability or the inability to finalize a deal on knuckle-dragging Congressional Republicans, minimizing damage to the Obama administration's reputation abroad.

5. Israel: Kerry is one of the most pro-Israel senators. A Kerry nomination for Secretary of State would be a nomination for strengthening the U.S.-Israel partnership. The Senator supports a two-state peace deal, but only if Israel's interests are taken into account foremost:

- After the 2010 raid on a Palestinian aid flotilla, stated that he did not believe Israel was becoming a strategic burden to the United States. Israel "has every right in the world to make certain weapons are not being smuggled in," said Kerry.
- Signed a 1999 resolution expressing opposition to the formation of a Palestinian state. However, in 2009 urged Israel to do more to support a Palestinian state.
- Emphasizes continually a perceived lack of credible Arab or Palestinian bargaining partners.

— Embarrassingly, in 2010 said that Syria's Bashar al-Assad could be a force for change in the conflict. al-Assad is now best known for readying chemical weapons to deploy against a massive insurrection in his country.

Obama selecting Kerry is a clear indication that the U.S.-Israel partnership will continue, and that major concessions to Palestinians are not on the agenda, regardless of the U.N.'s recent recognition of a theoretical Palestinian state.

6. Iran: Like virtually every person in Washington, John Kerry feels that the Iranian nuclear program is a menace to regional stability. However, he is opposed to 'saber rattling' and represents the standard Beltway consensus on Iran:

- Voted against designating the Iranian Revolutionary Guards a terrorist organization, siding with Democrats who dubbed it needlessly antagonistic.
- Helped unanimously pass severe sanctions on Iran, the same ones described by Vice President Joe Biden as the toughest in history.
- Stated in April that he thinks Iranian leaders will act rationally on the discussion of nuclear issues.
- Thinks we can work harder to solidify "common interests" with Iran, including eliminating the Taliban and fighting drug trafficking.
- Says military action on Iran is a last resort after diplomatic possibilities have been exhausted.

7. China: Kerry has a nuanced view of U.S.-Chinese relations, and seems focused on continuing the Obama administration's first-term policy of emphasizing broad commonalities for cooperation and a stable long-term trade relationship.

- Voted in favor of normalizing trade relations with China, but voted against an amendment tying this request to Congressional oversight of human rights issues in that country.
- Does not support transferring clean energy technology to China.
- Said, "I don't think that we're here to rupture [the Chinese-American] relationship. I think we're here to send a message to the Chinese about the urgent need to repair it," speaking in favor of a bill to add new duties on imports from countries with undervalued currencies which infuriated Chinese officials.
- However, says we need to counter China's rise not by fighting, but competing with our own economic resurgence: " ... economics is not war. We can both come out well ahead of where we are now."

Kerry will continue to engage U.S.-Chinese relations as a cooperative, rather than purely competitive effort

CONGRESSIONAL MEETING NOTES

Date: May 27, 2008

Submitted by: Jordan Paul

Member of Congress: Sen. Kerry

Names of Participants: Frank Lowenstein (Sr. Foreign Policy Advisor), Jordan Paul

Subject of Meeting: Western Sahara Negotiations Update, Senate Letter

Synopsis of remarks, including Q&A:

Jordan gave Frank the update on the negotiations and the one year extension of the MINURSO mandate. They discussed Peter Van Walsum's call for realistic negotiations based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty and the U.S. endorsement of this position. Jordan explained how this was the moment to push to process towards a conclusion and discussed a possible Senate letter.

Frank asked a series of questions about the Western Sahara:

- 1) Is the Western Sahara Moroccan?
- 2) How important is it to U.S.-Morocco Relations?
- 3) What about a referendum?
- 4) What about International Law?

Jordan explained that the land was always Moroccan, except for the period of Spanish colonialism. Jordan explained that several Moroccan dynasties traced their roots back to the Western Sahara. On the issue of importance, Jordan said that it was, far and away, the most important issue in Morocco. It affects the stability of the country and remains the most important international issue for Morocco.

Jordan retold the story about how and why the referendum failed and why the international community, especially the U.S., supported the idea of autonomy. Jordan characterized a return to referendum as a return to a failed idea that would only maintain the status quo and prolong the suffering of those living in the camps. Jordan also discussed the role of international law and how the autonomy plan meets every definition of self-determination and responds to the UN Security Council calls for proposals from the parties to facilitate a negotiated political solution.

Jordan segued back into why now is the best time for a Senate letter and described our efforts in the Senate over the past few weeks (Lugar, Biden, Kerry, Coleman, et al). Frank said that the committee generally worked by consensus and that we should keep him in the loop as we move forward. Frank's last line was that he supported moving the process forward.

Responses/Observations:

The meeting with Kerry's staffer Frank Lowenstein was productive but he did not commit to supporting a Senate letter. He seems to support the Moroccan position, but he is friends with Gare Smith (head lobbyist at Foley Hoag for Algeria). Frank's father-in-law is also a partner at Foley-Hoag.

My feeling is that Frank's head is probably with Morocco but he would rather sit on the sidelines and remain neutral.

Follow-up Actions: Keep Frank informed of any significant development concerning a potential Senate letter.

Favorable to Morocco: See Notes

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, January 04, 2013 10:01 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS source report

According to one of its members, Polisario's National Secretariat will be meeting over a period of several days as of January 5 to draw up a programme of activities for the Saharawi national liberation movement for 2013. The National Secretariat will in particular be looking at what initiatives might be taken to counter Morocco's manoeuvres in its present capacity as a non-permanent member of the UN Security Council. According to the National Secretariat member, Polisario's top leadership – in fact a semi-formal committee made up of five top officials, namely General Secretary Mohamed Abdelaziz, SADR Foreign Minister Mohamed Salem Ould Salek, SADR Defence Minister Lamine Bouhali, SADR Prime Minister Abdelkader Taleb Oumar and Speaker of the Saharawi National Council Khatri Adouh – is convinced that the cause of Saharan independence will over the coming year face diplomatic problems and attempts by Morocco to weaken the UN's intervention, including via MINURSO. The determining factor, however, will be the struggle of the Saharawis of the interior, concludes the National Secretariat member.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, January 15, 2013 3:10 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Blog Monitoring January Week 1

Blog Name	Update Title/Date	Summary	Comments	Respond?
Magharebia	M20F rallies in Rabat Dec. 24, 2012	Morocco's February 20 Movement (M20F) rallied in Rabat on Sunday (December 23rd). "We are here to demand the liberation of Driss Bouterrada and the release of all the political prisoners," Moroccan Association of Human Rights (AMDH) chief Khadija Ryadi told AFP. While Bouterrada was arrested December 10th on drug trafficking charges, Ryadi claims that he is being prosecuted for his links to the M20F group.	0
Magharebia	Morocco dismantles AQIM cell Dec. 26, 2012	Moroccan judicial police broke up an al-Qaeda cell in Fez, MAP reported on Tuesday (December 25th). The aim of the six-member cell was to "enrol and recruit young Moroccans who have embraced jihadist ideas, in order to send them to al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) camps", AFP quoted the interior ministry as saying in a statement.	0
Magharebia	Maghreb countries to launch joint university Dec. 27, 2012	A "new pan-Maghreb university and science academy will soon be established" said Libyan Education Minister Mohamed al-Faitouri Soualem on Wednesday (December 26th) in Rabat. Education ministers from Algeria, Libya, Mauritania, Morocco and Tunisia discussed ways to harmonize basic education methods and facilitate student and teacher mobility in the Maghreb.	0
Magharebia	Marrakech opens cybercrime lab Dec. 28, 2012	Moroccan police forces opened their latest laboratory to fight cybercrime in Marrakech, MAP reported on Thursday (December 27th). Facilities with anti-cybercrime labs are already open in Rabat, Casablanca and Fes. The new Marrakech establishment will also cover the regions of Agadir, Laayoune and Safi.	0
Magharebia	Moroccan police arrest 30 protestors Dec. 30, 2012	Demonstrators protesting against rising prices of water and electricity clashed with police in Marrakech. Thirty people were arrested for organizing an unauthorized demonstration," the ministry statement said, adding that these people committed "acts of violence and vandalism" and threw stones at law enforcement officers and citizens.
Magharebia	USFP to challenge Morocco	The new first secretary of Morocco's Socialist Union of Popular Forces (USFP) wants to take on the conservative movement by creating a left-wing	0

	_conservatives Dec. 30, 2012	alliance. Since his election as head of the USFP on December 16th, Driss Lachguer has repeatedly told the media of his party's intention to form an alliance to counter the rise of "conservative and backward trend".
Magharebia	Moroccan police accused of assaulting MP Jan. 2, 2013	Controversy rocked Morocco when law enforcement officers allegedly beat up Abdesamad El Idrissi, an MP of the PJD, while breaking up a demonstration staged by unemployed graduates in Rabat last week. The young MP intervened during Thursday's protest to ask police officers to release a young unemployed graduate who had been assaulted and arrested by law enforcement officers.	0
Magharebia	Morocco counters extremism with culture Jan. 3, 2013	According to Culture Minister Amine Sbihi "Extremists should be tackled not only directly by the authorities, but also by instilling the country's values in young people. This will protect them against the extremist thinking that is spread everywhere, in particular by certain satellite channels". For 2013, Morocco has allocated 571 million dirhams (52 million euros) for the culture ministry, including 217 million dirhams solely for investment purposes. A new community-based strategy includes the opening of fifteen new arts centers, three conservatories, two theaters, and 15 new culture centers to be run in partnership with local authorities.	1
Magharebia	Moroccan MP arrested for corruption Jan. 6, 2013	A Moroccan MP in the Chamber of Counselors was arrested on corruption charges last week in Kenitra after being caught red-handed taking a bribe of 200,000 dirhams.	0
Magharebia	Morocco literacy project reaches milestone Jan. 8, 2013	More than 6 million Moroccans have benefited from literacy programs over the last decade, according to figures unveiled last month. "Some 735,000 people benefited from literacy programmes from 2011 to 2012. This is a record for the past ten years," Illiteracy Eradication Directorate (DLCA) head El Habib Nadir said at a Marrakech press conference on December 16th. Morocco won an honorable mention at the 2012 UNESCO Confucius Prize for its efforts, especially projects aimed at helping women become more independent through literacy.	0
Magharebia	Young Moroccans discuss 2013 wish list Jan. 11, 2013	Young people say they desire a more effective and transparent government to solve the crisis of unemployed graduates in 2013. Politics and corruption must be cleaned up, and there should be an expansion of resources for young people to develop their artistic and athletic talents, Magharebia heard from several young Moroccans.	0
Carnegie Endowment for International	Morocco's Engagement with the Sahel	This piece discusses the possibility of resuscitating the Community of Sahel-Saharan States. The author writes that only Morocco has the "the spur, stature, and stability to lead it."	0

Peace	Community Jan. 3, 2013
UPI	U.S. oil company latest to move on Morocco Jan. 3, 2013	U.S. company Plains Exploration and Production said it aims to start drilling in a highly promising area off the coast of Morocco. The company said it plans to drill at least two wells in the area by 2014.	0
Tax News	Morocco's Parliament Backs 2013 Finance Bill Jan. 3, 2013	Morocco's 2013 finance bill levies higher "solidarity" taxes on top earners and on companies earning large profits to benefit the poor. Revenues from the solidarity taxes are to flow to a support fund for "social cohesion." The 2013 finance bill provides for a projected economic growth rate of 4.5 percent.	0
FreshPlaza	Morocco: Citrus export down 22% Jan. 3, 2013	The Moroccan citrus export is a lot lower than expected this season, mainly due to the cold weather during the blooming period.	0
Lakome	Sahara : Al Jazeera met Rabat à l'épreuve Sahara: Al Jazeera puts Rabat to the test Jan. 3, 2013	On Jan. 3, Al Jazeera published an article heavily criticizing Morocco's Western Sahara policy only weeks after receiving permission to reopen in Rabat. Written by Tom Stevenson in Laayoune, the article describes the Saharan conflict emphasizing rights for the Sahrawi victims. The article draws parallels to the Israeli - Palestinian conflict stating that "Both involve the departure of former colonial powers, the arrival of external forces, the supposed repression of the local population and to maintain the status quo of the permanent members of the Security Council of the UN." Translated from French to English	0
TIME	Is Marrakech's Westernized Female Mayor a Real Figure for Change? Jan. 4, 2013	This piece is about the 37 year old female mayor of Marrakech. Many observers believe the fact that Ms. Mansouri has been elected demonstrates how progressive the country has become; others believe she is merely a puppet controlled by male advisers.	0
Reuters	Morocco says may launch subsidies reform in June Jan. 5, 2013	In a step supported by the International Monetary Fund, the government now aims to repair its finances by reducing subsidies and shifting the focus of spending to the poorest Moroccans.	0
Reuters	Morocco to	Morocco plans structural reform of its state pension	0

	reform state pension system. PM says Jan. 10, 2013	system during the five-year term of the current government, including an increase in the retirement age, Prime Minister Abdelillah Benkirane said.
Al Arabiya	Islamist ally wants more woman ministers in Morocco Jan. 5, 2013	The head of Morocco's Istiqlal (Independence) party, the main ally of the ruling Islamists, has asked for a cabinet reshuffle, saying 20 percent of ministers should be women, media reports said on Friday. "The reshuffle is an opportunity to inject new blood... and increase the representation of women to 20 percent," Hamid Chabat said in an official request to the head of the government which was published in local media. The current government led by the head of the Justice and Development Party, Abdelillah Benkirane, has only one female minister in the 31-member cabinet, in charge of family affairs.	0
Al Jazeera	Inside disputed Western Sahara Jan. 7, 2013	Sahrawis complain of abuses and say the international community has ignored their plight under Moroccan rule. MINURSO has limited jurisdiction and is insufficiently staffed. In April, Amnesty International reported that: "Sahrawis advocating self-determination for the people of Western Sahara remained subject to restrictions on their freedoms of expression, association and assembly, and leading activists continued to face prosecution."	114
News24	Morocco rapper gets "integrity" prize Jan. 6, 2013	Transparency Morocco awarded jailed Moroccan rapper Mouad Belghouat (known as "Al-Haqed") its "Integrity Prize" for his efforts towards creating an "integrated and transparent society." He is considered a public face of the February 20 Movement.	1
North Africa Post	Morocco Elected Chair of Security Council's Counter-Terrorism Committee Jan. 7, 2013	Morocco has been elected chair of both the UNSC's Counter-Terrorism Committee, which supports member states' legal and institutional abilities to combat terrorism, and a Working Group tasked with examining practical measures to be taken against groups and individuals involved in terrorism. In the coming year, the UNSC will focus on counter-terrorism and peacekeeping missions. The article concludes with a brief biography of Mohammed Loulichki, Morocco's permanent representative to the UN.	0
Middle East Online	Morocco's Justice and Charity 'ready to form party' Jan. 8, 2013	A top member Morocco's banned Justice and Charity Party has declared that the party is willing to submit a request to formally become a political party. However, as a result of Justice and Charity's refusal to accept the King as the commander of the faithful, he does not believe that any such request will be accepted.	0
Middle East Online	Morocco reduces jail terms for 5	Five members of the "February 20" protest movement saw their sentences reduced on Wednesday to six months. Human Rights Watch had condemned the	0

	'February 20' activists Jan. 10, 2013	original trial process, citing claims by the defendants that they were tortured into signing false confessions, while the UN special rapporteur on torture last year criticized Morocco's harsh treatment of protesters.
I'Humanite.fr	Sahara occidental : Mohammed VI, le monarque qui viole les droits humains Western Sahara: Mohammed VI, the monarch who violates human rights Jan. 8, 2013	This piece is very critical of the state of human rights in the Western Sahara and refers to the king as "the executioner of the Saharawi people."	0
All Africa	Morocco: French NGO Calls On Hollande to Address Situation of Saharawi Prisoners in Local Jails Jan. 10, 2013	Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic's Friends Association (AARASD) called on French President François Hollande to "pay attention" to the situation of 23 political prisoners in the Moroccan jail of Sale, and whose trial is to be held on February 1. Regine Villemon, president of the AARASD, called on Hollande to exert pressure in favor of the Saharawis at meetings during his upcoming official visit to Morocco.	0
The Daily Star Lebanon	A new role for Morocco in North Africa? Jan. 11, 2013	This article explains why leading the CEN-SAD (Community of Sahel-Saharan States) would be highly profitable to Morocco. In addition to setting the agenda for regional security talks, it could exercise heretofore untapped soft power potential.	0
The View from Fez	HM the King Pardons 413 Convicts On Independence Manifesto Day Jan. 11, 2013	HM King Mohammed VI pardoned 413 convicts on the occasion of the Manifesto Independence Day, celebrated on 11 January, the Justice and Liberties Ministry said in a statement. 299 criminals had their prison sentences or imprisonment reduced. One inmate's life sentence was commuted to a limited prison term. Imprisonment sentences were pardoned and fines imposed for 10 others. Three convicts were granted pardons over their prison sentences and fines, while 60 had their fines annulled.	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, January 15, 2013 5:50 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Twitter Monitoring January Week 1

Update Name/ Date	Summary
La réforme de la caisse de compensation est-ce un remède indispensable à la hausse des dépenses publiques? Reform of entitlements is an critical remedy for public debt? Jan. 8, 2013	According to Najib Boulif, Minister in charge of general affairs and governance, reform of entitlements is ready and will be implemented in the coming months. It will reduce public expenditure by 24 billion dirhams, thereby reducing public debt and encouraging investment. The government plans to maintain assistance only to the lowest income group, defined as earning 1000 dirhams or less per month.
Maroc : Le Club des magistrats s'oppose au ministère de l'Intérieur sur le contrôle des élections Morocco: The Moroccan Magistrates' Club clashes with the Ministry of the Interior over the control of elections Jan. 8, 2013	The Moroccan Magistrates' Club, an organization of Moroccan judges devoted to the separation of executive power from the judiciary, has made demands for the control of elections to be shifted from the Ministry of the Interior to an independent judiciary, in order to combat perceived corruption in the governmental control of elections. The demand is unlikely to be met, but serves the purpose of reopening the debate on the necessity of an independent body overseeing elections.
Clôture à Tanger de la 3ème réunion des chambres de commerce et d'industrie arabo-africaines A closure to Tangier's 3rd reunion of the Arab- African	This two day meeting aimed to establish an investment and trade partnership between African and Arab countries, as well as identifying obstacles and constraints to the development of economic cooperation. Participants examined various ways to promote Arab-African investment, increase the volume of trade between parties and focus on the promotion and strengthening of relations between the Chambers of Commerce, Industry and Agriculture. They also called for the disbanding of trade barriers.

Chambers of Commerce and Industry Jan. 9, 2013
Tanger se confirme en tant que deuxième pôle économique du Maroc Tangier is confirmed as the second economic center of Morocco Jan. 9, 2013	The triangle between Tangier, Tanger Med port and Tetouan has become the economic showcase of Morocco with a series of industrial areas served by a highway, ultra modern port, railroad and in a couple of years by TGV. Once constructed, it will make Tangier the first city in Africa to have a TGV.
Au Maroc, un institut va former des « leaders de communauté » catholiques et protestants In Morocco, an institute is being established for Catholic and Protestant "community leaders" Jan. 10, 2013	Al Mowafaqa ("Agreement") Institute has been established in Rabat, Morocco. This project is the product of a partnership between academic Institute Al Mowafaqa, the Catholic Institute of Paris and the Faculty of Protestant Theology of Strasbourg.
Le port de pêche de Laâyoune paralysé Fishing port of Laayoune paralyzed Jan. 10, 2013	A strike by 3,000 fishermen has caused the port of Laayoune to come to a standstill. Their demands include more access to prime fishing areas, reduction of hiring restrictions, and requesting tax exempt status on their haul. They would also like to be allowed legally to catch more octopus.
Un eurodéputé appelle le Danemark à reconnaître la RASD A European deputy calls on Denmark to recognize the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic	Danish MP Soren Sondergaard called on Denmark to recognize Western Sahara as an independent state, according to a press release he made public on Tuesday.

Jan. 10, 2013
Maghreb : Ouverture d'une banque d'investissement commune cette année Maghreb: Opening of a joint investment bank this year Jan. 10, 2013	The Arab Maghreb Union is preparing the establishment of a joint bank. With a starting capital of $ 100 million, the bank will have its headquarters in Tunis.
Manifestation pacifique contre l'occupation marocaine à la ville occupée de Boujdour Peaceful protest against the Moroccan occupation in the occupied city of Boujdour Jan. 10, 2013	On Wednesday a protest occurred in the Western Sahara city of Boujdour which called for the immediate end of Moroccan rule in Western Sahara. The protesters carried SADR flags and chanted slogans for Sahrawi self-determination. According to this article, the protest was brutally dispersed by Moroccan forces.
Maroc : Le PJD rejette une proposition de loi criminalisant tout rapport sexuel avec les mineures - Morocco: The PJD rejected a proposed law criminalizing all sexual relations with minors Jan. 10, 2013	The PJD has rejected a proposed amendment to article 475 of the penal code which would criminalize all sexual relations with minors, in order to counteract the article that states that alleged rapists may avoid jail time if they marry their alleged victims. This amendment had been proposed in response to the highly publicized suicide of Amina Filali last spring.
Des avions militaires et soldats étrangers dépêchés dans le centre du Mali Military airplanes and foreign soldiers	Military aircraft carrying weapons and foreign troops arrived Thursday in Sévaré (central Mali), where the army has an operational command post. No indication, however, had been obtained immediately on the number and origin of these aircraft, weapons and foreign soldiers, one witnesses who mentioned the presence of whites among the soldiers. "I saw a C-160 land with arms and men. Certain men had white skin," said the worker airport Sévaré (650 km north of Bamako). dispatched to central Mali

Jan. 11, 2013

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, January 15, 2013 5:59 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS situation report

This information is from a generally reliable source, but the information contained herein has not been collaborated with third parties.

WESTERN SAHARA / SITUATION REPORT

11/01/13

On January 5, Polisario's National Secretariat – the movement's central committee – convened for its half-yearly meeting at the Shahid El Hafedh camp in Tindouf to assess the events of 2012 and outline plans for the first six months of 2013. Attention was focused on the upcoming 40th anniversaries of the founding of the Polisario Front (May 10) and of the beginning of its armed struggle for the independence of Western Sahara (May 20).

Speaking to us shortly before the National Secretariat meeting, one of its members initially struck an upbeat note, arguing that the double anniversary would provide the opportunity for countless initiatives to raise the profile of and generally re-galvanise the struggle for Saharawi independence. 2013, the National Secretariat member claimed, will be “the year of the Western Sahara” – only to lapse, almost immediately, into a rather more pessimistic tone: with Morocco currently serving as a non-permanent member of the UN Security Council, Polisario's top leadership fears that the cause of Saharawi independence will have trouble making any headway at the UN, where Moroccan manoeuvring may even affect MINURSO and its mission.

Morocco has, of course, been on the UN Security Council for a year already, even holding the rotating presidency in December 2012, and it is by no means clear that this has in and of itself made a qualitative difference to the international community's handling of the Western Sahara issue. After all, despite the fact that the Moroccan authorities very publicly withdrew their confidence in him last spring, Christopher Ross remains Secretary General Ban Ki-moon's Personal Envoy, suggesting that Rabat's supposedly privileged position does not even give it any added leverage over personnel, never mind policy.

However, Morocco's position at the UN has of late arguably been strengthened to some degree by the election of its Permanent Representative Mohamed Loulichki to chair the Security Council's Counter-Terrorism Committee throughout 2013. If nothing else, this will throw further fuel onto Polisario's smouldering anxiety about being equated with the Islamist armed groups operating out of northern Mali and generally being smeared with the brush of terrorism. Such fears have been voiced on a number of occasions by Polisario officials and activists, and according to a Saharawi journalist who spoke to us in early November the issue was raised explicitly by Polisario's intelligence chief Brahim Ahmed Mahmoud in his meeting with Christopher Ross when the latter visited the Tindouf camps in the autumn. Mahmoud is reported to have presented the UN envoy with “proof” that the Moroccan security services have been trying to discredit Polisario by seeding smuggling and terrorist networks in the Sahel with young Saharawis whom they allegedly control by means of blackmail. With Moroccan and other media periodically bringing up the canard of hordes of Saharawi fighters in the ranks of AQMI (an echo of the much repeated claim that Polisario units were fighting on behalf of the Qaddafi regime in the Libyan conflict of 2011), Polisario spokespeople have been peddling the counter-claim that the AQMI spin-off MUJAO is manipulated by, and may even have been created by, the Moroccan security services^[1] – a rumour that is well on the way to becoming received wisdom in the Algerian media^[2].

At the same time, Polisario's leadership has reason to fear that it may be increasingly marginalised in the coming period due to the approach adopted by Christopher Ross. Reporting to the UN Security Council on November 28, Ross said that he did not believe that convening another round of informal talks (i.e. the continuation of the so-called Manhasset process) would advance the search for a solution to the Western Sahara question, stating his intention of focussing instead on additional consultations with “key international stakeholders”^[3], to be followed at some unspecified date by a round of shuttle diplomacy with the parties and neighbouring states^[4], the ultimate aim of which would be to bring the two parties, Morocco and Polisario, back to the table for formal negotiations (as opposed to “informal contacts”, à la Manhasset).

In essence, Ross appears to be arguing that progress depends on improved relations between Algeria and Morocco. Ironically, in light of his earlier blackballing by Rabat, this is very close to Morocco's long-held position that the Sahara question is an “artificial” conflict created by Algeria that must ultimately be solved by direct negotiations between Rabat and Algiers – and it has been decried as such by the above-quoted Polisario National Secretariat member^[5]. Even as Ross seeks to internationalise the Western Sahara question, Polisario – which had the added disappointment of hearing the spokesman of France's new Socialist government re-state Paris' support for the Moroccan autonomy plan during Ross' visit to the French capital in November – appears to be expecting less and less of the international community. Increasingly, Polisario sources talk of the need for action in the Moroccan-administered territories to keep the cause alive: while the National Secretariat member argues that the “determining factor” in the coming period will be the struggle of the “Saharawis of the interior”, a Polisario cadre attending a meeting of members of the Saharawi community in Europe held in the Paris suburb of les Mureaux on Dec. 29-30, 2012 told us plainly that the Saharawis “will just have to rely on their own strength”, adding that “an intifida is the only way to force the Moroccans to organise a referendum”. 2013 will be “the year of the uprising of the Saharawis living under Moroccan occupation,” proclaimed the same activist.

A senior civil servant at the Algerian Presidency, for his part, concurs that the Western Sahara conflict is likely to be shunted even more firmly into the sidelines in the coming period – but far from advocating a new intifada in the Moroccan-controlled territories to counter this suggests that Polisario and the SADR ought to seek to strengthen their ties with the peoples of the region, “and especially Mauritania”. Speaking to us at the beginning of January, the source argued that Morocco's two year term on the UN Security Council did not give it any particular advantage in the Western Sahara dispute, and was indeed surprisingly positive about Rabat's position at the UN: far from being a problem, Morocco's Security Council membership is, from Algiers' point of view, “a good thing”, he argued, pointing out that Algeria's permanent representative actually voted for the Moroccans when non-permanent members were being selected in October 2011.

Above all, the Algerian senior servant stressed, Algiers has no intention of provoking a crisis in its relations with Morocco, or of letting any such crisis develop in any way, shape or form. On the contrary, the source goes as far as to argue that from Algeria's point of view it is time for “normalisation” with Morocco – because of the gathering storm just over Algeria's southern borders in northern Mali.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
 President and CEO
 The Gabriel Company, LLC
 1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
 Washington DC, 20005
 Phone: +1 202.887.1113
 Fax: +1 202.887.1115
 Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
 Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

-
-
- [1] In July 2012, SADR Foreign Minister Mohamed Salem Ould Salek gave an interview to Italian geopolitical review Limes, reproduced by the official Algérie Presse Service (21/07/12), in which he stated à propos of MUJAO: “There is no doubt that Moroccan occupation of our territories is a destabilising factor. You can’t take it out of my head that Moroccan intelligence services are behind that strange group that formed specifically to kidnap the aid workers. Moroccan intelligence has been trying to destabilise the region since 2005 to reduce humanitarian aid and thus pressure Polisario into accepting political concessions.”
 - [2] For one recent example, see the editorial in French daily El Watan of 23/12/12, in which MUJAO is described as “an association of criminals created by the Moroccan intelligence services, whose only mission it to try to destabilise Algeria.”
 - [3] This is likely to mean, essentially, Spain and France, and perhaps the United States. As part of his tour prior to reporting back to the Security Council in November, Ross chose to visit Madrid and, in their capacity as permanent members of the UN Security Council, the UK, France, the US and Russia.
 - [4] i.e. Algeria and Mauritania.
 - [5] The source was speaking to us privately in early December. Publicly, Polisario's National Secretariat has been careful to restate its confidence in Christopher Ross, describing his tour of the region as a “positive step” in a statement issued after its meeting in early January.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, January 20, 2013 11:22 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Twitter Monitoring January Week 2

FYI

Update Title/Date	Summary
Maroc : Centre de détention secret de Témara, lettre ouverte à Abdelilah Benkirane Morocco: An open letter to Abdelilah Benkirane about the secret prison in Temara Jan. 13, 2013	Ali El Gazi, former DGST (Direction Générale de la Surveillance du Territoire) commissioner, wrote a public letter to PM Benkirane about the existence of a detention center in Temara, a facility which the political class notoriously denies despite the insistence of international NGOs. With the implementation of the new constitution (which emphasizes good governance) Abdelilah urges PM Benkirane to address human rights violations that occur within the "secret" prison walls.
Conseil régional du RNI dans le Grand-Casablanca: La métropole a besoin de trouver des "formules plus innovantes" The regional council of RNI in Casablanca: the city needs to find "more innovative solutions" Jan. 13, 2013	At the regional council of the National Gathering of Independents (French acronym RNI), RNI president Salaheddine Mezour stated that the city's local government was "exhausted" and suffered from an absence of a participative approach. In his words, "We must develop a new vision for expanding the responsibilities of the local collective and giving citizens an opportunity to participate in its management, via decentralization." He suggested taking inspiration from the French model of local government in formulating a new unit system for local government in Moroccan cities.
Safi: 5 ans pour avoir violé 45 femmes! Safi: 5 years for having raped 45 women! Jan. 13, 2013	The Safi court of appeals has sentenced a man to 5 years in prison for having raped 45 women whom he lured to an isolated place under the guise of interviewing cooks for an event he was planning. Upon being arrested, the man reportedly admitted his crimes and showed no remorse, stating that he did it as revenge against his wife, who had left him. Many in the region are angry that he was given such a light sentence.

Parti de l'Istiqlal: Les membres du comité central désignés Istiqlal party: Members of the central committee designated Jan. 13, 2013	The Istiqlal Party had its second official meeting last Friday and Saturday. During the meeting, the party adopted the contents of a note addressed to the members of the majority coalition. Also, Taoufiq Hjira was named president of the National Council, and several members of the central committee were appointed as well. Finally, PI Secretary-General Hamid Chabat delivered a message criticizing the government for the insufficiency of the economic measures it has taken in the past year.
Le Maroc pourrait quitter le MSCI Morocco could leave MSCI Jan. 14, 2013	Given the volatility of the Moroccan stock market in the wake of the global financial crisis, Morocco could be removed from the MSCI Emerging Market index. This could have serious consequences for the Moroccan economy, as it could cause a drop in foreign investments in Morocco.
Halima Assali, future patronne du Mouvement Populaire ? Halima Assali, future head of Mouvement Populaire? Jan. 14, 2013	Halima Assali, who is known as a peacemaker in the Mouvement Populaire party, is likely to be named the new head of the party. Other candidates for this position include Mohamed Ouzzine, Minister of Youth and Sports and Assali's protege.
Chabat cloue au pilori ses détracteurs Chabat hold his critics accountable Jan. 14, 2013	Secretary General of the Istiqlal Party, Hamid Chabat, insisted that his authority over the party is incontestable and that his status will not be challenged. Furthermore, he appointed former Minister of Housing Taoufik Hjira, one of his main supporters, as president of the National Council. Mr. Chabat had unexpectedly strong support during the national council session.
Benabdellah à la majorité: « Assez ! » "Enough!" exclaims Benabdellah to the majority Jan. 16, 2013	PPS Secretary-General Nabil Benabellah believes that the majority of the government is missing two vital qualities: maturity and serenity. He further explains that current climate is full of "artsy scandals" rather than focusing on the sole mission of the government which is representing the "supreme interest of the country". Lastly, he calls for more cohesion within the government stating that "it is unacceptable to put one foot in one area and the other in a different area".
Le parlement USFP est désormais sur pied	Voting for the 300 members to the Administrative Commission took place on Saturday (Jan. 12) in a calm and transparent manner. The president of the IXth Congress of the USFP announced the final outcome on Monday (Jan.14). Women play an important role in the new Administrative Commission as they could potentially gain one third of the total seats.

The USFP Parliament is put in motion Jan. 16, 2013
Benkirane s'entretient avec les ministres maghrébins de la Santé Benkirane meet with Maghreb health ministers Jan. 17, 2013	PM Benkirane met with health ministers from the Arab Maghreb Union in an effort to promote common health policy across the region. The Libyan health minister said, "[p]roblems in this sector are generally the same in all Maghreb countries, it's a situation that requires a concerted effort from all countries in the region to find an appropriate solution."
PJD, UC et RNI vers une nouvelle alliance ? PJD, UC and RNI move towards a new alliance? Jan. 17, 2013	Secretary General of the Istiqlal party, Hamid Chabat, has recently threatened to withdraw his party from the coalition government, so PJD is looking for other potential allies. While the l'Union Constitutionnel (Constitutional Union) party has said it will support whatever the majority party is, Rassemblement Nationale des Independents (National Assembly of Independents) is on record refusing to participate in a PJD-ruled government.
Menouni recoit des représentants des mouvements Fatah et Hamas Menoui receives representatives from Fatah and Hamas Jan. 17, 2013	Advisor of HM King Mohammed VI, Abdellatif Menouni, received representatives from Fatah and Hamas on Wednesday Jan. 16 in Rabat.
Maroc Telecom : 10 milliards prévu pour la modernisation de son infrastructure Maroc Telecom: 10 billion dirhams planned for the modernization of its infrastructure Jan. 17, 2013	Maroc Telecom plans to invest over 10 billion dirhams to modernize its infrastructure through a signed agreement with the government. Morocco Telecom intends to meet "the growing needs of mobile technology and broadband Internet". In order to meet the market demand almost all existing equipment will need to be replaced. This project is expected to create around 500 jobs.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, January 20, 2013 11:26 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring January Week 2

FYI

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel

Blog Name	Article Title/Date	Summary	Comments	Response?
Eurasia Review	Morocco's Nizar Baraka Selected As Best Finance Minister In Middle East – OpEd Jan. 11, 2013	Moroccan finance minister Nizar Baraka has been selected as best finance minister in the Middle East by Banker magazine. Bankers and economic experts were “impressed by the fact that the Moroccan Ministry of Finance presents performance indicators for better implementation of government programs, noting that the restructuring reforms to stimulate growth, investment and boost businesses still ongoing in Morocco.”	1
Magharebia	Algeria denies any Morocco border dispute Jan. 11, 2013	Algerian Foreign Minister Mourad Medelci said Tuesday (January 8th) that his country had “no problem with Morocco”, stating that the two countries could open up talks in the future on the issue of maritime borders, noting that Algeria would work on expanding the recent agreement with Tunisia on maritime borders to include other countries, including Libya, Morocco, Spain and Italy. While he did not mention opening the land border between the two countries, he did state that it is not in dispute.	5
Magharebia	Morocco launches youth volunteer initiative Jan. 13,	Morocco has launched an initiative to train youth in “volunteering and civic education.” The initiative is intended to establish the tradition of civil service and social cohesion in the younger	0

	2013	generation. The government hopes to secure the participation of all government sectors, national foundations, local communes and organizations and associations working with children and youths in this project.
Magharebia	Rabat hosts transitional justice forum Jan. 14, 2013	An international conference on the progress and the prospects of transitional justice opened Monday (January 14th) in Rabat. Representatives from the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, the International Centre for Transitional Justice, and the EU are expected to attend the two-day event.	0
Magharebia	Human development key to Maghreb progress Jan. 14, 2013	Government officials from Tunis, Morocco, Algeria and Mauritania expressed their desire for greater cooperation on human development, with priority given to younger generations. All agree that more should be done to improve the scientific and cultural level of Maghreb human resources in order to speed up development.	0
Magharebia	Maghreb bankers back financial integration Jan. 15, 2013	The economic leg of the Arab Maghreb Union is moving forward following a meeting last week in Nouakchott. Representatives of the IMF, the World Bank and the Islamic Development Bank, along with central bank governors and financial experts from Mauritania, Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya, discussed ideas at the 5th Arab Maghreb Union congress on economic integration.	0
Magharebia	Moroccan rape victim speaks after suicide attempt Jan. 16, 2013	A young Moroccan house maid whose dramatic suicide attempt has revived concerns about violence towards women and child workers spoke to representatives from the National Institution for Solidarity with Women in Distress on Tuesday (January 15th), AFP reported. The 19-year-old woman jumped from the fourth floor of an	0 apartment building in Casablanca. A young man was killed while catching her as she fell. The incident was filmed by a neighbor and posted on the Internet.

Magharebia	Morocco, EU enhance political dialogue Jan. 17, 2013	The seventh session for enhanced political dialogue between Morocco and the European Union opened Wednesday (January 16th) in Rabat, MAP reported. The meeting will reportedly focus on developments in Africa and the Middle East.	0
The View from Fez	Morocco introduces new bank note Jan. 13, 2013	Morocco has issued a new banknote of MAD 25 ($ 2.94). Chadwick Wasilenkoff, President and Chief Executive Officer of Fortress Paper, commented: " I would like to congratulate the Bank al Maghrib on the launch of their new 25 Dirham banknote and being the first in the world to produce and launch these high security Durasafe banknotes." The back of the note carries a print vignette commemorating 25 years of banknote printing at the Moroccan State Printing Works.	0
The View From Fez	High Atlas Rescue Mission Jan. 14, 2013	Moroccans have rallied to support villagers in the High Atlas Mountains, who are struggling to survive in the face of cold winter temperatures. Several tons of food and hundreds of mattresses and blankets were distributed this weekend to inhabitants of remote mountain villages.	0
The View From Fez	Jetairfly Teases With Promises of New Flights to Morocco Jan. 14, 2013	Belgian airline, Jetairfly, has announced that it will be adding new flights to Moroccan destinations - at least for the summer season - but has not disclosed the intended routes.	0
The View from Fez	Ryanair bases in Morocco confirmed	Ryanair is creating its first non-European bases in Fez and Marrakech, the company confirms. Arrangements will begin in April.	0

	Jan. 17, 2013
Jadaliyya	Penser le changement de l'éducation au Maroc : Interview de Nabil Belkabir, membre de l'UECSE Thoughts on changing education in Morocco: Interview with Nabil Belkabir, member of the UECSE Jan. 14, 2013	This article is an interview with a member of the Union of Students for Changing the Educational System (UECSE), a newly formed group of students protesting the Moroccan educational system. According to Belkabir, the Moroccan educational system is "rotten", and is imperiled as the country continues to move towards privatization of education. He particularly criticizes Arabization policies as a failure of the educational system. According to him, the goal of the movement is to organize students and formulate and implement ideas for overhauling the educational system. Translated from French to English	0
Jadaliyya	A New Revolt in Morocco?: An Interview with Mohammed El Marouani Jan. 18, 2013	Mohamed El Marouani is the author of Abdessalam Yassine's funeral oration, who died on 13 December 2012. Sentenced to twenty-five years in prison for "conspiring against state security," El Marouani was released during the wake of the February 20 Movement. He is the founder of the Al Umma, which he hopes to transform into a political party.	0
Prensa Latina	Military Alert in Morocco Facing Events in Mali Jan. 15, 2013	The Moroccan security forces are on high alert amid fears that the actions of Islamic groups in Northern Mali, now attacked by French soldiers, might extend to Moroccan territory.	0
Reuters	Morocco prepares to grasp nettle of subsidy reform Jan. 16, 2013	Morocco's government is preparing to launch its biggest economic policy change in years: reform of the system of food and energy subsidies which it uses to keep down the living costs of millions of people. The reforms are needed to prevent heavy government borrowing from destabilizing	0

		the economy, and "could serve as a model for the governments of other Arab countries."
Worldcrunch	In Morocco, A Call For Polygamy To Reduce Ranks Of Unmarried Women Jan. 16, 2013	Abdesslam El Bouraini, the president of the National Order of Religious Notaries argues: "The median age for marriage increases more and more, while women can't find husbands. So why don't we modify the polygamy law to allow men to marry several women?"	0
All Africa	Morocco: Nation to Boost Growth Through Youth Jobs Jan. 16, 2013	SMEs, entrepreneurship and other youth employment strategies will enhance economic development in Morocco, a government body says.	0
The National	Tenders signal Morocco's initiative on renewable energy Jan. 17, 2013	Morocco is preparing a tender for the second phase of the Quarzazate solar plant after awarding the contract for the 160 megawatt first phase late last year. The new tender will call for a further 300MW worth of solar power capacity. Initial bids will be solicited next month, and the tender will be floated soon after.	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, January 25, 2013 4:47 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring January Week 3

FYI

Blog Name	Update Title/Date	Summary	Comments	Respond?
Al Arabiya	Morocco's only female minister says wearing hijab made her a media target Jan. 19, 2013	Morocco's only female minister claimed that the media has targeted her because she dons the Islamic headscarf, commonly known as the hijab. Minister of Solidarity, Women, Family and Social Development, Bassima Hakkaoui, said since taking office in January 3, 2012, the media attempted to mar her credibility by reporting false news and information about her, such as that her husband has a second wife.	0
Sahara Occidental	The Sahrawi Association of Victims of Grave Human Rights Violations Committed by the Moroccan State El-Aaiun, Western Sahara Jan. 19, 2013	On Tuesday, January 15, 2013, the second day of the international meeting on transitional justice organized by the National Council for Human Rights, Moroccan security forces prevented eighteen Saharawi human rights activists from entering the conference room at the Royal Academy. The Saharawi activists could participate on the first day of the meeting without an invitation. However, "it was during the second day that the Saharawi activists could speak and report the reality of extreme poverty in which their own people are living under the Moroccan occupation and clarify that transitional justice is still far from being in place in Western Sahara" states the author.	0
Electric Light & Power	Masdar and Morocco inks agreement Jan. 21, 2013	Masdar (Abu Dhabi's renewable energy company) announced the signing of a framework agreement with the Ministry of Energy, Mines, Water and Environment of the Kingdom of Morocco that will enable them to have thorough cooperation in the field of renewable energy.	0
All Africa	Morocco: Editor Charged With Defamation in Morocco Jan. 21, 2013	Youssef Jajili, editor-in-chief of the investigative weekly Alaan Magazine, was charged with defamation on Monday in Ain Al-Saba court in Casablanca in connection with a June 22 article about Abdelkader Amara, minister of manufacture and trade in the current Islamic government, news reports said.	0
All Africa	Morocco: Sahel Upheaval Worries Morocco	This article addresses concern felt by Moroccan government officials, Moroccan officials of non-governmental organizations, and Moroccan citizens regarding instability of the Sahel region. Wide-ranging problems include recruitment of young Moroccans to terrorist networks, problems with	0

	Jan. 23, 2013	intelligence sharing, and problems relating to regional integration.
All Africa	Morocco Looks to Revive Tourism Trade Jan. 25, 2013	Morocco is hoping 2013 will be a year of economic recovery for the tourism sector but experts are cautioning the rebound will not be as easy as once thought. "Tourism in Morocco is crucial to the country's economy, as it represents about 7.1% of the gross domestic product," financial analyst Moussa El Mouritani explained. The analyst told Magharebia that reviving the sector this year would be difficult: "The European market represents over 50% of the tourism in Morocco; however that market is still unstable and the economy is having a hard time getting back to its normal pace and normal progression."	0
Wamda	How 3 Women Entrepreneurs are Creating Opportunities in Morocco, Egypt, and Jordan Jan. 22, 2013	This article is about three women entrepreneurs in the MENA region, one of whom is Moroccan. The Moroccan project focuses on rehabilitating educational facilities in depressed areas.	0
Magharebia	North Africa: Morocco Terror Risk Spikes Jan. 18, 2013	This article discussed efforts by AQIM and MUJWA to recruit Moroccans for jihadist projects in the region.	0
Magharebia	Morocco dismantles terror recruitment cell Jan. 20, 2013	The Moroccan judicial police and the General Directorate for Territorial Surveillance have broken up a terrorist recruitment cell, the fifth such since last fall. The terror cell, which had ties to Al Qaeda, had recruited more than 40 Moroccans since April 2012. The Moroccan government is concerned that this is representative of a "proliferation of terrorist networks."	0
Magharebia	Morocco: Moroccan Parliament Under Scrutiny Jan. 22, 2013	More than a year after the election of Morocco's new Chamber of Representatives under the new constitution, views on its performance remain mixed. Areas of concern are absenteeism, favoritism, and obstructionism.	0
Magharebia	Morocco to host security meeting Jan. 23, 2013	The interior ministers of Morocco, Spain, France and Portugal will meet in Rabat on Friday to discuss regional security. Police training, intelligence sharing and the Mali crisis will reportedly top the agenda of the Morocco talks.	0
Mamfakinch	Affaire du député accusé de viol	Arif Hassan, a parliamentarian who has been accused of rape, has been acquitted despite the fact that a positive DNA match links him to the	1

	Deputy accused of rape Jan. 20, 2013	crime. Civil society organizations have launched a petition against this decision as well as creating a facebook group inviting Hassan to resign from Parliament. Translated from French into English
MarketWatch	Chevron Signs Agreement for Exploration Areas Offshore Morocco: Acreage expands Chevron's footprint offshore Africa Jan. 22, 2013	Chevron Corporation announced that its subsidiary, Chevron Morocco Exploration Ltd, signed petroleum agreements with Morocco's Office National Des Hydrocarbures Et Des Mines for three offshore areas. "We look forward to participating in exploration activities in Morocco, which provides Chevron an opportunity to advance our growth strategy in frontier basins," said George Kirkland, vice chairman, Chevron Corporation. Once awarded, Chevron will acquire seismic data and conduct studies in deepwater areas known as Cap Rhir Deep, Cap Cantin Deep and Cap Walidia Deep located between 60 and 120 miles (100 to 200 kilometers) west and northwest of Agadir, Morocco. The areas encompass approximately 11,300 square miles (29,200 square kilometers) with average water depths ranging from between 330 feet to 14,700 feet (100 meters to 4500 meters).	0
The View from Fez	Morocco May Scrap Disputed Rape Law: Justice Ministry Jan. 22, 2013	The only female minister, Minister of Solidarity, Women, Family and Social Development, Bassima Hakkaoui, has been vocal in her call to change the law. "A rapist belongs to jail and not elsewhere," she said. The justice ministry supported a proposal by the parliament to alter article 475 of the penal code, under which the rape of a minor is punishable by several years in prison unless the victim and their aggressor wed. The modification has yet to be formally approved by both houses. The ministry said it was prepared to go even further and suggest harsher punishments for rapists of minors, including up to 30 years in prison rather than the current standard punishment of five years.	0
The View from Fez	Morocco's Tourism Sector - Is 2013 A Recovery Year? Jan. 25, 2013	The blogger writes, "The economic downturn in Europe and instability in Mali and Algeria are all contributing to the tourism sector's slow recovery in Morocco. While there are some promising developments such as the Ryanair decision to use Marrakech and Fez as bases for their aircraft, there is still a touch of gloom in the tourist industry. Tourism experts say that concentrating on airline services and introducing medical tourism may be the key to a brighter future."	0
Reuters	Morocco GDP growth slows to 2.8 percent in Q4 Jan. 23, 2013	Morocco's economic growth slowed to a "real, seasonally adjusted" 2.8 percent year-on-year in the last quarter of 2012, from 2.9 percent in the third quarter, the country's planning agency said. The economy was hit by a 9.2 percent drop in agricultural production during the past quarter due to drought. However, GDP growth is expected to pick up to about 4.5 percent in the first quarter of	0

		this year because of a budding pick-up in external demand and the start of a recovery in the agricultural sector, the agency said late on Tuesday.
Huffington Post	Morocco To Change Law That Allowed Rapists To Avoid Punishment By Marrying Their Victims Jan. 23, 2013	Nearly a year after Morocco was shocked by the suicide of a 16-year-old girl who was forced to marry her alleged rapist, the government has announced plans to change the penal code to outlaw the traditional practice.	163
Herald Scotland	Cairn to drill off coast of Morocco Jan. 23, 2013	Edinburgh-based Cairn Energy says it will start exploratory drilling off the coast of Morocco this year despite the recent attack on an oil and gas facility in nearby Algeria where six British workers are thought to have died.	0
Diaspora Saharaoui	Rassemblement samedi à Paris pour exiger la libération des prisonniers politiques sahraouis Demonstration in Paris to demand freedom for Saharawi political prisoners Jan. 23, 2013	A rally will be held in front of the Trocadero in Paris in early February prior to a military court trial of 24 Saharawi political prisoners in Morocco.	0
Christian Science Monitor	In remote Western Sahara, prized phosphate drives controversial investments Jan. 24, 2013	This article is an overview of the debate about Western Saharan resources.	0
EuroMoney Magazine	Mena Q4 results: Gulf becomes safer: Morocco and Tunisia resist heightened global risks Jan. 25, 2013	This article assesses changes in (economic and security related) risk in the MENA region. It concludes that though the Gulf states are safer than the rest of the MENA region, "Tunisia and Morocco, now similarly ranked in 73rd and 74th places respectively, are still less risky than parts of western and eastern Europe, despite the upheavals caused by the Arab Spring and other problems that have caused the ratings agencies to question their creditworthiness."	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, January 25, 2013 4:52 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Twitter monitoring, January week 3

FYI

Update Title/Date	Summary
The Government decides to reduce visits of foreigners to refugee camps and liberated territories due to situation in Mali Jan. 23, 2012	The Government of the Saharawi Arab Republic has decided to reduce visits of foreigners to the Saharawi refugee camps and liberated territories "given to the war situation in Mali and its possible negative impact on security and stability in the region," said Wednesday a press release issued by the Ministry of Cooperation.
Abdelilah Benkirane : une popularité intacte une année après Abdelilah Benkirane: popularity intact after one year Jan. 23, 2013	It would make sense if Benkirane's popularity had declined as a result of the economic doldrums gripping Morocco, but public opinion of the prime minister has not suffered.
Le "chantage" de Chabat sur Benkirane Chabat's "blackmail" on Benkirane Jan. 24, 2013	Officials within the PJD accuse Hamid Chabat of "blackmail" as well as exerting political pressure to assure his position as mayor of Fez. A member of the PJD also noted that Chabat is putting pressure for the nomination of Ahmed Toufiq Hejira as the new chairman of the House of Councillors.
Qui veut faire avorter l'expérience de la finance islamique au Maroc ? Who wants to abort the Islamic financial experience in Morocco? Jan. 24, 2013	Several Islamic banks accuse Moroccan lobbyists of derailing these banks in order to allow conventional banks to keep the monopoly of the credit market in Morocco. Benkirane's government does not want Islamic banks to be able to work on international norms and has thus implemented certain conditions which make it impossible for these banks to establish themselves. Bank officials believe that "Morocco is missing an historic opportunity to attract capital that is fleeing from the Arab Spring countries, notably Tunisia and Egypt."

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, February 02, 2013 12:54 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Twitter Monitoring January Week 4

FYI

Update Title/ Date	Summary
Maroc : Le père d'un étudiant décédé des suites d'une agression policière. veut une intervention royale Morocco: The father of a student who died after a police attack wants a royal intervention Jan. 28, 2013	After a third year student at the University of Fes died following a "violent" altercation with police, his father, a prominent imam in the region, has demanded that the king intervene to see that "justice will be done."
Deux ans après le Printemps arabe. l'intégration économique du Maghreb est indispensable (Par Nizar Baraka, ministre de l'économie et des finances du Royaume du Maroc) Two years after the Arab Spring, economic integration of the Maghreb is critical (by Nizar Baraka, economic and finance minister of the Kingdom of Morocco) Jan. 28, 2013	Minister Baraka wrote this piece explaining the underlying issues surrounding the current economic situation and explained how the region can move forward together. He emphasized the importance of stability to attract investment and alleviate the burden on the indigenous populations. He expressed a positive attitude about a "Transmaghreb Growth Pact" which "transcends both individual agendas and neighborhood rivalries" in the hope of creating a common vision and a unifying project: shared prosperity for all and the creation of a trusted economic organization in the "South of the Mediterranean" region.
Pas d'immunité pour les ministres ! No immunity for ministers! Jan. 28, 2013	In Article 94 of the new Constitution, members of the government are criminally responsible before the Kingdom's court for crimes committed during their tenure.
Benkirane à Davos :	During the Davos summit, Benkirane accused Western countries of undermining the

"l'Occident refuse la démocratie qui porte les islamistes au pouvoir" Benkirane to Davos: "The West refuses democracy that brings Islamists to power" Jan. 28, 2013	democratic process in Morocco and stated the the only difference between the democratic reforms in Morocco and the democratic reforms elsewhere in the Arab world was that the reforms in Morocco were enacted in a stable political environment, and that Morocco is a continuing target for terrorists who want to undermine that stability. At the last Davos summit, Benkirane called out Western powers for their previous support for Arab dictators.
Le Maroc réduit l'ouverture de sa frontière avec la Mauritanie à quelques heures par jour Morocco reduces the opening of its border with Mauritania to a few hours per day Jan. 28, 2013	Major staff of the FAR, the intelligence services, the Royal Gendarmerie, and the DGSN met in Aousserd to discuss the potential security crisis posed by the violence in northern Mali and the recent hostage crisis in Algeria. They decided, as a preventative measure, to partially close the border with Mauritania.
"Il est temps que l'UA joue un rôle capital pour la décolonisation de la dernière colonie en Afrique " (Président Mohamed Abdelaziz) "It is time that the AU plays a leading role in decolonizing the last colony in Africa" (President Mohamed Abdelaziz) Jan. 28, 2013	Mohamed Abdelaziz, in a meeting of AU heads of state in Addis Abeba, called for the countries of the AU to take a leading role in "the decolonization of the last colony in Africa" (referring to Western Sahara, in strict accordance with the tenants of the AU charter and the UN Commission on Human rights. In his words: "the decolonization of Africa remains incomplete as long as the Sahrawi people suffer under the colonialism of the Moroccan occupation." He went on to accuse Morocco of flagrant human rights violations in Western Sahara.
Benkirane au Forum économique de Davos : « Le Maroc est un pays stable » Benkirane on the world economic forum in Davos: "Morocco is a stable country" Jan. 28, 2013	During the WEF (World Economic Forum) talk on "transformations in the Arab world", Benkirane proclaimed that "We can not say we do not have problems in Morocco, but we can say that none of these problems affects our stability". Responding to a question on corruption in the Kingdom, Benkirane simply stated that "not everything written in newspapers is true. However, I can assure you that the government is investigating these cases".
Sahara Occidental : le Conseil des ministres de l'UA	The AU's council of ministers has unanimously adopted a resolution to conduct a referendum in Western Sahara. They "unanimously adopted a decision by which it requested the Commission of the African Union to take 'all measures' to organize a

adopte une décision pour l'organisation d'un référendum d'autodétermination Western Sahara: The Council of Ministers of the AU adopts a decision for the organization of a self-determination referendum Jan. 28, 2013	referendum on self-determination in Western Sahara".
Benkirane: La situation sécuritaire au Maroc est "maîtrisée" Benkirane: The security situation is "mastered" (under control) Jan. 29, 2013	Benkirane said the crime rate in Morocco remains low compared to similar states, making the tenuous assumption that therefore "the security situation is under control." He also pointed out that despite the events occurring in North Africa and the Sahel-Saharan region, no travel ban in Morocco has been issued by a foreign country.
Président de la République du Sud-Soudan appelle le Royaume du Maroc à la reconnaissance de la RASD. President of the Republic of South Sudan calls on the Kingdom of Morocco to recognize the Saharawi Democratic Arab Republic. Jan. 29, 2013	The president of South Sudan has called on Morocco to recognize the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic to put an end to the Western Sahara conflict, noting that his country gained independence via referendum.
Le Maroc parmi les 10 premiers exportateurs des plantes médicinales au monde Morocco among the top 10 exporters of medicinal plants in the world Jan. 31, 2013	Morocco is ranked 10th in the world in the exportation of medicinal plants, with annual exports reaching 50 million Euros. This is due to the abundance and variety of medicinal and aromatic plants (PAM) found in the country. It is such a large industry in Morocco that there are 30 separate exporters of PAM, and this number is growing.
Enquête. Africains, mais pas trop...	This article explores the question of Moroccan identity, arguing it is African because of Amazigh roots it shares with modern states across North Africa.

Investigation.
Africans, but not too much...

Jan. 31, 2013

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, February 02, 2013 12:59 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring January Week 4

FYI

Blog Name	Update Title/Date	Summary	Comments	Respond?
Magharebia	Morocco street vendors to gain rights Jan. 25, 2013	Trade Minister Abdelkader Amara announced a plan to legalize and regulate long-ignored street vendors. A new organizational framework will be created to enable traders to work legally at specific times in specific areas. The program, which will be tested in Kenitra, will also include training and awareness-raising efforts raised at traders.	0
Magharebia	France, Portugal join Moroccan-Spanish police initiative Jan. 27, 2013	France and Portugal will become part of the Moroccan-Spanish police collaboration, which was established last year. The interior ministers of Morocco, Spain, France and Portugal met in Rabat to discuss regional security. Police training, intelligence sharing and the Mali crisis topped the agenda of the talks.	0
Magharebia	Global experts tackle Sahel security	Over 150 diplomats, officials and analysts from 67 countries	0

	Jan. 28, 2013	convened in Marrakech on January 25th-26th to explore solutions to Sahel instability. There is an urgent need to prevent the threat of terrorism from spreading across the region, concluded participants in the fourth Marrakech Security Forum, held by the African Federation for Strategic Studies (FAES) and the Moroccan Center for Strategic Studies (CMES).
Magharebia	Moroccan officials discuss security situation Jan. 30, 2013	Moroccan Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane faced tough questions from members of Parliament this week regarding the country's security situation. Parliamentarians warned about the danger of the rise of crime especially in light of the events in Sahel.	0
AI Monitor	Morocco's Banned Islamist Party Gets New Leader Jan. 26, 2013	Mohamed Abadi has assumed the position at the head of the banned Justice and Charity Association political party.	0
AI Bawaba	Housing shortage in Morocco Jan. 27, 2013	The Moroccan government is taking steps to solve the housing problem by building 100,000 units and investing $400 million into the construction and housing industries.	0

		117,000 more units will be built annually. Moroccan social housing projects have attracted high interest from foreign and national investors.
Marketwire	Chainformation Announces Partnership to Launch Franchise Software in Morocco Jan. 28, 2012	Chainformation, a leading provider of software for retail, franchise and chain businesses, today announced it has entered an agreement with BeOne Consulting, a consulting and training corporation based in Morocco. Launching in Morocco also means that the CCM franchise software suite has been completely translated to French, allowing rapid implementation with French speaking franchise- and retail-chains.	0
ArabianBusiness.com	Abu Dhabi's TAQA seals $1.4bn Morocco finance deal Jan. 29, 2013	Abu Dhabi National Energy Company (TAQA), sealed a US$1.4bn deal for financing the expansion of its power plant in Morocco. The financing is the largest in over a decade for an international project in Morocco with Japanese and Korean export credit agencies participating for the first time in Moroccan project finances.	0
Afrique Jet	MISMA: Morocco pledges 5 Million	Morocco has pledged five	0

	USD to MISMA Jan. 29, 2013	million dollars to the Mali International Support Mission (MISMA), Saaddine El Othmani announced at the African Union headquarters in Addis Ababa. This announcement marks the first time a Moroccan official has visited or delivered a speech at the AU.
Fresh Plaza	Cold wave affects tomato development in Morocco Jan. 29, 2013	The low temperatures registered two weeks ago in Agadir, Morocco, have had an impact on the shipments to European markets. Perpignan (FR) port operators were the first to notice the lower supply volumes, as these fell by over 15%, although now that temperatures are warmer, production is also back to the usual levels. The drop in temperatures was not extreme, but they went as low as 3-4 degrees Celsius (37-39F); temperatures at which tomatoes stop their development.	0
People's Daily Online	Morocco donates 4 mln USD to Syrian refugees Jan. 30, 2013	Morocco has donated 4 million dollars to help alleviate the suffering of Syrian refugees, official media reported Wednesday. This additional contribution made	0

		by Morocco, which has received thousands of Syrian refugees, will support international efforts to help the Syrian people, says Foreign Minister Saad Dine El Otmani.
World Tribune	Westerners warned on travel to Morocco amid terror attacks in region Jan. 31, 2013	The British Foreign Office modified its official country profile on Morocco to say there is a general threat from terrorism and that foreigners could be subject to hostility and possible abduction, anticipated retribution from France's military action in Mali.	0
POMED	Reporters Without Borders: World Press Freedom Index 2013 Jan. 31, 2013	Morocco has been ranked 136/179 in global standings according to Reporters Without Borders 2013 assessment of freedom of the press. It is toward the lower end of MENA region rankings, with Syria holding the region's worst rating of 176 and Kuwait the region's best at 77. The United States was ranked 32nd.	0
The Africa Report	Morocco capitalised on its democratic transition - Nizar Baraka Jan. 31, 2013	Rabat is looking to Gulf financing and multilateral financiers to help it roll out infrastructure building programs and develop and support a network of small	0 enterprises. Baraka explained that Morocco is approaching international capital markets to lift pressure on domestic debt markets and avoid squeezing small companies and the private sector.

Human Rights Watch	Morocco/Western Sahara: Repression Belies Reform Pledges Jan. 31, 2013	According to HRW's World Report 2013 Report, "Even as government ministers talked of reform, the courts imprisoned dissidents during 2012 under repressive laws curtailing free speech, and after unfair trials. The police used excessive force against demonstrators, abused the rights of migrants, and advocates of self-determination for Western Sahara faced continuing repression."	0
News 24	Morocco: Protests as 24 Sahrawis tried Feb. 1, 2013	Rival protests were held on Friday Feb. 1 outside a military tribunal in the Moroccan capital where 24 Sahrawis accused of killing members of the security forces in the Western Sahara in 2010 are being tried.	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, February 07, 2013 4:05 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Washington Post by Jennifer Rubin - "An open letter to Secretary of State John Kerry" (mentions Morocco)
Attachments: W Post by Jen Rubin - An open letter to Secretary of State John Kerry 5Feb2013.pdf

FYI – Nice mention today in Jennifer Rubin’s open letter to Secretary of State Kerry.

<http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn/wp/2013/02/05/an-open-letter-to-secretary-of-state-john-kerry/>

The Washington Post

February 5, 2013

An open letter to Secretary of State John Kerry

By Jennifer Rubin

Secretary of State John Kerry
 (Melinda Mara/The Washington Post)

Dear Secretary of State Kerry:

Those in favor of a robust U.S. presence in the world are dismayed, to put it mildly, about the president’s choice for secretary of defense. Although foreign policy hawks have had their differences with you in the past, to be blunt, you are the best hope for maintaining the United States as that indispensable nation and the world’s only superpower. Because many errors were not made on your watch, you have the unique opportunity to clean the slate, put mistakes behind you and chart a more responsible and successful foreign policy.

Others may scoff, but Republicans are rooting for you to succeed and to do so in ways that further US interests around the globe.

For starters, you can repair the U.S.-Israel relationship. A good place to start would be by denouncing a truly vile study by the Council of Religious Institutions in the Holy Land, funded by a grant for the U.S. State Department’s Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor, that equates Palestinian and Israeli textbooks. As this report explains: [T]he study finds that, while neither Israel nor the Palestinians are guilty of “dehumanizing and demonizing characterizations of the other,” each side presents “the other as a violent enemy bent on destroying or dominating the self-community ...” One example of the latter is that Israeli textbooks depict Palestinians “negatively” by linking them to the massacre of Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics. (How this particular piece of history could be portrayed otherwise without rewriting it is beyond me.) It is no wonder, then, that the Israeli Education Ministry decided not to cooperate in the study at its outset and now denounces its outcome.

In addition it would be wise to focus on the Palestinian Authority’s “unity government” with Hamas, making clear that the partnership cannot continue and/or it must explicitly accept the Quartet principles for any progress to be made on the "peace process." Speaking of which it would be productive for you to meet with Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad and to reemphasize the importance of progress on the ground and improvement in the daily lives of Palestinians.

Moving to North Africa, it is obvious the first term appointees messed up, ignored threats and let the area descend into chaos. You should make every effort to reverse that error. Building on the new strategic relationship with Morocco, aiding the French in Mali and providing ample assistance to Libya to build its security apparatus and civil society are essential. Why not, like the Marshall Plan for Europe, the Kerry Plan for North Africa?

Next is Russia. I see you have already dumped "reset" and for that you deserve praise. However, it would be helpful for you to continue to raise the cases of imprisoned dissidents, meet with democracy advocates and limit trade and economic partnerships with Russia so long as the dictatorship of Vladimir Putin persists.

Now we come to Syria, which is a sore subject with you, I know. But you can help repair your legacy (which includes all that unseemly ingratiating of Bashar al-Assad) for pushing for more involvement in aid and support for the rebels and urging the administration to set up humanitarian safe zones. Hillary Clinton has a Syria debacle on her record; you can have an end to a bloody civil war and a successful post-war Syria.

And then there is Iran. You were left, I know, with a sanctions policy that is not having the intended effect. The Iranian nuclear program is moving swiftly ahead. There is no way you want the first line of your bio to read: "As secretary of state, Kerry allowed Iran to get the nuclear bomb." It is essential to remain firm on our bargaining position on abandoning nuclear enrichment (in fact why are we allowing enrichment up to 20 percent?) and to communicate seriously about a military option.

In some sense your past views and actions make your firm stances even more credible and important to a second term course correction. Coming from you, toughness on Iran, Russia and Syria will certainly get the world's attention.

Best of luck, Mr. Secretary. You will need it.

The Washington Post

February 5, 2013

Right Turn

By Jennifer Rubin

An open letter to Secretary of State John Kerry

By Jennifer Rubin

Secretary of State John Kerry
(Melinda Mara/The Washington Post)

Dear Secretary of State Kerry:

Those in favor of a robust U.S. presence in the world are dismayed, to put it mildly, about the president's choice for secretary of defense. Although foreign policy hawks have had their differences with you in the past, to be blunt, you are the best hope for maintaining the United States as that indispensable nation and the world's only superpower. Because many errors were not made on your watch, you have the unique opportunity to clean the slate, put mistakes behind you and chart a more responsible and successful foreign policy.

Others may scoff, but Republicans are rooting for you to succeed and to do so in ways that further US interests around the globe.

For starters, you can repair the U.S.-Israel relationship. A good place to start would be by denouncing a truly vile study by the Council of Religious Institutions in the Holy Land, funded by a grant for the U.S. State Department's Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor, that equates Palestinian and Israeli textbooks. As this report explains: [T]he study finds that, while neither Israel nor the Palestinians are guilty of "dehumanizing and demonizing characterizations of the other," each side presents "the other as a violent enemy bent on destroying or dominating the self-community ..." One example of the latter is that Israeli textbooks depict Palestinians "negatively" by linking them to the massacre of Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics. (How this particular piece of history could be portrayed otherwise without rewriting it is beyond me.) It is no wonder, then, that the Israeli Education Ministry decided not to cooperate in the study at its outset and now denounces its outcome.

In addition it would be wise to focus on the Palestinian Authority's "unity government" with Hamas, making clear that the partnership cannot continue and/or it must explicitly accept the Quartet principles for any progress to be made on the "peace process." Speaking of which it would be productive for you to meet with Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad and to reemphasize the importance of progress on the ground and improvement in the daily lives of Palestinians.

Moving to North Africa, it is obvious the first term appointees messed up, ignored threats and let the area descend into chaos. You should make every effort to reverse that error. Building on the new strategic relationship with Morocco, aiding the French in Mali and providing ample assistance to Libya to build its security apparatus and civil society are essential. Why not, like the Marshall Plan for Europe, the Kerry Plan for North Africa?

Next is Russia. I see you have already dumped "reset" and for that you deserve praise. However, it would be helpful for you to continue to raise the cases of imprisoned dissidents, meet with democracy advocates and limit trade and economic partnerships with Russia so long as the dictatorship of Vladimir Putin persists.

Now we come to Syria, which is a sore subject with you, I know. But you can help repair your legacy (which includes all that unseemly ingratiating of Bashar al-Assad) for pushing for more involvement in aid and support for the rebels and urging the administration to set up humanitarian safe zones. Hillary Clinton has a Syria debacle on her record; you can have an end to a bloody civil war and a successful post-war Syria.

And then there is Iran. You were left, I know, with a sanctions policy that is not having the intended effect. The Iranian nuclear program is moving swiftly ahead. There is no way you want the first line of your bio to read: "As secretary of state, Kerry allowed Iran to get the nuclear bomb." It is essential to remain firm on our bargaining position on abandoning nuclear enrichment (in fact why are we allowing enrichment up to 20 percent?) and to communicate seriously about a military option.

In some sense your past views and actions make your firm stances even more credible and important to a second term course correction. Coming from you, toughness on Iran, Russia and Syria will certainly get the world's attention.

Best of luck, Mr. Secretary. You will need it.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, February 11, 2013 9:54 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring February Week 1

FYI

Subject: Blog Monitoring February Week 1

Blog Name	Update Title/ Date	Summary	Comments?	Response
Amnesty International	Morocco military trial of Sahrawi civilians flawed from the outset Feb. 1, 2013	The trial of 24 Sahrawi civilians before a military court in Morocco is flawed from the outset, Amnesty International said today, as it called for the defendants to be tried in a civilian court and for an investigation into their torture allegations.	0
Al Arabiya	Gulf states hand Morocco first chunk of $2.5 bln aid package Feb. 2, 2013	Morocco has received the first part of a $2.5 billion aid package promised by wealthy Gulf Arab states, a Moroccan official said on Friday. The pledge is designed to cement ties between Arab monarchies in the wake of regional uprisings.	0
Yahoo! Finance	Morocco's ruling Islamists target risky reforms Feb. 3, 2013	Morocco's ruling Islamists are pushing ahead with critical reforms of government subsidy programs and pension programs. The current economy is characterized by "sharp inflation and deteriorating public finances", according to this Yahoo News report.	0
All Africa	Morocco: SADR Government 'Ready' to Cooperate With AU to Conduct Self-Determination Referendum in Western Sahara Feb. 3, 2013	The Algerian Foreign Affairs Minister, Mr. Mohamed Salem Ould Salek, welcomed the decision to designate the African Union Commission to take all measures for the holding of a referendum on self-determination in Western Sahara. In a press conference at the SADR embassy in Algiers, Mr. Ould Salek described the decision as the "historic and important event", noting that such decision is an indication to the commitment by the United Nations and African Union to conduct a self-determination referendum in Western Sahara.	0
All Africa	Morocco: President of Republic Calls On AU Commissioner to Stop Moroccan Decision to Bring the Gdeim Izik	Secretary General of the Polisario Front, Mohamed Abdelaziz, has called on Chairperson of the African Union to intervene against the decision to bring 24 Saharawi political prisoners before a Moroccan military tribunal.	0

	Group Before a Military Court Feb. 5, 2013
All Africa	West Africa: HM The King - Morocco Warned the International Community, Years Ago, of the Perils Looming Over the Sahel and Sahara Region Feb. 7, 2013	In a speech to the Organization of Islamic Cooperation, King Mohammed VI said Morocco had warned of instability in the Sahel.	0
Magharebia	Morocco broadens youth services Feb. 3, 2013	Young Moroccans will soon get easier access to a number of services, from employment to transportation, healthcare and cultural opportunities. A new special "youth card" is part of a global approach aimed at the advancement of young people through a number of initiatives, Youth and Sports Minister Mohamed Ouzzine told Parliament on January 14th. "This gives young people what they've been asking for. It sends out a strong signal that we're thinking about young people who are looking for practical measures which will have a positive effect on their everyday lives," the minister said.	0
Magharebia	Morocco adjourns Gdaim Izik trial Feb. 3, 2013	The military trial of 24 Sahrawis accused of killing members of the Moroccan security forces in Western Sahara opened on Friday (February 1st) and was adjourned until February 8th, AFP reported.	0
Magharebia	Jailed Moroccan rapper launches hunger strike Feb. 5, 2013	On Feb. 4 Mouad Belghouat, a 24 year old rapper and member of Morocco's youth activist group M20F, began a hunger strike in Oukacha prison, where he was sentenced to serve a one year term. Belghouat, known as "El-Haqed", was jailed last May in connection with the posting of a YouTube video set to his song "Kilab al-Dawla" (Dogs of the State). He has denied any connection to the video.	0
Magharebia	Morocco: HM The King - We All Have to Support Current Efforts to Achieve Palestinian Reconciliation Feb. 6, 2013	Commending the UN General Assembly's decision to grant Palestine non-member observer State status, HM the King recalled, in the speech read out by head of the government, Abelilah Benkirane, that this is an "achievement we owe to His Excellency President Mahmoud Abbas's unrelenting efforts and to the Palestinian people's brave struggle to set up their independent, unified and fully viable state, on the basis of the 1967 borders, with East Jerusalem as its capital."	0

Magharebia	Morocco: Local Vocational Training Falls Short, Report Says Feb. 7, 2013	A new report from Morocco's audit court criticized the kingdom's job training programs for failing to find work for graduates. Morocco's Office for Vocational Training and Work Promotion (OFPPT) oversees such programs, but now faces questions from the audit court for failing to keep track of how students are doing on the job market post-graduation.	0
Magharebia	Morocco: Nation to Upgrade Infrastructure Feb. 7, 2013	Morocco signed a 2.5 billion dirham (223 million euro) loan deal with the Islamic Development Bank, MAP reported on Wednesday (February 6th). The funds will be used for the construction of the 170 MW M'dez El Menzel hydro power plant. The loan will also help fund drinking water supplies in eight provinces and upgrade rural road networks.	0
Share Cast	Tangiers Petroleum reveals oil potential at Trident prospect in Morocco Feb. 4, 2013	Tangiers Petroleum on Monday said seismic data confirmed its Trident prospect in offshore Morocco contained an estimated 750m barrels of recoverable oil.	0
Reuters	IMF gives thumbs up to Morocco's economic strategy Feb. 4, 2013	IMF completed the first assessment of Morocco's economic program under a two-year precautionary credit line, indicating the country had met all the performance criteria of its $6.2 billion loan. Nemat Shafik, the IMF's deputy managing director, said the Moroccan authorities' economic strategy was "built appropriately on fiscal consolidation, structural reforms and prudent monetary and financial policies." The IMF urged the government to move forward with reforms of its subsidy and pension system.	0
AP	AP Interview: Morocco Islamists Warn of Unrest Feb. 5, 2013	In an interview with the Associated Press, Fathallah Aarsalane, political leader of Al Adl wal Ihsan, or the Justice and Charity movement, warned that Morocco is at serious risk of a popular revolt if the state doesn't recognize the demands of the Arab Spring and implement real democratic reforms. "Things have regressed to the point before the Arab Spring and today there is a risk of serious popular revolt outside of any political structure," he said at his home in Rabat. "We can't predict when the social situation will explode but what is certain is that all the ingredients already exist."	1
Tamazgha	Violence policière à Agadir Police violence	Moroccan police violently broke apart a pro-Amazigh rally in Agadir. Dozens of people were allegedly arrested and Amazigh flags were confiscated. The article describes the situation in Agadir as "unprecedented repression."	3

	in Agadir Feb. 3, 2013
Zawya	Spectrami expands its wings and sets up a new base in Morocco Feb. 6, 2013	Spectrami, the leading value added distributor in the MENA region, today announced the opening of its new office in Morocco as part of its expansion strategy in the region. The new office is based in Casablanca and will serve the fast growing market for technology products and solutions in North Africa.	0
CNBC	Why Morocco Holds Mixed Fortunes for Investors Feb. 6, 2013	Slim Feriani, CEO at Advance Emerging Capital, asserts that "the jury is still out as to whether Morocco can remain fully insulated from what's going on in neighboring countries and more recently Mali, which has increased the political and social risk of all of North Africa". For 2013, the IMF projects stronger economic growth of 5.5 percent, higher than any other country in the MENA region, including Qatar and Saudi Arabia.	0
Kuwait News Agency	Morocco strongly condemns assassination of Belaid Feb. 7, 2013	Morocco strongly condemned the assassination of Tunisian opposition politician and leader of the Unified Democratic Nationalist party, Chokri Belaid, branding the deadly attack on the politician as a "terrorist and dangerous" act. Morocco renewed its rejection of violence and political assassination from any source and affirmed its solidarity with the bereaved and the people of Tunisia, Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation in Morocco said in a statement, issued late on Wednesday.	0
Wind Power Monthly	GDF goes ahead with 300MW Morocco project Feb. 8, 2013	French energy giant Gaz De France Suez and Moroccan conglomerate Nareva Holding have broken ground on their jointly owned 300MW project at Tarfaya, on the country's southern Atlantic coast.	0
Winnipeg Free Press	Bombardier makes way for CSeries: shifts some production to Morocco Feb. 8, 2013	Bombardier Aerospace is making room for production of the CSeries airliner by beginning to transfer component work on its regional jets to a temporary plant in Morocco. Bombardier employment in Morocco is expected to reach about 100 by year-end and ramp up to 850 in eight years.	0
Moroccan News Board	U.S. - Morocco Joint Military Exercises Expand Feb. 8, 2013	Exercise "African Lion", traditionally an annual training exercise between the US and Morocco, will include 14 partner nations from Europe and Africa.	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, February 11, 2013 9:54 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Twitter Monitoring February Week 1

FYI

Subject: Twitter Monitoring February Week 1

Update Title/ Date	Summary
Le Roi Mohammed VI serait le 1er chef d'Etat maghrébin à visiter la Tunisie révolutionnaire King Mohammed VI will be the first North African leader to visit revolutionary Tunisia Feb. 5, 2013	King Mohammed VI will be the first North African leader to visit Tunisia since the Jasmine Revolution. The interim president of Tunisia, Mohamed Moncef Marzouki, has family in Morocco. They are expected to discuss further development of the Arab Maghreb Union.
Le Qatar conditionnerait son aide financière au Maroc par son achat de Maroc Telecom Qatar will condition financial aid to Morocco on the purchase of Maroc Telecom Feb. 5, 2013	The kingdom of Qatar is conditioning financial aid to Morocco on the basis of being allowed to purchase a majority share of Maroc Telecom.
Tanger : Les ouvrières de Zara et Mango payées 11.7	Moroccan workers who create clothes for global fashion powerhouses Zara and Mango make slightly less than 12 dirhams an hour, according to a study conducted by Isidor Boix, secretary of a Spanish syndicate of labor rights and practices.

dirhams de l'heure Tangiers : Factory workers at Zara and Mango paid 11.7 dirhams per hour Feb. 5, 2013
Maroc : Le crédit du FMI maintenu en échange de la réforme de la caisse de compensation Morocco: IMF credit maintained in exchange for the reformation of the compensation fund Feb. 5, 2013	Though Morocco has met the IMF loan requirements, the body insists that Morocco needs to focus on reforming the compensation fund and the pension system. While the reform of the public pension system has not been announced specifically, Abdelilah Benkirane has admitted: "Our pension system is in danger. Nobody wants our country to suffer the same fate as Greece".
Amrani continue l'opération de séduction des britanniques... Amrani continues the operation of seducing the British... Feb. 6, 2013	Moroccan Minister of Foreign Affairs Youssef Amrani was in talks Wednesday in Rabat with the president of the Moroccan-British Parliamentary Friendship Group, Ian Liddell-Grainger. The two discussed opportunities for growth in Moroccan-British economic cooperation and the security situation in the Sahel.
Manifestation à Tanger contre la projection d'un film sur les juifs Protest in Tangier against the screening of a film about Jews	On Tuesday nearly 200 people, largely young Islamists, protested against the screening of a film about Jews in the National Film Festival. The film, titled "Tinghir-Jérusalem, les échos du Mellah" and directed by French-Moroccan director Kamal Hachkar, is about Jews from the small Amazigh town of Tinghir and their immigration to Israel in the 1950's and '60's. The protesters chanted, "No to normalization with Israel! No to Zionism!" Hachkar responded that the film was in no way pro-Zionist. The Minister of Communication, Mustapha Khalfi, took no position on the film.

Feb. 6, 2013
Torture : Un nouveau rapport accuse le Maroc de collaboration avec la CIA. Torture: A new report accuses Morocco of collaboration with the CIA Feb. 6, 2013	A new report released by the Open Society Justice Initiative has fingered Morocco as being one of the 54 countries who cooperated with the CIA in its "enhanced interrogation" program. According to the report, Morocco gave the US access to prison facilities and handed over prisoners that the US suspected of having links to Al-Qaeda. The report further alleges that several detainees were tortured in Moroccan facilities during the length of the enhanced interrogation program.
Le Mali confirme la présence des combattants du Polisario dans les rangs des djihadistes au Nord. Mali confirms the presence of Polisario combatants in the ranks of Northern Jihadists Feb. 6, 2013	Malian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Tieman Coulibaly, confirmed the growing presence of Polisario fighters in northern Mali: "there were only 500 jihadis, nowadays, they are between 5,500 and 7,000 men". Mr. Coulibaly thanked Morocco for being the first country to send humanitarian aid as well as providing diplomatic and military cooperation. He stresses that "Morocco has always supported and continues to support the Mali and its territorial integrity. We rely heavily on the support and cooperation with Morocco to overcome the terrorist threat".
Le Maroc, principal bénéficiaire du soutien européen entre 2011 et 2013 avec 580 millions d'euros. Morocco, principal beneficiary of European support between 2011 and 2013 with 580 million euros Feb. 8, 2013	Morocco has received 580 million euros in aid from the EU between 2011-2013, making it the number one recipient of European aid. The aid money is meant to help economic and social development, environmental protection initiatives, and institutional support (specifically regarding human rights and the justice system).

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, February 17, 2013 11:17 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal <rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com>
Subject: I am home. can you call me when its convenient for you please

THanks Ed

Sent from my iPad

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, February 17, 2013 4:16 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Twitter Monitoring February Week 2

Subject: Twitter Monitoring February Week 2

Update Title/ Date	Summary
Pourquoi Vivendi veut vendre Maroc Telecom ? Why does Vivendi want to sell Maroc Telecom? Feb. 11, 2013	The article explores possible motives for selling the controlling share of Maroc Telecom. Vivendi expects the Moroccan market to become saturated and would like to sell its share while it is still profitable. Apparently, French President Francois Hollande has requested the sale be postponed until after the conclusion of French military deployment in Mali, so France can maintain the controlling share of Vivendi subsidiaries in Mali and other African countries. Akhbar Al Yaoum has reported that the Elysee Palace is opposed to a potential sale to Qatari telecom giant Qtel, due to intelligence reports indicating Qatar has formed ties to armed militants in Northern Mali, and in light of Qatar's refusal to participate in French air raids in Mali.
Le nouveau regard de l'UE sur le Printemps arabe The new view of the EU on the Arab Spring Feb. 11, 2013	In light of the Arab Spring unrest, the EU has proposed a new strategy in its relations with its neighbors south of the Mediterranean. The commission has proposed a "partnership for democracy and a shared prosperity with the south of the Mediterranean." This signifies the EU's dedication to supporting the nascent democratization efforts in the region, both politically and financially.
Maroc : Pas de retrait de l'Istiqlal du gouvernement Benkirane No Istiqlal retreat from the Benkirane government Feb. 11, 2013	Hamid Chabat, leader of the Istiqlal party, has definitively ruled out the possibility of leaving the government, despite repeatedly butting heads with his PJD counterpart, Abdelillah Benkirane. The latest eruption between Istiqlal and PJD is due to disagreement over proposed legislation to reform entitlements.
La stabilité du Maroc, une exception en Afrique du Nord (presse) Morocco's	Morocco is seen as an "island of stability" in North Africa, given its relatively low level of unrest during the Arab Spring. This stability has entices foreign companies to invest in Morocco, and the IMF has predicted that the country could see a GDP growth of 5.5% this year, though some sources say that this is too optimistic. The country is rapidly improving its competitiveness in international markets, but it still has to deal with a debt crisis and high youth unemployment.

stability, an exception in North Africa (press) Feb. 11, 2013
La réforme de la Caisse de compensation, manoeuvre électorale du PJD ? Reforming the compensation fund, an electoral maneuver of the PJD? Feb. 12, 2013	If the state were to remove the compensation fund and liberalize the price of raw materials, the cost of electricity will double while gas will more than triple. Experts believe, however, that the reform of the compensation fund is a targeted campaign led by the PJD to gain more support from the poorer rural areas of the country. Reforming the compensation fund should allow the government to gradually grant direct subsidies gradually to 3.5 million poor people. It may, however, increase poverty affecting millions of Moroccans.
26 organisations sahraouies demandent à Total de quitter leur pays 26 Sahrawi organizations demand Total to leave their country Feb. 12, 2013	26 Sahrawi organizations have released a statement saying “We, the signatories are against Total's presence in Western Sahara. We urge the company to stop all research and leave immediately.” Total has signed an agreement with the Moroccan government for a 100,926,70 km² block of land, calling it the Anzarane Offshore.
12 cas de grippe A (H1N1) enregistrés à Dakhla 12 cases of influenza A (H1N1) recorded in Dakhla Feb. 12, 2013	The Ministry of Health announced on Sunday that twelve cases of influenza A (H1N1) were reported amongst fishermen in Dakhla, with one death. A medical team was deployed to the fishing boat docking in the port of Dakhla to assess the situation and make the recommended therapeutic and prophylactic measures. As a precautionary measure, the Ministry of Health has activated its alert system.
Ouarzazate : Les arrivées touristiques en hausse de 42% en novembre	Numbers of tourists visiting Ouarzazate in November 2012 increased by 42% compared with figures collected in November 2011.

2012 Ouarzazate: Tourism up 42% in November 2012 Feb. 13, 2013
Tanger Med bientôt le premier port desservant le marché algerien Tanger Med soon to be the most important port for the Algerian market Feb. 15, 2013	The development of port infrastructure in Morocco is troubling to Algeria, which could soon depend entirely on Moroccan ports. Algeria's 14 ports date back to colonial times and cannot accommodate large haul vessels. Additionally, the transport and processing of shipments costs 40% more in Algeria than in Morocco, according to an Algerian shipping expert.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, February 20, 2013 4:47 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian Situation Report

The material contained in this report are from private and public channels. Although from a reliable source, none of the material has been corroborated by third parties.

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

February 8, 2013

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- Although there have been suggestions that DRS commander Tewfik may no longer be as pivotal a player as he once was, the DRS is understood to have been put in command of operations at the In Amenas siege and to have responsibility for channelling critical information to President Bouteflika.
- The press has been strongly supportive of the army's intervention at In Amenas, but has implicitly questioned the possible shortcomings of the DRS in preventing the terrorist take-over of the gas facility, which may be damaging for Tewfik.
- Rumours that Bouteflika was in Geneva for medical treatment during the In Amenas crisis appear to be untrue. The President is reported to be in good health and the main arbiter in the forthcoming presidential contest.
- Although the possibility of Bouteflika himself running for a 4th term of office has still not been ruled out, PM Abdelmalek Sellal is now being mentioned as a possible successor.

Foreign Relations

- The In Amenas attack was launched in retaliation for Algeria's assistance to the French war effort in northern Mali, which includes efforts to cut off AQMI's access to fuel as well as authorising French air force overflights.
- The In Amenas attack and the earlier Islamist offensive in Mali initially put the Algerian regime on the back foot, stoking its fears of losing all control over the Sahara, exposing its collaboration with France and putting its relations with countries whose nationals were among the hostages under strain.
- Algiers appears however to be bouncing back, earning respect for its tough response, securing a security cooperation agreement with the UK and pressing for transfers of sensitive military and security technology.

Security

- The In Amenas crisis dominated reporting of security news in January, possibly crowding out other incidents.
- In Amenas was the first ever direct attack on oil and gas production facilities in Algeria since the outbreak of violence in 1992.
- The opportunistic attempt by AQMI and its allies to build an 'Islamic emirate' in northern Mali brought them into direct conflict with France, transforming AQMI's strategic orientation and recasting Mokhtar Belmokhtar as the new face of the global jihad.
- The attacks of AQMI's Saharan branch on Algerian interests are subsidiary to its struggle with France, but it remains to be seen whether or not the national leadership in the north of the country will adopt this orientation.

Political Trends

The surprise attack on the Sonatrach-BP-Statoil gas facility at In Amenas in the southern Algerian province of Illizi on January 16 is a unique and unprecedented event: not only does it represent the first direct attack on hydrocarbons production facilities in Algeria since the Islamist insurgency broke out 21 years ago, it is without a doubt the worst terrorist incident at an oil or gas installation anywhere in the world in the history of the industry. With Minister of Communication Mohand Oussaïd Belaïd now casting it as “Algeria's 9/11”, it is worth considering how the In Amenas siege might affect relations and the balance of power between the key members of the country's leadership – President Bouteflika, intelligence chief Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène and the heads of the army – all the more so in light of earlier claims that Tewfik had been unsettled to see Western powers dealing primarily with CoS Lt-Gen. Ahmed Gaïd-Saleh rather than him when discussing how to handle crisis in northern Mali^[1], to which of course the In Amenas attack is linked.

The public blame game following the In Amenas attack has naturally been more muted than it might have been in a fully functioning democracy, with the result that indicators as to how the incident is affecting relations at the top are partial, fragmentary, and to some extent contradictory. On the one hand, while local and international news media (and the Algerian Defence Ministry's own website) have tended to highlight the role of the army's special forces in putting an end to the In Amenas hostage crisis^[2], a source close to the commanders of the DRS intelligence and security service tells us that President Bouteflika from the outset entrusted control over operations to the DRS, which kept the President informed throughout. This would seem to imply that, behind the scenes, Tewfik has the upper hand over the military chiefs, while at the same time holding onto an important card in his relationship with Bouteflika insofar as he is entrusted with the task of channelling critical information to the President.

On the other hand, the Algerian press has in general been very supportive of the army's role, with most media strongly defending both the refusal to negotiate with the armed group that had seized control of the site and the uncompromising military assault that put an end to the siege, and to the extent that there has been any questioning in the Algerian media, it has tended largely to focus on how the attack could have happened in the first place – the unspoken charge being that In Amenas could only have occurred because of a catastrophic intelligence failure. In this vein, leading Arabic-language daily Al-Khabar (Jan. 21) claims that President Bouteflika had ordered an investigation into how AQMI was able to take over the In Amenas facility. This of course lays the blame implicitly at the door of the DRS. Meanwhile, a source at the Presidency has been hinting that Tewfik is no longer the pivotal figure he once was. If this is so, it may be the result of a longer-term decline in power rather than a direct consequence of the In Amenas episode, but insinuations about his services' lack of efficacy in defending the country's vital infrastructures against terrorist attack will do nothing to enhance Tewfik's standing.

At the same time, there has been open criticism, especially in the Algerian French-language and online media, of Bouteflika's role, or rather his absence, during and after the In Amenas crisis. Having received Malian Prime Minister Diango Cissoko on Jan. 14, two days before AQMI's attack on the In Amenas facility, Bouteflika disappeared from public view for a full fortnight, reappearing on Jan. 28 to welcome the Spanish Defence

Minister. Bouteflika's failure to address the nation at the height or in the immediate aftermath of the crisis was seen as a sign of "contempt" for the people by some press commentators, while others suggested that the President had not been seen or heard because he was in Geneva for medical treatment^[3]. This latter explanation – a recurrent rumour – appears to be untrue: a senior civil servant at the Presidency tells us that Bouteflika is "in good health" and had not of late been noticeably absent from the El Mouradia presidential palace^[4]. Indeed, however much criticism might be piled upon him beyond the walls of El Mouradia, within the inner workings of the Algerian political system Bouteflika still seems to be in control.

Above all, the President appears to have the upper hand with regard to the upcoming presidential contest – more so, it would seem, than intelligence chief Tewfik, who had previously been held to be the king-maker. One source at the Presidency suggests, almost off-handedly, that the current most likely candidate to take over from Bouteflika in 2014 is Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal – a long-standing and reliable supporter of Bouteflika who is also understood to be close to Tewfik, but who has not hitherto been thought of as having either the ambition or the stature to become President. At the same time, however, the option of Bouteflika himself standing for a fourth successive term of office has still not been definitively ruled out, and it seems unlikely that any firm decision will be possible at least until the dust has settled from In Amenas, and possibly not before there is clearer visibility with regard to the implications for Algeria of the broader conflict in northern Mali.

Foreign Relations

If nothing else, the attack by the 'Masked Men Brigade' of AQMI's Saharan branch^[5] on the Tiguentourine gas facility at In Amenas on Jan. 16, planned as much as two months in advance according to the group's chief Mokhtar Belmokhtar, is indicative of the organisation's acute sense of strategy.

The In Amenas raid must be seen in the context of the ongoing struggle south of the border between AQMI and its allies on the one hand and the French military and what remains of the Malian state on the other. The French intervention was triggered by the surprise offensive on Jan. 10 by the armed Islamist groups in northern Mali against the town of Konna, just south of the unofficial demarcation line between the territory they conquered in early 2012 and the territory still under the control of the central government; Paris has argued that the attack on Konna was a prelude to a swoop on Bamako that would have opened the way to the establishment of an Islamist emirate in the whole of Mali. However, the jihadist groups that had managed with a force of a few thousand men to hold the north of the country for almost a year would have had great difficulty establishing firm control over Bamako (population 2 million) and Mali's other cities, which are largely hostile to them^[6], and it seems likely that AQMI and its allies were aware of this and never had the conquest of Bamako as their real objective. Rather, their surprise southwards push to Konna seems to have been designed to provoke precisely the reaction that it got: the open intervention of the French military. By drawing in the French – rather than obediently waiting for Paris, working through the United Nations, the African Union and the Economic Community of West African States, put together a West African proxy force – the jihadists would have been seeking to recast their fight as a confrontation between the defenders of Islam and an invading 'infidel', Western, imperialist army. Neither should the rapid success of the French army's Operation Serval be taken as a sign that AQMI and its allies were taken by surprise, or even that they have been vanquished; rather, in virtually all areas, the jihadist groups appear to have carried out an orderly tactical retreat, deliberately avoiding engaging the advancing French and Malian forces and minimising their losses. Having learned the lessons of Iraq and in particular Afghanistan, their subsequent strategy is likely to be to launch an insurgency, using hit-and-run guerilla tactics, once the occupying force is in place^[7].

The In Amenas operation was an extension of this strategy insofar as it seems to have been intended, like the offensive against Konna, to clarify matters: in striking at an element of Algeria's critical infrastructure, AQMI would have anticipated a very tough response from the Algerian security forces; by targeting a plant that is jointly operated by European oil companies, with large numbers of expat workers present on site – rather than an easier target such as, for example, the network of oil and gas pipelines that criss-cross the Algerian Sahara – it ensured that Algiers would be clearly seen as colluding with “the West”. Plans for the operation were, by Belmokhtar's own account, first hatched some two months in advance – i.e. in the wake of UN Security Council Resolution 2071 calling on member states, regional and international organisations to provide support for efforts to combat AQMI and its allies in northern Mali. For those plans to have been carried through when they were, AQMI would have to have been convinced that Algeria was – contrary to the Algerian government's official position – providing support in one form or another for the French military campaign, since to have launched such an attack on Algeria while it was observing strict neutrality would clearly have been counterproductive. Beyond granting the French air force overflight rights, one key way in which Algeria can discreetly provide assistance to the French war effort in northern Mali is to crack down more effectively on the smuggling of the fuel which is essential to the jihadists' mobility and which mostly comes from Algeria, and it would seem that a commitment to do just that was made at the meeting of the Algerian, Tunisian and Libyan prime ministers in Ghadames, Libya on Jan. 12. Indeed, a senior civil servant at the Algerian Presidency has confirmed to us that Algeria had resolved a few days before the Ghadames border security summit to establish full control over the so-called 'Salvador triangle' – an area straddling the borders of Algeria, Libya and Niger that has long been a crucial passageway for smugglers of all types, and which had taken on special importance for AQMI and its allies in the Sahara for channelling weapons from Libya and, no doubt, fuel from Algeria; the same source indicated that Algiers considers the In Amenas raid to be a form of retaliation for such moves.

Initially, AQMI's offensives – against Konna in Mali, and against the gas facility at In Amenas – put Algiers on the back foot. The fact that it was Ansar Dine – the Tuareg Islamist faction with which Algiers had brokered negotiations in the hope of breaking the jihadist front and obviating or at least minimising any armed intervention – that led the attack on Konna came as a shock to Algiers, compromising its entire strategy for dealing with the Mali crisis. Speaking to us a fortnight later, an advisor at the Presidency spoke of the Algerian leadership's alarm that it is losing all vestige of the control it used to have over events across its southern borders, which is increasingly tinted with concern that this may steadily develop into a loss of control over Algeria's own desert south. As the French military intervention got under way, the announcement by French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius that air raids on jihadist strongholds in northern Mali had been made possible by Algiers' decision to grant the French Air Force the right to overfly its territory came as a considerable embarrassment to Bouteflika and the regime as a whole, who were lambasted by critics at home for collaborating with the armed forces of the former colonial power^[8]. Finally, the siege of In Amenas and the uncompromising military assault to dislodge the armed islamists and retake the facility before they could blow it up momentarily exposed Algeria's relations with the governments of those countries with significant numbers of nationals on the site – in particular the United Kingdom and Japan – to severe strain.

Any tension with Western countries has dissipated remarkably quickly, however. UK Prime Minister David Cameron jetted in to Algiers on Jan. 30 – the first ever visit to Algeria by a British head of government – with his National Security Advisor Sir Kim Darroch and MI6 chief Sir John Sawers in tow, and proceeded, according to an advisor at the Presidency, to bend over backwards to persuade his hosts to forget his initial “over-reaction” to the Algerian military intervention at In Amenas, blaming it on a lack of information. By the end of the British PM's visit, agreement had been reached on a “strategic security partnership” between the two countries, built around consultations between senior military, security and intelligence advisers co-chaired by Darroch and his Algerian counterpart Kamal Rezzag-Bara. For his part, France's President François Hollande – who had carefully avoided criticising the Algerian response to In Amenas in the heat of the moment – went still further, strenuously defending the Algerian government's fight against terrorism in remarks to the European Parliament on Feb. 5; this has been greeted with immense satisfaction by Algerian media close to the government, which has contrasted Hollande's supportive stance to the disdainful, hands-off attitude shown by his Socialist predecessors towards the Algerian regime at the height of the troubles in the 1990s. Cameron, Hollande and other Western leaders have explicitly recognised the importance of Algeria to any solution to the security problems of the Sahara-Sahel region^[9].

Meanwhile Algiers, although it has been shown to be collaborating to some degree with the West against the jihadists in northern Mali, has stuck to its line of no foreign troops on Algerian soil and no Algerian troops on foreign soil (as restated by PM Sellal during the annual African Union summit in Addis Ababa towards the end of January), and even finds itself in a position to try to extract some positive advantage from the situation, both politically and practically. On the political level, “senior officials” quoted by the New York Times^[10], for example, have been quick to put out the kind of message Algiers wishes to be heard in Washington: that the In Amenas incident is directly connected to last September's attack on the US Consulate in Benghazi^[11], and that such damage to Western interests is the direct consequence of the Arab Spring uprisings with which Washington and other Western capitals have expressed sympathy^[12]. And in practical terms, the Algerian regime now seems to be attempting to transform the respect, however grudging, that it has won for its uncompromising stance towards the attackers of In Amenas into agreements on arms and security technology transfers: the army is reported to be pressing ahead with plans to acquire American or French-made mine resistant ambush protected-all terrain vehicles, while Bouteflika is believed to have discussed with David Cameron the possible use of satellites in securing Algeria's borders and to have received a pledge from the British PM that he would support security plans for border with Mali which include the acquisition by Algiers of American-made UAVs – although it is not clear whether Cameron will go all the way and lobby for Algiers to be allowed to buy the MQ-9

Reaper killer drones on which it seems to have its heart set.

Security

Falling in the middle of the month and spreading out over several days, the In Amenas siege naturally dominated reporting of security news in January, possibly to the extent of crowding out reporting of other incidents: only seven jihadist attacks and 12 incidents all told were reported in the Algerian media for the entire month (and none at all in the week of Jan. 20-27)^[13]. On the other hand, the shock of In Amenas seems to have loosened at least some tongues, with one ex-military source, now in private security in southern Algeria, letting slip that armed clashes on the border with Mali are far more frequent, and damaging, than officially admitted (to the point, the source claimed, that the Algerian military is in urgent need of new field hospitals); this seems to confirm our earlier suspicion (see AMSR #117) that the abrupt decline to close to zero in reports of incidents on the Algeria-Mali border as of June last year was to be attributed to a news blackout rather than an actual decline in the number of incidents.

An unprecedented event in the history of political violence in Algeria, the In Amenas crisis received unprecedented coverage in the international media. To recap the most salient points: early in the morning of Jan. 16, a group of heavily armed jihadists who had crossed the Libyan border around 80km away in three 4WD vehicles, stormed a gas production facility jointly operated by Sonatrach, BP and Statoil at Tinguetourine, located in the desert 40km east of the small town of In Amenas in the wilaya of Illizi. The jihadists overran the facility with relative ease and held hostage 800 workers, including more than 100 expatriates of various nationalities. The hostage takers belonged to AQMI's Katibat al-Mulathamine (Brigade of Masked Men), headed by Mokhtar Belmokhtar^[14], and based in northern Mali. In a statement to independent Mauritanian news agency ANI, Katibat al-Mulathamine said the operation was launched “after it became clear that Algeria is taking part in the war against the Muslim people of Azawad, opening its airspace [to French jet fighters] and closing its borders to complete the blockade against them”. According to Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal, no more than five of the attackers were Algerian nationals; 11 of them were Tunisians and the rest came from eight other countries, including two Canadian nationals. The Algerian Special Forces rapidly surrounded the facility, and on Jan. 17 launched an assault with helicopter support to retake the living quarters, followed on Jan. 19 by a second assault aimed at retaking the production plant. In all, one Algerian hostage and 39 foreign hostages of various nationalities are reported to have been killed. PM Sellal put the total number of attackers at 32, of whom 29 were killed and three captured, although there have been suggestions that the group was up to 40 strong, some of whom managed to escape.

The In Amenas attack was the first ever direct attack on oil and gas production facilities in Algeria since the outbreak of violence in 1992. Although a number of expatriates working in the oil and gas industry were assassinated in the 1990s^[15] and bombings of pipelines in the north of the country – mainly if not exclusively domestic oil and gas pipelines supplying refineries and power stations, as opposed to export pipelines – were commonplace, in the early years of the Islamist insurgency it was the deliberate policy of both the AIS and the GIA, the two main armed groups at that time, not to attack the oil and gas production facilities in the deep south. This was as much a practical question (the Sahara was for a time one of the main routes for gun-running to the armed groups in the north of the country, and it was considered wiser to avoid attracting more attention than was absolutely necessary from the security forces) as a matter of principle (especially in the period up to late 1995, when an Islamist victory still seemed a plausible outcome, it was argued that Algeria's oil and gas was the rightful property of the people and that the industry should be safeguarded so that the coming Islamic state would be able to take it over intact). As the GIA began to fall apart in the mid-90s, Mokhtar Belmokhtar, who hails from the southern wilaya of Ghardaia, briefly emerged as the organisation's regional commander or emir for the deep south, before being squeezed out by the GIA's northern leadership as of the summer of 1997 – because of his reluctance to adopt their tactic of mass killings, according to statements he made to a local source who managed to meet and interview him in May 1998. By that time, Belmokhtar had come to specialise mainly in cigarette smuggling and the theft of vehicles from oil companies and government agencies, observing informal rules of engagement that had more to do with Bedouin razzias, or raids^[16], than with the modus operandi of the armed groups in the north. This remained the case even after Belmokhtar joined forces with the Hassan Hattab's GSPC (the split-off from the GIA which was soon to emerge as Algeria's main jihadist group) in 1999, with Belmokhtar keeping a large measure of autonomy and whenever avoiding bloodshed as an unwelcome diversion from the serious business of smuggling. By the mid-2000s, he and his group had for the most part relocated across Algeria's southern borders, and seemed to have established a relatively peaceful modus vivendi with the Algerian security forces.

In 2006, the GSPC's national leadership swore allegiance to Osama Ben Laden and rebranded itself as Al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQMI), adopting Al-Qaida's language of confrontation with the “Jews and Crusaders” in a global jihad as well as its tactic of suicide bombings. However, locked in a life-or-death struggle with the Algerian regime, the organisation's conversion to Al-Qaida's strategy of concentrating on the “far enemy” (i.e. the United States and other Western countries that support both Israel and the oppressive regimes in the Arab and Muslim world) rather than the “near enemy” (i.e. the local regimes themselves) was only partial at best. In mid-2007, AQMI carried out an internal reorganisation which saw the emergence of new leaders (Yahia Djouadi, Abdelhamid Abou Zeid) for the Saharan brigades who appeared to be more in tune with the leadership in the north than Belmokhtar had ever been, and it was after this reorganisation that AQMI units based in northern Mali adopted the tactic of kidnapping European and North American expats, aid workers, diplomats and tourists. Disconnected from the armed struggle against the Algerian regime in Algeria itself, the AQMI's kidnapping gangs in the Sahara thus in a sense began to engage the “far enemy” - although in many cases the political demands and ultimatums put to Western governments for the release of their nationals have in effect been little more than window dressing for the payment of hefty ransoms. It was ostensibly the southern leaders' concentration on kidnapping (and other illegal money-making activities such as drug smuggling) at the expense of active participation in the jihad against the “near enemy” that led some of the group's members to break away and set up MUJAO in mid-2011.

What has really “Al-Qaidised” AQMI's Saharan branch – and transformed Mokhtar Belmokhtar into the new face of global jihad – is a sequence of events that, initially at least, were not of its own making at all. The uprising against the Qaddafi regime in Libya in February 2011 and the ensuing war opened up a vast new treasure trove of weaponry; the opening of the prisons in Libya and Tunisia, and later political developments in those countries, led to the establishment of like-minded groups keen to build ties with AQMI; and, crucially, the return of thousands of trained and armed Tuareg fighters from Libya to northern Mali made possible a new Tuareg rebellion in early 2012 that seized hold of the northern half of the country extremely quickly, pushing the Malian state to the brink of collapse. This provided AQMI with the opportunity, which together with MUJAO and the newly created Ansar Dine it seized with alacrity, to hijack the Tuareg revolt and establish an embryonic state in northern Mali. Although reports of volunteers flooding to the infant 'Islamic emirate' from across North West Africa appear to be exaggerated, the success of AQMI's daring coup does appear to have attracted a certain number of fighters from Libya, Tunisia and possibly elsewhere, and some acolytes from even further afield (the improvised Sharia court in Gao, for example, is reported to have been staffed by Pakistani judges). Above all, setting up a breakaway state in northern Mali also brought AQMI into direct conflict with a Western power, France.

The raid on In Amenas, as we have argued above^[17], must be seen as a function of that conflict – as must the future attacks Belmokhtar has promised in retaliation for the Algerian military's assault against his men at the gas plant. In terms of jihadist strategy, this situation is in fact a mirror image of the GIA and the GSPC years: the GIA and the GSPC, insofar as they attacked France and French interests (i.e. the “far enemy”) at all, did so to punish and dissuade perceived support for the Algerian state, the “near” - and main - enemy; in 2013, it is France that has become the main enemy for AQMI's Saharan brigades, and Belmokhtar's men have lashed out as never before against Algeria, the near enemy, because of its support for the French war effort. It remains to be seen what role AQMI's central leadership in the north of Algeria will play in this battle – but a video message issued by the organisation's national emir Abdelmalek Droudkel in early December condemning French manoeuvring in Mali suggests that it may be inclined to march in step with its southern comrades-in-arms.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
 President and CEO
 The Gabriel Company, LLC
 1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
 Washington DC, 20005
 Phone: +1 202.887.1113
 Fax: +1 202.887.1115
 Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
 Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

^[1] See AMSR #119

^[2] The Guardian (Jan. 25) did, however, point out that the assault was commanded by Gen. Bachir Tartag (appointed head of the DRS's Directorate of Internal Security in December 2011), whom it presented as Tewfik's “deputy”.

^[3]

This rumour was also picked up by The Guardian, which claimed in the article quoted above that "the 75-year-old president was absent throughout the crisis, undergoing medical treatment in Geneva. Mediene and the army, say well-placed sources, kept him out of the picture because they were angry that his agreement to let French planes fly over Algeria to attack Islamist rebels in Mali was leaked from Paris."

- [4] The President does on occasion stay away from the Presidential palace, according to the source, "but never for more than 24 hours at a stretch".
- [5] Responsibility for the operation was claimed by Mokhtar Belmokhtar, head of Katiba El Moulathimine (the Masked Men Brigade), on behalf of Katiba El Mouakioune Bi Damaa (the 'Brigade of those who Sign in Blood'), which appears to have been a specially established sub-group. Despite some suggestions in the international media that Belmokhtar somehow 'broke' with AQMI at the end of 2012 because of rivalry with Abdelhamid Abou Zeid, the organisation's principal 'emir' in northern Mali, there is no indication that this is actually the case, and Belmokhtar explicitly spoke in the name of AQMI in the video message claiming responsibility.
- [6] It could by no means have been ruled out, on the other hand, that what remained of the Malian state might have collapsed under the impact of the Islamist offensive, ushering in a period of anarchy in which no faction could claim control of the entire country.
- [7] The first signs of this are already being seen, with a number of roadside bombs and, on Feb. 8, a suicide bomb attack against a Malian army unit in Gao.
- [8] Seemingly in response to this, French weekly magazine Jeune Afrique (Jan. 21) published an article – illustrated with what purported to be a photograph of the presentation of the 'real' route to Defence Minister Jean-Yves Le Drian at France's Air Operations Command – claiming that the French Air Force's Rafales actually flew a far more circuitous route via Morocco and Mauritania; some Algerian media subsequently claimed that, while Bouteflika may have given permission for the overflights, it was not in the end used by the French. This version – which has all the hallmarks of a spin doctors' damage limitation exercise – has not been officially confirmed by any of the governments involved.
- [9] Hollande told the European Parliament: "We shall need Algeria in this part of the world ... in fighting terrorism, ... in encouraging a policy of development, ... and for the political dialogue, including with the Tuareg."
- [10] 'Some Algeria Attackers Are Placed At Benghazi', New York Times, 22/01/13
- [11] Several of the fighters who took part in the raid on In Amenas were, according to the unnamed senior Algerian official quoted by the NYT, Egyptians who had also taken part in the Benghazi attack.
- [12] "This is the result of the Arab Spring," said the official said, who spoke on condition of anonymity because investigations into the hostage crisis were still under way. "I hope the Americans are conscious of this."
- [13] Nonetheless, armed activity in the north of the country is likely to have seen a real dip due to heavy snow in Kabylia and other mountainous areas of northern Algeria where AQMI's forces are mainly concentrated. Only two AQMI operations and six incidents all told were reported in the Kabyle wilayas throughout the month.
- [14] Also known as Belaouer in Algerian Arabic or Le Borgne in French (i.e. the One-Eyed Man), or by the nom de guerre Khaled Abou El Abbas.
- [15] A British engineer was shot dead at the Bethioua petrochemicals plant and gas port in NW Algeria in Dec. 1993, and five foreign technicians employed by Bechtel were killed in Ghardaïa in May 1995.
- [16] Under which the seizure of booty is licit but bloodshed is avoided wherever possible since this enables the opposite party to claim a blood "debt" and can lead to interminable blood feuds.
- [17] See above, Foreign Relations.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, February 25, 2013 4:57 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: FYI from J.P. Pham (25 Feb. 2013): Brenthurst Paper - "Morocco and the African Union"
Attachments: Morocco and the AU (Brenthurst Paper 2013-01).pdf

Very important and interesting piece by Peter Pham. Thanks Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Dr. J. Peter Pham [<mailto:drjppham@aol.com>]
Sent: Monday, February 25, 2013 11:00 AM
To: undisclosed-recipients
Subject: FYI from J.P. Pham (25 Feb. 2013): Brenthurst Paper - "Morocco and the African Union"

Dear Friends and Colleagues,

I co-authored a just-published study examining Morocco's relationship with the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) and its successor, the African Union (AU), in the evolving context of one of the world's most intractable feuds, the dispute over the Western Sahara.

The study, Morocco and the African Union: Prospects for Re-engagement and Progress on the Western Sahara, was published by the Johannesburg, South Africa-based Brenthurst Foundation as part of its Discussion Papers series on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the first pan-African organization, and co-authored with the Foundation's director, Greg Mills, and its deputy director, Terence McNamee.

Founded in 2004 by the Oppenheimer family to promote constructive dialogue on issues affecting economic growth and development across Africa, the Brenthurst Foundation has as its mandate to encourage key decision makers and experts to share experiences and insights at private meetings and seminars; deliver relevant, practical policy advice to governments; and generate new thinking and thought-leadership to address Africa's development challenges.

The study argues that specter of transnational conflict in Africa's Sahel region – punctuated by France's intervention in Mali – has cast a fresh light on the stalemate over the Western Sahara. Moreover, my co-authors and I contend that if the African Union is to engage meaningfully on this issue, it must engage Morocco, the separatist Polisario Front, and, perhaps most consequentially, the Polisario's main backer, Algeria, with new ideas and realistic avenues to break the impasse. Morocco's continuing absence from the AU over the organization's recognition of the Polisario's "Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic" not only threatens to create a permanent rupture in the regional body but also limits the catalytic role in Africa's economic growth that Morocco, given its relative sophistication and depth of integration with Europe and the Mediterranean and Atlantic basins, is especially well positioned to play.

I have taken the liberty of attaching a copy of the paper for your consideration.

Best regards, /s/ JPP

DISCUSSION PAPER 1/2013

Morocco and the African Union

Prospects for Re-engagement and Progress on the Western Sahara

Terence McNamee,
Greg Mills and
J Peter Pham

Strengthening Africa's economic performance

Morocco and the African Union

Prospects for Re-engagement and Progress on the Western Sahara

Contents

Introduction	4
Background	6
OAU to AU	6
Re-engaging Africa	9
Irreconcilable Differences?	11
Africa's new security landscape.. . . .	15
Economic integration	16
New Directions for Morocco and the AU?.	20
Endnotes	24

About the Authors

Terence McNamee is the Deputy Director, and Greg Mills is the Director of the Brenthurst Foundation. J Peter Pham is Director of the Africa Centre at the Atlantic Council in Washington DC, and Editor-in-chief of the Journal of the Middle East and Africa.

Published in February 2013 by:
 The Brenthurst Foundation
 E Oppenheimer & Son (Pty) Ltd
 PO Box 61631, Johannesburg 2000, South Africa
 Tel +27-(0)11 274-2096 · Fax +27-(0)11 274-2097
www.thebrenthurstfoundation.org

All rights reserved. The material in this publication may not be reproduced, stored, or transmitted without the prior permission of the publisher. Short extracts may be quoted, provided the source is fully acknowledged.

Layout and design by Sheaf Publishing, Benoni.

Executive Summary

On the 50th anniversary of the founding of the first pan-African organisation, this Paper examines Morocco's relationship with the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) and its successor, the African Union (AU), in the evolving context of one of the world's most intractable feuds, the dispute over the Western Sahara. Morocco formally withdrew from the OAU in 1984 over the admission of the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR) as a full member of the organisation. SADR claims sovereignty over the whole Western Sahara territory, which Morocco claims as its own. In the nearly 30 years since, Morocco has refused to rejoin the OAU/AU – and remains the only African country that is not a member – unless the membership of SADR, which is only partially recognised internationally, is withdrawn or frozen. This dispute has impaired Morocco's relations with, to varying extents, all African countries and creates serious divisions within the AU.

The spectre of transnational conflict in Africa's Sahel region – punctuated by France's intervention in Mali – has cast a fresh light on the stalemate over the Western Sahara, which has been a pawn in regional power plays for decades. Many analysts have warned that rising instability in the region is a threat to the uneasy peace that has prevailed since the UN-brokered ceasefire in 1991. Conversely, this Paper argues that for all the uncertainty and potential flashpoints the Arab Spring and the crisis in the Sahel have laid bare for the countries of the region, this period of transition – as with major political shifts elsewhere in recent history – may provide a window of opportunity to break the deadlock over the Western Sahara and thus smooth Morocco's re-entry into the AU. In particular, the need for new forms of economic and security cooperation should fuel a new push for a diplomatic settlement, even if positions over the Western Sahara's status appear as entrenched as ever.

Within Morocco, further internal reform would reinforce the seriousness of its 2007 autonomy proposal for the Western Sahara and help address a number of questions about its viability. For all Morocco's investment in the territory and concerted efforts to bring a Sahrawi elite into the establishment, there is no avoiding the existence of strong nationalist sentiment or the continuing perception on the ground of an occupation. That does not make independence any more of a panacea for the myriad local and regional issues at stake – as AU statements routinely suggest – but it does illustrate that Morocco may need to rethink some of the core arrangements in the autonomy proposal to counter the powerful lure of self-determination.

For its part, the AU has buried its head in the Saharan sands for far too long. If it is to engage meaningfully on this issue, it must engage Morocco, SADR and, perhaps most consequentially, SADR's main backer, Algeria, with new ideas and realistic avenues to break the impasse. Morocco's continuing absence from the AU not only threatens to create a permanent rupture in the organisation but also limits the catalytic role in Africa's economic growth that Morocco, given its relative sophistication and depth of integration with Europe and the Mediterranean and Atlantic basins, is especially well positioned to play.

We can only speak of Africa when Morocco is included; and of the African Union when it is excluded
– A senior AU official

Introduction

The spectre of transnational conflict in Africa's Sahel region has cast a fresh light on one of the world's most intractable feuds, the dispute over the Western Sahara. In November 2012, the United Nations Secretary General's Personal Envoy for Western Sahara, Christopher Ross, warned that the crisis had lasted 'far too long' and called any acceptance of the status quo a 'serious miscalculation'. He went on to urge the Kingdom of Morocco and the government-in-exile of the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR) to 'move swiftly into serious negotiations' over the Western Sahara – a territory both claim as their own – and implored the key external actors (notably the United States, France and Algeria) to pressure the two sides to do so. In a region increasingly exposed to multiple, inter-locking security threats – from extremist Islamists, secessionists, displaced persons, drug traffickers and mercenaries, to say nothing of deteriorating civil–military relations – a potentially catalytic conflict such as the one in the Western Sahara 'cannot be allowed', according to Ross, 'to stand still'.¹

The Arab Spring and the related 'fall-out'² underline the potential consequences of inaction over the Western Sahara, which has been a pawn in regional power plays for decades. Many analysts have warned that rising instability in the region is a threat to the uneasy peace that has prevailed since the UN-brokered ceasefire in 1991. Even so, the temptation to let this enduring dispute remain frozen is strong. The Western Sahara is one of several intractable 'intra'-state issues that has defied the international community's efforts to facilitate its 'solution' for decades. A long-time observer of the struggle has called it a 'chronic illness'.³ In this respect it is not dissimilar to the conflict in Cyprus or even the Israeli–Palestinian conflict, although it elicits nowhere near the global interest that those two struggles provoke. Notwithstanding their diverse origins and different triggers for violence, at the heart of these intractable conflicts lay sharply contrasting interpretations of key historical events, which shape the opposing communities' identities as well as their sense of justice and what is rightfully theirs.

In a year which began with a surprise intervention by France in Mali and a mass hostage-taking of Westerners by Islamist terrorists in neighbouring Algeria, North Africa and the Sahel region are sure to be high on the agenda of Western diplomats and the African Union. Paradoxically, this could diminish the effort to find new mechanisms for the Western Sahara, if it is seen as too risky to launch a diplomatic push when political dynamics in the neighbourhood are so fluid. Despite Ross's warning, the dispute may indeed be destined to 'stand still' for some time yet.

At the heart of these intractable conflicts lay sharply contrasting interpretations of key historical events, which shape the opposing communities' identities as well as their sense of justice and what is rightfully theirs

There are compelling reasons why all parties to the conflict should no longer regard this as a viable alternative. In human welfare terms, the Sahrawi people have most to lose by maintenance of the status quo. As many as a hundred thousand Sahrawis live in wretched conditions in refugee camps in southern Algeria; some have been there since the 1970s. Of the remainder of the (est.) 400 000 people of the historically nomadic Sahrawi tribes who live in Western Sahara (some are dispersed in neighbouring countries), they face harsh living conditions and are, according to international human rights groups, subject to violations on a regular basis by Moroccan security forces.⁴ Terrorist groups such as Al Qaida in the Maghreb (AQIM) have tried to exploit such conditions to convince young Sahrawi to join the movement, which is seeking to establish fundamentalist regimes based on Islamic Law (or Sharia) and expel 'foreign' influences from the region. Although over the years they have had limited success due, at least in part, to their conflicting aims (AQIM is anti-nationalist), AQIM has shown an increasing pragmatism in its use of 'outside help'⁵ and the fluid situation appears to be evolving in a negative direction. In Mali, AQIM-linked militias and the Touaregs temporarily joined forces in early 2012 to rout government forces in the north of the country, before turning on each other a few months later. In the absence of meaningful progress on the Western Sahara dispute – whatever the outcome – it is hard to imagine how the Sahrawis' plight might improve, with all the related dangers that portends for the region. In an ominous indication of what might well be ahead, French intelligence sources confirm some 300 Sahrawi youth may have been recruited to militant training camps in northern Mali in late 2012.⁶

Since the 1970s, part of the challenge in 'reimagining' the Western Sahara issue has been the failure of leaders on all sides to promote a reasoned debate on the issue with their publics

Equally hard to envisage is how Morocco might re-join the AU unless there is an end to the stalemate over the Western Sahara. The Kingdom left its predecessor, the Organisation of African Unity (OAU), in 1984 over the admission of SADR. This self-exclusion is not just symbolic. It has real and profound consequences for both Morocco and the organisation. The 'distance' created by the Kingdom's absence from the AU – Morocco is the only African country not to be included as a member – could become permanent, as an increasingly dynamic Moroccan state pursues deeper integration in the wider Atlantic area and reinforces its strong European links. This would not be in the AU's – or Africa's – interest. The evolving crisis in Mali is a potent example of how divisions over the Western Sahara impede potentially vital political and security cooperation on the continent, in this case between regional powerhouses, Algeria and Morocco, both of whom have considerable experience in combating extremism, as well as strong historical and cultural links with the Touareg groups – considered part of the wider Berber diaspora – who are central to any management of the crisis.⁷ In economic terms, too, the AU will be less integrated and therefore less effective in realising its laudable aims and tackling some of the emergent challenges facing the continent, so long as Morocco remains outside the organisation and the Western Sahara issue continues to blight relations between its members.

On the 50th anniversary of the founding of the continent's first pan-African organisation, the OAU, this Paper assesses the current scope for Morocco's reintegration with the AU, mindful that positions on both sides of the Western Sahara dispute are deeply entrenched. The merits of the competing claims on the Western Sahara will not be addressed in any detail. Nor is there a focus on the internal concerns and politics of the Sahrawi leadership, though it goes without saying that they are central to any viable agreement. There are a number of excellent studies examining the complex legal, cultural and historical issues which have scuppered all previous attempts to resolve the Western Sahara crisis⁸, but in general the literature and commentary on the subject inclines towards highly partisan analyses, if not plain propaganda. Since the 1970s, part of the challenge in 'reimagining' the Western Sahara issue has been the failure of leaders on all sides to promote a reasoned debate on the issue with their publics. Instead they have defaulted into a Manichean discourse; among their own, those who challenge their official line are typically seen as quislings, outside the sacred national project.

The specific point of departure in this Paper is Morocco's relationship with Africa and the AU in the evolving context of what is commonly referred to as the 'Western Sahara question'. Lack of meaningful progress on this question has come at significant cost, especially to Africa. Should it continue there is a danger of permanent damage to the pan-African organisation. The Paper argues, however, that for all the uncertainty and potential flashpoints the Arab Spring and the crisis in the Sahel have laid bare for the countries of the region, this period of transition – as with major political shifts elsewhere in recent history – may provide a window of opportunity to break the deadlock over the Western Sahara and thus smooth Morocco's re-entry into the AU.

Background

On 26 February 1976, the colonial power, Spain, officially withdrew from what was then called the Spanish Sahara – a vast, sparsely populated territory with about 1 100 kilometres of Atlantic coastline, with seemingly few resources apart from fishing grounds and phosphate mines. The following day the Polisario Front⁹ – a liberation group founded in May 1973 in Mauritania by students from the Spanish Sahara studying in Morocco – proclaimed the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR) as a government-in-exile. Backed, armed and harboured by Algeria, the Polisario Front initiated a guerrilla war against Morocco and Mauritania, which inherited part of the Spanish Sahara territory.¹⁰

Since then Morocco – which gained its independence from France in 1956 – has engaged in a costly struggle with the Algerian-backed Polisario Front, first on the battlefield, then in international capitals and the halls of the United Nations. In general, the international community has been equivocal in the face of each side's competing claims, encouraging dialogue and emphasising the need for a peaceful resolution. While Morocco has lobbied for international acceptance of its claim to the territory, Algeria and Libya (under Gaddafi) have actively sought recognition for SADR, a process which has seen several reversals with formal recognition extended and withdrawn by foreign governments over the past two decades.

A UN Peace plan was accepted by all parties in 1988 and subsequently a Settlement Plan was endorsed by the Security Council in June 1990¹¹ and the following year the UN brokered cease-fire was implemented on 6 September 1991.¹² The Settlement Plan effectively gave Morocco most of the territory (including the entire Atlantic coastline) whilst SADR 'administered' the remaining (largely uninhabited) eastern part which bordered Mauritania and Algeria from its base in camps around Tindouf in the southwestern part of Algeria. The two areas were separated by a berm – a land-mined embankment in the desert stretching more than 2 000 kms, built by the

This period of transition may provide a window of opportunity to break the deadlock over the Western Sahara

Moroccan army in the 1980s. The Plan comprised a transitional period, the repatriation of refugees, the exchange of prisoners of war and the setting up of an international peace-keeping force referred to as 'MINURSO'¹³ to monitor the cease-fire and the planning and the organisation of a referendum. However, the identification of eligible voters for the self-determination referendum became a permanent stumbling block – both parties rejected alternating referendum proposals in which their putative voters were at a numerical disadvantage.¹⁴ During his time as the UN Secretary General's envoy to the Western Sahara from 1997–2004, former US Secretary of State, James Baker, put forward a series of proposals to break the deadlock over the terms of the referendum, but none succeeded.¹⁵

OAU to AU

The seminal moment in African–Moroccan relations came in February 1982 when at the 69th Council of Ministers conference of the OAU, the Western Sahara was admitted into its membership. In response, Morocco immediately suspended its participation in the OAU. Then, two years later, in November 1984, Morocco officially withdrew from the organisation.

There is nothing that is not disputed about this episode. Nearly all aspects of this chapter are contentious and subject to sharply contrasting interpretations by both governments and scholars. The overwhelming view within Morocco is that the decision was borne of back room deals and the strong-arming of many small and diplomatically-weak African countries by others, especially Morocco's neighbours Algeria and Libya. Special opprobrium is reserved for the then OAU Secretary General, Edem Kodjo. Strong evidence suggests that he exceeded his mandate in determining the legal basis of Western Sahara's admission, in particular by allowing – without prior consultation with the then OAU chairman, Kenyan president Daniel Arap Moi, or the newly-established Implementation Committee on the territory's future – a self-proclaimed republic to take a seat as a member before a referendum on its status organised and supervised by the organisation was held.¹⁶ Chaos followed Kodjo's decision and 19 states walked out in protest at the Secretary General's unilateral move.¹⁷ The affair plunged the OAU into an unprecedented predicament that threatened the very existence of the organisation.

That the historical controversies are unlikely to ever be resolved is evident in the contrasting reflections on the episode by two of the major protagonists, Kodjo and Olusegun Obasanjo, the former President of Nigeria and one of two surviving members of the OAU's ad hoc committee of African leaders ('Wisemen') established in 1978 to seek a solution to the Western Sahara question compatible with the right of self-determination.¹⁸ Following his spell as OAU Secretary General, Kodjo, who later served twice as Prime Minister of Togo, has been equivocal, at best, about the Western Sahara's claim to statehood. He has suggested that SADR no longer possesses the conditions that had motivated its endorsement at the OAU and attempted to shift the blame for the imbroglio onto sitting African heads of state at the time.¹⁹ Conversely, Obasanjo remains convinced that the decision to admit the Western Sahara in 1982 was correct and its claim to full independence should be facilitated through the mechanisms of the AU.²⁰

The AU's predecessor, the OAU, was founded in the wake of decolonisation and based on the principles of state sovereignty and non-interference. The main impetus behind its establishment was to consolidate newly-independent African states, prevent the balkanisation of the continent and, critically, gain independence for a number of new nations.

Morocco was a major force in the OAU's establishment, through 'The Casablanca Group' – an organisation of 'progressive' states which included Algeria, Egypt, Ghana and Morocco – which merged with its rival, the Monrovia Group, and eventually led to the creation of the OAU in 1963. More broadly, Morocco perceived itself as a major contributor to African solidarity and ardent supporter of various liberation movements across the continent. Consequently, when Morocco withdrew from the

In 1963 Morocco was one of two countries that had made strong reservations and abstained from voting in favour of the sanctity of frontiers at the formation of the OAU

OAU it was very much as a deeply disillusioned state, which believed that the OAU had acted perversely against its own founding charter, which stipulated that the territoriality of states was a sine qua non condition for their membership. This was all the more so because the Polisario was never recognised by the OAU as an African liberation movement and the SADR was not a sovereign, independent state with control over its territories. In 1963 Morocco was one of two countries (the other was Somalia) that had made strong reservations and abstained from voting in favour of the sanctity of frontiers at the formation of the OAU, pointing out that their territorial integrity was not yet achieved. This goes some way to explaining its different interpretation of 'decolonisation' in the context of Spain's withdrawal from the Spanish Sahara.

Nevertheless, from the Moroccan perspective the damage was done. In response Morocco closed its embassies in several African countries and concentrated more heavily on greater Euro-Mediterranean integration, its membership of the Arab league, and establishing free trade agreements with European countries and the United States. In 1987, Morocco even applied to join the then European Economic Community. This was arguably a more symbolic than quixotic gesture: Morocco knew from its advance diplomacy that it stood no chance of admission, as much due to its poor human rights record and lack of democracy as geography. Nonetheless, Morocco's reigning monarch, King Hassan II, persevered with the application, a clear signal to sub-Saharan Africa that Morocco's future laid elsewhere.²¹

The AU was broadly modelled on the European Union, with a number of comprehensive frameworks and governing institutions covering its main areas of concern

The OAU, meanwhile, was faltering badly. It was derided internationally as 'the Dictators Club'. Corruption, poverty and authoritarianism were pervasive amongst its members, many of whom became entwined in proxy conflicts fought on behalf of the Cold War superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union. Although civil wars abounded, the OAU stood on the sidelines and did not intervene; it was rendered impotent, as much by its own now-anachronistic charter as by the failings of its leaders.

By the end of the 1990s a number of key African leaders, notably Libya's Muammar Gaddafi – eager to create a new platform for his grandiose political aims – were pushing for a radical rethink of the OAU. The result was the AU, formed in 2002. This new organisation was recast from the vestiges of the OAU into a new continental body that was committed to increase Africa's development, combat poverty and corruption, and, critically, end Africa's many conflicts, if necessary through intervention.

The AU was broadly modelled on the European Union, with a number of comprehensive frameworks and governing institutions covering its main areas of concern: The Assembly, comprised of heads of state; The Executive Council and the all-important Commission, which does the lion's share of the policy implementation; The Peace and Security Council (PSC), the body which was established to intervene in African conflicts to protect the security of the continent; the Pan African Parliament; the Economic, Social and Cultural Council (ECOSOCC); the Court of Justice; and other entities, such as the New Economic Partnership for Africa's Development (NEPAD). There are also far reaching plans to set up more integrated financial institutions, and by 2023 an African Economic Community with a single currency.

The scale of ambitions for the AU is vast, but the organisation is a direct reflection of Africa itself – it is struggling to reform its governing structures and progress towards its laudable aims has in some areas been painfully slow, if not non-existent. With huge financial and organisational barriers, the AU has a mountain to climb before it can claim to be 'fit for purpose'. The burdens and expectations on the AU – perhaps most especially in its formidably challenging peacekeeping missions – are enormous. And there have been some very significant failures, notably its inability to devise an effective response to the Zimbabwean crisis of the 2000s.²²

Several experts have rightly observed, however, that regional and continental bodies in Europe, Asia and Latin America also took many years to establish themselves and grow into their charters.²³ In 2012 the organisation moved into its striking new headquarters (funded and built by the Chinese as 'a gift

With huge financial and organisational barriers, the AU has a mountain to climb before it can claim to be 'fit for purpose' to Africa') in Addis Ababa and elected an impressive new Chairperson of the Commission, Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma, one of South Africa's most respected government ministers. Ultimately, however, the AU's success will hinge on the realisation of one of its founding principles, that Africa's conflicts must be resolved before the continent can achieve prosperity. On that score, there are new grounds for optimism. Its most ambitious mission is the AU peacekeeping force in Somalia, a battle-hardened army of nearly 18 000 uniformed personnel. Security experts argue that this mission has been more effective in restoring a measure of stability to the country's chaotic, war-torn capital than any other foreign force, including the American mission in the 1990s.²⁴

The one conflict which creates the most strain within the institution itself is the Western Sahara. By its own admission²⁵, however, the AU Commission 'has more or less buried its head in the sand'. The body has done little more than continually reiterate its support of the on-going efforts by the UN²⁶ to find a solution to the conflict consistent with relevant Security Council and General Assembly resolutions that will provide for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara. The only statements made by successive Commission Chairpersons 'start and stop with the assertion that Morocco is an important part of Africa and has an important contribution to make to the development of the continent, and with an expression of hope that a solution will be found so that Morocco can "re-join the African family"'.²⁷

The question is whether Morocco can do that outside the AU.

Re-engaging Africa

Following Morocco's exit from the OAU in the 1980s, its bilateral relations narrowed in scope and became confined to specific areas, such as oil imports from Nigeria and humanitarian aid. Its diplomatic approach was characterised by Abdallah Saaf, Minister of Education from 1998 to 2002, as 'Royal Air Maroc [the national airline] diplomacy – almost totally symbolic. It means that we only have relationships with countries that our airline serves. Southern African countries are ignored and our representation in South Africa is more symbolic than effective'.²⁸

Since 2000, however, Morocco has made a determined effort to re-engage with Africa (especially French speaking African countries) on several fronts. The Kingdom re-opened several diplomatic representations, both resident and non-resident; and it reinforced its presence in several African-related from these states. In the field of education, a grant programme for African students was launched; today over 7 000 grants to African students from 35 countries are awarded annually for study at Moroccan universities. He also made numerous official visits to African countries, which have resulted in the conclusion of 17 bilateral trade agreements.

In November 2010, the then Moroccan minister of foreign affairs and cooperation, Taib Fassi Fihri, proposed the creation of an Alliance for development in Africa as a framework to coordinate bilateral, regional and international initiatives related to the African continent. Morocco also launched in 2009 the ministerial conference of Atlantic African countries (African states on the Atlantic Ocean coast) and established a permanent secretariat in Morocco. The second ministerial conference, which took place in Morocco on 15 November 2010, adopted an action plan for cooperation and coordination in the fields of politics, security, economics and the environment.²⁹ In parallel, with support from the European Commission's Bureau of European Policy Advisors (BEPA), Morocco has organised an even more ambitious series of international forums, which met in 2009 and 2012 in Shkirat, outside Rabat, with the goal of creating a broader 'Atlantic Community' linking the African states on the ocean's littoral with their European and American counterparts.³⁰

Of the 252 international accords Morocco signed in 2010, 96 were with African countries in the field of telecommunications, water management, electricity, fisheries, air-transport and banking. The majority of

By its own admission the AU Commission 'has more or less buried its head in the sand' forums, such as the Franco–African summits and the first Euro–Africa summit in 2000. During the latter's proceedings, Morocco's King Muhammad VI (who succeeded his father King Hassan II in 1999) announced a debt forgiveness plan for Africa's least-developed countries, and the eradication of the custom duties to be levied on the products imported

Figure 1: Imports and exports to sub-Saharan Africa

these accords were related to projects involving private Moroccan businessmen though it includes some public bodies operating in African markets or investing directly in African companies.³¹ In the 1990s, Moroccan trade with sub-Saharan Africa amounted to an average of $300 million annually, barely 2 per cent of Morocco's foreign exchange. Between 1998 and 2008, however, the volume improved dramatically, averaging $529 million annually and reaching $1 billion in 2008. Nevertheless, it is still 'far below its potential', a Ministry of Finances report concluded in 2007. Between 1998 and 2008, for example, sales of agricultural products on the African market never exceeded 0.3 per cent of Morocco's agricultural exports and 0.05 per cent of Africa's total imports of the same. Likewise, less than 0.7 per cent of Moroccan textile exports go to African countries, an amount equivalent to barely 0.35 per cent of their textile imports, while just 2.5 per cent of Morocco's chemical products are exported to Africa, equivalent to 0.3 per cent of the total amount imported by the rest of the continent.³²

Morocco's political re-engagement with Africa under King Mohammed VI is doubtless borne of numerous practical and strategic considerations.

The underlying message to Africa, however, is that Morocco is a country of serious political and economic clout, integral to the continent's development and prepared to play a leading role in its future – but perhaps not unconditionally. Morocco would not budge on its position on re-taking its seat at the AU: it would not re-join unless the membership of 'SADR' was frozen. After 1984, Morocco expended a huge amount of diplomatic and financial muscle on trying to get SADR out of the OAU. Although to no avail, for years the subject was deemed too sensitive to be discussed at the annual OAU summits. Moreover, since the organisation had acted decidedly in favour of the Western Sahara by admitting them as a full member, the OAU's potential role in acting as a neutral negotiator between Morocco and SADR to end the conflict was fatally undermined.

On 15 September 2004, just over two years since the AU was founded, Moroccan officials were left reeling after the 'shock' recognition of SADR by South Africa. Hitherto, Moroccan officials believed strongly that they had turned the tide of African opinion on the Western Sahara question and were winning the diplomatic argument. South Africa's 'principled position' on SADR – 'delayed' for 10 years despite clear commitments made by Nelson Mandela as apartheid fell – was ‘based on its rejection of colonialism in all its forms and the support for achieving a just, lasting and mutually acceptable political solution, which will provide for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara.’³³ The principles which underpinned this stance included:

1. The centrality of the AU and UN in the resolution of the conflict; and
2. The sanctity of inherited colonial borders in Africa and the right of peoples of former colonial territories to self-determination and independence as contained in the Constitutive Act of the AU.

Morocco swiftly withdrew its ambassador to Pretoria and condemned South Africa’s ‘partial, stunning and ill-timed’ decision, noting in its official response ‘the pioneer support it has continuously provided to the legitimate struggle of the South African people for its dignity and freedom,’ referring to the ANC’s struggle against apartheid.³⁴ Yet formal recognition by such a significant African player – South Africa constitutes 25 per cent of the AU’s economy – only served to redouble Morocco’s effort to re-invigorate its African linkages and relationships.

Additional impetus was given by the impending secession of South Sudan, which achieved independent statehood and full international recognition in July 2011. Morocco feared that the South Sudan ‘precedent’ might soften key international opinion against SADR’s case for formal sovereignty over the Western Sahara territory. The emergence of Africa’s newest state, however, cut both ways. While supporters of the Polisario argued that it strengthened the case for the creation of an independent Western Sahara, the fact that it shattered the precedent that African states conform to colonial borders also undermined one of the principal pillars of claim for a separate Saharan entity based on the boundaries of the Spanish protectorate.

Eighteen months on from the independence of South Sudan, there is no evidence that its experience has made independence more likely for other would-be states in Africa, including Somaliland, which aside from its demonstrated commitment to democratic rule can also legitimately claim – at least more than any other sub-state entity – to fulfil the Montevideo criteria for statehood (a permanent population, a defined territory, government, and the capacity to defend and represent itself), as well as near universal popular support for independence.³⁵ South Sudan’s troubled beginnings – economic warfare with the North, the emergence of Kashmir-like scenarios on its northern border, renewed internecine conflicts inside the country – may have only cemented international opinion against any further ‘balkanisation’ of Africa.

South Sudan’s troubled beginnings may have only cemented international opinion against any further ‘balkanisation’ of Africa

At the time of writing, Morocco is accorded a special status within the AU and benefits from some of the services and institutional arrangements available to all AU states, such as the African Development Bank. In recent years Morocco has worked with the AU Commission in various international partnerships between the AU and different regions and countries, and has even sent representatives for meetings held at the AU in Addis Ababa – this would have been unheard of in the mid 2000s. Outside the halls of the AU summit in Addis Ababa in July 2012, Morocco’s Foreign Minister Saad-Eddine El Othmani was engaged in intensive diplomatic activities. Some have taken it as a sign that Morocco may feel the tide of opinion at the AU is turning in its favour.³⁶

Irreconcilable Differences?

Morocco's renewed political and economic engagement, with Africa aside, the fundamental position on re-joining the AU remains more or less exactly the same: if SADR occupies a seat as a member state, Morocco will stay out of the AU. In 2007 Morocco unveiled a plan offering broad autonomy to the Western Sahara covering executive, legislative and judicial matters whilst Rabat would retain defence, foreign affairs and the currency, as well as the religious prerogatives of the king. Officially called the Moroccan Initiative for Negotiating an Autonomy Statute for the Sahara Region in 2007, it has received considerable international endorsement. Subsequent UN Security Council resolutions renewing MINURSO's mandate have described it as 'serious' and 'credible' and the French, Spanish and US governments expressing support for it.³⁷ In the words of then US Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton, 'Morocco's autonomy plan is serious, realistic, and credible – a potential approach to satisfy the aspirations of the people in the Western Sahara to run their own affairs in peace and dignity'.³⁸

'Morocco's autonomy plan is serious, realistic, and credible – a potential approach to satisfy the aspirations of the people in the Western Sahara to run their own affairs in peace and dignity'

For senior SADR officials, the autonomy plan was a non-starter; they remained singularly focused on achieving full statehood. Autonomy was only relevant insofar as it could be one of the options that the Sahrawi people could choose in the promised UN-organised referendum on the Western Sahara's future, so long as outright independence was also on the ballot. The African countries that support SADR, such as South Africa, generally concurred that this was a clear case of self-determination.

There is a lack of unanimity on this issue, both internationally and among member states of the AU, however. As of 2012, the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic has been recognized by 85 states, although 32 states have 'frozen' or 'withdrawn' recognition for a number of reasons. A total of 40 states currently maintain diplomatic relations with SADR, though Sahrawi embassies exist in only 18 states. Within Africa, 38 states have recognised SADR though more than a dozen have 'de-recognised' it. Kenya, for example, suspended its decision to recognize SADR in

Within Morocco, the struggle to preserve sovereignty over this disputed territory has been viewed as something of a sacred obligation

2006, apparently so it could act as a mediating party. But under the AU Charter, just like the UN Charter, there is no provision for de-recognition. In technical and legal terms, therefore, it is immaterial how many African countries derecognise SADR.³⁹ According to a senior AU official, the political position of the AU with regard to Morocco's membership boils down to the following: The Constitutive Act of the AU gives a window to Morocco to come back – but it must do so without any conditions. Effectively, then, this 'position' means 'acceptance of the Western Sahara as a separate country'.⁴⁰ Not only is this currently – and doubtless for the foreseeable future – unacceptable to Morocco but it is difficult to imagine any Moroccan government even considering it as an option.

Within Morocco, the struggle to preserve sovereignty over this disputed territory has been viewed as something of a sacred obligation, by the King of Morocco as much as ordinary citizens. For all King Mohammed VI's genuine popularity and importance to national identity – which has helped keep the Arab Spring largely at bay in Morocco – it is widely argued that the existence of the monarchy in its present form is dependent on the outcome in Western Sahara, since it has become its principal rallying cry. So sensitive is the issue within Morocco that criticism of its security forces' response to unrest in Sahrawi refugee camps in November 2010 prompted hundreds of thousands to take to the streets of the country's largest city, Casablanca, in protest. (The criticism was levelled by an opposition political party in Spain.) Internationally, Morocco's main supporters fear that its 'loss' of the Western Sahara would severely weaken one of the main bulwarks for moderation and stability in the region.

In talks on the Western Sahara's future, the autonomy proposal remains the anchoring framework for Morocco and its international backers. The proposal is brief, with less than two dozen substantive clauses, and borrows heavily from experiences elsewhere, particularly European models.⁴¹ There are a host of unanswered questions – the exact borders of the autonomous region, the division of resources, police and army presence, flag, even what the region would be called – but Morocco believes they needn't

Internationally, Morocco's main supporters fear that its 'loss' of the Western Sahara would severely weaken one of the main bulwarks for moderation and stability in the region preclude the plan from serving, at a minimum, as an entry point for negotiations. Other commentators have raised questions about the efficacy of the plan given that the proposed autonomous entity would, in its legal and institutional make-up, be fully democratic while the 'parent state' would continue to function as a monarchy where the King effectively controls the key levers of the state. Whether a democratic, self-governing Western Sahara could be embedded within a less-free but infinitely more powerful Morocco is an open question.⁴²

For SADR, its own position is complicated by the lack of intellectual and legal consensus on the concept of self-determination. International law provides few pointers in deciding on independence movements, in Africa as elsewhere, where the principles of 'self-determination' and 'territorial integrity' collide, with no clear track to reconcile the two. At the founding of the OAU in 1963, for instance, the former Portuguese protectorate of Cabinda was ranked by the organisation as the 39th state still to be decolonised and Angola as the 35th. The enclave of Cabinda had a separate history and legal status as a Portuguese colony and was for much of its history (although not all) governed separately from Angola. In this and other respects it was similar to the Spanish Sahara. Yet since the Alvor Agreement granting Angola independence was signed in 1975, and Cabinda – which refused to sign the agreement – was forcibly subsumed into Angola proper as a province by MPLA⁴³ (and Cuban) troops, the OAU and its successor the AU have effectively accepted the Angolan fait accompli without so much as a murmur. That Cabindans saw its incorporation into Angola then (and now) as a clear violation of their right to self-determination has never garnered much interest beyond its borders.

The right to unilaterally establish a new state based on the principle of self-determination outside the colonial context is not recognised in international law. Morocco has steadfastly argued that SADR's claim falls 'outside', whereas its supporters assert that it is a clear case of decolonisation. Yet the wisdom of applying an understanding of self-determination framed exclusively by decolonisation and 'all-or-nothing' propositions is problematic, according to some legal experts.⁴⁴ Since the end of the Cold War, there has been much greater emphasis placed on the idea of self-determination as less an automatic right to statehood than a right to democratic governance. To complicate matters further, often there is no shared vision of what constitutes 'self-determination' between locals and their putative representatives who sit at the AU table or regional fora. Some African 'leaders' patently do not control the territories they purport to represent: not so much ungoverned spaces as spaces governed by the ungoverned.⁴⁵

Any discussion of self-determination for SADR must also reflect on the role of Algeria, which still refuses to allow a census of the Sahrawi population in its camps. Morocco's supporters charge that Polisario is not only backed and funded by Algeria but in fact has no sovereign decision-making power; its leaders take direct orders from Algiers, which is less committed to the Sahrawi people than it is to 'whatever may unsettle Morocco'.⁴⁶ To be sure, Algeria has used the Western Sahara as a pawn in its fight for regional supremacy and a means to consolidate domestic support in a country still struggling with the consequences of its brutal, murky civil war and the myriad sources of potential instability within its borders. But so, to a more limited extent, has Morocco. The legacy of mistrust between the two countries has kept their shared border closed since 1994 and fuelled a dangerous arms race. In May 2012, the Moroccans declared the UN Envoy, Christopher Ross, biased in favour of Algeria.

Figure 2: World SADR status

On the face of it, therefore, the positions are irreconcilable. On 11 to 13 March 2012, a ninth round of UN-backed informal talks on the Western Sahara was held in New York. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon's summary of the meeting conveyed more or less the same gloomy message as the previous rounds:

The parties discussed and disagreed sharply on the purpose of the negotiating process. Morocco argued that the process was meant to negotiate the details of its autonomy proposal in preparation for a referendum of confirmation. Frente Polisario countered that it was meant to open the door to all possibilities in preparation for a referendum with multiple options. Each side continued to reject the other's proposal as the basis for negotiation.⁴⁷

Against these entrenched divisions, the past may not be a helpful guide for new ideas to break the stalemate. Where alternatives may emerge is in a consideration of Africa's evolving security and economic landscapes, particularly Morocco's changing role.

Africa's new security landscape

From Africa's Mediterranean coast to the southern Sahel there are grave concerns that no country will be immune from the rising tide of insecurity. The main threats – terrorism, insurgency and transnational organised crime – are spilling over the region's porous borders. No one quite foresaw how the Arab Spring would exacerbate and complicate these challenges. Just how unpredictable the future trajectory of these threats could be was underlined by France's surprise intervention in Mali. That a number of extremists from the Boko Haram Islamist movement in Nigeria are reported to have aided rebels in the north of the country is testament to the potential spread of the crisis.⁴⁸ There is a potential upside in all this, however: an increasingly fragile and uncertain environment could set the stage for new forms of political and security cooperation.⁴⁹ For Morocco, it could also soften some of the intractable divisions – in particular with Algeria and the AU – over the Western Sahara.

Africa – and particularly the AU – must lead in defining its own changing security landscape and devise an effective, comprehensive and coherent approach. Piecemeal efforts by one country alone will achieve little. In North Africa and the Sahel, there is an urgent requirement to strengthen logistical coordination and intelligence cooperation among all affected countries and pool resources and materiel for joint security operations. The success of any multi-lateral response would be undermined by Morocco's exclusion, given its political, military and economic clout, as well as its direct experience of terrorism. As recently as April 2011 Morocco itself fell victim to AQIM-linked terrorists, who attacked the country's number one tourist destination, Marrakech. By joining the AU, Morocco – which boasts military and intelligence services as advanced as any in the wider region – would also join the Joint Military Staff Committee of the Sahel Region (CEMOC), which

Africa – and particularly the AU – must lead in defining its own changing security landscape

has taken a leading role in coordinating anti-terrorist operations.⁵⁰ Benjamin Nickels argued recently that 'AU member states could also benefit from Morocco's relations and strong political and economic interests with the European Union, and its membership in the NATO Mediterranean Dialogue (which also includes Algeria, Tunisia, Egypt and Mauritania), to strengthen military cooperation with these major entities. This cooperation may include intelligence support, and permission to land military forces in the Sahara, where terrorist groups and criminal gangs carry out their criminal activities.⁵¹

Given the limited resources and technical capabilities of most African states, foreign assistance will play an important part in tackling the interlocking security challenges affecting the Sahel region. Nevertheless, recent events have highlighted the need for regional powers with in-depth knowledge of a highly complex and fluid security terrain to lead the response. France's intervention in Mali to halt the advance of Islamist militias on the capital, Bamako, has been met with broad approval in the region – but ultimately France's actions will be judged on its long-term effectiveness in promoting stability, which is far from certain.⁵² For its part, the United States is beginning to question the effectiveness of its costly pan-Sahelian counter terrorism initiative, launched in 2002 to train the region's armed forces in countering violent Islamists. In three of the four states which received US assistance – Mauritania, Niger and Mali – the army has seized power. In the fourth, Chad, the army came close in 2006.⁵³ 'The tendency in the west', argue some experts in the region, 'to look at Islamic extremism as a global threat and a global phenomenon, at the expense of local dynamics, has led to a string of policy failures'.⁵⁴

'The tendency in the west to look at Islamic extremism as a global threat and a global phenomenon, at the expense of local dynamics, has led to a string of policy failures.'

Morocco's contribution to an African-led solution or approach to the crisis would be greatly enhanced by a rapprochement between the Kingdom and Algeria – which has a de facto veto over Morocco's involvement – something which both publics would enthusiastically welcome. Both administrations are under pressure to deliver wider political reform whilst avoiding Arab-Spring-type uprisings. That Morocco's new foreign minister made Algiers his first foreign trip in January 2012 may reflect their shared anxiety over the pace of reform as well as the rise of extremist parties within their midst,⁵⁵ but it might also hint at the possibility of normalisation in their relations. One should not underestimate the reservoir of mutual suspicion that still exists, however. Algeria's President Bouteflika was the country's foreign minister when the Polisario was established in the 1970s (Morocco's current King was just ten years old) and his regime comprises a cadre of war-hardened officials not easily given to compromise, not least with their bitter rival next door.⁵⁶

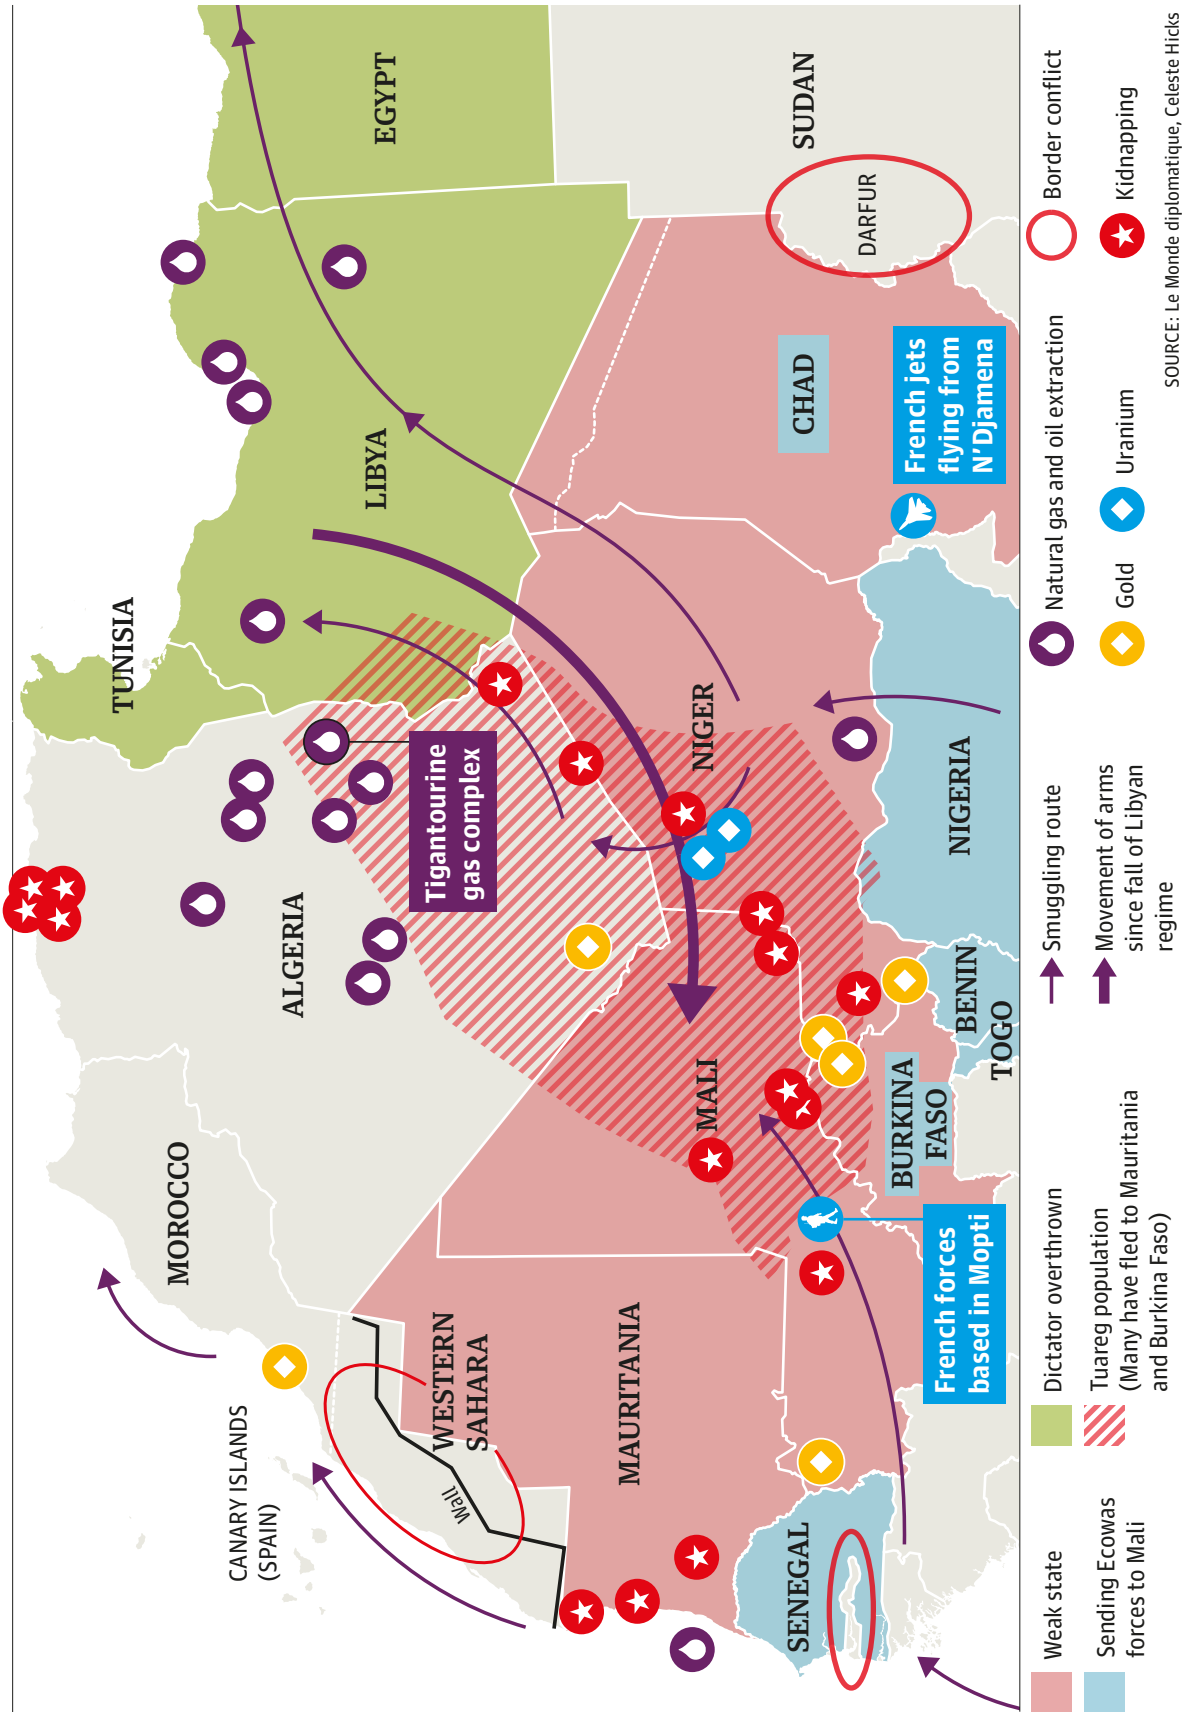

Economic integration

Morocco's fight with Algeria over the Western Sahara impedes regional economic integration at least as much as security cooperation. This lack of integration has blocked potentially enormous opportunities for development in the areas of infrastructure, transport and energy, which could have a transformative impact on poverty, job creation and food security across a broad swathe of the continent.

Morocco is a member of the moribund Arab Maghreb Union (AMU). Arguably the worst performing regional economic community (REC) in Africa, the AMU comprises Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Mauritania and Libya. It was founded in 1989 on high hopes of future economic and even political unity, rooted in their shared Arab/Berber culture and language, Muslim religion and experience of French colonialism. The AMU has not convened a meeting since 1994, however. Again, the principal (though not only) source of division has been the Western Sahara question. The consequences for intra-regional trade have been palpable: current estimates put it between 1.2 to 2 per cent, one of the lowest levels recorded for regional trade in the world.⁵⁷ If the AMU had instead realised its goal of a fully-fledged free trade area, it would nearly double the level of commercial relations within the Maghreb region, according to one recent study,⁵⁸ and significantly raise overall GDP.

Figure 3: North and west Africa: A region in turmoil

The Arab Spring, and perhaps especially the removal of the polarising figures of Gaddafi and Tunisian leader Zine el Abidine Ben Ali, appears to have breathed new life into the AMU, with Tunisia leading the effort to revive the union. The hope is that some long-delayed projects, particularly the Trans-Maghreb Highway, which could have a catalytic impact on development across the region, might finally be realised. Greater energy trade could also have a huge multiplier effect. The potential for complementarity between oil-rich Algeria, which exports almost nothing to other Maghreb countries, and Morocco, with its sophisticated banking, manufacturing and resources (mainly phosphates) sector, is vast.

Of course, potential is one thing, reality another. In the past all North African states have played their part in the region's pernicious balance of power game, often using the Western Sahara as a political football, despite all the fine-sounding words about Maghreb unity.⁵⁹ Attempts to influence Libya's Transitional National Council to fall behind Morocco's claim on the Western Sahara or recognise SADR is a case in point. Nevertheless, long-time observers of Maghreb politics believe the Arab Spring together with the emergence of a new generation of economic elites in Algeria, seemingly keen to forge a détente with Morocco, could rescue the AMU.

The potential for Morocco to serve as one of the continent's key hubs for integration and commerce is clear

Morocco is also at the forefront of African integration beyond the borders of the Maghreb. The Kingdom has sought to assume leadership of CEN-SAD – the Community of Sahara–Sahel States. The least known of Africa's RECS, CEN-SAD ballooned to 28 members under Gaddafi's largesse, covering a vast area of the continent. But it lacked a viable raison d'être and appeared doomed to oblivion after the death of the Libyan leader in 2011. CEN-SAD was given a lifeline when members lobbied Morocco to take command of the organisation, which includes major continental powers

Kenya and Nigeria. For the Kingdom it represents, according to Nickels, a unique opportunity to project its influence in a grouping that draws 'Africa's Arab and Muslim North into the continent's south.' This would allow Morocco to engage more fully in a region where it has deepening security concerns and wishes to broaden its economic links – and without worrying about an Algerian 'veto'. Algeria is the only Muslim country in Africa that has refused to join the organisation. In joining, Algeria believes it would be tantamount to recognition of Moroccan sovereignty over the Western Sahara, which borders the Sahel (Algeria does not consider Morocco a Sahelian country).⁶⁰

In less than a decade, Morocco went from an economic straggler to one of the top five recipients of foreign investment in Africa

The potential for Morocco to serve as one of the continent's key hubs for integration and commerce is clear. The inter-continental Tanger Med port and the expansion of Casablanca airport are only two of several existing projects which demonstrate what might be possible, if linked to other countries' investments in road and rail infrastructure. As a member of the AU, Morocco would also be well positioned to serve as a channel for internal aid to African infrastructure projects, with Moroccan firms serving as the implementation agents in sectors such as agriculture, health and water.⁶¹

Morocco's rapid development over the past 15 years puts it among very few African countries that can genuinely claim to be an economic model for the rest of the continent. The President of the Congo Republic and former AU Chairperson, Denis Sassou Nguessou, said as much in early 2012, in a speech advocating deeper economic ties in Africa: 'The Moroccan model should be taken into account for the free trade area project in Africa'. He reportedly added that Morocco should return to the AU though provided no recipe for its re-admission.

In less than a decade, Morocco went from an economic straggler to one of the top five recipients of foreign investment in Africa. Once best known as a louche retreat for European travellers, Morocco is today home to some of the most ambitious manufacturing, infrastructure and tourism schemes in Africa.⁶² Through a solid programme of macro-economic reforms and economic diversification Morocco has been able to raise gross national income

In some areas, Morocco still faces enormous socio-economic challenges, especially in education and literacy

per person five-fold from US$550 in the 1970s to US$2,850 in 2010. The average life expectancy increased from 55 years to 73 in 2009. Over the past ten years, poverty rates have declined by more than 40 per cent.⁶³ A few decades ago, less than 15 per cent of Moroccans had access to water; today only about 10 per cent do not. The former managing director of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) described Morocco as a 'pillar of development in the region' and an example of progressive reform for Arab and African countries alike.⁶⁴

In some areas, Morocco still faces enormous socio-economic challenges, especially in education and literacy.⁶⁵ And for all the progress on the processes of democratisation and the consolidation of the rule of law, the implementation of the reforms announced by the King in 2011 have been, at best, sluggish. Nevertheless, Morocco's political and economic progress in recent years led to its selection as the first country in the region to be granted 'advanced status' by the European Union, which makes it a pioneer in the European Neighbourhood Policy. The agreement constitutes a 'roadmap' which widens the sphere of EU–Morocco bilateral relations. Morocco is already the foremost beneficiary in the region of European funds allocated to Neighbourhood Policy countries (€654 million for 2007–2010).⁶⁶

Morocco's main economic, financial and social relations are with Europe and as such it has cultivated a high degree of dependency on its northern neighbours. At the same time, Morocco does not have a seat at the European table. So as Europe reshapes itself, Morocco will effectively remain prisoner to that situation, with little or no power to affect outcomes that bear heavily on its economic and political priorities. 'We have to follow what is happening in Europe and we have little control over how our relations evolve with the rest of the continent', according to former minister Abdalla Saaf. 'And in spite of the historical legacy of our past with Europe (mainly France and Spain), we are considered as a country that belongs to its margin. We are seen like Ukraine and Moldova for instance.'⁶⁷ His comments were made before the 2008 global financial crisis and the years of austerity which have ensued. Today, the current crisis in the euro zone has 'raised new questions about the future of the EU and the degree of European openness to societies on its periphery'.⁶⁸

Beyond Europe, Morocco retains considerable influence in the Muslim world – as a founding member of the Organisation of the Islamic Conference and a member of the League of Arab States. This is particularly true of the Gulf states, as more summits of the two bodies have taken place in Morocco than any other Arab or Muslim country (the frequent visits of Saudi Arabia's king and the United Arab Emirates' leader is a case in point).

Until the impasse over the Western Sahara question is broken Morocco's full contribution to Africa will never be realised

Returning to Africa, even without being a member of the AU, Morocco has in the last decade served as president of the Africa Group in the World Trade Organisation (WTO) and president of the Group 77. Going forward, in theory there is nothing preventing Morocco from remaining outside the AU ad infinitum whilst retaining its current informal links both through various missions and in Addis Ababa. The scale of its ambition in Africa in the political and economic spheres is clear. How engaged Morocco will be in the future is by no means certain, however. Until the impasse over the Western Sahara question is broken Morocco's full contribution to Africa will never be realised. As for the AU, Morocco remains keen to resume its membership but there may come a point when it decides to turn its back on the AU permanently, a move that could have far-reaching consequences for the organisation.

New Directions for Morocco and the AU?

This analysis of Morocco's troubled relationship with Africa in the context of the Western Sahara question has focused mainly on high politics and relations between leaders and governments. The views of ordinary Moroccans on the issues discussed above tell a different, perhaps even more revealing story.

Africa is not part of the worldview or consciousness of most Moroccans. Speak to any young professional or student in Morocco today and there can be no doubt that for the vast majority their compass still points in only two directions – north towards Europe and west towards North America. Notwithstanding the commercial links established in (especially West) Africa by top Moroccan businesses, African countries are places which have become 'other': rarely visited or experienced by Moroccans, and for the most part neglected. For decades 'Africa' has been what transits through their country in the form of migrants, seeking a better life in Europe via the continent's closest crossing point on Morocco's coast. Since Morocco's economy took off in the 2000s, 'Africa' has started to stay in the country in increasing numbers, as migrants from poorer sub-Saharan countries secure construction work and other manual jobs that Moroccans generally avoid.⁶⁹ Beyond this, Africa appears to hold little interest. Several years ago the respected Centre for Cross Cultural Learning in Morocco's capital, Rabat, attempted to develop a programme for learning English in Ghana, geared to Moroccan students as an alternative to more expensive destinations for language instruction such as the US and UK. The project never got off the ground because no students (or parents) expressed any interest whatsoever in learning English in an African country. 'We realised then', remarked the head of the Centre, the level of 'misconceptions concerning Africa, particularly English Speaking Africa which is little known in Morocco.'⁷⁰

This blinkered perspective is not restricted to Africa. The comparative dearth of Moroccans working or even travelling in places like India or China speaks to the hegemony of Western culture among the country's elite and youth, which is perhaps surprising in a country that boasts such a rich melange of Islamic, Berber, Maghrebi, Arab and Jewish traditions. The neglect of Africa is all the more pronounced for the fact that the continent is home to Morocco.

For years the issue of the Western Sahara was taboo in Morocco, something that was never spoken about in terms other than the official narrative – i.e., the Western Sahara is an ineluctable part of Morocco and always has been, end of story. More recently the taboo has lessened somewhat, with Moroccan media less constrained in its reporting of the on-going negotiations and even contentious issues such as the Sahawri refugee camps in Tindouf.

Moroccan intellectuals and civil society have a potentially vital role to play in devising ways to address the challenge of Sahawri self-determination

Nevertheless, many would argue that the state's firm monopoly of the Western Sahara question and the management of this issue is still intact. Moroccan intellectuals and civil society have a potentially vital role to play in devising ways to address the challenge of Sahawri self-determination, but thus far they have been largely absent from the debate.⁷¹

The situation might be very different had the crisis over the Western Sahara not culminated in Morocco's exit from the pan-African organisation it helped form. Fifty years on from the founding of the OAU, the return of Morocco to its successor would allow, as one official in Addis Ababa put it, 'Africa to stop being divided', and rid the organisation of its greatest source of friction and strain. 'We can only speak of Africa when Morocco is included; and of the AU when it is excluded.’

At present, there could be no bitterer pill for Morocco to swallow than a resumption of its place at the African table while SADR still occupied a seat. For Rabat this would be tantamount to an acceptance of the AU position. This is not technically the case, according to a senior legal expert at the AU, however. Morocco could take up AU membership without de facto recognition of the SADR, not least

In taking up membership of the AU, Morocco would be joining a more effective continental organisation of far greater promise than its much maligned predecessor

since a large number of African countries do not recognise (or have derecognised) the entity diplomatically. And the AU Charter does not allow for the exclusion of states once they have become members: it has no power of de-recognition or expulsion (although there is nothing that prevents the revision of the Constitutive Act either by consensus or, ‘failing which, by a two-third majority’ of the AU Assembly to provide for such a possibility – an outcome that Morocco is likelier to achieve within the AU, rather than outside of it).⁷²

The AU has been at pains to remind Morocco it left the OAU, an organisation which no longer exists. In taking up membership of the AU, Morocco would be joining a more effective continental organisation of far greater promise than its much maligned predecessor. If Morocco becomes a member of the AU, it will be ‘speaking as part of Africa on African issues – you are part of the software and hardware of Africa – and you can access African markets which are moving to integration.’

Conversely, should the UN-sponsored talks on the Western Sahara finally result in a political settlement, it will be deeply embarrassing for the AU to have a member state that exists in name only. Over time, the AU’s partial position towards the Western Sahara conflict will almost certainly erode its credibility as a continental body. One could go further still and assert that the fundamental principles and objectives of the AU – uphold African unity and deepen continental integration – are threatened by Morocco’s continuing absence. The current security crisis in the region, together with other emergent dynamics which should promote much greater cooperation and integration, have created a significant opportunity to bring Morocco back into the African family, though it may prove short-lived.

The dispute over the Western Sahara was once inextricably linked to the Cold War; riven by ideological differences and evincing many of the attributes of a classic East–West proxy war. Today the conflict is deeply enmeshed in the politics of the Maghreb and the wider region, in particular the struggle for dominance between Algeria and Morocco. This is not to say that self-determination and sovereignty are not central to understanding the dispute and any viable resolution, but rather that future developments on the Western Sahara will be measured more by political decisions made in Rabat and Algiers than these core principles. A staunch supporter of Western Sahara’s right to statehood, Olusegun Obasanjo, has nevertheless also acknowledged that no movement on this issue is possible without a renewed diplomatic dialogue between the two rivals. In the former

The current security crisis in the region, together with other emergent dynamics, have created a significant opportunity to bring Morocco back into the African family, though it may prove short-lived

Nigerian President’s view, the AU’s task, however, is to firstly ‘persuade Morocco that common defence and security will be greatly enhanced’ by its willingness to let Sahrawis decide their fate for themselves.⁷³

Critical to any resolution of the crisis is to stop the negotiations from being held hostage to some of the ‘unworkable and unattractive alternatives’ currently on the table. For more than two decades there has been, for instance, no progress on the timing and terms of a popular referendum. Moreover, there are a number of mechanisms and concepts in the conflict resolution ‘toolkit’ – such as associate statehood, shared sovereignty, free association and so on – that have not yet been adequately considered by either camp.⁷⁴ The 2007 autonomy proposal currently put forward by Morocco as the sole basis of its approach to negotiations has not proved acceptable to SADR, though arguably too little has been done to rethink some of its core arrangements.

Decentralisation would provide a vehicle to satisfy the cultural, political and economic aspirations of hitherto voiceless communities and tribes

Considerable attention has turned to the road-map for regionalisation announced by the King in November 2008 and emboldened two years later with the creation of the Advisory Committee on Regionalisation (CCR).⁷⁵ The stated objective of the CCR is to insert autonomy for Western Sahara into a larger framework of regionalism in Morocco, broadly based on the Spanish model. In theory, this would give far greater scope for Morocco’s long-neglected regions to run their own affairs and eventually result in the establishment of local governments. Decentralisation would provide a vehicle to satisfy the cultural, political and economic aspirations of hitherto voiceless communities and tribes, which could become a template for the wider region.

To be sure, the Western Sahara question cannot be tackled in isolation from dynamics which affect all countries in the region: ‘by resolving Western Sahara, you don’t really resolve the wider problem; the region is infinitely more complex than that’.⁷⁶ The Sahara Desert represents an area bigger than the United States, yet it does not make up a state but part of one. Any political settlement on the Western Sahara is likely to have ramifications for other countries in the region – such as Mauritania, Algeria and Libya – which have within their borders the potential for other Saharan states.⁷⁷ It is worth recalling that the forefathers of the Polisario, after all, wanted to liberate the entire Sahara region not just the present-day territory of the Western Sahara. When weighing up the viability of any strategy, for the Western Sahara as much as other existing or simmering conflicts, the region’s history speaks to the acute importance of identity. The region comprises some of the poorest populations in the world but also some of the strongest identities, most of which are not confined to one state. In attempting to forge a common will of living together, the colonial legacy does not necessarily point to the most effective means to promote stability, prosperity and safeguard peoples’ identities.⁷⁸

Thinking in ‘regionalisation’ terms may be sensible in theory for all states in the region, but diplomatically for Morocco a heavy emphasis on regionalisation may have the opposite effect insofar as negotiations over the Western Sahara. The symbolism of the date of the King’s announcement of the regionalism proposal in 2008 – the 33rd anniversary of the Green March, when hundreds of thousands of Moroccans crossed into the Western Sahara to assert its sovereignty over the territory – was not lost on anyone. However sincere the proposal, in diplomatic terms it is likely to widen the gap because it negates any claims of distinctiveness on the part of SADR; in effect the Western Sahara becomes one of several equally distinct claims within one Moroccan nation.

The region comprises some of the poorest populations in the world but also some of the strongest identities, most of which are not confined to one state

At present Morocco is a highly centralised state, which is one of the reasons many analysts have argued that the autonomy proposal would prove unworkable. At the same time, the instincts of Morocco’s relatively young King are reformist. Morocco is not a democracy but its process of democratisation is more advanced than any country in the region. The Western Sahara will be an important litmus test. Progressive minds are under no illusions about the strength of the nationalist sentiment in Western Sahara. For all Morocco's investment in the territory and concerted efforts to bring a Sahrawi elite into the establishment⁷⁹, there is no avoiding the continuing perception on the ground of an occupation, complete with endless checkpoints, mistreatment by security forces and the like.⁸⁰ That does not make independence any more of a panacea, but it does illustrate that Morocco has much work to do to counter the almost irresistible lure of self-determination.

Further internal reform would reinforce the seriousness of the autonomy proposal and help address the problematic question of hybridity (democracy inside monarchical-based rule). One of the leading Moroccan analysts of the plan, Abdelhamid El Ouali, suggests that it confirms 'the irreversibility of the process of democratisation which the country is experiencing, as autonomy has its own requisites, the most significant being the effective implementation of democracy on both national and local scale. Territorial autonomy is so associated and interwoven with democracy that the former is unimaginable without the latter.'⁸¹ Although Morocco's fiercest critics regard the proposal as nothing more than a ruse to avoid a referendum, within the Kingdom there is a deep conviction in the 'autonomy' concept as the most promising and viable means to address the Western Sahara question.⁸² Over the past 30 years, Rabat's diplomacy has been underpinned by the belief that the liberation struggle will turn out to be a 'blip in the longue durée', an idea that will eventually burn itself out, just as many self-determination movements have, over time, been compelled to scale back their once-steadfast ambitions for statehood.⁸³ The autonomy plan suggests that Rabat is genuinely committed to altering the status quo, but the proof may well rest in its acceptance of some previously unthinkable compromises.

A number of constructive ideas have been put forward by legal experts and political analysts that might, conceivably, soften opposition to the autonomy plan amongst SADR officials and their supporters. Some specific proposals, such as the removal (in a final agreement) of language expressly forbidding secession, would doubtless meet with fierce resistance in Morocco. Yet the act of recognising a 'moral right to secede' could, in itself, give a measure of dignity to the Sahwari people that helps to build confidence in the negotiating process, even where there is unlikely to ever be consensus on the precise conditions under which both sides would allow for the 'right' to be exercised. Moreover, international experience has shown that autonomous arrangements are never likely to be perceived as concrete, fixed for all time, because the minority in multi-national states will always reserve the right to challenge them if they believe their core interests are at stake. The 'permanent' solution to secessionism is, in fact, a chimera.⁸⁴ The recent push for a vote on independence in the Catalan region of Spain – the model for Morocco's regionalisation strategy – emphasises the point. In reality, perhaps the best governments seeking to manage deep political and cultural cleavages within their midst can hope for is a modus vivendi, a second best solution.

Morocco's process of democratisation and declared commitment to human rights, if realised, bodes well for a peaceful and viable agreement on the Western Sahara

The good news is that evidence from around the world suggests that Morocco's process of democratisation and declared commitment to human rights, if realised, bodes well for a peaceful and viable agreement on the Western Sahara.⁸⁵ The new constitution adopted in July 2011 outlines a more democratic future for Morocco, as well as a new emphasis on sub-Saharan Africa. The Sahel is explicitly highlighted, and it follows only the Maghreb and the umma (and precedes the Mediterranean world) in the document's listing of Morocco's regional priorities.

The bad news is that Moroccan–African relations may have hit a high-water mark; in the absence of real progress on Morocco's re-integration into the AU, we may not witness any further deepening of African–Moroccan relations but rather some significant reversals, especially in the political sphere. The AU is seeking to strengthen its internal cohesion in the face of serious and potentially divisive continental challenges. Some of the most troubling threats were laid bare at the AU Summit in 2012, which was dominated by political and security crises – instability and the rise of ‘Jihadism’ in parts of West Africa and the Sahel, renewed violence in the DRC and the ongoing crisis between Sudan and South Sudan. And this was before France intervened in Mali.

The AU has buried its head in the Saharan sands for far too long. If it is to engage meaningfully on this issue, it must engage Morocco, SADR and, perhaps most consequentially, Algeria with new ideas and realistic avenues to break the impasse. It may suit AU leaders personally to avoid the highly contentious argument that there ought to be a different classification for a member if their final international status is still pending, but such evasion could eventually have serious consequences for the organisation, especially if more countries de-recognise the Western Sahara.

A Moroccan reversal would have some echoes in the current situation with Turkey and the European Union. For decades Turkey craved EU membership but was kept outside the Union for various political and cultural reasons. Today, many would argue that newly-confident and economically powerful Turkey needs Europe, whose reputation has taken a beating due to political infighting and financial crises, a lot less than Europe needs Turkey – though it remains to be seen how strong the pull of membership still is in Ankara. ‘The clock is winding down’, according to one expert, ‘you could push Morocco so far away that it never comes back.’⁸⁶

The political instability and insecurity sweeping across a growing expanse of Africa highlight the importance of not just regional efforts but indeed a trans-regional strategy to counter the proliferation of armed groups and tackle the key, inter-locking drivers of conflict. Morocco has a vital role to play, but its contribution will be circumscribed so long as the Western Sahara issue infects relations within the key body which should be leading the fight – the AU.

This analysis was complemented by several interviews conducted between 2010 and 2012 with officials in Morocco, Addis Ababa (African Union) and South Africa, many of whom spoke on condition of anonymity.

Endnotes

- 1 UN Press Service, ‘Morocco: Amidst Series of Meetings, UN Envoy Urges Resolution to Western Sahara Crisis’, 12 November 2012.
- 2 When the Gaddafi regime in Libya collapsed in October 2011 due to an Arab Spring uprising, up to 5 000 Touareg from Mali, who had been recruited into Libya’s armed forces and were fighting on behalf of the dictator, returned to Mali. ‘Resentful and well-armed’, the Touaregs’ successful operations against Mali’s military led to the ongoing political and security crises affecting the country. See, for instance, <http://www.opendemocracy.net/george-joff%C3%A9/chaos-in-sahel>.
- 3 Interview with Professor Mohammed Benhammou, Moroccan Centre for Strategic Studies, Rabat, 29 November 2012.
- 4 Human Rights Watch, 2013 Report, see <http://www.hrw.org/world-report/2013>.
- 5 J Peter Pham, ‘The Dangerous “Pragmatism” of Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb’, Journal of the Middle East and Africa (Vol. 2, No. 1, January–June 2011), pp. 15–29.
- 6 François Soudan, ‘Mali: Polisario Connection’, Jeune Afrique, 8 November 2012, <http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Article/JA2703p010-013.xml0/>.
- 7 For a discussion of Touareg groups’ aims, see http://www.andymorganwrites.com/what-do-the-touareg-want/?fb_action_ids=10152199594777195&fb_action_types=og.likes&fb_source=aggregation&fb_aggregation_id=246965925417366.
- 8 See, for instance, Jacob Mundy and Stephen Zunes, Western Sahara: War, Nationalism and Conflict Irresolution (Syracuse, NY: Syracuse Studies on Peace and Conflict, Resolution, 2010); Yahia H. Zoubir and Daniel Volman (eds.), The International Dimension of the Western Sahara Conflict (Westport, CT: Praeger, 1993); Ali Bahaijoub, Western Sahara Conflict: Historical, Regional and International Dimensions (London: North–South Books, 2010); Toby Shelley, Endgame in the Western Sahara:

- What Future for Africa's Last Colony?* (London: Zed, 2004); Samuel J Spector, 'Negotiating Free Association between Western Sahara and Morocco: A Comparative Legal Analysis of Formulas for Self-Determination', International Negotiation (Vol 16, 2011), pp 109–135; J Peter Pham, 'Not Another Failed State: Towards a Realistic Solution of the Western Sahara', Journal of the Middle East and Africa (Vol. 1, No. 1, 2010), pp. 1–24.
- 9 From the Spanish abbreviation of Frente Popular de Liberación de Saguia el Hamra y Río de Oro ('Popular Front for the Liberation of Saguia el-Hamra and Río de Oro').
- 10 Mauritania withdrew from the fight in 1979 and recognised SADR's sovereignty, although Moroccan forces quickly moved into the areas it vacated.
- 11 The Settlement Plan is in UN Security Council document S/22464, 19 April 1991. See also Resolution 690, 1991.
- 12 UN Security Council Resolution 658, 1990.
- 13 MINURSO: The United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara.
- 14 Throughout the 1990s Moroccan actions, in particular, served to bog the voter identification process down through a series of appeals based on a much wider interpretation of 'eligibility' than SADR's, as described pointedly by Jeremy Harding, 'Behind the Sandwall', London Review of Books (Vol. 28, No. 4, 2006).
- 15 Spector, Op cit., p. 128.
- 16 At the instigation of Morocco's King Hassan, an Implementation Committee, mandated by the OAU assembly to work out the modalities of a cease-fire and referendum, was established in 1981. It held its second ordinary session in Nairobi, on 8–9 February 1982, which was preceded by a meeting of the Foreign Ministers which drew up details of the referendum and the cease-fire. OAU Doc.AHG/IMP.C/WS/Dec.2, (II), Rev.2., 8–9 February 1982.
- 17 Jeune Afrique, Paris, No 1106, 17 March 1982, pp. 20–23; Le Monde, 25 February 1982, p. 1; the walk out was made by Cameroon, the Central African Republic, Comoros, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Gambia, The Ivory Coast, Liberia, Mauritius, Morocco, Niger, Senegal, Somalia, Sudan, Tunisia, Upper Volta and Zaire.
- 18 The other surviving member is Mali's former president Moussa Traoré. Aside from then Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo and Traoré, the ad hoc committee comprised the heads of state of Guinea, Ivory Coast, Tanzania and Sudan.
- 19 Interview published in Jeune Afrique, 1997. See also <http://www.arabicnews.com/ansub/Daily/Day/000720/2000072037.html>.
- 20 Interview with Olusegun Obasanjo, 12 February 2013.
- 21 Morocco also has a free trade agreement with the United States, in effect since 2006. Bilateral trade in goods between the two countries is valued in excess of $2 billion per year.
- 22 See <http://www.cfr.org/africa/african-union/p11616>.
- 23 Ibid.
- 24 See http://topics.nytimes.com/top/reference/timestopics/organizations/a/african_union/index.html. Also see Greg Mills, 'Amisom – An African Success Story?', Sunday Times (Johannesburg), 14 October 2012.
- 25 Correspondence with senior AU official, 7 December 2010.
- 26 See <http://allafrica.com/stories/201101240002.html>.
- 27 Correspondence with senior AU official, 7 December 2010.
- 28 See Faycal Lescarret-Benhassain, African Business (No. 303, November 2004).
- 29 Communication with Ali Bahaijoub, 6 June 2011.
- 30 See <http://www.itca.hcp.ma/>.
- 31 Statement to parliament in Rabat on 4 November 2011 by Morocco's minister of foreign affairs and cooperation, Taib Fassi Fihri.
- 32 Kingdom of Morocco: Ministry of Finance and Economy (Royaume du Maroc: Ministère de l'Economie et des Finances), Study and Financial Planning Department (Direction des Etudes et des Prévisions Financières), Point sur les relations du Maroc avec les pays de l'Afrique Subsaharienne, Mai 2010, 7 (brief on Morocco's relations with sub-Saharan states).
- 33 Interview with senior South African foreign affairs official, 15 January 2011. Also see 'Written response by South Africa's Minister of International Relations and Cooperation to parliamentary question on SADR', 26 February 2010, published 18 May 2010. See http://www.defenceweb.co.za/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=8002:

- parliamentary-question-dirco-saharawi-sudan-ivory-coast-asean-etc&catid=53:People&Itemid=117.
- 34 See <http://www.afrol.com/articles/13961>.
- 35 'African Game Changer? The consequences of Somaliland's international (non) recognition', a Study Report, Brenthurst Discussion Paper 05/2011 (Johannesburg: Brenthurst Foundation, 2011).
- 36 Yahia H Zoubir, 'Tipping the Balance Towards Intra-Maghreb Unity in Light of the Arab Spring', The International Spectator (Vol. 47, No. 3, 2012), p. 92.
- 37 French Brigadier General Jean Maurin reiterated France's support for the autonomy plan in his address to the Marrakech Security Forum, the largest annual security forum held in Africa, 25 January 2013.
- 38 Hillary Rodham Clinton, Remarks with Moroccan Foreign Minister Taieb Fassi Fihri, 23 March 2011, <http://www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2011/03/158895.htm>.
- 39 Correspondence with senior AU official, 8 December 2010.
- 40 Ibid. It is unclear how 'official' – or, more importantly, how prescriptive – this position is. A 2005 AU Commission report by then Deputy Chair Patrick Mazimhaka effectively concluded that the independence of Somaliland would not necessarily be problematic for the AU. 'Objectively viewed,' the 2005 report states, 'the case should not be linked to the notion of "opening a Pandora's box"'. Yet the status of Somaliland has not changed despite this 'position'.
- 41 Anna Khakee, 'The Western Sahara autonomy proposal and political reform in Morocco', Noref Report (Oslo: Norwegian Peacebuilding Resource Centre, June 2011).
- 42 Ibid.
- 43 Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola.
- 44 Spector, Op cit., p. 112..
- 45 See Terence McNamee, 'The First Crack in Africa's Map? Secession and Self-Determination after South Sudan', Brenthurst Foundation Discussion Paper 01/12 (Johannesburg: Brenthurst Foundation, 2012).
- 46 Interview with a senior Moroccan government official, Rabat, 29 November 2012.
- 47 See <http://un-report.blogspot.com/2012/04/ban-ki-moons-report-on-western-sahara.html>.
- 48 William Wallis, 'Mali adds to list of boomerangs from Washington's war on terror', Financial Times, 19 January 2013.
- 49 Benjamin P. Nickels. 'Morocco's Engagement with the Sahel Community', 3 January 2013, see <http://carnegieendowment.org/2013/01/03/morocco-s-engagement-with-sahel-community/ez1k>.
- 50 Ibid.
- 51 Ibid.
- 52 J Peter Pham, 'Managing Mali', 28 January 2013, see http://www.acus.org/new_atlanticist/managing-mali.
- 53 Wallis, Op cit.
- 54 Ibid.
- 55 Marina Ottaway and Marwan Muasher, 'Islamist Parties in Power: A Work in Progress', 23 May 2012, see <http://carnegieendowment.org/2012/05/23/islamist-parties-in-power-work-in-progress/aw7x>.
- 56 'The Neighbours Start Talking', Africa Confidential, 16 March 2012.
- 57 Ian O. Lesser, Geoffrey Kemp, Emiliano Alessandri and S. Enders Wimbush, 'Morocco's New Geopolitics: A Wider Atlantic Perspective', Wider Atlantic Series (Washington, DC: German Marshall Fund of the United States, 2012), p. 41.
- 58 Ibid., p. 87.
- 59 Zoubir, Op cit., in note 36, p.83.
- 60 Nickels, Op cit.
- 61 Lesser et al., Op cit., p. 39.
- 62 See Mohammed Dahbi, Terence McNamee, Greg Mills, Michael Spicer and Lyal White, 'Getting into the race: Morocco's lessons from diversification', Occasional Paper number 6, February 2009 (Johannesburg: Business Leadership South Africa).
- 63 See <http://www.aideffectiveness.org/busanhlf4/es/countries/middle-east/731.html>.
- 64 Statement by IMF managing director Dominique Strauss-Kahn following a report on the Article IV consultation with Morocco compiled in July 2008.
- 65 Failings in education and literacy are the main factors behind Morocco's relatively poor ranking on the UN Human Development Index (117 out of 172 countries in the 2010 survey).
- 66 Communication with Ali Bahajjoub, 6 June 2011.
- 67 Lescarret-Benhassain, Op cit.
- 68 Lesser et al., Op cit., p. 15.
- 69 See <http://www.alarabiya.net/articles/2010/10/03/121091.html>.
- 70 Interview with Abdelhayy Moudden, 30 November 2012, Rabat.
- 71 Ibid.

- 72 Correspondence with senior AU official, 15 November 2010.
- 73 Interview with Obasanjo, Op cit.
- 74 Spector, Op cit.
- 75 See for instance Yossef Ben-Meir, 'Morocco's Regionalism "Roadmap" and the Western Sahara', World Affairs (Vol. 14, No. 2, 2010).
- 76 Interview with former advisor to King Mohammed VI of Morocco, 28 November 2012, Rabat.
- 77 Bahaijoub, Op cit., in note 3, p. 421.
- 78 Interview with former advisor to King Mohammed VI of Morocco, Op cit.
- 79 One prominent example being Morocco's ambassador to Spain, who is a Saharwi. Another is the appointment of Polisario leader Mohamed Abdelaziz's own father – a retired Moroccan army non-commissioned officer – to the Royal Consultative Council on Saharan Affairs.
- 80 Interview with former senior Moroccan UN official, 30 November 2012, Rabat.
- 81 Khakee, Op cit.
- 82 Interview with Mustapha Machrafi, 28 November 2012, Rabat.
- 83 Harding, Op cit.
- 84 Terence McNamee, 'Managing the Two Solitudes: Lessons from Canada', in Jeffrey Herbst, Terence McNamee and Greg Mills (eds.), On the Fault Line: Managing Divisions and Tensions in Societies (London: Profile Books, 2012). Chapter on the FL.
- 85 J Peter Pham, 'Morocco's Momentum', Journal of International Security Affairs, no. 22 (Spring–Summer 2012), pp. 13–20.
- 86 Interview with Machrafi, Op cit.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, February 26, 2013 6:12 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS report

The following information is from a generally reliable source but it has not been corroborated by other sources.

According to a member of Polisario's National Secretariat, the Front is split between two points of view concerning negotiations with Morocco. The most recent meetings of the National Secretariat, which were supposed to be devoted to preparations for Polisario's 40th anniversary celebrations in three months, saw divergent opinions emerge. Some insisted that everything had to be done to demonstrate that the stalemate is Morocco's responsibility. Those who argued for this position underlined that the suspension of family visits between Tindouf and Laayoune late January feeds into this strategy of putting Morocco on the defensive. The visits were suspended by Polisario in protest at the Moroccan police's security measures against families coming from Tindouf. Mohamed Abdelaziz, the secretary general of Polisario, is one of those in favour of this line. The other point of view, upheld by a minority of participants, was that everything should be done to push for a quick resumption of UN-sponsored talks with Morocco. This faction argued that there is no other realistic way forward in this difficult regional context. Ahmed Salem Ould Salek, Polisario's foreign minister – who two years ago used to insist that negotiations “serve no useful purpose” - was among those arguing in favour of the latter option.

A member of a Sahrawi NGO based in Algiers said the heavy jail sentences (25-30 years) recently handed down by Moroccan military courts on 24 Sahrawi activists were greeted with relief by Polisario leaders. Mohamed Abdelaziz described them before a closed-door meeting as a “godsend” and ordered that a file be prepared presenting the trials as an “exemplary case of Moroccan colonial practices in the Sahara”. For Mohamed Abdelaziz this was not a trial of youths who had attacked policemen in November 2010, but of young activists struggling for the freedom of their country. These trials will be given a prominent place at Polisario's 40th anniversary celebration, the Polisario general secretary added.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, February 26, 2013 11:17 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: [New post] Libya seeks international assistance to secure borders, rule of law – Magharebia

This is something I believe Morocco could partner with the US on. Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Morocco On The Move [<mailto:comment-reply@wordpress.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, February 26, 2013 11:05 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: [New post] Libya seeks international assistance to secure borders, rule of law – Magharebia

Morocco on the Move posted: "[caption id="attachment_12227" align="aligncenter" width="610"] Libyan Prime Minister Ali Zidan meets with French President Francois Hollande to discuss security issues [Essam Mohamed].[/caption] Magharebia, by Essam Mohamed (Tripoli, Libya, Feb.)"

Respond to this post by replying above this line

New post on Morocco On The Move

Libya seeks international assistance to secure borders, rule of law – Magharebia

by Morocco on the Move

Libyan Prime Minister Ali Zidan meets with French President Francois Hollande to discuss security issues [Essam Mohamed].

Magharebia, by Essam Mohamed (Tripoli, Libya, Feb. 25, 2013) – Libya wants to secure its borders, build a national army and set up a police force. Now the country's leaders are looking for outside help to make it happen.

Italy, France, the United States, Britain, and India have put forth proposals to help Libya secure its borders and maintain order, Prime Minister Ali Zidan said on Thursday (February 21st). Libya and Turkey were already co-operating in terms of training, defence and security equipment.

"We're committed to reaching the best," the premier said.

With its 3,000 kilometres of land borders, Libya is determined to thwart traffickers and terrorists from taking advantage of the country's terrain.

Libya will be working with other countries to co-ordinate ways to secure its southern borders, as agreed upon during the February 16th Community of Sahel-Saharan States (CEN-SAD) summit, Zidan said.

"We have discussed... border security with the French President," Prime Minister Zidan told reporters after meeting with Francois Hollande in Paris on February 13th.

Meanwhile, the Friends of Libya met in Paris on February 12th and pledged security support to the country's nascent democratic government.

"Much has already been achieved but issues remain," French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius said in his opening address to the gathering.

International partners should send "experts to train Libyan security forces and police, and help to rebuild the army, navy and air force", he added.

The partners confirmed their full support for the interim government in its determination to implement a plan to enhance national security, boost justice and rule of law, and build a democratic, prosperous and stable state.

Libya's Foreign Minister Mohammed Abdel Aziz told the Paris event that Libya did not need troops, but training.

"What we're asking of our international partners is to help us with training and rehabilitation, and the transfer of advanced technology to protect our long borders and shores," he said.

The Friends of Libya welcomed the EU decision to send a civil mission from the European Common Security and Defence Policy by June 2013 to help manage the border.

"Controlling the border will spare Libya a lot of problems, especially arms smuggling and the smuggling of Africans to Europe, which Kadhafi was using to pressure Europe," journalist Miftah Belaid said.

"We're suffering from these border-related problems, especially from the entry of drugs... The assistance from the West to is a step to help build the new, free Libya," civil servant Kamela Ali said.

Morocco on the Move | February 26, 2013 at 11:04 am | Categories: General, Politics, Security | URL: <http://wp.me/p1Gm1x-3bc>

Comment See all comments

Unsubscribe or change your email settings at Manage Subscriptions.

Trouble clicking? Copy and paste this URL into your browser:

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2013/02/26/libya-seeks-international-assistance-to-secure-borders-rule-of-law-magharebia/>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, March 10, 2013 11:11 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Twitter Monitoring, March Week 1

FYI

Update Title/ Date	Summary
Un Algérien bloqué à Casablanca depuis deux mois An Algerian detained in Casablanca for two months March 5, 2013	An Algerian merchant named Karim Yahi arrived in Casablanca for a trade fair in January, upon which time he was detained by Moroccan police with no apparent grounds for arrest and was held in the Maârif police station for four days. Then, upon releasing him from jail, Moroccan authorities refused to return his passport for two months, forcing him to live with acquaintances in Casablanca. The Algerian Consulate in Casablanca is reportedly still following the case.
Khalid Alioua, ancien directeur général du CIH, libéré pour l'enterrement de sa mère Khalid Alioua, former director general of CIH, was let out for the interment of his mother March 5, 2013	Khalid Alioua, former Minister of Higher Education and Scientific Research and former director of Crédit Immobilier Hôtelier (CIH), was allowed to leave jail on Monday for four days to attend the interment of his mother. He is being prosecuted for embezzlement and misappropriation of public funds and abuse of power during his tenure as head of CIH. King Mohammed VI gave Alioua his personal condolences for his mother's death.
Aftati: ceux qui veulent affronter le PJD doivent le faire maintenant Afafti: Those who want to confront the PJD should do so now March 5, 2013	In a recent media release, Hamid Chabat, Secretary General of the Istiqlal Party, stated that his party's alliance with the Islamists [PJD] was only "temporary, not strategic" and that it would end in 2016. These statements enraged the Deputy of PJD, Abdelaziz Aftati, who believes that these kind of statements are a provocation and that "those who want to confront the PJD must do so here and now, not later."

L'Ecole Hassania en péril March 5, 2013	Engineering students have been on strike since February 20. The students are unhappy with the lack of hot water, lack of modules that are required for their training, as well as the lack of qualified teachers. Teachers and administrators are also angry as they are no longer being paid for their services. "We demand a direct intervention from the Minister responsible for infrastructure," state the engineering students.
La Fondation de l'éducation pour l'emploi (EFE-Maroc) fait son bilan Foundation of Education for Employment (EFE-Morocco) reveals its balance sheets March 5, 2013	Moroccan Foundation for Education for Employment (EFE) announced on Monday evening in Casablanca, the launch of the "Al Morad" program to benefit over 15,500 young individuals. This project, initiated with the MasterCard Foundation until 2014, will create a bridge between young people and the labor market by providing training tailored to the skills of specific companies. It will simultaneously coach, mentor and train as well as involve the trainees in civic activities to ensure their integration in the professional world.
Mohammédia : 3 personnes arrêtés en flagrant délit pour escroquerie dans une affaire d'immigration clandestine Mohammedia: 3 people caught red handed and arrested for fraud in a case of illegal immigration March 5, 2013	Police in Mohammedia have just arrested three people in connection with an illegal immigration scam. The arrest was made following a complaint by a woman against one of the alleged perpetrators who promised her a contract of employment in the UAE. After paying the initial deposit of 2,000 DHS, the alleged perpetrator told the woman to meet him at the cafe. The police intervened, arresting the alleged crook with his accomplice. Quickly, the two defendants confessed that they were not the masterminds of this operation. The search resulted in the seizure of passports at home, pictures of candidates for immigration, photocopies of tickets as well as blank forms of the National Office of Airports (ONDA). One member confessed to be working with his sister who currently resides in the UAE.
Six mineurs sahraouis enlevés et torturés à El Aaiun occupée par les autorités marocaines 6 Sahrawi minors kidnapped and tortured at El Aaiun which is occupied by	Moroccan authorities wearing civilian clothes abducted six Sahrawi children from Oued Seguia. The children were beaten for new information before they could be released. The victims were: Beyt Khaled, Elwadani Lebihat, Ezarwali Mansour, Zin Eddine, Errikaa Aamir and Fadhel.

Moroccan authorities March 7, 2013
Projet de code de la presse. La morale, une "ligne rouge" supplémentaire ? Draft law on the press. Morality, another "red line"? March 7, 2013	Minister of Communication Mustapha Khalfi has drafted a new press law that would expand the regime's discretion in prosecuting journalists and restrict freedom of the press. The new draft law would ban the publishing of words, images, or films deemed immoral. It bans material that contains "pornographic" content that would incite "debauchery, adultery, or crime." Publishing such material would be punishable by a fine of 50,000 to 100,000 dirhams. Furthermore, publishing material deemed to be offensive to any members of the royal family would be punishable by 3 to 5 years in prison and a fine of 10,000 to 100,000 dirhams. Under this law, the police would have absolute discretion to seize any materials they consider to be in violation of these restrictions. The article describes the law as giving the police a "blank check" to punish those who publish materials that they deem to be morally offensive or offensive to the person of the King or the royal family.
Maroc : Hogra sur un carrossier, le magistrat suspendu de ses fonctions Morocco: Bullying a vehicle body-builder, the magistrate is suspended from duty March 7, 2013	After two huge protests in Midelt (5,000-7,000 attend the first protest and 10,000 attended the second, in support of Himmi Moulay Hicham, a young mechanic forced to kiss the feet of Said Fareh, prosecutor the court of first instance in Midelt); Fareh has been suspended of all judicial duties. As a judge, Said Fareh enjoyed judicial immunity, "yet with the direct intervention of the Minister he has lost his immunity and will thus be judged like any other citizen" says Mourad Chqondi, vice-president of the AMDH.
Sebta : Une association dénonce des discriminations contre les travailleuses marocaines Ceuta: An association denounces discrimination against Moroccan female workers March 8, 2013	On International Women's Day, the Association for the Dignity of Women and Children protested discrimination against Moroccan women working in Ceuta. According to the Association, Moroccan women in Ceuta are often recruited into jobs with little stability and with a high potential for abuse, such as domestic work and the service industry, and are often forced into "degrading and precarious" work situations. They receive very little compensation, and have little to no access to education or health care.
L'Université George Washington	George Washington University received on Thursday Sahrawi Human Rights official Aminatou Haidar, who was visiting Washington DC and New York to plead the cause of Western Sahara and denounce violations of human rights against Sahrawis in Morocco. In a panel discussion

reçoit la militante sahraouie Aminatou Haidar

George Washington University receives the Sahrawi militant Aminatou Haidar

March 8, 2013

presented to students, teachers and representatives of U.S. organizations of human rights, Ms. Haidar explained the brutal and bloody repression led by Morocco, through arbitrary arrests, beatings, incommunicado detention, torture, rape, extrajudicial executions, enforced disappearances, burying Sahrawis alive and the ejection from helicopters. Accompanying her testimony she showed video recordings depicting scenes of repression by Moroccan forces shot secretly in the occupied Saharawi territories. In addition to this conference in Washington, Ms. Haidar has also participated in a meeting held last Tuesday at the UN Headquarters by the Robert F. Kennedy for justice and human rights.

Pour la première fois, la CDG sous la loupe de la Cour des comptes

For the first time, the CDG is under the magnifying glass of the Court of Accounts

March 8, 2013

The CDG, Morocco's state fund, is being audited for the first time in a process that is being undertaken with the utmost discretion. The fund had previously been criticized for its opacity, and numerous financial institutions affiliated with it experienced serious financial mismanagement.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, March 10, 2013 11:24 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring, March Week 1

FYI

Subject: Blog Monitoring, March Week 1

Blog Name	Update Title/ Date	Summary	Comments	Response?
Al-Arabiya	Morocco, EU begin talks on free-trade accord March 1, 2013	EU Commission head Jose Manuel Barroso met with PM Abdelilah Benkirane on Friday to discuss the terms of a Morocco-EU free trade agreement. According to Barroso, such a deal "will give each better access to the other's markets and improve the business climate in a way that will make it more predictable and stable."	0
Magharebia	Morocco, Spain discuss security partnership March 1, 2013	Moroccan Interior Minister-Delegate Cherki Drais and Spanish State Secretary for Security Francisco Martinez Vazquez met on Tuesday (February 26th) in Rabat to discuss bilateral cooperation. Both sides discussed the various aspects of security cooperation, specifically in regards to organised trans-border crime, terrorism, drug trafficking and illegal immigration. They also agreed to make the passage through checkpoints smoother.	0
Magharebia	Activists debate Morocco right to rally March 6, 2013	Moroccan human rights activists met in Rabat on Saturday (March 2nd) to discuss the people's right to demonstrate despite the sometimes forceful response from authorities. Mohamed Nouhi, Chairman of the Moroccan Centre for Human Rights believes that such revisions will "be in line with international human rights mechanisms ratified by Morocco".	0
Magharebia	UpM project to assist Morocco women entrepreneurs March 6, 2013	The Union for the Mediterranean (UpM) announced that it will launch a project aimed at helping young, female entrepreneurs in Morocco. The project is set to be launched in April.	0
Sahara Press Service	Morocco takes "great risk" by condemning 24 Sahrawi activists (AARASD) March 2, 2013	Regine Villemont, president of the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic's Friends Association in France (AARASD), stated on Saturday that Morocco took a great risk by sentencing the 24 Sahrawis involved in the 2010 Gdem Izik riots. In her opinion, this trial demonstrates that Morocco does not abide by international democratic and human rights conventions, and these convictions could well spark a second crisis like Gdeim Izik. Furthermore, Abba Heisan, Secretary General of the Saharawi Jurists	0

		Union, stated that Moroccan security forces have been subjecting the 24 jailed Sahrawis to torture.
Eurasia Review	Morocco: Another Step Towards Reinforcement Of The Rule Of Law – OpEd March 3, 2013	The National Council on Human Rights (CNDH) adopted 4 thematic reports at its Fourth Ordinary Session. The first of these reports concerns the contributions of the CNDH to the Constitutional Court. The second report lays out the Council’s proposals relating to the “exception of unconstitutionality” clause, which would allow a party in a lawsuit raise concerns of the constitutionality of the law in question. The third report concerns military court reform, and recommends that civilians not be tried in military courts, and the fourth report concerns the separation of power and independence of the judiciary. A representative of the King stated that he welcomed the approach and contents of the report, and is dedicated to continually foster the values of democracy in Morocco.	0
View From Fez	Moroccan News Brief #89: Morocco aims to be among top 20 tourist destinations in the world March 3, 2013	Analysts at the Oxford Business Group (OBG) recently released a report that Morocco is well positioned to “claim itself among the top 20 tourist destinations in the world”. The report states that the Kingdom “continues its efforts to achieve this goal despite the difficulties related to the impact of instability in the region and the current crisis in the Eurozone.”	0
View From Fez	Moroccan News Brief #89: European Investment Bank - "Cooperation with Morocco is bliss!" March 3, 2013	Vice-President of the European Investment Bank (EIB), Philippe de Fontaine Vive, applauded Morocco’s record and exceptional cooperation in 2012. Morocco, he said, is the first recipient of this action and this new “unprecedented” commitment of nearly one billion euros of financing in 2012. It also shows “the strong commitment “of the EIB-FEMIP to support the transition to a new form of innovative and more inclusive growth in Morocco.	0
View From Fez	The Moroccan Zorro - Unmasked March 4, 2013	Mounir Agueznay, the young man who has been nicknamed “the sniper of Targuist” has spent the last six years recording the actions of corrupt policemen. His first video revealed drivers handing money to the police. The video went viral in both the Arabic and Western media, yet his identity was not discovered. At the time, the local police tried hard to discover his identity but the community protected him. The authorities in Targuist strongly suspected Agueznay, but after failing to catch him they turned on his family. “To get their revenge, they arrested my brother Radouane last October and accused him of drug dealing. He was sentenced to one year in prison,” Agueznay said.	0
View From Fez	Moroccan Tourism Off	Moroccan tourism has expanded in the first weeks of 2013, with a 3% increase in the month of January as	0

	to a Good Start in 2013 March 5, 2013	compared to January 2012. Overnight stays in registered accommodation establishments increased by 14%. Morocco is making a concerted effort to attract foreign investment in all sectors, including its tourism industry. Imad Barrakad, CEO of Moroccan Tourism, is holding tourism investment meetings in Berlin from March 4th to March 6th. This effort is paying off; the Egyptian conglomerate Amer Group has signed a framework agreement with the Ministry of Tourism of Morocco to develop "Porto Agadir," which will include amusement parks, hotels, shopping centers, cinemas, and various activities for children.
Daily News Egypt	Sweden supports free trade agreement between Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, Tunisia March 4, 2013	The Swedish International Development Cooperation Agency (Sida) will continue to support the implementation of the Agadir agreement; which was signed in Rabat, Morocco on 25 February 2004, between Egypt, Jordan, Morocco and Tunisia. The Agadir agreement aims at establishing a free trade area between the four countries. It is a crucial step towards the creation of a Euro-Mediterranean free trade area. It includes liberalising trade for industrial products, agricultural and processed agricultural products, and trade in services.	0
NATO News	Moroccan Minister Delegate for Foreign Affairs visits NATO	Morocco's Minister Delegate for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation Youssef Amrani visited NATO headquarters for the first time on Tuesday 5 March 2013. He met with Deputy Secretary General Ambassador Alexander Vershbow, and the two discussed Moroccan-NATO relations and Morocco's role in NATO's Mediterranean Dialogue. Since it joined the Mediterranean Dialogue in 1994, Morocco has played an active role in missions such as the anti-terrorism mission in the Mediterranean, the SFOR mission in Bosnia, and the KFOR mission in Kosovo.	0
European Voice	Morocco bars four MEPs March 6, 2013	Four members of the European Parliament were barred from entering Western Sahara. They had planned on entering Western Sahara on a fact-finding mission on the state of human rights in the territory. The group of MEPs was comprised of several political parties, and one of them, far-left Spanish MEP Willy Meyer, had been barred from entering the territory in the past. This was not an official delegation from the European Parliament, and while they had informed the EU's president and foreign policy chief of their intention to visit Western Sahara, they had not informed European Commission president Jose Manuel Barroso, who on Friday launched trade talks with Morocco.	0
Arabian Business	Morocco seeks energy salvation in sunshine, wind March 6, 2013	Morocco, one of the world's most energy-poor countries, intends to make up its energy deficit with new projects in solar and wind power. Morocco currently imports 95% of its energy needs, and last year energy comprised over a quarter of the country's total imports. Morocco hopes to cut 2.5 million tons of oil from its imports with these new	0

		solar and wind energy programs, and eventually export some of the energy produced through these programs to European countries. There are, however, some concerns about the projects, including the potential environmental impact and difficulties in finding funding.
Bernama	International Narcotics Control Board Highlights Morocco's Role In Drgs War March 7, 2013	The International Narcotics Control Board (INCB) has released a report highlighting Morocco's role in fighting drug trafficking. It notes that the Moroccan government has undertaken a number of measures against drug trafficking, including tightening border and coastal control, training border police in using new detection technologies, strategies to prevent the use of light aircraft in drug trafficking, and improved cooperation with international law enforcement agencies such as INTERPOL. The report also specifically praises the Moroccan government for its strategies in decreasing the production and use of cannabis in the country.	0
Mail & Guardian	Morocco's Parliament Pledges to Change Rape Law March 7, 2013	The Moroccan Parliament and judiciary have already stated that they support overturning the controversial Article 475. This article also outlines a movement on the part of some left-leaning parties in Parliament to officially ban all child marriage, citing language in the 2011 constitution. While the 2004 Family Law reforms state that the minimum age of marriage is 18, many judges overlook that, and it's estimated that as many as 10% of Moroccan girls are married as minors.	1
Afriqie Jet	Morocco, Libya agree to strengthen economic ties March 7, 2013	Moroccan Minister of Industry, Trade and new technologies, Abdelkader Amar, and his Libyan counterpart, Suleiman Ali Latif al-Faytouri discussed ways to strengthen bilateral cooperation in the industrial field through the establishment of companies and increasing mutual visits.	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, March 10, 2013 11:41 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: situation report on Algeria

The source of this information is very reliable and provides solid analysis based on a recent visit there. This information has not been corroborated by third parties.

Politics

First, on politics, the sense in Algiers is that President Abdelaziz Bouteflika and his advisors are going to shortly orchestrate a constitutional reform that will change the presidential term limit from its current maximum of three five-year terms to two seven-year terms. In addition, the constitutional reform will introduce a vice presidency, something that has been batted about for four or five years, largely by Bouteflika himself who whinges about Algeria's parliamentary system leaving him less than a full president, but not entirely oblivious to the fact that his own health is likely to soon leave him a dead president.

Any Algerian president does have legitimate grievances with Algeria's half parliamentary/half presidential system. But the real driver to the amendments is to figure out how to transition to a post-Bouteflika era with as few disruptions as possible.

The amendments would effectively extend Bouteflika's presidency by two years. Bouteflika would no longer be in the final year of his third term, but fifth year of his second term. This approach seems to be the best compromise for the moment: it postpones potential destabilizing elections currently slated for 2014 in which there do not appear to be any credible candidates; it avoids the uncomfortable and unmanageable situation that Bouteflika does indeed win a fourth five-year term in 2014, but dies midway; and assuming that the vice president is in effect Algeria's first post-Bouteflika president, it resolves the succession issue.

The problem with this approach is that it simply kicks the can down the road. It is easy to imagine that the four-month debate over who was to become prime minister after the 2012 legislative elections will look like a petty squabble compared to the fight over who should be vice president. The fight for prime minister was intense because there were suspicions that whoever won was effectively being tapped to replace Bouteflika, but these were ultimately untrue. Were the position of vice president to be created, it will in fact be the case and the debate over who will be vice president will be proportionally more intense than that for prime minister. But perhaps kicking the can down the road is just what Algeria needs – nature will take its course in the next several years and key decision-makers will no longer be with us, potentially freeing up the field for more workable solutions.

Security

On the security front, while the internet and Paris and Washington were buzzing about the possible deaths of AQIM leaders Abdelhamid Abou Zeid and Mokhtar Belmokhtar, Algiers was much more sanguine and no one paid it much mind. Obviously, it would be good if both Abou Zeid and Belmokhtar were dead – they deserve it – but in Algeria that seemed to be beside the point. Algeria has cut off the heads of many a snake only to see them grow back and the snakes' venom evolve. Algiers is convinced that even if we have seen the end of AQIM in the Sahara, we have not seen the end of jihadi terrorists. The real point is who comes after Belmokhtar and Abou Zeid, what will happen to AQIM, how long the French intend to remain in Mali, and consequently how long there will be northerly pressure on Algeria's southern border.

The reluctance to dwell on Belmokhtar and Abou Zeid's fate was also in no small part likely due to the fact that the French and Chadians may have managed to accomplish in six weeks what Algeria had been unable to do in six years. When I was speaking with an official about Abou Zeid and Belmokhtar, I asked about Droukdel – after all, he's only 40 miles from Algiers, so how can he still be alive? The official replied, "If there were no mice, what would cats do?"

Regarding oil sector security, the consensus in Algiers appears to be that the attack at the In Amenas gas facility in January was a one-off, both because of the attack's objectives and because of the facility's unique constellation of characteristics. Whether the immediate Algerian response did indeed serve as a deterrent for future attacks is an open question, but it does appear that the Algerian military response has been meaningful. There is a question about who and what those resources are – are they upper echelon troops or are they the dregs; are they competent and capable or just warm bodies with guns?

This raises another question that I intend to look into over the next several weeks. The relationship between the Ministry of Energy and Mines (MEM) and Sonatrach has always been well understood. Likewise, the relationship between the MEM and the Prime Minister's Office and the Presidency was closely watched. This was because the problems that the energy sector faced over the last decade were regulatory ones and the solutions to them were negotiated among the different political decision makers. In Amenas, however, introduced a new level of problems for the energy sector, namely, security. As a consequence, it's important now to understand the relationship between the MEM and the Interior Ministry which is responsible for the Gendarmerie, as well as the relationship between the MEM and the Army Chief of Staff and the Defense Ministry.

Oil and Gas

Speaking specifically about the oil and gas sector, Minister of Energy and Mines Youcef Yousfi is in Houston promoting Algeria best he can and trying to salvage an upcoming bid round that has been undermined by the In Amenas attack. The bid round was intended to showcase new fiscal terms enshrined in the January 2013 hydrocarbons reform law, but oil companies are not enticed by new incentives, and it's not just because of concerns about another In Amenas. In fact, In Amenas seems to have given IOCs a pretext for something that they were already looking for. IOCs think that the new terms are not attractive enough and they think that if they sit the next bid round out and make it fail, then they will be able to push the terms down even further. Sonatrach desperately needs new exploration activity and faced with another failed round, it would likely capitulate. In short, the IOCs have Sonatrach over the barrel and are showing no mercy.

Sonatrach itself is reeling from its own internal problems, including the indeterminate status of its CEO Abdelhamid Zerguine and the corruption scandal that is being called Sonatrach Deux. Following rumors that Yousfi had fired Zerguine last month, Zerguine is still in his position, as he himself said, "for the moment." The perception in Algiers is that Zerguine is indeed out of a job, and only remains in his office because the media beat Yousfi to the punch. Not wanting to appear to have lost control of the situation, Yousfi kept Zerguine in office, but he'll remain there only so long as it takes to find another replacement. The immediate consequence of this is that Zerguine is going about his work, but in a desultory manner. His vice presidents have picked up on this and are doing likewise.

Sonatrach Deux appears to be at once more interesting and more mundane than Sonatrach Un. If the first Sonatrach scandal in 2010 that resulted in the entire energy sector leadership being sacked was driven by a settling of scores between clans in the ruling elite, the current Sonatrach scandal does not have that same political component and seems to be genuinely aimed at reducing levels of corruption in the sector. On the one hand, Sonatrach Deux is not as salacious and intrigue-laden as the 2010 scandal. On the other hand, it is potentially more interesting because it raises real questions about how far the government is willing to go to pursue corruption, about how business was done at Sonatrach in the past and how it will be done in the future. Likewise, while many observers in Algeria dismissed Sonatrach Un as a political affair, as something internal to power struggles in the depths of political leadership, Sonatrach Deux is starting to take on a populist tone, which could compel political leadership to more sincerely pursue it. To be continued.

For the moment, Algiers is in a strange state – calm on the surface, but churning beneath. Outwardly, people and politicians are going about their business as usual, even if a little more distractedly, but there's a sense that the next shoe is about to drop. That sense is not entirely one of foreboding, but also one of anticipation – perhaps this is the break-out that Algeria has been waiting for, that this is the moment that Algeria will begin to realize its full potential.

Walking with an official on a rainy night under Martyrs' Monument (a monument, the official wryly pointed out, that had been built by SNC-Lavalin, a potential target of the current corruption investigations) we were talking about Algerian nationalism. "Algerians love their country and they're proud of it, but they're frustrated with the current situation. Algeria could be so much more."

Phone: +1 202.887.1113

Fax: +1 202.887.1115

Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com

Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, March 13, 2013 1:26 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: W Sahara/ Total / Polisario

For your information please see below. This information is from a generally reliable source although it has not been corroborated by third parties. Thank you, Ed

Begin message: Regarding French supermajor Total's contract with ONHYM for the Anzarane block off the coast of Western Sahara, which is currently up for renewal, pro-Saharawi groups in France are looking at ways of bringing pressure to bear to prevent this, including possibly taking the case to the European Court of Justice (along similar lines to legal challenges last year to the Free Trade Agreement between the EU and Morocco). A member of the Polisario leadership confirms that the SADR intends to "take the matter to the the European Court of Justice, and to the UN. The aim is not just to get Total's contract for exploration off the Western Sahara coast cancelled, but restate the SADR's claim to sovereignty over Western Sahara." END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, March 17, 2013 2:53 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Twitter Monitoring March Week 2

FYI

Update Title/ Date	Summary
Sebbar trace les grands traits des rapports thématiques du CNDH Sebbar traces the main features of the thematic reports of the CNDH March 12, 2013	Four thematic reports were written by the CNDH for the forum on "Evaluation of the contribution of the NHRC Justice Reform in Morocco" which were then submitted to the King. A recommendation from one of the reports is to amend the Code of Military Justice so that more civilians are tried before military courts. In terms of the Constitutional Court, recommendations focused on the right of litigants before the Court, the public nature of the sessions especially in terms of appeals, and to improve the representation of women. The latest report on the Higher Judicial Council recommends that the Board is responsible for overseeing all stages of the election of its members, as well as internal promotion.
Samira Sitail compare Benkirane à Kadhafi Samira Sitail compares Benkirane to Kadhafi March 12, 2013	Samira Sitail, deputy director of the public television channel 2M, angered Benkirane by comparing him to Muammar Gaddafi and Fidel Castro. Samira Sitail, which prides herself of her close connections to the palace and the royal adviser Fouad Ali El Himma, is accused of using the public broadcaster funding towards a political agenda.
Deux projets sociaux pour les enfants et les jeunes souffrant d'addictions Two social projects for children and youth with addictions March 12,	Two social projects were launched today (March 12) by King Mohammed VI. They are intended to support young people with addictive behaviors and improve conditions of hospitalized children admitted to the Centre Hospitalier Universitaire (CHU) Hassan II. The first project will be built in Doukkarate. It will include a center for social support, risk reduction, and a medical center. The cost is estimated to be 5 million dirhams, funded equally by the Mohammed V Foundation for Solidarity and the Ministry of Interior. The second project, will be a space of socio-educational support and training for children who have been hospitalized for a long time, allowing them to better withstand their disease.

2013 Kénitra : 10 mois et 5 mois de prison à l'encontre de deux personnes pour escroquerie et vol d'électricité Kenitra: 10 months and 5 months in prison against two people for fraud and theft of electricity March 12, 2013	Two men were sentenced to 10 and 5 months in prison, respectively, for fraud and theft of electricity. They were arrested in early February in connection to an investigation undertaken by the Royal Gendarmerie after protests in the slum of Sidi Taibi in which residents called for their homes to be connected to water and electricity. A local Labor Party official was sentenced to 10 months in prison and a 500dh fine for fraud, and a local electrician was sentenced to 5 months in prison and a 500dh fine for theft of electricity.
La mort de la presse amazighe ! The death of the Amazigh press! March 12, 2013	Over the past ten years, Amazigh-language periodicals have been disappearing, to the point that there is only one Amazigh newspaper left ("Le Monde Amazigh"). All of the Amazigh language periodicals failed due to financial concerns, and now "Le Monde Amazigh" also appears to be in financial trouble. According to the article, one of the main factors behind the financial issues that caused so many periodicals to fail was a lack of professionalism on the part of newspaper distributors and a lack of companies willing to purchase ad space in the newspapers; in essence, latent racism against the Amazigh appears to be putting the Amazigh press in danger.
Maroc : Lancement d'une webradio défendant la liberté d'émission Morocco: Launching a new webradio defending freedom of emission March 14, 2013	A participatory radio called "E-joussour" headquartered in Casablanca is scheduled to launch today (March 14) at the Cultural Fabric of Veterans Abattoirs. The inauguration will be an opportunity for the team to present its project and disseminate its first program on the "Role of community radio stations in the promotion of women's rights" in connection to the International Women's Day which was celebrated on March 8th. This initiative is funded in part by the European Union, and supported by the World Association of Community Radio Broadcasters, International Media Support and Community Media Solutions.
Une guerre du fioul	The local refinery, Samir, has stopped producing fuel because the state and Moroccan oil distributors insist on importing diesel from abroad, even if Samir can cover almost all of the local

menace de paralyser l'économie marocaine A war of oil threatens to paralyze the Moroccan economy March 14, 2013	market needs. Samir argues that there have been no shortages. In fact, the refinery has delivered 58,000 tons of fuel, which is more than the average 35,000 tons.
L'AMDI veut se greffer aux ambassades AMDI wants to add itself to embassies March 15, 2013	The Moroccan Agency for Investment Development (AMDI) wants to increase its visibility with Morocco's largest international investment partners by basing itself in their foreign missions. Currently, cooperation between AMDI and the Moroccan Ministry of Foreign Affairs is under discussion.
Le PJD fait cavalier seul avec son plan législatif The PJD rides solo with its legislative plan March 15, 2013	Regarding the government's legislative, it seems that the PJD is trying to force their own agenda at the expense of the majority and of the opposition with which it still refuses to discuss critical issues that affect the future of Morocco. "The legislative plan that has been developed in the context of a unilateral agenda without consultation is an attempt to deprive Parliament of its right to legislate," stated Lachgar Driss, first Secretary of the USFP. Moreover, since Chabat, leader of the Istiqlal, called for a new charter and a majority of the cabinet reshuffling, there has been a blatant discrepancy between the two main components of the majority fueling an already existing tension.
Prevenir les violences sexuelles faites aux enfants Preventing sexual violence against children March 15, 2013	The Association for A Better Future for Our Children is organizing training sessions this week in Rabat for a program designed to prevent the sexual abuse of minors. The training program will teach program officials and educators how to handle potential abuse situations, parents on how to speak with their children on this topic and spot the signs of abuse, and children how to avoid potentially abusive situations. The Association intends to broadcast this program throughout the Middle East and Africa with the help of NGO partners in France and several African countries.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, March 17, 2013 3:08 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian situation report

The following information is compiled from public and private sources. Its accuracy has not be verified.

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

March 15, 2013

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- Taking advantage of the attention that has been focussed on the south of the country in the wake of the In Amenas attack, trade unionists and the unemployed in Algeria's southern wilayas have launched one of the broadest and most militant protest movements over socio-economic issues that the country has seen in years, prompting PM Sellal to issue dire warnings about "criminal gangs" seeking to split southern Algeria away from the north.
- At the same time, a number of corruption scandals involving figures formerly close to President Bouteflika, which had been thought to be closed cases, have returned with a vengeance.
- There are signs that the military – encouraged by the centre-stage role it has been given by the war in Mali and its repercussions in Algeria but irked by Bouteflika's decision to grant the French over-flight rights and by disputes over commissions on defence procurement – is re-emerging as a political player. The resurgence of the corruption scandals may be a factor of this.
- In place of the old duumvirate made up of Bouteflika and DRS chief Tewfik, a more complex, three-way game, involving Bouteflika, Tewfik and the military, may be emerging in the run-up to the 2014 presidential election.

Foreign Relations

- With the French military battling AQMI and its allies very close to Algeria's southern borders, a French general has praised Algiers as "our best ally in Mali".
- President Bouteflika has nonetheless been happy to let the Russian Foreign Minister condemn, in the name of both their countries, outside intervention "in Mali and Syria".
- Algiers' efforts to acquire US-made armed drones have been predictably unsuccessful. The question of collaboration with the American drone capability in the Sahara remains open.

Security

- In a rare report of jihadist activity in the capital, one Algerian daily has claimed that the security forces apprehended a would-be suicide bomber in an Algiers suburb towards the end of February.
- Overall, however, AQMI in northern Algeria appears to be on the back foot at present and not well equipped to launch attacks in solidarity with its comrades in northern Mali.
- With the armed forces and the Energy Ministry still discussing how best to secure oil and gas facilities in the south of the country, a vehicle belonging to an Italian company was hijacked and stolen near Hassi Messaoud in early February.
- There have been suggestions that foreign oil companies will be prohibited from using private security firms to defend their installations in southern Algeria, with the army taking over this role.
- Sporadic reporting of mostly minor incidents on the southern and eastern borders continues, but may not be a full reflection of the real situation.
- Reports that one of AQMI's main leaders in the Sahara, Abdelhamid Abou Zeid, has been killed are judged credible by French official sources.

Political Trends

Lambasted in the press for failing to address the nation during or immediately after the In Amenas siege in January, President Bouteflika finally addressed the subject in a message to mark Algeria's annual "martyr's day" (commemorating those who died in the war of liberation) on Feb. 18. In his statement – which was published by the official media rather than being delivered as a speech – Bouteflika lauded the commitment that inspired our brave soldiers in the great battle of In Amenas against the forces of evil and destruction [which] is the epitome of the legacy inherited from our martyrs [of the liberation war]. The heroes of this battle proved by their efficiency, precision, professionalism and triumph that they are the undisputed and indisputable successors of our brave martyrs and that the National People's Army is truly a worthy successor to the National Liberation Army and the standard-bearer of victory and triumph in every battle engaged by the nation to protect its security, stability and sovereignty.

In a clear allusion to the upheavals that have shaken the region since the outbreak of the Arab Spring, Bouteflika went on to call for "vigilance" and a reaffirmation of Algerian "love for the homeland and nationalism" in the face of the deplorable events and developments occurring here and there and all around us in more than one Arab country, [which] irrespective of their outer aspects, demonstrate the seriousness of what is happening behind the scenes.

A week later, another presidential statement – again, not delivered as a speech, but this time sent as a message to UGTA leader Abdelmadjid Sidi-Saïd on the occasion of the double anniversary of the founding of Algeria's official trade union and the nationalisation of the oil and gas sector – was published in the official media. The President renewed his praise for the role played the army and other security forces at In Amenas, before neatly segueing into other issues of the day:

Our security is jeopardized by the situation in Mali on our southern border and the sporadic outbreaks of terrorism that we are constantly fighting. What happened recently in Amenas is an instructive illustration, in that it highlighted the cruelty of the terrorist groups, but also the know-how of our army and our security services, who put an end to this attack against one of the most important facilities in our country.

I want to take this opportunity to pay a special tribute to the officers, soldiers and members of the security services and of the civil defence force, whose intervention earned our admiration and that of international public opinion.

I bow also to the memory of the Algerian and foreign workers who lost their lives in this cowardly attack and I express our admiration and gratitude to those among them who, by their cool-headedness and courageousness, made it possible to save the installations and production facilities.

In this connection, I cannot ignore the scandals that have recently been uncovered by the press concerning the management of Sonatrach. Such news can only inspire indignation and disapproval, but I have faith in our criminal justice system's ability to unravel this tangled web, identify those responsible and mete out with thoroughness and firmness the punishments provided for under our legislation.

Their hackneyed phraseology notwithstanding, both presidential messages are in fact replete with signals not only to the population at large but also to other players in the Algerian power structure. This urgent political semaphore comes amid two political squalls that have blown up, seemingly independently of one another, over the past month: an upsurge in agitation across the vast southern wilayas where Algeria's oil and gas resources are located on the one hand, and the surprise return to prominence in the Algerian media (and to a degree also internationally) of a number of high-level corruption scandals that had seemed to have been swept definitively under the carpet after being partially dealt with during Bouteflika's second and third terms of office. It remains to be seen whether these squalls will blow over, or whether they augur heavier storms to come.

Since the presidential election of 2004, in which a last-minute deal with DRS chief Lt-Gen. Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène enabled him to outmanoeuvre the army chiefs, it had been largely plain sailing for President Bouteflika. With the once powerful heads of the army marginalised as political players, Bouteflika and Tewfik in effect ruled as a duumvirate, proving to be masters at the game of manipulating, dividing, co-opting and suborning the political parties and able for the most part simply to ignore the many spontaneous and localised outbreaks of social unrest that flared regularly in towns and villages across the country without ever finding a political voice or, still less, coming together into a single, united movement. To be sure, the regime was rattled for a time by the protests and rioting over soaring food prices that broke out in late 2010, coinciding with the Tunisian revolution, and the following months of upheavals across the Arab world, prompting Bouteflika's April 2011 promise of extensive political and constitutional reform, but it soon became apparent that the fires of the Arab Spring had not taken in Algeria, and the regime returned largely to business as usual (the constitutional reform process has limped on, but with less and less enthusiasm from all concerned: Prime Minister Sellal, confirming earlier this month that the draft reform would be submitted first to parliament and then to a referendum, was unable to say whether this would be during the spring or autumn session of parliament and dropped not the slightest hint as to what it might actually contain).

Beneath the surface this otherwise tediously flat sea, however, hidden currents seem to have begun to move of late. Amid prolonged uncertainty as to whether or not Bouteflika intends to stand for a fourth term of office in 2014, one potential successor after another (former Prime Ministers Ahmed Ouyahia and Ali Benflis, Transport Minister Amar Ghoul, the present PM Abdelmalek Sellal) has bobbed up to the surface only to sink again for the most part almost without trace – suggesting a state of indecision or deadlock behind the scenes. In our last report, we quoted a source at the Presidency as hinting that Tewfik (who is thought to have earlier backed first Ouyahia and then Benflis as possible regime candidates in 2014) might no longer be the pivotal figure he once was. This came on the heels of suggestions from a former DRS officer that Tewfik had been unsettled by the fact that the West's main interlocutor with Algeria on the situation in northern Mali is not him but Chief of Staff Maj-Gen. Ahmed Gaïd-Saleh.

Since then, there have been further suggestions – from private sources (notably an astute Algerian businessman close to sections of the military) and from the special envoy of Paris-based daily Le Monde – that the army has begun to re-emerge as a political player. The catalyst has been the French intervention against AQMI and its allies in northern Mali, which has thrust the Algerian military centre-stage – not only as the preferred interlocutor of the Western powers but also as the guardian of Algeria's borders and, as seen at In Amenas, vital infrastructures. The Algerian businessman notes that, since France launched its 'Operation Serval' in northern Mali, members of the rising generation of officers in the Algerian military have begun to hold informal gatherings to discuss the situation (and no doubt other matters) – a practice that had ceased several years ago. A mid-ranking Spanish defence official, meanwhile, claims that the French intervention in Mali provoked a direct confrontation between President Bouteflika and the army: although the military chiefs were extremely reluctant to grant the French over-flight rights (insisting that permission to overfly Algerian territory be limited to logistical support aircraft rather than fighter aircraft, and that it be granted on a case-by-case basis) they were in the end overruled by the President who promptly granted the French what they wanted.

At the same time, the sudden rush of media and government attention for conditions in southern Algeria following the In Amenas siege seems to have acted as a stimulus to the socio-economic agitation across the southern wilayas. Protest movements by the unemployed and others are of course nothing new in southern cities such as Ouargla and Laghouat. But the In Amenas attack, by drawing attention to the social and political context in which it took place (due notably to reports that the attackers had been able to recruit a number of disaffected locals as informants or accomplices), has provided southern Algerians with an opportunity to air their grievances. The opportunity has been seized with enthusiasm: unemployed workers attempted to march to the oil hub of Hassi Messaoud to make their voice heard on the February 24 anniversary of the nationalisation of the oil and gas sector (only to be beaten back by police and gendarmes), workers in the education sector in all the southern wilayas launched a three-day strike as of February 25 over pay and working conditions and called on other sectors to follow their lead, and the National Committee for the Defence of the Rights of the Unemployed (CNDDC) called for an all-south demonstration in Ouargla on March 14 (at least 10,000 attended the protest, which this time was allowed to pass peacefully). Marking the anniversary of nationalisation with a visit to In Amenas on Feb. 24, Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal and his ministers were taken to task by speaker after speaker at a meeting with notables and representatives of the local population over the social and economic marginalisation of the south; Sellal's remarks, in which he gave voice to the regime's fears of a "criminal gang^[1]" of wreckers seeking to split the south away from the rest of Algeria, seem to have served only to further fuel the indignation of the protesters^[2]. The government has since responded with a reshuffle of provincial governors that has brought new heads to six out of ten southern wilayas (including, for the first time, the appointment of a local man as Wali of Illizi), a programme to encourage small businesses, job creation and local recruitment in the south, and pledges to establish Sonatrach and Algérie Télécom training academies in various southern towns to develop local talent. It remains to be seen whether this will be sufficient to quell a movement which for the time being seems to be growing in confidence.

The attention to the south, and the protest movement there, appear also to have encouraged another former Prime Minister, Ahmed Benbitour, who hails from the southern wilaya of Ghardaia, to declare his intention of standing for President in 2014. Benbitour was the first prime minister appointed by Bouteflika after he came to power in 1999 but served for less than a year before falling out with the head of state over economic policy; somewhat later, at a time of tension between the President and the military chiefs, he seems briefly to have been considered by some within the army as a potential alternative to Bouteflika in the 2004 presidential election. Whether or not Benbitour is being actively encouraged this time round by elements within the establishment, he has latched on to the other political hot potato of the moment, namely the corruption scandals surrounding the Bouteflika presidency – a theme which was extensively used by Bouteflika's opponents within the power structure in the run-up to the 2004 presidential election, when compromising details were drip-fed to the press by insiders over a period of months.

Since the second week of February, when Milan prosecutors announced that they had put ENI head Paolo Scaroni under investigation in a probe into alleged bribes paid to win contracts in Algeria for ENI subsidiary Saipem SpA, the Algerian independent media has been publishing a seemingly endless stream of articles on corruption at Sonatrach, further fuelled by later reports in the Canadian and Italian press that Swiss magistrates are investigating possible corrupt practices on the part of Canada's SNC-Lavalin in Algeria. While the initial trigger may have been provided by these external probes, there are signs that the media chatter has been deliberately kept going by elements within the establishment: new tidbits relating to middlemen involved in corruption at Sonatrach appear to have been leaked to reliable journalists (notably Salima Tlemçani of El Watan, who has close ties to the military), those who do not have anything new to add have been free to indulge in speculation, and other, unrelated cases have been dragged back into the open – including lurid claims that then Interior Minister Yazid Zerhouni was seen leaving national police chief Col. Ali Tounsi's office with a mysterious bundle of documents under his arm immediately after the latter was shot dead at his desk by a colleague in 2010). Time and again, the central figures in these scandals are individuals who are or were close associates of Bouteflika's: Zerhouni, former Foreign Minister Mohamed Bedjaoui, and above all former Energy Minister Chakib Khelil (who according to certain press reports jetted briefly back to Algiers from his self-imposed exile in the midst of all this to consult with the President's brother, Saïd Bouteflika, and seek assurances that he would be protected from prosecution). Furthermore, it has transpired that the Algerian courts themselves opened a second investigation into corruption at Sonatrach last October^[3] that in part covers the same ground as the Milanese investigation into Saipem, and that a decision was taken in January of this year to allow both the defence and the prosecution in the long-buried El Khalifa Bank case^[4] to have their appeals heard in a court of cassation, as of April 2. It would seem therefore that there is an internal, Algerian dynamic going on here, and there are grounds for thinking that it may be driven by parties within the establishment with an axe to grind with the President and his erstwhile 'clan'. In this respect, it is worth noting that the Spanish defence official quoted above also alluded to a conflict between the Algerian top brass and Saïd Bouteflika, who is said to have cornered all the commissions generated by a contract signed with Germany for the supply of frigates to the navy, leaving the military out.

Thus the signs seem to point to the emergence of a new, three-way game at the top, between Bouteflika, Tewfik and the generals, in place of the rather uneventful two-man game run by Bouteflika and Tewfik alone over the past eight years. This would seem to be the context of Bouteflika's repeated hat-tipping to the army and the DRS in his recent messages, his warning about the continued risk of Arab Spring contagion, and his statement of “confidence in the ability of the criminal justice system” to deal appropriately with the resurgent corruption scandals. It is unclear at this stage how this game will play out, but it is certainly worth monitoring as Algeria enters the run-up to the spring 2014 presidential poll.

Foreign Relations

As France's Operation Serval in northern Mali continues to unfold, fighting is increasingly concentrated in the Adrar des Ifoghas uplands north of Kidal to which AQMI and its allies had fallen back after their tactical retreat from the main towns in the early days of the French intervention. Consequently, French troops have taken control of the remote town of Tessalit, just 70 km from Algeria's southern border, and are conducting operations in a mountain range that actually extends northwards into Algerian territory – uncomfortably close, from the Algerian point of view. With the jihadist groups under pressure from French air strikes and ground offensives by Chadian forces, this puts Algeria, and its armed forces in particular, in role of gatekeeper. It is in this context that French army general Henri Poncet (an Africa specialist who coincidentally was born in Oran) was quoted by French news magazine Marianne at the end of February as lauding in no uncertain terms Algeria's “courageous” support for the French war effort. “At a time when the joint European defence effort is conspicuous by its absence, Algeria has turned out to be our best ally in our intervention in Mali,” opined the general, going on to argue that the time has come for Algeria and France “to march ahead together – History has just given us the opportunity to do so, by designating a common enemy.”

Algiers' position is not without ambiguity, however. After receiving Sergei Lavrov on Feb. 11, for example, President Bouteflika made no comments to the press himself, leaving the talking to the Russian Foreign Minister – who naturally seized the opportunity to restate Russia's traditional opposition to outside (and especially Western) intervention in the affairs of sovereign states and to emphasise the harmony of views between Algiers and Moscow on the need for negotiated, “political and diplomatic” solutions to conflicts in countries “such as Mali and Syria”. In Mali, grumbled Lavrov, the French now found themselves fighting “the same people they armed in Libya”. Even though in reality Algeria, by force of circumstance, now has little choice but to collaborate with the French against AQMI and its allies, there can be little doubt that Algiers shares the view that what is now happening in Mali is in large part the consequence of former French President Sarkozy's adventurism in Libya.

The upheavals in Mali and Libya having creating immense problems for Algeria on its southern and eastern borders, the Algerian leadership has, as we indicated in our last report, expressed interest in acquiring advanced, US-made killer drones (specifically the MQ-9 Reaper) with which to patrol these vast and almost uncontrollable frontiers. However, it would appear that such efforts – be they directly with the US authorities or via the British – have led nowhere (perhaps unsurprisingly given the sensitive nature of the technology which has not even been made available as yet to the United States' closest Arab allies in the Gulf). In the wake of this failure, the Algerian media has claimed that the first prototype Algerian-made drone, which has apparently been in development since President Bouteflika launched the idea during a visit to Ouargla in 2010, will be ready “by the end of this year”. There is no indication however that the future Algerian drone will be armed, and even if a prototype does fly before the end of 2013, mass production and deployment would still be a long way off, leaving the Algerian military dependent on other means for patrolling the vast desert badlands – and perhaps tempted to envisage closer cooperation with the US military's newly established drone capability in neighbouring Niger.

Security

Political violence in February was markedly one-sided. The security forces kept up a steady rate of ambushes targeting small groups of jihadists in Kabylia and to a lesser extent other parts of the country, while AQMI remained for the most part passive. Overall, the jihadist group took the initiative in only around a third of the 22 incidents recorded in February^[6].

One significant exception to AQMI's pattern of passivity came early in the month, when a group of "several jihadists" attacked a military camp near Boudoukhan in the wilaya of Khenchela, in the EAST of the country, on February 5. The group, dressed in military uniforms, commandeered a vehicle used to supply the camp and tried to use it as a "Trojan horse" to infiltrate the facility, provoking a three-hour battle in which at least one jihadist was killed and an unspecified number of soldiers wounded. The army immediately launched a major search and destroy mission in the area to track the group, using helicopter gunships and even jet fighters according to press accounts, and the following day freed a hostage (believed to be the driver of the hijacked vehicle) the attackers had taken with them in their flight. Initial press reports claimed that there had been as many as 50 attackers, "most of them Tunisians and Libyans"^[7]; the Algerian Defence Ministry officially denied this in a statement on Feb. 8, saying there no more than "eight criminals" involved.

There was also an unusual report of an attempted suicide-bombing in the capital, ALGIERS, which has not seen any incidents of political violence for a number of years. According to Arabic-language daily Echorouk (Feb. 28), the security forces, expecting terrorist acts against French interests in the capital following France's military intervention in Mali, tightened their surveillance of jihadist activity and towards the end of February discovered a plot to suicide-bomb a "civil security centre" in the Bab el-Oued district; when apprehended in a mosque the would-be bomber "was already wearing his suicide belt", but the security forces "managed to immobilise him" before he could detonate it, claimed the daily.

Although this story should be viewed with some caution (Echorouk, which has a tendency to sensationalism and cannot be considered an entirely reliable news source, was the only newspaper to carry it), the reference to the potential threat to French interests in connection with the war in Mali does nonetheless raise the serious question of whether and how AQMI in northern Algeria will take part in the "revenge" operations promised by Mokhtar Belmokhtar following the bloody denouement of the In Amenas siege, and more broadly in supporting its comrades-in-arms who are battling French and allied African forces in the Malian Sahara. Documents allegedly found in Timbuktu after it was taken back from the jihadists in late January^[8] indicate that ties between AQMI's two branches — the Kabylia-based arm which comprises the central leadership and the Saharan branch in northern Mali — are closer than seemed to be the case, with AQMI's national emir Abdelmalek Droukdel (a.k.a. Abou Mosab Abdelwadoud) effectively laying down the line for the southern branch. And yet, two months after the beginning of France's Operation Serval in northern Mali, AQMI in northern Algeria has largely kept quiet, or even reduced its activity. This may be due to pressure from the security forces, pre-emptively stepping up their harassment of jihadists in the north of Algeria with constant search and destroy missions and ambushes of isolated jihadists, and/or the effects of harsh winter weather on AQMI's depleted forces. However, AQMI theoretically still has the option of suicide bombings, which are more difficult to prevent by means of classic military operations, and it cannot be entirely ruled out that the French war in Mali might provides the context for a suicide strike against French interests or symbols of the Algerian state and military in northern Algeria.

In the oil producing regions of the SOUTH, there was one minor incident on February 2, when a group of armed men “believed to be bandits” hijacked a 4WD vehicle belonging to an Italian company “working in the oil industry”. The assailants beat up the occupants of the car — none of them expats — and held them hostage for some time before letting them go and making away with the car. The fact that armed men on pick-up trucks could still roam the areas around Hassi Messaoud suggests that security of Algeria’s oil and gas sites was still not optimal more than a fortnight after the In Amenas incident. There have since been reports that the security forces have beefed up their presence beyond the perimeters of oil and gas facilities and suggestions that foreign oil companies will no longer be allowed to employ local private security firms for facilities protection, in which role they are supposedly to be permanently replaced by the army. On Feb. 20, Energy Minister Youcef Yousfi, speaking at a forum organised by government-owned daily Echaâb, indicated that the Ministry of Energy and Mining was still in discussions with the DRS and the army concerning the oil and gas industry's security needs.

Two incidents were reported on the BORDERS WITH LIBYA. On February 16 the security forces detected an off-roader that was trying to cross into Algeria from Libya near In Amenas, wilaya of Illizi, and launched an operation to intercept it. Two “terrorists”, one Libyan and one Egyptian, and a third unidentified individual were killed in the operation. Echorouk (17/2) said these jihadists are believed to have fled from Mali to Libya with the beginning of the French intervention there. For its part, El-Khabar (28/2) reported that security forces had on Feb. 26 arrested four men in an off-roader as they tried to cross into Algeria from Libya near Djanet, also in the wilaya of Illizi. The vehicle bore no registration plates and the men, dressed in military uniforms, carried two machine guns. They claimed to have lost their way while on a hunting trip.

Algeria’s SOUTHERN BORDER saw three incidents early February but no further clashes have been reported since Feb. 16^[9]. On February 1 security forces intercepted an armed group travelling in three off-roaders as they tried to cross into Algeria from Niger near In Guezzam, in the south of the wilaya of Tamanrasset. Helicopter gunships were used in the operation. Two “terrorists” were killed and ammunition and a number of weapons and satellite phones recovered. On Feb. 8 the Algerian army “eliminated” two jihadists who were trying to cross the border with Niger in the south of the wilaya of Tamanrasset to “deliver a shipment” of weapons. They were found to be carrying machine guns and communications gear. On Feb. 11 El-Khabar said that security forces on February 9 intercepted three individuals smuggling weapons from Mali in the area between Tin Zaouatin and Bordj Baji Mokhtar. They were carrying machine guns and ammunition and “admitted working for MUJAO^[10]”. And on February 15, security forces, acting on intelligence, tracked and intercepted a jihadist group near Bordj Baji Mokhtar in the south of the wilaya of Adrar, on the border with Mali. After a “three-hour chase” the security forces killed four of the jihadists, believed to belong to Ansar Dine, and forced three others to flee into Mali. Five machine guns were recovered.

In northern MALI, meanwhile, French and Chadian forces continue to battle jihadists in the Adrar des Ifoghas uplands, which run right up to the Algerian border where they merge into the foothills of the Hoggar. In late February it was reported that Abdelhamid Abou Zeid, emir of AQMI’s Katiba Tarek Ibn Ziad and one of the organisation’s top three commanders in Mali, was killed in a French air raid on or around February 25. A week later, Chadian sources claimed that their forces had killed Mokhtar Belmokhtar, commander of AQMI's Masked Men Brigade which carried out the In Amenas raid. French official sources say news of Abou Zeid's death appears to be credible, pointing to posts on jihadist forums that admit he was "martyred", but are more sceptical of reports of Belmokhtar's death.

Meanwhile French military commanders say their forces fighting in the Adrar des Ifoghas have discovered "terrorism infrastructure on an industrial scale" in the area and weapons in very large quantities, including armoured vehicles, artillery pieces and other heavy weapons, but no MANPADS. According to a usually well-informed French journalist and defence analyst, French forces "have found no surface-air missiles in working condition" in the arsenal the jihadists left behind, and there have as yet been no reports of such weapons being used against French aviation in the conflict.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
 President and CEO
 The Gabriel Company, LLC
 1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
 Washington DC, 20005
 Phone: +1 202.887.1113
 Fax: +1 202.887.1115
 Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
 Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

-
- [1] Cherdima, a particularly derogatory word in Algerian colloquial Arabic – which the Prime Minister's spokesmen have since tried to deny he ever used.
- [2] Significantly, banners reading "national unity is a red line [not to be crossed]" were raised at the Ouargla demonstration on March 14.
- [3] Now being referred to as the 'Sonatrach II case'. The first investigation into corruption at Sonatrach, which led to the conviction of the company's CEO Mohamed Méziane and most of its top management, was launched in 2010.
- [4] Founded by Abdelmoumen Rafik Khalifa in 1998, El Khalifa Bank, one of the first private banks in Algeria, enjoyed a meteoric rise during Bouteflika's first term of office thanks in part to its management of the accounts of several large, government-related institutional clients, before abruptly hitting a wall and going into liquidation. Having fled to London, Abdelmoumen Khalifa was tried in absentia in 2007 along with over 100 other defendants and sentenced to life imprisonment for corruption, abuse of trust, forgery and criminal association. Widespread suspicions that he had been 'covered' for years by the regime and that members of Bouteflika's entourage had profited directly or indirectly from embezzlement at his bank were swept under the carpet.
- [5] Seven incidents reported in AQMI's Kabyle heartland in February; one in Algiers; five in the eastern wilayas of Batna, Tebessa and Khenchela; two in the western wilaya of Chlef; five in the south, mostly on the borders.
- [6] So far in March five incidents all told, including two AQMI operations, have been registered.
- [7] Following the Algerian authorities' assertion that as many as 11 of the In Amenas attackers were Tunisians, and in light of the ongoing instability in Libya and Tunisia, rumours of Libyan and Tunisian nationals being involved in attacks in Algeria are likely to be a recurrent theme in Algerian media reporting over the coming period. It is not yet possible to state with any certainty, however, that Tunisian and Libyan fighters are present in any significant numbers in AQMI's ranks in northern Algeria.
- [8] Radio France International and French daily Libération (25/02/13) give an account of a document entitled 'Roadmap relating to Islamic jihad in Azawad', signed by Abdelmalek Droukdel and dated 20 July 2012, which summarises internal discussions about the way forward for AQMI in building an Islamic state northern Mali, managing its relations with Ansar Dine and the MNLA. A fortnight earlier, Britain's Daily Telegraph (13/02/13) published what it claims were partial minutes of a meeting of AQMI's leadership, held under the command of Droukdel on 18 March 2012, covering similar themes.

[9] With a war on the other side of the southern border which has already leaked into Algeria through its eastern border, there is clearly a big effort by the Algerian authorities to keep the borders, especially in the south, closed and keep infiltrators out. The relative lack of reporting since Feb. 16 does not necessarily mean a lack of incidents, since information appears to be controlled and some activity is likely not to be reported in the press.

[10] The Movement for Unicity and Jihad in West Africa, a group which split off from AQMI's southern units in mid-2011 but continues to work closely with its parent organisation.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 19, 2013 1:44 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS report

FYI, a report from our sources:

According to a former Mauritanian government minister, a number of Saharawis have indeed been taking part in the war in Mali. The Mauritanian intelligence services have established a list of around fifty names. But although these fighters may hail from Western Sahara, they are not members of the Polisario Front or its affiliated organisations; they are residents of Mauritania, and some of them were born in that country, and entered Mali from Mauritania rather than travelling through Algerian territory.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 19, 2013 6:05 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: January/February 2013 Events Bulletin

Dear Team,

Below please find the January/February 2013 MAC Events Bulletin. Our team compiles a monthly list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

gVisit us at: <http://www.moroccoonthemove.com>

Follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

January/February Events Bulletin

January 29

Global Authoritarians and the Arab Spring: New Challenges for U.S. Diplomacy

January 30

Moving Beyond Rhetoric: How Should President Obama Change U.S. Policy in the Middle East?

February 6

Crisis in Mali and North Africa: Regional Dynamics and International Priorities

February 6

Priorities for Stabilizing Mali

February 11

Elections and Politics in North Africa

February 14

Crisis in Mali: U.S. Interests and the International Response

February 27

International Cooperation in Combating Terrorism

Global Authoritarians and the Arab Spring: New Challenges for U.S. Diplomacy

Date: January 29, 2013

1. Title: Global Authoritarians and the Arab Spring; New Challenges for U.S. Diplomacy

Hosted by the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars

Participants:

Daniel Brumberg: Senior Adviser, Center for Conflict Management, United States Institute of Peace

Steven Heydmann: Senior Advisor, Middle East Initiatives, United States Institute of Peace

Tamara Cofman Wittes: Director, Saban Center for Middle East Policy, Brookings Institute

Haleh Esfandiari: Moderator: Director, Middle East Program, Woodrow Wilson Center

2. Overview

Daniel Brumberg and Steven Heydmann discussed their recently published paper "Global Authoritarianism and the Arab Spring: New Challenges for U.S. Diplomacy", which analyses powerful authoritarian regimes and their influence in the MENA region. Tamara Wittes provided commentary on the paper.

3. Summary

Steven Heydmann discussed the theoretical background of the paper. Since the Arab Spring, the United States has been navigating an extremely volatile policy environment. While the landscape of the region is far from stable, some trends are beginning to emerge that will pose serious challenges for US diplomacy. Among them is the role that leading authoritarian states have assumed, notably Russia, China, and Iran, as critical actors in regional and international diplomacy. To Heydmann, this "loose, flexible, and informal" grouping of countries has five main goals: 1) Challenging the West, particularly in international organizations; 2) Creating economic ties among themselves via trade agreements, weapons sales, and direct investment; 3) Creating ties with emerging regional democracies, who are often sympathetic to critiques of the US role in the international system; 4) Establishing authoritarian forms of government as a viable alternative to democracy; and 5) Breaking Western dominance of globalization. These countries vehemently defend state sovereignty, reject the imposition of international normative human rights mechanisms, and argue that the US is no longer the global hegemon. Heydmann emphasized that these authoritarian actors have immense interests in the Middle East and are able to capitalize on anti-US sentiment found across the region, which has a negative aggregate impact that makes US diplomacy very difficult.

Daniel Brumberg explained that he and Heydmann wanted to start the conversation about global authoritarianism and its impacts. He is particularly interested in the way these regimes band together to block pathways to global governance in international organizations, thus "thwarting the will of the global community" to implement Responsibility to Protect and similar programs. Russia and China routinely blunt the efforts of the UNSC, and Brazil and South Africa, sought-after emerging democracies, use abstentions to provide political cover to authoritarian regimes in such settings. At a recent meeting of Non-Aligned States, Mohammed Morsi spoke of redefining the global economic and political order in a more equitable way, mimicking traditional authoritarian regimes.

Tamara Wittes noted the region is undergoing a change of immense strategic importance. Her primary comment on the paper was about whether or not the balance of democracy and authoritarianism matters. The nature of globalizing authoritarianism is to strengthen collective opposition to global norms of human rights in the face of global consensus and growing global democratization in every region and in every culture. However, there is a complex mix of interests and opportunities due to globalization that these regimes seek to exploit. The United States must transform its diplomacy to adapt. Wittes admitted that the US must manage a difficult legacy in the Middle East, and she seemed dubious that it could overcome it in this fluid landscape with "smart power".

Heydmann responded that the balance of democracy and authoritarianism matters. The authoritarians contextualize their claims with arguments about the international order. Authoritarians present entirely different options from the West in managing crises and in general; they present the possibility of being equal to the West. Now emerging states have the option of being something different. However, even though history gives the United States an advantage, acquiescence is not a given. Brumberg agreed that the Chinese have been explicit in offering an alternative model.

4. Q&A

Q: (Esfandiari) Regarding vote counts in the UN, Iran did not get the votes it was counting on to stop sanctions. Also, the only countries willing to trade with Iran are India and China.

A: (Heydmann) Relationships are ad-hoc between authoritarian regimes, and they depend on sufficient shared interests between states, which is the problem in "too casual" arrangements like these.

Q: (Professor, University of Wisconsin) This all seems reminiscent of the Group of 7, shifting coalitions, the Non-Aligned Movement. Gradually they built pretty strong anti-Western momentum aimed at stopping Western hegemony.

A: (Brumberg) Certain aspects are relevant, but this is taking place in a different international context.

(Heydmann) There are echoes of that, but also some important differences. Global democratization squeezed out authoritarian regimes, but now some democracies have failed so it is a congenial context for authoritarian claims to be an alternative to democracy.

(Wittes) The Non-Aligned Movement had power originally because it was anti-colonial and anti-imperial.

Q: (Gerald Chapman, unaffiliated) Could you go into more detail about the norms you spoke of that the global authoritarians don't like, such as the Law of the Sea?

A: (Heydmann) In addition to the Law of the Sea, they have a big problem with the ICC and universal referral to that body. The only way for non-signatories to the Treaty of Rome to be referred is via a resolution in the UNSC, which presents obvious problems.

Q: (National Endowment for Democracy) The Gulf Cooperation Council also impedes the application of liberal norms. Why is Saudi Arabia outside the frame of this conversation? Also, why is there no discussion of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization? Erdogan is trying to join.

A: (Brumberg) China is trying to express its power via the SCO and other methods. Sometimes it's aligned with Saudi Arabia. Authoritarianism is sustained in the region, and so are US relations with authoritarian regimes. China has investments on both sides of the Gulf and balances itself very carefully vis-à-vis sanctions and military intervention. A war economy is bad for China.

(Wittes) China's engagement in the Middle East is based on energy need. China is free-riding on the American security umbrella in the Gulf.

Q: (Unidentified speaker, Embassy of Egypt) What is your assessment of US policy toward Egypt, and how would you address the anti-US sentiment?

A: (Wittes) There's a big difference in Egyptian and American interests, but they both share interest in a stable Middle East. My worry concerning Egypt is that the beleaguered president will fall back on nationalism to rally support, and the US is an easy target. US engagement in the region is multifaceted.

Q: (Arohi Sharma, Senate intern) Do the US bases in the Middle East compromise our interests?

A: (Heydmann) The bases are a visible symbol of a US presence, which hurts and helps us. On the one hand, the bases can be a thorn in the side of our relationships, and they can constrain our opportunity to engage. But some view the bases as evidence of America's commitment to security in the region.

5. Observations

This event was attended by approximately 50-60 policy professionals and academics. The discussion of authoritarian regimes and their actions, specifically working in tandem to achieve goals and frustrate the US, was very interesting. There is certainly ample evidence to support their claims of China pointedly holding up an alternative system. The event was of little relevance to Morocco, but Daniel Brumberg and Steven Heydmann were very clever and articulate, and it is useful that MAC has relations with them for events and counsel.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Moving Beyond Rhetoric: How Should President Obama Change U.S. Policy in the Middle East?

Date: January 30, 2013

1. Title: Moving Beyond Rhetoric: How Should President Obama Change U.S. Policy in the Middle East?

Hosted by the Project on Middle East and Democracy (POMED)

Panelists:

Esraa Abdel Fattah: Youth Committee Member, Al-Dostour Party of Egypt

Larry Diamond: Director, Center on Democracy, Development and Rule of Law, Stanford University

Brian Katulis: Senior Fellow, Center for American Progress

Stephen McInerney: Moderator: Executive Director, Project on Middle East Democracy

2. Overview

During his first presidential term, President Obama promised a radically different approach towards the Middle East. Although this rhetoric was well-embraced, four years later, such acclamation was perceived to be simply empty words. Presently, there is still a lack of tangible policies to address the Middle East despite the historical upheaval of the Arab Spring. In an attempt to define policy options for President Obama's second term, POMED authored a report on the topic with assessments from leading American and Middle East experts. It was clear that, despite the variety of responses, four core recommendations emerge in the report: taking bolder steps, engaging more broadly, using leverage and incentives, and creating more flexible policies.

3. Summary

Stephen McInerney opened the discussion by promoting the recent publication which addresses the changes that should be made in US policy towards the Middle East. He also expanded on the four recurring themes. As mentioned, the United States needs to take bolder steps. Presently, US policies are too cautious and the US needs, according to Larry Diamond, to "stop tinkering." Secondly, the US needs to engage more broadly and step away from just government to government relations. Establishing and strengthening government to people and people to people relationships are a must. Thirdly, using leverage and incentives to reward or punish actions will encourage more engagement with the region. Finally, implementing more creative and flexible policies will allow for quicker responses, thus increasing America's credibility. McInerney asked each panelist to express what they believed to be the best policy moving forward.

Larry Diamond's, main advice was to "get serious." Although Obama has been serious about altering current policies, the follow through has been disappointing. In getting serious, the administration needs to create both regional and country-specific policies. The US also needs to underscore its unequivocal unwillingness to accept pseudo-democracy as democracy. Diamond pointed to Morocco and Jordan as countries that are at the end of the day faux democracies, despite having promoted democratic reforms. He argued that the US cannot rely on such reforms because transitions eventually turn violent without real reform. Diamond stressed his belief that Morocco's regime will not survive our lifetime and definitely not the next ten years and urged the Obama administration to lean hard on the Moroccan monarchy and push for real democratic reform. He also questioned Morocco's legitimacy as a member of the UN Security Council.

Esraa Abdel Fattah noted that real power lies in the people, a lesson that the Egyptian government has yet to learn; and until the government recognizes this, there will always be turmoil in Egypt. Because of this, the US must focus on forging relationships directly with the people rather than solely focusing solely on government to government relationships. Fattah advocated for development projects created by the US that will immediately affect the daily lives of the populace. In her opinion, Egypt needs to stop dialogues and move to more concrete socioeconomic developments to help the people in the streets. Lastly, Fattah explained that this frustration with the United States is nothing new and that unfortunately it will continue, as she fundamentally believes that the US is making the same mistake with Morsi as it did with Mubarak.

Brian Kutulis had four overall recommendations regarding moving beyond Obama's 2009 rhetoric. First and foremost, he called for the banishment of labels like the "Arab Spring" and "Arab Awakening" due to their lack of neutral connotation. By eliminating such labels, it will be easier to understand the fluid battle for legitimacy and power within the region. Second, that the US needs a designated individual within the government to devise an integrated strategy for the region. Katulis cited John Brennan's expertise and ability to exercise influence on counterterrorism policies as an example of the ideal candidate. Third, there is a need for more robust policy tools that both the American government and international organizations can use to affect a positive change despite the ongoing economic crisis. The question in point is not about how much money the Administration is spending, but where they are spending it. Fourth, Like Diamond, Katulis called for more country-specific strategies in addition to a regional strategy that places political reform in the context of other American strategic interests, rather than focusing only on a select set of policies like the prevention of an Iranian nuclear weapon.

4. Q & A

Q: (Mohamed Baboush, Tunisian citizen) Interesting papers have studied the high amount of American support for a democratic Tunisia; however, none seem to address how to bridge the gap between analysis/recommendations and implementation?

A: (Diamond) There needs to be more knowledge on the process of implementation. What is lacking is the sense of urgency and priority from higher levels. The US in regards to Tunisia is focusing on more mid-term rather than short term achievements. In terms of economic development, there first needs to be a higher level of education among the populace. Clear marching orders are lacking.

(Katulis) I am not familiar with Tunisia so I am going to answer this question by using Egypt as a frame of reference. In the case of Egypt, new policies should not be created. Due to budget cuts within the US, the Obama administration has tied all economic aid to the IMF; however the Administration has to keep in mind that this cannot be a "one-off" thing. Policy makers should not think in terms of a Marshall Plan, but instead how to create a link between the public and private sectors. The most important factor is to implement the already conceptualized ideas. We are stuck in Egypt and stuck in the US.

Q: Do you believe that the sentiment of Egyptians is of hopefulness or hopelessness?

A: (Fattah) Regardless of what happens in the streets of Egypt, Egyptians will fight with all their might and soul for their country. In that respect, Egyptians will always be and remain hopeful for change.

Q: How can the US help when so there is so much hatred of American's on Egyptian grounds?

A: (Fattah) In order for this hatred to cease, America has to change its image. If the US Administration really wants to alter its image it needs to stop giving money to Egypt and create projects on the ground.

(Diamond) There is a limit to what the US can do in regards to building projects within Egypt. Also, in order to have the capability of funding such projects there needs to be a financial flow and relationship with private enterprises to keep these projects that you are talking about sustainable. Before addressing this, there is a dire call for short term relief. Medium-term relief can be established by qualifying the local populace for jobs through education. I sympathize,, but the US simply cannot create projects and ignore the political aspect; imagine what will happen if there are no free elections? The US needs to focus on both political and economic factors.

(Fattah) Whether the elections are free or not free, the US will not be able to do anything. Historical evidence proves that the US will and cannot do anything.

Q: (Ari Ratner, former White House appointee at the State Department)I am frustrated with the lack of response from the American government. Bureaucracy is hindering effective action in the Middle East. We should not focus on country-specific strategies, but instead on a flexible overarching response. Why has this not happened yet? We already have the tools, but why are we not using them?

A: (Katulis) I agree that there should be a better structure which would in turn allow for a better response from the government. The already implemented structures deny us the ability of being nimble, which is why we need to establish either an individual or a group whose sole focus is the Middle East. We need to involve Egyptian civilians and begin talks on the Hill on how we can become more flexible.

A: (Diamond) We need to rewrite our policy on foreign assistance. This is nothing new and attempts have been made, like the creation of the MCC. However, this movement has lost its momentum. There is a lack of creativity - of individuals thinking out of the box. For example, Tom Friedman created free public online courses available to anybody with an internet connection. Small and visionary initiatives like Friedman's are lacking from the Secretary of State.

Q: (Nancy, Director of Freedom House in Egypt) The key problem with funding from organizations like the World Bank and USAID is that nobody really looks at the channel the funds go through. The money fails to reach the poor. How is this social development funding supposed to help small businesses when it is goes directly into the pockets of the corrupt? These crooked individuals and organizations are never held accountable, how can the people be supported?

A: (Fattah) You are right about the corrupted channels, which brings me back to my other point that we do not need money but direct projects. There is a lack of credibility of the funds provided by the World Bank and USAID. Instead of money, the US needs to reestablish its credibility by building institutions that we can trust.

5. Observations

Approximately 40 professionals of diverse backgrounds including undergraduates, former members of the state department, and NGO representatives, attended this event. While the panelists and audience was primarily Tunisian and Egyptian focused, Larry Diamond was the only panelist to mention Morocco albeit in a negative light. This is not the first time that such arguments have been made about Morocco's commitment to real democracy. Diamond's assertions have been advanced by other Middle East experts, in both public and private forums. However misinformed, they reveal the continued challenges Morocco faces in telling its story of reform and underscore the need for continued communication about the progress Morocco is making in implementing the reforms of the 2011 Constitution.

\(Back to top\)

Crisis in Mali and North Africa: Regional Dynamics and International Priorities

Date: February 6, 2013

1. Title: Crisis in Mali and North Africa: Regional Dynamics and International Priorities

Hosted by the Brookings Institution, Africa Growth Initiative

Participants:

Daniel L. Byman: Senior Fellow and Research Director, Saban Center for Middle East Policy, Brookings Institution

Todd Moss: Vice President for Programs and Senior Fellow, Center for Global Development

Justin Vaisse: Senior Fellow and Director of Research, Center on the United States and Europe, Brookings Institution

Mwangi S. Kimenyi: Senior Fellow and Director, Africa Growth Initiative, The Brookings Institution

Margaret Brennan: Moderator: State Department Correspondent, CBS News

2. Overview

This event brought together experts from several different professional and regional perspectives to discuss the current situation in Mali. Daniel Byman discussed the role of al-Qaeda and other militant Islamist groups in Mali and in the Sahel more generally. Todd Moss spoke about the role that the United States can play in stabilizing the country in the wake of the French intervention. Justin Vaisse discussed (and defended) the French role in Mali. Mwangi Kimenyi discussed what regional actors can do in the future to support African democracy. After each panelist gave a short presentation, moderator Margaret Brennan engaged them in a discussion of possible solutions to the crisis going forward. Among other things, this highlighted the difficulty in developing a unified Western and African response to this crisis and future instability in the region, and the animosity amongst various international actors in regards to addressing Sahel instability.

3. Summary

Vaisse spoke specifically on the roots of the conflict in Mali and France's military intervention. There have been a number of Tuareg uprisings in the past, usually resulting in a peaceful settlement with the government in Bamako promising reforms including programs to build up infrastructure in the region and a plan for autonomy. This time, however, the uprising became particularly violent and ultimately succeeded in taking control of territory in the north. Vaisse explained that this is due to three main factors differentiating it from previous uprisings. One, the rebels were better funded than before due to revenue from increased cocaine trafficking from Latin America through the Sahel. Two, the revolution in Libya resulted in an influx of fighters into Mali who had previously worked for Qaddafi. Three, and most importantly, well-trained and well-funded Islamists, who essentially hijacked the Tuareg movement, were able to succeed in rapidly advancing towards Bamako, which the Tuareg had failed to do. It is these Islamist militants who are the new important actors in the Sahel region and who pose a particular threat to stability. For this reason in particular, according to Vaisse, Captain Sanogo specifically asked the French to intervene in Mali. The French had been in the Sahel for years dealing with Islamist groups that kidnapped French citizens; thus they were thus familiar with the actors in the region.

Moss spoke about the potential US role in this crisis. There are three stages of the international intervention: the initial French military intervention, peacekeeping, and the rebuilding of democratic institutions and security infrastructure. The US will be able to play a support role in the third stage. In recent years, the US has made three main mistakes in Mali and the region in general that could have been prevented - the prevention of which could have also prevented the current crisis:

1. The US ignored the ethnic tensions in Mali that led to this uprising. Specifically, we ignored the fact that the peace deals Bamako made with the Tuareg in order to quell previous uprisings were never upheld. Thankfully, it will be possible in the future to make sure that the Tuareg demands are met and prevent another uprising since the Tuareg are not naturally aligned with the Islamist groups. Unfortunately, it will be some time before Bamako is willing to negotiate with the Tuareg or vice-versa.
2. The US accepted Mohamed Ould Abdel Aziz as president of Mauritania following the 2008 coup d'état, despite the fact that this was not a legitimate democratic transition.
3. The US did not foresee this coup in Mali.

Judging on previous US action in similar situations, it will be the US' strong inclination to take strong counterterrorism measures against the combatants in the Sahel. This would be another mistake. Instead, Moss stressed that the US should balance a reasonable counterterrorism approach with smarter democracy-building support in Mali. It will be important that the US be proactive in this effort, instead of simply continuing to react to French actions in the country.

Next, Byman discussed the role of al-Qaeda in the region and the US counterterrorism response. Lately, the trend of terrorism in Mali (and throughout the Sahel) has been a shift away from the core of al-Qaeda and towards smaller, local terrorist organizations that are loosely affiliated with al-Qaeda. Fortunately, for the most part these groups present less of a direct threat to the US homeland. Unfortunately, they present more of a threat to regional stability. With this shift in the regional terrorist threat, US policy must shift accordingly. The previous tactic of chasing terrorist groups out of the country will likely backfire, as they will simply move to another country in the region - the presence of these groups in Mali in the first place was the result of having pushed AQIM out of Algeria. Instead, the US would do well to follow the advice that Moss just presented and balance a reasonable counterterrorism response with aggressive democratic institution-building in Mali. However, Byman was sure that the US would not take these measures in Mali, because Mali is simply not high enough on its list of foreign relations priorities. He suggested that what the US can do with the limited resources the US government will likely allot for our response in Mali is to support our allies in their counterterrorism efforts and enact a policy of containment against extremist groups in the country.

Kimenyi gave what he called an African perspective on the crisis in Mali and the French intervention. He was wary of any European military intervention in Mali because of the history of Western interventions in Africa. What concerned him especially was that despite the fact that the French had a quick success in their military operations in Mali, the core societal issues that precipitated the coup in Mali still remain. To truly prevent this from happening again, more infrastructure development will be necessary, in addition to a peace agreement that will give autonomy to the Tuareg. However, the French military intervention turned out to be necessary because of the failure of the African Union and ECOWAS to come together and address the crisis—the lack of unified response is indicative of the need to establish an African Union standing army. He highlighted the importance of an African response to an African problem.

4. Q & A

Discussion between moderator and speakers:

Q: (Brennan) The French seemingly saw the militant Islamist threat in Mali as much more dire than the Americans did. Why is there such a different calculation about the threat of Islamists between France and the United States?

A: (Vaisse) Well, the Pentagon did not see this as a direct threat now, but given five years it would have.

(Moss) Yes, in the short-term the Pentagon does not count Mali high on its list of priorities, but the military would have found the need to take counterterrorism measures in Mali. What is important to note here is the disparity between the military and the Department of State/Obama Administration: the military generally has an interventionist instinct, but the Administration and the diplomatic corps have a non-interventionist instinct.

Q: (Brennan) Why do we not have any good intelligence on these regional al-Qaeda affiliates?

A: (Byman) The intelligence community can predict strategic threats, but we cannot expect to disrupt every local plot, especially in the case of these local al-Qaeda affiliates. They operate in a region that is already difficult to monitor, and they do not have extensive foreign networks that we can track. We need to start combining intel-gathering with social diplomacy. That is, we need diplomatic missions that will go in and work with local communities, in addition to human intel-gathering that we have relied on in the past. Furthermore, we need to funnel money into intel-gathering. There will be interest on the military side to take aggressive action in the region, but there are still serious political concerns that make such aggressive force dangerous.

(Moss) It is clear that, in light of increased terrorist activity in the Sahel, we are going to increase intel-gathering in the region. However, this comes with certain risks. We are dealing with a small number of dangerous people in a vast region. If we increase the amount of intelligence coming in about possible attacks, how do we know when it is or isn't appropriate to go in and neutralize the threat with force? This may lead to us using more force than is advisable in a delicate region.

Q: (Brennan) How far away are we from a true democratic transition in Mali?

A: (Kimenyi) The short answer is, we are far from true democratic transition. For one thing, the current government in Mali does not have legitimacy because it was installed as a result of a coup. Also, neither the government in Bamako nor the citizens of southern Mali want to negotiate with the Tuareg. The illegitimate government needs to stand aside for democratic elections and the people of southern Mali need to be able to negotiate peace with the Tuareg in the north before a true democratic transition can take place.

Q: (Brennan) We have heard that the French hope to pull out of Mali in March. Is this really a deadline?

A: (Vaisse) We have been having difficulty determining the best date to pull out; you do not always get to choose who you work with. Given our intelligence, we underestimated the danger here and the effort it would take to catch the militants. We are planning a tentative timetable for elections in July. And yes, there will be cooperation from the US, but they will not launch kinetic ops in the country.

Q: (Brennan) AQIM has managed to largely fund its activities with ransom money from kidnappings. How do we counter this? Do we need to have more of a unified, non-kinetic Western response?

A: (Byman) When countries pay ransom to AQIM, it will continue to use this tactic. The US is frustrated with the European countries that do pay ransom to AQIM, like the French, who have paid close to 22 million euros in ransom. We understand that it's their people who are being kidnapped, but we would prefer if they not negotiate with terrorists in any way. We would be much stronger if we had a unified counterterrorism response.

(Vaisse) We did not pay that much money in ransom, and you're right, it IS our people who are being taken.

(Kimenyi) Let me reiterate that Africans should be playing a bigger role on our own continent. The kind of Western intervention that we would welcome is more aid in development. The West should not be working on a unified counterterrorism plan for Africa; it should be working on a unified development plan.

Q: (Brennan) Does the West have a role to play in this kind of soft diplomacy?

A: (Moss) Well, politically speaking, regional actors like ECOWAS, the AU, and potentially Burkina Faso, will begin to take the lead. If the US and France just use air strikes to "contain" the terrorist threat in Mali, then we will certainly see these militant groups spilling over into Niger, Mauritania, and Algeria. What we really need is more regional involvement in negotiations.

Q: (Brennan) Can we talk about Algeria? Can they take a lead role in controlling AQIM?

A: (Vaisse) That is a really difficult question. The Algerian security forces have been ruthless in cracking down on AQIM, but they have really only done so selectively, in order to make the regime look better. Furthermore, they have the right of pursuit in Mali, and they haven't used that.

(Byman) Algeria is a key power in approaching AQIM. They have a larger intelligence service and more counterterrorism resources than any other regional power. However, it has been difficult working with them; they are wary of cooperating with Western powers because they are fearful of giving up their autonomy in the region, given their troubled history with French colonialism. Also, Algeria sometimes massacres its own people and supports small terrorist ops in order to discredit Islamists and support the regime. Going forward, Algeria will be the most important question in going after these groups.

(Moss) It is important to keep in mind that AQIM is mostly Algerian; we cannot deal with this threat without Algeria's cooperation.

Q & A with audience:

Q: (Leon Weintraub, University of Wisconsin-Madison) I recall that we had training programs in the Department of State for African forces. What was the scope of these efforts? Did they help at all?

A: (Moss) Well, you're referring to the Trans-Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership (TSCTP), which involved several countries of the Sahel coming together to do training exercises. We have had important partners in this, and deployed our resources to this program, but the problem is that the governments involved kept falling to coups.

Mali, having been once considered the most stable democratic state in the Sahel region, was the keystone state in this program; that is why the coup in Mali was such a disaster for regional security. We really need to revisit our model for regional security.

(Vaisse) It is important to note that the Malian army is not a fighting army. Those who join the army are looking to get paid, and maintaining the status quo is a good way to do this. Although, the Malian army could be useful in the future for integrating the Tuareg further into Malian society.

(Kimenyi) I was not aware of these programs, but I can tell you that they have not been broad enough to have a real effect. The US should use AFRICOM to support African forces.

Q: (Jessica Gill, NPR) Can you elaborate further on where the interests and motivations of the Tuareg and those of the Islamist militants converge?

A: (Moss) We must not conflate terrorist interests with legitimate minority grievances. Even if these groups operate in the same geographic space and they do sometimes cooperate, they have fundamentally different motivations. The jihadists want strict Islamism, and the Tuareg simply want political autonomy and more infrastructure-building and investment in the north.

(Vaisse) We have seen the Tuareg cooperate with the French against AQIM. I would say that the situation in Mali is analogous to the situation in Afghanistan, with the Taliban cooperating with al-Qaeda.

(Byman) That is false. Afghanistan is not a fair analogy to Mali right now. There are so many ideological divisions at play within the militant groups in the north, between the Tuaregs and the jihadists, and between different jihadist groups themselves. These coalitions are constantly created and broken because of rivalry and opportunism.

(Moss) To be perfectly honest, given the tolerant religious climate in Mali, one would never expect jihadism to take root there.

5. Observations

This event was attended by 30-40 foreign policy professionals, including several officials from the US Department of State and other Foreign Ministries. The panelists did not say much that was directly applicable to Morocco, though Morocco could potentially be a helpful partner to the United States in providing support to regional military forces in fighting instability in the Sahel. Furthermore, Morocco could distinguish itself as an important partner in counterterrorism as Algeria continues to resist full cooperation with Western powers in fighting AQIM. Interestingly, what was most striking at this event was the level of animosity between the panelists. Vaisse was incredibly defensive of the French intervention and did not appreciate implications on the part of the other panelists that France had overstepped its boundaries in the region, and Kimenyi was incredibly wary of any Western interference in the region, seeing it as a necessarily destabilizing factor. This is why regional partnership will be so important in the future.

\(Back to top\)

Priorities for Stabilizing Mali

Date: February 6, 2013

1. Title: Priorities for Stabilizing Mali

Hosted by the Africa Center for Strategic Studies at the National Defense University

Participants:

Panel One

Dr. Matharin C. Hounnikpo: Academic Chair, Civil-Military Relations, Africa Center for Strategic Studies

Rida Lyammouri: Africa Analyst, Novanti Group

Dr. Djallil Lounnas: AQIM specialist, Al Akhawayn University

Dr. Benjamin Nickels: Moderator: Assistant Professor of Transnational Threats and Counter-Terrorism, Africa Center for Strategic Studies

Panel Two

Col. Patrick de Vathaire: Senior French Representative, Africa Center for Strategic Studies

Johanna Mendelson Forman: Senior Associate, Americas Program, Center for Strategic and International Studies

Sharon Bean: Development Advisor, Trans-Sahel Counterterrorism Partnership, USAID

Dr. Matharin C. Hounnikpo: Academic Chair, Civil-Military Relations, Africa Center for Strategic Studies

Dr. Joseph Siegel: Moderator: Director of Research, Africa Center for Strategic Studies

2. Overview

The Africa Center for Strategic Studies hosted a pair of expert panels that examined the actors and drivers of instability in northern Mali and the requirements for stabilizing this territory beyond the near-term military intervention.

3. Summary

Panel One

The first panel focused primarily on destabilizing factors in the region and within Mali itself. It highlighted terrorist organizations, drug trafficking, weak government, and porous borders as the primary factors of instability. Dr. Lounnas spoke at length about AQIM, Ansar al-Dine, and Mokhtar Belmokhtar, noting that the Algerian government has repeatedly tried to “reach out” to Belmokhtar in particular, but has been unsuccessful in using this counterterrorism strategy. Lounnas noted that the composition of AQIM is mainly Algerians and Libyans and that the organization has not been successful recruiting Moroccans. It has been successful attracting recruits in Tunisia and Libya because they were weakened or collapsed states. He alleged that AQIM has retreated to the Afogas region, a mountainous region close to the Algerian border.

Rida Lyammouri focused on economic aspects of the conflict and warned that the increased presence of transnational organized criminal groups in the region is empowering militant Islamist groups. He argued that trafficking is a major component of the instability in Mali and the Greater Sahel, with South American planes delivering drugs to be transported to Europe. Despite the volume and frequency of drug trafficking, Lyammouri nevertheless stressed that AQIM is mainly financed by collecting ransoms for kidnapped tourists, journalists, or aid workers – with 90% of AQIM’s funds coming from ransom money and only 10% is from drugs. That said, militants are increasingly looking to illicit trafficking as a source of revenue, as trafficking has thrived in recent years due to widespread poverty, the region’s geographic location as a transit hub between South American and Europe, pervasive corruption, and governance failure.

Dr. Hounnikpo characterized issues in Mali by the “3T’s - Tuareg, terrorists, and traffickers”. He mainly discussed the history of Mali, providing background on the Tuareg and their grievances.

Panel Two

The second panel addressed priorities for stabilizing Mali. Colonel Patrick de Valthaire spoke about the recent French military intervention in Mali. He spoke about how the French coordinated their mission with the EU and ECOWAS and explained that the French actions have destabilized the Islamists’ logistics and capabilities. Regarding future action in Mali, he stated that EU forces will be training a Malian battalion starting in March 2013. He also stressed the importance of developing the capacity of the Malian government and security sector institutions to confront continued security challenges.

Johanna Mendelson Forman applied some lessons from her work on Central and South America to the problems in Mali. She argued that the marginalization of rural Malians was a root cause of the current conflict - one that must be addressed through inclusive development in order to avoid a recurrence of violence. Forman stressed that assistance at the local level was essential and that women needed to play a greater role in the resolution of the crisis.

Sharon Bean advocated development responses to help stabilize Mali, identifying two main areas for improvement: governance and communications. The lack of governance was a key driver of instability to begin with and the Malian government will only be able to restore stability with improved governance. Bean stated that the Malian government has long promised to improve governance and development in the region, but has often failed to deliver. This time, it must therefore engage in a consultative process with key stakeholders in the North before implementing a program. Through this consultation - and improved communication with important northern stakeholders - Bamako will be better able to overcome continued skepticism of its promises.

4. Q&A

Panel One – selected exchanges

Q: (Mohammed Tulba, Library of Congress) I am intrigued by the relationship between these groups and Algeria. The first question is why is MUJAO attacking Algeria? And also, is Ansar al-Dine close to Algeria? How is it possible for Ansar al-Dine to be close to both Algeria and AQIM, because they hate each other.

A: (Lounnas) MUJAO split from AQIM, but initially AQIM's main aim was to strike Algeria so perhaps MUJAO did that to show what it can do. Ansar al-Dine is AQIM's key to the local North Malian population. Algerians cutting Ansar al-Dine off from AQIM was key to diminishing AQIM's power.

(Houngnikpo) I've always been baffled by Algeria's position. When you go back in history, Algeria's position vis-à-vis France, Algeria's willingness to control terrorism as a foreign policy tool; how do you let go of that tool in your hand? You can even declare your opposition as terrorists if you want. It's a very tricky issue.

Q: (William Zartman, SAIS) We don't talk much about the Trans-Sahel Initiative these days. How is it we trained a lot of people in Mali, and then they turn around and leave or join rebel groups?

A: (Lyammouri) As for the military training, the US did its job. It's up to the Malians to be responsible with their knowledge. When you teach a student, you don't know if he's going to cheat on the exam. If that person is willing to take bribes or be corrupted, that's not your problem. You taught him how to fight, how to shoot, or how to monitor activities, but it's up to him to sustain that. It's about the sustainability of training, and that should be addressed by future foreign policy makers.

(Houngnikpo) [Desertion] is an indication of lacking history or culture [on the part of the trainers], because if you know how Tuareg culture operates, the importance of clan, you can't lump a bunch of Tuareg together in a brigade and think that will solve things, you're just dreaming. Three of four brigades defected with equipment and knowledge, everything, and joined the other side. I hope there are some lessons for decision-makers to take from this. We can't just throw money at something because the government wants us to; we need to use our brain and ask ourselves, is this smart, is this feasible? We can't talk about smart foreign policy while we make kind of dumb decisions.

(Lounnas) AQIM and Ansar al-Dine, these people are battle-trained, they fought in Algeria, they fought in Libya, and this is not the case of the Malian army. They [AQIM] are also well armed. That's important to consider.

Q: (Lawrence Freedman, Africa Desk ENR Journal) To fight instability in the region, why are we not identifying the Qataris and the Saudis? They were behind the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, which was an AQIM precursor. These countries put these people in motion. They were involved in the attack on our Ambassador in Libya in 2012. If we don't identify these networks we won't succeed. If we are drying up terrorism, why not go after the heart of terrorism? On another note, during a forum at the Atlantic Council last Friday someone alleged the troops from the North weren't going to take Bamako because they have valuable relationships with illicit traders and traffickers in Bamako.

A: (Lounnas) Saudis and Qatari support religious communities that spread Salafism in the Maghreb, and this started after the Iranian revolution to counter that. When I was in Mauritania I noticed a lot of mosques and schools sponsored by Saudi Salafists.

(Houngnikpo) In terms of Qatari and Saudi networks, I think we have identified them, but the question is what to do about them. Remember, they were heavily involved in Libya, and we freed them..

Q: (Alvaro Teno, Embassy of Spain) Is there an assessment of the current negotiation process? What about factions that have split from Ansar al-Dine. Regarding trafficking I would like an assessment on the role that strong countries like Morocco or Algeria are to play in control of trafficking, or if there is interest on either side to monitor or control trafficking?

A: (Lyammouri) Regarding the trafficking, the border between Morocco and Algeria is really tight because of the Western Sahara dispute. To avoid that problem, traffickers moved to east Mauritania and Western Mali. Some trafficking is happening through the Moroccan- Algerian border, but it's not like it used to be.

(Lounnas) According to a friend of mine who works on drug trafficking in Morocco and Algeria, she says drug lords in those countries can give political leaders lessons on regional cooperation. They do not recognize the closing of the borders, and they cooperate quite a bit.

(Houngnikpo) In terms of negotiations, we have a great deal of confusion. Who is talking to whom and why, what about, everyone is trying to solve whatever they can right now. The only thing I know for sure is that Captain Sanogo has sent a team to Ougadougou to negotiate the retirement of those who staged the coup. Trafficking should be a transnational regional issue. But when you go back to national interests, Morocco, Algeria, Mauritania, there seems to be disagreements about how to address that issue, and sovereignty, and those sorts of issues.

Q: (General Goodwin George Moore (ret.) SSES Nigerian Chapter) France is not alone in the war of northern Mali.

The UN authorized the ECOWAS and AU troop deployments to aid France in fighting that battle. Nigeria immediately deployed troops and its air force. The issue of always saying France is doing this, doing that, without also recognizing the other components, is not in the interest of France. Mr. Lounnas captured the essence of it by saying this war is not going to be the short tea party France thinks. It's the responsibility of the ECOWAS force to force them out, and acknowledging who is fighting this war alongside France.

A: (Houngnikpo) George, I'd like to be with you on ECOWAS, but unfortunately when I look at ECOWAS' record. The reality is until the French came in, there was nobody.

Q: (Brit Sloane, USIP) How do you see the rebuilding process going forward? What is the importance of a political solution and what does that look like - elections, a national conference process, etc.?

A: (Houngnikpo) Given the historical grievances, you can't have an interim organization handle those issues. We need to have a permanent, democratic political solution before we go into development. We need those who are legitimately selected to make those decisions.

(Lyammouri) It's difficult to hold elections now with hundreds of thousands of Malians in refugee camps.

Q: (Malik Chaka, Millenium Challenge Corporation) One of the panelists contrasted Malian and Nigerian treatment of the Tuareg- could he expand on that? I would also like to know how has the Salafists' ability and force been diminished by the French offensive in terms of casualties, fatalities, oil and fuel, and rolling stock like four wheel drive vehicles?

A: (Lounnas) We don't know how many have been killed. We know they've retreated. We know they lost a lot of men, we know they lost vehicles, but we aren't sure how it affects their ability to move and to fight. In my opinion, it's too soon to know how exactly they've been affected.

(Lyammouri) They are scattered, and they prefer that because they are obvious targets in cities. They are patient and they are fine to wait until the right moment and then strike. Closing the borders will not affect their trafficking operations. They will go back to old school methods, using donkeys and camels, using alternate routes.

Q: (Maz Kelly, Booz Allen Hamilton) Given the political weakness and disorganization of Malian state, how involved does the international community have to be in the situation and implementation of an accord.

A: (Lyammouri) I think involvement of neighboring countries like Mauritania, Burkina Faso, and Algeria is important, other than that it's not very important. I know the Swiss are working with the MNLA.

(Houngnikpo) The West needs to be involved, how involved or not involved remains to be seen. But the West needs to come in with a common agenda or we won't be successful.

Panel Two

Q: (Commandant, National War College) Mali needs to fix its porous borders and improve transport in the country.

A: (Mendelson Forman) We need to take into account that Mali is not in a vacuum and porous borders are an issue across the region. We need to figure out how to work bilaterally and regionally, to support a fairly weak state, and decide whether, going forward, it should be priority to train forces to combat transnational crime.

Q: (David Throop, CSIS Africa program, SAIS, British Foreign Office, Mali desk) We can't treat Northern Mali as one coherent problem. People say one of the problems stems from the government's inability to establish itself in Northern Mali, but every Northern uprising has corresponded with an effort by the government to put down roots there. There has been a backlash every time. Instead of fixing things, it provokes resistance and violence and exacerbates the problem instead of solving it.

A: (Houngnikpo) I agree that security can't solve everything, and development needs to happen in the north, too.

Q: (Richard Logan, Naval War College) Algeria has a great deal of incentive to deal with porous borders, stabilizing Libya (small arms and light weapons in particularly) and the greater region. I would also be interested in some post-In Amenas commentary.

A: (de Vathaire) AQMI has been in Northern Mali for many years. The trigger for the French operation was the movement of forces to the south. As far as Algeria is concerned, I think the terrorists made a huge mistake attacking In Amenas- terrorists have forced Algeria to choose a side.

Q: (Angela Martin, USAID) Are there examples from other countries of stabilization programs where parts of the country are differently affected? There is obviously a huge disparity in wealth and affectedness. I've also heard some disturbing arguments blaming the Tuareg. How do you deal with the fact that Tuareg are being blamed and not the terrorists? Can you speak to this?

A: (Bean) I'm sure for many in the room the first thing that comes to mind is a national dialogue to build trust and develop some possible solutions. A lot of what we've seen causing conflict and tensions has come from lack of dialogue. As far as economic issues, there's been a lot of wrestling with how to encourage and employ a lot of the young people in north whose traditional livelihoods have been eroded by various factors such as climate change or modern times. It's something we struggle with everywhere, even in the US. We want to provide youth with more economic opportunities and discourage illegitimate employment.

(Houngnikpo) Tuareg are blamed, to an extent. We have a Tuareg problem, Africans say "all the Tuareg are terrorists or traffickers", which is not true. Until Bamako takes the situation seriously, we'll be stuck.

(Mendelson Forman) In Colombia we saw a similar case. Colombia is an exception because it's an economy that functions despite a 60 year internal war. Bamako doesn't have the same resources; Mali is in a category of countries dependent on foreign aid. Coupled with the problem of giving aid to a government that's neither accountable nor has the capacity to deliver services even if given the benefit of the doubt, you undermine citizen confidence.

5. Observations

This event was heavily attended by civilians and military personnel, US government employees, representatives from NGOs, scholars, and students. There were approximately 200 observers present. Dr. Matharin Houngnikpo presented many interesting and important observations, and his thoughts about Morocco would be very valuable (whether he supports Morocco or not- if he is critical, it would be useful opposition research). Both Dr. Lounnas and Mr. Lyammouri from the first panel are Moroccan, so it could be useful to cultivate relationships with them. Dr. Lounnas is an expert on terrorist groups in the Sahel, so he could provide some interesting commentary on the Polisario/ terrorist connection.

For a complete video of the event, please visit:

<http://africacenter.org/2013/02/video-priorities-for-stabilizing-mali-panel-discussions-at-acss/>

\(Back to top\)

Elections and Politics in North Africa - A Panel Discussion

Date: February 11, 2013

1. Title: Elections and Politics in North Africa - A Panel Discussion

Hosted by the Elliott School of International Affairs, Project on Middle East Political Science (POMEPS)

Participants:

Ellen Lust: Associate Professor, Political Science, Yale University

Lindsay Benstead: Assistant Professor, Political Science, Portland State University

Matthew Buehler: PhD Candidate, University of Texas - Austin

Marc Lynch: Moderator: Associate Professor of Political Science and International Affairs, George Washington University

2. Overview

This conference addressed electoral patterns in Tunisia, Egypt, and Morocco, and what implications these patterns had on the future of North African democracy. Benstead presented the findings of a survey gauging the political participation of Tunisians in the 2011 Constituent Assembly elections and compared these findings to that of data taken from Egyptian voters. Buehler discussed the past, current, and future roles of Islamist parties in Morocco, in particular the PJD, with respect to monarchical power and the democratization process. Finally, Lust discussed general trends in recent North African elections and the implications of these trends for democracy in the region.

3. Summary

Benstead's discussion was based on the recently compiled findings of a survey of 1200 Tunisian voters (men and women) from 16 electoral districts, which gauged political participation in elections before and after the Jasmine Revolution, experiences with government institutions, attitudes towards the political transition, and expectations for the future. She compared this data to similar data from Egyptian sources in order to address the claim that the outcome of the democratization processes in these countries was due to differences in religious tensions. Her main argument was that although Tunisia and Egypt will see very different democratization processes in the future, contrary to popular belief these differences are unrelated to differences in religiosity. This argument addressed three common myths about nascent democracies in the post-Arab Spring Maghreb:

- 1) Political transitions in the Islamic world are struggles between secularists and Islamists;
- 2) Islamist parties won recent elections in the post-revolutionary Maghreb because Arabs do not embrace democracy (so-called "Arab Exceptionalism"); and
- 3) Islamist parties will soon start to lose elections, and this represents the best hope for democracy in the Arab world.

None of these myths were borne out by the data. The preponderance of respondents, and a sizeable minority of respondents who supported Islamist parties, held moderate views with respect to the role that religion should play in politics, indicating that there is not necessarily a bitter struggle between hard-line Islamists and secularists. Most respondents stated that they cared more about jobs and the economy than about social issues such as religion. Furthermore, 80% of Tunisian respondents and 90% of Egyptian respondents stated that they "Agree" or "Strongly Agree" that democracy is the optimal form of government. Benstead said that what explains this is the fact that Islamist parties were more organized and far outpaced secular parties in campaigning; they were able to present policies and possible solutions to popular issues, such as the economic crisis, more effectively than their competitors. Finally, support for Islamist parties has actually risen since the last elections in both Tunisia and Egypt in roughly equal numbers, indicating that these parties have maintained their core constituencies. Through this, Benstead came to the conclusion that religiosity is not the primary factor in determining the future of democracy in Tunisia and Egypt. Rather, what will be most important is the relative strength of government institutions in these two countries. In Egypt, democratic institutions are weak and often undermined by outside interests, such as the military and the judiciary. Tunisia, on the other hand, has a stronger Constituent Assembly and trade unions, and while there are troubling developments in the Ennahda government and issues with forming an acceptable constitution, its established institutions give Tunisian democracy a good chance for survival. Thus, Tunisia is in a better position to transition to democracy than Egypt, and Islamism has little to do with it.

Buehler presented an explanation of how the PJD came to power in Morocco and what challenges to governing they can expect to face in the future. Morocco did experience what Buehler referred to as an Arab Spring, but the country avoided a violent, explosive rebellion due in large part to the efforts of King Mohammed VI, who was able to quell the protests by proposing a new constitution and moving up the date of parliamentary elections. While not a democratic country, Morocco has a long history of political parties, and the PJD is the best organized of them. Given its strong support base, it could have made the Arab Spring protests in Morocco more destabilizing by endorsing them, but instead leveraged its support into bargaining power to guide the constitutional referendum and convince the regime to eliminate non-conservative social provisions in the constitution. It then won a sweeping victory in the November 2011 elections. However, while it commands overwhelming popular support, it does face challenges to governance, some future and some immediate. One immediate concern is the lack of power the PJD's coalition holds in relation to the so-called "shadow government" of the regime. Foreign dignitaries have been bypassing the elected government in favor of meeting with this shadow government; the PJD's coalition needs to find a way to command the respect and influence necessary to be seen as a legitimate government in the diplomatic community. Furthermore, upcoming local elections in Morocco will be crucial for the PJD to solidify its power, and it is possible that the regime would use its influence to reassert itself in these elections, which carry more popular weight than the general elections. Finally, in the long-term the PJD needs to be concerned with the possibility of co-optation. A significant part of its popular support comes from its oppositional position in relation to the regime, and if the monarchy were to co-opt the PJD as a vehicle for influence, as it did with the Moroccan Socialist Party, the PJD could lose its core urban constituency and, more importantly, lose the ability to govern effectively. Some sources already claim that the PJD has been co-opted by the regime and has not taken adequate steps to effect the democratic changes it campaigned on. So it will be important for the PJD to address this issue quickly in order to maintain its influence.

Lust spoke only briefly on trends in North African elections. First, she made a distinction between elections as political reform and elections as a referendum on reform. This distinction, she posited, is based in voter turnout - the more the public cares about quick political reform, the more likely one is to see high voter turnout. She presented the case of Morocco as an example of elections as a referendum on reform, positing that the voter turnout in the Moroccan elections indicates that the public is not especially concerned with seeing rapid democratic reform and is comfortable with the monarchy continuing to hold absolute power. In this case, then, who wins the election is really not entirely important (not least because the King ultimately wields absolute power no matter who wins and the public appears to have no issues with that). On the other hand, which party wins in Tunisian, Egyptian, or Libyan elections matters quite a bit because the public is more interested in quickly reforming the political system in each of these cases. Lust then commented on Benstead's earlier findings about the significance (or lack thereof) of religiosity in democratization, stating that electoral cleavages can be based on many different metrics, including religion, and can possibly affect how democracy develops, depending on who gets elected.

4. Q & A

Q: (Lynch) You mentioned the polarization of the electorate in Tunisia earlier, but your research states that 60% of Tunisian voters are undecided and 39% of Egyptian voters are undecided. Is this then a reasonable approximation of the “middle ground”? Also, can you speak briefly on the accountability of Islamist parties to their constituencies? What voters want from their elected officials and what the elected officials deliver are often very different things.

A: (Benstead) It is difficult to get a clear analysis of “undecideds” in Egypt and Tunisia. They could be this so-called “middle ground,” but what is more likely is that they are disenchanting with the elites and political parties; there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the current governments. To your second point, it does seem that the political elites are far more committed to ideological issues than voters; voters care more about jobs and improving the economy. In the long-run, accountability depends upon institutional development.

Q: (Lynch) What is the PJD doing? Are they succeeding in their goals or have they been co-opted by the regime? How are relations between the PJD and the opposition Islamist movement, and what is it in Morocco that allows for cooperation between ideological rivals?

A: (Buehler) As of now we cannot know whether or not the PJD victory is just cooptation. What will be telling is whether or not the PJD base expands. Currently its support base is upper middle class professionals in medium-sized cities. If they stop representing the urban vote and start expanding into rural areas, as the Moroccan Socialist Party did when it was co-opted by the regime, then we can say that they might not really be governing. Regarding the Justice and Charity Movement, it’s somewhat of a dying party, and it appears that its base has in some way supported the PJD. The PJD would not have won if they did not at least have tacit support from Justice and Charity’s base.

Q: (Lynch) Are the elections in Egypt and Tunisia just a vehicle for preserving the status quo? Also, you mentioned elections as reform and elections as a referendum on reform, but what about elections to placate the international community?

A: (Lust) Well, many people seem to conflate “revolution” and “elections” with “outcomes that I like.” There is not a clear reason why reform should be going faster, even if that is what the international community wants to see.

Q: (Researcher from POMED) Is the PJD unwilling to cross red lines? The party appears to keep self-censoring and deferring to the monarchy.

A: (Buehler) Well, the PJD doesn’t want to push the envelope too far. There was once a movement to ban the party and drawing the ire of the monarchy can be just as deleterious to their governing power as being co-opted by the regime.

Q: (Former State Dept official from the MENA Bureau) Has anyone done any research on the social background of lower-level members of the Islamist parties?

A: (Buehler) Well, for one, it is difficult to get good demographic data on political parties in the MENA region because these are developing nations. They do not keep good records of this and do not have the organization to do so. Though, perhaps tellingly, Islamists in Morocco are largely elected by the urban population, and the Moroccan Socialists are elected by the rural population.

5. Observations

This event was attended by roughly 40-50 policy professionals and GWU students. Benstead’s explanation of how religious polarization is not as much of a threat to democracy as conventional wisdom leads us to believe was extremely interesting; it could be useful in the future to pay attention to more statistics and survey-based studies of electoral participation in the Maghreb. Buehler is clearly an expert on Moroccan politics, and he could be an important connection to make, particularly as he made fairly objective statements about the political process in Morocco and didn’t make a firm assessment on whether or not the monarchy was looking to limit the PJD’s power, though he did strongly imply that the monarchy could look to co-opt the PJD, as it had done with the Moroccan Socialist Party. Furthermore, his statements about the idea of a ‘shadow government’ are important to be aware of, especially if this idea is gaining credibility in diplomatic, academic, and policy circles. Lastly, his assertions that the PJD would not have won without at least tacit support from Justice and Charity’s support base is interesting, as most experts have shied away from statements about potential linkages between the PJD and Justice and Charity. It will be important to at least follow Buehler’s work, as he seems to be becoming a voice on Morocco.

\(Back to top\)

Crisis in Mali: U.S. Interests and the International Response

Date: February 14, 2013

1. Title: Crisis in Mali: U.S. Interests and the International Response

Hosted by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs

Participants:

Chairman Ed Royce: Committee Chairman (R-CA)

Representative Eliot L. Engel: Ranking Member (D-NY)

Witnesses:

Ambassador Johnnie Carson: Assistant Secretary, Bureau of African Affairs, US Department of State

Amanda Dory: Deputy Assistant Secretary for African Affairs, Office of the Secretary of Defense, US Department of Defense

2. Overview

This Congressional hearing addressed the impact of al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb's (AQIM) power grab in northern Mali, which has destabilized the entire region. Chairman Royce applauded France's initiatives and rapid progress. Due to fact that AQIM hosts a cell in Paris, France has a high interest in assuring peace in the Sahel. Despite there being a direct threat to France, Chairman Royce reminded the audience that the situation in Mali has a worldwide impact, accusing the Administration of being tepid to French requests. Although the French intend to convert this mission into a UN peacekeeping one, Chairman Royce believes it is still too deadly to hand the conflict over to an "ineffective and ill-equipped peace force."

3. Summary

Chairman Royce opened the hearing with a brief description of Mali's geographical location. He noted that prior to this hearing, many constituents believed that Mali was an island in the Pacific, rather than a fairly large country in Africa – perhaps as a way of emphasizing how poorly understand the issue of Mali was in US. Ranking Member Engel began by reiterating America's support of France's efforts to attempt to eliminate terrorism in the northern region of Mali. He was appalled that the Administration was charging Paris for using American airlifts; especially since France is a close NATO ally who is engaged in a mission that supports US interests.

Other members gave their opening remarks. Representative Poe referenced the rebel leader, Mokhtar Benmokhtar, who also led the attacks on the Algerian gas facility. Representative Sherman expressed his opinion tha the US did not need to take a lead role in this mission, but instead stand strongly behind the French, particularly given to the current economic crisis. Representative Bass noted the uneven progress encountered in Mali specifically in comparison to successful and peaceful transitions of power in Ghana, Ethiopia, Senegal, and Somalia. She strongly urged the Malian President to consult all key political actors to work together in an open dialogue to achieve a political consensus. She concluded that the Malian government also needs to address the human rights abuses that were perpetuated by their own armed forces.

Ambassador Carson explained that the current conflict in Mali reflects the fragility of governance in the region, the lack of economic development, particularly in the North, and the absence of meaningful opposition by which people can engage the government. He stressed that the March coup and loss of northern Mali demonstrate how quickly terrorists can take advantage of fragile states as poor governance, weak democratic institutions, and a lack of development and economic opportunity create fertile ground for terrorism and instability. Ambassador Carson outlined four challenges that Mali continues to face as it tries to overcome the current political and security crisis: the continued presence of AQIM in northern Mali, the need to restore democracy, the need to begin negotiations with northern minority groups like Tuareg, and an ongoing humanitarian crisis. He addressed each of these threats in turn, detailing US efforts to help Mali overcome them.

In terms of security, Carson noted that the presence of extremists in the North poses a threat to the entire Sahel region. The US remains concerned about the activities of AQIM and MUJAO. The US is currently working with countries throughout the region to respond to this threat and deny a safe haven to terrorists. The US strongly supports French and African efforts in Mali and has been actively engaged in supporting them. As of February 13, 2013, the US has conducted 22 refueling missions and has provided 867,000 pounds of jet fuel to French aircrafts.

Carson acknowledged that continued progress and a transition to an UN-authorized effort will take time and stressed the importance of continued engagement in the meantime, including training for Malian defense and security forces as is being done by the EU training mission, and the restoration of humanitarian aid under the right conditions, as Mali's problems cannot be solved by military means alone.

Turning to the need to restore democracy, Carson welcomed the Malian national assembly's approval of a political roadmap to restore Mali's democracy as a critical first step towards legitimate and inclusive governance. Carson advised Malian officials to stringently follow the road map and ensure that all elections be conducted free from intimidation and interference by security forces. He urged Captain Sanogo and the rest of the military to remove themselves completely and permanently from Malian politics. In addressing the need to start negotiations, Carson stressed that the Malian government must recognize its indigenous population, who not only has a history of resisting foreign Islamic extremists, but also has legitimate political, social, and economic grievances. The US strongly supports the resumption of negotiations with all parties who have cut ties to terrorist organizations and who recognize the unity and territorial integrity of the Malian state. The US is working closely with neighboring countries and the international community to lend support to the negotiating process and establish long term open dialogue between the northern population and the government.

Lastly, Carson addressed the humanitarian crisis. Since the beginning of March of last year, thousands have been displaced and left homeless due to conflict, exacerbating a precarious humanitarian situation created by chronic food insecurity. The US has worked to alleviate some of the suffering, providing over $120 million in humanitarian assistance. This amount is part of $467 million in humanitarian aid to the Sahel region as a whole. Carson concluded by reminding the audience that military success will be fleeting without a democratic and credible government that is responsive to the needs of all Malians. In order to do so, all perpetrators must be held accountable for their human rights abuses so that the process of national reconciliation can begin.

Amanda Dory addressed the security concerns. She stated that the DoD is currently working with international and interagency partners to restore Malian sovereignty. She highlighted that the US is supporting the French via intelligence, refueling, and airlift carriers. Due to the March coup, the DoD's direct engagement with Malian armed forces is restricted by Leahy law. She reiterated that there is no consideration of putting US armed forces on the ground. Instead, the US will continue work to support neighboring countries. Within the US, DoD is working closely with the State Department to help the African-led International Support Mission to Mali (AFISMA) define the requirements of this mission. Dory explained that part of the challenge prior to the coup was the differing opinion between the DoD and the Malian government. Between 2009-2012, the American government spent $41 million on training and equipping armed forces to put pressure on AQIM. However, the Malian government's prime focus was the perceived threat of the Tuareg. Due to the lack of cohesion, DoD has shifted its efforts to Mauritania and Niger, who like the US are focused on combating counterterrorism. She concluded by reiterating that despite the lack of any indication of a direct attack, AQIM does have the capability to attack Western interests and kidnap Westerners in the Sahel region.

4. Q & A

Q: (Chairman Royce) Discussion is underway to transition the mission from French-led to a UN peacekeeping mission. I am worried that this will only lead us back to square one because there is still a heavy presence of very aggressive jihadists. Why are we pushing for a peacekeeping mission at this time? Do we have a set of ground conditions or benchmarks that must be met prior to deploying a peacekeeping force? If so, what are they?

A: (Carson) Currently, we are not sending in UN peacekeeping troops. It would be done in conjunction with France's departure and based on the capacity of the Malian army. A roadmap will need to be created establishing a step by step process to reduce any unanticipated consequences. There is going to be an ongoing need for a counterterrorism operation in northern Mali and that will always reside in the hands of the French, not the UN.

Q: (Chairman Royce) Multiple news outlets report that our response to our French allies has been slow, especially compared to our response to Libya. What's the hold? Can Congress help speed the process?

A: (Dory) Actually, we have responded as quickly as feasible. The French first requested intelligence, which was met almost instantly. Airlift support was a second priority. In fact, the French expressed their gratitude for our support.

Q: (Representative Engel) Over the last ten years we have spent tens of millions of dollars in training African troops. With Mali falling apart, what effective steps can the US take to deal with spillover effects in neighboring countries?

A: (Carson) Although it is no question that Mali is a political and military disappointment, we believe that much of the money we spent in the Sahel region has been put to good use. Niger, Burkina Faso, Benin, Togo, Nigeria, Chad, and Mauritania, all of whom received great military assistance from us and benefited from our programs, are responding the way we want them too. In the case of Mali, the military not only failed to perform on the battlefield but also undertook a military coup dislodging the democratic government.

(Dory) We need an overall strategy that focuses not only on capacity and will, but also establishes a shared sense of security objectives. In addition to tactical and operational engagement, there is a need for cohesion on an institutional level.

Q: (Representative Christopher Smith – R-NJ) What training is the US government using in regards to humanitarian aid, specifically to the alarming increase in sex trafficking?

A: (Dory) DOD has not engaged with the Malian forces since the coup. By cutting off our security assistance we are not actively participating in training them. Instead, we are collaborating with AFISMA to create country specific agendas. These countries will then be trained by the US. Regardless of the specific training programs, they all include human rights.

Q: (Representative Christopher Smith – R-NJ) Carson, in your testimony on June 29th you stated that an ECOWAS mission would be ill-advised, is this still your belief? What will be the mission of the AFISMA peacekeeping force and their rules of engagement?

A: (Carson) The Leahy amendment requires vetting and approving any units that we supply, train, and support to make sure they have clean human rights records. We do not endorse any military human rights violations. Thus, if any violations including sexual trafficking occur we cut off assistance, expose them, and bring it up with the Malian government. Not sure I used the term ill-advised. At the time, I was warning ECOWAS to make sure it had a planned, managed, and well resourced mission so as to not have African forces move in prematurely and be defeated by the very enemy they were trying to ward off.

Q: (Sherman) What other countries in the Sahel and West Africa are of security concern to the US in regards to Islamic extremists and terrorism?

A: (Carson) The criteria that make these states susceptible to terrorism are: weak governance, poor development, porous borders, and communities that feel they have legitimate grievances that are not being addressed by the central government. There is a growing awareness on part of governments across the Sahel that AQIM does constitute a serious threat, and that the governments of the region must respond to the economic and social needs of their people.

Q: (Representative Dana Rohrabacher – R-CA) Why does the US or France have to be involved in this conflict? Is this essentially an ethnic/tribal conflict? Do we have black Africans in the South and Arab Africans in the North?

A: (Carson) The situation is very complex. There are historical disagreements that divide the Tuareg in particular, which are located mostly in northern Mali and are of Berber and Arab descendants.

Q: (Representative Dana Rohrabacher – R-CA) Are you confident that the US can come into a situation like this that has historical, ethnic, tribal roots and make a difference?

A: (Carson) There are several things that are happening simultaneously in Mali which is why it is a complex problem. Issues of the Tuareg predate the arrival of AQIM, but AQIM in its existence in the region is a fact that needs to be dealt with. It is important to make sure that we do not inflate past conflicts. We may not have an immediate threat to our own homeland, but the region and the French do have serious concerns.

Q: (Representative Karen Bass – D-CA) Do you believe that Mali will be ready in time for the June elections? Who are the candidates besides the current President?

A: (Carson) We tried to respond as expeditiously to the French as possible. We have cut assistance in respect of section 7008 because of the military coup in March. I believe that it is possible to hold inclusive, credible, free, and transparent elections come July 31 per the roadmap. Also, neither the current President nor Prime Minister will be a candidate in the election.

Q: (Representative Steve Chabot – R-OH) Overall, the amount of aid to this region with a particular focus on Mali has reached around a billion dollars over the past seven years. It seems that as usual, the US bears most burden of these initiatives because other world leaders are not as well-equipped or don't want to get involved and expect the US to take lead. In fact, we contributed $96 million while China and India together contributed only one million. Are other nations planning to provide assistance? How can we push for other countries to take a bigger financial assistance role? Why have we yet to see a real assistance from China?

A: (Carson) Others in the international community have initially pledged around 50 million Euros for European military training missions, which focus on retraining or rebuilding/rehabilitating the Malian military.

Q: (Representative David Cicilline D-RI) Do you believe that these terrorist organizations will be reflected in the outcome of the future elections? Can there be reconciliation between Malians and Tuareg?

A: (Carson) AQIM does not have popular support across northern Mali. Mokhtar Belmokhtar is not Malian, but Algerian/Mauritanian, and he does not have enough followers to become an elected official. The overwhelming welcome that the French troops received across northern Mali reflects that they feel deeply oppressed by Sharia law. Mali has had 20 years of democracy and has had several president/parliamentary elections that have gone well; I have faith that this can be restored. In Bamako many citizens had a different perception than we did of what constitutes an imminent threat. Specifically, we have always been deeply concerned about the AQIM threat in Mali while the Malian government and Bamako thought the threat was their age-old traditional enemy the Tuareg. The Malian government has to accommodate the political grievances of the Tuareg.

Q: (Representative Ted Poe – R-TX) Are the weapons being used by Belmokhtar and other al-Qaeda groups from Qatar and Libya?

A: (Dory) A tremendous amount of weapons trafficking in the region is related to the access of weapons after Gaddafi's fall. It is difficult to track whether there is a direct connection to Qatar.

Q: (Representative Gerry Connolly- D-VA) What is our sense of France's capability? Should we worry? What about short and long-term?

A: (Dory) Thus far we have been very impressed with France's capabilities. However, we cannot say "mission complete" any time soon.

Q: (Representative Grace Meng – D-NY) What are the immediate long term consequences for us and our allies if we just ignore Mali?

A: (Carson) When we turned our backs on Somalia we suffered direly. We walked away from a relief effort in 1993 after the Black Hawk incident. When we turn our backs on them the whole world turns their back on them. France also cannot ignore Mali because it hosts the second largest Malian community.

5. Observations

The two panels provided a thorough overview of the current challenges in Mali, as well as current US interests and efforts there and in the region. Although the hearing was informative about AQIM's international threat, witnesses did not provide any additional insight on the future of its operations in northern Mali and the Sahel. There was also little discussion of the regional impact of terrorism and the potential for a regional response to it. While important in highlighting the importance of North Africa for US interests, the hearing offered little of interest for Morocco, particularly as the Q&A portion underscored that Congressmen have little understanding or knowledge of this part of the world.

For a complete video of the hearing, please visit:

<http://foreignaffairs.house.gov/hearing/hearing-crisis-mali-us-interests-and-international-response>

\(Back to top\)

International Cooperation in Combating Terrorism

Date: February 27, 2013

1. Title: International Cooperation in Combating Terrorism

Hosted by the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies

Participants:

Ambassador (ret.) Stuart Eizenstat: Keynote Speaker: Former Ambassador to the European Union

Abderrahim Rahhaly: Deputy Chief of Mission, Embassy of the Kingdom of Morocco

Dr. Mary Jane Deeb: Chief, Africa and Middle Eastern Division, Library of Congress

Admiral (ret.) Terry McKnight: Former First Commander, Joint Task Force 151

Ambassador (ret.) David Smith: Senior Fellow, Potomac Institute for Policy Studies

General (ret.) Alfred Gray: Closing Remarks: 29th Commandant of the Marine Corps

Professor Yonah Alexander: Moderator: Director, Inter-University Center for Terrorism Studies; Senior Fellow, Potomac Institute for Policy Studies

2. Overview

Despite the changing regional dynamic of terrorism, the threat posed by international terrorism remains high, as al-Qaeda and its affiliates regroup and reassess their mission. This panel focused on the current terrorist threats in the world, regional and international counterterrorism cooperation, and how global policy makers should attempt to curb terrorism.

3. Summary

Ambassador Stuart Eizenstat provided an overview of terrorism in the world, noting that it is currently being placed out on a global playing field, "from Mali to Bali, Nigeria to Bulgaria, and the Middle East and North Africa to Southeast Asia." Similar to its geographic distribution, the current terrorist threat comes from widely different groups, some homegrown, some state-sponsored, some with domestic aspirations, and others with a global reach and a desire to target internationally. Given this context, Eizenstat stressed that combating terrorism requires both international cooperation and the use of every legal means possible, including drone strikes, intelligence sharing, sanctions, and military training. In addition, combating terrorism requires preventing it in the first place through job creation, rule of law, and good governance to ensure that young people have opportunities and a stake in their own future. Eizenstat noted that in the absence of good governance, states fail, thus becoming safe havens for terrorism, as is the case in Mali today. The challenge is thus to promote nation-building, because if nation-building fails, a gaping hole will be left for terrorist action.

Following the keynote, Professor Yonah Alexander opened the rest of the panel discussion and marked the official release of a new report from the Potomac Institute, "Terrorism in North Africa & the Sahel in 2012: Global Reach and Implications." The report assesses the current threat of terrorism in the region given events in Mali and makes recommendations for confronting it.

Abderrahim Rauhaly highlighted Morocco's efforts in combating terrorism and its approach both nationally and internationally. He noted that Morocco has long been trying to attract international attention to the volatility in the region and the links between terrorist groups operating there such as AQIM and Boko Haram. Now the world is paying attention to the region, but more cooperation is required to really confront its security challenges. Toward this end, Morocco is engaged in comprehensive counterterrorism efforts, which include elements of security, reform, and development in order to place the human factor first. Morocco has also undertaken religious reforms to ensure the promotion of tolerance, human rights, and the rule of law. As a result, Morocco has achieved some success in avoiding the terrorist threat that has affected its neighbors.

Despite this national success, Morocco nevertheless believes that it will not be successful in confronting terrorism at the regional level without more regional cooperation, as trafficking and terrorist networks cross borders and proliferate in weakly governed areas. Due to the complex and multi-dimensional nature of the terrorist threat, Rauhaly underscored the importance of regional cooperation and highlighted Morocco's efforts to promote it, as chair of the UN Counterterrorism Committee, as an active member of the Global Forum against Terrorism, as an advocate of stronger South Atlantic cooperation, and as a non-permanent member of the UN Security Council. The latter has allowed Morocco the opportunity to elevate security as a priority issue for the UNSC and has also allowed it to advance the issue of Mali, with the Council authorizing the deployment of an international force while under Morocco's Presidency. Rauhaly also noted that Morocco is supporting the political process in Mali, providing humanitarian aid to the country, and providing funds for the international mission.

Dr. Mary Jane Deeb provided an historical overview of the Middle East and North Africa, arguing that it is necessary to see the MENA region in context. She characterized the region according to the three primary revolutions the region has experienced in its modern history: the socialist revolution, the Islamist revolution, and the pro-democracy revolution, widely known as the Arab Spring. She provided her observations on the most recent revolution, arguing that the region is still in great flux, with instability and insecurity rampant due to the continued operation of militias in Libya and Tunisia and mass displacement and refugees flows due to conflict in Syria, among other security challenges. Deeb stressed that under such conditions cooperation in combating terrorism is difficult and unlikely. As a result, it might be preferable for the US and its allies to work with countries that did not experience the Arab Spring, such as Algeria, Morocco, Jordan, and some of the Gulf countries.

Admiral Terry McKnight shared his experiences in promoting maritime security and anti-piracy programs. He argued that the best success story in combating terrorism was the success achieved in combating piracy in Somalia. He noted that this example provided some important lessons learned for combating non-maritime terrorism as well, largely because the success achieved in Somali was due to international cooperation. The mission was under the umbrella of the United Nations and had a high degree of cooperation and coordination among over twenty nations.

In addition, the mission was granted flexibility in its operations, which allowed it to adjust to changing conditions. McKnight stressed that international cooperation and flexibility are key in combating terrorism going forward.

Ambassador David Smith addressed the issue of cyber terrorism, stating that no one even really knows what it means or what it refers to. Is it using computers for terrorist ends, using the internet to for hacking enemies, or using the web to incite violence? To some degree it is all of those things and Smith stressed that there are three important trends regardless of the definition one chooses. First, the greater use of social media has made it easier to disseminate propaganda that can incite violence and advocate terrorism across borders. Second, the appearance of independent actors has allowed cyber terrorism to flourish. This is largely due to the first trend, which has allowed terrorist organizations to recruit across borders and individuals to "volunteer" even without being actively recruited. Third, the increased use of cyber attacks on industrial control systems is a new development, but one that is here to stay and has the capacity to threaten our way of life.

4. Q & A

Q: What measures are most important in countering extremism?

A: (Rahhaly) Morocco works to counter extremism by acknowledging and encouraging diversity and tolerance. It has recognized the diverse composition of Moroccan society and enshrined it in the Constitution. It has also worked to reform the religious field. One of the major elements of reform is the inclusion of women as religious figures in order to promote tolerance and equality. The only way to counter extremism is by promoting tolerance, creating open societies, and promoting human development.

(Deeb) The most important thing is education. Literacy levels are low in many places where terrorism thrives and as a result it is difficult to present an alternative to extremism. So the education and training of young people is so important, as is using the media as a medium to explain Islam and promote messages of tolerance.

Q: (DCM, Embassy of Algeria) In assessing the region, Dr. Deeb noted that Algeria is a military state, when the reality is that the government is elected. Could you please provide your rationale for this assessment?

A: (Deeb) The military is the basis of power in Algeria. The electoral system functions to some degree, but the power base is still the military, even if it is wearing civilian clothes.

Closing Remarks

General Gray concluded by arguing that terrorism is a tactic and that it is the environment in which terrorism thrives that needs to be fixed. It is not possible to just eliminate terrorism by killing terrorists. Rather, Gray stressed that the conditions have to be created so that terrorism cannot succeed.

5. Observations

Approximately 30 think tank experts, journalists, and students attended the event, which provided a broad overview of the challenges of countering terrorism. With the exception of Mr. Rahhaly, who provided a detailed analysis of Morocco's counterterrorism efforts, each of the other speakers spoke quite generally about the issue. All of the panelists agreed that regional and international cooperation are essential for any counterterrorism strategy, but unfortunately none of them provided recommendations on how to achieve such cooperation given the divergent national interests and strategies of many countries at the forefront of these efforts. The event was nevertheless valuable, as Professor Alexander used it to launch his latest report on terrorism in the Middle East and North Africa. In the report, Professor Alexander makes several important recommendations of relevance to Morocco, namely the importance of resolving the Western Sahara conflict in order to improve regional cooperation in countering terrorism and addressing the humanitarian situation in the camps near Tindouf to eliminate a recruiting ground for terrorists. MAC should widely disseminate these messages from a credible third party in order to advance Morocco's position on the Western Sahara and the refugee crisis.

\(Back to top\)

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, March 27, 2013 1:44 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Libya O&G sector

The following information is from a trusted source regarding Libya's Oil and gas sector.

(We) just finished the most comprehensive, most up-to-date profile of the Libyan hydrocarbons sector that is currently available. In it, we profile more than twenty of the top decision-makers in the Prime Minister's Office, the Ministry of Oil and Gas, the General National Congress committees related to energy, and the National Oil Corporation, its subsidiaries and joint-ventures. This was a massive undertaking.

In addition to being an overt plug for what I think is a valuable product, it's also a long-winded excuse for not having written more frequently about what's going on in Libya these days. The below redresses that.

Politics: More politicking, more problems

Libyan politics are at a very messy stage in the transition from the revolution to the election of a permanent government. Early political hurdles were overcome, having been propelled by a shared sense of revolutionary purpose. That sentiment has now calcified and become brittle, susceptible to fracturing.

The General National Congress, the country's nine-month old legislature, is struggling to retain its popular legitimacy. The population's lack of faith in the GNC derives from the GNC's slow pace of political progress – it doesn't seem to do much of anything and is characterized more by politicking than policy-making, more by self-interest than national interest (a problem, incidentally, that Tripoli seems to share with Washington.)

In part, the inability of the GNC to make policy is due to its unclear mandate – is it supposed to genuinely legislate or is it simply to review the policies of its predecessor, the NTC, and to continue to steer the country down the political roadmap that will lead to a permanent government? The members of the GNC, let alone the population at large, appear unsure of what its exact remit is.

The GNC also faces logistical issues. A populist protest evicted the GNC from its regular meeting place for more than a month earlier this year and temporary meeting places have been repeatedly overrun. Even when the GNC is able to meet, many GNC members do not attend sessions – at any given time, 10% of GNC members are traveling abroad and still others are occupied with local concerns preventing them from attending GNC sessions. On top of that, the National Integrity Commission has disbarred sixteen GNC members on grounds that their candidacies did not meet revolutionary criteria. With the resignation at the beginning of March of a GNC member from Misrata, 183 GNC members remain out of the 200 that were elected in July 2012.

The GNC's legitimacy is also declining because of the government's own failures to manage popular expectations. Take, for example, the GNC's decision to hold national elections for the constitutional drafting committee instead of appointing the committee itself. This was a wise move that would ensure greater popular support for a draft constitution, but the GNC failed to articulate how complicated the electoral process would be. The GNC has yet to explain to the broader Libyan population that because the committee will have twenty members drawn from each of Libya's three regions, the High Electoral Commission cannot simply dust off the electoral maps used for the GNC elections and superimpose them on the constitutional committee elections. Likewise, the High Electoral Commission has not explained that it has to devise new guidelines for candidates running for the constitutional drafting committee. Will candidates be allowed to be members of political parties or will they have to be independents? Will there be a minimum number of seats reserved for women and/or ethnic minorities and if so, how will this quota be imposed? Drawing new maps and devising new by laws for the elections takes time and neither the General National Congress nor the High Electoral Commission has explicitly and publically addressed these challenges.

The predicament that the GNC is now in is very similar to that the NTC before it faced – namely, will the GNC's legitimacy decrease faster than its ability to implement policies that will further progress toward election of a permanent government. If the answer is yes, then Libya is looking into the abyss, with the likelihood of the eventual emergence of a strongman. Even if the answer is no, Libya is still facing a very rough road ahead.

Security: resource regionalism?

One can't talk about Libya, without talking about security. The security situation has seen progress in some areas, only to regress in others. On the one hand, there have been various training programs overseas for recruits in various forces. The Ministry of Interior recently launched a campaign to oust some of the more recalcitrant militias from Tripoli, but what this amounts to in practice is the ouster of militias that have not at least in part joined forces with the national security apparatus. (Some militias have been recruited entirely or partially into the Ministry of Defense forces or the Ministry of Interior forces. Others have resisted efforts by the state to coopt them.) The Ministry of Interior and Ministry of Defense have purchased new and potentially effective equipment. And we're getting a clearer picture of who is control (at least nominally) of different units within the national security apparatus.

On the other hand, some violent groups have targeted the GNC and there was an assassination attempt against GNC president Mohamed Magarief in early March. Other groups have threatened other GNC members, resulting in their resignations. And the militias are posing a problem for oil companies in both the upstream and downstream.

Militias have been involved in disturbances, disruptions, clashes and protests at several oil and gas installations throughout the country. Although the circumstances differ from one facility to the next, the root problem can be termed "resource regionalism." If resource nationalism is about the state trying to extract greater benefits from the oil and gas sector at the expense of IOCs, then resource regionalism is different regions trying to extract greater benefit from the sector at the expense of the state. Libya's oil and gas activity is one of the country's precious few steady sources of employment and everyone wants a slice of the pie, or a bigger slice, or to keep the slice they already have. In some instances, the oil and gas facility clashes have been about local labor quotas, in other instances, they have been about formalizing and retaining responsibilities that were assumed informally during the revolution. Despite the differences, it is clear that the clashes will continue: targeting oil and gas facilities has proven to be a quick way for aggrieved parties to compel the state to acquiesce to their demands.

Likewise, the salafi jihadi threat in Libya is still extent. Normally thought to be confined to far eastern Libya, the In Amenas attack in Algeria in January suggests that there are salafi jihadi sympathizers in southwestern Libya and there are reports that salafi jihadi sentiments are becoming more prominent in Misrata, Libya's third largest city. Most jihad-watchers are currently focused Mali and Tunisia, which are more dynamic environments, but we would be remiss to overlook Libya. I'm reluctant to be alarmist, but Libya is a target rich environment with poor security, which implies that a(nother) significant jihadi attack is only a matter of time.

Oil: 2013 bid round isn't going to happen

On the oil front, Minister for Oil and Gas Abdulbari al-Arussi has said that Libya will hold an oil and gas licensing round by the end of 2013. There is no way that this will happen. There are simply too many issues for the sector to address before it can hold a licensing round and the sector's unclear structure and general lack of bureaucratic capacity mean that mean that it won't be able address any of the issues quickly.

The first challenge to holding a new licensing round is the need to review the EPSA-IV framework that was used in the three previous rounds during the Qadhafi regime. The Ministry of Oil and Gas and the National Oil Corporation (NOC) are well aware that IOCs are uninterested in participating in another EPSA-IV round and as a result the Ministry of Oil and Gas has convened a committee to review the framework and make recommendations for drafting a new hydrocarbons law. Even in the best of circumstance, hydrocarbons reform laws can take the better part of a year. Given Libya's indeterminate state, one could easily expect the EPSA-IV review to last until at least the beginning of 2014.

The second issue is the structure of the oil and gas sector management itself. The exact relationship between the newly formed Ministry of Oil and Gas and the NOC is not entirely clear. The Ministry of Oil and Gas is the ostensible sector regulator and it would clearly like to push ahead with a bid round in order to definitively establish its authority over the NOC, but the NOC is very likely to rebuff any attempt by the ministry to hold a bid round precisely in order to prevent the ministry from locking in its authority over the NOC.

Lastly, even if these two hurdles were overcome, the Ministry of Oil and Gas would have to determine what acreage it would want to make available in the upcoming round – where do the sector's exploration priorities lie, what is the right mix of prospectivity, and what about unconventional plays? The answers to these questions are not likely to emerge in the next nine months.

The fact that a bid round in 2013 is almost entirely unlikely does not mean, however, that the NOC and the Ministry of Oil and Gas are opposed to bilaterally negotiated market entry. There may be some progress to be made here, but again, it's not going to yield results overnight, or even by the end of the year. END...

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, April 11, 2013 5:19 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Interview with Rachid Benmouktar– Washington Post, J. Rubin

VERY HELPFUL ARTICLE with Rachid

Respond to this post by replying above this line

New post on Morocco On The Move

Arab Spring: No walk in the park; Interview with Morocco Reformer – W. Post, J. Rubin

by Morocco on the Move

Under Morocco’s recently passed Constitution, the task is “to make people into citizens,” says Dr. Rachid Benmokhtar Benabdellah. In Morocco part of the task involves devolving power to localities.

Washington Post, Right Turn by Jennifer Rubin (Washington, DC, April 10, 2013) -- Syria is in the midst of a bloody civil war. Lebanon is a shadow of its former self, no longer a vibrant, fully autonomous or inclusive nation. Iraq is beset by sectarian violence. And Egypt is economically and politically teetering on the brink of another popular eruption under the rule of the Muslim Brotherhood.

Then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, Moroccan Foreign Minister Saad Eddine Othmani, Feb. 2012 (Abdelhak Senna/Getty Images)

Even where gradual, peaceful change is taking place there is no straight line from authoritarian rule to Western-style democracy. I spoke by phone today with Dr. Rachid Benmokhtar Benabdellah, a Moroccan governmental official deeply immersed in the civil and constitutional reforms ongoing. He puts it simply, “The biggest challenge? They are numerous!” he says cheerily. He gives some perspective on the enormity of tasks for countries emerging at a time of political and economic chaos in the region.

Under the recently passed Constitution, he explains the task is “to make people into citizens.” In Morocco part of the task involves devolving power to localities. He observes, “Auditing skills and expertise are very important. People need to be trained and to have some knowledge.” This is true, he cautions, for officials and ordinary citizens. That requires “young people with good education” and continued integration of “young women in private society [who can take] leadership in civil society.” One of the biggest challenges, he says, is that young people “are expecting something from government. We need to train them in entrepreneurship.” He adds that this is one area in which the United States can provide encouragement and assistance.

"In addition to its internal challenges, Morocco faces regional threats from al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and the violent separatist group, the Polisario Front."

Morocco is unique in some ways. Unlike the modern states carved out of British holdings, Morocco is an old country with a respected monarchy that combines religious and political power. The present King, like his father, therefore can speak with religious and secular authority in moving the country toward a modern economic and political system. Interestingly he comments that what Morocco can teach its neighbors is that “even in the dark years we were able to find a way.” This is a lesson about endurance and patience, as he tells it. “We were able to make good assessments and to be critical,” he says. With each step forward, he notes, “We build on success. We don’t have to go back to the beginning.”

In addition to its internal challenges, Morocco faces regional threats from al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and the violent separatist group, the Polisario Front. Until the security situation is resolved the dream of an integrated, prosperous North Africa remains a distant dream.

The take-away from our conversation is that the transformation of a country is no easy matter. Morocco at least has the benefit of a reformist monarchy and a shared national history. Elsewhere the picture is more grim. What we take for granted — a concept of citizenship, respect for a constitution, competent governance and an independent judiciary — have to, in large part, be started from scratch after tin-pot autocrats are overthrown. That requires immense patience which is often in short supply after years of political repression and economic stagnation. And that in turn requires a long-term commitment by the West in money, technical expertise, diplomatic support and anti-terrorism cooperation.

If we want the final chapter of the Arab Spring to be the emergence of peaceful, stable and relatively free governments with functioning economies, then we need to give not speeches but sustained help. That's not an easy sell when we and other Western powers have budgetary and economic problems of their own. But the alternative is widespread violence, the re-emergence of anti-Western leaders and humanitarian disaster.

Morocco on the Move | April 10, 2013 at 5:03 pm | Tags: featured | Categories: Business, Culture, Elections and Reform, General, Politics, Religious Tolerance, Security, Women's Rights | URL: <http://wp.me/p1Gm1x-3QE>

Comment

See all comments

Unsubscribe or change your email settings at Manage Subscriptions.

Trouble clicking? Copy and paste this URL into your browser:

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2013/04/10/arab-spring-no-walk-in-the-park-interview-with-morocco-reformer-w-post-j-rubin/>

Thanks for flying with  WordPress.com

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, April 11, 2013 5:19 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Interview with Rachid Benmouktar– Washington Post, J. Rubin

VERY HELPFUL ARTICLE with Rachid

Respond to this post by replying above this line

New post on Morocco On The Move

Arab Spring: No walk in the park; Interview with Morocco Reformer – W. Post, J. Rubin

by Morocco on the Move

Under Morocco’s recently passed Constitution, the task is “to make people into citizens,” says Dr. Rachid Benmouktar Benabdellah. In Morocco part of the task involves devolving power to localities.

Washington Post, Right Turn by Jennifer Rubin (Washington, DC, April 10, 2013) -- Syria is in the midst of a bloody civil war. Lebanon is a shadow of its former self, no longer a vibrant, fully autonomous or inclusive nation. Iraq is beset by sectarian violence. And Egypt is economically and politically teetering on the brink of another popular eruption under the rule of the Muslim Brotherhood.

Then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, Moroccan Foreign Minister Saad Eddine Othmani, Feb. 2012
(Abdelhak Senna/Getty Images)

Even where gradual, peaceful change is taking place there is no straight line from authoritarian rule to Western-style democracy. I spoke by phone today with Dr. Rachid Benmokhtar Benabdellah, a Moroccan governmental official deeply immersed in the civil and constitutional reforms ongoing. He puts it simply, “The biggest challenge? They are numerous!” he says cheerily. He gives some perspective on the enormity of tasks for countries emerging at a time of political and economic chaos in the region.

Under the recently passed Constitution, he explains the task is “to make people into citizens.” In Morocco part of the task involves devolving power to localities. He observes, “Auditing skills and expertise are very important. People need to be trained and to have some knowledge.” This is true, he cautions, for officials and ordinary citizens. That requires “young people with good education” and continued integration of “young women in private society [who can take] leadership in civil society.” One of the biggest challenges, he says, is that young people “are expecting something from government. We need to train them in entrepreneurship.” He adds that this is one area in which the United States can provide encouragement and assistance.

"In addition to its internal challenges, Morocco faces regional threats from al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and the violent separatist group, the Polisario Front."

Morocco is unique in some ways. Unlike the modern states carved out of British holdings, Morocco is an old country with a respected monarchy that combines religious and political power. The present King, like his father, therefore can speak with religious and secular authority in moving the country toward a modern economic and political system. Interestingly he comments that what Morocco can teach its neighbors is that “even in the dark years we were able to find a way.” This is a lesson about endurance and patience, as he tells it. “We were able to make good assessments and to be critical,” he says. With each step forward, he notes, “We build on success. We don’t have to go back to the beginning.”

In addition to its internal challenges, Morocco faces regional threats from al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and the violent separatist group, the Polisario Front. Until the security situation is resolved the dream of an integrated, prosperous North Africa remains a distant dream.

The take-away from our conversation is that the transformation of a country is no easy matter. Morocco at least has the benefit of a reformist monarchy and a shared national history. Elsewhere the picture is more grim. What we take for granted — a concept of citizenship, respect for a constitution, competent governance and an independent judiciary — have to, in large part, be started from scratch after tin-pot autocrats are overthrown. That requires immense patience which is often in short supply after years of political repression and economic stagnation. And that in turn requires a long-term commitment by the West in money, technical expertise, diplomatic support and anti-terrorism cooperation.

If we want the final chapter of the Arab Spring to be the emergence of peaceful, stable and relatively free governments with functioning economies, then we need to give not speeches but sustained help. That's not an easy sell when we and other Western powers have budgetary and economic problems of their own. But the alternative is widespread violence, the re-emergence of anti-Western leaders and humanitarian disaster.

Morocco on the Move | April 10, 2013 at 5:03 pm | Tags: featured | Categories: Business, Culture, Elections and Reform, General, Politics, Religious Tolerance, Security, Women's Rights | URL: <http://wp.me/p1Gm1x-3QF>

Comment

See all comments

Unsubscribe or change your email settings at Manage Subscriptions.

Trouble clicking? Copy and paste this URL into your browser:

<http://moroccoonthemove.wordpress.com/2013/04/10/arab-spring-no-walk-in-the-park-interview-with-morocco-reformer-w-post-j-rubin/>

Thanks for flying with  WordPress.com

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, April 11, 2013 10:27 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS situation report

The information contained in this report are from public and private sources and are generally reliable although there has been no corroboration of the information. Ed

WESTERN SAHARA / SITUATION REPORT

05/04/13

Three months after his highly charged trip to Algiers, French President François Hollande was in Rabat and Casablanca on April 3 and 4 for an official visit aimed at confirming the solidity of Franco-Moroccan relations regardless of which party happens to be in power in either country. In the period immediately following Hollande's election just under a year ago, it may be recalled, the incoming Socialist administration's stated policy objective in the Maghreb was to establish a more 'balanced' relationship with France's former possessions than had been the case under the preceding right-wing administrations, which had fairly unabashedly favoured Morocco over Algeria – prompting some suspicions that France's new centre-left government harboured greater sympathy for Algiers than for Rabat, and for the Algerian position on Western Sahara than for Morocco's claim to the territory^[1]. After a brief period of ambiguity, however, French diplomacy began quietly to revert to form, on the Western Sahara question at least, and if any doubts lingered they will have been dispelled this month. As an unnamed adviser to François Holland put it to French journal of record Le Monde on the eve of the President's trip to Morocco: “The French position is not reinvented every six months. We are not naive, we know that this issue is complicated, and an enormously sensitive one for the Moroccans.” Addressing the Moroccan parliament on April 4, President Hollande himself hammered home the message: “France supports the efforts of the Secretary General of the UN to achieve an acceptable political settlement. The plan presented by Morocco in 2007 provides for a status of broad autonomy for the people [of the Sahara]. Here and now, I repeat: this is a serious and credible basis for a negotiated solution.” Embattled at home in France where he faces record low approval ratings, Hollande was at least gratified with a standing ovation from Morocco's parliamentarians.

In anticipation, Polisario General Secretary and President of the SADR Mohamed Abdelaziz published an open letter to François Hollande in Algerian daily El Watan on April 2, in which he condemned the French position on Western Sahara as “an obstacle to [...] peace and justice” (adding, however, that it was “never too late” for Paris to change track). Algiers was also spurred to react to the French President's visit, with Foreign Ministry spokesman Amar Belani taking issue with a 'scene-setting' dispatch issued by French government-owned news agency AFP just before Hollande's visit which explained that “concerning Western Sahara, fought over by Algeria and Morocco since 1975, France's position remains the same: Paris supports the Moroccan autonomy plan.” More than the French support for the autonomy plan, what irked the Algerian Foreign Ministry spokesman particularly was the suggestion that the Western Sahara issue is a dispute between Morocco and Algeria. “To say that Algeria and Morocco compete for the Western Sahara is a disconcerting error and I am surprised by such an aberration,” Belani said in a statement to official government news agency APS. “Algeria's position is well known. Algeria has no ambition or claim to the territory of Western Sahara, for which it seeks genuine decolonization through the exercise of the Saharawi people's inalienable right to self-determination.”

The Algerian Foreign Ministry may have been particularly touchy on that particular point because it detects a broader trend, beyond AFP's “disconcerting error” to reduce the Western Sahara conflict to a dispute between Rabat and Algiers. In particular, the UN Secretary General's Personal Envoy Christopher Ross, when he suggested in his report to the Security Council last November that a phase of shuttle diplomacy with the neighbouring countries (i.e. Mauritania and Algeria) would be necessary before anything could be expected to come of renewed talks between the two official parties to the dispute (i.e. Morocco and Polisario), indicated that progress towards a solution depends on improved Algerian-Moroccan relations, thus seeming to imply that the dispute was, at base, between Algiers and Rabat. As we noted in our last report, this is not so very far removed from Morocco's long-held position that the Sahara question is an “artificial” conflict created by Algeria that must ultimately be solved by direct negotiations between Rabat and Algiers. This position – anathema to Algiers, of course – is restated on every possible occasion by Morocco's Islamist Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane, notably in an interview with French journalists on Feb. 24 (“Everyone knows that the Sahara is Moroccan and that, in the context of autonomy, a solution could be found. And if Algeria were to decide to solve this problem, it could be resolved in one day”).

These points of interpretation aside, however, it is worth underlining the practical conclusion Ross drew in his remarks back in November: that there was no point in the present circumstances in continuing with the episodic 'informal discussions' between Morocco and Polisario that have become known as the Manhasset process. This admission of failure led to the emergence of divergent opinions at meetings of Polisario's National Secretariat early this year. The majority view, backed by Mohamed Abdelaziz, was that everything should be done to demonstrate that the stalemate was Morocco's responsibility, and generally to put Rabat as far as possible on the defensive. Supporters of this position argued that Polisario's decision to suspend family visits between Tindouf and Laayoune in late January, in protest at security measures imposed by the Moroccan police on families coming from Tindouf, could be seen as part and parcel of this strategy of exposing Moroccan intransigence; the question of human rights abuses in the Moroccan-controlled Sahara is of course another live issue which serves to maintain the pressure on Rabat^[2]. On the other hand, a minority of participants in the National Secretariat meetings, among them SADR Foreign Minister Ahmed Salem Ould Salek, argued that the Front needed to push for a quick resumption of UN-sponsored talks with Morocco, since there was no other realistic way forward given the “difficult” context prevailing in the region.

Difficult, the regional situation most certainly is. At the time of the National Secretariat discussions in which such complications were invoked, France's 'Operation Serval' against AQMI and allied jihadist groups in northern Mali was just getting under way, and notwithstanding the largely symbolic first withdrawal of French troops on April 8 the continuing conflict in Mali's desert north remains an extremely sensitive issue more than two months later. With the Algerian regime unsettled by the collapse of its strategy of attempting to entice the Tuareg

Islamist faction Ansar Dine to break with AQMI and uncertain how to respond to the presence of French troops in its own 'backyard'^[3], Rabat has rushed to take advantage of the situation by offering its open and unambiguous support to Paris' campaign in Mali, spelled out very explicitly by King Mohamed VI in a speech (read on his behalf by PM Benkirane) to the Organisation of Islamic Cooperation^[4] summit in Cairo on Feb. 6. As well as helping to restore Rabat's 'special relationship' with Paris, Morocco's support for the French-led effort to bring northern Mali back under the control of the central government has boosted its influence in Bamako, while Algeria's influence continues to decline: in an interview in early February^[5], Malian Foreign Minister Tiéman Coulibaly, was effusive in his thanks for Moroccan support, recalling that the UN Security Council resolution 2085 authorising military action to restore Mali's territorial integrity was passed under the Moroccan chairmanship of the Security Council:

Morocco has always supported and continues to support Mali and its territorial integrity. We rely heavily on the support and cooperation of Morocco in overcoming the terrorist threat. We rely on the help and support of Morocco, which is a brotherly country with whom we have historic relations and was the first country from which we received humanitarian aid.

Coulibaly went on to add:

There were only 500 jihadists at the outset. Now there are between 5,500 and 7,000. These jihadi groups were joined by young people with no prospects, including young Sahrawis from the [Tindouf] camps.

This latter claim – which despite being repeated by a Malian government minister remains tendentious at best^[6] – is clearly harmful for Polisario, and a boost to Rabat's long-running black propaganda campaign. Rabat followed up its advantage in mid-March with an African mini-tour by King Mohamed, taking him (together with a large chunk of the government, foreign intelligence chief Mohamed Yassine Mansouri and numerous Palace advisors) to Senegal, Côte d'Ivoire and Gabon. While Mali was a central part of discussions between the King and Presidents Sall, Ouattara and Bongo – all of whom are reported to have promised to support Morocco's reintegration into the African Union – the Western Sahara question is also understood to have been on the menu, and a member of Polisario's National Secretariat to whom we spoke shortly afterwards described the King's tour as being part and parcel of Rabat's attempts to have the process of negotiations with Polisario “buried” once and for all.

Meanwhile, the sudden outbreak of social unrest across southern Algeria that has occurred in parallel with the war in northern Mali^[7], and the first premises of the emergence of a 'Tuareg question' within Algeria itself^[8], have the authorities in Algiers all the more on edge. This adds to the difficulties for Polisario and the Sahrawis of the Tindouf camps: according to a leading member of a Sahrawi NGO, based in Algiers, the DRS intelligence and security service recently informed senior Polisario leaders that no contacts between Sahrawis and Algerian and non-Algerian Tuaregs would henceforth be tolerated without explicit prior approval from the DRS; furthermore, all travel by Tindouf-based Sahrawis to or within countries bordering on Algeria, even if arriving via third countries, will require prior authorisation from the DRS^[9].

More worryingly still, for Polisario, the uncertainty in Algeria with regard to the 2014 presidential election is now beginning to affect, albeit obliquely, the Western Sahara question. According to a senior civil servant at the Algerian Presidency, Algeria's long-held doctrine on Western Sahara – essentially the position outlined by Foreign Ministry Amar Belani (see above), namely that Algeria demands that the recognition of the Sahrawi people's right to self-determination via a referendum in accordance with existing UN Security Council resolutions – will not change one iota as long as Bouteflika is in power. But speculation in Algiers political salons that Bouteflika might not stand for re-election in 2014 has encouraged a number of political figures to begin questioning the validity of this and other shibboleths. According to the same source, among those who have begun to entertain the idea that Algeria needs to rid itself of the dead weight of the Western Sahara conflict and adopt a new approach to building a more closely integrated Maghreb are at least two members of the politburo of the left-leaning Front des Forces Socialistes^[10], several heads of nationalised companies and, above all, a number of leading parliamentarians from the ruling FLN. The President's entourage, having got wind of these private discussions, tends to see them as the beginnings of movement against a fourth term for Bouteflika; conversely, the more Bouteflika insists on the Western Sahara question in his discussions with foreign visitors^[11], the more the dissenters get the message that he is inclined to run for re-election in 2014. Henceforth, the source at the Presidency concludes, in Algeria the Western Sahara question is a domestic political issue more than anything else.

It was perhaps with this in mind that SADR Foreign Minister Mohamed Salem Ould Salek, speaking at a press conference at the SADR embassy in Algiers on March 26, went even further than usual in linking the Moroccan intelligence services and AQMI-offshoot MUJAO^[12], claiming that “the Algerian diplomats kidnapped in April 2012 in Gao, northern Mali, and who have still not been released, were kidnapped on the orders of Moroccan Makhzen”. For good measure, Ould Salek added that:

The Moroccan secret services want to flood North Africa with large quantities of drugs. For Morocco, drugs and terrorism are two sides of the same coin. MUJAO was created by Morocco as a vector of instability and damage against Algeria and Western Sahara. The leaders of MUJAO currently reside in Rabat and hold diplomatic passports enabling them to move freely abroad, especially to Bamako, where the Moroccan embassy as of 2006 [sic] became MUJAO's headquarters. With drug money, Morocco is able to buy the silence of several countries, so that it can continue to violate the aspirations of the Sahrawi people to freedom.

Such claims, promptly taken up in the Algerian press, seem almost to have been calculated to make it all the more difficult for Algerian politicians to walk away from the Western Sahara question and begin the process of mending fences with Morocco.

By the time Christopher Ross embarked on his tour of the region in late March, therefore, the situation was, if anything, even more difficult. Speaking to us between Ross' visits to Morocco (March 20-21) and the Tindouf camps (March 25-26), the Polisario National Secretariat member quoted above indicated that the Front's leadership, while aware that the context was not particularly favourable and that Morocco was pushing in the opposite direction, would tell to Ross that there was an “urgent” need to resume direct negotiations between the two parties, and that Polisario was ready to do so without preconditions (although clearly this does not preclude exerting continued pressure on Morocco, over the question of human rights in particular^[13]). Speaking to us after Ross' meetings with the Polisario leadership^[14], the National Secretariat member reported somewhat despondently that “nothing new” had come of them. Ross is said to have listened “attentively” to his interlocutors, who made a point of raising both the impasse in the negotiations process and the human rights situation in the territories held by Morocco. Without laying out his conclusions explicitly, Ross reportedly insinuated (a) that it is becoming increasingly difficult to envisage organising a referendum and that an alternative solution, which would have to be acceptable to both parties and to the neighbouring countries, is needed to unblock the situation, and (b) that for a new round of direct negotiations to be worthwhile, a rough outline of such an alternative would be required, as a basis for discussion. The Secretary General's Personal Representative is also reported to have promised to cover the question of human rights in the report he is due to deliver to the Security Council on April 22, a week before the annual vote to renew MINURSO's mandate.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
 President and CEO
 The Gabriel Company, LLC
 1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
 Washington DC, 20005
 Phone: +1 202.887.1113
 Fax: +1 202.887.1115
 Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
 Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

[1] See AMSR #115 (June 8, 2012)

[2] According to a Sahrawi NGO activist, Mohamed Abdelaziz described the very heavy jail sentences handed down in mid-February by a Moroccan military court on 24 Sahrawi activists detained after the break-up of the Gdeim Izik protest camp in November 2011 as a “godsend” and ordered that a file be prepared presenting the trials as an “exemplary case of Moroccan colonial practices in the Sahara”.

[3] See AMSR #121 & #122.

[4] Formerly the Organisation of the Islamic Conference.

[5] Atlasinfo.fr, 05/02/13

[6] A former Mauritanian government minister to whom we spoke in mid-March claimed that Mauritanian intelligence services have established a list of "around fifty" names of Sahrawis who have been taking part in the war in Mali, but added that these fighters are not members of Polisario or residents of the camps and had entered Mali from Mauritania, where they previously resided, rather than travelling through Algerian territory.

Reporting from Bamako, French daily Le Monde (April 7-8, 2013) indicates that the 200 jihadist prisoners captured in northern Mali by French and allied forces and held at the central prison in Bamako after being handed over to the Malian authorities include only a small minority of foreign fighters: four from Nigeria, four from Niger, two from Burkina Faso, one Gambian of Malian origin, one Tunisian, one Somalian, one Mauritanian, two Algerians and “one Moroccan who identifies himself as Sahrawi”. Around 80% of the prisoners are Malian nationals.

[7] See AMSR #122

[8] On March 29, the heads of the 30 Tuareg tribes of the Hoggar (southern Tamanrasset) met at the home of their Amenokal (or traditional leader) Ahmed Edabir to adopt a platform of demands for the Tuaregs of Algeria. While stressing their commitment to national unity, the Tuareg tribal leaders set up a 'Council of the Tribes of the Hoggar' and signed a lengthy letter to President Bouteflika demanding, amongst other things, that the central authorities reserve quotas for Tuaregs in government ministries, the diplomatic corps, the security services etc.

[9] Prior to this new regulation, Sahrawi residents of Algeria wishing to travel abroad were only required to give prior notification of their departure to the Gendarmerie (for inhabitants of the Tindouf camps) or the police (for those residing in Algiers or other cities), according to the same source.

[10] The FFS, which has of late toned down somewhat its once strident opposition to the regime as a whole, is a sister party of François Hollande's

PS, both being members of the Socialist International.

- [11] When Bouteflika received French National Assembly Speaker Claude Bartolone and the French ambassador to Algiers on March 11, for example, the bulk of his comments reportedly concerned the Western Sahara.
- [12] As we have noted in earlier reports, Polisario spokespeople, notably Mohamed Salem Ould Salek, have for some months been pushing the claim that MUJAO (the Movement for Monotheism and Jihad in West Africa, an AQMI splinter group which first emerged in late 2011) is a puppet, and perhaps even a creation, of the Moroccan security services. See WSSR 11/01/2013.
- [13] Hence for example Mohamed Abdelaziz's unusual open letter to King Mohamed at the end of March, condemning the abuse by Moroccan security forces of Sahrawi women protesters in Laayoune during Christopher Ross' visit.
- [14] Ross met with SADR President Mohamed Abdelaziz, MINURSO coordinator M'hamed Khaddad, parliamentary speaker and head of the delegation to the Manhasset talks Khatri Addouh, members of the Sahrawi National Council (the SADR's quasi-parliament), and members of the National Secretariat.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, April 15, 2013 8:49 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Blog Monitoring April Week 2

Subject: Blog Monitoring April Week 2

Blog Name	Article Title/Date	Summary	Comments
Yabladi	Les cadavres de 37 chiens destinés à la consommation découverts à Casablanca The bodies of 37 dogs destined to be eaten discovered in Casablanca April 4, 2013	In Morocco, a new food scandal has been brought to light by pure "accident." A sausage vendor was arrested for a traffic violation in Boulevard Zerkoutni, Casablanca and would have at worst, received a ticket. The policeman was curious and asked to look in the back of the truck. The man admitted that he had 37 dog carcasses whose meat was used to fill sausages to be sold in the old medina of Casablanca. Translated from French	6
Yabladi	Entrepreneurs espagnols escroqués au Maroc : Rabat promet de « punir » les responsables Spanish entrepreneurs cheated in Morocco: Rabat promises to "punish" those responsible April 5, 2013	The Minister for Foreign Affairs Youssef Amrani acknowledged having received complaints from Spanish entrepreneurs who say they have been scammed in Morocco, at a breakfast briefing organized by the Europa Press news agency in Madrid last Tuesday. For more than two years, Spaniards have decried corrupt practices used against them in Morocco, without any government intervention. Despite the assurances of Youssef Amrani, the Association affected by extortion in Morocco (AAEM) is still wary. The new Ambassador of the European Union (EU) Rupert Joy, declares that a solution will be found as soon as possible. Translated from French	1
Yabladi	Melilla : Le président ne veut plus d'imams originaires du Maroc Melilla: The President does not want any Imams from Morocco	Juan José Imbroda, president of Melilla, has publicly stated that he wants an end to the arrival of imams from Morocco. He believes that all religious officials should be Spanish and appointed by the authorities of Madrid; and not preachers "paid by Morocco." On February 5, during a trip to Madrid, he asked the Minister of Justice, Alberto Ruiz Gallardón, to send Spanish preachers to the mosques in Melilla. According to the Spanish Secret Police, if expelling Moroccan Imams comes to fruition this will benefit radical Salafists and Wahhabists, in that the perceived insult to Moroccan Islam will aid them in recruitment; local Salafists have already enrolled 20 new students in their schools. Translated from French	1

	April 5, 2013
Yabladi	Le comité de l'ONU sur la torture enquête sur les violations des droits de 42 Subsahariens The UN Committee on Torture investigates human rights violations of 42 Sub-Saharan April 8, 2013	The article accuses Morocco of being either inexperienced and/or overzealous in the fight against illegal immigration. The UN Committee against Torture may initiate an investigation into the circumstances of the deportation of the 42 sub-Saharan refugees duly recognized by UNHCR to the Algerian border in December 2006. At the time the Moroccan authorities wanted to show the Spanish Government, led by the Socialist Zapatero, pledges of their willingness to combat illegal immigration by organizing raids against the sub-Saharan. The same year, Rabat hosted the first edition of the Euro-African conference devoted to this phenomenon, but without the participation of Algeria. The complaint filed by a Spanish lawyer relies on Article 3 of the Convention against Torture, and also claims that the police violently raided homes in Rabat and of raping a 27 year old woman. Translated from French
Yabladi	Trafic de drogue: Le Maroc réclame la réouverture des frontières avec l'Algérie Drug Trafficking: Morocco claims the reopening of borders with Algeria April 10, 2013	The interior ministers of the 5+5 group met on Tuesday in Algeria to discuss the importance of the Sahel region and the fight against terrorism and drug trafficking. Representatives from Algeria, Mauritania, Libya, Morocco and Tunisia as well as France, Italy, Spain, Malta and Portugal have agreed to intensify cooperation on border security through the exchange of expertise, experiences, information, analysis and evaluation. Specialized training courses will be organized for the CIMO experts to facilitate the transfer of technology and modernization of control systems and security of travel documents. Interior Minister, Mohand Laenser took this occasion to advocate for the reopening of the Moroccan-Algerian border. Translated from French	3
Yabladi	Une marche en djellaba et foulard contre le mouvement FEMEN A march in djellaba and scarves against the FEMEN movement April 11, 2013	On March 23rd, Algeria was the first to rally against FEMEN's movement. Tunisian women followed suit on April 6th by marching in djellabas and scarves. The Minister for Family and Solidarity, Bassima Hakkaoui, spoke against FEMEN: " Using nudity to protest brings us far back into prehistoric times, prior human evolution and when humans decided to cover themselves. There is a big difference between prehistoric and modern times we live in, what I consider the most advanced time since man appeared on earth. " Translated from French	2
Yabladi	Benkirane n'exclut pas le recours à des élections anticipées Benkirane does not exclude	Despite the early elections, the PJD has not seen a decrease in its power; especially in the recent elections in Tangier, Marrakech and Fez. The PJD has a comfortable edge as the other political parties seem more indecisive and divided as ever. Furthermore, Al Akhbar Al Youm posted an article on the increasing affiliation with the PJD. They currently have 23,000 affiliates compared to 2011's 13,000.	3

	recourse in the anticipated elections April 11, 2013	Translated from French
Yabladi	Exploration pétrolière au Maroc : 3 milliards de DH d'investissement en 2013 Oil exploration in Morocco: 3 billion dirhams investment in 2013 April 11, 2013	Three billion dirhams are set aside in 2013 for oil exploration. The ministry aims to increase the number of wells, but it is very expensive, especially when the state fails to honor its commitment.. An analyst at Citigroup, said that "Morocco remains an under-explored hydrocarbons market." The government has also launched an extensive program of exploration of shale gas, which requires a significant mobilization of funds. Translated from French	0
Magharebia	Morocco at a crossroad April 5, 2013	This article reports that Moroccan youths are in a dire economic situation, and given the proliferation of AQIM this poses not only an economic threat to Morocco, but also a security threat. According to a 2012 World Bank report, nearly half of all Moroccan youths ages 15-29 are either unemployed or not in school. Terrorist recruiters thrive in environments of high youth unemployment, because the frustration caused by unemployment and poverty makes youths, particularly young men, susceptible to extremist sentiments. With the Sahel security situation becoming increasingly precarious, the article claims, Morocco and the international community at large can no longer afford to address security issues with solely military tactics; instead, investment in the youth (in the form of schooling, job training, and sports programs) is necessary in order to prevent Morocco's youth from becoming the next generation of extremists.	0
Magharebia	Morocco, Hollande discuss Sahel security April 8, 2013	Hollande during his two day trip to Morocco, indicated that the threat of terrorism in West Africa and the Sahel was a danger not just for the countries concerned and their neighbours, but for the whole of Africa and Europe. Also addressing Sahel security, King Mohammed VI stressed "We are driven by the same clarity of vision over the vital need to ensure peace, security and stability for all African countries. Such conditions seem necessary to secure the lasting foundations of democracy, progress and human development".	0
All Africa	Western Sahara: Social Movements Assembly Condemns Aggressive Behaviour By Moroccan Delegates and Reaffirms Solidarity With Saharawi	Over 50 social justice organizations from several countries who attended the World Social Forum in Tunis have signed a declaration affirming their solidarity with the Sahrawi cause. This group, known as the Assembly of Social Movements, was interrupted during their WSF meeting by angry opposition by the Moroccan delegation. According to an ASM communique, "[Moroccan delegates] took over the stage and violently attempted to prevent the reading of the last section of the declaration where we were affirming that we "defend the right of peoples to self-determination and sovereignty, as in Palestine, the Western Sahara, and Kurdistan." The communique goes on to vehemently condemn this interruption	0

	People - Communiqué	and reaffirm support for the Sahrawi people.
All Africa	Morocco: Balearic Parties Urge Government to Pressurize Nation for Releasing Saharawi Prisoners April 7, 2013	The six political parties in the Balearic Islands, Spain, have asked the government to pressure the Moroccan regime to reverse the convictions of the 24 Gdeim Izik prisoners and set them free. This move comes after a delegation from the Balearic parliament visited Sahrawi refugee camps last week. The parties have also called for the establishment of a UN mechanism to ensure the respect of human rights in Western Sahara, and to allow observers and journalists to freely assess the situation in the field.	0
All Africa	Morocco: Polisario Front - the UN Report Is 'Balanced' but 'Shy' April 10, 2013	Ahmed Bukhari, the Polisario representative to the UN, stated that UN Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon's report on the situation in Western Sahara gave a balanced look on the issue, but betrayed a reluctance to criticize Morocco for its role in human rights abuses. In his words: " The report is balanced but shy and reflecting the impact of the diversion tactics and intimidation practiced by Morocco to undermine UN efforts to resolve the question of occupied Western Sahara." Bukhari expressed his approval of Ban's inclusion of language calling for a permanent mechanism by which to monitor the state of human rights in Western Sahara and for a solution to the issue that would respect the Sahrawi people's right to self-determination, a right that he noted was enshrined in the UN Charter.	0
Construction Week Online	Colas lands Moroccan $177m high-speed rail deal April 7, 2013	Colas Rail has announced that its consortium (with French engineering firm Egis Rail) has won a $177m contract to design and build a high-speed rail line in Morocco. The consortium will design and build a 185km, double-track line between Tangiers and Kenitra.	0
Futurity.org	Salty water threatens Morocco's oases farms April 8, 2013	According to a study by Duke University and Ibn Zohr University in Agadir, redirecting meltoff from the Atlas Mountains to irrigate the desert oases of southern Morocco has increased the salinity of the groundwater to dangerous levels, making continued farming of dates and other crops unsustainable. "The flow of imported surface water onto farm fields has caused natural salts in the desert soil and underlying rock strata to dissolve and leach into local groundwater supplies," said Avner Vengosh, professor of geochemistry and water quality at Duke's Nicholas School of the Environment. This presents an even more pressing problem for the future: as natural oases in the Sahara begin to dry up as a result of climate change, local communities will have to rely on groundwater to survive, groundwater that now has an untenable salinity level. For a short-term solution to this problem, the researchers have discovered a previously overlooked low-saline water source that flows naturally into the Draa Basin from the adjacent Anti-Atlas Jabel Saghro Mountains. Flow from this low-saline source will dilute the groundwater and will hopefully mitigate the harmful effects of built-up salt.	0
Reuters	U.N. warns of risk of Mali war	UN secretary general Ban Ki-Moon has warned that the Malian conflict might have disturbing spill over effects into Western	0

	spillover in Western Sahara April 9, 2013	Sahara the Polisario Front. Western powers are concerned that Mali's vast and lawless Saharan region could become a launchpad for international militant attacks. In his report, Ban argued in favor of some form of independent rights monitoring but offered no details on how it would be carried out in the resource-rich territory. He also recommended renewing the mandate for the U.N. peacekeeping mission in Western Sahara for another year until April 30, 2014, as well as adding 15 military observers and six U.N. police officers to the force.
The Daily Star Lebanon	Israel: Morocco MPs refused entry as had no visas April 10, 2013	Earlier this week Israel turned away two Moroccan MPs who were trying to enter Jordan through the West Bank, because they did not have entry visas for the West Bank. They were part of a delegation from the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe going to meet with Jordan's King Abdullah II. While the Moroccan parliament is furious over this incident, Israel has defended its decision to turn them away, stating that any Moroccan citizen needs a visa to enter the West Bank through Israel, and that the MPs simply showed up at the Allenby border crossing with their Moroccan passports, without having coordinated their visit with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The other delegates held European passports, and thus were able to enter the West Bank without visas.	0
China Daily	Chinese navy starts visit to Morocco April 10, 2013	13th Escort Taskforce of the Chinese navy on Tuesday arrived in Casablanca, beginning a five-day visit to the country. The visit by the escort taskforce, composed of two frigates and one supply ship, is the first of its kind made to the nation by a Chinese naval fleet, said Li Xiaoyan, commander of the escort taskforce. During the visit, Li will meet Morocco's navy officers and government officials and introduce the Chinese navy's anti-piracy operations in the Gulf of Aden and the waters of Somalia for more than four years.	0
Washington Post	AP Interview: Morocco looks to beef up tourism hit by Europe's economic crisis, Arab upheavals April 10, 2013	Morocco has experienced a drop in tourism as a result of two main external circumstances: the European economic crisis and the Arab Awakening. The economic crisis has caused French and Spanish tourism (which in 2011 constituted half of Morocco's tourism industry) to drop sharply; in response, Morocco's Tourism Ministry is trying to attract more tourists from more economically secure European countries such as Britain and Germany, and from Gulf states such as Saudi Arabia. While Morocco has not suffered the same instability as some of its neighbors as a result of the Arab Awakening, public opinion on the safety of traveling in North Africa has changed markedly since 2011. Thus, the Ministry must also build up Morocco's image as a safe and stable country to visit in order to rebuild its tourism industry.	0
The New York Times	Morocco Slow to Enforce Laws on Women's Rights April 10, 2013	This article is about the delay in applying internationally accepted standards on women's rights in Morocco. Despite the country's progressive Family Law, the largely conservative Moroccan judiciary has consistently found loopholes in statutes meant to protect girls and women, and the infamous Article 475 of the Moroccan penal code has resulted in several high-profile cases of abuse and death of young Moroccan women. Recently, a grant from the Netherlands has led to the creation of a website called Marsadnissa, a database of past rulings on family law. This database will serve as a resource to both women's rights attorneys and judges; the access to precedential rulings on women's rights and family law will allow attorneys to better	0 serve their clients and judges to make more informed rulings on these controversial cases.

lemag.ma	Moulay Hicham : Les marocains se révolteront en 2018 et le Makhzen y succombera Moulay Hicham: The Moroccan people will revolt in 2018 and the Makhzen will fall April 10, 2013	Prince Moulay Hicham penned an article in the French journal Pouvoirs that states that Morocco will undergo democratic revolution in 2018, and that the Makhzen will subsequently cease to exist. This democratic revolution, according to him, will be led by Morocco's leftist parties, and will be incited by the poor governance of the ruling PJD party. Translated from French	16
The View from Fez	Casablanca Airport - Lack of Action on Runway Confusion April 11, 2013	Tuesday, April 9, Soir Echos reported that the Mohamed V airport at Casablanca is at risk of aircraft accidents, because of runway configurations. They claim that the three runways can lead to confusion among pilots wishing to land at the airport; putting both aircraft and passengers at risk. As of yet no accident has happened but there have been four close calls. The Directorate General of Civil Aviation (DGCA), urged ONDA, the National Airports Authority, to conduct a thorough safety audit to better understand how such confusion comes about and solve the problem as soon as possible. To date, the DGAC has not received any response from the ONDA says M'Barek El Fakir, head of investigations at DGCA. In turn, for ONDA, this is a "case closed."	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, April 20, 2013 8:10 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitoring April Week 3

Blog Name	Article Title/Date	Summary	Comments
Yabiladi	Le dernier rapport du FMI met à nu la politique économique du Maroc The last IMF rapport lays Morocco's economic policy bare April 12, 2013	The IMF published a report last week saluting Morocco's macro-economic control despite the external shocks like the European crisis. However, the IMF indicates that it is worried about the government's ability to reduce the budget deficit to 4.8%. The decline in remittance and tourism revenue, in addition to a lack of foreign direct investment, indicate a loss of competitiveness for Morocco. The compensation fund and the pension system also remain concerning for the IMF. Raising the retirement age is considered as one of the solutions. Translated from French	24
Yabiladi	TIC : Le Maroc est 89ème dans le rapport de World Economic Forum ITC: Morocco is 89th in the World Economic Forum report April 12, 2013	On Wednesday, the World Economic Forum released a report on information technologies and communication. Out of a total of 144 countries, Morocco ranked 89th, two spots higher than in 2012. Morocco is the highest ranking in terms of Maghreb countries, with Algeria ranking 131st. However, it is lagging behind when compared to Arab countries, with Qatar (23rd) ranking higher than France(26th) and Belgium (24th). Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Coupe budgétaire de 15 milliards de dirhams au Maroc : Benkirane critiqué de toute part Budget cut of 15 billion dirhams in Morocco: Benkirane criticized from all sides April 15, 2013	Last Friday, Moroccan finance minister Nizar Baraka announced a 15bil dh spending cut, in order to address the country's financial difficulties. This was met with outcry from both the government and the opposition, all criticizing PM Benkirane for being unable to find a "creative" solution to Morocco's economic crisis, stating that austerity is not the way to revive the country's lagging economy. Some economists have responded by stating that Morocco's budget cuts are the result of pressure from the IMF for rapid reform. Translated from French	0

Yabiladi	Maroc : Le Sahara au cœur d'une réunion de crise au cabinet royal Morocco: The Sahara at the heart of a crisis meeting in the Royal Cabinet April 15, 2013	This article covers the United States' decision to back the call to expand MINURSO's mandate to monitor human rights in the Western Sahara region, and the regime's reaction. The royal cabinet had a tense five-hour-long meeting on how to react to this statement. The author fears that this is a victory for the Polisario in the Security Council. He states that while the US has changed its position on the matter, Morocco will always be able to count on France's support in the UNSC; however, France does not have the power to override the United States' influence on the Council. Translated from French	38
Yabiladi	Des policiers condamnés pour corruption dans la région de Rabat Police officers convicted of corruption in the region of Rabat April 16, 2013	Sixteen officers were arrested and spent the night in jail for "abstention, disclosure of professional secrecy, bribery and corruption". Various sentences were issued; one of the policeman was sentenced to 18 months, while eleven were sentenced to between three and eight months. The main officer accused is also a drug dealer and is sentenced to four years with a fine of 10,000 dhs; his accomplice is sentenced to serve one year and pay 5,000 dhs fine. Translated from French	4
Yabiladi	Maroc : Le conseil supérieur des oulémas s'oppose à la liberté de conscience Morocco: The Supreme Ulama Council opposes freedom of conscience April 16, 2013	The Supreme Ulama Council has issued a fatwa against the freedom of conscience, stating that Muslims who renounce their religion should be treated as apostates and could be killed for their crime. While this fatwa does not affect Moroccan law, this goes in the face of a number of the country's international commitments, including the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Translated from French	14
Yabiladi	Guerre au Mali : L'AFP s'attire les foudres du Polisario et de l'Algérie War in Mali: The AFP has angered the Polisario and Algeria April 17, 2013	An article written by AFP stating that Mujao and AQIM members were found in Tindouf and in Western Sahara angered both the Polisario Front and Algeria. Both deny these allegations. Algerian Ministry of Foreign Affairs responded that this is "a gross disinformation campaign since it is well known to all that the Mujao are not in Algerian territory". Moreover, AFP has also suggested that the Polisario Front is also present in northern Mali. Translated from French	4

Yabiladi	Maroc/Algérie : Opération séduction en marche ? Morocco/Algeria: Operation Seduction in effect? April 17, 2013	According to a report on RFI, since the beginning of 2013 Morocco and Algeria have been trying to reach a reconciliation, in the wake of the security crisis in the Sahel and the need of each country for partnership with the EU. There has already been some movement towards such reconciliation within the private sector, with companies on each side of the border expressing interest in forging business ties. Reconciliation on maritime borders and airspace, however, have been more difficult to negotiate. Translated from French	0
Sahara Press Service	Morocco is responsible for prolonging Western Sahara conflict, says Mauritanian diplomat April 13, 2013	Former Mauritanian ambassador Mohamed Lemine Ould El Kateb has stated that Morocco is responsible for prolonging the Western Sahara conflict, according to the Algerian newspaper Al Chourouk. According to him, Morocco has not shown any flexibility on the matter, and that the conflict presented a regional security threat if allowed to continue.	0
Morocco News Board	Western Sahara: UN Chief Discounts Independence April 14, 2013	This article provides commentary on UN Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon's report on the Western Sahara crisis. The report deviated from the norm in a few ways, especially in its tone, which the author says indicated that the UN will be taking a new approach to Western Sahara. The report calls upon Rabat and Algiers to cooperate in finding a solution to the Western Sahara crisis, and the author of this article interprets this as being indicative of a shift in the UN approach away from Western Saharan independence. The author suggests that Rabat should expand Sahrawi freedoms in its autonomy plan to meet UN expectations and thus preclude more calls for Saharan independence. Another factor that the author finds reassuring is Ban's inclusion of the involvement of Polisario fighters in AQIM-linked violence in the Sahel.	0
Morocco News Board	Morocco-US Relations: Time for Restraint April 18, 2013	This op-ed states that Morocco must temper its reaction to the US backing of human rights monitors in MINURSO, lest it jeopardize a strong alliance that is crucial to both countries. In the author's words, "Morocco and the United State need to further their cooperation rather than brawl over marginal issues." The article suggests that Rabat expand its public diplomacy efforts in the US, emphasizing the importance of military cooperation between the two countries, and "improve public advocacy for the Kingdom's position in the Sahara conflict." He concludes: "It is not time for Moroccans to lash out at some obviously biased groups, like the RFK Center for Human Rights, but rather hit the right political and diplomatic notes with Washington."	6
Magharebia	Morocco arrests 200 football fans April 14, 2013	Moroccan police arrested nearly 200 soccer fans for acts of violence and vandalism after the April 11 game between Raja Casablanca and FAR Rabat. During the clashes, shops, cars, trams, and buses were destroyed.	0
Magharebia	Moroccan Parliament reconvenes	The Moroccan Parliament's spring legislative session opened on April 12, with a legislative agenda of tackling unemployment and legislative performance. House of Representatives Speaker	0

	April 15, 2013	Karim Ghellab said that the Parliament and the government should coordinate efforts to implement the related provisions of the new constitution. Several parliamentarians have brought attention to the lack of action on parliamentary proposals; the constitution granted more legislative power to parliament where it had previously resided with the government, and many MPs are especially concerned that priority has not been given to the legislative initiatives of parliamentarians. Parliament will also address the major structural reforms including the compensation and pension funds.
Magharebia	Morocco, UK boost judicial co-operation April 16, 2013	On April 3, Morocco signed three judicial cooperation deals with Britain. These agreements cover extradition policies and mutual assistance in criminal matters. Moroccan Foreign Minister Saadeddine El Othmani said the Moroccan delegation's visit to the UK was part of efforts to develop the strategic partnership between the two countries.	0
Mamfakinch	Vidéo du débat organisé par Node « Monarchie ou République. Quel modèle pour le Maroc » Video recording of a debate organized by Node titled "Monarchy or Republic. Which model for Morocco" April 14, 2013	The association Node hosted an interesting debate between advocates of a "parliamentary monarchy model" and those who would like to one day see the emergence of a "republican model". The debate was recorded and is provided on the website. The debate was a couple minutes over two hours. Translated from French	1
Washington Post	Morocco rejects any proposals to give UN mission in W. Sahara power to monitor human rights April 15, 2013	Spokesman Rodney Ford, for the American Embassy in Rabat confirmed US discussion to expand MINURSO mission to include human rights monitoring. The Moroccan statement, issued after a meeting among the king, Cabinet and political party heads on Monday, however, rejected any such proposal and said Morocco's efforts to promote human rights were already internationally recognized.	3
Proactive Investors	Investor spotlight shines on Morocco ahead of busy drill campaign April 15, 2013	It is estimated that Morocco's vast exploration area, which spans almost twice the area licensed in the Gulf of Mexico, could become one of the world's top oil and gas provinces. Cairn said it expects drilling will start early in the second half with the Foun Draa well setting in motion a ten-well campaign. Cairn is carrying the first US$60mIn of the well costs for the Foun Draa programme, it also has a 50% stake in the area. Other partners are San Leon with 14.17%, Serica with 8.33% and Longreach with 2.5% (the state oil firm retains the remaining 25%). Jefferies analyst Laura Loppacher highlights that economically Morocco is an attractive destination for oil investment thanks to the government's accommodating approach so far.	0

Albawaba Business	Is Morocco going green? April 16, 2013	With announcement of Africa's second-largest wind farm being built in southern Morocco, ambitious plans are set to increase renewables in the country's energy sector. The program aims to improve grid efficiency and generate 42% of domestic needs from renewable energy by 2020. A total of 16 companies submitted bids in 2012 to participate in the construction of the new wind energy projects. The projects will take the form of public-private partnerships (PPPs), with institutions such as ONEE, the Energy Investment Company (Société d'Investissements Energétiques), and the Hassan II Fund for Social and Economic Development (Fonds Hassan II pour le Developpement Economique et Social) earmarked for key roles in developing the farms. Morocco thus far, looks like it is heading in the right direction to meet its 2020 target.	0
Today Business	Wilmar buys 27.5% stake in Morocco sugar firm for S$333 mln April 16, 2013	Singapore's Wilmar International said it has acquired a 27.5 per cent stake in Cosumar, Morocco's sole sugar supplier, for 2.3 billion Moroccan dirhams (S$333 million), expanding its sugar operations into Africa.	0
Al Arabiya	Morocco cancels war games with U.S. over Western Sahara April 17, 2013	Morocco canceled its 13th annual "African Lion" military exercises with the United States after the Obama administration supported adding human rights monitoring to the U.N. mission to the disputed Western Sahara territory. Moroccan Minister of Communication Mustapha Khalfi has decried the push to expand MINURSO's mandate to include human rights monitoring, stating "it is an attack on the national sovereignty of Morocco and will have negative consequences on the stability of the whole region."	0
World Politics Review	Morocco's Cancellation of Military Exercise a Major Disruption for U.S. April 18, 2013	Morocco's last-minute cancellation of the "African Lion" war games (which were supposed to run from April 17-27) constitutes a big disruption for the US military, according to Yahia Zoubir, a professor of international relations and international management and director of research in geopolitics at Euromed Management in Marseilles. According to him, it will be difficult for the army to redeploy the 1,400 US troops already in Morocco for the exercises. Despite Morocco's and the US' longstanding alliance, this cancellation is likely to strain relations between the two countries.	0
Reuters	France won't block U.S. proposal on Western Sahara: envoys April 18, 2013	French envoys have stated that France is unlikely to use its veto power to block the US' proposal to add human rights monitoring to MINURSO's mandate, saying that this issue is between the US and Morocco and that France does not want to intervene. Without France's veto, the resolution will likely pass.	0
Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights	Nowhere to Turn: The Consequences of the Failure to Monitor Human Rights Violations in Western Sahara	The RFK Center produced a report on the human rights situation facing the Sahrawi people in Western Sahara and Tindouf. Information was collected through interviews and meetings during a visit to the regions. While the Equity and Reconciliation Commission established by Morocco in 2004 played an important role in initiating a process to deal with the atrocities of the past, many people believe that it has failed to implement recommendations from the victims; denying access to justice	0

[and Tindouf
Refugee Camps](#)

April 19, 2013

and truth. The RFK Center urges for immediate action from the UN and demands that Morocco puts an end to the pattern of violence and impunity that affect the Sahrawi people who support the independence of Western Sahara.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, April 22, 2013 7:08 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: ALgeria situation report

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT #123

April 19, 2013

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- With socio-economic protests still rampant in the south while DRS investigators continue to probe allegations of corruption at Sonatrach and elsewhere, the political climate remains unsettled.
- According to a high-level source, President Bouteflika has finally made his mind up to stand for a fourth term of office next year. There has been no public announcement yet, however.
- As the process of amending the constitution moves ahead, it would seem that there are plans to set up a new National Security Council to oversee the work of the police, the gendarmerie and perhaps part of the DRS.
- This may augur moves to break the DRS up into two or more distinct services, to avoid excessive concentration of power after the body's present chief, 'Tewfik' Médiène, retires.
- Such circumstances inevitably generate speculation and rumours, including reports that Maj-Gen. Bachir Tartag, head of internal security at the DRS, is deliberately orchestrating the corruption investigations in order to destroy the entente between Bouteflika and Tewfik and prevent the President from being elected for a fourth term.

Foreign Relations

- With members of Algeria's political class beginning, discreetly, to entertain the possibility of abandoning the shibboleth of Sahrawi independence and building a more united Maghreb once Bouteflika is out of the way, there is a natural temptation for Bouteflika's circle to play up long-standing differences with Morocco in order to prevent such ideas gaining traction in the run-up to the 2014 presidential election.
- Meanwhile, Moroccan politicians, whipped into a frenzy by the surprise announcement that Washington backs inclusion of human rights monitoring in MINURSO's remit, have begun lashing out angrily at Algeria and reviving dormant claims to Algerian territory.
- If MINURSO is given a human rights component, elements with the Moroccan security services may be tempted to use dirty tricks to 'prove' that there is a pay-off between human rights and efficient security.
- Algiers is quietly gloating at the Moroccans' discomfiture, following Rabat's angry cancellation of the joint Moroccan-American African Lion war games.

Security

- Overall, reported levels of political violence have remained low, but with something of an uptick in the first half of April.
- Incidents of note in the north of the country include an attack by a former Islamist guerilla fighter on a civilian in Algiers and an attempt to ambush the convoy of the regional governor of Medea.
- No incidents were reported in the oil and gas producing areas of the south, where the authorities claim to have boosted security significantly, but there has been a rash of incidents in the south-west of the country, all involving the interception of fighters arriving from Mali or Mauritania.
- In a rare admission of weakness, AQMI has spoken of its "pressing need for men and materiel" in an appeal to the youth of Tunisia to join its ranks rather than leave to fight in Syria.
- A separate communiqué from AQMI, expressing solidarity with the "intifada of the South" has been rejected out of hand by the leaders of the unemployed youth protests that have been shaking southern Algeria.

Political Trends

In our monthly reports since the beginning of this year, we have followed the Algerian political scene as it enters an increasingly turbulent phase. An unprecedented wave of unrest in the southern provinces, the resurgence of half-buried corruption scandals and uncertainty about the 2014 presidential election have converged at a time when the duumvirate of President Bouteflika and DRS chief Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène that has dominated politics since 2004 appears to be giving way to a more complex, three-way game, in which the military chiefs are players alongside the head of state and his intelligence chief. Indirect echos of the mood at the top, we reported, seemed to indicate a growing sense of unease.

Speaking to us in mid-April, a source with access to both Bouteflika and Tewfik expressed, for the first time, a degree of relief with regard to some of these issues – while at the same time hinting at new changes yet to come that may yet turn out to be equally unsettling. As far as the situation in the south is concerned, the source argued that things are “beginning to calm down”. On the face of things, this claim seems somewhat over-optimistic. Militant yet peaceful and well organised demonstrations by the unemployed have continued throughout the month (in Tamanrasset on April 10 and Ghardaïa on April 13, with another scheduled for Djelfa on April 20), while the three-day strike called by public service unions across the south at the beginning of the second week of April was widely observed (with a participation rate of just over 69% according to the organisers) and may herald further action. It is possible, however, that the source's optimism was inspired by a feeling that the authorities (and first and foremost the DRS) have begun to get to grips with the southern protest movement, and may now feel more confident of being able to manipulate and deflect it: the outbreak of rioting and wanton destruction of public property seen in the southern city of Ouargla on April 10 over allocations of social housing is, paradoxically, the kind of protest that the authorities appear relatively comfortable with – incidents such as this flare up regularly across the country and, insofar as the rioters' outlook is essentially parochial and depoliticised, are generally left to burn themselves out. It may be no coincidence that some eyewitnesses claimed to have seen groups of agents provocateurs deliberately encouraging the violence and destruction in Ouargla.

Behind the scenes, meanwhile, the same high-level source claimed that the suspense is at last over as regards the 2014 presidential election. Although no official announcement has yet been made, President Bouteflika has, according to the source, finally made his mind up and decided to stand for a fourth successive term. Speaking very guardedly, the source had nothing to say about how the other key players stand in relation to this decision, but appeared to imply that it was not opposed by DRS chief Tewfik.

A decision has also been taken to move ahead, at long last, with the revision of the constitution. This much at least is out in the open, President Bouteflika having met with the speakers of both houses of parliament, the head of the Constitutional Council and (tellingly) Assistant Defence Minister Maj-Gen. Abdelmalek Guenaïzia on April 2 to set the ball rolling, before appointing a body of experts a few days later to draft the required amendments. There have also been leaks to the press concerning the likely content of the package they are working on, which according to Tout Sur Algérie (April 16) will include:

- changes to the status of the Prime Minister, who is to be answerable to parliament rather than to the President;
- the creation of a new position of Vice President (most likely appointed by the President rather than elected on a joint ticket);
- reintroduction of an upper limit on the number of successive terms of office a President may serve (although in all likelihood not a return to the two-term limit that existed prior to 2009^[1]);
- the creation of a position of Minister of Defence, separate from the position of President of the Republic^[2];
- undefined measures to “provide a new framework for the activities of the security forces”^[3].

The final point in this list is the most intriguing. It appears to refer to a forthcoming initiative to which the high-level source quoted above also alluded, extremely cautiously, when we spoke in mid-April: the creation of a new 'National Security Council' to oversee the operations of the police, the Gendarmerie (currently part of the military and under the authority of the Defence Ministry) and, it would seem “part of” the DRS. The source gave nothing more away, other than to stress that the move was “not directed against Tewfik”. Vague though they may be, these hints bring to mind suggestions made earlier by separate sources that Tewfik – who, aged 74, cannot be expected to stay on in his present role indefinitely – has for some time been mulling plans to split the DRS into two or more separate institutions^[4] before he retires, so that his successors will never again be able to concentrate the same degree of power in their hands as he has wielded since he took over the helm of the security and intelligence service back in 1990. Insofar as the DRS is, in many respects, the very core of the Algerian regime, such developments will be of the utmost importance over the coming period.

It is in this context that one of Tewfik's potential successors, head of the Direction de la Sécurité Intérieure Maj-Gen. Bachir Tartag, has come under the spotlight. Tartag, who took over the crucial internal security position in late 2011, had already been named in the media as the operational commander of the security forces' response to the In Amenas hostage crisis^[5]. He has now been identified by the press as the man in charge of the ongoing anti-corruption probes. Over the past month, DRS investigators have, amongst other things, searched the residences in Algiers and Oran of former Energy Minister Chakib Khelil (who appears to have been 'allowed' to flee to Switzerland before answering a summons to appear before investigating magistrates) and have reportedly called in for questioning President Bouteflika's private secretary, Mohamed Rougab, in connection with alleged irregularities at the national housing agency. This has prompted specialist newsletter Maghreb Confidentiel to allege that, as the “real orchestrator of the anti-corruption investigations”, Tartag is deliberately trying, by targetting individuals close to Bouteflika, to “smash the fragile peace between his boss Tewfik and the head of state, ... cause the Bouteflika clan to implode and prevent the President from running for a fourth term in 2014.”

It is of course technically correct that Maj-Gen. Tartag is, in his capacity as head of the DSI, in charge of the DRS' criminal investigations department, which is carrying out the corruption probe. And it is conceivable that, if there is an agreement between Bouteflika and Tewfik to break up the DRS to prevent any intelligence chief after Tewfik from monopolising power, Tartag may, as a potential successor to Tewfik, have a motive for seeking to scupper the understanding between them and do whatever he can to prevent Bouteflika from securing another five years in power. But it is worth stressing that we have no confirmation from other sources at this stage that this is indeed what Tartag is trying to do, or even that he would be able to operate independently of the wishes of Tewfik, his immediate boss, and Bouteflika, to whom the DRS is in principle answerable. Nevertheless, as Algeria inches towards what seems certain to be a highly controversial presidential election and with news of a possible reorganisation of the security services beginning to seep out, rumours such as this are very much worth monitoring and testing against the known facts, as possible indicators of the way in which the new and increasingly complex game of Algerian power politics may play itself out.

Foreign Relations

In his report to the Security Council last November, the UN Secretary General's Personal Envoy Christopher Ross suggested, not uncontroversially, that progress towards a solution to the Western Sahara conflict depends on efforts to improve relations between Algeria and Morocco. Developments in Algeria, and a sudden and dramatic shift in relations between Morocco and the United States, suggest that no such improvement is to be expected in the short to medium term, at least.

As we have noted elsewhere^[6], sources at the Algerian Presidency are adamant that Algeria's long-held position of support for Sahrawi self-determination via a UN sponsored referendum will not change a jot as long as Bouteflika is President. Insofar as any real improvement in Moroccan-Algerian relations is, from Rabat's point of view, predicated on a shift in Algiers' stance on Western Sahara, this would seem to preclude any meaningful change in relations between the two neighbours while Bouteflika is in power – which may, it now seems, extend beyond 2014. Furthermore, the same sources report that there has been increasing chatter in Algiers political salons concerning the need for Algeria to adopt a new approach to relations with its neighbours, up to and including abandoning the cause of Sahrawi independence; this, it would seem, is seen in a very poor light by the President's entourage, which views such mutterings as the beginnings of movement against a fourth term for Bouteflika. In the short term, therefore, the Bouteflika camp has every interest in amplifying traditional points of discord between Algeria and Morocco in order to prevent the question of inter-Maghreb relations and normalisation with Rabat gaining any traction. Interior Minister Daho Ould Kablia has already set the tone, insisting when questioned by journalists and members of civil society bodies during a visit to Oran on April 12 that “the question of opening the border with Morocco is a highly political matter” that could not be settled quickly or easily.

Matters have been further complicated by Washington's unexpected shift on the question of including a human rights component in the mandate of MINURSO, contained in a draft UN Security Council resolution that the American delegation to the UN has circulated to the so-called Group of Friends of Western Sahara^[7]. Predictably enough, Rabat has reacted with knee-jerk outrage, apparently expecting France to provide the support to which it has become accustomed and use its veto to block the move. But it would appear that this will not be the case: France's UN Ambassador Gérard Araud told reporters on April 18 that his country was "ready to vote for the American text if it is put on the table." It cannot be ruled out that behind-the-scenes horse-trading might yet lead to the proposal being dropped before being put to the vote at the UNSC, but barring this the Security Council seems set to add human rights monitoring in MINURSO's remit when it votes on April 25.

Infuriated as it may be at Washington's diplomatic shift and Paris' unexpected defection, there is clearly a limit beyond which Rabat – which can scarcely afford to break off relations with the US or France – cannot go, and having already cancelled at short notice this year's African Lion war games with the US military in a histrionic fit of pique, it would seem that that limit is now fairly close. De-recognising and expelling MINURSO remains a theoretical option, but since this would amount to withdrawing from the UN 'Settlement Plan' which has served as a relatively effective cover for Morocco's 'facts on the ground' for almost a quarter century it does not appear the most likely. If MINURSO is allowed to stay on, with human rights monitoring as part of its mandate, it is possible that elements within the Moroccan security apparatus may be tempted to provide 'proof' that, for intelligence and security agencies, there is a pay-off between respect for human rights and efficiency, by deliberately turning a blind eye to cross-border smuggling of drugs and weapons, AQMI recruitment^[8], etc. The consequences for Algerian-Moroccan relations would clearly be anything but positive. Even without this, there is an obvious temptation for Moroccan politicians to lash out all the more strongly at Algeria (the real opposing party in the Western Sahara dispute according to the Moroccan doxa). Hamid Chabat, Secretary General of the Istiqlal Party, is already reported to have responded to the changes at the UN by reviving his party's historic position of laying claim to a large slice of western Algeria.

Meanwhile, Algiers – able for once to bask in the contrast between Rabat's sudden cancellation of the African Lion exercises and the signs of progress in its own military relationship with the US^[9] – has been quietly gloating at Rabat's discomfiture. As an unnamed Algerian diplomatic source, quoted by various Algerian electronic and print media^[10], puts it:

The anger and disappointment that prevail on the other side of the border are in direct proportion to the bitter diplomatic failure [that Rabat has suffered]. [...]

It has to be said that it is not so much the issue of monitoring of human rights that has provoked our neighbors' ire as the essential political issue of the Security Council deciding to demolish the fiction of so-called Moroccan sovereignty [...] by imposing third-party monitoring [...].

This is therefore a major political shift, to which must be added another, equally important element: if the Security Council does allow MINURSO to report regularly on the violence to which the Sahrawis in the occupied territories are systematically exposed, they will no longer hold back in denouncing the abuses and unfair trials they suffer, asserting openly their right to freedom of assembly and expression, and stating clearly their demand for independence.

So there is a real tectonic shift, which may shake up the situation on the ground and shake things up on the international level. That is what Rabat is afraid of, and it explains the confused, angry and sometimes violent reactions against Algeria.

The inappropriate, irresponsible and unacceptable language [...] is typical of this Pavlovian reflex that consists in putting Algeria automatically in the dock whenever the Saharawi cause makes any gains on the international scene. And yet, with a little serenity and insight, it is easy to see that the conditions that used to prevail regionally and internationally have evolved in a number ways, and that [...] a lasting solution can only be legitimate if it is based on a fair, multiple-choice referendum. After all, if you are going to shout yourself hoarse telling the world that the Sahrawis are "Moroccan subjects", why be so afraid of a referendum on self-determination?

Security

Overall, there has not been no significant rise in political violence since our last report. Jihadist activity remained at low levels in March, with only seven jihadist operations reported nationwide in the whole month (around the same level observed since the beginning of the year, and about half the long term average), but picked up in early April, with five jihadist operations reported in the first half of the month; Kabylia in particular saw its worst week this year in early April, perhaps reflecting the end of the tough weather conditions that impede guerilla activities in this mountainous region during the winter. Activity by the security forces meanwhile was down sharply, with seven operations reported in March (against 15 in February), and two in the first half of April.

There was however a rare incident in ALGIERS on March 16, in which a TV technician was stabbed to death by a "repentant jihadist" in the Bouzareah district. Unions and the media treated it as a "terrorist attack", but the assailant's motive for is not clear and it is at least as likely that the incident was simply another one of many cases of unplanned, individual violence between former members of the armed islamist groups and their neighbours and colleagues, which have plagued society since the "national reconciliation" laws were brought into force.

One other notable incident in the north of the country occurred on April 3, when one policeman was killed and another wounded in a terrorist ambush on the RN-8 highway near Mezrana, wilaya of Médéa. The policemen were scouting out the road to be taken by the wali of Médéa on a visit to Tablat, in the north of the wilaya, when they came under heavy machine gun fire from jihadists hiding in the hills overlooking the road. The incident was reported by the official news agency APS and relayed by the press as "an attack against the governor's escort", while press accounts said the attack took place "just a few minutes before the governor's car arrived at the spot". The incident is significant not only because it occurred in an area that has been largely free of violence for a number of years but because it seems to represent a return to the tactic of targeted assassinations that is all the more surprising in that it requires a level of planning and intelligence gathering that might have been assumed to be beyond the capabilities of AQMI's hard-pressed units in the north of the country.

No incidents were reported in OIL AND GAS PRODUCING AREAS, where the authorities claim to have considerably enhanced security measures, sending sending 5,000 additional soldiers to the south to patrol the oil and gas fields (El-Watan 22/03) and tightening security around the town of Hassi Messaoud and nearby oil facilities around the beginning of April (El-Khabar 01/04). Several checkpoints have been established in various parts of the town, stopping and checking vehicles and verifying whether occupants are actual residents of the area. In the last week of March, security forces are reported raided several "black spots" in Hassi Messaoud known to be lairs of drug dealers and criminals. Further, security forces have intensified patrols around oil facilities, with security staff in uniform and civilian clothing watching over around the clock. "Strict orders have been given" that expatriate workers should not move about without security escort – although this appears to be no more than the belated application of rules that have existed on paper for several years (and which apply, in principle, to the north as well as the south of the country).

The SOUTHERN BORDERS in general appeared relatively calm this past month, although this may still be due more to underreporting than to a real fall in jihadist and smuggling activity around Algeria's borders. There were some signs of the jihadist presence moving west, to the usually comparatively quiet areas between Algeria, Mali and Mauritania, instead of the eastern sector, which extends from the Libyan border to the town of Bordj Baji Mokhtar in the southeast of the wilaya of Adrar, where most border incidents are usually concentrated. Three incidents have been reported in the great south-west since January 2013, against just one in the whole of 2012. According to El-Khabar (01/04), security forces are understood to have clashed with and besieged a group of jihadists on March 25-26 north of Timimoun in the wilaya of Adrar; they are believed to have made their way there from Mauritania. The army command on March 31 launched a "major operation" to "comb through" the Grand Erg Occidental between the wilayas of Ouargla and Béchar all the way to Mauritanian border, to root out any jihadist presence in the area. The operation is supposed to be "completed before the summer," according to security sources quoted by El Khabar. On April 1, according to L'Expression (04/04), the Algerian army, acting on intelligence, intercepted two offroaders in the area near the border between Algeria, Mali and Mauritania and killed "at least nine" jihadists of various nationalities (from Libya, Niger, Burkina Faso and Mali) who are believed to have belonged to MUJAO. On April 13 Algerian security forces backed by helicopters tracked and destroyed two offroaders in an area around 190km from Bordj Baji Mokhtar, near the border with Mali, said

Wakt el-Djazair (14/04). All five jihadists on board, again believed to belong to MUJAO, were killed and three rocket propelled grenades, five machine guns and “a large stock of ammunition” were recovered.

Beyond Algeria's borders, the office of President François Hollande on March 23 officially confirmed the death of Abdelhamid Abou Zeid, emir of AQMI's Katiba Tarek Ibn Ziad, reportedly killed in late February (see previous report). The next day the Algerian press reported that “Jemal Oukacha, alias Yahya Abou El Hammam was named Abou Zeid's successor as the AQMI's emir for the Sahara region”. This is doubly incorrect, insofar as Abou Zeid was not “emir of AQMI in the Sahara” but merely commander of one AQMI's brigades in the region (albeit an important one), while Oukacha was already “emir of AQMI in the Sahara” as of September 2012^[11]. AQMI issued a statement on April 6 denying the “death of the emir of the Sahara” and his replacement by Oukacha, explaining that Oukacha became emir after his predecessor died in a car accident “months before the French aggression began”, and, for good measure, accusing the French president of “lying to the French people to boost his sagging popularity”. The Algerian press, followed by some foreign newspapers (e.g. Le Monde, 06/04), contrived to understand this to mean that AQMI was denying Abou Zeid's death, even though the statement did not mention him and was clearly not talking about him. Meanwhile, the death of Mokhtar Belmokhtar, announced by Chadian officials in early March, remains unconfirmed, notwithstanding Chadian President Idris Déby's insistence^[12].

Online, AQMI issued a statement on March 17 to “the Muslim youth in the Maghreb and especially Tunisia” urging them not to leave to take part in jihad in other countries unless “the leaders of jihad in your area, judging the move to be in the interest of Islam, authorise you to go”. Thus “we implore the young Muslims of Tunisia to stay in their land and not leave it in the hands of the enemies Islam”. Those who must leave:

would do better to join the jihad in the Islamic Maghreb, where your brethren in northern Mali are struggling in the face of the French Crusade, or in northern Algeria, where the need for men and materiel is pressing, after two decades of war against the infidels. France, with its allies in the region, is working hard to empty the Maghreb of its jihadist energy, not because they care about other fronts, but in order to cut the supply of fighters on the front to which it has sent its troops.

Although the statement did not mention it openly, the allusion to Syria is clear. AQMI is trying to persuade would-be jihadists in Tunisia and North Africa to join its ranks instead of leaving to fight in Syria – a rare if not unheard of admission of weakness.

In a separate statement, sent to Mauritanian news agency ANI on March 22, AQMI stated its support for the protests in Algeria's southern wilayas, which it termed the “Intifada of the South”, and called for more demonstrations against the regime. After listing a litany of “crimes of the Algerian regime” — ranging from “corruption” to the “forced deportation of three million people, a tenth of the Algerian population” — the jihadist organisation described the demonstrations in the south as “a legitimate response to the policy of marginalisation” that has long afflicted the southern provinces and called on the “young men of the South” to “unify their demands and their command”. Tahar Belabès, spokesman of the National Committee for the Defence of the Rights of the Unemployed (CNDDC), which has been organising the protests in the south, promptly and categorically rejected AQMI's support in a statement to the media, in which he stressed that the movement “is peaceful and hates violence” and condemns “all attempts to manipulate or interpret” it. There have been no indications that AQMI's statement has gained any traction whatsoever with rank and file protesters either.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
 President and CEO
 The Gabriel Company, LLC
 1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
 Washington DC, 20005
 Phone: +1 202.887.1113
 Fax: +1 202.887.1115
 Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
 Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

- [1] It is difficult to see, however, how a limitation on the number of successive terms of office that would nonetheless permit Bouteflika to stand for a fourth time could have any worthwhile meaning – unless a mechanism is found whereby the amendments do not come into effect until after the 2014 presidential election.
- [2] This is not strictly speaking necessary, insofar as the existing constitution, although it does stipulate that the President is “responsible for national defence”, at no point states that the position of Defence Minister is held exclusively by the President of the Republic. The position of Defence Minister exists and, indeed, has been held in the past by individuals other than the President. The inclusion in the constitution of a clause explicitly prohibiting the President from holding the defence portfolio, on the other hand, would represent a potentially significant change in the balance of powers.
- [3] On this particular point, TSA adds, “our sources provided no further details”.
- [4] The 'classic' division would be into one domestic and one foreign intelligence agency, but this would be to overlook the real extent of the DRS' remit, which goes way beyond intelligence gathering, notably on the domestic scene. Among the other options would be to split off the Direction Centrale de la Sécurité de l'Armée, possibly placing it directly under the authority of the Defence Ministry.
- [5] See AMSR #121
- [6] See WSSR 11/04/13
- [7] Besides the United States, this includes France, Spain, Britain and Russia.
- [8] In mid-April, the Moroccan Interior Ministry issued a statement indicating that the police and the DST (domestic intelligence agency) had succeeded in identifying and dismantling a six-man cell in Fès that had been actively recruiting Moroccan volunteers with the aim of sending them to join AQMI in Algeria.
- [9] On March 24, US AFRICOM commander Gen. Carter Ham flew to Tamanrasset to visit the Joint Operational Staff Committee (CEMOC), a structure, based at the headquarters of the Sixth Military Region of the Algerian armed forces, that was established at Algeria's initiative in 2009 to bring together representatives of the militaries of Mali, Niger, Mauritania and Algeria itself and provide a framework for cooperation between them in the Sahara-Sahel region.
- [10] Algerie1.com, Tout Sur l'Algérie, L'Expression...
- [11] See AMSR #118 of October 17, 2012
- [12] Déby told French newspapers on April 15 that Belmokhtar “blew himself up as Chadian forces surrounded him” and “we could not take pictures of him”.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, April 27, 2013 11:24 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Blog Monitoring April Week 4

Subject: Blog Monitoring April Week 4

Blog Name	Article Title/Date	Summary	Comment
All Africa	Angola: Diplomat Stresses Angola's Role in Africa April 19, 2013	The ambassador of Morocco to Angola, Sidati El Ghallaoui Friday in Luanda highlighted the country's role in Africa, taking into account its experience in peace-building process. According to El Ghallaoui, Angola should be perceived as a model for the rest of the region, as it has attained high levels of development. Angola and Morocco cooperate in various fields especially in education, fisheries, agriculture and rural development. El Ghalloui concludes that both countries are working together for the creation of a Joint Commission that will strengthen the already established bilateral relationship.	0
All Africa	Morocco: Gabonese President Arrives in Nation April 22, 2013	President of the Gabonese Republic, Haj Ali Bongo Ondimba and his wife Sylvia Bongo, arrived Monday evening in Fez for a visit to the kingdom during which he will participate in the 6th agriculture conference and will attend the opening of the 8th Moroccan international agriculture fair (SIAM) in Meknes, which will be chaired by HM King Mohammed VI on April 23-24.	0
All Africa	Morocco Awards Ambassador Ousman Badjie April 23, 2013	Gambia's ambassador to France, Ousman Badjie, was awarded the Great Ribbon of the Alawite Wissam last week by Morocco's ambassador to France, Chakib Benmoussa, in recognition of the important role he played in fostering closer ties between Morocco and Gambia. This award is part of the Kingdom's recent policy of cementing and expanding partnership with Sub-Saharan Africa. In recent weeks, King Mohammed VI has made a number of state visits to neighboring West African countries.	0
Business Recorder	France to negotiate UN text on Western Sahara April 20, 2013	France signalled that it would push to modify the US proposal to MINURSO before casting its vote. French Foreign Ministry spokesman Philippe Lalliot told reporters "we are not at the stage today to say whether we will vote for or against it." Although previously vetoing resolutions on the issue; on Thursday France declared that it would unlikely veto the American draft.	0
Magharebia	Maghreb states discuss judicial co-operation April 23, 2013	Judges from Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Mauritania and Libya are advocating increased integration and legal reform throughout the Maghreb region. They discussed the economic and social advantages to judicial integration at the Arab Maghreb Union judiciary committee session in Nouakchott, Mauritania. The gathering was a step on the road to closer judicial co-operation between Maghreb countries, especially in the field of standardisation of laws governing cross-border crime.	0
Magharebia	Maghreb interior ministers devise common	Last week, interior ministers from Arab Maghreb Union countries met in Rabat and adopted a draft security strategy. The Rabat Declaration, approved at the April 21st meeting, highlighted the	0

	strategy April 25, 2013	"desire for consultation and coordination expressed by the member states, especially in the fields of security and counterterrorism", Moroccan Interior Minister Mohand Laenser said. The declaration states that "[Terrorism] needs to be tackled jointly, through on-going coordination. This is because Maghreb countries are neighbours and belong to the same regional area, and face common challenges and threats." They also discussed the importance of addressing such issues as funding for terrorist groups, the recruitment of religious extremists, and cross-border drug trafficking.
Magharebia	Morocco. Mauritania ink 17 accords April 25, 2013	Morocco and Mauritania concluded their 7th joint commission session Wednesday (April 24th) in Nouakchott with the signing of 17 new cooperation accords, which spelled out plans for partnership in the fields of transportation, education, scientific research, energy, housing, and sanitation, among others. In his opening address to the session, Mauritanian Prime Minister Moulaye Ould Mohamed Laghdaf called on Moroccan business leaders to invest in his country's fishing, mining and agriculture sectors.	0
Free Thought Blog	المجتمع المدني يرفض توسيع صلاحيات المينورسو بالصحراء المغربية Civil society refuses the expansion of MINURSO privileges in Western Sahara April 21, 2013	Protesters from several civil society organizations rallied outside the parliament building in Rabat on Sunday in protest of the US proposal to add human rights monitoring to the MINURSO mandate, because they consider this move to be a violation of Morocco's national sovereignty. The protest was supposed to be in front of the US embassy, but one of the organizers thereof stated that they were prevented from protesting outside of the embassy because of a meeting between the US ambassador and the Moroccan foreign ministry. Translated from Arabic	2
Middle East Online	Gulf-Moroccan Forum in Tangier seeks to stimulate bilateral investment April 21, 2013	The third Gulf-Moroccan Investment Forum will be held from May 6 to 8 in Tangier, Morocco. Over 400 Gulf and Moroccan businessmen are expected to participate in this three-day event to discuss the increase of bilateral investment opportunities and to study joint ventures. Forum chairman Mohamed Ait Bouselham highlights the promising investment opportunities in Tangier as it has become " an important economic hub in North Africa attracting big European and US companies."	0
AFP	Morocco border issue could be resolved soon: Algeria April 21, 2013	Algerian Interior Minister Dahou Ould Kablia urges the reopening of the Moroccan-Algerian border. Kablia praised his Moroccan counterpart Mohand Laenser, who visited Algiers earlier this month, for creating an environment conducive to the process. President Hollande has also pressured both countries into reopening the border to boost trade and cooperation. In light of the recent US proposal to expand MINURSO, Morocco has labeled the Polisario Front as a terrorist organization. Kablia was asked how long Algeria was going to support the Polisario Front. He avoided the question, merely stating that Algiers was "not a party to the conflict."	0
Morocco World News	US proposal on MINURSO is not accepted by two members:	The Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, José Manuel García-Margallo expressed his displeasure at the US proposal to expand MINURSO's mandate and stated that he expected to see a revised resolution to re-authorize MINURSO	0

	Spanish FM April 21, 2013	from the US. He pointed out that two members, France and Spain, of the Group of Friends of the Sahara opposed this resolution, and for that reason it should be changed. The other members of the Group of Friends of the Sahara are the US, the UK, and Russia.
Yabiladi	Sahara : John Kerry accuse le Maroc de violations des droits de l'Homme [Rapport] Sahara: John Kerry accuses Morocco of human rights violations April 21, 2013	This article is simply commenting on the ironic timing of the US Department of State report on human rights. Coming out days after the US proposed to add human rights monitoring to the MINURSO mandate, the report accuses Morocco, along with several other countries, of violating human rights. It specifically refers to abuse in the prison in Laayoune. The article states that the report largely echoes the report of Juan Mendez, UN special rapporteur on torture, then makes vague connections between Kerry and the RFK Center (which recently released an excoriating report on human rights in Western Sahara), because Kerry is married to a Kennedy. Translated from French	24
Yabiladi	Maroc : Lancement des travaux pour l'autoroute El Jadida-Safi qui sera ouverte en 2015 Morocco: Launching of construction for the El Jadida-Safi highway which will be opened in 2015 April 22, 2013	HM King Mohammed VI presided over a ceremony this Sunday beginning construction on a 4.8bil dhs highway between El Jadida and Safi. This highway will greatly decrease the time it takes to travel between the two cities and will hopefully increase travelers' security. It should be finished by 2015. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	L'Algérie arrête un militant amazigh marocain à Tizi-Ouzou Algeria arrests a Moroccan Amazigh militant in Tizi-Ouzou April 22, 2013	Khalid Zirari, vice president of the World Amazigh Congress, was arrested in Algeria over the weekend for participating in a protest for Kabyle autonomy in Tizi-Ouzou, the capital of Kabylie. Officially, he was arrested for participating in a non-authorized march organized by a separatist movement. He was supposed to be deported to Morocco and barred from re-entering Algeria, but as of this article's publication (24 hours after he was arrested), no one had heard from him and Yabiladi was unable to make telephone contact with him. Translated from French	13
Yabiladi	Sahara/Maroc : La vidéo qui accable la Minurso	A recent video released portrayed two UN soldiers, one Egyptian and the other Argentinean having a political discussion with members of the Polisario Front. The Egyptian soldier stated that "this land is yours and nobody can take it and you have to use the conditions of each situation with a new approach. For each	16

	Sahara/Morocco: The video that overwhelms MINURSO April 23, 2013	situation weigh the pros and cons and act accordingly. This is your chance for you to be visible to the world so that you can reclaim your rights". A petition has been launched demanding the expulsion of the Egyptian UN soldier. Mohamed Taleb, a community actor in Laayoune calls for the resignation of the head of MINURSO, the German Wolfgang Weisbrod-Weber due to his hostile position towards Morocco. With the release of the video, Morocco challenges MINURSO's neutrality. Translated from French
Yabiladi	La question du Sahara bloque l'accord de pêche entre le Maroc et l'UE Sahara issue halts fishery agreements between Morocco and the EU April 23, 2013	European Commissioner for Maritime Affairs and Fisheries, Maria Damanaki raised the issue of human rights in the Sahara in February during the fifth round of negotiations, after receiving a letter from the "minister" of the Polisario representative for Europe. The letter called for "the suspension of negotiations due to the persistent human right violations Sahrawis face as well as the illegal plundering of Western Sahara's natural resources." Without guaranteeing human rights of Sahrawis, Damanaki states that fishery agreements will not be negotiated. Due to this, a date has yet to be set for the sixth and hopefully final round of negotiations. Translated from French	4
Yabiladi	Espagne : Un réseau qui transportait de la drogue depuis le Maroc en autogire démantelé Spain: A network that transported drugs from Morocco by gyroplane dismantled April 24, 2013	The Spanish Guardia Civil has dismantled a drug trafficking network that was carrying hashish from Morocco to Spain. The investigation began in December, when the Guardia Civil intercepted a gyroplane carrying the drugs into the country. From there they were able to arrest three members of the organization, which led to their discovery of money and drug stashes, along with computers containing information on the rest of the network's business. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	African Lion : Le Maroc revient sur sa décision d'annulation, mais les Etats-Unis n'acceptent qu'en partie African Lion: Morocco reverses its decision to cancel, but the US only accepts it in part	After the US abandoned its proposal to add human rights monitoring to the MINURSO mandate, Morocco has asked the US military to return and resume its annual African Lion joint military exercises. However, the US military responded that it would only be able to do some of the exercises, because the forces that had been in Morocco for the war games have been redeployed. African Lion will be able to resume in full next year. Translated from French	6

	April 25, 2013
Yabiladi	Les Marocains souhaitent que l'Union européenne joue "un rôle plus important au Maroc" [Etude] Moroccans want the EU to play "a more important role in Morocco" [Study] April 25, 2013	A survey, funded by the EU, conducted between November and December 2012 questioned a thousand Moroccans on their perception of the EU. Results are as follows: 77% believe that the EU is a key partner for the kingdom, 75% also believe that the the EU contributes "a lot" to the development of the kingdom. 58% of respondents said that the EU has supported local populations during the Arab Spring and 68% think that the EU has brought peace and stability to the region, unlike the rest of the region where these figures are 40% , 32% and 37% respectively. The survey also indicates that 72% of Moroccans trust the EU, more than any other international institutions such as the Arab League (51%) and the UN (46%); more than their parliament (38%) and political parties (29%) but as much as their government (73%). Lastly, 83% believe that the EU should play a stronger role in Morocco. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Sahara : Manifestation des pro-Polisario à Laâyoune et Boujdour Sahara: Pro-Polisario demonstration in Laayoune and Boujdour April 26, 2013	Immediately after the adoption by the Security Council of Resolution 2099, around 30 to 40 pro-polisario individuals took over the streets and protested demanding the right to self-determination of Sahrawis and denounced the absence of an independent human rights monitoring. There was also a sit in in the UNHCR office in Laayoune. Police did not intervene in either event. Translated from French	1
Mamfakinch	كلمة المؤتمر الوطني العاشر للجمعية المغربية لحقوق الإنسان إلى مامفاكينش Words of the 10th national meeting of the Moroccan Conference on Human Rights to Mamfakinch April 23, 2013	The Moroccan Conference on Human rights convened its 10th annual national meeting on April 19-21 and asked Mamfakinch to follow it as a partner organization. Mamfakinch has already partnered with the Conference in several areas, including immigrant rights, political prisoners, and monitoring human rights violations. Mamfakinch will continue to publish reports on the proceedings of the conference. Translated from Arabic	0
RTT News	Morocco, EU Begin Negotiations for Closer Trade Ties April 23, 2013	The European Union and Morocco have begun first round of negotiations for finalizing Deep and Comprehensive Free Trade Area (DCFTA) agreement. The agreement is expected to deepen existing trade relations in a host of areas not yet covered, such as services and public procurement, as well as to bring better protection for investments and new commitments on competition and intellectual property rights. The DCFTA will be an important step towards gradually integrating the Moroccan economy into the	0

		EU single market, removing obstacles to trade both at the border and behind the border.
Reuters	Compromise seen on Western Sahara allowing U.N. mission extension April 23, 2013	Three Western diplomats said Washington has withdrawn its proposition after the resolution was reviewed by a group of countries including the United States, France, Spain, Britain and Russia. French Foreign Ministry spokesman Philippe Lalliot told reporters that "there will be a resolution very soon for a new mandate of the MINURSO. We are close to a solution that will satisfy everybody." He declined to comment on the details of the resolution, which was due to be voted on April 25. A U.N. Security Council diplomat said that the draft resolution contained more human rights language than previous years, describing it as a "step forward." However, according to Omar Mansour, a member of the Polisario's National Secretariat decision-making body, such compromise is a big mistake and embarrassment for the Sahrawis that could lead to the young generation turning to violence.	0
Bloomberg	Morocco Says Working on Laws to Protect Women. Enhance Equality April 23, 2013	In an interview in London with government spokesman Mustapha Khalfi that in the next two to three months Morocco will amend Penal Code 475 to criminalize violence against women and stop rapists from marrying victims to escape prosecution. Last February, according to Khalfi, the government set up 162 million dirham Family Solidarity Fund for divorced women who, for whatever reason, cannot receive alimony payments. He concludes that last year the government allocated 65 millions dhs for 223 civil society projects to help improve the lives of women nationwide, especially in rural areas and the sum is projected to increase this year.	0
Arab News	Morocco to sign $ 2.4 bn IDB loan deal April 24, 2013	Morocco expects to sign a $ 2.4 billion loan deal next month with the Islamic Development Bank (IDB). Under this agreement, Morocco will receive $600 million each year from 2013 to 2016, most of which is a loan but some of which will be a direct donation. The country furthermore hopes to raise $1.5bil this year by selling its first sukuk. The Moroccan parliament approved legislation allowing the government and companies to issue sukuk last January. Morocco's budget deficit is currently 22.9bil dhs, though the rate of economic growth has increased over the past year to 4.8% and is expected to reach 5.5% next year.
The Daily Star Lebanon	Morocco opposition Islamists warn of 'explosion' April 24, 2013	Fathallah Aarsalane, spokesman for the Justice and Charity Party, told AFP in an interview that the party hopes to become a part of Moroccan politics. He disparaged the PJD-led governing coalition, alleging that it is toothless and that the country is instead ruled by a "shadow government" controlled by King Mohamed VI. He then slammed the authorities for failing to improve living conditions in the North African country which is grappling with widespread poverty and high youth unemployment. He claimed that unless the government tackles the social and economic injustices faced by a large percentage of the country, especially the country's youth population, Morocco will likely experience an "explosion" of youth protests, which could take the form of anti-regime protests similar to those in Tunisia and Egypt.	0
CNN	Spain arrests 2 men suspected of al Qaeda group links	Spanish police have arrested two men suspected of being connected to Al Qaeda. The two men were Nou Mediouni, 23, from Algeria and Hassan El Jaouani, 52, from Morocco. Both men were unemployed and living in Spain at the time. They had been under surveillance for the past year as part of an operation that Spanish police carried out in cooperation with their counterparts	298

	April 24, 2013	in France and Morocco. The two were both recruited to AQIM through Mali-based militants, and El Jaaouani was allegedly involved in recruiting for the terrorist group in Spain.
Morocco Board TV	Morocco: Assid speaks against religious extremism in school text books April 24, 2013	The activist and researcher for Morocco's Amazigh Cultural Institute (IRCAM), Ahmed Assid, spoke on Islam and education in Morocco, at a seminar organized by the Moroccan Association of Human Rights (AMDH) in Rabat. According to him, religious education in Morocco " is now outdated, and teaches religious values that contradict universal human rights values". He added that textbooks convey a "terroristic" Islam and that religious education emphasizes "spreading Islam by the sword". Assid concludes the three minute video by stating that religious belief is a free choice and that nobody should be intimidated/threatened to follow their belief. Salafist preacher Hassan El Kattani called for not " letting these remarks pass without reaction" and filed a complaint against Assid for undermining Islam.	1
The View from Fez	Fez residents report earthquakes April 25, 2013	Fez experienced two earthquakes early in the morning of April 25. The first, at 5:29, registered a 4 on the Richter scale, and the second, at 5:42, registered a 3.8. The earthquakes caused buildings to sway and people to leave their homes, but did not cause significant damage or casualties.	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, April 30, 2013 4:29 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS situation report

Based upon public and private reports, that are usually judged accurate, although the information contained herein have not been corroborated by third party sources.

A member of Polisario's National Secretariat describes UNSC Resolution 2099 as a “turning point in the Western Sahara conflict”. The resolution, which in the end did not provide for extending MINURSO's mandate to cover human rights monitoring, leaves the door open for other UN institutions to take up this matter. It is therefore important for the Saharawis to prove to the entire world that respect for human rights is an essential element in their struggle for independence. They must now show the world that the right to self-determination is the most primary of human rights. The demonstrations that took place in Laayoune, Smara and elsewhere in the territories under Moroccan control show that the Saharawis are exercising their right to demand independence; the response of the Moroccan occupiers was repression, leaving over 50 wounded. There is a new element, too: for the first time, the Moroccan occupiers have begun demolishing the homes of Saharawi activists. The Polisario Front will soon launch an international campaign for the protection of the Saharawi population in the territories held by Morocco. The Saharawis will celebrate the 40th anniversary of the founding of the Polisario Front [on May 10] by calling for human rights to be respected in Western Sahara. Human rights organisations from all over the world will be coming to the refugee camps and the occupied territories to demand that human rights are respected and to condemn the repression meted out by the Moroccan occupiers. The international conference on the right of peoples to self-determination held in Algeria on Saturday, April 27 provided the occasion for Polisario to launch this campaign.

A leading member of a Saharawi NGO, who is based in Algiers, says that none of Polisario's leaders, when commenting on UNSC resolution 2099, so much as mentioned the possibility of resuming direct talks with Morocco [the subject of articles 4 & 5 of the resolution]. The dominant discourse within Polisario, following this resolution, is focussed on mobilising international pressure for the respect of human rights in the Sahara and, by extension, for the Saharawis' right to self-determination. That the Americans came out in favour of human rights monitoring showed that the efforts of Polisario and its friends do have a positive effect, even if Washington's subsequent U-turn has left a bitter taste in the Saharawis' mouths. The Algerians did not appreciate this American reversal either, seeing it as a sign of weakness in their support for the Saharawis. That is why several Algerian political leaders have loudly restated their support for the Saharawi cause. One of the collateral effects of the American U-turn is that there can no longer be any speculation about the possible re-opening of the Algerian-Moroccan border. The Algerians are no longer prepared to consider re-opening the border without some perspective of a solution to the Sahara conflict.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, May 04, 2013 1:31 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Blog Monitoring May Week 1

Subject: Blog Monitoring May Week 1

Blog Name	Article Title/ Date	Summary	Comments
All Africa	Morocco: UN 'Miss Opportunity' to Allow Western Sahara Human Rights Monitoring April 25, 2013	Amnesty International described the MINURSO re-authorization as a “missed opportunity” in the fight to protect human rights in the region. AI’s Middle East and North Africa Director, Philip Luther said, “The Security Council has failed the people of Western Sahara and the Tindouf refugee camps by missing a unique opportunity to subject persistent human rights concerns.” Luther further stated that, given that the Moroccan government has claimed dedication to improving the state of human rights in Western Sahara and its accusations that human rights organizations do not pay enough attention to conditions in the Tindouf refugee camp, he would have expected the Moroccan government to be more amenable to adding human rights monitoring to MINURSO. However, he did note that the resolution acknowledges the need for improving human rights in Western Sahara and the Tindouf camps. MINURSO is one of the few peacekeeping missions without a human rights monitoring mandate.	0
All Africa	Morocco: Saharawi Representative Kamal Fadel Gives Talk On Western Sahara At Sydney University	Kamal Fadel, Polisario representative to Australia, gave a lecture at the Centre for Peace and Conflict Studies (CPACS) at the University of Sydney about human rights and self-determination in Western Sahara. He underlined what the Polisario sees as “the UN’s clear position towards Western Sahara” as well as the UN’s promise to organize an independent referendum for the territory and the fact the MINURSO is the only UN peacekeeping mission without the capability to monitor human rights. He concluded by stressing that for the United	0

		Nations, Western Sahara remains a colonial case to which the UN doctrine and practice relating to decolonization must be applicable.
All Africa	Gambia: Moroccan, Lebanese Investors Meet Veep April 30, 2013	Investors from SGI Group based in Morocco and Lebanon Monday called on the Gambian vice president and minister of Women's Affairs, Her Excellency Aja Dr Isatou Njie-Saidy. The three-man delegation was accompanied to State House by Gambia's ambassador to Morocco, Lamin Kabba Bajo. These investors are in the country to meet business stakeholders in the country. SGI Group is an international holding group specialized in consultancy and engineering for mega projects such as water treatment plants, waste water management, drainage, bridges, huge buildings, hotels and hospitals among a host of others.	0
Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights	U.N. Renews Peace-Keeping Mission in W. Sahara Without a Human Rights Monitoring Component April 26, 2013	Kerry Kennedy expressed his profound concern for the decision of the United Nations Security Council to renew the MINURSO mandate without a human rights component. The RFK Center calls upon the Security Council to allow Special Rapporteurs monthly visits to Western Sahara listing specific individuals. They also urge the Groups of Friends to continue to discuss the incorporation of a human rights mandate. Santiago A. Canton, Director of RFK Partners for Human Rights concludes that "It is inconceivable that some countries prefer to close their eyes and allow human rights violations to continue. However, even if the Security Council considers a permanent mechanism unnecessary, they can still have more effective supervision under the current Resolution, by facilitating more UN presence in the region".	0
Yabiladi	Caisse de compensation au Maroc : Benkirane veut conditionner l'aide monétaire directe Compensation	One of the pillars of strategy for the compensation fund is to create direct monetary aid to the needy; specifically for their children's education and medical care. In order to do so, the state will encourage these individuals to engage in literacy programs as well as participate in income-generating activities financed by the Solidarity Fund. Another pillar is to establish	0

	Fund in Morocco: Benkirane wants to condition for direct cash assistance April 26, 2013	a system of protection against the fluctuation of oil prices. Meaning, that if oil prices rise beyond the threshold set by the government, the surplus is automatically passed on to the consumer. The Compensation Fund advises the government to raise the price of commodities, while providing direct aid to poor. Such a vision, if implemented in July, does not conform with the IMF's recommendations. Translated from French
Yabiladi	Maroc/Etats-Unis : Une délégation marocaine s'est réunie avec le chef du Conseil National de Sécurité Morocco/US: A Moroccan delegation meets with the Head of National Security Council April 28, 2013	On Friday, after the passing of Resolution 2099; Taieb Fassi Fihri, the king's counselor, Yassine Mansouri, Chief DGED, Youssef Amrani, No. 2 in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and Rashad Bouhlal, Ambassador of the Kingdom in Washington, met with Tom Donilon, the head of the National Security Council. The talks were mainly worn on the widening and deepening of the strategic relationship between the two friendly countries. This marks the first contact after the MINURSO ordeal. Translated from French	4
Yabiladi	Réouverture des frontières maroco-algériennes : les trois conditions d'Alger Reopening the Moroccan-Algerian border: Algiers' three conditions April 28, 2013	An anonymous "senior official" from the TSA party stated that Rabat has to meet three Algerian terms before reopening the border. It is indicative that Amr Belani, spokesman of Foreign Affairs is the anonymous TSA official. The three terms are as follows: ending the smear campaign and aggressive stance vis a vie Algeria, cooperating to end drug trafficking and of course recognize Algeria's stance on Western Sahara and allow the UN to assume its responsibilities. Belani concludes that "any approach that moves away or upset these three parameters will only needlessly pollute the atmosphere, making it a problematic environment. We want full normalization of our relations with our neighboring country as well as boost regional integration. "	27

		Translated from French
Yabiladi	Maroc : L'exclusion d'élèves voilées d'une école privée à Tanger fait le buzz... « pour rien » Morocco: Veiled students are suspended from a private school in Tangier creating a media buzz... "for nothing" April 29, 2013	Last week, four students of Ibn Sina Institute of Tangier arrived at school wearing a long veil covering their torso and arms. However, Moroccan school code states that the veil cannot cover a student's uniform; thus the four girls were ordered to go back home for violating the dress code. The case was picked up by the media; where the girls stated that they were proud to be Salafists and are free to wear what they pleased. They did not attend school for six days. Director Mansouri clarified that these students were not excluded and that the veil is not forbidden; they were sent home because they were not abiding by uniform protocol. He added "once they had agreed to wear their uniform properly, they were readmitted". To avoid attracting press attention, the four students will not face the disciplinary board; unpunished actions are a cause of concern as they can push other students to also disobey the rules. Translated from French	1
Yabiladi	Maroc : Le roi d'Espagne en visite officielle cet été Morocco: The King of Spain on an official visit this summer April 29, 2013	King Juan Carlos of Spain will be making an official state visit to Morocco over the summer. He had originally planned to visit Morocco in March, but hernia surgery forced him to postpone the visit. This state visit is especially important for the two countries because Spain is in dire financial straits, and Morocco is Spain's second largest market, after the European Union. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Affaire Nahari/Laghzioui : le prêcheur 2.0 est acquitté Nahari/Laghzioui case: The preacher 2.0 is acquitted	Abdellah Nahari has been acquitted of incitement to murder, of which he was indicted for a June 2012 Youtube video in which he issued a fatwa calling for the death of Mokhtar Laghzioui for "misrepresentation of Islam and encouraging vice." Laghzioui had, in a television interview, supported the call of the Moroccan Association for Human Rights for the parliament to strike down article	0

	April 30, 2013	s490 of the penal code, which criminalizes sex outside of marriage. Laghzioui's employer, leftist newspaper Al Ahdath Al Maghribia, decided to press charges against Nahari last summer, and since then secular, leftist, and human rights groups have rallied around Laghzioui. Nahari, too, has gained a following of supporters, who claim that he is a victim of the authorities. Translated from French
Yabiladi	Maroc : La France rappelle le droit de manifester au Sahara occidental Morocco: France reaffirms the right to protest in Western Sahara April 30, 2013	French foreign minister Philippe Lalliot has called upon Morocco to respect the Sahrawis' right to peaceful protest in the wake of police crackdowns on recent protests in Laayoune. The protests began after the MINURSO reauthorization resolution passed without human rights monitoring. Yabiladi considers this call to be a threat and has accused France of taking a new stance on Western Sahara and abandoning its ally Morocco. Translated from French	10
Yabiladi	Italie : Une cellule terroriste comprenant des Marocains démantelée Italy: A terrorist cell dismantled containing Moroccans April 30, 2013	A terrorist cell responsible for recruiting people to join the jihad was discovered in the region of Apulia, Italy. The group had contacts worldwide, with bases at Bari and several branches in Lombardy and Sicily; where six arrests were conducted today. The arrested were Moroccans and Tunisians who are accused of international terrorism and incitement to racial hatred. Their movements were monitored; portraying frequented phone shops and cafes that distributed films praising suicidal attacks and urging anti-Semitism. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Le PJD insiste sur l'interdiction de la chicha The PJD insists on the on prohibition of shisha	Minister of the Interior, Mohand Laensar stated that with the instated shisa controls, 3,305 people were arrested in 2012 compared to the 667 in 2009; adding that 1200 hookahs were confiscated and many cafe owners licences were revoked. However, this is not enough in the eyes of Benkirane who wants to further the	2

	April 30, 2013	initiative by banning public consumption of shisha. In his eyes, the law is of utmost urgency as shisha has a very negative impact on health, citing that the pipe contains 4,000 toxins. Translated from French
Yabiladi	Le Conseil des oulémas s'oppose aux femmes imams The Ulema Council opposes female imams April 30, 2013	The Ulama Supreme Council believes in the religious ban on Muslim women to become imams. To back their opinion, the religious body called on the Hadith attributed to the Prophet Mohamed from Sahih Al-Bukhari's book: "Never will succeed a people who entrusts his affairs to a woman". However citings by al-Bayhaq (994-1066) about Aisha prove otherwise: "Even Aisha, widow of the Prophet led the prayer with women having them sit in the same row as her". Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Liberté de conscience au Maroc : Le ministre des Affaires islamiques prend ses distances avec les oulémas Freedom of conscience in Morocco: The Minister of Islamic Affairs distances himself from the Supreme Council of the Ulama May 2, 2013	Two weeks after the Ulama Supreme Council issued a fatwa calling for apostates to be put to death, the Minister of Islamic Affairs has stated that this was not actually a fatwa, but instead was a simple "opinion." He went on to say that it is important to remember that Morocco follows the rule of law, and not the opinion of religious leaders, alluding to the lack of penalties against apostasy in the penal code. While he distanced himself from the opinions of the Ulama, he defended the rights of religious leaders to express such opinions, after several imams expressed in their sermons extreme opposition to the secularist Amazigh activist Ahmed Assid. Translated from French	8
Yabiladi	Le taux de chômage en recul pour le premier trimestre 2013 Decline in	The unemployment rate fell by 0.5 percentage points this quarter partly due to creation of 99,000 jobs in the service sector. However, fisheries and construction industry have seen record losses; respectively 100,000 and 56,000.	2

	unemployment in the first quarter of 2013 May 3, 2013	Translated from French
ABC News	Clashes Erupt in Western Sahara After UN Vote April 27, 2013	Conflicting reports emerged Saturday about clashes late Friday in the northern town of Laayoune. Hamoud Iguilid of the Moroccan Association of Human Rights said dozens chanted their hopes for rights monitors and protested peacefully. He said a young man who was hurt and a woman who lost a finger were among those injured.	0
Kuwait News Agency	OCCI to take part in 3rd GCC-Morocco Investment Forum April 27, 2013	The Oman Chamber of Commerce and Industry (OCCI) announced on Saturday that it will participate in the forthcoming Moroccan-GCC investment forum, to be held in Tangier between May 6 and 8. This event is important for businesses from GCC countries hoping to invest in Morocco; the strengthening of relations between Morocco and the GCC over the past few years has greatly expanded GCC direct investment in the country.	0
Washington Post	Morocco's Islamist prime minister warns criticism of Prophet Muhammad 'not acceptable' April 28, 2013	Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane took a not-so-veiled swipe at secular activist Ahmed Assid at a party rally late Saturday in Rabat when he stated that it is unacceptable to criticize the Prophet Muhammad. Assid has drawn fire for saying a Moroccan school textbook has implied that Islam could be imposed by force. At least one Salafist leader retorted that Assid was trying to paint Muhammad as a terrorist — a claim Assid denies — and called Assid an “unbeliever,” which could be seen as an incitement to violence.	8
Al-Arabiya	Morocco fair promotes self-sufficient agriculture in effort to cut imports April 28, 2013	For the eighth year in a row, the central Moroccan city of Meknes hosted its annual agriculture event, attracting over 1,000 exhibitors from around the world. This year's International Agriculture Fair focused on food security and self-sufficiency. Currently in Morocco, agriculture - some of it in the form of rudimentary and subsistence farming, and highly vulnerable to the vagaries of rainfall - employs about	0

		40 percent of the workforce of over 11 million people. Five years ago Morocco inaugurated its "Green Plan" which set out to develop the agriculture and food production sectors in the country in order to improve food quality and the livelihoods of those who grow it, as well as reduce Morocco's dependency on foreign crops. According to the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, the sector has developed rapidly over the past few years, as the Green Plan has led to huge investment and an increase in the amount of cultivable land. The Green Plan is set to run until 2018 at a cost of one billion dhs a year.
DVIDS	Artillerymen help make convey a success during Exercise African Lion 13 April 29, 2013	Marines successfully transported all their personnel and equipment from Cap Draa to Agadir, Morocco on April 20th. The joint task force consisting of U.S. Marines, soldiers, sailors and airmen were able to conduct modified joint training for Exercise African Lion 13; demonstrating their ability to adapt to unpredicted circumstances, restore mission essential tasks, build interoperability and create friendships during the remaining days of the evolution. The logistics component will continue to exercise vigilant, safe and rapid retrograde of almost 1,200 personnel and 250 short-tons of vehicles and equipment.	0
Bikya News	Morocco women battle against domestic abuse May 1, 2013	This article is about the continuing problem of domestic violence in Morocco and some of the ways that Moroccans are trying to counter it. One of these solutions on the grassroots level is the establishment of safe houses in Moroccan cities for women fleeing their abusive husbands. Political solutions are also picking up steam; Morocco's Social Development Minister Bassima Hakkaoui said last week that she would try to push forward a law protecting women that has been stuck in Parliament for 8 years.	3
Business Standard	UAE, Morocco discuss bilateral relations May 2, 2013	The United Arab Emirates and Morocco have held talks over a number of issues of mutual interest and ways to boost existing relations between them. The discussions were held between Sheikh Saif bin Zayed Al Nahyan, the UAE's deputy prime minister	0 and interior minister Wednesday and Moroccan ambassador to UAE Mohammed Ayet Ali.

Reuters	Morocco's BMCE Bank to raise $500 million in bond issue May 2, 2013	If the general assembly on June 4th approves the move; Morocco's second-private lender, BMCE bank, will issue what would be its first foreign bond of $500 million to reinforce its financial resources.	0
The View from Fez	May Day Demonstrations in Morocco Bring Thousands to the Streets May 2, 2013	Thousands took to the streets of Rabat and Casablanca on Wednesday demanding jobs and higher pay during May Day demonstrations marked by tension, with a large security contingent deployed in the capital. Several thousand people marched up Rabat's central boulevard around midday, waving Moroccan and Berber flags, holding placards and chanting slogans, some of them strongly critical of the government. These slogans ranged from one PJD-aligned union calling for the end of corruption and proclaiming its support for the King to some unionists chanting, "The people want the fall of the government," echoing the popular slogan used in Egypt and Tunisia during the Arab Spring revolutions. In addition, the demonstrations were attended by unemployed graduates and public sector workers demanding more jobs and better working conditions.	0

From: Ed Gabriel <ed.gabriel@moroccanamericancenter.com>
Sent: Tuesday, May 14, 2013 8:43 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Congressional Morocco Caucus Signed Dear Colleague and Signed House Administration
Caucus Registration Form
Attachments: ny13emsil@mail.house.gov_20130501_173943.pdf;
ny13emsil@mail.house.gov_20130501_174342.pdf

And now we have a Morocco Caucus

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Congress of the United States
Washington, DC 20515

Join the Congressional Morocco Caucus

Dear Colleague:

We are pleased to announce the establishment of the Congressional Morocco Caucus for the 113th Congress.

As has been the case in past years, the Congressional Morocco Caucus will be a bipartisan group of Members committed to deepening the economic and strategic relationship between the United States and Morocco.

Morocco was the first nation to recognize the United States and Morocco remains one of America's oldest and closest Muslim allies in the Middle East and North Africa. Morocco continues to be a vital strategic friend that shares our values and aspirations. Most recently, in the midst of the Arab spring, Morocco held a national referendum to revise their Constitution and institute far-reaching democratic reforms. Morocco has long been a strong partner on security issues, a strong trading partner for US business, and is a regional leader on democratic reforms. Morocco is also the only nation in Africa with a free trade agreement with the United States.

With all that is happening in region, US relations with Morocco has taken on a renewed sense of urgency and strategic importance. We hope that you will join the Congressional Morocco Caucus so that we can work together on these critical issues. Now is the time to signal our strong support for Morocco and work together to ensure the success of their democratic aspirations.

For more information, or to join the Friends of Morocco Caucus, please contact Annie Yea in Congresswoman Loretta Sanchez's office (5-2965) or Chris Berardini in Congressman Michael Grimm's office (5-3371).

Sincerely,

Michael Grimm
Member of Congress
11th District of New York

Loretta Sanchez
Member of Congress
46th District of California

Bennie Thompson
Member of Congress
2nd District of Mississippi

Joe Wilson
Member of Congress
2nd District of South Carolina

Congress of the United States
Washington, DC 20515

May 1, 2013

The Honorable Candice Miller
Chairwoman
Committee on House Administration
1309 Longworth House Office Building
Washington, DC 20515

The Honorable Robert A. Brady
Ranking Member
Committee on House Administration
102 Cannon House Office Building
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Chairwoman Miller:

We would like to register the Congressional Morocco Caucus as a Congressional Member Organization for the 113th Congress. The Congressional Morocco Caucus will serve as an informal group of Members dedicated to strengthening bilateral relations and creating more opportunities for productive dialogue on issues of common concern between the United States and Morocco.

Representatives Michael Grimm, 11th District of New York; Loretta Sanchez, 46th District of California; Bennie Thompson, 2nd District of Mississippi; Joe Wilson, 2nd District of South Carolina will serve as Co-Chairs of the Congressional Morocco Caucus. The staff assigned to handle caucus related issues are listed below:

Rep. Loretta Sanchez
Annie Yea (Staff)
202-225-2965
Annie.Yea@mail.house.gov

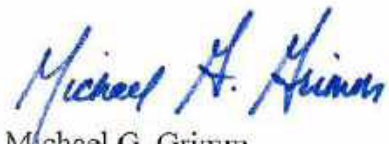

Rep. Michael Grimm
Chris Berardini (Staff)
202-225-3371
Chris.Berardini@mail.house.gov

We trust that the information provided meets the requirements for registering a Congressional Member Organization in the 113th Congress. Thank you for your attention to this matter and please feel free to contact us with any questions.

Sincerely,

Loretta Sanchez
Member of Congress

Michael G. Grimm
Member of Congress

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, May 18, 2013 11:16 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitor May Week 3

Blog Name	Article Title/Date	Summary	Comments
Yabiladi	Défense : Le premier drone 100% marocain prévu pour juin Defense: The first 100% Moroccan drone scheduled for June May 10, 2013	The first Moroccan manufactured drone will be tested at a formal event at the end of June. Six researchers at the National School of Electricity and Mechanics worked on this project. Lahcen Daoudi, the Minister of Higher Education, will attend the event. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Technologies solaires : Le Maroc a-t-il fait le mauvais choix ? Solar technology: has Morocco made the wrong decision? May 11, 2013	Morocco has chosen the most expensive solar tech, solar thermal cells, instead of the less expensive photovoltaic cells. However, in the next 10 years, solar thermal cells are expected to become less expensive than photovoltaic cells because of advances in solar thermal technology. Thermal is also better suited for operation in high temperatures. The US is a leading producer of photovoltaic, whereas Spain leads the market in thermal. Translated from French	5
Yabiladi	Homosexualité au Maroc : 2 hommes condamnés à la prison et un autre couple poursuivi Homosexuality in Morocco: 2 men condemned to prison and another couple follows May 14, 2013	Two men have been convicted of a violation of Article 489 of the Moroccan penal code, which forbids homosexuality. They have been in a relationship for 10 years, and for that they have been sentenced to 3 years in prison and a 1000 dirham fine. The couple was found out because one partner accused the other of sexual assault. Another same-sex couple being held in Salé are on trial for committing homosexual acts, and could receive the same sentence. This news is unfolding only a few days before the International Day Against Homophobia (May 17). Translated from French	11
Yabiladi	Des pirates pro-Polisario	A number of Moroccan websites fell victim to a cyber attack by pro-Polisario hackers, including Istiqlal's French language journal	0

	attaquent des sites marocains Pro-Polisario pirates attack Moroccan websites May 14, 2013	l'Opinion.ma. This is not the first Sahara-related cyber attack; in 2010 the Algerian government reported that the sites for the ministries of the interior and tourism were attacked by Moroccan hackers in the wake of the violence in Gdeim Izik. Translated from French
Yabiladi	Espionnage Maroc/Espagne : La police catalane contredit le CNI sur l'affaire Ziani Espionnage Morocco/Spain: Catalan police contradict the CNI on the Ziani affair. May 14, 2013	Noureddine Ziani, a Moroccan national and president of the Union of Islamic Cultural Centers in Catalonia, is to be expelled from Spain by the Spanish National Intelligence Center (CNI) for allegedly being a DGED agent. However, Catalan independence parties believe the expulsion order is for political reasons, as Ziani is in favor of Catalan independence. A Spanish newspaper has discovered that the CNI had been investigating Ziani since 2010 for is pro-Catalan independence activities. Translated from French	2
Yabiladi	Maroc/France : Majidi poursuit Benchemsi pour diffamation à Paris Morocco/France: Majidi sues Benchemsi for defamation in Paris May 14, 2013	Mounir Majidi, personal secretary to Mohammed VI, is suing journalist Ahmed Reda Benchemsi for accusing him of peddling influence to increase his personal wealth last year. Majidi was accused of using Royal Air Maroc funds to purchase personal subsidiary companies with government assent. Benchemsi is currently a visiting scholar at Stanford University. If found guilty he faces a fine of 12000 euros or more. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Mosquée de Taroudant : Le roi Mohamed VI financera sa reconstruction Taroudant Mosque: King Mohammed VI will finance reconstruction May 15, 2013	Mohammed VI has decided to use personal funds to finance the reconstruction of the historic Taroudant Mosque. Built in the 16th Century, the mosque was partially destroyed by fire on May 7th. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Tour de vis sur la frontière algéro-marocaine :	In the face of the continued security threat posed by Saharan drug trafficking, Algeria has bolstered its security agreement with Morocco and tightened border security by adding 24 new checkpoints. According to this article, this security tightening is a	11

	Alger installe 24 nouveaux postes de contrôle Crackdown on the Algeria-Morocco border: Algeria installs 24 new checkpoints May 15, 2013	response to Morocco's request to open up the land border. Algeria has accused Morocco of being lax in its security and has said that Saharan drug trafficking in Algeria originates in Morocco. Algerian Interior Minister Dahou Ould Kablia has stated that Algeria can only reopen the land border with Morocco if Morocco expands its efforts to address the drug trafficking problem. Translated from French
Yabiladi	Suicide de Mbarek El Karassi : coup de folie ou ultime révolte contre les autorités locales à Marrakech ? Suicide of Mbarek El Karassi: moment of madness or ultimate revolt against the local authorities in Marrakech? May 15, 2013	The sister of Mbarek El Karassi posted a video to Youtube on Tuesday, March 14 that accused the local authorities in the Essâada neighborhood of being responsible for her brother's death. She claimed that the local kingpin and his deputy had a grudge against him, and for this reason imposed restrictions (solely on him) that made it impossible for him to conduct his business and eventually led to authorities confiscating his cart. After El Karassi committed suicide they allegedly intimidated the other vendors in the neighborhood to not reveal the truth of what happened. Translated from French	11
Yabiladi	Marrakech : Trafic de drogue au lycée français Victor Hugo Marrakech: Drug trafficking at the Victor Hugo French high school May 16, 2013	A teacher at the Victor Hugo school in Marrakech has been arrested for drug trafficking. He was caught in possession of 25 grams of marijuana, and when police searched his residence they discovered 1,800 kg of hashish and an electronic scale. Police say that he was selling the drugs to students at the school and to tourists visiting Marrakech. Translated from French	1
Yabiladi	Le Maroc participe à la reconstruction du Mali à hauteur de 5 millions de dollars Morocco	Abdelilah Benkirane announced Thursday that Morocco would donate $5 million to aid in rebuilding Mali at a Brussels donor's conference. Translated from French	1

	participates in the reconstruction of Mali at the level of $5 million May 17, 2013
Magharebia	Moroccan MPs question youth employment progress May 10, 2013	Moroccan parliamentarians questioned Employment Minister Abdelouahed Souhail April 29th on youth unemployment. He claimed that jobs are available in the civil society sector, but that youth skills often do not meet the needs of business. As a new plan, the government opened National Agency for the Promotion of Work (ANAPEC) at two universities to make students aware of business needs and requirements.	0
Magharebia	Morocco to create new textile sector jobs May 14, 2013	Moroccan Trade Minister Abdelkader Amara said on Monday that Morocco plans to partner with private industry to create 250,000 jobs in the textile sector by 2025 Trade Minister Abdelkader Amara as saying on Monday. The program is expected to cost 30bil dhs and aims to capture 1% of the world market. The trade ministry is also expected to soon announce a program for decreasing youth unemployment.	0
Magharebia	Fate of Moroccan government in king's hands May 14, 2013	According to Istiqlal spokesperson Adil Benhamza, the king called party leader Hamid Chabat "to exhort him to keep [Istiqlal] ministers in the government" in the wake of Istiqlal's announcement that it would be leaving the ruling coalition. According to an official statement, Istiqlal's national council took the decision unanimously because of what it called a "lack of coordination between the members of the coalition, unilateral decision-making by the government." Istiqlal holds several important positions in the Moroccan cabinet. The king is empowered to serve as an arbiter in situations such as these, and may call upon PM Benkirane to reshuffle his cabinet or he may call for new elections. However, Istiqlal's national council would have to approve a cabinet re-shuffle.	0
Magharebia	Constitutional reform forum opens in Marrakech May 14, 2013	Lawmakers from Algeria, Egypt, Jordan, Libya, Mauritania, Tunisia and Morocco on Tuesday (May 14th) begin a two-day Marrakech workshop on constitutional reform. The Council of Europe organized the event, as part of the European Union program to strengthen democratic reform in the "Southern Neighbourhood."	0
Magharebia	Morocco confronts extremism among expats May 15, 2013	PM Abdelilah Benkirane has faced tough questions lately on the issue of the radicalization of Moroccan expatriates. The Kingdom seeks to counter this by increasing its efforts to build mosques and send imams overseas to educate Muslim expatriates and deter them from being swayed by fundamentalist rhetoric. However, academics and expatriates agree that the efforts have not been sufficient. Currently, the government has only sent 30 imams overseas; in order to address extremism in the Moroccan diaspora, the government will have to send many more moderate imams to the largest Moroccan population centers outside of the country. Benkirane has also vowed to address other issues in the expat community, pledging to extend the RAMED_medical assistance scheme to disadvantaged MREs who do not have medical insurance in their countries of residence and to give them	0

		the right to vote in Moroccan elections.
Magharebia	Morocco invests in automotive industry May 16, 2013	Morocco is allocating 600 million dirhams (54 million euros) to investment projects in the automotive industry. The cooperating businesses include Delphi Packard Kénitra, Lear Automotive Morocco, Fujikura Automotive Morocco and Denso Thermal Morocco. The projects aim to create 5,700 jobs.	0
Jadaliyya	The Facade of Political Crises in Morocco May 12, 2013	This analysis posits that Istiqlal's threat to leave the ruling coalition will have little bearing on the functioning of the government and that, in fact, it indicates the powerlessness of Moroccan elected officials and the uselessness of Moroccan elections. According to the author, Istiqlal made this move both in its own interest (to further embarrass PJD) and as a pawn of the monarchy; she suggests that this "scandal" could have been a calculated move that was formulated within the palace walls in order to portray the king as a "neutral" arbiter and deflect attention from the increasing unrest in Western Sahara.	5
AFP	Morocco King urges key govt ally to stay in cabinet May 12, 2013	Mohammed VI has urged Istiqlal "to keep its ministers in the government," according to an Istiqlal spokesman. The party later released a statement claiming it "totally adheres to the royal wish to guarantee conditions of stability and to serve the higher interests of the nation." A PJD spokesman indicated that the decision to withdraw from the government is not serious.	0
PV-TECH	Work begins on 160MW Noor 1 CSP project in Morocco May 13, 2013	May 10th was the groundbreaking for the first solar project to be developed for the Moroccan Agency for Solar Energy (MASEN). The project will be developed by Saudi company ACWA, and serviced by several Spanish companies. The German govt has provided 115m Euros for the project. The plant is expected to be operational late 2015.	0
DC Bureau	The Expanding Sahara: Deforestation in Morocco May 13, 2013	Because of changing precipitation patterns, the Sahara Desert is likely to expand into bordering countries, reducing their agricultural productivity. In many countries, this global change is in addition to local environmental pressures. As a whole, the country loses an average of 30,000 hectares of forest per year. Fewer trees mean weaker root systems to protect soil. Erosion rates in both the Atlas and Rif mountains are among the highest in the world. The author concludes that he is not optimistic about Morocco's ability to improve environmental management and respond to desertification.	4
The North Africa Post	Security, Anti-Terrorism Struggle, Shared Concern for USA, Morocco May 13, 2013	In their phone talk, President Obama and HM King Mohammed VI paid "a particular attention to the two countries' cooperation in defense, security and the fight against terrorism". President Obama has also expressed the wish to expand consultations with the King on topical international issues, including Syria, Mali and Palestine. The two leaders exchanged invitations to visit each other's country to have thus the opportunity to continue their conversation in person.	0
CPI Financial	Morocco's covered bond framework a basis for the first African covered bond	The report Morocco Looks To Covered Bonds To Support Housing Finance indicates that under the proposed covered bond legislation, universal banks will be allowed to issue on-balance-sheet mortgage covered bonds called Obligations Sécurisées Hypothécaires (OSHS) and public sector covered bonds referred to as Obligations Sécurisées Territoriales (OSTs). S&P believes that initially only domestic and local currency-denominated	0

	May 13, 2013	issuances. In terms of becoming an accepted funding product in the European markets is still unclear according to S&P: "There are important details still to be finalized via additional circulars that we understand will be published later this year. Only then we will know what the first African covered bonds will finally look like".
Middle East Online	Morocco street vendor dies after self immolation May 14, 2013	A Moroccan street vendor in Marrakech died in the hospital after setting himself on fire in protest of having his goods confiscated. He had sold fruit and vegetables in the street, and then began selling old furniture, until a local official confiscated his goods. Some 40 people protested in Marrakesh on Monday evening, with larger protests expected around his funeral.	0
Morocco News Board	Morocco New Diplomatic Postures Unnerve Algeria May 14, 2013	Experts intimate with the lobbying world of Washington and familiar with the business opportunities in Algeria believe that a "new type "of pro-Algerian lobby was active and involved in pushing for this new American "proposal". These experts assumptions are based on their knowledge of the financial attractiveness of the Algerian market. According to the author, "Algerian apologists in Washington, Paris and Madrid should bear the responsibility of the degradation of relations between Rabat and Algeria."	3
Sahara Press Service	Haidar: Morocco commits all kinds of "violence and torture" against Sahrawis in the silence of the international community May 15, 2013	Addressing the Pan African Parliament from Johannesburg, CODESA president Aminetu Haidar claimed Morocco commits "violence and torture" against Sahrawis. The refusal of Morocco to allow human rights monitoring "reaffirms the need for the African Union to exercise all kind of pressure so that Morocco respect the rights of the Sahrawis." Haidar also asked the Pan African Parliament to support the Saharawi people and the UN to send a commission of inquiry into the occupied territories of Western Sahara.	0
Redstone Rocket	USASAC conducts Georgia, Morocco engagements May 15, 20013	Maj. Gen. Del Turner, commander of the Security Assistance Command, recently visited Morocco as part of the command's strategic engagements with U.S. Africa Command. Turner's team met with the Office of Security Cooperation, Moroccan Ministry of Defense's general inspector of the Moroccan Royal Armed Forces Lt. Gen. Abdelaziz Bennani and the director 4th Bureau of the Moroccan Army. "Lt. Gen. Bennani specifically pointed out that we have an 'indestructible military relationship,'" Whitaker said. "Much of the discussion with Morocco involved critical FMS cases, EDA (Excess Defense Articles), training and spare parts." USASAC's motto is "Strength in Cooperation," and according to Whitaker, that is exactly what these recent engagements were about.	0
AFP	Morocco police tortured 6 Sahrawi protesters: Amnesty May 16, 2013	"According to the information received by Amnesty International," six Sahrawi activists were "tortured and otherwise ill-treated and that their 'confessions' were extracted under torture in police custody." The men were arrested May 9th following May 4-5 protests in Laayoune.	0
Africa	Senegal on a	Senegal's President Macky Sall has urged "the friends of Morocco"	0

Review	drive to have Morocco rejoin AU	to join his efforts in bringing the north African country back to the African Union, stating that the reunion would help the body in reaching a sustainable solution to the Western Sahara crisis. President Sall believes that the hardest part in resolving the conflict had been attained with the acceptance of the Kingdom to grant a broader autonomy for the disputed territory. "We have always defended the position of Morocco. From our point of view, the best strategy today is to bring Morocco to join his friends in the African Union to improve the action," he said.
ShareCast	Cairn Energy plans exploration in Morocco May 17, 2013	Cairn Energy is planning an exploration program offshore Morocco. The multi-well exploration program is on track to start later this year and is targeting more than 3.5bn barrels of oil equivalent of mean unrisks gross prospective resource.	0

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, May 20, 2013 3:31 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: March/April 2013 Events Bulletin
Attachments: ER_MarchApril2013ERBulletin.docx

Dear Team,
Below please find the March/April 2013 MAC Events Bulletin. Our team compiles a monthly list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

March/April Events Bulletin

March 5

Dateline Egypt and North Africa: Updates from the Field

March 8

The Arab Awakening: Lessons Learned and Challenges Ahead

March 18

Economic Turmoil in Arab Countries - Can Partners Help?

March 20

Counterterrorism Policies and Priorities: Addressing the Evolving Threat

March 28

Algeria Between Reform and Stability

April 8

Political Change and Security in North Africa

April 10

Morocco's Reforms - Stalled or In Process?

Dateline Egypt and North Africa: Updates from the Field

Date: March 5, 2013

1. Title: Dateline Egypt and North Africa: Updates from the Field

Hosted by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy

Participants:

Eric Trager: Next Generation Fellow, The Washington Institute

Aaron Y. Zelin: Richard Borow Fellow, The Washington Institute

David Pollock: Kaufman Fellow, The Washington Institute

Robert Satloff: Executive Director, The Washington Institute

2. Overview

As Secretary Kerry makes his inaugural Middle East trip, states across North Africa face rising tensions among the forces for democracy, stability, and Islamic political ascendancy. In Egypt and Tunisia, revolutions have given way to uncertainty and violence, while Morocco's model of stable reform -a monarch with an Islamist prime minister - tends to obscure other elements lurking just beneath the surface. To assess these changes and their consequences for the region and the United States, three Washington Institute fellows recently conducted intensive research trips to each of these countries, where they spoke frankly with a wide range of government officials, opposition leaders, security officers, and human rights activists, both secularist and fundamentalist. At this policy forum, the panelists discussed their findings.

3. Summary

Robert Satloff opened the forum by noting that the current political climate of North Africa is complex and that the various countries of the region all face very different issues. Egypt is struggling to tackle economic and political issues at the same time as restoring security and the rule of law. Moving west, Tunisia faces political uncertainty and the rise of a Salafist movement. Algeria is confronting insurgent terrorism and a security blowback from Mali. All the way to the west, Morocco endured the Arab Spring quietly, but there are subterranean political developments in course there. Each of the panelists addressed the country they visited on a recent trip to the region, with Eric Trager discussing Egypt, Aaron Zelin discussing Tunisia, and David Pollack discussing Morocco only, as he was not able (authorized?) to visit Algeria on this most recent occasion.

Eric Trager provided an assessment of the political players in Egypt, devoting most of his presentation to an analysis of the Muslim Brotherhood's politics, policies, and power within the Egyptian system. He profiled emerging political leaders in the Brotherhood, as well as non-Islamist parties and actors. In closing, Trager noted several important factors for US policy going forward. First, he argued that Egypt will not be a major regional player for the time being given its own domestic issues. Second, the US must force the Muslim Brotherhood to make touch changes that would lead it to moderate its behavior now. Lastly, though mass upheaval is unlikely, the US must be monitor possible triggers for further instability.

Aaron Zelin characterized Tunisia as experiencing stagnation and polarization. It has failed to lived up to lofty expectations following its revolution and many of the problems that incited the revolution remain, particularly the continued issue of having more college graduates than available jobs. Zelin also noted that the perceived deterioration of security is very much present.

David Pollack discussed what he termed "the most interesting country in the region – Morocco." For Pollack, Morocco is the most interesting because not much is happening there. He questioned how Morocco has managed to get through the Arab Spring without much upheaval, particularly since it is afflicted with many of the same development challenges as it neighbors, including poverty, high illiteracy rates, and high youth unemployment – perhaps indicating that its revolution is to come. He also questioned its role as a potential model, citing the arguments of observers, namely Ignatius and Zakaria, that the country is a model of how a monarch can lead his country through a gradual process of democratization. Pollack argued that neither view is right – Morocco is neither reforming nor is it ripe for revolution. It is a special case that entails a mixture of modest reforms and stability, for both the present and the future.

To support his assertions, Pollack addressed three themes: the status of the reforms, the status of the PJD and the Islamists, and potentially lessons learned from Morocco's experience. In addressing the first, Pollack detailed the emergence of the February 20th movement and its protests against corruption. He stated that King Mohammed VI responded immediately to these protests by pursuing reforms and a new Constitution that placed some limits on the King's power. These reforms were followed by the election of a true opposition party for the first time in Moroccan history and a new government led by a Prime Minister that was not appointed by the King, but rather by the winning party, the PJD. These measures of reformed quieted the popular protests, but Pollack argued that they were less than meets the eye. In reality, the King and the palace control much of political and economic life. In addition, the PJD is a compliant party that is not a real Islamist party – the real Islamist party is the JCO. Pollack provided examples of what he perceived to be the King and the palace's continued control of the country, citing the case of the list of corrupt officials being published as a faux attempt at reform, since there was no punishment for these officials and many of them still profit from political and economic favors from the palace. He also cited continued redlines on criticizing the King, referencing arrests and detentions of the King's critics, as well as the palace's practice of using political and economic power to keep political parties compliant.

Turning to the PJD, Pollack stated that the party is neither independent nor Islamist. During his stay in Morocco, he met with a senior minister in the PJD cabinet who reinforced this opinion when he noted that, "the PJD is not in government in order to confront the King, no to Islamize the country, which is already Muslim." Pollack stressed that the Palace always wins when there is controversy between the PJD and the King. He referenced several examples to support this point: the PJD's plan to have television programs only broadcast in Arabic, which was rejected by the Palace; the PJD's plan for education reform, which was rejected by the Palace; and the PJD's attempt to ban commercials about gambling, which the Palace only agreed to limit and not ban. The true Islamist party, according to Pollack, is thus the JCO – an important grassroots movement whose size observers can only estimate. Guesses vary from .5 to 1 million, with .5 million people attending the funeral of the former leader of the JCO Sheikh Yassine. While in Morocco, Pollack had the fortunate opportunity to meet with several JCO leaders – a rare occurrence for a secretive and banned, but tolerated organization. These leaders argued that Islam and democracy are incompatible in theory, but that there are ways to make them compatible in practice through gradual implementation, which the JCO can explore "when we come to power."

Turning to the question of sharia, the JCO interlocutor stated that yes, the JCO wanted to implement true Islam and create a just society. He also stressed that sharia isn't just about cutting off people's hands as it is perceived in the West. He did say that ultimately, yes, the implementation of sharia is a priority, but only when a just society has been established (insinuating that there would be no need to cut off people's hands for stealing because there would be no injustice and thus no need to steal). At that point in the interview, the interlocutor said to Pollack, "Why are you concerned with petty thieves when the biggest thief in the country – whether in Morocco or Saudi Arabia – is the King?" Pollack responded, "So do you want to cut off the King's hand?" To which the JCO leader did not reply, noting instead that they want a different government, neither a phony PJD revolution nor the overthrow of the monarchy. The JCO is even accepting of Morocco under a real constitutional monarchy in which the King has no power and only a symbolic role. Based on this conversation, Pollack argued that Morocco is still repressive in many ways, despite some reform. He stressed that if the repression continues and the JCO continues to gain followers, there is the potential for a well-organized, fundamentalist revolution by the JCO.

Yet, despite this assertion, Pollack still believes that Morocco is stable and will remain so. Why? For one, the King is still personally popular and he maintains the advantage of being able to blame the government and his own entourage for anything that goes wrong. Moroccan citizens tend to do this as well, blaming the palace team for corruption. Second, the example of the Arab Spring two years later is not appealing to many Moroccans. The country has allowed a measure of reform which has assuaged some of the discontent and provided a glimmer of hope for further reform. That said Pollack does not believe that there is anything Morocco can teach the Arab world. Morocco is special and the blend of the King's personality, the fear of contagion, and modest reform is difficult to replicate.

Robert Satloff provided a concluding remark about the pace of change across the Maghreb, noting that in Egypt, Islamists have rushed to consolidate their power; in Tunisia, they have sought to stretch out the process; and in Morocco, Islamists have both stretched it out and remained deferent to traditional power structures, hoping eventually that power will land on their doorstep.

4. Q & A

Q: (Ralph Nurnburger) During your trip, were you able to get an assessment of the status of the Western Sahara or the security situation in the region?

A: (Pollack) You can't talk to a Moroccan official without them mentioning the Western Sahara. It is part of the standard discourse. They reference the autonomy situation and note that although things aren't perfect in the south, they are better than in the camps. This nationalist cause is helpful to the government and the palace in terms of domestic political security as it serves as a rallying cause, even though the status quo is tenable. Whenever there are protests, the King says the country must remain united for territorial sovereignty and it works. As for security, the spillover from the region has literally not touched Morocco. A recent report from Yonah Alexander notes zero attacks in 2012. It is a point of caution for Morocco and they want cooperation with their neighbors in confronting this challenge. They blame Algeria for blocking regional cooperation, just like Algeria blames Morocco.

Q: (Jennifer Lambert, US Department of State) What has been the impact of Sheikh Yassine's death on JCO? What about the role of Nadia Yassine?

A: (Pollack) The JCO is very secretive and did not talk about internal issues with me – they were not prepared to talk about the impact of his death, which is still uncertain. Sheikh Yassine was charismatic and JCO lost that, but it has not led to splits in the movement, nor is there a new charismatic leader. Nadia was an effective spokesperson and her role as a woman was unique and unlike other Islamist organizations, perhaps as a testament to the strong Sufi traditions of the JCO. But, I think her star has faded with the death of her father – she owed her position to her father and for now has dropped from view.

Q: (Yonah Alexander) Could you provide your assessment of the impact of refugee flows on the security situation in the Sahel?

A: (Pollack) The refugee issue didn't come up during my visit. Morocco is intent on securing its borders and it does that effectively – it has a very large security apparatus. There don't appear to be big population flows throughout the country.

5. Observation

Approximately 30 think tank experts and WINEP patrons attended the event and another 50 participants watched online. While Morocco was discussed in detail, David Pollack was highly skeptical of Morocco's reform process and its potential as a model. He used the term "makhzan" throughout his presentation when referring to the power structure in the palace. It is clear that he primarily met with the PJD and the JCO during his visit to Morocco, thus skewing his perceptions. Bizarrely, Pollack seemed to be pushing for a real Islamist party to come to power, as if Morocco could only reform under the leadership of an Islamist party, like Egypt and Tunisia are trying to do. Given the negative outcomes, at least so far, in those countries, this was a surprising stance to take, particularly for an organization like WINEP which had tended to provide more positive assessments of Morocco and has a pretty anti-Islamist bent. Pollack also provided no alternatives to Morocco's current path of reform, only observations, thus limiting the usefulness of his assessments. MAC should nevertheless reach out to Pollack and WINEP to provide them briefings and information on reform.

\(Back to top\)

The Arab Awakening: Lessons Learned and Challenges Ahead

Date: March 8, 2013

1. Title: The Arab Awakening: Lessons Learned and Challenges Ahead

Hosted by the Woodrow Wilson Center Middle East Program

Participants

Rami G. Khouri: Director, Issam Fares Institute for Public Policy and International Affairs, American University of Beirut

Robin Wright: Wilson Center-USIP Distinguished Scholar

Haleh Esfandiari: Moderator: Director, Middle East Program, Wilson Center

2. Overview

This event provided a brief overview of some preliminary conclusions that scholars have made on the state of Arab democracy two years after the Arab Awakening, as well as some of their predictions for the future. Both speakers presented their analyses of the Arab Awakenings, the current status of the major players and issues, and some thoughts on trends that are emerging.

3. Summary

Khouri identified eight trends of the Arab Awakening.

1. There is a clear set of grievances common to all of the uprisings that are expressed in different ways. These grievances are a combination of calls for political rights and for "material needs" (jobs and economic opportunities), and understanding the balance of these two categories is crucial to understanding the uprisings in any one country. Mohamed Bouazizi in Tunisia is an example of how a lack of political rights and material needs sparked revolution; Bouazizi's sole means of subsistence was destroyed, and then he was denied political recourse. According to Khouri, it will be important to pay attention to protests in Kuwait; if we can identify what grievances have sparked protests in a largely homogenous, wealthy country, then we will be better-able to understand the motivations behind protests in other Arab countries.
2. The intensity and depth of the sentiments driving these protests are far beyond what we initially thought; it goes far beyond "breaking the barrier of fear." That is, these revolutions aren't simply about Arab populations overcoming the activation barrier of airing their grievances with the government in public; rather, they are fueled by deep-seated discontent with the old regimes and passion for democratic change.
3. In spite of these general commonalities in motivation, there are tremendous differences in the types of protests we see and the levels of government response. This is attributable to the disparities in regime type and government legitimacy between the different Arab states.
4. The technical logistics of democratic transitions, such as constitution-writing and institution-building, are much more important than elections; agreeing on a set of laws governing the country is crucial in transitioning from a one-party autocracy or a monarchy to an elected democracy.
5. It is easy to either exaggerate or underestimate the role of religion and Islamist parties, but we should be careful to do neither. Religiosity, or lack thereof, will be an important factor to take into account in the construction of post-revolutionary identity in these nascent democracies; it is entirely possible that, when a strong Arab democracy emerges, it will have a degree of religiosity in its governing structure. We must be cognizant of this and its potential implications, including the potential for the majority religious identity to infringe upon the rights of religious minorities (such as the Copts in Egypt). However, it is becoming clear that Islamist parties and candidates in countries such as Egypt are beginning to lose their popularity; in recent polls Mohammed Morsi only garnered 25% of popular support, whereas before he had 50%. Furthermore, Islamist parties such as Ennahda appear to be fracturing. In sum, Muslim religiosity may play a larger role in the new Middle Eastern democracy than it does in Western society, but in the end Islamists are like any other politicians and are susceptible to public disapproval for failing to effectively govern.
6. We must be patient with these nascent democratic institutions, because it is clear that none of the actors involved in these democratic transitions have any experience in elected, accountable democratic governance. It is simply too soon for us to say that, in light of recent violence in countries such as Tunisia and Egypt, the Arab Awakening has failed.
7. One significant shift that we have seen since the beginning of the Arab Awakening is that the citizenry of these countries are no longer content to live under autocratic government. The populations of these countries expect government accountability and are willing to change the government if need be.
8. Returning to the issue of material rights versus political rights, it is clear that, while material rights have driven the protests at a grassroots level, the true issues underlying the popular revolutions are political rights and social justice. The evidence for this is the fact that people in the MENA region have been voicing discontent on such critical issues as dignity, respect, justice, and political participation for the past five years.

Khouri concluded his discussion by stating that, in order to understand the Arab Awakening and its aftermath, we must keep in mind the "5 R's": (citizen) revolt, rights, respect, reconfiguration, and re-legitimization. While there have been obvious growing pains in the establishment of elected democracies in the post-Arab Awakening states, the problems inherent in this transition are vastly overwhelmed by the fact that now, for the first time after decades of autocracy, there are millions of Arabs who are writing constitutions.

Wright began by noting that we should not judge the Arab Awakening a failure based solely upon political strife in countries such as Egypt and Tunisia, because there is a distinction between the politics of change and the culture of change. While true political change may be stalled, democratic change has become an inexorable part of popular culture in these countries, and is unlikely to disappear. She then presented her own list of significant political trends of the Arab Awakening:

1. There are now 120 million Arabs who have been empowered by democratic revolution. Wright expects that each of the 22 Arab regimes will be challenged. However, more people in the Arab world are afraid of democratic change now than two years ago, due to a number of factors, including political and social turmoil, the unpredictability and violence of reform, the lack of effective political managers, and the lack of a defined, effective new order emerging to fill the power vacuum. This is why the constitution-writing process will be crucial to effective democratic transition in each of these states.
2. Almost every Arab country is worse off, economically speaking, than it was two years ago. While many Arabs in the MENA region have far more freedoms, there are far fewer jobs. No country, not even those who have not seen democratic revolution, is immune to this economic turmoil.
3. The so-called "proliferation of democracy" has negative consequences. It has resulted in the creation of far too many political parties; for example, in Libya 130 parties ran for 80 seats in the legislature. This proliferation is the result of many different political opinions and a lack of willingness on the part of legislative hopefuls to pool their resources and collaborate to affect the kind of change that they can agree upon. This not only weakens candidates, but the democratic process as a whole.
4. Far from being a monolithic group, Islamists exist on a spectrum. Despite the conventional wisdom that political strife in nascent Arab democracies exists largely in an Islamist versus secularist dichotomy, there are deepening divisions between different Islamist parties and within Islamist parties. On the extreme end of the spectrum, the Salafists have influence disproportionate with their numbers, because they still have the kind of energy, focus, and discipline that even the Muslim Brotherhood no longer has.
5. With the proliferation of arms and militias in countries such as Libya, Syria, and Egypt, the security situation in the region is deteriorating.
6. Local tribes have re-emerged as the primary source of identity where modern nation-states have failed. This is especially prevalent in Libya, Iraq, Jordan, and Syria.
7. Nascent democracies in the MENA region will have to accept the demographic realities of their populations: these populations are overwhelmingly young, and these young people expect healthcare, jobs, and education from the governments that they put into power.
8. Corruption is already running rampant in new Arab democracies because everyone in the new administrations feels entitled to a piece of the proverbial pie.
9. Women have fared very poorly in terms of political pull, seats in parliament, and basic security.
10. Sykes-Picot – and the maintenance of current borders - may not survive this political unrest. Wright was confident that the boundaries of some countries, Iraq in particular, are liable to change.

4. Q & A

Q: (Joshua Pollock, Department of State Office of Global Women's Issues) Do the issues we've seen with regard to the status of women in these countries represent the failure of modernism and equality in these countries?

A: (Wright) I'm not sure that we can say this is the failure of modernism. Women have been a driver of change in this region, especially as women's literacy increases. However, these ascendant women are confronted with the very real challenges of latent patriarchal tradition and tribalism. Also, it has only been two years since the Arab Awakening began; it is too early to state with any confidence that modernism has failed.

(Khouri) We cannot say that this represents the breakdown of the modern nation-state in the Arab world, because, frankly, the Arab world has never before had modern nation-states. These states are still tackling questions of basic governance and constitution-writing, and in these patriarchal societies that lack a strong women's movement it follows that women's rights will be put on the back-burner until the issues of state formation have been dealt with. It will take time for women to have their voices heard, but we cannot categorically call this a failure. However, there have been some encouraging developments, such as the push to address equality of the sexes in Tunisia.

Q: (Jane Harman, Woodrow Wilson Center) How much of a role will anti-Zionism play in these transitions? Is Israel even relevant?

A: (Wright) Israel is never irrelevant. Arab governments in trouble will always use Israel as a diversionary tactic. While we have not yet seen much of this yet, and in fact the Egyptian government went as far as to openly collaborate with Israel on security issues in the Sinai Peninsula, it is only a matter of time.

(Khouri) The issue of Israel/Palestine is enormously important to people around the region, who by and large strongly support Palestinian rights. While the Israeli-Arab conflict has not played into the Arab Awakening protests, there appears to be a connection between the sense that these authoritarian Arab regimes lack legitimacy and the humiliation felt by Arab populations over their governments being unable to stand up to Israel and the United States. Furthermore, these populations are worried that support for Israel will become the metric by which the US and other major powers judge the legitimacy of democratically elected Arab governments.

Q: Will Sunni/Shia sectarianism replace the Israeli-Arab conflict in political significance?

A: (Khouri) I believe the sectarian divide is greatly exaggerated; we were never concerned with sectarianism until the US invaded Iraq. While there has been sectarian violence, which has made sectarianism front-page news, this does not constitute a major, long-term issue in the MENA region. If anything, the root of this violence is more closely tied to issues of tribalism, and not sectarianism.

(Wright) I have to disagree; my great fear is that sectarianism could define the region more and more in the years to come, especially with respect to alliances with Iran. For example, Saudi Arabia supports Western economic intervention in Iran (via sanctions), and would support US military intervention in Iran; I fear that this is fueled by the so-called "guardians" of Sunni Islam wanting to attack the center of Shia power.

Q: (John Anderson, former Foreign Service Officer) What might the form and shape of democratic transition in Saudi Arabia and the rest of the Gulf look like?

A: (Khouri) The difference in the Gulf is that there are no anti-monarch revolutionary pressures to speak of; that is, the people are more interested in reform than overthrowing the regime, similar to the situation we see in Morocco. There are small movements in Saudi Arabia to open up and liberalize the country, and this will result in a very slow movement towards liberalization. It is possible that we may see a constitutional monarchy in Saudi Arabia in the future.

5. Observation

The event was attended by approximately 40 people, a mix of policy professionals, students, and casual observers. In my opinion, the panelists did not have enough time to fully flesh out the observations that they made, so it is difficult to pull meaningful conclusions from the speeches, either specifically in relation to Morocco or in general. Essentially, Wright and Khouri came to the same general conclusion: It is too soon to tell whether or not these revolutions have been successful, and with some qualifications, we may be cautiously optimistic about their eventual outcomes. One thing I found notable in relation to Morocco was that they both emphasized the importance of constitution-writing; this presents an opportunity for MAC to highlight the progressiveness of Morocco's new constitution. While there have been some hiccups in its implementation, Morocco having a new constitution that protects human and civil rights can be presented as an evidence that the country's gradual democratic transition is a model for the rest of the Arab world.

\(Back to top\)

Economic Turmoil in Arab Countries- Can Partners Help?

Date: March 18, 2013

1. Title: Economic Turmoil in Arab Countries- Can Partners Help?

Hosted by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Participants:

Marwan Muasher: Vice President of Studies, Middle East Program, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Ibrahim Saif: Senior Associate, Middle East Center, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Jean-Pierre Chauffour: Lead Country Economist, Morocco; Regional Trade Coordinator in the Middle East and North Africa Region, World Bank

Nemat Shafik: Deputy Managing Director, International Monetary Fund

Uri Dadush: Moderator: Senior Associate and Director, International Economic Program, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

2. Overview

More than two years after the outbreak of pro-reform revolutions in several countries in the Middle East and North Africa (MENA), the economic situation in the region remains precarious. Progress in restoring confidence as well as sustainable and rapid economic growth will depend on internal forces and the return of political stability. External partners may also play a role in helping normalize and eventually improve the underlying growth fundamentals of these economies. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace hosted a panel discussion that both examined economic and political reforms within the region and assessed the degree to which external partners could play in addressing the challenges Arab governments face as they transition to democracy.

3. Summary

Nemat Shafik believes that the future of the region will be determined largely by domestic forces with little external aid. She also made note of the commonalities between the nations: a decline in economic growth, an increase in unemployment, high economic expectations, stretched government budgets, a decline in currency reserves, and a lack of a serious internal plan. She emphasized that the last similarity is particularly hindering due to the government's "lack of a destination point" on both an economic and political front.

Despite the lack of a macroeconomic crisis, Shafik believes that the overall outlook of each country is nowhere near positive. The shaky international markets and spillover effect from the civil war in Syria are factors threatening the stability of the region. She stated that there are five reforms that need to be implemented immediately: a transition from rent seeking to actual capitalism, increased exports, reform of the labor market (to include women) and education, increased bank financing, and moving from untargeted subsidies to safety nets, which simultaneously creates space for investment. She concluded that the involvement of external partners, although important, should be limited and urged the creation of institutions that will enable a separation of powers, transparency, and competitiveness.

Jean-Pierre Chauffour reiterated the need to "stick to one direction". He pointed out that political reforms go hand in hand with the current economic situation. Chauffour called for immediate economic integration with European markets. In order for this to occur, according to Chauffour, Europe needs to rebuild its credibility in five ways. Primarily, it needs to facilitate market access for imported products. This has already been achieved with Morocco, but can be done with other countries like Tunisia, Egypt, and Jordan. In addition, encouraging labor mobility, promoting solar exports, improving the regulatory environment, and fostering overall closer economic relationships with the Mediterranean are other ways Europe can demonstrate its commitment.

Marwan Muasher echoed the need to establish institutions. Muasher is frustrated that Middle Eastern policymakers continue to attempt to isolate political from economic reforms. He noted that the solution is simple and "so self-evident"; economic and political reform must go hand in hand. Muasher reminded the audience that change takes time and that the current status of the Egyptian economy, although dire, is much better than it was during the 1980s. He argued that the bad economic conditions might actually be a blessing in disguise for countries in the region that have not foregone a democratic transition because it will force those governments to open their political space to outside forces. According to Muasher, the solution resides in detail-orientated, inclusive, measurable plans that include performance indexes and specific timeframes that center on unemployment and the fiscal deficit.

Ibrahim Saif focused on how conditions for social justice could be created, reached, and enabled. He reminded the audience that the Arab Spring began with the economic demands. Saif believes that the root problem is political identity and polarization. Specifically, economic forces are still driven by political connections and networking. Saif cited citing Egypt, Morocco, and Tunisia as examples of such dynamics. Furthermore, he underscored that weak and inefficient bureaucracies have led civilians to turn their backs on the process of reform. Another aggravation is the lack of capacity from the private sector. Saif concluded that domestic markets must be reconstructed, formal institutions must be established, open dialogue with unions must be created, and budget priorities on how to spend public money must be defined.

4. Q & A

Q: (Uri Dadush) Is there a difference between the Gulf and Maghreb countries?

A: (Muasher) The region's governments are split between two camps. Countries that are in the midst of reform like Egypt and Tunisia or those like the Gulf monarchies whose governments believe that they are immune to the demands for reform. The latter have failed to internalize the message of reform.

Q: (Mohammed Schenaou) What kind of considerations are constraining the IMF from doing more to address the region's economic challenges?

A: (Shafik) The IMF does not envision itself as the sole provider for all the necessary financing to encourage growth. In fact, the IMF relies heavily on individual pledges from European partners.

Q: (Mohamed Mensouri, American University) How can countries engage their society?

A: (Chauffour) What we do is try to complement the IMF. The populace has great expectations. Countries need to try to promote dialogue by advocating education, women's participation, transparency, citizen participation in politics, and the strengthening of Parliaments.

Q: (Ed Miker, advisor to the government of Oman) Is there evidence of short term gains that could serve as an inspiration for long term gains?

A: (Muasher) I don't believe in short term gains. Earlier, people knew that sacrifices needed to be made in order to pursue democracy. Now, however, people feel like they are sacrificing for nothing because they do not believe that their governments are serious about reform. Also their ability to sacrifice is limited.

t Shafik) I believe that freedom is a short term gain; people can stand up and speak their mind. Signals of support from the international community also mean a lot.

(Chauffour) The short term gains are few low hanging fruits. A short term gain that could have some very short term results would be moving away from rent seeking to capitalism. Another short term problem that is easily fixable is reopening the border between Morocco and Algeria, which has been inhibiting them from trading and information sharing.

5. Observation

This event attended by approximately 75 individuals, composed primarily of college students and regional experts, in addition to a few officials from regional embassies. Jean-Pierre Chauffour is the lead country economist for Morocco and regional trade coordinator in the Middle East and North Africa Region for the World Bank, so it could be useful to cultivate a relationship with him. He was also the only panelist to highlight Morocco's successful relationship with Europe and that the reopening the border between Morocco and Algeria will be highly beneficial. However, the insight provided by the panelists was nothing new; all reiterated the need for the establishment of clear domestic plans and that reform was time-sensitive.

For a complete recording of the event, please visit:

<http://carnegieendowment.org/2013/03/18/economic-turmoil-in-arab-countries-can-partners-help/fn0v>

\(Back to top\)

Counterterrorism Policies and Priorities: Addressing the Evolving Threat

Date: March 20, 2013

1. Title: Counterterrorism Policies and Priorities: Addressing the Evolving Threat

Hosted by the US Senate Committee on Foreign Relations

Participants

Jane Harman: Director, President, and CEO, Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars (Former Member, US House of Representatives)

Michael E. Leiter: Senior Counselor to the Chief Executive, Officer, Palantir Technologies (Former Director of the National Counterterrorism Center)

Kenneth L. Wainstein: Partner, Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft LLP (Former Assistant to the President for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism)

2. Overview

This hearing was convened for the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee to hear testimony on how the US can update its counterterrorism policies in response to an evolving terrorist threat, namely the move from a centralized al-Qaeda with a powerful and well-funded core to a loosely connected network of al-Qaeda-affiliated terrorist organizations. Harman emphasized the importance of moving away from the use of kinetic power and towards combating the narrative that the US is at war with Islam. Leiter focused on redirecting US focus in reacting to terrorist threats toward intelligently addressing them. Wainstein focused on giving US counterterrorism programs more legitimacy by bringing them under congressional oversight.

3. Summary

Senators Menendez (D-NJ) and Corker (R-TN) opened the hearing with a few observations on the changes that we have seen in the past few years in the nature of global terrorism. Menendez noted, as would every other speaker in the course of the hearing, that while we have significantly degraded the central organization of al-Qaeda, the emergence of a decentralized al-Qaeda presents new challenges going forward. Loosely connected al-Qaeda affiliates use the weakened core organization for funding and support while pursuing their own regional goals. Of these, al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) has emerged as the biggest threat to the US homeland. Given this shift, Menendez concluded, the most pressing question of this hearing is how do we address these new terrorist threats? Senator Corker agreed with Senator Menendez and added that recent violence in North and West Africa at the hands of al-Qaeda affiliates makes this hearing especially timely. He stressed that that the United States needs to evolve its counterterrorism strategy to respond to the evolution in the global terrorism threat. He made three observations on how we must change our counterterrorism strategy. First, any new strategy must be mindful of the shift in al-Qaeda structure from a centralized organization to one with several nodes around the world. Second, given this plurality of nodes, any new counterterrorism strategy must involve cooperation with our foreign allies. Third, going forward Congress should play a more active role in authorizing the use of force.

Harman began by stating that while many of our tactics have been helpful in fighting the war on terror since 2001, many are proving to be counter-productive, and in a broader sense our strategy is all wrong. We have yet to develop a "positive-sum roadmap" for the way forward - a narrative of what goals we want to achieve and how we are going to achieve them. This is crucial particularly because the terrorist threat has evolved; while our tactics, primarily the deployment of kinetic force, have helped to destroy the core of al-Qaeda, and we now face the new threat of a more horizontal organization. If anything, this more decentralized al-Qaeda entity is strengthened by our use of kinetic force in the Middle East, North Africa, and South/Central Asia, because our use of kinetic force, especially drone strikes, is supporting the proliferation of the al-Qaeda narrative that the United States is at war with Islam and with Muslims, not at war with terrorism. In order to choke off the power of this narrative, we need to win hearts and minds; in other words, we have to win the argument. She presented five recommendations to change our approach to the war on terror to not continue to alienate the Muslim world. The first is to stop our piecemeal counterterrorism reactions to terrorist attacks. We need to come up with an integrated government counterterrorism policy. In addition, we need to provide more support to the Department of State's Bureau of Counterterrorism, which is the most important body in implementing our non-kinetic counterterrorism strategy. The second recommendation is that we make smarter investments with regards to our foreign aid expenditures. We must carefully analyze the foreign aid budgets and find ways to plus up funds to the countries that need it most and resist funding for so-called "flavor of the month" countries. The third recommendation is that we live our morals. Such objectionable tactics as rendition, "enhanced interrogation", and targeted killings are not helping us win the argument. In her words, playing whack-a-mole with our enemies does nothing to counter the narrative that we are at war with Islam. The fourth recommendation is that we reduce the over-classification of intelligence. Far too much of our intelligence is classified, and this is keeping our policy makers from seeing the bigger picture. The final recommendation is that we "drain the swamp", or cut off the recruitment pipeline at its source. The way to do this, in addition to refuting the narrative that the US is at war with Islam, is to push reform in authoritarian Muslim governments.

Leiter began with assessing US security vis-à-vis global terror and what we should now focus on given that reality. The United States is in a better position to detect and disrupt a catastrophic attack like 9/11 than it ever has been. As such, we should not read too much into recent events such as the attacks in Benghazi and Algeria, and the proliferation of AQIM. While these events do have implications for our interests abroad, they do not constitute direct threats to the homeland, and we should not treat them as such. He identified terrorism in North Africa, the conflict in Syria, and Hizbullah as regional threats that we need to keep a closer eye on, because all three of these are growing problems that clearly threaten regional stability. However, there are some roadblocks to paying appropriate attention to and taking appropriate action on these regional threats. The first issue is so-called "terrorism fatigue." In short, international terrorism has been at the forefront of the national dialogue for the past ten years and Americans are getting tired of talking about it. The second issue is the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. The US and the international community at large need to secure the stock of nuclear materials and work to prevent the creation of improvised nuclear devices and complex bioterrorism attacks. The third issue is the weakening of the counterterrorism infrastructure. Leiter is concerned that we do not properly contextualize the significance of terrorist attacks. Terrorist attacks are a fact of life today, and yet, as with the 9/11 attack in Benghazi, we tend to treat every terrorist attack as a systemic failure on the part of our counterterrorism infrastructure. This will only result in driving the smart people we need away from a career in counterterrorism and alienate our overseas partners in counterterrorism. The final issue is remaining on the offense on all fronts of this battle. The focus on the kinetic use of force has sapped focus from what we need to do in order to drain the swamp. We must expand our efforts on soft power. Leiter concluded by noting the cost of the war on terror over the past decade - in twelve years we have poured $100 billion into this effort, and we have not reaped proportional benefits. We need to take a more logical approach to this and employ mission-focused budgeting.

Wainstein's testimony only added marginally to the others' presentations. He began by stating that since 9/11 we have made enormous efforts to build and reorganize our counterterrorism infrastructure to address the threat that al-Qaeda has posed. While this succeeded in improving our readiness for another 9/11-style attack from a strong, centralized al-Qaeda, this type of threat doesn't exist anymore. Instead, a decentralized al-Qaeda threatens our interests by threatening regional stability in the Middle East, North Africa, and South/Central Asia. Thus, we must reevaluate our counterterrorism programs once again. He warned that, in doing this, we must not allow the executive branch to have unilateral power. The executive branch cannot police itself. Congress needs to be more involved; this will provide our counterterrorism strategy a level of legitimacy that unilateral executive action cannot. He had two recommendations for Congress in this endeavor: any legislation passed must both be cognizant of the executive's need to make quick decisions, and it must provide flexibility in our counterterrorism capabilities.

4. Q & A

Q: (Menendez, D-NJ) Most of the government's most significant counterterrorism actions take place at the strategic level. Have we done enough to cut the recruitment pipeline or discredit al-Qaeda's jihadist narrative?

A: (Harman) This is precisely what I was talking about - we need to win the argument in order to win the war. Our current "drone-centric" foreign policy is not only inefficient, it actually weakens our position in the diplomatic battle that is crucial to ensuring our own security. What we can do with our kinetic tactics, in addition to expanding public diplomacy, is to devise a strict legal framework around our use of drones and put the use of drones under the purview of FISA. A rules-based drone program will help us in winning the argument.

Q: (Menendez) At the end of the day, having rules for when we strike won't win hearts and minds; we need to be able to help populations on the ground. Shouldn't our policy consider other things?

A: (Leiter) The simple answer is yes. In my view, soft power has been woefully under-funded and under-focused for two main reasons. One, it is much easier to get funding for programs that bring business to Representatives' home districts, as opposed to funding for an army of diplomats in the basement of the State Department. And two, it is easier and quicker to see results (or at least changes) when we undertake kinetic tactics. What can we do about this? One thing we can do is reallocate funds to the Departments of State and Homeland Security; the Department of Defense tends to be the worst representative of our government to communicate the message that we are not at war with Islam. In addition, we need to maintain foreign aid and rule of law programs; this will be especially crucial in the developing stages of new Arab democracies in the wake of the Arab Spring. It is important for us to remember: the Arab Spring protests were driven by local populations calling for modern democracy, not al-Qaeda. (Wainstein) The Arab Spring has proven to be a trade-off. We have lost some tactical partners in the war on terror, but if the Arab Spring is the way to improve the condition of the people in these countries, then it's a counterterrorism win for us. We need to solidify the partnerships we do have in the region, before al-Qaeda gains more of a foothold in these new democracies.

Q: (Corker, R-TN) Let's go back to the legal case. The decimation of the core of al-Qaeda makes it much harder for us to tie these peripheral groups back to the authorization for the use of force that we signed on September 18, 2001.

A: (Harman) I would like to emphasize that absolutely no one who voted for this authorization in 2001 believed that it would last until now; we thought this would be a temporary authorization. We absolutely cannot continue to approach the "war on terror" using this framework. As I said before, it is crucial that we win the argument, and we can do this with a whole of government approach to counterterrorism, smarter investments, and by living our values.

Q: (Corker) In that case, I believe that this defense authorization needs to be updated. What are some of the characteristics of an updated defense authorization that would differ from the one we put in place on September 18, 2001?

A: (Leiter) The last AUMF is, at the same time, too broad, too narrow, and too vague; it is difficult to look at it and say how it would apply to some of these newer terrorist organizations that are gaining power.

(Wainstein) Until now, the executive branch has been able to shoehorn its actions into the AUMF. Putting this under the purview of Congress will lend legitimacy to the process.

(Harman) I'm not sure that Congress should give a blanket authorization for the use of force, but yes, Congress' role in oversight and legislating needs to be much more assertive than it has been in the past 12 years. Also, calling this a "war on terror" is not helping; terror is a tactic, not an enemy.

Q: (Murphy, D-CT) You talked about winning with actions, not just words, so I have a question about how actions we take here factor in abroad. We've seen a pretty remarkable increase in anti-Islam behavior here in the past five years. Ms. Harman, how much does this matter in winning the argument?

A: (Harman) This actually matters a lot. Our record is mixed on Islamophobia; we have made some serious missteps, but we have seen some outreach to Muslim communities on the part of local police forces, such as what we have seen in Los Angeles. We should encourage this; more of this outreach will make it more attractive for members of the Muslim community to turn in people who may be turning towards extremism, but who have clean police records and otherwise operate under the radar. In a broader sense, projecting tolerance must be a big part of the counterterrorism approach. Let's remember, more Muslims have been the target of al-Qaeda attacks than have non-Muslims.

(Leiter) What is important here is that Islamophobia in the US undermines the willingness of the American Muslim community to address the Muslim community abroad in order to fight the narrative that the US is at war with Islam. When they see Islamophobia here, they're less likely to stand up and say that America is a good place to be Muslim.

Q: (Kaine, D-VA) The narrative does not have to be won by us, necessarily; it can be won by another country that shows that terrorism isn't the way to success. The salient examples here are Morocco and Turkey. Turkey, in particular, is a strong Muslim nation with a growing GDP and can serve as an alternative success model.

A: (Harman) I strongly agree with you. There is a big opportunity for us in this right now, especially given the strong relationship between President Obama and PM Erdogan. By and large, Turkey offers a moderate model of an Islamist society; Islamists are not necessarily bad, but terrorists are.

(Leiter) The US has a good track record with this type of partnership, as in Indonesia and Jordan. In places like Libya and Egypt, we have to use our foreign aid that makes them walk the right path, but we have to take a sophisticated look of who is in this government and how we can work with them. Just looking superficially at what groups are in power and saying we can't work with them because they are Islamist will be akin to cutting off our nose to spite our face.

Q: (Menendez) What do you envision as the elements of "draining the swamp"? What are the partnerships that have worked particularly well and what partnerships have we not tapped that we should tap?

A: (Harman) I think we need to focus on public-private partnerships. The private sector has the tools and the agility to make an impact that the public sector simply does not. In particular, the private sector and the NGO community are uniquely equipped to fight illiteracy in these countries, which is a major factor in terrorist recruitment.

(Leiter) We need to do a better job of engaging the American Muslim community and we have to accept that what the US says about Islam on a global basis is generally dismissed; we are not a credible speaker on this subject. We need to empower moderate voices abroad that can counter al-Qaeda's message. Something that has worked well for us in the past is disaster relief - it shows a non-military face, depicts us as humanitarians, and has been incredibly effective. We need to use our partnerships and empower other voices abroad to help us show that al-Qaeda has a bankrupt ideology and that there is an alternative way to protect Islam.

5. Observation

This hearing was not especially well-attended, likely because it convened considerably later than previously expected, due to voting in the Senate. MAC can capitalize on was the testimony asserting that the US should strengthen its partnerships with moderate Muslim states and hold them up as examples for the rest of the Muslim world; Morocco is a pretty clear example of this. It is interesting to consider if MAC can be useful in promoting voices in the Moroccan American community to speak out on this issue as an antidote to those charging the US with Islamophobia. Given that Harman and Leiter both alluded to the needed to reach out to the Muslim-American community, MAC should maintain its relationship with Harman and reach out to Leiter.

\(Back to top\)

Algeria Between Reform and Stability

Date: March 28, 2013

1. Title: Algeria Between Reform and Stability

Hosted by John Hopkins University, School of Advanced International Studies

Participants:

William Zartman: Professor Emeritus, Conflict Management, JHU-SAIS

Eamonn Gearon: Professional Lecturer, African Studies Program, JHU-SAIS

Daniele Moro: Moderator: African Studies, Johns Hopkins University SAIS

2. Overview

The John Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies hosted a discussion on whether or not Algeria is on a path of reform or stability, including topics such as how the country avoided the Arab uprisings, the importance of the April 2014 elections, and the security and politics of the Sahara. .

3. Summary

The panel discussion began with an Al Jazeera documentary that examined the bitterness that is still present in Algeria as a result of French colonial rule and how French colonialism fueled resentment between France and its Muslim community. Dr. Zartman began the discussion with remarks about the struggle between reform and stability in the region after the Arab Spring. In terms of indicators for a revolution, Dr. Zartman listed three characteristics Algeria shares with the region: an aging autocratic ruler with no clear indication of his successor, high youth unemployment, and a lack of motivation to move beyond a hydrocarbon economy. Despite these shared characteristics, Dr. Zartman highlighted six key factors that have discouraged Algerians from revolution.

First and foremost, Algerians are terrified of falling back into a civil war, as the atrocities committed in the 1990s remain at the forefront of their minds. Second, unlike in Tunisia and Egypt, Algerian history demonstrates the military's lack of fear and hesitation to shoot civilians, especially if power were handed to an Islamist government. Third, the Algerian populace understands that the military and President Bouteflika are codependent and that Bouteflika's fall would be insignificant. Regardless of Bouteflika's departure the military will maintain significant power. Fourth, protestors demands are provincial-specific and thus lack the wider appeal that inspires national protests - there have been protests, but none have largely regional events. Fifth, the Algerian government has been able to suppress, buy off, and/or discredit small groups of protestors. Finally, the impact of the 2010-2011 elections gave legitimacy to the current government. According to Dr. Zartman,, these elections were seen as free and fair, giving Bouteflika's government a certain amount of democratic legitimacy. Also, both the National Rally for Democracy (RND) and the National Liberation Front (FLN) have seen gains, whilst the Islamist parties have become irrelevant. Nevertheless, Dr. Zartman concluded with a warning, : if President Bouteflika goes back on his word and runs for President or if the newly elected President is an older-generation RND or FLN affiliate, this could cause an uproar.

Eamonn Gearon noted that after 132 years under French occupation, the atrocious civil war that led to Algeria's independence simultaneously created Salafi jihad extremists. These extremists created the basis for the emergence of AQIM. According to Gearon, Algeria has faced more violence than any other nation in the region, which contributes to its need for a robust military role that provides consistent stability. Being a colony for over a century has lead to much resentment and deep rooted skepticism of foreigners.

Gearon explained that although these small extremist groups linked to AQIM are aiming to spread fear and instability throughout the region, they do not want to govern the nation, especially in such troublesome times. He elaborated that these terrorist organizations profit from acts of kidnapping and ransom, citing the In Amins oil platform incident as an example. Gearon noted that such incidents promote the success of AQIM's mission to spread terror. Due to this success, Gearon concluded that Algeria's security situation will most likely get worse before it gets better. Gearon also warned the Algerian government to wean itself from its dependency on its hydrocarbon industry, which has in the past suffered major drops in price, directly affecting the country's stability.

4. Q & A

Q: (Lawrence Freeman, African Desk Arab Magazine) What is the relationship between Algeria and Morocco?

A: (Zartman) There is a long-standing rivalry between Algeria and Morocco. Algeria fears AQIM and anti-Algerian groups located in the North Atlas Mountains of Morocco. Furthermore, Algeria is keen on uniting North African states whilst keeping Morocco ostracized. For example, in the 1980s Algeria called for security cooperation with Sahel countries and pointedly left out Morocco.

Q: (Michelle Payn, POMED) What is the percentage of youth unemployment in Algeria and why is it so high?

A: (Gearon) Overall unemployment is at 10%. However, when looking at individuals younger than 25 years old, the percentage rises to 25-30%. Algeria, like Libya, depends on its hydrocarbon industry, which relies on foreign workers and machines. Algeria does not have an economy, but a savings account.

Q: (Former Ambassador to Italy) What efforts are being made to diversify Algeria's economy?

A: (Gearon) With the increase in the price of oil, there is a lack of desire and drive to diversify the economy. (Zartman) Although a downward trend in oil prices may put pressure on the government to diversify, there is currently no political will to expand the Algerian economy beyond oil exploration.

Q: (Gare Smith, lawyer) What is the best security approach? Can education be included?

A: (Gearon) One that encompasses the three following aspects: having a robust amount of military equipment, recognizing and discussing social issues, and diversifying the economy. (Zartman) Education is not even a fish in the water. Building schools is not going to make a dent. I would like to extend Mr. Gearon's answer by adding one other aspect. AQIM has never attacked an oil facility until now, securing oil facilities is now a number one priority. Although AQIM planned to make a fire and attract attention, their original plan did not constitute of killing hostages; this only occurred due to the government's intervention.

5. Observation

This event was mainly attended by students, former and current ambassadors, and a couple of reporters. There were around 30 attendees. Due to his extensive knowledge and background on the security and politics of the Sahara, Eamonn Gearon could be quite useful for MACP. Although he has not been explicit on his stance on the issue of Western Sahara, he wrote a book titled The Sahara: A Cultural History. Labeling Algeria's economy as a savings account was also a unique and intriguing perspective. Dr. Zartman provided interesting insight on the domestic factors that have saved Algeria from succumbing to a revolution. He also believes that Algeria is purposefully leaving Morocco in the dark, inhibiting the possibility of a bilateral relationship.

For the documentary link "Veterans: The French in Algeria", please visit:
http://www.youtube.com/watch?feature=player_embedded&v=NOPfoaTaINU#!

\(Back to top\)

Political Change and Security in North Africa

Date: April 8, 2013

1. Title: Political Change and Security in North Africa

Hosted by McDaniel College and CNA Strategic Studies

Participants:

Panel 1:

Marina Ottaway: Senior Scholar, Woodrow Wilson Center

Monica Marks: Rhodes Scholar, Tunisia

Jason Ullner: Former Algeria Desk Officer, US Department of State

Anouar Boukhars: Moderator: Assistant Professor of International Relations, McDaniel College

Panel 2:

Fernando Reinares: Senior Researcher, International Terrorism, Real Instituto Elcano (Madrid, Spain)

Fred Wehrey: Senior Associate, Middle East Program, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Patrick Worman: Bureau of Counterterrorism, US Department of State

Eric Thompson: Moderator: Vice President and Director, CNA Strategic Studies

Keynote Address:

Ambassador Janet A. Sanderson: Former Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near East Affairs, US Department of State

Panel 3:

Laurence Ammour: Research Fellow, International Security and Defense, Institute of Political Science (Bordeaux, France)

Glynn Torres-Spelliscy: Professor, The New School for Public Engagement

Lahcen Achy: Non-Resident Scholar, Carnegie Middle East Center

Christianna Nichols Leahy: Chair, Political Science Department, McDaniel College

2. Overview

The countries of North Africa have experienced considerable political and social upheaval over the past two years. However, concurrently, violent extremist networks and criminal organizations have grown and are expanding their operations throughout the region. This conference explored the range and scale of challenges that confront the states of North Africa, the United States, and the international community with the aim of identifying policy options for the future.

3. Summary

Panel 1: Response and Strategies of Regimes and Political Parties

Anouar Boukhars opened by detailing the questions the panelists sought to address, namely: how have existing regimes adjusted to the new political landscape? What is the status of political and economic reform efforts? Are Islamist parties who assumed power gaining or losing popularity? What are the political, cultural, and economic cleavages that drive and shape events on the ground? Is the pessimism about the prospects of the Arab Spring misplaced? What are US interests in the region?

Boukhars provided the context for the answering these questions with a brief overview of the political situation in Morocco, Tunisia, and Algeria. He noted that two years after the Arab Spring, the fate of democracy is unclear in North Africa. Morocco is the only country that experienced a peaceful transition, but the question remains whether or not the reform process there represents a true third way or merely a cosmetic shift that leaves the country ripe for revolution. Per Boukhars, neither of those characterizations is right, but it is nevertheless too early to tell the outcome of political reform in Morocco. In Tunisia, insecurity, deepening political polarization, and ideological extremism continue to plague the country and inhibit progress on political reform. Algeria has weathered popular upheavals and the opposition remains weak, but there have only been limited reforms and the government has used money to limit dissent. Nonetheless, the issue of President Bouteflika's successor presents potential complications for the future.

Marina Ottaway spoke about political reform in Morocco, a country she visited in late March – her third visit there since the start of the Arab Spring. Ottaway noted that she was struck by how little change had taken place in the country. She observed that people's debates and political discussions remained the same as when she was there in June 2012. For example, at that time reforms to the press code was about to be published. In March 2013, it was still about to be published. The same applied to subsidy reform. Despite this observation, Ottaway argued that the reform is more than just cosmetic in Morocco. The question is whether the pace of change is enough to satisfy Morocco and the aspirations of the people.

She answered with an overview of the Arab uprising in Morocco. In February 2011, demonstrations began in Morocco, but there was not an uprising and there was an immediate response from the government. The King kept his word – a new Constitution was approved in July and elections took place in November. How was this possible? First, Morocco had a history of minor reform from the top since the time of King Hassan II. The country made very real human rights progress and had experience with an opposition government. Second, the PJD is the most moderate of the Islamist parties in the region and was willing to work on a third way – partnering with the King for reform. Third, the Palace and the King's entourage were confident enough to know that they were still ultimately in control – they could run circles around everyone else. As Ottaway noted, in Morocco today, there is a very strong distinction between "le gouvernement" and "le pouvoir."

Therefore, Ottaway's assessment is that the reform process is real, but slow. There is no doubt that the King will push through reforms, but he will need to be pressured by the government and the people. That is not currently happening in Morocco - reform has been from the top without a push from the bottom. The King and his advisors know that they have to move forward with reform, but want to avoid the fallout from it. The King is comfortable and the government is hesitant to push for its prerogatives as defined in the Constitution. The PJD is terrified of confrontation with the King and it will be difficult to pressure him without confrontation. Ottaway stressed that the PJD has been far too cautious. With regard to the Constitution and what the PJD and the Parliament can do, Ottaway argued that Morocco is not a constitutional monarchy like it says – it is more like a semi-Presidential system except with a King instead of a President. There are executive powers reserved for the King and the Prime Minister, but the Prime Minister has been asking for his powers, rather than using them. As for the Parliament, which is empowered to adopt the organic laws required to implement the Constitution, it has an idea of what needs to be done, but hasn't done much. Only three of eighteen organic laws have been adopted thus far.

Despite the stalled status of reform, King Mohammed VI has thus far remained unscathed. He is popular, legitimate, and has a cadre of capable advisors. Furthermore, there is no real opposition in Morocco. The USFP is weak, so if pressure is not coming from the PJD, it is not happening. While in Morocco, Ottaway tried to identify a possible opposition, but couldn't. While the JCO, which Ottaway described as a potential game changer, represents a possibility, it isn't there yet. According to representatives of the organization that Ottaway spoke with, the group isn't interested in politics just yet. In addition, they confessed that they don't think they could mobilize people in the streets at this time, "even if they tried." As for other opposition groups, whatever Salafists there are in the country don't appear to be a factor and are certainly not organized. Finally, the protest movement is still alive, but is localized and ineffective at the national level.

In conclusion, Ottaway noted that Morocco represents an interesting experiment in reform from the top. If it can happen this way, it is the best option. Although wanting to avoid sounding too conservative, Ottaway argued that uprisings generally don't result in happy endings. If Morocco is able to make this process work, it will be great for the country and a great example for other countries and monarchs. For now, however, the lesson from Morocco is that reform from the top won't work without a push from the bottom.

Monica Marks addressed political reform in Tunisia. She underscored the transition that had occurred within the country as a result of the revolution – several ministers went from being in jail to holding ministerial positions in the very building in which they were held in confinement. Despite this evident symbolism, unfortunately there has not been a lot of progress in Tunisia. Marks ascertained that this was for institutional reasons, political reasons, and practical reasons. Institutionally, the Ministry of the Interior, which is responsible for security reform, is the most corrupt and is still staffed 90% by people who were there before the revolution. Politically, the drafting of the Constitution is still ongoing, which makes other reform more difficult. Pragmatically, the country is plagued by bureaucracy.

Jason Ullner gave a brief history of political reform in Algeria – referencing the civil war, the process of reconciliation, and the military's carte blanche for retaining power. Ullner argued that there has been slow, creeping reform in Algeria, although it is not clear who is in charge of what, with the DRS, the military, and Bouteflika all having some degree of power. Defining Algeria as a one-party state dominated by the FLN, Ullner addressed why, despite having similar problems to countries that experienced revolution – a massive youth bulge, food subsidies, etc. – Algeria had not experience an uprising. He argued that Algeria had its Arab Spring in 1991-1992. He doesn't view this as just an excuse, because he believes that Bouteflika is a different kind of leader, rather than a dictator; Bouteflika doesn't inspire ire like Ben Ali, and Algeria does have freedoms that didn't exist in neighboring countries, such as freedom of the press. Ullner noted that there have indeed been protests, but that they were small – largely because of DRS repression, but also because there has been no groundswell for drastic change. The Algerian people want slow, peaceful reform from within the government. In this regard, Ullner has seen a few steps in the right direction and believes that the government is coming along and headed in the right direction.

With regard to US interests in Algeria, Ullner stated that oil is always at the forefront, followed by Algeria's stance as a strong counterterrorism partner based on its historic experience in fighting Islamist terrorism. US-Algeria bilateral relations are rooted in this security cooperation and the two countries have strong intelligence and military relations. Algeria remains a bedrock for the US, particularly given instability in Mali and Libya. Seeking to deny suggestions that these relations came under pressure when Americans were killed at the attack on the In Amenas gas facility, Ullner stressed that the US maintained daily contact with its Algerian counterparts and the US was not caught off guard by developments. Defending this answer, Ullner argued that the "Algerians have a certain way of doing things" and that relations have only gotten better between the two countries since the attack at In Amenas. He cited the US-Algeria Strategic Dialogue as an indication of the strength of bilateral relations and noted that the US has encouraged Algeria to play a more active role in security issues in the region, including going beyond its borders, which is has historically refused to do.

Panel 2: Security Threats

Fernando Reinares assessed the security threats to and from the Sahel. He argued that terrorism is not the main problem North African countries face today, but certainly an important one. In order to put the current situation in context, Reinares provided a brief overview of the evolution of al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb. Founded in 2007, AQIM was at the start, an Algerian group with an Algerian agenda. It mostly carried out attacks within Algeria. Algerian counterterrorism efforts, however, became increasingly successful in later years, reducing the organization's capacity and forcing the organization to look again toward a sanctuary in northern Mali. With their new sanctuary established after the coup in Mali, AQIM started establishing alliances with other terrorist groups that began to operate in the region – MUJAO, a splinter group that in practices operates as a supporting aid, and Ansar Dine. At present, Reinares estimated that AQIM currently has 600-800 fighters and vast economic resources, but has settled primarily around Kidal and also made a tactical withdrawal to Mauritania.

Fred Wehrey addressed whether or not Libya is a failed or failing state. In making this assessment, he defined the three criteria for a failing state: the inability to control large swathes of territory; the lack of capacity to deliver services to its citizens; and the export of problems to its neighbors. Wehrey argued that Libya meets these conditions, but is in critical, but stable condition nonetheless, as failing assumes the existence of a state in the first place, which is not the case in Libya – Gaddhafi was the state. Wehrey also presented some positive assessments. First, the idea of a unified Libya exists. Second, oil production is increasing. Third, there is a lack of meddling by neighbors. Fourth, the political/ideological spectrum is narrow. Finally, infrastructure in the country has remained intact. For these reasons, Wehrey is optimistic, despite continued challenges, including marginalization of the periphery and the reality that the security sector is informal and dispersed.

Patrick Worman provided a macro-level analysis of the security threat in North Africa. He noted that there is a new AQIM focus on the Sahel because of the operational space it's been afforded there over the past few years – both as a result of the Algerian security services success in pushing them out and increased insecurity in neighboring countries. AQIM is now primarily fighting in countries ill-prepared to deal with them. The US is likewise concerned about al-Qaeda outreach efforts to AQIM trying to export instability and has developed policies to limit this, taking a holistic approach, including development and security measures. In terms of specific threats to the region, Worman only discussed Algeria and Libya, noting that he did not want to overlook Morocco, but that the country was a good news story as it maintains the longest counterterrorism partnership with the US and is not the locus of the current threat, which is in a band of Southern Algeria and the Sahel. As for Algeria, Worman noted that US-Algerian relations have become closer over the past 5-10 years because the threat is in Algeria's backyard, it has significant experience and strong capacity in counterterrorism operations, and there is broad public support for counterterrorism efforts throughout the country.

In Libya, Worman explained, the US is trying to cut down on the space within which terrorists can operation. They are trying to do so in a policy environment skeptical of US actions, which make its all the more difficult. In conclusion, Worman noted that the US preferences if for building long-term counterterrorism capacity in partner countries, building institutions in those countries, and building a unity of purpose among partner countries.

Keynote Address

Janet Sanderson provided personal observations on North Africa and US policy toward the region and shared her candid assessment of what the US got right and wrong. To start, she explained that the US government did not see the Arab Spring coming. It understood the issues behind it, but did not predict that 2011 would be a defining year. It is easy to understand common factors now, but the US didn't see the match that set it off. In the Maghreb, the US has been hampered in its mindset by its history in the region and its assessment that France was more involved there. This meant that the US rarely put the Maghreb at the top of the agenda, with a few exceptions such as the US-Morocco Free Trade Agreement and engagement with Gaddafi after his initial overture to the West. North Africa thus factored lightly in the US agenda. Presently, it has been said that North Africa is the Obama Administration's orphan and Sanderson acknowledged that this assessment is true. The Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs avoided leader to leader contact despite other contacts. However, benign neglect was not limited to the Obama Administration – it was the case under Clinton too, when it was clear that our approach was engagement light. For example, the US warmly embraced Morocco, but didn't engage in a politically substantive way. It engaged with Algeria based on counterterrorism issues alone, despite the clear US business interests in the country. It deemed Gaddafi crazy and left Tunisia to the Europeans. With the Arab Spring, the US was forced to pay attention to the region, but it saw developments through its own prism focusing on counterterrorism. As important as this issue is in the region, Sanderson underscored that it should not define US engagement there. In terms of the US response, the tools were not always the most nimble and effective, and the US often made events all about itself rather than the countries of the region.

In conclusion, Sanderson argued that the US can do better in the Maghreb and needs to redefine relations in the region. Its interests in promoting regional security, encouraging counterterrorism cooperation, securing access to energy and oil, and encouraging human rights, democracy, and the rule of law demand a reassessment of US relations in the Maghreb. There have been importance developments – an increase in exchange visits, Strategic Dialogues with Morocco and Algeria, and a broadened agenda for discussion and engagement. The question is whether the US is prepared to sustain the effort or not. In either case, this will require engagement from North Africa countries too as relations have to be based in partnerships.

Panel 3: Prospects for Regional Cooperation

Laurence Ammour gave a presentation on the Western Sahara issue, which she described as the blind spot of Algerian regional policy. Ammour referenced the Algerian position on regional counterterrorism cooperation and its veto of Moroccan membership in the Counterterrorism Center based in Algeria as evidence of Algeria's longstanding belief that it has preeminence in the Sahel and Sahara, quoting one official that said, "Last time I checked, Morocco doesn't have a Sahel border." Implicit in this statement was Algeria's assertion that Western Sahara will never be part of Morocco. The question that comes out of this for Ammour is: why has Algeria maintained this policy on the Western Sahara for over 40 years with no evolution? She sought to address this question by analyzing how the Western Sahara related to the domestic and foreign policy of Algeria. She argued that geopolitics and history explain Algeria's support for the Polisario and its broader stance on the Western Sahara. The relationship between Morocco and Algeria has been historically defined by border disputes – Morocco's territorial ambitions to broaden its borders to those of historic "greater Morocco," and Algeria's desire to limit Morocco's territorial ambitions and thereby assert and maintain geopolitical dominance of the Maghreb. The Western Sahara issue is a central part of geopolitical balancing in the region, as it is a marker of the territorial inequality between Morocco and Algeria. An additional factor is the dominant role of the military in both the founding of the Algerian state and in current domestic politics. The Western Sahara issue has proven useful domestically not only to justify military expenditures, but also to further Algeria's regional influence.

Why, however, in spite of developments in the region, including the political decline of the Polisario Front and the numerous incidents of Polisario involvement in terrorist and criminal activities (Ammour had a list of these on a power point she showed) has Algeria's stance not evolved accordingly? The reality is that little has changed in Algeria – Algerian leaders have failed to adapt to international relations and new political realities. Leaders are stuck in old ideologies. Unfortunately, Ammour sees little hopes for an evolution in Algeria's policy or for normalization of Moroccan-Algerian relations anytime soon. It is nevertheless time to move forward to resolve the humanitarian issue and ensure security cooperation to prevent the region from becoming even more of a hotbed for extremism and criminal activity in the region.

Glynn Torres-Spelliscy explained the legal issues behind resource development in the Western Sahara. He stressed that he was not assessing the wisdom of a policy choice on the issue either way, but was merely providing information on the legal options that apply to the situation there. There is a range of legally acceptable behavior on this issue and wisdom and legality are two very different concepts. Torres-Spelliscy also underscored that the issue of resource and economic development is an important one, as it offers the potential for cooperation without settling the question of the future political status of the Sahara. Development is likewise essential for both humanitarian and security issues and should not be limited before a political resolution.

Torres-Spelliscy detailed current economic challenges and opportunities in the Sahara before providing the legal context. The challenges are that the Sahara has limited arable land and is one of the least densely populated places the world. On the positive side, it has natural resources, namely phosphates, fish, and the potential for oil and gas, and the potential for agro-business. Economic development thus sounds difficult, but possible. Given that, what are the legal means for developing the territory? Torres-Spelliscy stated that Morocco has de-facto control of the territory, which is legally listed as a Non-Self-Governing Territory at the UN with Spain as the original administrative power. Although Spain attempted to transfer this power to Morocco and Mauritania via the Madrid accords, it was legally not allowed to do so. There is thus no administrative power in the territory. From a legal perspective, Morocco can either be sovereign, an administrative power, or an occupier. In this case, Morocco is not sovereign, it is not the legal administrator, but potentially a de-facto administrator, and it is not an occupier, as the country is listed as Non-Self Governing – not occupied. Fortunately, this issue does not have to be resolved legally in order for development to be allowed because there are some legal principals beyond this for the administration of natural resources. Several General Assembly Resolutions affirm the value of foreign economic investment if certain conditions are met, namely that the development must benefit the population and be in accordance with their wishes. Under Moroccan de-facto control, the benefits for the population are disputed. There is no doubt that Morocco has made serious investment in infrastructure and that looks likely to continue with the launch of the Economic, Social, and Environmental Council program for the territory. On the other hand, there are some questions about the distribution of these benefits. With regard to consultation, there is not sufficient legal evidence that the people have been consulted. There is no doubt that consultation has taken place and continues to do so in the Moroccan-controlled territory, but there has been no engagement with those Sahrawis displaced in the camps. That is where the issue stands today, although Torres-Spelliscy did note two signs of progress in conclusion: the 2011 request for a framework to develop a process for resource extraction and the 2012 agreement with UNEP to begin information sharing on the issue.

Lahcen Achy explored prospects for regional integration in the Maghreb, underscoring that the Western Sahara crisis has an impact on the whole region and on this issue. Why is regional integration important? According to Achy, it is needed to seize economic opportunities in the post-Arab Spring period, overcome reliance on Europe, and enhance security in the region. Despite these obvious advantages, the status of regional integration is disappointing. The region is losing 2-3% of GDP a year by not integrating, in addition to the added opportunity cost of spending. The region remains unattractive to large foreign investors because of limited opportunities for regional exports. Who bears the cost of this lack of integration? Achy argued that it's primarily the region's non-oil producing states of Morocco and Tunisia and the border areas within each country. Who benefits from the current status? Achy argued that is the countries that are less ready economically in terms of creating a policy environment for more open trade – namely, the least diversified economies and most dysfunctional business environments of Libya, Algeria, and Mauritania. Given these circumstances, what are the prospects for more integration in the near future? Unfortunately, they are not very good. Achy underscored that in order for increased integration to become widely appealing, countries require domestic reform first – on issues ranging from governance and corruption to the rule of law and leadership. The challenge is to engage people and not just leaders. Fortunately, people-to-people exchanges are starting and could provide the impetus for more exchange at the national level.

4. Q & A

Panel 1

Q: (World Affairs Council – Harrisburg, PA) Is it fair to think of the Islamist parties in Tunisia and Morocco as similar to European Christian Democratic parties? If that is an apt comparison, what should US engagement be with these parties? Lastly, is there a chance for an Islamist resurgence in Algeria.

A: (Marks) That is certainly what Ennadha wants to be like.

(Ottaway) The State Department has accepted that these parties have won elections – unlike what they did with Hamas. As for the comparison, it's a bit more complicated. They are more like the Christian Democrat parties of the past. The best comparison is conservative elements within the current US Republican party.

(Ullner) There will be a place for Islamists in Algerian politics, but the Islamist parties lost seats in the Spring 2012 election. It is unlikely that an Islamist will be President.

Q: (DCM – Algerian Embassy) I would like to make a correction to your assertions – Morocco is not the only country going through peaceful reform, Algeria is too.

A: (Ottaway) I beg to differ. Algeria hasn't reached a turning point. Yes, it has lots of political parties, and yes, there are some reforms, but Bouteflika is still the President and it is difficult to say a country is changing when it has the same government.

Q: (McDaniel student) Are you at all concerned about the status of women in any of these countries?

A: (Marks) The situation in Tunisia is much more positive and not nearly as bad as the analyses have been. Women have a voice within the Ennadha party and there are no threats to them from a legal perspective. That said, women have spoke of a rise in the security threat they face.

(Ottaway) There is fear among women in Egypt and Tunisia about their rights. This isn't the case in Morocco, but there is hostility between secular and conservative groups, although there hasn't been a change there from previous years.

Q: (Embassy of Spain) Could you evaluate the social and economic performance of the PJD, as well as the current status of the opposition movement and the leadership of the JCO?

A: (Ottaway) The potential is always there for renewed unrest in any country. I don't see anything imminent – and have not seen increased levels of discontent. As for the JCO, it's a paradox to me. It has to get involved in politics; otherwise it will become irrelevant by sidelining itself. There are several obstacles to political engagement by the JCO, however. First, there is the death of Sheikh Yassine and the lack of a new leader. Second, JCO will not only have to recognize the monarchy, but also the King as the commander of the faithful. Third, I don't think the situation is ripe. It was a surprising admission that representatives from the group said they would not mobilize people. Nevertheless, it seems bound to happen.

Q: (Boukhars) What I heard from US counterterrorism officials with regard to cooperation with Algeria differs from what I have heard today – is the relationship really that seamless?

A: (Ullner) The relationship has improved dramatically over the last ten years, but no, of course it is not on the level of say, US-England. In terms of how to influence Algeria, they don't want money. They want assistance on the state level – training and a constructive relationship, not the US telling them what to do.

Panel 2

Q: Does the US government have a “hearts and minds” strategy?

A: (Worman) We have been refining it since 9/11. We first increased assistance for development – which was like throwing money at the problem. This evolved into supporting local NGOs who do development work. Morocco has likewise developed this time of program to counterterrorism – treating it holistically through socio-economic assistance programs to target vulnerable demographics. The US prefers this type of an approach.

Panel 3

Q: (Charles Liebling, Western Sahara Endgame Blog) No one had discussed the options of independence or a referendum in the Western Sahara.

A: (Torres-Spelliscy) When you have a government in de-facto control, there are three legal scenarios. If the situation were to change, through a referendum or otherwise, and Morocco no longer be in de-facto control, it would be a different situation.

Q: (Marina Ottaway) Can you think of any examples of regional integration in places where political issues have been unresolved?

A: (Achy) Both West Africa and the MERCOSUR trade block have trade and economic integration despite differences in political systems.

C: (Ottaway) But this is different – it is more than just political differences. This is open conflict - unarmed, but open.

A: (Achy) If there is pressure, there might be some room for integration to drive a political solution. The countries need to address this issue and not avoid it like they are now. The circumstances are right given instability in the region.

(Ammour) Insecurity is in border areas and the economic figures about border trade reinforce the point about insecurity. There is trade, it is just in illicit goods. That is why regional integration could be so important. It could address insecurity in the border areas while improving development at the same time.

Q: What are the prospects for foreign investment?

A: (Achy) It is there, but the question is how to make it larger. For that, the Maghreb needs to represent a larger market for investors.

Q: Would it be possible to address these peripheral border areas individually or does it require regional cooperation?

A: (Ammour) It is easier if it's done regionally because if you develop borders through those means, you are developing two countries at the same time.

(Achy) It only works if it happens on both sides of the border. So borders need to be open.

5. Observation

Approximately 50 students, policymakers, and North Africa experts attended the all-day conference at McDaniel College. Generally, the panelists did not offer any really new insights into political, economic, and security developments in the Maghreb, although the conference was very valuable in that it dedicated an entire day to discussions on North Africa, which is important in and of itself given the way North Africa is not often prioritized in the US. The conference also helped clarify how the US – both experts and policymakers – continue to view the region. Some valuable conclusions can thus be drawn from the event. First, Morocco continues to be viewed as different from its neighbors in its approach to reform and as a potential model for its neighbors. That said, there is still widespread concern and skepticism about the political will of the Palace to initiate reform, the capacity of the PJD government to push for it, and the current pace of implementing reform. Second, the US prioritizes its counterterrorism relationships in the region and is unlikely to shift from that stance anytime soon. This is clearly the case with Algeria – a country which both representatives from the State Department emphasized as an important ally, despite obvious political issues that neither sought to mention. Third, the US continues to engage in the region bilaterally rather than regionally. This has an obvious impact on prospects for the US to promote regional integration and a resolution of the Western Sahara conflict. Finally, obvious progress has been made in getting North Africa on the radar of the United States at the very least. Whether or not this is sustainable is yet to be seen, but conferences like this one – and the words of Janet Sanderson admitting that the lack of engagement has been a problem – are hopeful signs for the future.

\(Back to top\)

Morocco's Reforms – Stalled or in Process?

MAMS Event Report

Date: April 10, 2013

1. Title: Morocco's Reforms – Stalled or in Process?

Hosted by the German Marshall Fund of the United States

Participants:

Rachid Benmokhtar Benabdellah: President, National Observatory for Human Development

Ivan Vejvoda: Vice President, Policy Programs, German Marshall Fund

Hassan Mneimneh: Moderator: Senior Transatlantic Fellow, German Marshall Fund

2. Overview

Among the states of North Africa, Morocco was the most proactive in responding to its Arab uprising, the February 20th Movement. King Mohammed VI called for a new constitution, which was quickly adopted. This paved the way for new elections and a new government coalition, led by the moderate Islamic Party of Justice and Development (PJD). Now, more than a year later, commentators and analysts are questioning to what degree reforms have been implemented and if the current government can promote needed reforms while balancing its relationships with the palace. Dr. Rachid Benmokhtar Benabdellah discussed the realities of the constitutional reform process and the pace of reform, pressing upon the need for further work and the obstacles ahead on the road to democratic reform. Benabdellah then presented the process by which his organization has begun to formulate a plan for the of development Morocco's southern provinces.

3. Summary

Mneimneh introduce Benabdellah and reviewed the recent history of liberal reforms in Morocco. According to Mneimneh, the recent constitutional reforms in Morocco were not enacted in response to the Arab Spring revolutions in Egypt and Tunisia and protests in Morocco. Rather, the Arab Spring reinvigorated a reform process that began almost 20 years ago, during the reign of King Hassan II. In fact, King Hassan II appointed Benabdellah Minister of Education in order to "clean house," as it were, in preparation for the introduction of democratic reforms.

Benabdellah indicated a few key impediments to Morocco's development that must be overcome: the lack of democracy, weak economy, fractured education and healthcare systems, the lack of inclusion of women, and poor governance. The main issue to be solved is the lack of democracy, especially in local government. However, Morocco is a complex country; it is large, multiethnic, and multilingual, and there has long been a separation between the "useful Morocco" (mostly urban centers) and the largely neglected countryside. For all of these reasons, it has long been difficult to write a reformed and inclusive constitution. The reform push accelerated rapidly once the Arab Spring came to Morocco, with protests calling out against corruption (but, significantly, not calling for the overthrow of the government). Since then, the country has advanced significantly. There have been improvements in human rights protections. The new constitution incorporates the standards set by all of the international conventions that Morocco has ratified. It gave more recognition to the country's minority groups by naming Amazigh as a national language. However, Morocco still has a long way to go with its democratic reforms, and the country is facing a number of crises, including the influx of immigrants, weak economy, and fluctuating consumer prices.

Benabdellah then presented what he referred to as the Moroccan government's agenda for development, to be carried out in three steps. The first step is to learn as much as possible from development experts. To this end, Benabdellah and other members of the Economic, Social, and Environmental Council (CESE) have met with scholars, consultants, elected officials, and local authorities in order to draft a roadmap for regionalization and further development. They then prepared a preliminary document in the beginning of January to serve as a starting point for the regionalization process. The second step was to take that document and bring it to the southern provinces of Morocco, where regionalization will be most crucial. It was important that they treated this presentation openly, frankly, and as a two-way discussion, both presenting information and taking suggestions from the people they met. Development is both desperately needed and particularly tricky in the south, due to factors such as the more nomadic culture, proximity to the border with Algeria, and the proliferation of Saharan drug trafficking. Thus, development in the south will require a revision of security, economic, and social policies in order to attract investment to the region and create jobs for its impoverished residents. The third step was to return to Rabat with this input from the residents of the southern provinces and their previous research and to assess it. CESE organized the information into a comprehensive report on the state of development and human rights in the country. The next step will be to put together a team to address the three main impediments to development in the south that the report indicated: economic/social issues, environmental issues, and cultural issues. Benabdellah is confident in Morocco's potential for success in development and reform.

4. Q & A

Q: Despite the existence of the 2004 Family Code there is a high level of illiteracy and disparity between men and women. Is this a rural or country wide phenomenon?

A: (Benabdellah) It is a rural phenomenon, and there are three factors that explain why such high levels still exist. Firstly, when Morocco was still a protectorate of France, only coastal cities were developed, creating a lag between rural and urban areas. Secondly education programs are a failure. After the recognition of Amazigh as an official language, the system attempted to standardize three Berber dialects into one. In addition, there is an overall lack of teachers and most teachers tend to migrate to the cities to find jobs. Lastly, until the 90s gender discrimination was very widespread. Families did not and still do not want to send their daughter to schools, but instead have them stay at home or be hired as maids. Although the illiteracy rate has decreased dramatically we have yet to solve the alarming dropout rate.

Q: (Pamela Beecroft, Center for International Private Enterprise) What are two or three approaches Morocco should take as it begins its road towards democracy?

A: (Benabdellah) Democracy goes hand in hand with education. We are stuck in a traditional paradigm which consists of employing new leaders based on their networking and money. Efforts are now being made to move beyond this and employ leaders based on their merit and knowledge. There needs to be a behavioral change. Authority figures need to serve the people. Also, universal values need to be implemented in the daily lives of Moroccans. The administration and the civil society need to work together. For example, the INDH fosters participation between people, local authorities, and elected leadership and has also introduced projects to lower the rate of unemployment. Lastly, accountability, assessment, and evaluation need to be implemented and enforced to maintain transparency.

Q: What is the relationship between the EU and Morocco in terms of trade and can it be extended to other facets?

A: (Benabdellah) Our partnership with the EU and the US is important; part of our progress is creating more openness with our partners. Despite the European crisis, Morocco maintained its resilience. Agreements between Morocco and the EU go beyond simple trade agreements with Morocco slowly integrating European norms. However, implementing EU political and financial standards tends to be complex and at times unfavorable.

Q: (Alvaro Ortega, Embassy of Spain) Can you assess the special commitment currently given to developing the North?

A: (Benabdellah) The current commitment to developing the North has some historical ties. Pre-independence, the only developed cities in Morocco were those located on the coast. Furthermore, each city had a specific function. For example, Rabat was the administrative city, Casablanca the fiscal hub, and Marrakesh the heart of tourism. Tangier was rich because it was an international city. However, when Morocco gained its independence, the city collapsed with the departure of 300 banks. For thirty to forty years, Tangier was forgotten. A road is currently being created from Tangier to Oujda. Citizens from Casablanca and Marrakesh are coming to work in Tangier, completing the comprehensive ecosystem of the "northern development" that is composed of education, transportation, communication, and technology. Due to the current crisis in Mali, investors are fearful of spillover effects and are thus hesitant to invest. However, Morocco is demonstrating its success in biodiversity, citing Argan oil in southern local industries, green energy in Ourzazate, and promising solar and wind power in Tantan.

Q: (Robert Holley, Moroccan American Center for Policy) What is the role of civil society in promoting cultural reform specifically for southern associations to become legitimate and independent?

A: (Benabdellah) The current associations are not playing the role we want them to. The government is being selective in accepting or rejecting associations, basing its decisions on what projects are being planned. Many of the NGOs that have historically opposed the government were the most vocal in the discussions we hosted, which is excellent because debate is part of democracy. There is a lack of standardization in rules and norms. Once these norms and rules are fixed, legitimacy can be established and respected by the authorities.

Q: (Robert Holley, Moroccan American Center for Policy) The absence of external partners and subsequently the lack of international resources directly impacts regional development in the south of Morocco. This being said, how can the government encourage external investment?

A: (Benabdellah) There is no international investment because there is no Moroccan investment. The government needs to create incentives that will in turn lead to an attractive market for investors. The current law states that associations cannot receive foreign money. An independent fund specific to aiding southern associations needs to be created to include training, capacity building, and mobility, which will then empower the people.

5. Observation

There were approximately 30 people in attendance from MAC, the German Marshall Fund, and DC-based think tanks and embassies. Benabdellah discussed both Morocco's successes and failures in development and in democratic change in a very frank way. He did not avoid uncomfortable topics in his speech nor did he skirt uncomfortable questions from the audience. This speaks to the openness of his organization and other government bodies in Morocco who are working to implement the reforms established in the most recent constitution and bodes well for the legitimacy of the reform process. Experts like Benabdellah are excellent advocates for Morocco, as they highlight Morocco's successes and challenges in a frank and credible way. Further visits by such experts will help tell Morocco's story in the US.

\(Back to top\)

March/April Events Bulletin

March 5

Dateline Egypt and North Africa: Updates from the Field

March 8

The Arab Awakening: Lessons Learned and Challenges Ahead

March 18

Economic Turmoil in Arab Countries - Can Partners Help?

March 20

Counterterrorism Policies and Priorities: Addressing the Evolving Threat

March 28

Algeria Between Reform and Stability

April 8

Political Change and Security in North Africa

April 10

Morocco's Reforms - Stalled or In Process?

Dateline Egypt and North Africa: Updates from the Field

Date: March 5, 2013

1. Title: Dateline Egypt and North Africa: Updates from the Field

Hosted by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy

Participants:

Eric Trager: Next Generation Fellow, The Washington Institute

Aaron Y. Zelin: Richard Borow Fellow, The Washington Institute

David Pollock: Kaufman Fellow, The Washington Institute

Robert Satloff: Executive Director, The Washington Institute

2. Overview

As Secretary Kerry makes his inaugural Middle East trip, states across North Africa face rising tensions among the forces for democracy, stability, and Islamic political ascendancy. In Egypt and Tunisia, revolutions have given way to uncertainty and violence, while Morocco's model of stable reform -a monarch with an Islamist prime minister - tends to obscure other elements lurking just beneath the surface. To assess these changes and their consequences for the region and the United States, three Washington Institute fellows recently conducted intensive research trips to each of these countries, where they spoke frankly with a wide range of government officials, opposition leaders, security officers, and human rights activists, both secularist and fundamentalist. At this policy forum, the panelists discussed their findings.

3. Summary

Robert Satloff opened the forum by noting that the current political climate of North Africa is complex and that the various countries of the region all face very different issues. Egypt is struggling to tackle economic and political issues at the same time as restoring security and the rule of law. Moving west, Tunisia faces political uncertainty and the rise of a Salafist movement. Algeria is confronting insurgent terrorism and a security blowback from Mali. All the way to the west, Morocco endured the Arab Spring quietly, but there are subterranean political developments in course there. Each of the panelists addressed the country they visited on a recent trip to the region, with Eric Trager discussing Egypt, Aaron Zelin discussing Tunisia, and David Pollack discussing Morocco only, as he was not able (authorized?) to visit Algeria on this most recent occasion.

Eric Trager provided an assessment of the political players in Egypt, devoting most of his presentation to an analysis of the Muslim Brotherhood's politics, policies, and power within the Egyptian system. He profiled emerging political leaders in the Brotherhood, as well as non-Islamist parties and actors. In closing, Trager noted several important factors for US policy going forward. First, he argued that Egypt will not be a major regional player for the time being given its own domestic issues. Second, the US must force the Muslim Brotherhood to make touch changes that would lead it to moderate its behavior now. Lastly, though mass upheaval is unlikely, the US must be monitor possible triggers for further instability.

Aaron Zelin characterized Tunisia as experiencing stagnation and polarization. It has failed to lived up to lofty expectations following its revolution and many of the problems that incited the revolution remain, particularly the continued issue of having more college graduates than available jobs. Zelin also noted that the perceived deterioration of security is very much present.

David Pollack discussed what he termed "the most interesting country in the region - Morocco." For Pollack, Morocco is the most interesting because not much is happening there. He questioned how Morocco has managed to get through the Arab Spring without much upheaval, particularly since it is afflicted with many of the same development challenges as its neighbors, including poverty, high illiteracy rates, and high youth unemployment - perhaps indicating that its revolution is to come. He also questioned its role as a potential model, citing the arguments of observers, namely Ignatius and Zakaria, that the country is a model of how a monarch can lead his country through a gradual process of democratization. Pollack argued that neither view is right - Morocco is neither reforming nor is it ripe for revolution. It is a special case that entails a mixture of modest reforms and stability, for both the present and the future.

To support his assertions, Pollack addressed three themes: the status of the reforms, the status of the PJD and the Islamists, and potentially lessons learned from Morocco's experience. In addressing the first, Pollack detailed the emergence of the February 20th movement and its protests against corruption. He stated that King Mohammed VI responded immediately to these protests by pursuing reforms and a new Constitution that placed some limits on the King's power. These reforms were followed by the election of a true opposition party for the first time in Moroccan history and a new government led by a Prime Minister that was not appointed by the King, but rather by the winning party, the PJD. These measures of reformed quieted the popular protests, but Pollack argued that they were less than meets the eye. In reality, the King and the palace control much of political and economic life. In addition, the PJD is a compliant party that is not a real Islamist party – the real Islamist party is the JCO. Pollack provided examples of what he perceived to be the King and the palace's continued control of the country, citing the case of the list of corrupt officials being published as a faux attempt at reform, since there was no punishment for these officials and many of them still profit from political and economic favors from the palace. He also cited continued redlines on criticizing the King, referencing arrests and detentions of the King's critics, as well as the palace's practice of using political and economic power to keep political parties compliant.

Turning to the PJD, Pollack stated that the party is neither independent nor Islamist. During his stay in Morocco, he met with a senior minister in the PJD cabinet who reinforced this opinion when he noted that, "the PJD is not in government in order to confront the King, no to Islamize the country, which is already Muslim." Pollack stressed that the Palace always wins when there is controversy between the PJD and the King. He referenced several examples to support this point: the PJD's plan to have television programs only broadcast in Arabic, which was rejected by the Palace; the PJD's plan for education reform, which was rejected by the Palace; and the PJD's attempt to ban commercials about gambling, which the Palace only agreed to limit and not ban. The true Islamist party, according to Pollack, is thus the JCO – an important grassroots movement whose size observers can only estimate. Guesses vary from .5 to 1 million, with .5 million people attending the funeral of the former leader of the JCO Sheikh Yassine. While in Morocco, Pollack had the fortunate opportunity to meet with several JCO leaders – a rare occurrence for a secretive and banned, but tolerated organization. These leaders argued that Islam and democracy are incompatible in theory, but that there are ways to make them compatible in practice through gradual implementation, which the JCO can explore "when we come to power."

Turning to the question of sharia, the JCO interlocutor stated that yes, the JCO wanted to implement true Islam and create a just society. He also stressed that sharia isn't just about cutting off people's hands as it is perceived in the West. He did say that ultimately, yes, the implementation of sharia is a priority, but only when a just society has been established (insinuating that there would be no need to cut off people's hands for stealing because there would be no injustice and thus no need to steal). At that point in the interview, the interlocutor said to Pollack, "Why are you concerned with petty thieves when the biggest thief in the country – whether in Morocco or Saudi Arabia – is the King?" Pollack responded, "So do you want to cut off the King's hand?" To which the JCO leader did not reply, noting instead that they want a different government, neither a phony PJD revolution nor the overthrow of the monarchy. The JCO is even accepting of Morocco under a real constitutional monarchy in which the King has no power and only a symbolic role. Based on this conversation, Pollack argued that Morocco is still repressive in many ways, despite some reform. He stressed that if the repression continues and the JCO continues to gain followers, there is the potential for a well-organized, fundamentalist revolution by the JCO.

Yet, despite this assertion, Pollack still believes that Morocco is stable and will remain so. Why? For one, the King is still personally popular and he maintains the advantage of being able to blame the government and his own entourage for anything that goes wrong. Moroccan citizens tend to do this as well, blaming the palace team for corruption. Second, the example of the Arab Spring two years later is not appealing to many Moroccans. The country has allowed a measure of reform which has assuaged some of the discontent and provided a glimmer of hope for further reform. That said Pollack does not believe that there is anything Morocco can teach the Arab world. Morocco is special and the blend of the King's personality, the fear of contagion, and modest reform is difficult to replicate.

Robert Satloff provided a concluding remark about the pace of change across the Maghreb, noting that in Egypt, Islamists have rushed to consolidate their power; in Tunisia, they have sought to stretch out the process; and in Morocco, Islamists have both stretched it out and remained deferent to traditional power structures, hoping eventually that power will land on their doorstep.

4. Q & A

Q: (Ralph Nurnburger) During your trip, were you able to get an assessment of the status of the Western Sahara or the security situation in the region?

A: (Pollack) You can't talk to a Moroccan official without them mentioning the Western Sahara. It is part of the standard discourse. They reference the autonomy situation and note that although things aren't perfect in the south, they are better than in the camps. This nationalist cause is helpful to the government and the palace in terms of domestic political security as it serves as a rallying cause, even though the status quo is tenable. Whenever there are protests, the King says the country must remain united for territorial sovereignty and it works. As for security, the spillover from the region has literally not touched Morocco. A recent report from Yonah Alexander notes zero attacks in 2012. It is a point of caution for Morocco and they want cooperation with their neighbors in confronting this challenge. They blame Algeria for blocking regional cooperation, just like Algeria blames Morocco.

Q: (Jennifer Lambert, US Department of State) What has been the impact of Sheikh Yassine's death on JCO? What about the role of Nadia Yassine?

A: (Pollack) The JCO is very secretive and did not talk about internal issues with me – they were not prepared to talk about the impact of his death, which is still uncertain. Sheikh Yassine was charismatic and JCO lost that, but it has not led to splits in the movement, nor is there a new charismatic leader. Nadia was an effective spokesperson and her role as a woman was unique and unlike other Islamist organizations, perhaps as a testament to the strong Sufi traditions of the JCO. But, I think her star has faded with the death of her father – she owed her position to her father and for now has dropped from view.

Q: (Yonah Alexander) Could you provide your assessment of the impact of refugee flows on the security situation in the Sahel?

A: (Pollack) The refugee issue didn't come up during my visit. Morocco is intent on securing its borders and it does that effectively – it has a very large security apparatus. There don't appear to be big population flows throughout the country.

5. Observation

Approximately 30 think tank experts and WINEP patrons attended the event and another 50 participants watched online. While Morocco was discussed in detail, David Pollack was highly skeptical of Morocco's reform process and its potential as a model. He used the term "makhzan" throughout his presentation when referring to the power structure in the palace. It is clear that he primarily met with the PJD and the JCO during his visit to Morocco, thus skewing his perceptions. Bizarrely, Pollack seemed to be pushing for a real Islamist party to come to power, as if Morocco could only reform under the leadership of an Islamist party, like Egypt and Tunisia are trying to do. Given the negative outcomes, at least so far, in those countries, this was a surprising stance to take, particularly for an organization like WINEP which had tended to provide more positive assessments of Morocco and has a pretty anti-Islamist bent. Pollack also provided no alternatives to Morocco's current path of reform, only observations, thus limiting the usefulness of his assessments. MAC should nevertheless reach out to Pollack and WINEP to provide them briefings and information on reform.

\(Back to top\)

The Arab Awakening: Lessons Learned and Challenges Ahead

Date: March 8, 2013

1. Title: The Arab Awakening: Lessons Learned and Challenges Ahead

Hosted by the Woodrow Wilson Center Middle East Program

Participants

Rami G. Khouri: Director, Issam Fares Institute for Public Policy and International Affairs, American University of Beirut

Robin Wright: Wilson Center-USIP Distinguished Scholar

Haleh Esfandiari: Moderator: Director, Middle East Program, Wilson Center

2. Overview

This event provided a brief overview of some preliminary conclusions that scholars have made on the state of Arab democracy two years after the Arab Awakening, as well as some of their predictions for the future. Both speakers presented their analyses of the Arab Awakenings, the current status of the major players and issues, and some thoughts on trends that are emerging.

3. Summary

Khouri identified eight trends of the Arab Awakening.

1. There is a clear set of grievances common to all of the uprisings that are expressed in different ways. These grievances are a combination of calls for political rights and for "material needs" (jobs and economic opportunities), and understanding the balance of these two categories is crucial to understanding the uprisings in any one country. Mohamed Bouazizi in Tunisia is an example of how a lack of political rights and material needs sparked revolution; Bouazizi's sole means of subsistence was destroyed, and then he was denied political recourse. According to Khouri, it will be important to pay attention to protests in Kuwait; if we can identify what grievances have sparked protests in a largely homogenous, wealthy country, then we will be better-able to understand the motivations behind protests in other Arab countries.
2. The intensity and depth of the sentiments driving these protests are far beyond what we initially thought; it goes far beyond "breaking the barrier of fear." That is, these revolutions aren't simply about Arab populations overcoming the activation barrier of airing their grievances with the government in public; rather, they are fueled by deep-seated discontent with the old regimes and passion for democratic change.
3. In spite of these general commonalities in motivation, there are tremendous differences in the types of protests we see and the levels of government response. This is attributable to the disparities in regime type and government legitimacy between the different Arab states.

4. The technical logistics of democratic transitions, such as constitution-writing and institution-building, are much more important than elections; agreeing on a set of laws governing the country is crucial in transitioning from a one-party autocracy or a monarchy to an elected democracy.
5. It is easy to either exaggerate or underestimate the role of religion and Islamist parties, but we should be careful to do neither. Religiosity, or lack thereof, will be an important factor to take into account in the construction of post-revolutionary identity in these nascent democracies; it is entirely possible that, when a strong Arab democracy emerges, it will have a degree of religiosity in its governing structure. We must be cognizant of this and its potential implications, including the potential for the majority religious identity to infringe upon the rights of religious minorities (such as the Copts in Egypt). However, it is becoming clear that Islamist parties and candidates in countries such as Egypt are beginning to lose their popularity; in recent polls Mohammed Morsi only garnered 25% of popular support, whereas before he had 50%. Furthermore, Islamist parties such as Ennahda appear to be fracturing. In sum, Muslim religiosity may play a larger role in the new Middle Eastern democracy than it does in Western society, but in the end Islamists are like any other politicians and are susceptible to public disapproval for failing to effectively govern.
6. We must be patient with these nascent democratic institutions, because it is clear that none of the actors involved in these democratic transitions have any experience in elected, accountable democratic governance. It is simply too soon for us to say that, in light of recent violence in countries such as Tunisia and Egypt, the Arab Awakening has failed.
7. One significant shift that we have seen since the beginning of the Arab Awakening is that the citizenry of these countries are no longer content to live under autocratic government. The populations of these countries expect government accountability and are willing to change the government if need be.
8. Returning to the issue of material rights versus political rights, it is clear that, while material rights have driven the protests at a grassroots level, the true issues underlying the popular revolutions are political rights and social justice. The evidence for this is the fact that people in the MENA region have been voicing discontent on such critical issues as dignity, respect, justice, and political participation for the past five years.

Khouri concluded his discussion by stating that, in order to understand the Arab Awakening and its aftermath, we must keep in mind the "5 R's": (citizen) revolt, rights, respect, reconfiguration, and re-legitimization. While there have been obvious growing pains in the establishment of elected democracies in the post-Arab Awakening states, the problems inherent in this transition are vastly overwhelmed by the fact that now, for the first time after decades of autocracy, there are millions of Arabs who are writing constitutions.

Wright began by noting that we should not judge the Arab Awakening a failure based solely upon political strife in countries such as Egypt and Tunisia, because there is a distinction between the politics of change and the culture of change. While true political change may be stalled, democratic change has become an inexorable part of popular culture in these countries, and is unlikely to disappear. She then presented her own list of significant political trends of the Arab Awakening:

1. There are now 120 million Arabs who have been empowered by democratic revolution. Wright expects that each of the 22 Arab regimes will be challenged. However, more people in the Arab world are afraid of democratic change now than two years ago, due to a number of factors, including political and social turmoil, the unpredictability and violence of reform, the lack of effective political managers, and the lack of a defined, effective new order emerging to fill the power vacuum. This is why the constitution-writing process will be crucial to effective democratic transition in each of these states.

2. Almost every Arab country is worse off, economically speaking, than it was two years ago. While many Arabs in the MENA region have far more freedoms, there are far fewer jobs. No country, not even those who have not seen democratic revolution, is immune to this economic turmoil.
3. The so-called "proliferation of democracy" has negative consequences. It has resulted in the creation of far too many political parties; for example, in Libya 130 parties ran for 80 seats in the legislature. This proliferation is the result of many different political opinions and a lack of willingness on the part of legislative hopefuls to pool their resources and collaborate to affect the kind of change that they can agree upon. This not only weakens candidates, but the democratic process as a whole.
4. Far from being a monolithic group, Islamists exist on a spectrum. Despite the conventional wisdom that political strife in nascent Arab democracies exists largely in an Islamist versus secularist dichotomy, there are deepening divisions between different Islamist parties and within Islamist parties. On the extreme end of the spectrum, the Salafists have influence disproportionate with their numbers, because they still have the kind of energy, focus, and discipline that even the Muslim Brotherhood no longer has.
5. With the proliferation of arms and militias in countries such as Libya, Syria, and Egypt, the security situation in the region is deteriorating.
6. Local tribes have re-emerged as the primary source of identity where modern nation-states have failed. This is especially prevalent in Libya, Iraq, Jordan, and Syria.
7. Nascent democracies in the MENA region will have to accept the demographic realities of their populations: these populations are overwhelmingly young, and these young people expect healthcare, jobs, and education from the governments that they put into power.
8. Corruption is already running rampant in new Arab democracies because everyone in the new administrations feels entitled to a piece of the proverbial pie.
9. Women have fared very poorly in terms of political pull, seats in parliament, and basic security.
10. Sykes-Picot – and the maintenance of current borders - may not survive this political unrest. Wright was confident that the boundaries of some countries, Iraq in particular, are liable to change.

4. Q & A

Q: (Joshua Policek, Department of State Office of Global Women's Issues) Do the issues we've seen with regard to the status of women in these countries represent the failure of modernism and equality in these countries?

A: (Wright) I'm not sure that we can say this is the failure of modernism. Women have been a driver of change in this region, especially as women's literacy increases. However, these ascendant women are confronted with the very real challenges of latent patriarchal tradition and tribalism. Also, it has only been two years since the Arab Awakening began; it is too early to state with any confidence that modernism has failed.

(Khouri) We cannot say that this represents the breakdown of the modern nation-state in the Arab world, because, frankly, the Arab world has never before had modern nation-states. These states are still tackling questions of basic governance and constitution-writing, and in these patriarchal societies that lack a strong women's movement it follows that women's rights will be put on the back-burner until the issues of state formation have been dealt with. It will take time for women to have their voices heard, but we cannot categorically call this a failure. However, there have been some encouraging developments, such as the push to address equality of the sexes in Tunisia.

Q: (Jane Harman, Woodrow Wilson Center) How much of a role will anti-Zionism play in these transitions? Is Israel even relevant?

A: (Wright) Israel is never irrelevant. Arab governments in trouble will always use Israel as a diversionary tactic. While we have not yet seen much of this yet, and in fact the Egyptian government went as far as to openly collaborate with Israel on security issues in the Sinai Peninsula, it is only a matter of time.

(Khouri) The issue of Israel/Palestine is enormously important to people around the region, who by and large strongly support Palestinian rights. While the Israeli-Arab conflict has not played into the Arab Awakening protests, there appears to be a connection between the sense that these authoritarian Arab regimes lack legitimacy and the humiliation felt by Arab populations over their governments being unable to stand up to Israel and the United States. Furthermore, these populations are worried that support for Israel will become the metric by which the US and other major powers judge the legitimacy of democratically elected Arab governments.

Q: Will Sunni/Shia sectarianism replace the Israeli-Arab conflict in political significance?

A: (Khouri) I believe the sectarian divide is greatly exaggerated; we were never concerned with sectarianism until the US invaded Iraq. While there has been sectarian violence, which has made sectarianism front-page news, this does not constitute a major, long-term issue in the MENA region. If anything, the root of this violence is more closely tied to issues of tribalism, and not sectarianism.

(Wright) I have to disagree; my great fear is that sectarianism could define the region more and more in the years to come, especially with respect to alliances with Iran. For example, Saudi Arabia supports Western economic intervention in Iran (via sanctions), and would support US military intervention in Iran; I fear that this is fueled by the so-called "guardians" of Sunni Islam wanting to attack the center of Shia power.

Q: (John Anderson, former Foreign Service Officer) What might the form and shape of democratic transition in Saudi Arabia and the rest of the Gulf look like?

A: (Khouri) The difference in the Gulf is that there are no anti-monarch revolutionary pressures to speak of; that is, the people are more interested in reform than overthrowing the regime, similar to the situation we see in Morocco. There are small movements in Saudi Arabia to open up and liberalize the country, and this will result in a very slow movement towards liberalization. It is possible that we may see a constitutional monarchy in Saudi Arabia in the future.

5. Observation

The event was attended by approximately 40 people, a mix of policy professionals, students, and casual observers. In my opinion, the panelists did not have enough time to fully flesh out the observations that they made, so it is difficult to pull meaningful conclusions from the speeches, either specifically in relation to Morocco or in general. Essentially, Wright and Khouri came to the same general conclusion: It is too soon to tell whether or not these revolutions have been successful, and with some qualifications, we may be cautiously optimistic about their eventual outcomes. One thing I found notable in relation to Morocco was that they both emphasized the importance of constitution-writing; this presents an opportunity for MAC to highlight the progressiveness of Morocco's new constitution. While there have been some hiccups in its implementation, Morocco having a new constitution that protects human and civil rights can be presented as an evidence that the country's gradual democratic transition is a model for the rest of the Arab world.

\(Back to top\)

Economic Turmoil in Arab Countries- Can Partners Help?

Date: March 18, 2013

1. Title: Economic Turmoil in Arab Countries- Can Partners Help?

Hosted by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Participants:

Marwan Muasher: Vice President of Studies, Middle East Program, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Ibrahim Saif: Senior Associate, Middle East Center, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Jean-Pierre Chauffour: Lead Country Economist, Morocco; Regional Trade Coordinator in the Middle East and North Africa Region, World Bank

Nemat Shafik: Deputy Managing Director, International Monetary Fund

Uri Dadush: Moderator: Senior Associate and Director, International Economic Program, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

2. Overview

More than two years after the outbreak of pro-reform revolutions in several countries in the Middle East and North Africa (MENA), the economic situation in the region remains precarious. Progress in restoring confidence as well as sustainable and rapid economic growth will depend on internal forces and the return of political stability. External partners may also play a role in helping normalize and eventually improve the underlying growth fundamentals of these economies. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace hosted a panel discussion that both examined economic and political reforms within the region and assessed the degree to which external partners could play in addressing the challenges Arab governments face as they transition to democracy.

3. Summary

Nemat Shafik believes that the future of the region will be determined largely by domestic forces with little external aid. She also made note of the commonalities between the nations: a decline in economic growth, an increase in unemployment, high economic expectations, stretched government budgets, a decline in currency reserves, and a lack of a serious internal plan. She emphasized that the last similarity is particularly hindering due to the government's "lack of a destination point" on both an economic and political front.

Despite the lack of a macroeconomic crisis, Shafik believes that the overall outlook of each country is nowhere near positive. The shaky international markets and spillover effect from the civil war in Syria are factors threatening the stability of the region. She stated that there are five reforms that need to be implemented immediately: a transition from rent seeking to actual capitalism, increased exports, reform of the labor market (to include women) and education, increased bank financing, and moving from untargeted subsidies to safety nets, which simultaneously creates space for investment. She concluded that the involvement of external partners, although important, should be limited and urged the creation of institutions that will enable a separation of powers, transparency, and competitiveness.

Jean-Pierre Chauffour reiterated the need to “stick to one direction”. He pointed out that political reforms go hand in hand with the current economic situation. Chauffour called for immediate economic integration with European markets. In order for this to occur, according to Chauffour, Europe needs to rebuild its credibility in five ways. Primarily, it needs to facilitate market access for imported products. This has already been achieved with Morocco, but can be done with other countries like Tunisia, Egypt, and Jordan. In addition, encouraging labor mobility, promoting solar exports, improving the regulatory environment, and fostering overall closer economic relationships with the Mediterranean are other ways Europe can demonstrate its commitment.

Marwan Muasher echoed the need to establish institutions. Muasher is frustrated that Middle Eastern policymakers continue to attempt to isolate political from economic reforms. He noted that the solution is simple and “so self-evident”; economic and political reform must go hand in hand. Muasher reminded the audience that change takes time and that the current status of the Egyptian economy, although dire, is much better than it was during the 1980s. He argued that the bad economic conditions might actually be a blessing in disguise for countries in the region that have not foregone a democratic transition because it will force those governments to open their political space to outside forces. According to Muasher, the solution resides in detail-orientated, inclusive, measurable plans that include performance indexes and specific timeframes that center on unemployment and the fiscal deficit.

Ibrahim Saif focused on how conditions for social justice could be created, reached, and enabled. He reminded the audience that the Arab Spring began with the economic demands. Saif believes that the root problem is political identity and polarization. Specifically, economic forces are still driven by political connections and networking. Saif cited Egypt, Morocco, and Tunisia as examples of such dynamics. Furthermore, he underscored that weak and inefficient bureaucracies have led civilians to turn their backs on the process of reform. Another aggravation is the lack of capacity from the private sector. Saif concluded that domestic markets must be reconstructed, formal institutions must be established, open dialogue with unions must be created, and budget priorities on how to spend public money must be defined.

4. Q & A

Q: (Uri Dadush) Is there a difference between the Gulf and Maghreb countries?

A: (Muasher) The region’s governments are split between two camps. Countries that are in the midst of reform like Egypt and Tunisia or those like the Gulf monarchies whose governments believe that they are immune to the demands for reform. The latter have failed to internalize the message of reform.

Q: (Mohammed Schenaou) What kind of considerations are constraining the IMF from doing more to address the region’s economic challenges?

A: (Shafik) The IMF does not envision itself as the sole provider for all the necessary financing to encourage growth. In fact, the IMF relies heavily on individual pledges from European partners.

Q: (Mohamed Mensouri, American University) How can countries engage their society?

A: (Chauffour) What we do is try to complement the IMF. The populace has great expectations. Countries need to try to promote dialogue by advocating education, women’s participation, transparency, citizen participation in politics, and the strengthening of Parliaments.

Q: (Ed Miker, advisor to the government of Oman) Is there evidence of short term gains that could serve as an inspiration for long term gains?

A: (Muasher) I don't believe in short term gains. Earlier, people knew that sacrifices needed to be made in order to pursue democracy. Now, however, people feel like they are sacrificing for nothing because they do not believe that their governments are serious about reform. Also their ability to sacrifice is limited.

t Shafik) I believe that freedom is a short term gain; people can stand up and speak their mind. Signals of support from the international community also mean a lot.

(Chauffour) The short term gains are few low hanging fruits. A short term gain that could have some very short term results would be moving away from rent seeking to capitalism. Another short term problem that is easily fixable is reopening the border between Morocco and Algeria, which has been inhibiting them from trading and information sharing.

5. Observation

This event attended by approximately 75 individuals, composed primarily of college students and regional experts, in addition to a few officials from regional embassies. Jean-Pierre Chauffour is the lead country economist for Morocco and regional trade coordinator in the Middle East and North Africa Region for the World Bank, so it could be useful to cultivate a relationship with him. He was also the only panelist to highlight Morocco's successful relationship with Europe and that the reopening the border between Morocco and Algeria will be highly beneficial. However, the insight provided by the panelists was nothing new; all reiterated the need for the establishment of clear domestic plans and that reform was time-sensitive.

For a complete recording of the event, please visit:

<http://carnegieendowment.org/2013/03/18/economic-turmoil-in-arab-countries-can-partners-help/fn0v>

\(Back to top\)

Counterterrorism Policies and Priorities: Addressing the Evolving Threat

Date: March 20, 2013

1. Title: Counterterrorism Policies and Priorities: Addressing the Evolving Threat

Hosted by the US Senate Committee on Foreign Relations

Participants

Jane Harman: Director, President, and CEO, Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars (Former Member, US House of Representatives)

Michael E. Leiter: Senior Counselor to the Chief Executive, Officer, Palantir Technologies (Former Director of the National Counterterrorism Center)

Kenneth L. Wainstein: Partner, Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft LLP (Former Assistant to the President for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism)

2. Overview

This hearing was convened for the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee to hear testimony on how the US can update its counterterrorism policies in response to an evolving terrorist threat, namely the move from a centralized al-Qaeda with a powerful and well-funded core to a loosely connected network of al-Qaeda-affiliated terrorist organizations. Harman emphasized the importance of moving away from the use of kinetic power and towards combating the narrative that the US is at war with Islam. Leiter focused on redirecting US focus in reacting to terrorist threats toward intelligently addressing them. Wainstein focused on giving US counterterrorism programs more legitimacy by bringing them under congressional oversight.

3. Summary

Senators Menendez (D-NJ) and Corker (R-TN) opened the hearing with a few observations on the changes that we have seen in the past few years in the nature of global terrorism. Menendez noted, as would every other speaker in the course of the hearing, that while we have significantly degraded the central organization of al-Qaeda, the emergence of a decentralized al-Qaeda presents new challenges going forward. Loosely connected al-Qaeda affiliates use the weakened core organization for funding and support while pursuing their own regional goals. Of these, al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) has emerged as the biggest threat to the US homeland. Given this shift, Menendez concluded, the most pressing question of this hearing is how do we address these new terrorist threats? Senator Corker agreed with Senator Menendez and added that recent violence in North and West Africa at the hands of al-Qaeda affiliates makes this hearing especially timely. He stressed that that the United States needs to evolve its counterterrorism strategy to respond to the evolution in the global terrorism threat. He made three observations on how we must change our counterterrorism strategy. First, any new strategy must be mindful of the shift in al-Qaeda structure from a centralized organization to one with several nodes around the world. Second, given this plurality of nodes, any new counterterrorism strategy must involve cooperation with our foreign allies. Third, going forward Congress should play a more active role in authorizing the use of force.

Harman began by stating that while many of our tactics have been helpful in fighting the war on terror since 2001, many are proving to be counter-productive, and in a broader sense our strategy is all wrong. We have yet to develop a "positive-sum roadmap" for the way forward - a narrative of what goals we want to achieve and how we are going to achieve them. This is crucial particularly because the terrorist threat has evolved; while our tactics, primarily the deployment of kinetic force, have helped to destroy the core of al-Qaeda, and we now face the new threat of a more horizontal organization. If anything, this more decentralized al-Qaeda entity is strengthened by our use of kinetic force in the Middle East, North Africa, and South/Central Asia, because our use of kinetic force, especially drone strikes, is supporting the proliferation of the al-Qaeda narrative that the United States is at war with Islam and with Muslims, not at war with terrorism. In order to choke off the power of this narrative, we need to win hearts and minds; in other words, we have to win the argument. She presented five recommendations to change our approach to the war on terror to not continue to alienate the Muslim world. The first is to stop our piecemeal counterterrorism reactions to terrorist attacks. We need to come up with an integrated government counterterrorism policy. In addition, we need to provide more support to the Department of State's Bureau of Counterterrorism, which is the most important body in implementing our non-kinetic counterterrorism strategy. The second recommendation is that we make smarter investments with regards to our foreign aid expenditures. We must carefully analyze the foreign aid budgets and find ways to plus up funds to the countries that need it most and resist funding for so-called "flavor of the month" countries. The third recommendation is that we live our morals. Such objectionable tactics as rendition, "enhanced interrogation", and targeted killings are not helping us win the argument. In her words, playing whack-a-mole with our enemies does nothing to counter the narrative that we are at war with Islam. The fourth recommendation is that we reduce the over-classification of intelligence. Far too much of our intelligence is classified, and this is keeping our policy makers from seeing the bigger picture. The final recommendation is that we "drain the swamp", or cut off the recruitment pipeline at its source. The way to do this, in addition to refuting the narrative that the US is at war with Islam, is to push reform in authoritarian Muslim governments.

Leiter began with assessing US security vis-à-vis global terror and what we should now focus on given that reality. The United States is in a better position to detect and disrupt a catastrophic attack like 9/11 than it ever has been. As such, we should not read too much into recent events such as the attacks in Benghazi and Algeria, and the proliferation of AQIM. While these events do have implications for our interests abroad, they do not constitute direct threats to the homeland, and we should not treat them as such. He identified terrorism in North Africa, the conflict in Syria, and Hizbullah as regional threats that we need to keep a closer eye on, because all three of these are growing problems that clearly threaten regional stability. However, there are some roadblocks to paying appropriate attention to and taking appropriate action on these regional threats. The first issue is so-called "terrorism fatigue." In short, international terrorism has been at the forefront of the national dialogue for the past ten years and Americans are getting tired of talking about it. The second issue is the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. The US and the international community at large need to secure the stock of nuclear materials and work to prevent the creation of improvised nuclear devices and complex bioterrorism attacks. The third issue is the weakening of the counterterrorism infrastructure. Leiter is concerned that we do not properly contextualize the significance of terrorist attacks. Terrorist attacks are a fact of life today, and yet, as with the 9/11 attack in Benghazi, we tend to treat every terrorist attack as a systemic failure on the part of our counterterrorism infrastructure. This will only result in driving the smart people we need away from a career in counterterrorism and alienate our overseas partners in counterterrorism. The final issue is remaining on the offense on all fronts of this battle. The focus on the kinetic use of force has sapped focus from what we need to do in order to drain the swamp. We must expand our efforts on soft power. Leiter concluded by noting the cost of the war on terror over the past decade - in twelve years we have poured $100 billion into this effort, and we have not reaped proportional benefits. We need to take a more logical approach to this and employ mission-focused budgeting.

Wainstein's testimony only added marginally to the others' presentations. He began by stating that since 9/11 we have made enormous efforts to build and reorganize our counterterrorism infrastructure to address the threat that al-Qaeda has posed. While this succeeded in improving our readiness for another 9/11-style attack from a strong, centralized al-Qaeda, this type of threat doesn't exist anymore. Instead, a decentralized al-Qaeda threatens our interests by threatening regional stability in the Middle East, North Africa, and South/Central Asia. Thus, we must reevaluate our counterterrorism programs once again. He warned that, in doing this, we must not allow the executive branch to have unilateral power. The executive branch cannot police itself. Congress needs to be more involved; this will provide our counterterrorism strategy a level of legitimacy that unilateral executive action cannot. He had two recommendations for Congress in this endeavor: any legislation passed must both be cognizant of the executive's need to make quick decisions, and it must provide flexibility in our counterterrorism capabilities.

4. Q & A

Q: (Menendez, D-NJ) Most of the government's most significant counterterrorism actions take place at the strategic level. Have we done enough to cut the recruitment pipeline or discredit al-Qaeda's jihadist narrative?

A: (Harman) This is precisely what I was talking about - we need to win the argument in order to win the war. Our current "drone-centric" foreign policy is not only inefficient, it actually weakens our position in the diplomatic battle that is crucial to ensuring our own security. What we can do with our kinetic tactics, in addition to expanding public diplomacy, is to devise a strict legal framework around our use of drones and put the use of drones under the purview of FISA. A rules-based drone program will help us in winning the argument.

Q: (Menendez) At the end of the day, having rules for when we strike won't win hearts and minds; we need to be able to help populations on the ground. Shouldn't our policy consider other things?

A: (Leiter) The simple answer is yes. In my view, soft power has been woefully under-funded and under-focused for two main reasons. One, it is much easier to get funding for programs that bring business to Representatives' home districts, as opposed to funding for an army of diplomats in the basement of the State Department. And two, it is easier and quicker to see results (or at least changes) when we undertake kinetic tactics. What can we do about this? One thing we can do is reallocate funds to the Departments of State and Homeland Security; the Department of Defense tends to be the worst representative of our government to communicate the message that we are not at war with Islam. In addition, we need to maintain foreign aid and rule of law programs; this will be especially crucial in the developing stages of new Arab democracies in the wake of the Arab Spring. It is important for us to remember: the Arab Spring protests were driven by local populations calling for modern democracy, not al-Qaeda.

(Wainstein) The Arab Spring has proven to be a trade-off. We have lost some tactical partners in the war on terror, but if the Arab Spring is the way to improve the condition of the people in these countries, then it's a counterterrorism win for us. We need to solidify the partnerships we do have in the region, before al-Qaeda gains more of a foothold in these new democracies.

Q: (Corker, R-TN) Let's go back to the legal case. The decimation of the core of al-Qaeda makes it much harder for us to tie these peripheral groups back to the authorization for the use of force that we signed on September 18, 2001.

A: (Harman) I would like to emphasize that absolutely no one who voted for this authorization in 2001 believed that it would last until now; we thought this would be a temporary authorization. We absolutely cannot continue to approach the "war on terror" using this framework. As I said before, it is crucial that we win the argument, and we can do this with a whole of government approach to counterterrorism, smarter investments, and by living our values.

Q: (Corker) In that case, I believe that this defense authorization needs to be updated. What are some of the characteristics of an updated defense authorization that would differ from the one we put in place on September 18, 2001?

A: (Leiter) The last AUMF is, at the same time, too broad, too narrow, and too vague; it is difficult to look at it and say how it would apply to some of these newer terrorist organizations that are gaining power.

(Wainstein) Until now, the executive branch has been able to shoehorn its actions into the AUMF. Putting this under the purview of Congress will lend legitimacy to the process.

(Harman) I'm not sure that Congress should give a blanket authorization for the use of force, but yes, Congress' role in oversight and legislating needs to be much more assertive than it has been in the past 12 years. Also, calling this a "war on terror" is not helping; terror is a tactic, not an enemy.

Q: (Murphy, D-CT) You talked about winning with actions, not just words, so I have a question about how actions we take here factor in abroad. We've seen a pretty remarkable increase in anti-Islam behavior here in the past five years. Ms. Harman, how much does this matter in winning the argument?

A: (Harman) This actually matters a lot. Our record is mixed on Islamophobia; we have made some serious missteps, but we have seen some outreach to Muslim communities on the part of local police forces, such as what we have seen in Los Angeles. We should encourage this; more of this outreach will make it more attractive for members of the Muslim community to turn in people who may be turning towards extremism, but who have clean police records and otherwise operate under the radar. In a broader sense, projecting tolerance must be a big part of the counterterrorism approach. Let's remember, more Muslims have been the target of al-Qaeda attacks than have non-Muslims.

(Leiter) What is important here is that Islamophobia in the US undermines the willingness of the American Muslim community to address the Muslim community abroad in order to fight the narrative that the US is at war with Islam. When they see Islamophobia here, they're less likely to stand up and say that America is a good place to be Muslim.

Q: (Kaine, D-VA) The narrative does not have to be won by us, necessarily; it can be won by another country that shows that terrorism isn't the way to success. The salient examples here are Morocco and Turkey. Turkey, in particular, is a strong Muslim nation with a growing GDP and can serve as an alternative success model.

A: (Harman) I strongly agree with you. There is a big opportunity for us in this right now, especially given the strong relationship between President Obama and PM Erdogan. By and large, Turkey offers a moderate model of an Islamist society; Islamists are not necessarily bad, but terrorists are.

(Leiter) The US has a good track record with this type of partnership, as in Indonesia and Jordan. In places like Libya and Egypt, we have to use our foreign aid that makes them walk the right path, but we have to take a sophisticated look of who is in this government and how we can work with them. Just looking superficially at what groups are in power and saying we can't work with them because they are Islamist will be akin to cutting off our nose to spite our face.

Q: (Menendez) What do you envision as the elements of "draining the swamp"? What are the partnerships that have worked particularly well and what partnerships have we not tapped that we should tap?

A: (Harman) I think we need to focus on public-private partnerships. The private sector has the tools and the agility to make an impact that the public sector simply does not. In particular, the private sector and the NGO community are uniquely equipped to fight illiteracy in these countries, which is a major factor in terrorist recruitment.

(Leiter) We need to do a better job of engaging the American Muslim community and we have to accept that what the US says about Islam on a global basis is generally dismissed; we are not a credible speaker on this subject. We need to empower moderate voices abroad that can counter al-Qaeda's message. Something that has worked well for us in the past is disaster relief - it shows a non-military face, depicts us as humanitarians, and has been incredibly effective. We need to use our partnerships and empower other voices abroad to help us show that al-Qaeda has a bankrupt ideology and that there is an alternative way to protect Islam.

5. Observation

This hearing was not especially well-attended, likely because it convened considerably later than previously expected, due to voting in the Senate. MAC can capitalize on was the testimony asserting that the US should strengthen its partnerships with moderate Muslim states and hold them up as examples for the rest of the Muslim world; Morocco is a pretty clear example of this. It is interesting to consider if MAC can be useful in promoting voices in the Moroccan American community to speak out on this issue as an antidote to those charging the US with Islamophobia. Given that Harman and Leiter both alluded to the needed to reach out to the Muslim-American community, MAC should maintain its relationship with Harman and reach out to Leiter.

\(Back to top\)

Algeria Between Reform and Stability

Date: March 28, 2013

1. Title: Algeria Between Reform and Stability

Hosted by John Hopkins University, School of Advanced International Studies

Participants:

William Zartman: Professor Emeritus, Conflict Management, JHU-SAIS

Eamonn Gearon: Professional Lecturer, African Studies Program, JHU-SAIS

Daniele Moro: Moderator: African Studies, Johns Hopkins University SAIS

2. Overview

The John Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies hosted a discussion on whether or not Algeria is on a path of reform or stability, including topics such as how the country avoided the Arab uprisings, the importance of the April 2014 elections, and the security and politics of the Sahara. .

3. Summary

The panel discussion began with an Al Jazeera documentary that examined the bitterness that is still present in Algeria as a result of French colonial rule and how French colonialism fueled resentment between France and its Muslim community. Dr. Zartman began the discussion with remarks about the struggle between reform and stability in the region after the Arab Spring. In terms of indicators for a revolution, Dr. Zartman listed three characteristics Algeria shares with the region: an aging autocratic ruler with no clear indication of his successor, high youth unemployment, and a lack of motivation to move beyond a hydrocarbon economy. Despite these shared characteristics, Dr. Zartman highlighted six key factors that have discouraged Algerians from revolution.

First and foremost, Algerians are terrified of falling back into a civil war, as the atrocities committed in the 1990s remain at the forefront of their minds. Second, unlike in Tunisia and Egypt, Algerian history demonstrates the military's lack of fear and hesitation to shoot civilians, especially if power were handed to an Islamist government. Third, the Algerian populace understands that the military and President Bouteflika are codependent and that Bouteflika's fall would be insignificant. Regardless of Bouteflika's departure the military will maintain significant power. Fourth, protestors demands are provincial-specific and thus lack the wider appeal that inspires national protests - there have been protests, but none have largely regional events. Fifth, the Algerian government has been able to suppress, buy off, and/or discredit small groups of protestors. Finally, the impact of the 2010-2011 elections gave legitimacy to the current government. According to Dr. Zartman,, these elections were seen as free and fair, giving Boutflika's government a certain amount of democratic legitimacy. Also, both the National Rally for Democracy (RND) and the National Liberation Front (FLN) have seen gains, whilst the Islamist parties have become irrelevant. Nevertheless, Dr. Zartman concluded with a warning, : if President Bouteflika goes back on his word and runs for President or if the newly elected President is an older-generation RND or FLN affiliate, this could cause an uproar.

Eammon Gearon noted that after 132 years under French occupation, the atrocious civil war that led to Algeria's independence simultaneously created Salafi jihad extremists. These extremists created the basis for the emergence of AQIM. According to Gearon, Algeria has faced more violence than any other nation in the region, which contributes to its need for a robust military role that provides consistent stability. Being a colony for over a century has lead to much resentment and deep rooted skepticism of foreigners.

Gearon explained that although these small extremist groups linked to AQIM are aiming to spread fear and instability throughout the region, they do not want to govern the nation, especially in such troublesome times. He elaborated that these terrorist organizations profit from acts of kidnapping and ransom, citing the In Aminas oil platform incident as an example. Gearon noted that such incidents promote the success of AQIM's mission to spread terror. Due to this success, Gearon concluded that Algeria's security situation will most likely get worse before it gets better. Gearon also warned the Algerian government to wean itself from its dependency on its hydrocarbon industry, which has in the past suffered major drops in price, directly affecting the country's stability.

4. Q & A

Q: (Lawrence Freeman, African Desk Arab Magazine) What is the relationship between Algeria and Morocco?

A: (Zartman) There is a long-standing rivalry between Algeria and Morocco. Algeria fears AQIM and anti-Algerian groups located in the North Atlas Mountains of Morocco. Furthermore, Algeria is keen on uniting North African states whilst keeping Morocco ostracized. For example, in the 1980s Algeria called for security cooperation with Sahel countries and pointedly left out Morocco.

Q: (Michelle Payn, POMED) What is the percentage of youth unemployment in Algeria and why is it so high?

A: (Gearon) Overall unemployment is at 10%. However, when looking at individuals younger than 25 years old, the percentage rises to 25-30%. Algeria, like Libya, depends on its hydrocarbon industry, which relies on foreign workers and machines. Algeria does not have an economy, but a savings account.

Q: (Former Ambassador to Italy) What efforts are being made to diversify Algeria's economy?

A: (Gearon) With the increase in the price of oil, there is a lack of desire and drive to diversify the economy.

(Zartman) Although a downward trend in oil prices may put pressure on the government to diversify, there is currently no political will to expand the Algerian economy beyond oil exploration.

Q: (Gare Smith, lawyer) What is the best security approach? Can education be included?

A: (Gearon) One that encompasses the three following aspects: having a robust amount of military equipment, recognizing and discussing social issues, and diversifying the economy.

(Zartman) Education is not even a fish in the water. Building schools is not going to make a dent. I would like to extend Mr. Gearon's answer by adding one other aspect. AQIM has never attacked an oil facility until now, securing oil facilities is now a number one priority. Although AQIM planned to make a fire and attract attention, their original plan did not constitute of killing hostages; this only occurred due to the government's intervention.

5. Observation

This event was mainly attended by students, former and current ambassadors, and a couple of reporters. There were around 30 attendees. Due to his extensive knowledge and background on the security and politics of the Sahara, Eamonn Gearon could be quite useful for MACP. Although he has not been explicit on his stance on the issue of Western Sahara, he wrote a book titled The Sahara: A Cultural History. Labeling Algeria's economy as a savings account was also a unique and intriguing perspective. Dr. Zartman provided interesting insight on the domestic factors that have saved Algeria from succumbing to a revolution. He also believes that Algeria is purposefully leaving Morocco in the dark, inhibiting the possibility of a bilateral relationship.

For the documentary link "Veterans: The French in Algeria", please visit:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?feature=player_embedded&v=NOPfoaTaINU#!

\(Back to top\)

Political Change and Security in North Africa

Date: April 8, 2013

1. Title: Political Change and Security in North Africa

Hosted by McDaniel College and CNA Strategic Studies

Participants:

Panel 1:

Marina Ottaway: Senior Scholar, Woodrow Wilson Center

Monica Marks: Rhodes Scholar, Tunisia

Jason Ullner: Former Algeria Desk Officer, US Department of State

Anouar Boukhars: Moderator: Assistant Professor of International Relations, McDaniel College

Panel 2:

Fernando Reinares: Senior Researcher, International Terrorism, Real Instituto Elcano (Madrid, Spain)

Fred Wehrey: Senior Associate, Middle East Program, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Patrick Worman: Bureau of Counterterrorism, US Department of State
Eric Thompson: Moderator: Vice President and Director, CNA Strategic Studies

Keynote Address:

Ambassador Janet A. Sanderson: Former Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near East Affairs, US Department of State

Panel 3:

Laurence Ammour: Research Fellow, International Security and Defense, Institute of Political Science (Bordeaux, France)

Glynn Torres-Spelliscy: Professor, The New School for Public Engagement

Lahcen Achy: Non-Resident Scholar, Carnegie Middle East Center

Christianna Nichols Leahy: Chair, Political Science Department, McDaniel College

2. Overview

The countries of North Africa have experienced considerable political and social upheaval over the past two years. However, concurrently, violent extremist networks and criminal organizations have grown and are expanding their operations throughout the region. This conference explored the range and scale of challenges that confront the states of North Africa, the United States, and the international community with the aim of identifying policy options for the future.

3. Summary

Panel 1: Response and Strategies of Regimes and Political Parties

Anouar Boukhars opened by detailing the questions the panelists sought to address, namely: how have existing regimes adjusted to the new political landscape? What is the status of political and economic reform efforts? Are Islamist parties who assumed power gaining or losing popularity? What are the political, cultural, and economic cleavages that drive and shape events on the ground? Is the pessimism about the prospects of the Arab Spring misplaced? What are US interests in the region?

Boukhars provided the context for the answering these questions with a brief overview of the political situation in Morocco, Tunisia, and Algeria. He noted that two years after the Arab Spring, the fate of democracy is unclear in North Africa. Morocco is the only country that experienced a peaceful transition, but the question remains whether or not the reform process there represents a true third way or merely a cosmetic shift that leaves the country ripe for revolution. Per Boukhars, neither of those characterizations is right, but it is nevertheless too early to tell the outcome of political reform in Morocco. In Tunisia, insecurity, deepening political polarization, and ideological extremism continue to plague the country and inhibit progress on political reform. Algeria has weathered popular upheavals and the opposition remains weak, but there have only been limited reforms and the government has used money to limit dissent. Nonetheless, the issue of President Bouteflika's successor presents potential complications for the future.

Marina Ottaway spoke about political reform in Morocco, a country she visited in late March – her third visit there since the start of the Arab Spring. Ottaway noted that she was struck by how little change had taken place in the country. She observed that people's debates and political discussions remained the same as when she was there in June 2012. For example, at that time reforms to the press code was about to be published. In March 2013, it was still about to be published. The same applied to subsidy reform. Despite this observation, Ottaway argued that the reform is more than just cosmetic in Morocco. The question is whether the pace of change is enough to satisfy Morocco and the aspirations of the people.

She answered with an overview of the Arab uprising in Morocco. In February 2011, demonstrations began in Morocco, but there was not an uprising and there was an immediate response from the government. The King kept his word – a new Constitution was approved in July and elections took place in November. How was this possible? First, Morocco had a history of minor reform from the top since the time of King Hassan II. The country made very real human rights progress and had experience with an opposition government. Second, the PJD is the most moderate of the Islamist parties in the region and was willing to work on a third way – partnering with the King for reform. Third, the Palace and the King's entourage were confident enough to know that they were still ultimately in control – they could run circles around everyone else. As Ottaway noted, in Morocco today, there is a very strong distinction between "le gouvernement" and "le pouvoir."

Therefore, Ottaway's assessment is that the reform process is real, but slow. There is no doubt that the King will push through reforms, but he will need to be pressured by the government and the people. That is not currently happening in Morocco – reform has been from the top without a push from the bottom. The King and his advisors know that they have to move forward with reform, but want to avoid the fallout from it. The King is comfortable and the government is hesitant to push for its prerogatives as defined in the Constitution. The PJD is terrified of confrontation with the King and it will be difficult to pressure him without confrontation. Ottaway stressed that the PJD has been far too cautious. With regard to the Constitution and what the PJD and the Parliament can do, Ottaway argued that Morocco is not a constitutional monarchy like it says – it is more like a semi-Presidential system except with a King instead of a President. There are executive powers reserved for the King and the Prime Minister, but the Prime Minister has been asking for his powers, rather than using them. As for the Parliament, which is empowered to adopt the organic laws required to implement the Constitution, it has an idea of what needs to be done, but hasn't done much. Only three of eighteen organic laws have been adopted thus far.

Despite the stalled status of reform, King Mohammed VI has thus far remained unscathed. He is popular, legitimate, and has a cadre of capable advisors. Furthermore, there is no real opposition in Morocco. The USFP is weak, so if pressure is not coming from the PJD, it is not happening. While in Morocco, Ottaway tried to identify a possible opposition, but couldn't. While the JCO, which Ottaway described as a potential game changer, represents a possibility, it isn't there yet. According to representatives of the organization that Ottaway spoke with, the group isn't interested in politics just yet. In addition, they confessed that they don't think they could mobilize people in the streets at this time, "even if they tried." As for other opposition groups, whatever Salafists there are in the country don't appear to be a factor and are certainly not organized. Finally, the protest movement is still alive, but is localized and ineffective at the national level.

In conclusion, Ottaway noted that Morocco represents an interesting experiment in reform from the top. If it can happen this way, it is the best option. Although wanting to avoid sounding too conservative, Ottaway argued that uprisings generally don't result in happy endings. If Morocco is able to make this process work, it will be great for the country and a great example for other countries and monarchs. For now, however, the lesson from Morocco is that reform from the top won't work without a push from the bottom.

Monica Marks addressed political reform in Tunisia. She underscored the transition that had occurred within the country as a result of the revolution – several ministers went from being in jail to holding ministerial positions in the very building in which they were held in confinement. Despite this evident symbolism, unfortunately there has not been a lot of progress in Tunisia. Marks ascertained that this was for institutional reasons, political reasons, and practical reasons. Institutionally, the Ministry of the Interior, which is responsible for security reform, is the most corrupt and is still staffed 90% by people who were there before the revolution. Politically, the drafting of the Constitution is still ongoing, which makes other reform more difficult. Pragmatically, the country is plagued by bureaucracy.

Jason Ullner gave a brief history of political reform in Algeria – referencing the civil war, the process of reconciliation, and the military's carte blanche for retaining power. Ullner argued that there has been slow, creeping reform in Algeria, although it is not clear who is in charge of what, with the DRS, the military, and Bouteflika all having some degree of power. Defining Algeria as a one-party state dominated by the FLN, Ullner addressed why, despite having similar problems to countries that experienced revolution – a massive youth bulge, food subsidies, etc. – Algeria had not experience an uprising. He argued that Algeria had its Arab Spring in 1991-1992. He doesn't view this as just an excuse, because he believes that Bouteflika is a different kind of leader, rather than a dictator; Bouteflika doesn't inspire ire like Ben Ali, and Algeria does have freedoms that didn't exist in neighboring countries, such as freedom of the press. Ullner noted that there have indeed been protests, but that they were small – largely because of DRS repression, but also because there has been no groundswell for drastic change. The Algerian people want slow, peaceful reform from within the government. In this regard, Ullner has seen a few steps in the right direction and believes that the government is coming along and headed in the right direction.

With regard to US interests in Algeria, Ullner stated that oil is always at the forefront, followed by Algeria's stance as a strong counterterrorism partner based on its historic experience in fighting Islamist terrorism. US-Algeria bilateral relations are rooted in this security cooperation and the two countries have strong intelligence and military relations. Algeria remains a bedrock for the US, particularly given instability in Mali and Libya. Seeking to deny suggestions that these relations came under pressure when Americans were killed at the attack on the In Amenas gas facility, Ullner stressed that the US maintained daily contact with its Algerian counterparts and the US was not caught off guard by developments. Defending this answer, Ullner argued that the "Algerians have a certain way of doing things" and that relations have only gotten better between the two countries since the attack at In Amenas. He cited the US-Algeria Strategic Dialogue as an indication of the strength of bilateral relations and noted that the US has encouraged Algeria to play a more active role in security issues in the region, including going beyond its borders, which is has historically refused to do.

Panel 2: Security Threats

Fernando Reinares assessed the security threats to and from the Sahel. He argued that terrorism is not the main problem North African countries face today, but certainly an important one. In order to put the current situation in context, Reinares provided a brief overview of the evolution of al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb. Founded in 2007, AQIM was at the start, an Algerian group with an Algerian agenda. It mostly carried out attacks within Algeria. Algerian counterterrorism efforts, however, became increasingly successful in later years, reducing the organization's capacity and forcing the organization to look again toward a sanctuary in northern Mali. With their new sanctuary established after the coup in Mali, AQIM started establishing alliances with other terrorist groups that began to operate in the region – MUJAO, a splinter group that in practices operates as a supporting aid, and Ansar Dine. At present, Reinares estimated that AQIM currently has 600-800 fighters and vast economic resources, but has settled primarily around Kidal and also made a tactical withdrawal to Mauritania.

Fred Wehrey addressed whether or not Libya is a failed or failing state. In making this assessment, he defined the three criteria for a failing state: the inability to control large swathes of territory; the lack of capacity to deliver services to its citizens; and the export of problems to its neighbors. Wehrey argued that Libya meets these conditions, but is in critical, but stable condition nonetheless, as failing assumes the existence of a state in the first place, which is not the case in Libya – Gadhafi was the state. Wehrey also presented some positive assessments. First, the idea of a unified Libya exists. Second, oil production is increasing. Third, there is a lack of meddling by neighbors. Fourth, the political/ideological spectrum is narrow. Finally, infrastructure in the country has remained intact. For these reasons, Wehrey is optimistic, despite continued challenges, including marginalization of the periphery and the reality that the security sector is informal and dispersed.

Patrick Worman provided a macro-level analysis of the security threat in North Africa. He noted that there is a new AQIM focus on the Sahel because of the operational space it's been afforded there over the past few years – both as a result of the Algerian security services success in pushing them out and increased insecurity in neighboring countries. AQIM is now primarily fighting in countries ill-prepared to deal with them. The US is likewise concerned about al-Qaeda outreach efforts to AQIM trying to export instability and has developed policies to limit this, taking a holistic approach, including development and security measures. In terms of specific threats to the region, Worman only discussed Algeria and Libya, noting that he did not want to overlook Morocco, but that the country was a good news story as it maintains the longest counterterrorism partnership with the US and is not the locus of the current threat, which is in a band of Southern Algeria and the Sahel. As for Algeria, Worman noted that US-Algerian relations have become closer over the past 5-10 years because the threat is in Algeria's backyard, it has significant experience and strong capacity in counterterrorism operations, and there is broad public support for counterterrorism efforts throughout the country.

In Libya, Worman explained, the US is trying to cut down on the space within which terrorists can operate. They are trying to do so in a policy environment skeptical of US actions, which make it all the more difficult. In conclusion, Worman noted that the US preferences are for building long-term counterterrorism capacity in partner countries, building institutions in those countries, and building a unity of purpose among partner countries.

Keynote Address

Janet Sanderson provided personal observations on North Africa and US policy toward the region and shared her candid assessment of what the US got right and wrong. To start, she explained that the US government did not see the Arab Spring coming. It understood the issues behind it, but did not predict that 2011 would be a defining year. It is easy to understand common factors now, but the US didn't see the match that set it off. In the Maghreb, the US has been hampered in its mindset by its history in the region and its assessment that France was more involved there. This meant that the US rarely put the Maghreb at the top of the agenda, with a few exceptions such as the US-Morocco Free Trade Agreement and engagement with Gaddafi after his initial overture to the West. North Africa thus factored lightly in the US agenda. Presently, it has been said that North Africa is the Obama Administration's orphan and Sanderson acknowledged that this assessment is true. The Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs avoided leader to leader contact despite other contacts. However, benign neglect was not limited to the Obama Administration – it was the case under Clinton too, when it was clear that our approach was engagement light. For example, the US warmly embraced Morocco, but didn't engage in a politically substantive way. It engaged with Algeria based on counterterrorism issues alone, despite the clear US business interests in the country. It deemed Gaddafi crazy and left Tunisia to the Europeans. With the Arab Spring, the US was forced to pay attention to the region, but it saw developments through its own prism focusing on counterterrorism. As important as this issue is in the region, Sanderson underscored that it should not define US engagement there. In terms of the US response, the tools were not always the most nimble and effective, and the US often made events all about itself rather than the countries of the region.

In conclusion, Sanderson argued that the US can do better in the Maghreb and needs to redefine relations in the region. Its interests in promoting regional security, encouraging counterterrorism cooperation, securing access to energy and oil, and encouraging human rights, democracy, and the rule of law demand a reassessment of US relations in the Maghreb. There have been important developments – an increase in exchange visits, Strategic Dialogues with Morocco and Algeria, and a broadened agenda for discussion and engagement. The question is whether the US is prepared to sustain the effort or not. In either case, this will require engagement from North Africa countries too as relations have to be based in partnerships.

Panel 3: Prospects for Regional Cooperation

Laurence Ammour gave a presentation on the Western Sahara issue, which she described as the blind spot of Algerian regional policy. Ammour referenced the Algerian position on regional counterterrorism cooperation and its veto of Moroccan membership in the Counterterrorism Center based in Algeria as evidence of Algeria's longstanding belief that it has preeminence in the Sahel and Sahara, quoting one official that said, "Last time I checked, Morocco doesn't have a Sahel border." Implicit in this statement was Algeria's assertion that Western Sahara will never be part of Morocco. The question that comes out of this for Ammour is: why has Algeria maintained this policy on the Western Sahara for over 40 years with no evolution? She sought to address this question by analyzing how the Western Sahara related to the domestic and foreign policy of Algeria. She argued that geopolitics and history explain Algeria's support for the Polisario and its broader stance on the Western Sahara. The relationship between Morocco and Algeria has been historically defined by border disputes – Morocco's territorial ambitions to broaden its borders to those of historic "greater Morocco," and Algeria's desire to limit Morocco's territorial ambitions and thereby assert and maintain geopolitical dominance of the Maghreb. The Western Sahara issue is a central part of geopolitical balancing in the region, as it is a marker of the territorial inequality between Morocco and Algeria. An additional factor is the dominant role of the military in both the founding of the Algerian state and in current domestic politics. The Western Sahara issue has proven useful domestically not only to justify military expenditures, but also to further Algeria's regional influence.

Why, however, in spite of developments in the region, including the political decline of the Polisario Front and the numerous incidents of Polisario involvement in terrorist and criminal activities (Ammour had a list of these on a power point she showed) has Algeria's stance not evolved accordingly? The reality is that little has changed in Algeria – Algerian leaders have failed to adapt to international relations and new political realities. Leaders are stuck in old ideologies. Unfortunately, Ammour sees little hopes for an evolution in Algeria's policy or for normalization of Moroccan-Algerian relations anytime soon. It is nevertheless time to move forward to resolve the humanitarian issue and ensure security cooperation to prevent the region from becoming even more of a hotbed for extremism and criminal activity in the region.

Glynn Torres-Spelliscy explained the legal issues behind resource development in the Western Sahara. He stressed that he was not assessing the wisdom of a policy choice on the issue either way, but was merely providing information on the legal options that apply to the situation there. There is a range of legally acceptable behavior on this issue and wisdom and legality are two very different concepts. Torres-Spelliscy also underscored that the issue of resource and economic development is an important one, as it offers the potential for cooperation without settling the question of the future political status of the Sahara. Development is likewise essential for both humanitarian and security issues and should not be limited before a political resolution.

Torres-Spelliscy detailed current economic challenges and opportunities in the Sahara before providing the legal context. The challenges are that the Sahara has limited arable land and is one of the least densely populated places the world. On the positive side, it has natural resources, namely phosphates, fish, and the potential for oil and gas, and the potential for agro-business. Economic development thus sounds difficult, but possible. Given that, what are the legal means for developing the territory? Torres-Spelliscy stated that Morocco has de-facto control of the territory, which is legally listed as a Non-Self-Governing Territory at the UN with Spain as the original administrative power. Although Spain attempted to transfer this power to Morocco and Mauritania via the Madrid accords, it was legally not allowed to do so. There is thus no administrative power in the territory. From a legal perspective, Morocco can either be sovereign, an administrative power, or an occupier. In this case, Morocco is not sovereign, it is not the legal administrator, but potentially a de-facto administrator, and it is not an occupier, as the country is listed as Non-Self Governing – not occupied. Fortunately, this issue does not have to be resolved legally in order for development to be allowed because there are some legal principals beyond this for the administration of natural resources. Several General Assembly Resolutions affirm the value of foreign economic investment if certain conditions are met, namely that the development must benefit the population and be in accordance with their wishes. Under Moroccan de-facto control, the benefits for the population are disputed. There is no doubt that Morocco has made serious investment in infrastructure and that looks likely to continue with the launch of the Economic, Social, and Environmental Council program for the territory. On the other hand, there are some questions about the distribution of these benefits. With regard to consultation, there is not sufficient legal evidence that the people have been consulted. There is no doubt that consultation has taken place and continues to do so in the Moroccan-controlled territory, but there has been no engagement with those Sahrawis displaced in the camps. That is where the issue stands today, although Torres-Spelliscy did note two signs of progress in conclusion: the 2011 request for a framework to develop a process for resource extraction and the 2012 agreement with UNEP to begin information sharing on the issue.

Lahcen Achy explored prospects for regional integration in the Maghreb, underscoring that the Western Sahara crisis has an impact on the whole region and on this issue. Why is regional integration important? According to Achy, it is needed to seize economic opportunities in the post-Arab Spring period, overcome reliance on Europe, and enhance security in the region. Despite these obvious advantages, the status of regional integration is disappointing. The region is losing 2-3% of GDP a year by not integrating, in addition to the added opportunity cost of spending. The region remains unattractive to large foreign investors because of limited opportunities for regional exports. Who bears the cost of this lack of integration? Achy argued that it's primarily the region's non-oil producing states of Morocco and Tunisia and the border areas within each country. Who benefits from the current status? Achy argued that is the countries that are less ready economically in terms of creating a policy environment for more open trade – namely, the least diversified economies and most dysfunctional business environments of Libya, Algeria, and Mauritania. Given these circumstances, what are the prospects for more integration in the near future?

Unfortunately, they are not very good. Achy underscored that in order for increased integration to become widely appealing, countries require domestic reform first – on issues ranging from governance and corruption to the rule of law and leadership. The challenge is to engage people and not just leaders. Fortunately, people-to-people exchanges are starting and could provide the impetus for more exchange at the national level.

4. Q & A

Panel 1

Q: (World Affairs Council – Harrisburg, PA) Is it fair to think of the Islamist parties in Tunisia and Morocco as similar to European Christian Democratic parties? If that is an apt comparison, what should US engagement be with these parties? Lastly, is there a chance for an Islamist resurgence in Algeria.

A: (Marks) That is certainly what Ennadha wants to be like.

(Ottaway) The State Department has accepted that these parties have won elections – unlike what they did with Hamas. As for the comparison, it's a bit more complicated. They are more like the Christian Democrat parties of the past. The best comparison is conservative elements within the current US Republican party.

(Ullner) There will be a place for Islamists in Algerian politics, but the Islamist parties lost seats in the Spring 2012 election. It is unlikely that an Islamist will be President.

Q: (DCM – Algerian Embassy) I would like to make a correction to your assertions – Morocco is not the only country going through peaceful reform, Algeria is too.

A: (Ottaway) I beg to differ. Algeria hasn't reached a turning point. Yes, it has lots of political parties, and yes, there are some reforms, but Bouteflika is still the President and it is difficult to say a country is changing when it has the same government.

Q: (McDaniel student) Are you at all concerned about the status of women in any of these countries?

A: (Marks) The situation in Tunisia is much more positive and not nearly as bad as the analyses have been. Women have a voice within the Ennadha party and there are no threats to them from a legal perspective. That said, women have spoken of a rise in the security threat they face.

(Ottaway) There is fear among women in Egypt and Tunisia about their rights. This isn't the case in Morocco, but there is hostility between secular and conservative groups, although there hasn't been a change there from previous years.

Q: (Embassy of Spain) Could you evaluate the social and economic performance of the PJD, as well as the current status of the opposition movement and the leadership of the JCO?

A: (Ottaway) The potential is always there for renewed unrest in any country. I don't see anything imminent – and have not seen increased levels of discontent. As for the JCO, it's a paradox to me. It has to get involved in politics; otherwise it will become irrelevant by sidelining itself. There are several obstacles to political engagement by the JCO, however. First, there is the death of Sheikh Yassine and the lack of a new leader. Second, JCO will not only have to recognize the monarchy, but also the King as the commander of the faithful. Third, I don't think the situation is ripe. It was a surprising admission that representatives from the group said they would not mobilize people. Nevertheless, it seems bound to happen.

Q: (Boukhars) What I heard from US counterterrorism officials with regard to cooperation with Algeria differs from what I have heard today – is the relationship really that seamless?

A: (Ullner) The relationship has improved dramatically over the last ten years, but no, of course it is not on the level of say, US-England. In terms of how to influence Algeria, they don't want money. They want assistance on the state level – training and a constructive relationship, not the US telling them what to do.

Panel 2

Q: Does the US government have a “hearts and minds” strategy?

A: (Worman) We have been refining it since 9/11. We first increased assistance for development – which was like throwing money at the problem. This evolved into supporting local NGOs who do development work. Morocco has likewise developed this time of program to counterterrorism – treating it holistically through socio-economic assistance programs to target vulnerable demographics. The US prefers this type of an approach.

Panel 3

Q: (Charles Liebling, Western Sahara Endgame Blog) No one had discussed the options of independence or a referendum in the Western Sahara.

A: (Torres-Spelliscy) When you have a government in de-facto control, there are three legal scenarios. If the situation were to change, through a referendum or otherwise, and Morocco no longer be in de-facto control, it would be a different situation.

Q: (Marina Ottaway) Can you think of any examples of regional integration in places where political issues have been unresolved?

A: (Achy) Both West Africa and the MERCOSUR trade block have trade and economic integration despite differences in political systems.

C: (Ottaway) But this is different – it is more than just political differences. This is open conflict - unarmed, but open.

A: (Achy) If there is pressure, there might be some room for integration to drive a political solution. The countries need to address this issue and not avoid it like they are now. The circumstances are right given instability in the region.

(Ammour) Insecurity is in border areas and the economic figures about border trade reinforce the point about insecurity. There is trade, it is just in illicit goods. That is why regional integration could be so important. It could address insecurity in the border areas while improving development at the same time.

Q: What are the prospects for foreign investment?

A: (Achy) It is there, but the question is how to make it larger. For that, the Maghreb needs to represent a larger market for investors.

Q: Would it be possible to address these peripheral border areas individually or does it require regional cooperation?

A: (Ammour) It is easier if it's done regionally because if you develop borders through those means, you are developing two countries at the same time.

(Achy) It only works if it happens on both sides of the border. So borders need to be open.

5. Observation

Approximately 50 students, policymakers, and North Africa experts attended the all-day conference at McDaniel College. Generally, the panelists did not offer any really new insights into political, economic, and security developments in the Maghreb, although the conference was very valuable in that it dedicated an entire day to discussions on North Africa, which is important in and of itself given the way North Africa is not often prioritized in the US. The conference also helped clarify how the US – both experts and policymakers – continue to view the region. Some valuable conclusions can thus be drawn from the event. First, Morocco continues to be viewed as different from its neighbors in its approach to reform and as a potential model for its neighbors. That said, there is still widespread concern and skepticism about the political will of the Palace to initiative reform, the capacity of the PJD government to push for it, and the current pace of implementing reform. Second, the US prioritizes its counterterrorism relationships in the region and is unlikely to shift from that stance anytime soon. This is clearly the case with Algeria – a country which both representatives from the State Department emphasized as an important ally, despite obvious political issues that neither sought to mention. Third, the US continues to engage in the region bilaterally rather than regionally. This has an obvious impact on prospects for the US to promote regional integration and a resolution of the Western Sahara conflict. Finally, obvious progress has been made in getting North Africa on the radar of the United States at the very least. Whether or not this is sustainable is yet to be seen, but conferences like this one – and the words of Janet Sanderson admitting that the lack of engagement has been a problem – are hopeful signs for the future.

\(Back to top\)

Morocco's Reforms – Stalled or in Process?

MAMS Event Report

Date: April 10, 2013

1. Title: Morocco's Reforms – Stalled or in Process?

Hosted by the German Marshall Fund of the United States

Participants:

Rachid Benmokhtar Benabdellah: President, National Observatory for Human Development

Ivan Vejvoda: Vice President, Policy Programs, German Marshall Fund

Hassan Mneimneh: Moderator: Senior Transatlantic Fellow, German Marshall Fund

2. Overview

Among the states of North Africa, Morocco was the most proactive in responding to its Arab uprising, the February 20th Movement. King Mohammed VI called for a new constitution, which was quickly adopted. This paved the way for new elections and a new government coalition, led by the moderate Islamic Party of Justice and Development (PJD). Now, more than a year later, commentators and analysts are questioning to what degree reforms have been implemented and if the current government can promote needed reforms while balancing its relationships with the palace. Dr. Rachid Benmokhtar Benabdellah discussed the realities of the constitutional reform process and the pace of reform, pressing upon the need for further work and the obstacles ahead on the road to democratic reform. Benabdellah then presented the process by which his organization has begun to formulate a plan for the of development Morocco's southern provinces.

3. Summary

Mneimeh introduce Benabdellah and reviewed the recent history of liberal reforms in Morocco. According to Mneimeh, the recent constitutional reforms in Morocco were not enacted in response to the Arab Spring revolutions in Egypt and Tunisia and protests in Morocco. Rather, the Arab Spring reinvigorated a reform process that began almost 20 years ago, during the reign of King Hassan II. In fact, King Hassan II appointed Benabdellah Minister of Education in order to “clean house,” as it were, in preparation for the introduction of democratic reforms.

Benabdellah indicated a few key impediments to Morocco’s development that must be overcome: the lack of democracy, weak economy, fractured education and healthcare systems, the lack of inclusion of women, and poor governance. The main issue to be solved is the lack of democracy, especially in local government. However, Morocco is a complex country; it is large, multiethnic, and multilingual, and there has long been a separation between the “useful Morocco” (mostly urban centers) and the largely neglected countryside. For all of these reasons, it has long been difficult to write a reformed and inclusive constitution. The reform push accelerated rapidly once the Arab Spring came to Morocco, with protests calling out against corruption (but, significantly, not calling for the overthrow of the government). Since then, the country has advanced significantly. There have been improvements in human rights protections. The new constitution incorporates the standards set by all of the international conventions that Morocco has ratified. It gave more recognition to the country’s minority groups by naming Amazigh as a national language. However, Morocco still has a long way to go with its democratic reforms, and the country is facing a number of crises, including the influx of immigrants, weak economy, and fluctuating consumer prices.

Benabdellah then presented what he referred to as the Moroccan government’s agenda for development, to be carried out in three steps. The first step is to learn as much as possible from development experts. To this end, Benabdellah and other members of the Economic, Social, and Environmental Council (CESE) have met with scholars, consultants, elected officials, and local authorities in order to draft a roadmap for regionalization and further development. They then prepared a preliminary document in the beginning of January to serve as a starting point for the regionalization process. The second step was to take that document and bring it to the southern provinces of Morocco, where regionalization will be most crucial. It was important that they treated this presentation openly, frankly, and as a two-way discussion, both presenting information and taking suggestions from the people they met. Development is both desperately needed and particularly tricky in the south, due to factors such as the more nomadic culture, proximity to the border with Algeria, and the proliferation of Saharan drug trafficking. Thus, development in the south will require a revision of security, economic, and social policies in order to attract investment to the region and create jobs for its impoverished residents. The third step was to return to Rabat with this input from the residents of the southern provinces and their previous research and to assess it. CESE organized the information into a comprehensive report on the state of development and human rights in the country. The next step will be to put together a team to address the three main impediments to development in the south that the report indicated: economic/social issues, environmental issues, and cultural issues. Benabdellah is confident in Morocco’s potential for success in development and reform.

4. Q & A

Q: Despite the existence of the 2004 Family Code there is a high level of illiteracy and disparity between men and women. Is this a rural or country wide phenomenon?

A: (Benabdellah) It is a rural phenomenon, and there are three factors that explain why such high levels still exist. Firstly, when Morocco was still a protectorate of France, only coastal cities were developed, creating a lag between rural and urban areas. Secondly education programs are a failure. After the recognition of Amazigh as an official language, the system attempted to standardize three Berber dialects into one. In addition, there is an overall lack of teachers and most teachers tend to migrate to the cities to find jobs. Lastly, until the 90s gender discrimination was very widespread. Families did not and still do not want to send their daughter to schools, but instead have them stay at home or be hired as maids. Although the illiteracy rate has decreased dramatically we have yet to solve the alarming dropout rate.

Q: (Pamela Beecroft, Center for International Private Enterprise) What are two or three approaches Morocco should take as it begins its road towards democracy?

A: (Benabdellah) Democracy goes hand in hand with education. We are stuck in a traditional paradigm which consists of employing new leaders based on their networking and money. Efforts are now being made to move beyond this and employ leaders based on their merit and knowledge. There needs to be a behavioral change. Authority figures need to serve the people. Also, universal values need to be implemented in the daily lives of Moroccans. The administration and the civil society need to work together. For example, the INDH fosters participation between people, local authorities, and elected leadership and has also introduced projects to lower the rate of unemployment. Lastly, accountability, assessment, and evaluation need to be implemented and enforced to maintain transparency.

Q: What is the relationship between the EU and Morocco in terms of trade and can it be extended to other facets?

A: (Benabdellah) Our partnership with the EU and the US is important; part of our progress is creating more openness with our partners. Despite the European crisis, Morocco maintained its resilience. Agreements between Morocco and the EU go beyond simple trade agreements with Morocco slowly integrating European norms. However, implementing EU political and financial standards tends to be complex and at times unfavorable.

Q: (Alvaro Ortega, Embassy of Spain) Can you assess the special commitment currently given to developing the North?

A: (Benabdellah) The current commitment to developing the North has some historical ties. Pre-independence, the only developed cities in Morocco were those located on the coast. Furthermore, each city had a specific function. For example, Rabat was the administrative city, Casablanca the fiscal hub, and Marrakesh the heart of tourism. Tangier was rich because it was an international city. However, when Morocco gained its independence, the city collapsed with the departure of 300 banks. For thirty to forty years, Tangier was forgotten. A road is currently being created from Tangier to Oujda. Citizens from Casablanca and Marrakesh are coming to work in Tangier, completing the comprehensive ecosystem of the "northern development" that is composed of education, transportation, communication, and technology. Due to the current crisis in Mali, investors are fearful of spillover effects and are thus hesitant to invest. However, Morocco is demonstrating its success in biodiversity, citing Argan oil in southern local industries, green energy in Ourzazate, and promising solar and wind power in Tantan.

Q: (Robert Holley, Moroccan American Center for Policy) What is the role of civil society in promoting cultural reform specifically for southern associations to become legitimate and independent?

A: (Benabdellah) The current associations are not playing the role we want them to. The government is being selective in accepting or rejecting associations, basing its decisions on what projects are being planned. Many of the NGOs that have historically opposed the government were the most vocal in the discussions we hosted, which is excellent because debate is part of democracy. There is a lack of standardization in rules and norms. Once these norms and rules are fixed, legitimacy can be established and respected by the authorities.

Q: (Robert Holley, Moroccan American Center for Policy) The absence of external partners and subsequently the lack of international resources directly impacts regional development in the south of Morocco. This being said, how can the government encourage external investment?

A: (Benabdellah) There is no international investment because there is no Moroccan investment. The government needs to create incentives that will in turn lead to an attractive market for investors. The current law states that associations cannot receive foreign money. An independent fund specific to aiding southern associations needs to be created to include training, capacity building, and mobility, which will then empower the people.

5. Observation

There were approximately 30 people in attendance from MAC, the German Marshall Fund, and DC-based think tanks and embassies. Benabdellah discussed both Morocco's successes and failures in development and in democratic change in a very frank way. He did not avoid uncomfortable topics in his speech nor did he skirt uncomfortable questions from the audience. This speaks to the openness of his organization and other government bodies in Morocco who are working to implement the reforms established in the most recent constitution and bodes well for the legitimacy of the reform process. Experts like Benabdellah are excellent advocates for Morocco, as they highlight Morocco's successes and challenges in a frank and credible way. Further visits by such experts will help tell Morocco's story in the US.

\(Back to top\)

.....

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, May 25, 2013 2:30 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitor May Week 4

Subject: Blog Monitor May Week 4

Blog Name	Article Title/Date	Summary	Comments
Morocco News Board	7th Edition of Moroccan American Bridges May 17, 2013	AMPA, the Association of Moroccan Professionals, will be organizing the 7th annual Moroccan American Bridges conference, to be held in Casablanca on June 21, 2013. The program includes sessions on building and financing start-ups, identifying cross-Atlantic business opportunities and achieving career growth in Morocco. In addition, the speakers will address new business models and industry trends that can be imported and tailored to the Moroccan market. Finally, the event will also feature a startup competition and a career fair for companies looking to hire U.S.-based or US-trained Moroccan professionals. In past years, MAB hosted prestigious speakers such as Mohamed Elmandjra, ex-CEO at Mediatecom in Casablanca and ex-President at Massimo corp. in Los Angeles and Othman Laraki, VP of Growth & International at Twitter in San Francisco	2
AFP	Morocco denies 'torturing' Sahrawi protesters May 19, 2013	Morocco has denied torturing the 6 Sahrawi detainees who were arrested in Laayoune on May 9 for their roles in protests against the reauthorization of MINURSO without a human rights monitoring mandate. In response to the detainees' accusations that the Moroccan security service had tortured them and had gotten confessions from them when they were under duress, the MAP stated, "What was reported is nothing but pure lies." If convicted, the men face up to 10 years in prison.	0
Bahrain News	A High-Level Human Rights Delegation to Visit Morocco May 19, 2013	A high-level delegation from the Bahraini Human Rights Affairs Ministry, led by Human Rights Affairs Minister Dr. Salah bin Ali Abdulrahman, is set to visit Morocco from May 20 to 23, at the invitation of the Moroccan Inter-ministerial Delegation on Human Rights. The delegation will hold meetings with senior officials to learn about Morocco's experience in human rights as well as ways of dealing with the Special Rapporteurs of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR). They hope to discuss potential future cooperation on human rights advances in both countries.	0
Bahrain News	Minister of Human Rights: Bahrain and Morocco are on the Path of Reform, Democracy and Reinforcing Rights and Freedoms May 23, 2013	The Bahraini minister of human rights met with the Moroccan interior minister, with the former praising the historical cooperative relations between Bahrain and Morocco and the latter stressing a culture of human rights. The Bahraini minister spoke of advances in prisoner and detainee rights, including new monitoring systems in police stations and increased training for law enforcement officials. Both men made note of purportedly misleading international organization reports on human rights in their countries. The Moroccan minister expressed his position that both Bahrain and Morocco are under similar circumstances, and that foreign powers are using human rights trouble in those countries for their own benefit.	0
Your Olive Branch	Building Schools for Morocco's Rural Poor	This article is a profile on Teach4Morocco, a national non-profit established in 2011 and based in Meknes that hopes to improve the Moroccan educational system and raise the low literacy rates in the country, particularly in rural areas. The organization was established by a	0

	May 19, 2013	woman named Maha Laziri, who has a staff of 10, all Moroccan youth between the ages of 21 and 28. Teach4Morocco's first project was the reconstruction of a school in the small village of Ichbaken, in a remote region of the Atlas Mountains. It has now build two schools, and particularly hopes to help poor, rural girls, who are often denied access to education and married off at young ages. According to Laziri, the country's education system is much more urban-oriented, and requires a paradigm shift to reach the lower-educated populations in rural areas.
Maghreb	Morocco Looks to Modernise Counter-Terror Methods May 19, 2013	In a May 10th meeting held by the National Security Directorate General (DGSN), directives to monitor and counter religious extremism were discussed with the goal of influencing policy. Presentations focused on "tracking the rise of extremist ideology and how youth come to embrace such radical thinking and become persuaded to carry out jihadi operations." Efforts to reform current CT policy include more sophisticated training of intelligence officers, cooperation with foreign intelligence units to track domestic as well as international terrorist groups, and adopting "more sophisticated approaches toward combatting the extremism that feeds terrorism."	0
Maghreb	Morocco Terror Cells Had Big Plans, Members Confess May 17, 2013	Eight members of Nador-based terror cells were arrested on May 5th and arraigned May 14th for their affiliation with "Al-Mouahidoun" and "Attawhid" and their future plans to launch jihadist operations in Morocco. The members also confessed to planning to rob banks in order to finance their attacks. These terrorist groups, among others, were brought down by the National Security Directorate General.	1
Ibn Kafka	Maroc: Pourquoi Chabat veut un remaniement ministériel Morocco: Why Chabat Wants a Cabinet Reshuffle May 20, 2013	Hamid Chabat, the secretary general of Istiqlal, is calling for a rebalancing of the cabinet run by Abdelilah Benkiraine to benefit a larger portion of the skilled labor force in the health professions in Morocco. (Policy tends to lean toward more restrictive taxation for public infrastructure, and more lenient policy for foreign companies investing in private projects.) Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Le déficit commercial du Maroc multiplié par 5 entre 2000 et 2012 Morocco's commercial deficit multiplied by 5 between 2000 and 2012 May 17, 2013	In 2000, Morocco's commercial deficit was 44m dirhams. By 2012, it had grown to 201m. The deficit is explained by increased energy purchases, food products, and goods and equipment. Translated from French	7
Yabiladi	Homophobie au Maroc : « On	May 17th was the International day against Homophobia. To combat homophobia in Morocco the LGBT magazine Aswat launched	31

	sait qu'on n'est pas en France, on ne réclame pas le mariage pour tous » Homophobia in Morocco: "We know we're not in France, we don't require marriage for all" May 17th, 2013	a campaign called "Love for all" According to a contributor to the magazine, the campaign "on Facebook and Twitter permits us to open a discussion. It is also an opportunity for LGBT individuals to express themselves and assert their rights." However, the campaigners are aware that Morocco is not France, and are not pressing for a law guaranteeing marriage equality. They are instead campaigning to repeal article 489 of the Moroccan Penal Code, which punishes homosexuality with imprisonment and a fine. Translated from French
Yabiladi	Crise à la majorité : Benkirane « Nous ne voulons pas renoncer à notre monarchie » Crisis in the Majority: Benkirane "We do not want to renounce our monarchy." May 20th, 2013	Istiqlal has proposed naming a new head of government from the PJD. In a meeting with PJD secretaries, Benkirane stated that "there is a current in favor of reform and another that opposes it. The party (PJD) is perfectly aware of its responsibility." Benkirane also indicated to the palace that "we want neither the destruction of our country nor to renounce our monarchy." According to another PJD secretary, "neither the PJD nor the government have received official correspondence from Istiqlal informing them of the decision" to retire from government. Istiqlal is for changing Benkirane, for whom the ideal replacement may be Saâdeddine El Otmani, the current minister of foreign affairs, a man of dialogue who is seen as not resorting to populism. Translated from French	1
Yabiladi	Condamnés pour homosexualité au Maroc : « On n'a rien fait d'illégal » Condemned for homosexuality in Morocco: "We did nothing illegal" May 21, 2013	Two Moroccan youths were condemned to four months in prison by the court of Temara for committing, according to police reports, "an act of flagrant homosexuality" in a car. The two men continue to assert their innocence. One of the men stated: "We were just talking in the car, nothing more. We did nothing illegal." Their attorney will discuss the possibility of an appeal with the men's families. Translated from French	7
Yabiladi	Installation du PAM en Europe pour contrer l'influence du PJD sur les MRE ? Installing the PAM in Europe to counter PJD	The Modernity and Authenticity Party (PAM) has opened an office in Brussels, following a long-standing PJD policy of reaching out to the Moroccan expatriate community. This is the second bureau that PAM has opened in Europe, after opening one in Paris in late March, and the party intends on opening another bureau in Amsterdam. Fatima El Ayadi, PAM member in the House of Councillors, said that the opening of these bureaus corresponds with the party's effort to fully respect the Moroccan constitution by ensuring the inclusion of Moroccans living abroad. The PJD is not concerned about PAM's new move, and does not believe that the party will be able to dip into	0

	influence on Moroccan expatriates? May 21, 2013	PJD's voter base abroad by copying its tactic. Translated from French
Yabiladi	Sahara : Nouvelle tension entre le Maroc et la Minurso au port de Dakhla Sahara: New tensions between Morocco and MINURSO in the port of Dakhla May 21, 2013	On Saturday, 3 members of the MINURSO peacekeeping force allegedly entered the port of Dakhla and began to take photographs of fishers. Moroccan security forces immediately requested that they stop what they were doing, but did not confiscate the cameras. Yabiladi is eager to point out that this comes on the heels of a video which surfaced last month of an Egyptian MINURSO peacekeeper telling Sahrawis that they should fight for their independence. Translated from French	6
Yabiladi	Maroc: Un Professeur Accuse de Precher l'Atheisme a l'Ecole Morocco: Teacher Accused of Teaching Atheism in School May 22, 2013	Zakaria Ajnekhat, an arabic language instructor in Ouled Hamdane, was accused of promoting atheism to his students. Ajnekhat was reported to the police by parents of the students. According to Ajnekhat, his arrest was a set up by the (Salafist) chair of a parents organization who has convinced the Ministry of Education that Ajnekhat has "denied the existence of God, denied that alcohol is forbidden by religion, cast doubt on the authenticity of the Quran and encouraged women to demonstrate their charms." The Moroccan Code states that a case of this nature, condemning religion (and specifically Islam), faces a penalty of up to three years in prison. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Maroc: Une Femme Meurt Apres le Demantelement d'un Bidonville a Mohammedia Morocco: Woman Dies After the Collapse of Shantytown in Mohammedia May 22, 2013	After the collapse of a shantytown in Mohammedia Tuesday, which killed a local woman, the local Human Rights Association (AMDH) began an investigation into the living conditions of the neighborhood which uncovered that over 26 structures are illegally constructed. In 2004, Morocco began a social initiative called "Cities without Slums" which will benefit over two million people. As of 2013, thirteen cities have declared that they are "cities without slums." Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Amnesty brosse un sombre tableau des droits de	In its annual report, published today, Amnesty International accuses Moroccan authorities of "restricting freedom of expression, engaging in pursuits against detractors of the monarchy and state institutions, as well as against Sahrawi supporters of self-	0

	l'Homme au Maroc Amnesty paints a somber picture of Human Rights in Morocco May 23, 2013	determination." The report also cites mistreatment of peaceful protesters at a royal ceremony in August. As concerns terrorism, the report accuses Moroccan authorities of illegally detaining Mohammed Hajib, a German-Moroccan, and sentencing him to 10 years in prison on the basis of a confession extracted through torture and without an attorney present. Amnesty reiterated last week's claim that 6 Sahrawis were also tortured, as well as calling on the Moroccan authorities to improve refugee and migrant rights. The report accuses the Polisario Front of not improving human rights in the Tindouf camps. Finally, the report suggests Moroccan law is not in alignment with a 1997 UN protocol guaranteeing equality between the sexes. Translated from French
Yabiladi	Sahara : Rabat interdit à un journaliste espagnol d'entrer à Laâyoune Sahara: Rabat forbids Spanish journalist from entering Laayoune May 23, 2013	Last week, Morocco expelled an Italian journalist from Laayoune; today, they banned a Spanish journalist from entering. After being interviewed by security for 30 minutes, the journalist was put on a plane destined for the Canary Islands. He had been in Western Sahara attempting to cover the 40th anniversary of the Polisario. In other news, a planned pro-Polisario march did not take place after increased security was deployed to the town of Smara. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Massacre de Londres : L'un des deux tueurs proche du Marocain Fouad Belkacem Massacre of London: One of the Killers Linked to Moroccan Fouad Belkacem May 24, 2013	Michael Adebolajo one of the killers of the Woolwich massacre, has links to (now imprisoned) extremist Fouad Belkacem, leader of Sharia4Belgium; the two attended past extremist movements. The two were linked between the extremist groups Sharia4Belgium and Sharia4UK--branches of the larger extremist Al-Muhajiroun movement. Translated from French
Yabiladi	Benkirane Contre Chabat: Le Palais a-t-il Opte Pour Le Chef du Gouvernement? Benkirane Versus Chabat: The	After a long wait, the head of government was reassured yesterday that he would remain in office, along with the current cabinet, until 2016. The king maintained neutrality in the conflict between Benkirane and Chabat, claiming "full trust [in] all the members of this team." At this time, cabinet is committed to the path of reform, in particular taxation, pension/retirement, and workers' compensation. Translated from French	0

	Palace Opts for the Head of the Government May 24, 2013
AllAfrica	Morocco: Japanese Parties Voice Support to Democratic Referendum in Western Sahara May 20, 2013	Via democratic referendum, various political parties in Japan have maintained support for the Western Saharan region to “freely choose its destiny” in order to “make possible the regional integration and stability in the region.” Supporters of this statement expressed concern over reported human rights violations and called for international involvement in the situation.	0
AllAfrica	Morocco: Spanish Solidarity Movement With the Saharawi People Urges Its Government to Grant Diplomatic Status to the Polisario Front Mission May 21, 2013	Spanish associations in solidarity with the Saharawi people urged the Spanish Foreign Ministry to grant diplomatic status to Polisario Front mission in Spain as the sole and legitimate representative of the Saharawi people. In the letter, the associations urged for “making efforts to push forward necessary political initiatives, moving towards a just and final solution, in defense of the right of the legitimate Saharawi people right to self-determination through free and transparent referendum, as the only way to complete the decolonization of Western Sahara.”	0
AllAfrica	Morocco: Zimbabwean National Union Party Affirms Its Firm Position of the Sahrawi Cause May 22, 2013	The head of the Zimbabwean National Union Party reaffirmed his party’s support for the Polisario’s position in the Western Sahara crisis. He said: “We are for the SADR in its legitimate struggle for freedom and completing the liberation of the rest of its territories occupied by the Kingdom of Morocco.” He claimed that the Moroccan presence in Western Sahara stems entirely from the desire to control the territory’s valuable natural resources.	0
Morocco News Board	Sahel: Algeria's Proxy War May 20, 2013	Hassan Masiky claims that the terrorist organizations in the Sahara and the Sahel, particularly MUJAO and Ansar Eddine, are under the patronage of Algeria--and therefore, engaged in a proxy war against the Touareg people. The U.S. and France have yet to acknowledge Algeria’s role in perpetuating the crisis in Mali and the W. Sahara [Algeria views the Touareg movements in the Sahel as “clear and present danger to the unity of Algeria.”]	4
Kuwait News Agency	Morocco. Kuwait Seek Closer Economic Ties- Official	The Moroccan Ministry of Commerce, Industry, and Technology’s trade sector announced the initiative to deepen ties with Kuwait via mutual investments and social and economic developments. The announcement “underlined the significance of establishing inter-Arab economic integration for the common interest of the Arab people.”	0

	May 20, 2013
Reuters	Morocco to launch 4G mobile license tenders by the end 2013 (sic) May 21, 2013	The head of Morocco's telecom agency said that they would apply for 4G licenses by the end of the year, and expects service to be available by the end of 2014. Morocco would be among the first African countries with 4G capability.	0
Al Arabiya	Saudi-backed firm plans to pump $230m into Morocco May 21, 2013	The Saudi-Moroccan Investment Company for Development plans to invest $230m in large projects by the end of 2015. Investments will run across several sectors including real estate, tourism and agriculture, the company's managing director, Mohammed Yasin, said. The corporation's capital is shared equally between the Public Investment Fund of Saudi Arabia and the Treasury of the Kingdom of Morocco.	0
New York Times	In Morocco, TV Is Part of Power Game May 22, 2013	According to this article, the Moroccan television media has become a pawn in an alleged power struggle between the PJD and the Royal Palace, ever since the PJD decided to put television reform on its legislative agenda. The Palace has always held tight control of the television networks, and when the PJD came to power in 2011 they immediately began attempting to reform the media in order to wrest control from the monarchy. The struggle between the government and the monarchy for control over setting guidelines has resulted in gaps in productivity that have seriously harmed the Moroccan television industry.	0
CSP World	DLR looks to Morocco for new solar research and test center May 23, 2013	The German Aerospace center (Deutsches Zentrum für Luft- und Raumfahrt; DLR) is devising plans for a solar power research and test center in Morocco on behalf of the Moroccan Agency for Solar Energy (Masen), as part of the Moroccan Solar Plan. The project is partially funded by the German Government and implemented by the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Internationale Zusammenarbeit (GIZ) GmbH. One possible location of the solar power research and test center is Ouarzazate, which is also the building site of the first solar power plants as part of the Moroccan Solar Plan.	0

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, May 25, 2013 2:52 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian Situation report

This report contains public and private information, which has not been corroborated by third party sources.

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

May 23, 2013

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- Almost a month after he was airlifted to Paris for treatment following a “minor stroke”, there has been no sign of President Bouteflika and speculation as to his condition is rising to fever pitch.
- Bouteflika's health problems come just as he had made up his mind to run for a fourth successive term of office next year.
- Concordant sources suggest that one of the main aims of the corruption investigations, which are being driven by the DRS, is to prevent Bouteflika from running for a fourth term.
- The question of the fourth term may have been laid to rest by the President's health problems; paradoxically, the situation may become more complicated if Bouteflika were to make a full recovery and return in fighting form .

Foreign Relations

- Interior Minister Ould Kablia has announced new security measures along the border with Morocco, and complained bitterly of the Moroccan authorities' lack of cooperation in combatting smuggling.
- Inclined for domestic political reasons to talk up problems on the border with Morocco, Ould Kablia has tended to downplay far greater threats on Algeria's eastern borders.
- As they move against jihadist groups in the mountains along the border with Algeria, the Tunisian authorities are appealing for ever greater military assistance from the Algerians.
- A Tunisian security official draws a pessimistic prognosis for the situation in Tunisia, which is compared to Algeria in the early '90s.

Security

- Jihadist activity nationwide accelerated markedly in April and early May, with security operations lagging somewhat behind them. There were no incidents in Algiers, however.
- A convoy of Italian expatriate workers has been ambushed in north-west Algeria in what may have been a kidnapping attempt, although none were taken hostage or wounded.
- Repeated acts of car-jacking and brigandry in the Hassi Messaoud area indicate that security is still not optimal around Algeria's oldest oil hub.
- There have been a number of incursions in the south-eastern oil province of Illizi by small groups of armed men from Libya, including one near In Amenas, and a failed attack on a security forces convoy transporting jihadist prisoners in the same province.

Political Trends

On April 27, Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika was airlifted to the Val de Grâce military hospital in Paris after suffering a "transient ischemia" - a temporary blockage of a blood vessel often called a mini-stroke. "The President is in very good health," his doctor Rachid Bougherbal told the press after the news was announced, adding that the President would return to Algiers "in not more than seven days." Almost four weeks later, there has still been no sign of Bouteflika and only the scantest of official communications about his condition, and speculation about his real state of health and its political consequences is mounting to fever pitch.

One of the earliest rumours had to do with the causes of the President's cerebrovascular accident. On the very day of his evacuation to Paris, Le Quotidien d'Oran ran a report, widely taken up by other Algerian media, quoting "certain sources close to the presidential circle" as claiming that the stroke occurred after Bouteflika learnt that his influential brother Saïd had been implicated in corruption scandals currently being investigated by the DRS intelligence and security service, forcing the President to dismiss him as an advisor. This story may well be apocryphal – we have had no confirmation from sources at the Presidency that Saïd Bouteflika has been sacked, and an Algerian businessman with family ties to the nomenklatura has expressed doubt that the President would even be capable of such a move, such is the "fusional" relationship between the two brothers – but it is symptomatic of the tense climate generated by the corruption investigations and of the uncertainty that they are generating.

In our last report, we noted claims in specialist newsletter Maghreb Confidentiel to the effect that Maj-Gen. Bachir Tartag, head of internal security at the DRS, had deliberately orchestrated the corruption investigations in order to "smash the fragile peace between his boss Tewfik^[1] and the head of state, cause the Bouteflika clan to implode and prevent the President from running for a fourth term in 2014". In the absence of confirmation from other sources, we suggested that such claims were nonetheless worth monitoring and testing against the facts as they unfolded. Evidence has since been mounting that the corruption investigations are indeed closely linked to the succession question.

At least two sources have, over the past month, suggested that – contrary to the 2009-10 crackdown on graft, which appears to have been driven by Bouteflika himself – this time the anti-corruption campaign is very much driven by the DRS. According to a project manager at Sonatrach who has had contact with current and former DRS officers involved in the corruption investigations:

The DRS says it is concerned about foreign investigations into Algerian affairs: the FBI has opened a preliminary investigation, the British suspect a BVI-registered subsidiary of Sonatrach of tax fraud, the Canadians have begun proceedings against SNC-Lavalin for corruption in its contracts with Sonatrach. But the DRS' concern is only a pretext, the aim of which is to demonstrate to Bouteflika and his entourage the need to launch a wide-ranging inquiry targeting people close to the President, which could affect him personally. The DRS has been piling on the pressure, instrumentalising this inquiry and the fight against corruption in general to settle two fast-approaching successions: Bouteflika's and Tewfik's. For this reason, the inquiry has become a major issue for the DRS.

An official at El Mouradia presidential palace adds further detail to the picture:

Contrary to what has been said in some quarters, Tartag has been chosen by Tewfik, against Bouteflika's will, as his successor at the head of the DRS.

The Presidency is mobilising all its resources to keep track of the investigation into corruption at Sonatrach. The DRS has been putting out some worrying signals, and the Presidency is not being kept informed of how the investigation is proceeding. The President is being kept out of the loop, supposedly so as to “spare” him. Aside from the President himself, the DRS is eavesdropping on everybody at the Presidency, where the atmosphere has been toxic since December.

Given the prevailing mood in relations between the Presidency and the DRS due to the tug-of-war over the succession, corruption investigations could go on for months. Tewfik has put people who are close to him in charge of these investigations: aside from Tartag, you also have Generals Gobrini and Djebbar. Virtually all the top brass of the DRS are taken up with the succession question, and the corruption investigations are one symptom of this amongst others. Tewfik's men want to use these investigations to raise the pressure and force Bouteflika to submit to their will: no fourth term. Tewfik has said that “we'll settle Bouteflika's succession first”, implying that he himself will also go once he has taken care of Bouteflika's succession.

There are at least four points that are worth drawing out of this. Firstly, it would appear that, while he is certainly involved in overseeing the corruption investigations as head of the Directorate of Internal Security, Gen. Tartag is neither the sole driver of the campaign nor acting against Tewfik, but with him. Secondly, the sources seem to believe that Tewfik, who is now 72 and whose health may no longer be what it was, is contemplating his own departure at some point in the future^[2]. Thirdly, for the first time in years, it is seriously suggested that Tewfik is not acting in tandem with Bouteflika. And finally, the corruption investigations have a clear political objective: to make it impossible for Bouteflika to stand for a fourth successive term of office.

In mid-April, it will be recalled, a source with access to both Bouteflika and Tewfik suggested guardedly that Bouteflika had, after months of hesitation, finally made up his mind to stand for a fourth term, while remaining coy as to other players' stances on this decision. The matter may now have been settled by Bouteflika's health issues, however. Over the past week, press reports have been increasingly pessimistic: on May 17, French newsmagazine Le Point quoted “concordant” Algerian and French sources as suggesting that the President's condition when he was admitted to Val-de-Grâce was far worse than stated in the official announcement and that “certain vital functions are badly affected”, and on May 19, Algerian French-language daily Mon Journal and its Arabic-language sister publication Jaridati claimed that Bouteflika, suffering from cancer as well as immunodeficiency and metabolic problems, had been secretly flown back to Algeria in a coma four days previously^[3]. On May 21, French daily Le Parisien quoted a member of the French government as saying that Bouteflika had been transferred from Val-de-Grâce to the Institution Nationale des Invalides, another French military hospital that specialises in treating the war-wounded and the severely handicapped, for “convalescence” (which was later partially confirmed by the French Defence Ministry).

To be sure, the official version – as expressed by Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal and presidential advisor Farouk Ksentini – remains that Bouteflika the President, “whose life was never in danger and whose health is improving day by day” is resting at his doctors' insistence but nonetheless “continues to follow the daily operations of government, pending his return to continue his mission in the service of Algeria and the nation”. This is essentially the same line as we had been given, in private, by a staffer at El Mouradia presidential palace since the beginning of Bouteflika's hospitalisation: the President had suffered a very minor stroke which was by no means life-threatening and had been promptly dealt with, and had been told to rest by his doctors; speaking to us again on May 15, the same source claimed that Bouteflika had made a full recovery and had been due to return that very day, but had postponed “for 24 hours” (the source ventured no explanation for this). But the longer Bouteflika's return is postponed, the less convincing such reassurances sound.

Thus, even if Bouteflika is not physically dying, his political death seems increasingly probable. It is telling that – in contrast with his previous hospitalisation at Val-de-Grâce in November 2005 (for a bleeding ulcer), when gushing messages wishing him a speedy recovery and a swift return to his position at the helm of the state were de rigueur for almost all mainstream politicians and parties – Algeria's political class, and in particular the two main government parties, the RND and the FLN, have this time remained entirely silent throughout his hospitalisation. As if uncertain of what is expected of them, party leaders have been refusing to make the slightest comment on the matter to the press. This is far from the reaction one might have expected had the fourth term been a 'done deal' within the ruling establishment. Even more explicitly, former Navy Commander Gen. Mohand Tahar Yala, who last year founded a political grouping he calls the Citizenship Movement, on May 19 penned a violent attack on Bouteflika that was published by Algerian daily El Watan and news portal Algérie Focus, in which he accuses the President of “high treason” for his role in establishing a “predatory” system of corruption that has wasted and pillaged Algeria's wealth^[4] and calls for him to be removed from office immediately^[5].

If, on the other hand, Bouteflika's condition really is as bad as has been suggested, the ruling establishment – and in particular Tewfik and the other senior officers of the DRS, together perhaps with the tops of the military – will have had time to prepare for his disappearance and deal with its consequences. Indeed, if our sources are correct when they suggest that the DRS top brass have been actively striving to prevent Bouteflika running for a fourth term, the most awkward scenario for Tewfik et al might, paradoxically, be for Bouteflika to make a full recovery as promised and return in fighting form.

Foreign Relations

Algeria has tightened security on its western border with Morocco, establishing 24 new monitoring points to combat smuggling of subsidised food products and fuel, Interior Minister Daho Ould Kablia announced at a press conference on May 13. Ould Kablia slammed what he termed the “passivity” of the Moroccan authorities with regard to cross-border smuggling:

We are doubly penalized. The smugglers take fuel out of the country and bring drugs in. We are forced to import fuel oil, pending the launch of the four new refineries [that are planned]. [...] I raised this issue with my Moroccan counterpart. I told him that if the Moroccan authorities do not make an effort, things will not move forward.

While the new anti-smuggling measures undoubtedly do constitute a response (albeit an inadequate one) to a very real problem, Ould Kablia's public grumbling about the attitude of the Moroccan authorities may also be in part politically motivated. As we noted in our last report, the Bouteflika camp, of which Ould Kablia is a key member, has every interest in amplifying traditional points of discord between Algeria and Morocco in order to prevent the question of inter-Maghreb relations and normalisation with Rabat gaining any traction in the run-up to the 2014 presidential election. In a telling contrast, at the same press conference Ould Kablia tended to downplay problems on the borders with Libya and Tunisia^[6].

The danger to the east is, however, far greater. Indeed, Algeria's border with Morocco is in most respects its least troublesome frontier these days, the perennial problem of smuggling notwithstanding. The French-led military intervention in northern Mali has pushed AQMI and its allies right up to the Malian-Algerian border, where incursions and clashes have been frequent. The 1,000 km long border with Libya has theoretically been closed since the war of 2011, but it remains impossible to shut the jihadists out entirely, even after security was supposedly enhanced in the wake of the In Amenas attack. And now the situation in north-west Tunisia is taking a turn for the worse, prompting the Algerian authorities to close the border with Tunisia too.

Back in December of last year, armed islamists clashed with the Tunisian gendarmerie in Djebel Chaambi, near Kasserine, close to the Algerian border, killing one gendarme and wounding three others. Eleven days later, the Tunisian Interior Minister announced that a training camp "run by three Algerians close to AQMI leader Abou Mossaâb Abdelouadoud" had been discovered in the area; some 16 armed islamists, among them three Libyans, had been arrested, and another 18 were still at large. The jihadist groups were not stamped out, however, and in late April the Tunisian military began a more concerted campaign against the armed groups in Djebel Chaambi and a smaller group further north in Djebel Salloum, also situated along the border. More than a dozen members of the Tunisian national guard and army were wounded, some of them severely, in the first half of May by landmines laid by the group to protect their encampments.

Publicly, Tunisian officials say the Djebel Chaambi group numbers no more than 20, a good half of them Algerian. Speaking to us in private, a Tunisian government security official estimated the number of terrorists in the Djebel Chaambi area at "200 individuals of various nationalities, but mostly from northern Mali and Libya". Tunisian officials have suggested that the armed groups want to use the heavily wooded and inaccessible borderlands as a base for attacks elsewhere, perhaps on targets in Algeria, and although there has been no official confirmation that jihadist groups in north-west Tunisia have launched cross-border raids, it is worth recalling an unusual incident in the north-eastern Algerian wilaya of Khenchela in February, in which by some accounts as many as 50 jihadists, "most of them Tunisians and Libyans", attempted to storm an Algerian army camp.

At the end of April, Gen. Rachid Ammar, chief of staff of the Tunisian armed forces, accompanied PM Ali Laarayedh on a visit to Algiers, during which they met with Gen. Ammar's opposite number, Lt-Gen. Ahmed Gaïd-Saleh. Flowing from this, a direct line of communication between ground and air operations in Algeria and Tunisia was reportedly set up to facilitate the exchange of information between the security services, while the Algerians presented their plans for expanded aerial surveillance along their eastern border to prevent the infiltration of armed groups as well as weapons smuggling across Tunisia from Libya^[7]. By mid-May, the Algerian army had reportedly deployed more than 6,000 troops on the Tunisian border (eight brigades of regular troops and special forces).

The Tunisian government security official quoted above argues that what the Tunisian and Algerian armies are fighting in north-west Tunisia is:

the military wing of a broader Salafist-Jihadist movement spanning Tunisian mosques, whose membership is estimated at 35,000 to 40,000. [...] In addition to their base camps in the mountains, their activities include recruitment, propaganda and fundraising in mosques. We are in a situation similar to that of Algeria in the early 90s — except that Tunisia is ill prepared to deal with it. Security officials have asked their political superiors to activate the security treaty signed with Algeria in 1983 and the Algerians have replied favourably. They closed their borders and put their intelligence resources (human and technological) at Tunisia's disposal, but that appears to be insufficient and there is a request underway for Algeria to extend the terms of the 1983 treaty to include cooperation in personnel and materiel. To put it bluntly, we want the Algerians to send us units and equipment to control the whole mountainous border area. The Tunisian army lacks the necessary equipment (anti-mine gear, night-vision, infrared sights, etc), and what it has is old and not serviceable. As soon as the Algerians take charge of the border areas, Tunisian army and security forces units will take care of Salafist-Jihadists inside the country. In addition to the shortage of equipment, Tunisian forces are hampered by a wobbly political class and the lack of a firm grip on domestic threats. It is likely the jihadists will seek revenge for the army's operations in Djebel Chaambi by carrying out attacks in the cities. The political class and civil society organisations appear to underestimate the threat.

If such pessimistic forecasts to the east are even partly confirmed, sections of the Algerian establishment – and notably of the military – are likely to find themselves all the more inclined to appreciate the relative stability of their western neighbour in the coming period.

Security

After a period of several months in which its presence in the north of Algeria appeared to be waning, AQMI's activity picked up notably in late April and early May. The last week of April was the busiest in terms of jihadist activity since early July 2012, and the whole month was the busiest since August 2012. Fourteen jihadist operations were recorded in April (up from seven in March, seven in February and eight in January) and six in the first half of May. The security forces initially lagged behind, with only seven operations reported in April (comparable to March) but appear to have stepped up their efforts in May, with eight operations recorded in the first half of the month.

ALGIERS and its environs remained quiet. The most noteworthy incidents in northern Algeria took place in the WEST^[8]. During the night of April 20-21, a jihadist group attacked a convoy of Italian staff heading to a work site near Theniet el-Had, between the wilayas of Aïn Defla and Tissemsilt. The attackers first shelled the convoy with home-made mortars (heb heb) and then attacked directly, but the gendarmes escorting the convoy fired back and repulsed them, according to London-based According to Al-Qods Al-Arabi. It is believed the jihadists were trying to kidnap the Italian staff. Three gendarmes were wounded in the operation but none of the foreign nationals were hurt^[9]. Also of note was the arrest by the security forces two jihadists in the town of Chlef on May 3, one of whom was found to be carrying a suicide belt according to the Algerian press – an indication that suicide bombings remain a possibility in the north of country, despite a lull in the use of this tactic.

The oil and gas producing regions of the SOUTH saw at least three incidents. On April 24 armed men attacked a civil engineering team working on the road between Hassi Messaoud and El-Oued and made away with an offroader. A force of gendarmes chased the assailants, forcing them to abandon the vehicle, according to the Algerian press. The recurrent carjackings and acts of brigandry around Hassi Messaoud notably indicate security is still not optimal in the region (El Watan on May 11 published a long article on “exceptional security measures” in the town, but a close reading shows these are aimed mostly at angry local protesters calling for jobs, not against jihadist activity). Near In Amenas, wilaya of Illizi, the security forces arrested a group of “Libyan terrorists” driving an offroader, Algeria’s privately owned Ennahar TV claimed on May 8 (the station did not give the exact date or any further details on the incident). Two other Libyans travelling in a 4WD vehicle were arrested by the Algerian security forces inside Algerian territory near Debdeb, wilaya of Illizi, on or around May 17. They were found to be carrying Kalashnikovs and satellite phones. On May 21, a group of around 15 terrorists is reported to have attacked a convoy of gendarmes escorting a prisoner transport in the wilaya of Illizi (L’Expression 22/05). Several gendarmes were wounded, one seriously, but none of the prisoners, all held on terrorism charges, were freed. The authorities suspect AQMI-offshoot MUJAO of being behind the failed operation, according to L’Expression (which did not specify the exact location of the incident).

Elsewhere in the south, an Algerian army position near Tinzaouatin, wilaya of Tamanrasset, on the border with Mali, was hit by “rocket shells” from Mali on April 25 and riposted by shelling over the border. El-Khabar (27/04) reported that the attack was the work of “jihadist groups” and had “nothing to do with French or Chadian forces in northern Mali”. Two days later, the army killed two “armed men” who were trying to cross into Algeria from Mali near Tinzaouatin (El-Khabar 28/04). On the border with Libya, the Algerian army clashed with a jihadist group near Djanet, wilaya of Illizi, on April 26, an operation that left two jihadists dead and two soldiers wounded according to El-Khabar (27/04), while Echorouk reported that the operation started when Algerian army surveillance aircraft spotted a convoy of four offroaders with armed men on board that tried to cross into Algerian territory from Libya. The Algerian press also reported that a “heavily armed group” attacked and robbed the post office at Bordj Baji Mokhtar (wilaya of Adrar) on May 13 and “fled over the border into Mali”, although the next day the Gendarmerie issued a statement describing the event as a “criminal robbery” and ruling out “any terrorist involvement”.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
 President and CEO
 The Gabriel Company, LLC
 1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
 Washington DC, 20005
 Phone: +1 202.887.1113
 Fax: +1 202.887.1115
 Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
 Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

[1] The nom-de-guerre of DRS chief Lt-Gen. Mohamed Médiène.

[2] This is, however, dismissed by another source with close knowledge of the workings of the DRS, who argues that Tewfik, having received his formative training from the KGB in the Soviet Union, has as his model the founder of the Cheka (the KGB’s forerunner) Felix Dzerzhinsky, who worked on through years of illness and died of a heart attack after delivering a speech to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

[3] Publication was blocked by the authorities at the last minute, and the papers’ proprietor Hichem Aboud has reportedly been charged with “harming state security”. Aboud, who was once editor in chief of the Army’s mouthpiece El Djeich, is thought to have ties to the DRS and/or sections of the military hierarchy.

- [4] In 2012, Gen. Tahar Yala issued at least two statements in the name of his new organisation and gave a number of interviews in which he called for “radical change” but did not hold forth at length on the theme of corruption and carefully avoided attacking Bouteflika personally.
- [5] Although Gen. Tahar Yala does not suggest it explicitly, one option might be impeachment under article 88 of the constitution, which allows for a sitting head of state to be removed on grounds of “serious and lasting illness”. This possibility has been floated in the last few days by dissident human rights lawyer Ali Yahia Abdenour.
- [6] "The security of [Tunisia and Libya] is a matter for those countries. I will not comment. We secure our borders from within." There is no infiltration of terrorists from these countries, and "even if there are one or two, they are arrested very swiftly. The Tiguentourine incident will not happen again."
- [7] Back in December, Algerian Interior Minister Daho Ould Kablia visited Tunis for talks on security and border issues, while Algerian Gendarmerie Commander Maj-Gen. Ahmed Boustila inspected new installations and units along the border with Tunisia (16 new advanced posts for the border guards, seven new intervention squads and an air squadron).
- [8] Although most of north-west Algeria has been largely free of jihadist activity for several years, small groups remain active in the wilayas of Ain Defla, Chlef and Tipaza, responsible for one or two incidents every month.
- [9] This incident was not reported this way in mainstream Algerian press. El-Watan (21/04) reported an APS story that “three gendarmes were wounded on April 21 by a roadside bomb explosion near Theniet el-Had”. No mention at all of foreign nationals. El-Khabar (22/04) reported “roadside bomb hits escort of foreign workers”, without giving details of the nature of the attack or the nationality of the foreign workers.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, June 07, 2013 9:48 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: This is an important read on Susan Rice

Friday, June 7, 2013 Follow

▶ TERMS OF ENGAGEMENT PRINT | TEXT SIZE - + Share on email | EMAIL | REPRINTS | SINGLE PAGE

The Combative Consigliere

Will Susan Rice bring out a more muscular side of Barack Obama?

BY JAMES TRAUB | JUNE 6, 2013

After the White House announced that Susan Rice would be replacing Tom Donilon as the president's national security advisor, I asked a foreign policy analyst who is close to the White House if he thought the change in personnel portended a change in policy. "Sure," he said, sardonically. "Susan will bring her magic wand and solve every problem in the world through intervention." He was mocking not Rice herself, but naïve activists who imagine that a more idealistic national security advisor will forge a more idealistic approach to the world.

More than four years in, Barack Obama has figured out what kind of foreign-policy president he wants to be -- less the visionary of the 2008 campaign than the faithful steward of national interests who closes out the ruinous misadventures of the post-9/11 era and husbands, rather than recklessly spends, America's limited resources. And it is reasonable to assume that this strategic recoupment will necessarily define Rice's tenure, whatever her personal convictions.

But I wonder if that's so. At first, after all, Secretary of State John Kerry looked a lot like his predecessor. Someone -- me, actually -- called him "Hillary Clinton in pants." But that hasn't been true at all. Hillary was an icon, with an iconic sense of her own role as America's face to the world; Kerry is a private figure enamored of back channels and shuttle diplomacy. Hillary was preoccupied with "cross-cutting" issues like the status of women; Kerry is a throwback who yearns to broker deals among sovereign states. And so he has frontally attacked deadlocked situations in Syria, Pakistan, and Palestine which his predecessor largely left to others. Good for him, I say.

Rice and Donilon are more obviously dissimilar. Donilon is a political insider with a deep regard for process, a man committed more to the neutral principle of ensuring that all voices are heard than to any specific policy outcome. He is a cautious man who wins the plaudits of foreign-policy realists for helping Obama steer clear of reckless entanglements, in Syria and elsewhere. Rice is a foreign-policy professional with deep convictions and a blithe self-assurance about her own judgments. She is a morally driven figure who makes those same realists uncomfortable. Michele Flournoy, the former under secretary of defense, says that Rice "may be more willing to take action in support of our values than many others would be who are more realpolitik."

The distinction is meaningful, but easily overdrawn. I once asked Rice if she considered herself idealistic, and she bridled. "'Idealistic' to me connotes believing in things or wanting things that are not achievable," she said. She would accept "principled," but she was fine with "pragmatic." At the United Nations, where she has been the U.S. ambassador, she is known for aggressively pushing American interests, not global goods. Rice also has an extremely well-developed instinct for where the president wants to be on any given issue, and will not stray beyond his views. She will wave no magic wands of intervention. Yes, she pushed the president to intervene in Libya; but she has not done so with Syria. She did not, intriguingly, join Hillary and former CIA director David Petraeus and others in urging the president last year to arm the rebels.

So why does it matter that Susan Rice will be the next national security advisor rather than, say, the estimable Tony Blinken, the current deputy? Is it just a question of style -- of Rice's famously short fuse, her battle-tested skills as a turf warrior, her special relationship with the president as a fellow African-American superstar? All those things matter, and have already been subjected to a great deal of scrutiny (as in here, for example). But one senior administration official I spoke with said that the salient differences between Rice and Donilon are not in temperament but in outlook.

Again, think of the analogy with Kerry, whose travel schedule and public oratory give the impression that he is tugging the White House deeper into the Middle East at the very moment it is trying to leave the region's savage conflicts behind. Kerry isn't doing this because he's a lone wolf, but because he knows the region so well and is passionately committed to sorting out its problems. Susan Rice has a different, if overlapping, set of commitments. She spent much of the eight years between Democratic administrations at the Brookings Institution writing about the connection between weak and failing states and American national security -- and, yes, humanitarian intervention. The one issue she made her own as ambassador to the U.N. was nation-building and peacekeeping in Africa.

Both Rice and Kerry, in short, care deeply about the kind of intractable and generally unrewarding -- and morally urgent -- problems which have absorbed the energies of American statesmen since the end of the Cold War. The "pivot" to Asia, for which Donilon is given a good deal of credit, represents a recognition that the United States needs to prepare itself for both new opportunities and new threats in the region; but also a national exhaustion, even disgust, with the thankless task of peace-making, state-building, democracy promotion, and above all military intervention of the last generation. Americans don't want to meddle with the insides of countries any more.

But the Middle East is going to keep tugging at the American sleeve. What is Washington going to do if not just Syria, but also Lebanon and Iraq, slide deeper into sectarian warfare? What if declining oil prices destabilize Saudi Arabia, or a third intifada breaks out in Palestine? The African success story is real; but so, at the same time, is state failure in much of the continent. In Dispensable Nation, Vali Nasr harshly criticizes Obama for favoring drones and counterinsurgency over diplomacy and development, and mocks the pivot to Asia as a kind of escapist fantasy. It's a one-sided narrative, but there's a lot of merit in it.

So I wonder if Rice will rebalance the rebalancing, and remind Obama that America can not walk away from the world's weak and failing places. Egypt and Libya need the United States, no matter how vexing they are; and Washington needs to let Egypt's president, Mohammed Morsi, know that cracking down on Hamas will not be enough to buy American goodwill if he continues cracking down on his domestic opposition as well.

Meanwhile, the rebels in Syria need the United States as well. Kerry has done Obama a favor by arranging with Moscow to bring the two sides together in Geneva, and thus buy more time for U.S. inaction. But the conference is almost mathematically certain to fail -- if it is held at all -- and then Washington will have to choose between obviously futile diplomatic encouragement and some form of military assistance, whether facilitated or provided directly. Is it such a foregone conclusion that Obama will continue to stand by as the body count mounts towards 100,000? The wisdom of restraint may come to feel intolerably craven. And Rice -- and Kerry -- may wind up urging him to arm the rebels. They might even work together!

The Barack Obama we have come to know over the last four years is a deeply cautious man with an acute awareness of how noble-sounding missions can miscarry disastrously. And the economic failure he inherited has compelled him to argue for "nation-building at home" rather than abroad. But he is a complex man with an ambitious sense of his nation's destiny, and his own. Tom Donilon reinforced one side of Obama. Perhaps Susan Rice will reinforce the other.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, June 10, 2013 9:03 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Final media report for Fez Synagogue restoration (Yeah!) and FINAL on Gdeim Izik
Attachments: Media Report on Fez Synagogue Restoration USCoverage FINAL 7June2013.doc; Media Report on Fez Synagogue Restoration USCoverage FINAL 7June2013.pdf; Media Report on Gdeim Izik Coverage FINAL 25March2013.pdf

Importance: High

Please note that attached are the final reports for both the Fez synagogue and Gdeim Izik publicity and the results are extremely positive. The articles were published in thousands of US newspapers, much like AP, UPI or Reuters publishes, when one article is circulated through all of their outlets. In this case we use the NAPS news service, which is highly effective. We are very pleased with the results and hope you are too. See summaries below, as well as the full reports, attached.

Fez Synagogue:

Media/Web Coverage Highlights

- NAPS ARTICLE – 2,100 US newspaper placements for “Morocco: An Oasis of Tolerance & Diversity,” written by MACP, and published in all 50 US states (see list below). Combined print and online audience exceeded 17.5 million readers, and the article appeared in 79 of the top 100 US media markets.

- MOROCCO ON THE MOVE – Ten news and blog columns were posted to Morocco on the Move, and then republished by Middle East Online, allAfrica.com, Atlas Times, and elsewhere, resulting in almost 200 total placements and more than 2 million media impressions.

- PRESS RELEASES – Two releases were distributed on PR Newswire, which were picked up and posted by 545 media outlets on Feb. 14th and 25th, 2013 (listed alphabetically at end of report), including major media such as the Wall Street Journal, Houston Chronicle, Boston Globe, Miami Herald, Reuters, Yahoo News, and S.F. Chronicle.

- E-LETTERS – Both releases were distributed directly to MACP’s key contacts including more than 3,000 policymakers, opinion leaders, and journalists.

- PITCHING REPORTERS – Pitch calls and e-mails also went to hundreds of Jewish and general US media, driving dozens of additional stories.

- RESULTS – Generated more than 3,000 total media, Web placements and 60 million media impressions.

Gdeim Izik:

Media/Web Coverage Highlights

- NAPS article – 2,056 US newspaper placements for article, “Advancing Rule of Law in Morocco,” written by MACP, and published in all 50 US states (see listed below). The combined print and online audience was almost 8 million readers, and the article appeared in 44 of the top 50 US media markets.

Morocco On The Move – Four postings of news and blog columns, including Feb. 8 commentary by MACP Executive Director Jordan Paul, “Transparency, Justice, and the Rule of Law in Morocco.” Republished by allAfrica.com, Atlas Times, Legal News, Sahara Question, and elsewhere, resulting in 150 total placements and more than 2 million media impressions.

PR Newswire – Press Release distributed on PR Newswire, picked up and posted by 194 media outlets on Feb. 18, 2013 (listed alphabetically at end of the report), including major media such as the Wall Street Journal, Houston Chronicle, Boston Globe, Miami Herald, Reuters, Yahoo News, Columbus Dispatch and San Francisco Chronicle. The postings led to more than 250 total media and Web placements, generating more than 20 million media impressions.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Media Coverage Report

RE: Media Report on Restoration of Historic Synagogue in Fez

Pursuant to your request, this report provides a full breakout of US press coverage from the announcement of the restoration the Slat al Fassiyine synagogue in Fez, to which King Mohammed VI delivered remarks.

On Feb. 13 a high-level delegation of Moroccan religious and government leaders came to Fez to inaugurate restoration of the historic Slat al Fassiyine synagogue—and underscore Morocco's commitment to religious tolerance and honoring its 3,000 year old Jewish heritage. To highlight this important message in US outreach, MAC launched an intensive, multi-faceted communications effort that continues to generate results today.

On the eve of the event, MAC's media team was already posting and tweeting from MOTM to alert reporters. The day of the ceremony, the MAC team went to work posting and tweeting to shape initial coverage and highlight the King's remarks as the lead news of the day. The MAC team issued a Press Release to reporters and PR Newswire, "Morocco's King Mohammed VI Commends Restoration of Historic Synagogue, Stresses Spiritual Diversity, Calls for Restoration of all Synagogues in Morocco," to reach both print and online press. The Fez synagogue was also highlighted in a follow-up release, "King Mohammed VI Welcomes Bill Clinton to Morocco; Former US President Praises North African Nation's Tolerance, Democratization," which like the first was e-mailed to policy makers and opinion leaders and pitched to hundreds of reporters. Next, a longer-lead NAPS article, "Morocco: An Oasis of Tolerance & Diversity," was sent to extend Morocco's key messages to thousands of US newspapers. Highlights of the MAC communications campaign are below.

Media/Web Coverage Highlights

- NAPS ARTICLE – 2,100 US newspaper placements for "Morocco: An Oasis of Tolerance & Diversity," written by MACP, and published in all 50 US states (see list below). Combined print and online audience exceeded 17.5 million readers, and the article appeared in 79 of the top 100 US media markets.
- MOROCCO ON THE MOVE – Ten news and blog columns were posted to Morocco on the Move, and then republished by Middle East Online, allAfrica.com, Atlas Times, and elsewhere, resulting in almost 200 total placements and more than 2 million media impressions.
- PRESS RELEASES – Two releases were distributed on PR Newswire, which were picked up and posted by 545 media outlets on Feb. 14th and 25th, 2013 (listed alphabetically at end of report), including major media such as the Wall Street Journal, Houston Chronicle, Boston Globe, Miami Herald, Reuters, Yahoo News, and S.F. Chronicle.
- E-LETTERS – Both releases were distributed directly to MACP's key contacts including more than 3,000 policymakers, opinion leaders, and journalists.
- PITCHING REPORTERS – Pitch calls and e-mails also went to hundreds of Jewish and general US media, driving dozens of additional stories.
- RESULTS – Generated more than 3,000 total media, Web placements and 60 million media impressions.

http://www.clevelandjewishnews.com/links_features/NewsArticle_28Feb01_602-2676-8271-68350467837.html

CLEVELAND
Jewish News

Thursday, March 7, 2013

Morocco: An Oasis Of Tolerance & Diversity

Tabbis pray as Jewish and Muslim leaders listen during the inauguration of the Slat al Fassiyine Synagogue in the northern Moroccan city of Fez.
AFP PHOTO/FADEL SENNA (NAPS)

By NAPS, North American Press Syndicate
(NAPS)—Some may be surprised at the thought of the king of a North African country calling for the restoration of the country's synagogues and acknowledging the country's rich history of cultural diversity.

Yet that was exactly the case recently when Morocco's King Mohammed VI highlighted Morocco's Jewish heritage and reaffirmed his country's commitment to religious freedom and diversity.

His comments came at the restoration ceremony of Slat al Fassiyine Synagogue in Fez. Built in the 17th century, it is the oldest synagogue in Fez, where much of the old city, or medina, has been designated a UNESCO World Heritage Site.

The synagogue had fallen into disrepair and had been closed since the 1960s. With funding from Morocco's Jewish community and the Federal Republic of Germany, Slat al Fassiyine has now been restored and a ceremony was held to celebrate the completion of the two-year renovation effort.

A Diverse Heritage

In his message, King Mohammed VI highlighted Morocco's diverse cultural heritage: "The Moroccan people's cultural traditions, which are steeped in history, are rooted in our citizens' abiding commitment to the principles of coexistence, tolerance and harmony between the various components of the nation.

"As is enshrined in the Kingdom's new Constitution, the Hebrew heritage is indeed one of the time-honored components of our national identity. For this reason, I wish to call for the restoration of all the synagogues in the other Moroccan cities so that they may serve not only as places of worship, but also as forums for cultural dialogue and for the promotion of our cultural values."

The king also said the two-year restoration of the 17th century synagogue bore "eloquent testimony to the spiritual wealth and diversity of the Kingdom of Morocco and its heritage."

A Message of Tolerance

Some 200 people attended the ceremony, including Moroccan Prime Minister Abdellah Benkirane, representatives of the German government, and leaders of the Moroccan Jewish community.

Serge Berdugo, president of the Judeo-Moroccan Patrimony Foundation, said that the restoration is a "message of peace and tolerance." "Slat al Fassiyine teaches us a beautiful lesson," he said. "It represented the past, bound to disappear. Its restoration process anticipated the future, and that future is now. Moroccan Judaism's time has come. This community is part of the Moroccan reality."

This information is provided by Declerian on behalf of the government of Morocco. Further information is available at the U.S. Department of Justice.

Placements of NAPS Article – 2,100 US Newspapers, print/online

NAPS Article: “Morocco: Oasis of Tolerance & Diversity” (Feb. 21, 2013)

The final report for the NAPS article, “Morocco: An Oasis of Tolerance & Diversity,” shows it generated 2,100 placements in newspapers in all 50 US states (including those listed below). Combined print/online audience was 17.5 million readers (double our 1st NAPS article). The article appeared in 44 of the top 50 US media markets, 79 of the top 100 markets, and 160 of the top 300 markets.

THE HOUR, NORWALK, CT
 NJ.COM, NEWARK, NJ
 HOMEREPORTEERNEWS, BROOKLYN, NY
 REGISTERSTAR, HUDSON, NY
 DAILYFREEMAN, KINGSTON, NY
 CATSKILLSHOPPERONLINE, LIBERTY, NY
 IONIANNEWS, NEW ROCHELLE, NY
 CHELSEANOW, NEW YORK, NY,
 QCHRON, REGO PARK, NY,
 BIGBEARGRIZZLY, BIG BEAR LAKE, CA,
 DESERTNEWS, CALIFORNIA CITY, CA,
 CHAMPIONNEWSPAPERS, CHINO, CA,
 COASTREPORTONLINE, COSTA MESA, CA,
 FONTANAHERALDNEWS, FONTANA, CA,
 HIGHLANDNEWS, HIGHLAND, CA,
 LADOWNTOWNNEWS, LOS ANGELES, CA,
 WAVENEWSAPERS, LOS ANGELES, CA,
 MALIBUTIMES, MALIBU, CA,
 TBRNEWS, MANHATTAN BEACH, CA,
 THEPOLYPOST, POMONA, CA,
 PVNEWS, ROLLING HILLS ESTATE, CA,
 NEWSMIRROR, YUCAIPA, CA,
 JOURNAL-TOPICS, DES PLAINES, IL,
 THEGILMANSTAR, GILMAN, IL,
 HERSCHERPILOT, HERSCHER, IL,
 BUGLENEWSPAPERS, PLAINFIELD, IL,
 HERALDARGUS, LA PORTE, IN,
 THENEWSDISPATCH, MICHIGAN CITY, IN,
 GILROYDISPATCH, GILROY, CA,
 MORGANHILLTIMES, GILROY, CA,
 SANBENITOCOUNTYTODAY, GILROY, CA,
 NEWS.GOOGLE.COM, MOUNTAIN VIEW, CA
 PACIFICSUN, SAN RAFAEL, CA,
 SONOMAWEST, SEBASTOPOL, CA,
 HOMETOWN-SHOPPER, UKIAH, CA,
 NEWARKPOSTONLINE, NEWARK, DE,
 DELCOTIMES, PRIMOS, PA,
 FOXBOROREPORTER, FOXBORO, MA,
 CAPEANNPLANET, GLOUCESTER, MA,

http://www.clevelandjewishnews.com/online_features/Israel/article_28fd60149025075-0771146943767387.html

CLEVELAND Jewish News

Thursday, March 7, 2013

Morocco: An Oasis Of Tolerance & Diversity

Rabbis pray as Jewish and Muslim leaders listen during the inauguration of the Slat al Fassiyyine Synagogue in the northern Moroccan city of Fez. AFP PHOTO/FADEL SENNA (NAPS)

By NAPS, North American Precis Syndicate

[NAPS]—Some may be surprised at the thought of the king of a North African country calling for the restoration of the country's synagogues and acknowledging the country's rich history of cultural diversity.

Yet that was exactly the case recently when Morocco's King Mohammed VI highlighted Morocco's Jewish heritage and reaffirmed his country's commitment to religious freedom and diversity.

His comments came at the restoration ceremony of Slat al Fassiyyine Synagogue in Fez. Built in the 17th century, it is the oldest synagogue in Fez, where much of the old city, or medina, has been designated a UNESCO World Heritage Site.

The synagogue had fallen into disrepair and had been closed since the 1960s. With funding from Morocco's Jewish community and the Federal Republic of Germany, Slat al Fassiyyine has now been restored and a ceremony was held to celebrate the completion of the two-year renovation effort.

A Diverse Heritage

In his message, King Mohammed VI highlighted Morocco's diverse cultural heritage: "The Moroccan people's cultural traditions, which are steeped in history, are rooted in our citizens' abiding commitment to the principles of coexistence, tolerance and harmony between the various components of the nation.

"As is enshrined in the Kingdom's new Constitution, the Hebrew heritage is indeed one of the time-honored components of our national identity. For this reason, I wish to call for the restoration of all the synagogues in the other Moroccan cities so that they may serve not only as places of worship, but also as forums for cultural dialogue and for the promotion of our cultural values."

The king also said the two-year restoration of the 17th century synagogue bore "eloquent testimony to the spiritual wealth and diversity of the Kingdom of Morocco and its heritage."

A Message of Tolerance

Some 200 people attended the ceremony, including Moroccan Prime Minister Abdellah Benkirane, representatives of the German government, and leaders of the Moroccan Jewish community.

Serge Berdugo, president of the Judeo-Moroccan Patrimony Foundation, said that the restoration is a "message of peace and tolerance." "Slat al Fassiyyine teaches us a beautiful lesson," he said, "It represented the past, bound to disappear. Its restoration process anticipated the future, and that future is now. Moroccan Judaism's time has come. This community is part of the Moroccan reality."

This information is provided by Beekman on behalf of the government of Morocco. Further information is available at the U.S. Department of Justice.

HOMENEWSHERE, READING, MA,
 SENTINELSOURCE, KEENE, NH,
 LEESBURG2DAY, LEESBURG, VA,
 INSIDENOVA, MANASSAS, VA,
 NORTHERNVASPORTS, SPRINGFIELD, VA,
 SUNGAZETTE, SPRINGFIELD, VA,
 CLARKSVILLENEWS, CLARKSVILLE, TX,
 AIMMEDIATEXAS, DALLAS, TX,
 DALLASWEEKLY, DALLAS, TX,
 KAUFMANHERALD, KAUFMAN, TX,
 DAILYTRIBUNE, MT PLEASANT, TX,
 TERRELLTRIBUNE, TERRELL, TX,
 ANTRIMREVIEW, BELLAIRE, MI,
 ALVINSUN, ALVIN, TX,
 THEANAHUACPROGRESS, ANAHUAC, TX,
 BAYCITYTRIBUNE, BAY CITY, TX,
 LEADER-NEWS, EL CAMPO, TX,
 GALVESTONDAILYNEWS, GALVESTON, TX,

YOURHOUSTONNEWS, HOUSTON, TX,
 KATYTIMES, KATY, TX,
 FBHERALD, ROSENBERG, TX,
 JOURNAL-SPECTATOR, WHARTON, TX,
 ELNUEVOHERALDO, MIAMI, FL,
 THEATLANTAVOICE, ATLANTA, GA,
 THENEWSOBSERVER, BLUE RIDGE, GA,
 THECRIER, DUNWOODY, GA,
 ELBERTON, ELBERTON, GA,
 THEHARTWELLSUN, HARTWELL, GA,
 FRANKLINCOUNTYCITIZEN, LAVONIA, GA,
 NORTHWESTGEORGIANEWS, ROME, GA,
 OCONEEENTERPRISE, WATKINSVILLE, GA,
 LEDGERNEWS, WOODSTOCK, GA,
 YELMONLINE, YELM, WA,
 CLEVELANDJEWISHNEWS, BEACHWD, OH,
 THEPOSTNEWSPAPERS, MEDINA, OH,
 CHANVILLAGER, CHASKA, MN,
 CHASKAHERALD, CHASKA, MN,
 EDENPRAIRIENEWS, EDEN PRAIRIE, MN,
 JORDANNEWS, JORDAN, MN,
 INDEPENDENTREVIEW, LITCHFIELD, MN,
 LPLEADER, LONG PRAIRIE, MN,
 SAVAGEPACER, PRIOR LAKE, MN,
 SAVVY.MNTN*, SHAKOPEE, MN,
 SHAKOPEENEWS, SHAKOPEE, MN,
 WALKERMN, WALKER, MN,
 PRESSPUBS, WHITE BEAR LAKE, MN,
 CORONADONEWSCA, CORONADO, CA,
 SCOOPSANDIEGO, SAN DIEGO, CA,
 ALESTLELIVE, EDWARDSVILLE, IL,
 THEINTELLIGENCER, EDWARDSVILLE, IL,
 THEJOURNAL-NEWS, HILLSBORO, IL,
 HERALDPUBS, MASCOUTAH, IL,
 OKAWVILLETIMES, OKAWVILLE, IL,
 BGDAILYNEWS, BOWLING GREEN, KY,
 BGNEWS, BOWLING GREEN, KY,
 MYIRONCOUNTYNEWS, IRONTON, MO,
 STLAMERICAN, ST. LOUIS, MO,
 STEGENHERALD, STE GENEVIEVE, MO,
 SULLIVANJOURNAL, SULLIVAN, MO,
 EMISSOURIAN, WASHINGTON, MO,
 TIMESONLINE, BEAVER, PA,
 HERALDSTANDARD, UNIONTOWN, PA,
 MOHAVEDAILYNEWS, BULLHEAD CITY, AZ,
 HAVASUNEWS, LAKE HAVASU CITY, AZ,
 PARKERPIONEER, PARKER, AZ,
 EACOURIER, SAFFORD, AZ,
 WMICENTRAL, SHOW LOW, AZ,

WICKENBURGSUN, WICKENBURG, AZ,
 LEBANONDAILYRECORD, LEBANON, MO,
 THEMONITOR, MCALLEN, TX,
 CAPITALGAZETTE, ANNAPOLIS, MD,
 MYEASTERNSHOREMD, EASTON, MD,
 STARDEM, EASTON, MD,
 CECILDAILY, ELKTON, MD,
 MYUPPERCHESAPEAKE, ELKTON, MD,
 THEFLUME, BAILEY, CO,
 RAWLINSTIMES, RAWLINS, WY,
 COASTWEEKEND, ASTORIA, OR,
 DAILYASTORIAN, ASTORIA, OR,
 SEASIDE-SUN, SEASIDE, OR,
 THEREFLECTOR, BATTLE GROUND, WA,
 CHINOOKOBSERVER, LONG BEACH, WA,
 NEWSRECORD.ORGTN*, CINCINNATI, OH,
 HERALD-ONLINE, LOUISBURG, KS,
 REPUBLIC-ONLINE, PAOLA, KS,
 MYCALDWELLCOUNTY, HAMILTON, MO,
 KEARNEYCOURIER, KEARNEY, MO,
 LIBERTYTRIBUNE, LIBERTY, MO,
 SEDALIADEMOCRAT, SEDALIA, MO,
 SMITHVILLEHERALD, SMITHVILLE, MO,
 GRAPHIC-ONLINE, ST JOSEPH, MO,
 KCNURSINGNEWS, ST JOSEPH, MO,
 NEWSPRESSNOW, ST JOSEPH, MO,
 PLATTECHRONICLE, WESTON, MO,
 FORESTHILLSMESSENGER, FORESTHILL, CA,
 EGCITIZEN, GALT, CA,
 GALTHERALDONLINE, GALT, CA,
 LEDGER-DISPATCH, JACKSON, CA,
 PNNA, SACRAMENTO, CA,
 WDTIMES, WATERTOWN, WI,
 NEWSEXAMINER, CONNERSVILLE, IN,
 CHRONICLE-TRIBUNE, MARION, IN,
 CIRCULATOR, PORTLAND, IN,
 SHELBYNEWS, SHELBYVILLE, IN,
 LAREDOSBARGAINBOOK, LAREDO, TX,
 LMTONLINE, LAREDO, TX,
 CIRCLEVILLETODAY, CIRCLEVILLE, OH,
 THEOTHERPAPER, COLUMBUS, OH,
 LOGANDAILY, LOGAN, OH,
 GOBOGALUSA, BOGALUSA, LA,
 HAMMONDSTAR, HAMMOND, LA,
 LOBSERVATEUR, LA PLACE, LA,
 THEHULLBALOO, NEW ORLEANS, LA,
 THESTTAMMANYNEWS, SLIDELL, LA,
 POST-VOICE, BURGAW, NC,
 CACHEVALLEYDAILY, LOGAN, UT,

MOABSUNNEWS, MOAB, UT,
 RICHFIELDREAPER, RICHFIELD, UT,
 GREENRIVERSTAR, GREEN RIVER, WY,
 BRANFORDSEVEN, BRANFORD, CT,
 JOURNALINQUIRER, MANCHESTER, CT,
 MIDDLETOWNPRESS, MIDDLETOWN, CT,
 TOWNTIMESNEWS, SOUTHURY, CT,
 VOICESNEWS, SOUTHURY, CT,
 SUNCHRONICLE, NORTH ATTLEBORO, MA,
 NEWPORTRI, NEWPORT, RI,
 INDEPENDENTRI, WAKEFIELD, RI,
 NCATREGISTER, GREENSBORO, NC,
 UNCGCAROLINIAN, GREENSBORO, NC,
 ACONES, HILLSBOROUGH, NC,
 JAMESTOWNNEWS, JAMESTOWN, NC,
 MONTGOMERYHERALD, TROY, NC,
 JOURNALNOW, WINSTON-SALEM, NC,
 FLTIMES, GENEVA, NY,
 LAUGHLINERTAINER, LAUGHLIN, NV,
 PORTLANDLEADER, PORTLAND, TN,
 MYSPARTANEWS, SPARTA, TN,
 PRESSREGISTER, CLARKSDALE, MS,
 DESOTOTIMES, HERNANDO, MS,
 PURCELLREGISTER, PURCELL, OK,
 NASSAUCOUNTYRECORD, CALLAHAN, FL,
 NASSAURECORD, CALLAHAN, FL,
 FBNEWSLEADER, FERNANDINA BEACH, FL,
 LAKECITYREPORTER, LAKE CITY, FL,
 THEALMATIMES, ALMA, GA,
 THEBLACKSHEARTIMES, BLACKSHEAR, GA,
 DOUGLASENTERPRISE, DOUGLAS, GA,
 THEPRESS-SENTINEL, JESUP, GA,
 RRDAILYHERALD, ROANOKE RAPIDS, NC,
 FREDERICKSBURGSTANDARD,
 FREDERICKSBURG, TX,
 GONZALESINQUIRER, GONZALES, TX,
 THEROTUNDAONLINE, FARMVILLE, VA,
 SOUTHSIDEMESSENGER, KEYSVILLE, VA,
 PRINCE GEORGE JOURNAL, P.GEORGE, VA,
 RICHMOND, RICHMOND, VA,
 TIMESDISPATCH, RICHMOND, VA,
 VANCNEWS, SOUTH HILL, VA,
 THE MONITOR, SUTHERLAND, VA,
 CROSSROADSCHRONICLE, CASHIERS, NC,
 THEFRANKLINPRESS, FRANKLIN, NC,
 CLAYCOUNTYPROGRESS, HAYESVILLE, NC,
 CHEROKEESCOUT, MURPHY, NC,
 MITCHELLNEWS, SPRUCE PINE, NC,
 CLINTONCHRONICLE, CLINTON, SC,

REEDLEYEXPONENT, REEDLEY, CA,
 THEDINUBASENTINEL, REEDLEY, CA,
 THESANGERHERALD, SANGER, CA,
 WPCVA, CHATHAM, VA,
 NEWSADVANCE, LYNCHBURG, VA,
 SMITHMOUNTAINEAGLE, WITZ, VA,
 PALLTIMES, OSWEGO, NY,
 SKANEATELESJOURNAL, SKANEATELES, NY,
 SOUTHCOUNTYLEADER, BIXBY, OK,
 BALEDGER, BROKEN ARROW, OK,
 CATOOSATIMES, CATOOSA, OK,
 CLEVELANDAMERICAN, CLEVELAND, OK,
 THECOLLINSVILLENEWS, COLLINSVILLE, OK,
 COWETAAMERICAN, COWETA, OK,
 GRANDLAKENEWS, GROVE, OK,
 MANNFORDEAGLE, MANNFORD, OK,
 MIAMIOK, MIAMI, OK,
 OWASSOREPORTER, OWASSO, OK,
 SANDSPRINGSLEADER, SAND SPRINGS, OK,
 SAPULPAHERALDONLINE, SAPULPA, OK,
 SKIATOOKJOURNAL, SKIATOOK, OK,
 OCOLLY, STILLWATER, OK,
 TULSABUSINESS, TULSA, OK,
 WAGONERTRIBUNE, WAGONER, OK,
 BENSONNEWS-SUN, BENSON, AZ,
 GVNEWS, GREEN VALLEY, AZ,
 EXPLORERNEWS, TUCSON, AZ,
 INSIDETUCSONBUSINESS, TUCSON, AZ,
 WILLCOXRANGENEWS, WILLCOX, AZ,
 ELPASOINC, EL PASO, TX,
 HARLANONLINE, HARLAN, IA,
 ENTERPRISEPUB, BLAIR, NE,
 DOANELINE, CRETE, NE,
 DAILYNEBRASKAN, LINCOLN, NE,
 OMAHANEWSTAND, OMAHA, NE,
 CASS-NEWS, PLATTSMOUTH, NE,
 SEWARDINDEPENDENT, SEWARD, NE,
 SANGRECHRONICLE, ANGEL FIRE, NM,
 RIOGRANDESUN, ESPANOLA, NM,
 CIBOLABEACON, GRANTS, NM,
 TAOSNEWS, TAOS, NM,
 MICHIGANSTHUMB, BAD AXE, MI,
 TCTIMES, FENTON, MI,
 STANDARDBANNER, JEFFERSON CITY, TN,
 JOURNALTRIBUNE, BIDDEFORD, ME,
 DENNEWS, CHARLESTON, IL,
 PARISBEACON, PARIS, IL,
 ANNANEWS, ANNA, IL,
 COURIERINDEPENDENT, CARTERVILLE, IL,
 PARISPI, PARIS, TN,
 BRYANTIMES, BRYAN, OH,
 GETTYSBURGTIMES, GETTYSBURG, PA,
 MORNINGJOURNAL, LISBON, OH,
 ELLWOODCITYLEDGER, ELLWOOD CITY, PA,
 DEWITT-EE, DEWITT, AR,
 ASHLEYCOUNTYLEDGER, HAMBURG, AR,
 THEBRAY, MAGNOLIA, AR,
 THEMCGEHEETIMES, MCGEHEE, AR,
 MYMONTICELLONEWS, MONTICELLO, AR,
 THEDAILYCITIZEN, SEARCY, AR,
 CHARLESTONMERCURY, CHARLESTON, SC,
 COLLETON TODAY, WALTERBORO, SC,
 LODINEWS, LODI, CA,
 CALAVERAESTERPRISE, SAN ANDREAS, CA,
 GULFCOASTNEWSTODAY, FAIRHOPE, AL,
 CCENTERDISPATCH, CLAY CENTER, KS,
 CCHEADLINER, CLAY CENTER, KS,
 CHAMBERLAIN SUN, CHAMBERLAIN, SD,
 FREEMANS D, FREEMAN, SD,
 LEADERCOURIER-TIMES, N. SIOUX CITY, SD,
 ONIDAWATCHMAN, ONIDA, SD,
 CAPJOURNAL, PIERRE, SD,
 VOLANTEONLINE, VERMILLION, SD,
 APP-PRINTING, ALBION, IN,
 FWBUSINESS, KENDALLVILLE, IN,
 FWDAILYNEWS, KENDALLVILLE, IN,
 KPCNEWS, KENDALLVILLE, IN,
 INDIANAGAZETTE, INDIANA, PA,
 CLASSICIMAGES, MUSCATINE, IA,
 WESTERNCOURIER, MACOMB, IL,
 SWIOWANEWSOURCE, ATLANTIC, IA,
 CHARITONLEADER, CHARITON, IA,
 ALGONA, DES MOINES, IA,
 THESIMPSONIAN, INDIANOLA, IA,
 CHAFFEECOUNTYTIMES, BUENA VISTA, CO,
 CHIEFTAIN, PUEBLO, CO,
 THEMOUNTAINMAIL, SALIDA, CO,
 TRICITIES, BRISTOL, VA,
 PAWPAWCOURIERLEADER, PAW PAW, MI,
 THREERIVERSNEWS, THREE RIVERS, MI,
 EMPORIA GAZETTE, EMPORIA, KS,
 WASHBURNREVIEW.ORG TN*, TOPEKA, KS,
 VERONEWS, VERO BEACH, FL,
 PALATKADAILYNEWS, PALATKA, FL,
 NEWS-GRAPHIC, GEORGETOWN, KY,
 VICKSBURGPOST, VICKSBURG, MS,
 STOWETODAY, STOWE, VT,
 NCCOAST, MOREHEAD CITY, NC,
 IOSCONEWS, EAST TAWAS, MI,
 GLADWINMI, GLADWIN, MI,
 THEROYALREGISTER, COEUR D'ALENE, ID,
 DNEWS, MOSCOW, ID,
 GAZETTERECORD, SAINT MARIES, ID,
 BOONEVILLEDEMOCRAT, BOONEVILLE, AR,
 CHARLESTONEXPRESS, CHARLESTON, AR,
 MCRECORDONLINE, HUNTSVILLE, AR,
 PARIS-EXPRESS, PARIS, AR,
 PRESSARGUS, VAN BUREN, AR,
 SEQUOYAHCOUNTYTIMES, SALLISAW, OK,
 BELOITDAILYNEWS, BELOIT, WI,
 HNGNEWS, SUN PRAIRIE, WI,
 LITTLERIVERNEWS, ASHDOWN, AR,
 HENDERSONDAILYNEWS, HENDERSON, TX,
 JIMPLECUTE, JEFFERSON, TX,
 ALICETX, ALICE, TX,
 RECORDSTAR, ALICE, TX,
 DELRIONEWSHERALD, DEL RIO, TX,
 CREIGHTONNEWS, CREIGHTON, NE,
 HARTINGTONSHOPPER, HARTINGTON, NE,
 NELIGHNEWS, NELIGH, NE,
 NORFOLKDAILYNEWS, NORFOLK, NE,
 MYWAYNENEWS, WAYNE, NE,
 IBERIANET, NEW IBERIA, LA,
 JOURNAL-EUREKA, ANAMOSA, IA,
 CPIONEER, CASCADE, IA,
 CRESCOTIMES, CRESCO, IA,
 THONLINE, DUBUQUE, IA,
 DYERSVILLECOMMERCIAL, DYERSVILLE, IA,
 KALONANEWS, KALONA, IA,
 NHTRIB, NEW HAMPTON, IA,
 VINTONDAILY, VINTON, IA,
 WAHPETONDAILYNEWS, WAHPETON, ND,
 ARGUSOBSERVER, ONTARIO, OR,
 PATRIOTTALON, TYLER, TX,
 GRANDRAPIDSMN, GRAND RAPIDS, MN,
 HIBBINGMN, HIBBING, MN,
 VIRGINIAMN, VIRGINIA, MN,
 ASHLANDWI, ASHLAND, WI,
 NEWS-SHIELD, BARRON, WI,
 HAYWARDWI, HAYWARD, WI,
 LADYSMITHNEWS, LADYSMITH, WI,
 SPOONERADVOCATE, SPOONER, WI,
 WALLOWA, ENTERPRISE, OR,
 EASTOREGONIAN, HERMISTON, OR,
 HERMISTONHERALD, HERMISTON, OR,
 BLUEMOUNTAINEAGLE, JOHN DAY, OR,
 BLOOMERADVANCE, BLOOMER, WI,

CHIPPEWAVALLEYMOMS, EAU CLAIRE, WI, FLORALA, FLORENCE, AL, DDTONLINE, GREENVILLE, MS,
 FULTONDEMOCRAT, CANTON, IL, MOULTONADVERTISER, MOULTON, AL, THERACQUETTE, POTSDAM, NY,
 LEECOUNTYCOURIER, TUPELO, MS, HICKORYRECORD, HICKORY, NC, TRI-PARISHTIMES, HOUMA, LA,
 THEINDEPENDENT, GRAND ISLAND, NE, JOURNALPATRIOT, N. WILKESBORO, NC, PARAGOULDDAILYPRESS, PARAGOULD, AR,
 LEXCH, LEXINGTON, NE, BROWNSVILLEHERALD, BROWNSVILLE, TX, RECORDGAZETTE, BANNING, CA,
 BRENHAMBANNER, BRENHAM, TX, VALLEYBARGAINBOOK, BROWNSVILLE, TX, IMPERIALVALLEYNEWS.COM, HOLTVILLE, CA
 THEEAGLE, BRYAN, TX, VALLEYMORNINGSTAR, HARLINGEN, TX, SANDIEGONEWSCAPE.COM, HOLTVILLE, CA
 WACOTRIB, WACO, TX, HARRISONDAILYTIMES, HARRISON, AR, YUMANNEWSNOW.COM, HOLTVILLE, CA,
 CENTRALWINENWS, ABBOTSFORD, WI, NEWTONCOUNTYTIMES, JASPER, AR, DESERTENTERTAINER, PALM DESERT, CA,
 PRICECOUNTYDAILY, PHILLIPS, WI, BOLIVARMONEWS, BOLIVAR, MO, HIDESERTSTAR, YUCCA VALLEY, CA,
 ARCHERCOUNTYNEWS, ARCHER CNTY, TX, BUFFALOREFLEX, BUFFALO, MO, LIBERTYCOUNTYTIMES, CHESTER, MT,
 THESUNFLOWER, WICHITA, TX, THELICKINGNEWS, LICKING, MO, CHOTEAUACANTHA, CHOTEAU, MT,
 MBVISIT, CONWAY, SC, MARSHFIELDMAIL, MARSHFIELD, MO, CUTBANKPIONEERPRESS, CUTBANK, MT,
 TRINITYJOURNAL, WEAVERVILLE, CA, MARYSVILLEONLINE, MARSHFIELD, MO, FAIRFIELDSUNTIMES, FAIRFIELD, MT,
 CASCADECATTLEMAN, YREKA, CA, NEWS-JOURNAL, MOUNTAIN GROVE, MO, LEWISTOWNNEWS, LEWISTON, MT,
 CASCADEHORSEMAN, YREKA, CA, REPUBLICMONEWS, REPUBLIC, MO, MONTROSEPRESS, MONTROSE, CO,
 SIDNEYHERALD, SIDNEY, MT, SOUTHCOUNTYMAIL, ROGERSVILLE, MO, TELLURIDENEWS, TELLURIDE, CO,
 WILLISTONHERALD, WILLISTON, ND, WEBSTERCOUNTYCITIZEN, SEYMOUR, MO, BROWNWOODTX, BROWNWOOD, TX,
 THEPENDERPOST, BURGAW, NC, CEDARREPUBLICAN, STOCKTON, MO, SAVANNAHREPORTER, SAVANNAH, MO,
 TOPSAILVOICE, BURGAW, NC, NAVIGATORJOURNAL, ALBION, IL, THECLAYTIMESJOURNAL, LINEVILLE, AL,
 STATEPORTPILOT, SOUTHPORT, NC, SITRADERS, WEST FRANKFORT, IL, THERANDOPHLEADER, ROANOKE, AL,
 WHITEVILLE, WHITEVILLE, NC, THESHOALSNEWS, SHOALS, IN, STARHERALD, SCOTTSBLUFF, NE,
 THECHARTONLINE, JOPLIN, MO, SUNCOMMERCIAL, VINCENNES, IN, WYOSPORTS, CHEYENNE, WY,
 BELMONDNEWS, BELMOND, IA, MCCLEANNEWS, CALHOUN, KY, THEEAGLEPOST, HOPKINSVILLE, KY,
 THEWILLISTONTRADER, LAKESIDE, MT, THE-MESSENGER, MADISONVILLE, KY, KENTUCKYNEWERA, HOKINSVILLE, MO,
 DAILYTOREADOR, LUBBOCK, TX, MESSENGER-INQUIRER, OWENSBORO, KY, JOURNALREVIEW, CRAWFORDSVILLE, IN,
 THEDAILYCOURIER, GRANTS PASS, OR, TIMESLEADER, PRINCETON, KY, NEWSBUG, RENNSALAER, IN,
 BOCOJO, ASHLAND, MO, THECORRYJOURNAL, CORRY, PA, DOUGLAS-BUDGET, DOUGLAS, WY,
 COCOMOVOICE, BOONVILLE, MO, TITUSVILLEHERALD, TITUSVILLE, PA, DAILYPROGRESS, CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA,
 LAKEEXPO, LAURIE, MO, AUBURNVILLAGER, AUNURN, AL, MCHNEWS, MCCONNELSVILLE, OH,
 DAILYDEM, FORT MADISON, IA, ATHENSOHIOTODAY, ATHENS, OH, PERRYDAILY, NEW LEXINGTON, OH,
 DAILYGATE, KEOBUK, IA, JACKSONCOUNTYDAILY, JACKSON, OH, MINICASSIA, BURLEY, ID,
 JOURNALPILOT, CARTHAGE, IL, PIKECOUNTYDAILY, WAVERLY, OH, ALBIANEWS, ALBIA, IA,
 PALMYRA-SPECTATOR, PALMYA, MO, ANCHORAGEPRESS, ANCHORAGE, AK, PORTLAVACAWAVE, PORT LAVACA, TX,
 EXPONENT-TELEGRAM, CLARKSBURG, WV, FRONTIERSMAN, WASILLA, AK, NPTELEGRAPH, NORTH PLATTE, NE,
 MOUNTAIN STATESMAN, GRAFTON, WV, PERRYVILLENEWS, PERRYVILLE, MO, DELTAWINDONLINE, DELTA JUNCTION, AK, DOTHANEAGLE, DOTHAN, AL, BHPIONEER, SPEARFISH, SD, NEWSMINER, FAIRBANKS, AK, SOUTHEASTSUN, ENTERPRISE, AL, TIMBERLAKES.DAKOTA, TIMBER LAKE, SD, STARNEWS, WAINWRIGHT, AB, GREATWHITEENTERPRISES, OMRO, WI, LAURELOUTLOOK, LAUREL, MT, THESHELBYNEWS, SHELBYVILLE, IN,

MOROCCO ON THE MOVE – 10 Postings of News and Blog Columns, Republished for almost 200 Total Placements

New Life for “Slat Al Fassiyine” synagogue in Fez

February 12, 2013 by Morocco On The Move

The project of the Slat Fassiyine synagogue in Fez is complete. This historic monument in the medina of Fez dating back to the XVIth century has been fully restored. Its inauguration will take place Wednesday, February 13 under the patronage of His Majesty King Mohammed VI and is organized by The Judeo-Moroccan Heritage Foundation (FPCJM) [...]

Morocco’s King Mohammed VI commends ‘spiritual diversity’ at synagogue renewal in Fez

February 13, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

Agence France Press/AFP, by Fadel Senna (Fez, Morocco, Feb. 13, 2013) — King Mohammed VI hailed the “spiritual wealth and diversity” of Morocco at a ceremony on Wednesday to mark the end of the restoration of a 17th century synagogue in the city of Fez. The ceremony was held in the medina, the Old [...]

King Hails Restoration of Synagogue,Urges Restoration for all Morocco Synagogues

February 14, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

* Click here for King Mohammed VI’s full remarks*

MACP (Washington, DC, Feb. 14, 2013) – In a message at the restoration ceremony of the 17th century Slat al Fassiyine Synagogue in Fez, HM King Mohammed VI reiterated his commitment to religious freedom and spiritual diversity, and emphasized the importance of the three-thousand-year-old Jewish legacy [...]

Morocco Inaugurates Restored Synagogue In Push For Tolerance – Le Soir

February 18, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

LE SOIR/Worldcrunch, by Hassan Alaoui (Fez, Morocco, Feb. 18, 2013) – It had served over the years as a prison, a carpet factory and a boxing gym. But last week, the building in this ancient Moroccan city’s central medina was officially returned to its original incarnation: the Slat-al-Fassiyine synagogue was inaugurated by King Mohammed [...]

King Mohammed VI Calls for Restoration of all Moroccan Synagogues – The Jewish Voice

February 20, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

The Jewish Voice, by JV staff (February 20, 2013) — In a message at the restoration ceremony of the 17th century Slat al Fassiyine Synagogue in Fez, HM King Mohammed VI reiterated his commitment to religious freedom and spiritual diversity, and emphasized the importance of the three-thousand-year-old Jewish legacy in Morocco. “As [...]

Morocco: An emerging model for Muslim-Jewish relations – Common Ground

February 20, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

Common Ground, by Adina Friedman (Washington, DC, Feb. 19, 2013) – At a ceremony last Wednesday marking the end of the restoration of a 17th Century synagogue in Fez’s Old City, in a message read by Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane, King Mohammed hailed Morocco’s “spiritual wealth and diversity” and its “values of coexistence, tolerance and [...]”

Bill Clinton hails Morocco’s tolerance, democratization – Middle East Online

February 25, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

Middle East Online (Washington, DC, Feb. 25, 2013) — Former US president Bill Clinton, who was on a private visit to Morocco, was received on Sunday in the Rabat royal palace by HM King Mohammed VI. The audience underscored the ties of friendship uniting the royal family and the Clinton family, and the good will [...]

King Mohammed welcomes Bill Clinton, who lauds Morocco’s tolerance, democratization

February 25, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

Click here for video highlights of former US President Bill Clinton’s visit to Morocco

MACP, YouTube, MAP (Washington, DC, Feb. 25, 2013) – Former US president Bill Clinton, who was on a private visit to Morocco, was received on Sunday in the Rabat royal palace by HM King Mohammed VI. The audience underscored the friendship [...]

Press Release: Morocco’s King Mohammed VI Commends...

February 14, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

CONTACT: Garth Neuffer, 202.470.2055 gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com
FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: Thursday, February 14, 2013

Morocco’s King Mohammed VI Commends Restoration of Historic Synagogue, Stresses Spiritual Diversity, Calls for Restoration of all Synagogues in Morocco

Washington, DC (Feb. 14, 2013) – In a message at the restoration ceremony of the 17th century Slat al Fassayne Synagogue in Fez, [...]

Press Release: King Mohammed VI Welcomes Bill Clinton...

February 25, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

CONTACT: Garth Neuffer, 202.470.2055 gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com
FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: Monday, February 25, 2013

King Mohammed VI Welcomes Bill Clinton to Morocco; Former US President Praises North African Nation’s Tolerance, Democratization

Washington, DC (Monday, Feb. 25, 2013) — Former US president Bill Clinton, who was on a private visit to Morocco, was received on Sunday in [...]

2 MACP Releases on PR Newswire and Pitched to Reporters – Posts at 545 Major Media Outlets, 800+ Total Placements

MACP Press Releases:

- “Morocco’s King Mohammed VI Commends Restoration of Historic Synagogue, Stresses Spiritual Diversity, Calls for Restoration of all Synagogues in Morocco” (Feb. 14, 2013)
- “King Mohammed VI Welcomes Bill Clinton to Morocco; Former US President Praises N.African Nation’s Tolerance, Democratization” (Feb. 25)

aePiot News

AlipesNews

Alpha Exclusive

AlphaTrade Finance

Anchorage Daily News

AssignmentEditor.com

Atlanta Business Chronicle

Austin American-Statesman (Austin, TX)

Austin Business Journal

Baltimore Business Journal

Belleville News-Democrat

Best Growth Stock Market Report

Beyond The Dow

Birmingham Business Journal

Biz Daily (Singapore)

Biz Wire Express

Bizjournals.com, Inc.

boomerVilleUS.com

Boston Business Journal

Boston Globe

Brian's Roar

Buffalo News (Buffalo, NY)

Business First of Buffalo

Business First of Columbus

Business First of Louisville

Business Journal of Greater Milwaukee

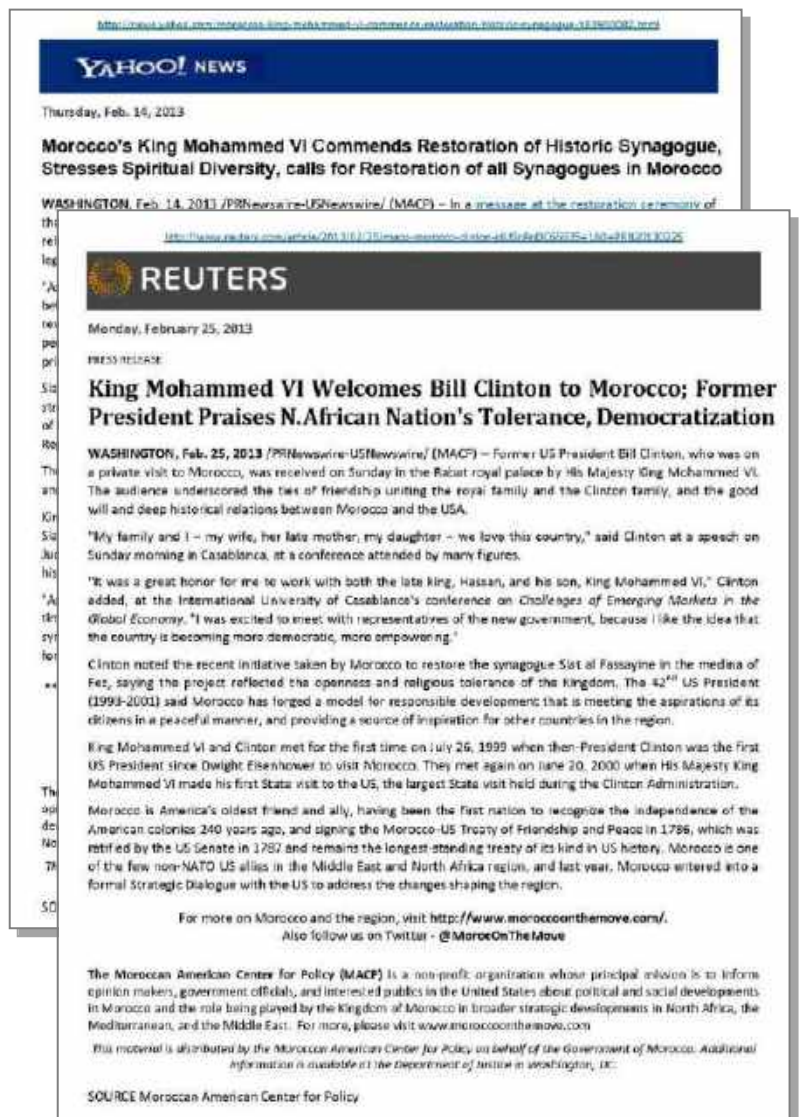

Business Journal of Phoenix

Business Journal of the Greater Triad Area

Business Review (Albany)

BusinessRockford

California Chronicle

Carlsbad Current-Argus (Carlsbad, NM)

Charlotte Business Journal

Chicago Business News

Cincinnati Business Courier

Cincinnati Enquirer

Codewit News

Columbus Dispatch	InvestTalk
Columbus Ledger-Enquirer (Columbus, GA)	Island Packet (Bluffton, SC)
Contra Costa Times	iStockAnalyst
Crossover.co.ke (Magnificent Ltd/Kenya)	Jacksonville Business Journal
Daily Breeze (Torrance, CA)	Kansas City Business Journal
Daily Herald	Kansas City Star
Dallas Business Journal	KGO-TV ABC-7 (San Francisco, CA)
Dayton Business Journal	KING-TV NBC-5 (Seattle, WA)
Dealbreaker	KVOR 740-AM (Colorado Springs, CO)
Denver Business Journal	Las Cruces Sun-News
Design 4 Law - Articles About Design And Law	Las Vegas Business Press
Digital Journal	Las Vegas Review-Journal
El Nuevo Herald	Latest News Today
El Paso Times	Lexington Herald-Leader (Lexington, KY)
eMoneyDaily	Living by the Seasons
eZanga	Long Beach Press-Telegram (Long Beach, CA)
Ezerin'Com Communication Agency	Los Angeles Business from bizjournals
Farmington Daily Times (Farmington, NM)	Los Angeles Daily News (Woodland Hills, CA)
Fayetteville Observer	Luso Financial Planning
Feed Head Lines	Market Intelligence Center
FinancialContent - PR Newswire	Market Pulse
FindLaw Legal News	MarketWatch
FinRoad	Maxim Group
Fort Worth Star-Telegram (Fort Worth, TX)	Memphis Business Journal
Global Newsweek	Miami Herald
Government News (Ulitzer)	Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal
Great American Financial Resources	Money Canada
GYL: Licensing and Certification Resource Directory	Money Show
Health Care Enrichment Program	MrBayStreet.com
Houston Business Journal	myMotherLode.com
Houston Chronicle	Nashville Business Journal
Human Rights Today	New Mexico Business Weekly
Idaho Statesman	New York Business Journal
Indianapolis Business Journal	News & Observer (Raleigh, NC)
Inland Valley Daily Bulletin (Ontario, CA)	News Info Guide
inPixels	News Tribune (Tacoma, WA)
Inside Bay Area	Newsday (Melville, NY)
International Business Times	NorthStar News
International Development News Today	NorthWest Cable News (Seattle, WA)
Investle	Oklahoman (Oklahoma City, OK)
InvestorPoint.com	Olympian (Olympia, WA)

OnCuba Magazine	Tampa Bay Business Journal
One News Page Global Edition	TC Palm
Orlando Business Journal	Telegraph-Macon (Macon, GA)
Pacific Business News	The Bellingham Herald
Pasadena Star-News (Pasadena, CA)	The Daily Herald
Pettinga Financial	The Herald
Philadelphia Business Journal	The HRIS World
Pittsburgh Business Times	The Online Investor
Portland Business Journal	The Sacramento Bee
PR Newswire	The State (Columbia, SC)
Press-Enterprise	The Sun News (Myrtle Beach, SC)
Puget Sound Business Journal	TheStreet.com
Record Publishing Company (Ravenna, OH)	Ticker Technologies
Redlands Daily Facts (Redlands, CA)	Times Union (Albany, NY)
ReleasePlus	Triangle Business Journal
Reuters	Tribune (San Luis Obispo, CA)
Ruidoso News (Ruidoso, NM)	Twitter (Ulitzer)
Sacramento Bee	US Politics Today
Sacramento Business Journal	Value Investing News
San Antonio Business Journal	Vanguardia
San Bernardino County Sun (San Bernardino, CA)	Vertical Continuity Your Social Marketing Space
San Francisco Business Times	VisionMonday
San Francisco Chronicle	Wall Street Journal
San Gabriel Valley Tribune	Wall Street Select
San Jose Business Journal	Washington Business Journal
San Jose Mercury News	Web 2.0 Journal
Santa Cruz Sentinel (Santa Cruz, CA)	Web Lens
SiliconValley.com (Silicon Valley, CA)	WFMZ
Socialmulti	Whittier Daily News (Whittier, CA)
South Florida Business Journal	Wichita Business Journal
Spoke	Wichita Eagle (Wichita, KS)
St. Louis Business Journal	Worcester Telegram & Gazette
Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)	Worth
State House News Service (Affiliated Services)	WR Hambrecht & Co.
Stocklink	WRAL-TV CBS-5 (Raleigh, NC)
StockNod	WSBNN Wall Street Business News Network
Street Insider	Yahoo! Politics
Sun Herald (Biloxi, MS)	Zecco

Two Weekly E-Letters

The MAC Communications team also sent the two press releases out directly as Weekly E-Letters to MAC’s contact list of more than 3,000 policy makers, opinion leaders, reporters, and other interested US audiences in the Washington, DC area.

Morocco on the Move

Morocco’s King Mohammed VI Commends Restoration of Historic Synagogue in Fez, Stresses Spiritual Diversity, Calls for Restoration of All Synagogues in Morocco

February 18, 2013

Restoration of Slat al Fassayine Synagogue in Fez bears “elegant testimony to the wealth and diversity of the Kingdom of Morocco and its heritage,” said

WASHINGTON, DC - In a message of the restoration ceremony of the Fassayine Synagogue in Fez, HM King Mohammed VI reiterated his religious freedom and spiritual diversity, and emphasized the important thousand-year-old Jewish legacy in Morocco.

“As Commander of the Faithful,” the King said, “I am committed to the community of believers, and to fulfilling my mission with respect of religions for all believers in the revealed religions, including Judaism, loyal citizens for whom I deeply care... The Moroccan people’s culture, steeped in history, are rooted in our citizens’ abiding commitment to coexistence, tolerance and harmony between the various components

Morocco on the Move

King Mohammed VI Welcomes Bill Clinton to Morocco; Former US President Praises North African Nation’s Tolerance, Democratization

February 25, 2013

HM King Mohammed VI received, on Sunday in the Rabat royal palace, former US President Bill Clinton who was visiting Morocco and praised the nation’s religious tolerance and progress on democratization.

WASHINGTON, DC - Former US president Bill Clinton, who was on a private visit to Morocco, was received on Sunday in the Rabat royal palace by HM King Mohammed VI. The audience underscored the tie of friendship uniting the royal family and the Clinton family, and the good will and deep historical relations between Morocco and the USA.

“My family and I – my wife, her late mother, my daughter – we love this country,” said Clinton at a speech on Sunday morning in Casablanca, at a conference attended by many figures.

Sampling of Jewish Press Coverage

The MAC Communications team contacted more than 100 US Jewish media outlets to generate additional coverage, which includes:

Here are the more prominent ones:

Jewish Week New York

<http://www.thejewishweek.com/features/lens/fez-synagogue-reopens>

Jewish Ledger (CT)

<http://www.jewishledger.com/2013/02/morocco-restores-ancient-synagogue/>

Israel International News (Arutz 7)

<http://www.israelnationalnews.com/News/Flash.aspx/262244>

Intermountain Jewish News (CO)

<http://www.ijn.com/ijn-news/international/3769-fez-moroccos-synagogue-is-restored>

GreenProphet.com

<http://www.greenprophet.com/2013/02/all-moroccan-synagogues-to-be-renovated-says-king-mohammed-vi/>

Times of Israel

<http://www.timesofisrael.com/moroccos-islamist-pm-inaugurates-fez-synagogue/>

Euro Jewish Congress

<http://www.eurojewcong.org/morocco/8916-morocco-pm-to-inaugurate-historic-fez-synagogue.html>

Your Jewish News

<http://www.yourjewishnews.com/2013/02/25768.html>

Jewish People Around the World

http://www.jpeopleworld.com/index.php?dir=site&page=country&subj_cs=3640

JSpace.com

<http://www.jspace.com/news/tags/architecture/6945>

<http://www.thejewishweek.com/fez/rest/anc/fez-synagogue-reopens>

Fez Synagogue Reopens

03/12/13 | Steve Lipman | Staff Writer

Photography by Gerry Images

Two years ago, as Morocco adopted a new constitution while the Arab Spring raged throughout the Arab world, Morocco's King Mohammed VI reached out to his country's small Jewish population. He called for the renovation of all Jewish houses of worship in Morocco, so they could serve as centers for cultural dialogue.

His seeds of interfaith outreach bore fruit earlier this month.

The 17th-century Siat Alfassiyyine synagogue in Fez, following a two-year refurbishing effort, reopened with a ceremony that drew some 200 people, including Morocco's prime minister, who read a message from the king, as well as other members of the government, Islamic leaders and representatives of Germany. The German government contributed to the project.

The synagogue, which was used as a carpet workshop and a gym in recent centuries, had deteriorated before its recent renovation. The restoration bears "eloquent testimony to the spiritual wealth and diversity of the Kingdom of Morocco and its heritage," King Mohammed said in a statement read at the ceremony. "The Moroccan people's cultural traditions, which are steeped in history, are rooted in our citizens' abiding commitment to the principles of coexistence, tolerance and harmony between the various components of the nation."

steve@jewishweek.org

Media Coverage Report

RE: Media Report on Restoration of Historic Synagogue in Fez

Pursuant to your request, this report provides a full breakout of US press coverage from the announcement of the restoration the Slat al Fassiyine synagogue in Fez, to which King Mohammed VI delivered remarks.

On Feb. 13 a high-level delegation of Moroccan religious and government leaders came to Fez to inaugurate restoration of the historic Slat al Fassiyine synagogue—and underscore Morocco's commitment to religious tolerance and honoring its 3,000 year old Jewish heritage. To highlight this important message in US outreach, MAC launched an intensive, multi-faceted communications effort that continues to generate results today.

On the eve of the event, MAC's media team was already posting and tweeting from MOTM to alert reporters. The day of the ceremony, the MAC team went to work posting and tweeting to shape initial coverage and highlight the King's remarks as the lead news of the day. The MAC team issued a Press Release to reporters and PR Newswire, "Morocco's King Mohammed VI Commends Restoration of Historic Synagogue, Stresses Spiritual Diversity, Calls for Restoration of all Synagogues in Morocco," to reach both print and online press. The Fez synagogue was also highlighted in a follow-up release, "King Mohammed VI Welcomes Bill Clinton to Morocco; Former US President Praises North African Nation's Tolerance, Democratization," which like the first was e-mailed to policy makers and opinion leaders and pitched to hundreds of reporters. Next, a longer-lead NAPS article, "Morocco: An Oasis of Tolerance & Diversity," was sent to extend Morocco's key messages to thousands of US newspapers. Highlights of the MAC communications campaign are below.

Media/Web Coverage Highlights

- NAPS ARTICLE – 2,100 US newspaper placements for "Morocco: An Oasis of Tolerance & Diversity," written by MACP, and published in all 50 US states (see list below). Combined print and online audience exceeded 17.5 million readers, and the article appeared in 79 of the top 100 US media markets.
- MOROCCO ON THE MOVE – Ten news and blog columns were posted to Morocco on the Move, and then republished by Middle East Online, allAfrica.com, Atlas Times, and elsewhere, resulting in almost 200 total placements and more than 2 million media impressions.
- PRESS RELEASES – Two releases were distributed on PR Newswire, which were picked up and posted by 545 media outlets on Feb. 14th and 25th, 2013 (listed alphabetically at end of report), including major media such as the Wall Street Journal, Houston Chronicle, Boston Globe, Miami Herald, Reuters, Yahoo News, and S.F. Chronicle.
- E-LETTERS – Both releases were distributed directly to MACP's key contacts including more than 3,000 policymakers, opinion leaders, and journalists.
- PITCHING REPORTERS – Pitch calls and e-mails also went to hundreds of Jewish and general US media, driving dozens of additional stories.
- RESULTS – Generated more than 3,000 total media, Web placements and 60 million media impressions.

http://www.clevelandjewishnews.com/links_features/NewsArticle_28f85011-602-2676-6221-6b55164f7817.html

CLEVELAND
Jewish News

Thursday, March 7, 2013

Morocco: An Oasis Of Tolerance & Diversity

rabbis pray as Jewish and Muslim leaders listen during the inauguration of the Slat al Fassiyine Synagogue in the northern Moroccan city of Fez. AFP PHOTO/FADEL SENNA (NAPS)

By NAPS, North American Press Syndicate (NAPS)—Some may be surprised at the thought of the king of a North African country calling for the restoration of the country's synagogues and acknowledging the country's rich history of cultural diversity.

Yet that was exactly the case recently when Morocco's King Mohammed VI highlighted Morocco's Jewish heritage and reaffirmed his country's commitment to religious freedom and diversity.

His comments came at the restoration ceremony of Slat al Fassiyine Synagogue in Fez. Built in the 17th century, it is the oldest synagogue in Fez, where much of the old city, or medina, has been designated a UNESCO World Heritage Site.

The synagogue had fallen into disrepair and had been closed since the 1960s. With funding from Morocco's Jewish community and the Federal Republic of Germany, Slat al Fassiyine has now been restored and a ceremony was held to celebrate the completion of the two-year renovation effort.

A Diverse Heritage

In his message, King Mohammed VI highlighted Morocco's diverse cultural heritage: "The Moroccan people's cultural traditions, which are steeped in history, are rooted in our citizens' abiding commitment to the principles of coexistence, tolerance and harmony between the various components of the nation.

"As is enshrined in the Kingdom's new Constitution, the Hebrew heritage is indeed one of the time-honored components of our national identity. For this reason, I wish to call for the restoration of all the synagogues in the other Moroccan cities so that they may serve not only as places of worship, but also as forums for cultural dialogue and for the promotion of our cultural values."

The king also said the two-year restoration of the 17th century synagogue bore "eloquent testimony to the spiritual wealth and diversity of the Kingdom of Morocco and its heritage."

A Message of Tolerance

Some 200 people attended the ceremony, including Moroccan Prime Minister Abdellah Benkirane, representatives of the German government, and leaders of the Moroccan Jewish community.

Serge Berdugo, president of the Judeo-Moroccan Patrimony Foundation, said that the restoration is a "message of peace and tolerance." "Slat al Fassiyine teaches us a beautiful lesson," he said. "It represented the past, bound to disappear. Its restoration process anticipated the future, and that future is now. Moroccan Judaism's time has come. This community is part of the Moroccan reality."

This information is provided by Declerian on behalf of the government of Morocco. Further information is available at the U.S. Department of Justice.

Placements of NAPS Article – 2,100 US Newspapers, print/online

NAPS Article: “Morocco: Oasis of Tolerance & Diversity” (Feb. 21, 2013)

The final report for the NAPS article, “Morocco: An Oasis of Tolerance & Diversity,” shows it generated 2,100 placements in newspapers in all 50 US states (including those listed below). Combined print/online audience was 17.5 million readers (double our 1st NAPS article). The article appeared in 44 of the top 50 US media markets, 79 of the top 100 markets, and 160 of the top 300 markets.

THE HOUR, NORWALK, CT
 NJ.COM, NEWARK, NJ
 HOMEREPORTEERNEWS, BROOKLYN, NY
 REGISTERSTAR, HUDSON, NY
 DAILYFREEMAN, KINGSTON, NY
 CATSKILLSHOPPERONLINE, LIBERTY, NY
 IONIANNEWS, NEW ROCHELLE, NY
 CHELSEANOW, NEW YORK, NY,
 QCHRON, REGO PARK, NY,
 BIGBEARGRIZZLY, BIG BEAR LAKE, CA,
 DESERTNEWS, CALIFORNIA CITY, CA,
 CHAMPIONNEWSPAPERS, CHINO, CA,
 COASTREPORTONLINE, COSTA MESA, CA,
 FONTANAHERALDNEWS, FONTANA, CA,
 HIGHLANDNEWS, HIGHLAND, CA,
 LADOWNTOWNNEWS, LOS ANGELES, CA,
 WAVENEWSAPERS, LOS ANGELES, CA,
 MALIBUTIMES, MALIBU, CA,
 TBRNEWS, MANHATTAN BEACH, CA,
 THEPOLYPOST, POMONA, CA,
 PVNEWS, ROLLING HILLS ESTATE, CA,
 NEWSMIRROR, YUCAIPA, CA,
 JOURNAL-TOPICS, DES PLAINES, IL,
 THEGILMANSTAR, GILMAN, IL,
 HERSCHERPILOT, HERSCHER, IL,
 BUGLENEWSPAPERS, PLAINFIELD, IL,
 HERALDARGUS, LA PORTE, IN,
 THENEWSDISPATCH, MICHIGAN CITY, IN,
 GILROYDISPATCH, GILROY, CA,
 MORGANHILLTIMES, GILROY, CA,
 SANBENITOCOUNTYTODAY, GILROY, CA,
 NEWS.GOOGLE.COM, MOUNTAIN VIEW, CA
 PACIFICSUN, SAN RAFAEL, CA,
 SONOMAWEST, SEBASTOPOL, CA,
 HOMETOWN-SHOPPER, UKIAH, CA,
 NEWARKPOSTONLINE, NEWARK, DE,
 DELCOTIMES, PRIMOS, PA,
 FOXBOROREPORTER, FOXBORO, MA,
 CAPEANNPLANET, GLOUCESTER, MA,

http://www.clevelandjewishnews.com/using_facebook/article_28fd5014e9225074-c771-9b5178d7387.html

CLEVELAND Jewish News

Thursday, March 7, 2013

Morocco: An Oasis Of Tolerance & Diversity

Rabbis pray as Jewish and Muslim leaders listen during the inauguration of the Slat al Fassiyyine Synagogue in the northern Moroccan city of Fez. AFP PHOTO/FADEL SENNA (NAPS)

By NAPS, North American Press Syndicate

(NAPS)—Some may be surprised at the thought of the king of a North African country calling for the restoration of the country's synagogues and acknowledging the country's rich history of cultural diversity.

Yet that was exactly the case recently when Morocco's King Mohammed VI highlighted Morocco's Jewish heritage and reaffirmed his country's commitment to religious freedom and diversity.

His comments came at the restoration ceremony of Slat al Fassiyyine Synagogue in Fez. Built in the 17th century, it is the oldest synagogue in Fez, where much of the old city, or medina, has been designated a UNESCO World Heritage Site.

The synagogue had fallen into disrepair and had been closed since the 1960s. With funding from Morocco's Jewish community and the Federal Republic of Germany, Slat al Fassiyyine has now been restored and a ceremony was held to celebrate the completion of the two-year renovation effort.

A Diverse Heritage

In his message, King Mohammed VI highlighted Morocco's diverse cultural heritage: "The Moroccan people's cultural traditions, which are steeped in history, are rooted in our citizens' abiding commitment to the principles of coexistence, tolerance and harmony between the various components of the nation.

"As is enshrined in the Kingdom's new Constitution, the Hebrew heritage is indeed one of the time-honored components of our national identity. For this reason, I wish to call for the restoration of all the synagogues in the other Moroccan cities so that they may serve not only as places of worship, but also as forums for cultural dialogue and for the promotion of our cultural values."

The king also said the two-year restoration of the 17th century synagogue bore "eloquent testimony to the spiritual wealth and diversity of the Kingdom of Morocco and its heritage."

A Message of Tolerance

Some 200 people attended the ceremony, including Moroccan Prime Minister Abdellah Benkirane, representatives of the German government, and leaders of the Moroccan Jewish community.

Serge Berdugo, president of the Judeo-Moroccan Patrimony Foundation, said that the restoration is a "message of peace and tolerance." "Slat al Fassiyyine teaches us a beautiful lesson," he said, "It represented the past, bound to disappear. Its restoration process anticipated the future, and that future is now. Moroccan Judaism's time has come. This community is part of the Moroccan reality."

This information is provided by Beckerman on behalf of the government of Morocco. Further information is available at the U.S. Department of Justice.

HOMENEWSHERE, READING, MA,
 SENTINELSOURCE, KEENE, NH,
 LEESBURG2DAY, LEESBURG, VA,
 INSIDENOVA, MANASSAS, VA,
 NORTHERNVASPORTS, SPRINGFIELD, VA,
 SUNGAZETTE, SPRINGFIELD, VA,
 CLARKSVILLENEWS, CLARKSVILLE, TX,
 AIMMEDIATEXAS, DALLAS, TX,
 DALLASWEEKLY, DALLAS, TX,
 KAUFMANHERALD, KAUFMAN, TX,
 DAILYTRIBUNE, MT PLEASANT, TX,
 TERRELLTRIBUNE, TERRELL, TX,
 ANTRIMREVIEW, BELLAIRE, MI,
 ALVINSUN, ALVIN, TX,
 THEANAHUACPROGRESS, ANAHUAC, TX,
 BAYCITYTRIBUNE, BAY CITY, TX,
 LEADER-NEWS, EL CAMPO, TX,
 GALVESTONDAILYNEWS, GALVESTON, TX,

YOURHOUSTONNEWS, HOUSTON, TX,
 KATYTIMES, KATY, TX,
 FBHERALD, ROSENBERG, TX,
 JOURNAL-SPECTATOR, WHARTON, TX,
 ELNUEVOHERALDO, MIAMI, FL,
 THEATLANTAVOICE, ATLANTA, GA,
 THENEWSOBSERVER, BLUE RIDGE, GA,
 THECRIER, DUNWOODY, GA,
 ELBERTON, ELBERTON, GA,
 THEHARTWELLSUN, HARTWELL, GA,
 FRANKLINCOUNTYCITIZEN, LAVONIA, GA,
 NORTHWESTGEORGIANEWS, ROME, GA,
 OCONEEENTERPRISE, WATKINSVILLE, GA,
 LEDGERNEWS, WOODSTOCK, GA,
 YELMONLINE, YELM, WA,
 CLEVELANDJEWISHNEWS, BEACHWD, OH,
 THEPOSTNEWSPAPERS, MEDINA, OH,
 CHANVILLAGER, CHASKA, MN,
 CHASKAHERALD, CHASKA, MN,
 EDENPRAIRIENEWS, EDEN PRAIRIE, MN,
 JORDANNEWS, JORDAN, MN,
 INDEPENDENTREVIEW, LITCHFIELD, MN,
 LPLEADER, LONG PRAIRIE, MN,
 SAVAGEPACER, PRIOR LAKE, MN,
 SAVVY.MNTN*, SHAKOPEE, MN,
 SHAKOPEENEWS, SHAKOPEE, MN,
 WALKERMN, WALKER, MN,
 PRESSPUBS, WHITE BEAR LAKE, MN,
 CORONADONEWSCA, CORONADO, CA,
 SCOOPSANDIEGO, SAN DIEGO, CA,
 ALESTLELIVE, EDWARDSVILLE, IL,
 THEINTELLIGENCER, EDWARDSVILLE, IL,
 THEJOURNAL-NEWS, HILLSBORO, IL,
 HERALDPUBS, MASCOUTAH, IL,
 OKAWVILLETIMES, OKAWVILLE, IL,
 BGDAILYNEWS, BOWLING GREEN, KY,
 BGNEWS, BOWLING GREEN, KY,
 MYIRONCOUNTYNEWS, IRONTON, MO,
 STLAMERICAN, ST. LOUIS, MO,
 STEGENHERALD, STE GENEVIEVE, MO,
 SULLIVANJOURNAL, SULLIVAN, MO,
 EMISSOURIAN, WASHINGTON, MO,
 TIMESONLINE, BEAVER, PA,
 HERALDSTANDARD, UNIONTOWN, PA,
 MOHAVEDAILYNEWS, BULLHEAD CITY, AZ,
 HAVASUNEWS, LAKE HAVASU CITY, AZ,
 PARKERPIONEER, PARKER, AZ,
 EACOURIER, SAFFORD, AZ,
 WMICENTRAL, SHOW LOW, AZ,

WICKENBURGSUN, WICKENBURG, AZ,
 LEBANONDAILYRECORD, LEBANON, MO,
 THEMONITOR, MCALLEN, TX,
 CAPITALGAZETTE, ANNAPOLIS, MD,
 MYEASTERNSHOREMD, EASTON, MD,
 STARDEM, EASTON, MD,
 CECILDAILY, ELKTON, MD,
 MYUPPERCHESAPEAKE, ELKTON, MD,
 THEFLUME, BAILEY, CO,
 RAWLINSTIMES, RAWLINS, WY,
 COASTWEEKEND, ASTORIA, OR,
 DAILYASTORIAN, ASTORIA, OR,
 SEASIDE-SUN, SEASIDE, OR,
 THEREFLECTOR, BATTLE GROUND, WA,
 CHINOOKOBSERVER, LONG BEACH, WA,
 NEWSRECORD.ORGTN*, CINCINNATI, OH,
 HERALD-ONLINE, LOUISBURG, KS,
 REPUBLIC-ONLINE, PAOLA, KS,
 MYCALDWELLCOUNTY, HAMILTON, MO,
 KEARNEYCOURIER, KEARNEY, MO,
 LIBERTYTRIBUNE, LIBERTY, MO,
 SEDALIADEMOCRAT, SEDALIA, MO,
 SMITHVILLEHERALD, SMITHVILLE, MO,
 GRAPHIC-ONLINE, ST JOSEPH, MO,
 KCNURSINGNEWS, ST JOSEPH, MO,
 NEWSPRESSNOW, ST JOSEPH, MO,
 PLATTECHRONICLE, WESTON, MO,
 FORESTHILLSMESSENGER, FORESTHILL, CA,
 EGCITIZEN, GALT, CA,
 GALTHERALDONLINE, GALT, CA,
 LEDGER-DISPATCH, JACKSON, CA,
 PNNA, SACRAMENTO, CA,
 WDTIMES, WATERTOWN, WI,
 NEWSEXAMINER, CONNERSVILLE, IN,
 CHRONICLE-TRIBUNE, MARION, IN,
 CIRCULATOR, PORTLAND, IN,
 SHELBYNEWS, SHELBYVILLE, IN,
 LAREDOSBARGAINBOOK, LAREDO, TX,
 LMTONLINE, LAREDO, TX,
 CIRCLEVILLETODAY, CIRCLEVILLE, OH,
 THEOTHERPAPER, COLUMBUS, OH,
 LOGANDAILY, LOGAN, OH,
 GOBOGALUSA, BOGALUSA, LA,
 HAMMONDSTAR, HAMMOND, LA,
 LOBSERVATEUR, LA PLACE, LA,
 THEHULLBALOO, NEW ORLEANS, LA,
 THESTTAMMANYNEWS, SLIDELL, LA,
 POST-VOICE, BURGAW, NC,
 CACHEVALLEYDAILY, LOGAN, UT,

MOABSUNNEWS, MOAB, UT,
 RICHFIELDREAPER, RICHFIELD, UT,
 GREENRIVERSTAR, GREEN RIVER, WY,
 BRANFORDSEVEN, BRANFORD, CT,
 JOURNALINQUIRER, MANCHESTER, CT,
 MIDDLETOWNPRESS, MIDDLETOWN, CT,
 TOWNTIMESNEWS, SOUTHURY, CT,
 VOICESNEWS, SOUTHURY, CT,
 SUNCHRONICLE, NORTH ATTLEBORO, MA,
 NEWPORTRI, NEWPORT, RI,
 INDEPENDENTRI, WAKEFIELD, RI,
 NCATREGISTER, GREENSBORO, NC,
 UNCGCAROLINIAN, GREENSBORO, NC,
 ACONESNEWS, HILLSBOROUGH, NC,
 JAMESTOWNNEWS, JAMESTOWN, NC,
 MONTGOMERYHERALD, TROY, NC,
 JOURNALNOW, WINSTON-SALEM, NC,
 FLTIMES, GENEVA, NY,
 LAUGHLINERTAINER, LAUGHLIN, NV,
 PORTLANDLEADER, PORTLAND, TN,
 MYSPARTANEWS, SPARTA, TN,
 PRESSREGISTER, CLARKSDALE, MS,
 DESOTOTIMES, HERNANDO, MS,
 PURCELLREGISTER, PURCELL, OK,
 NASSAUCOUNTYRECORD, CALLAHAN, FL,
 NASSAURECORD, CALLAHAN, FL,
 FBNEWSLEADER, FERNANDINA BEACH, FL,
 LAKECITYREPORTER, LAKE CITY, FL,
 THEALMATIMES, ALMA, GA,
 THEBLACKSHEARTIMES, BLACKSHEAR, GA,
 DOUGLASENTERPRISE, DOUGLAS, GA,
 THEPRESS-SENTINEL, JESUP, GA,
 RRDAILYHERALD, ROANOKE RAPIDS, NC,
 FREDERICKSBURGSTANDARD,
 FREDERICKSBURG, TX,
 GONZALESINQUIRER, GONZALES, TX,
 THEROTUNDAONLINE, FARMVILLE, VA,
 SOUTHSIDEMESSENGER, KEYSVILLE, VA,
 PRINCE GEORGE JOURNAL, P.GEORGE, VA,
 RICHMOND, RICHMOND, VA,
 TIMESDISPATCH, RICHMOND, VA,
 VANCNEWS, SOUTH HILL, VA,
 THE MONITOR, SUTHERLAND, VA,
 CROSSROADSCHRONICLE, CASHIERS, NC,
 THEFRANKLINPRESS, FRANKLIN, NC,
 CLAYCOUNTYPROGRESS, HAYESVILLE, NC,
 CHEROKEESCOUT, MURPHY, NC,
 MITCHELLNEWS, SPRUCE PINE, NC,
 CLINTONCHRONICLE, CLINTON, SC,

REEDLEYEXPONENT, REEDLEY, CA,
 THEDINUBASENTINEL, REEDLEY, CA,
 THESANGERHERALD, SANGER, CA,
 WPCVA, CHATHAM, VA,
 NEWSADVANCE, LYNCHBURG, VA,
 SMITHMOUNTAINEAGLE, WITZ, VA,
 PALLTIMES, OSWEGO, NY,
 SKANEATELESJOURNAL, SKANEATELES, NY,
 SOUTHCOUNTYLEADER, BIXBY, OK,
 BALEDGER, BROKEN ARROW, OK,
 CATOOSATIMES, CATOOSA, OK,
 CLEVELANDAMERICAN, CLEVELAND, OK,
 THECOLLINSVILLENEWS, COLLINSVILLE, OK,
 COWETAAMERICAN, COWETA, OK,
 GRANDLAKENEWS, GROVE, OK,
 MANNFORDEAGLE, MANNFORD, OK,
 MIAMIOK, MIAMI, OK,
 OWASSOREPORTER, OWASSO, OK,
 SANDSPRINGSLEADER, SAND SPRINGS, OK,
 SAPULPAHERALDONLINE, SAPULPA, OK,
 SKIATOOKJOURNAL, SKIATOOK, OK,
 OCOLLY, STILLWATER, OK,
 TULSABUSINESS, TULSA, OK,
 WAGONERTRIBUNE, WAGONER, OK,
 BENSONNEWS-SUN, BENSON, AZ,
 GVNEWS, GREEN VALLEY, AZ,
 EXPLORERNEWS, TUCSON, AZ,
 INSIDETUCSONBUSINESS, TUCSON, AZ,
 WILLCOXRANGENEWS, WILLCOX, AZ,
 ELPASOINC, EL PASO, TX,
 HARLANONLINE, HARLAN, IA,
 ENTERPRISEPUB, BLAIR, NE,
 DOANELINE, CRETE, NE,
 DAILYNEBRASKAN, LINCOLN, NE,
 OMAHANEWSTAND, OMAHA, NE,
 CASS-NEWS, PLATTSMOUTH, NE,
 SEWARDINDEPENDENT, SEWARD, NE,
 SANGRECHRONICLE, ANGEL FIRE, NM,
 RIOGRANDESUN, ESPANOLA, NM,
 CIBOLABEACON, GRANTS, NM,
 TAOSNEWS, TAOS, NM,
 MICHIGANSTHUMB, BAD AXE, MI,
 TCTIMES, FENTON, MI,
 STANDARDBANNER, JEFFERSON CITY, TN,
 JOURNALTRIBUNE, BIDDEFORD, ME,
 DENNEWS, CHARLESTON, IL,
 PARISBEACON, PARIS, IL,
 ANNANEWS, ANNA, IL,
 COURIERINDEPENDENT, CARTERVILLE, IL,
 PARISPI, PARIS, TN,
 BRYANTIMES, BRYAN, OH,
 GETTYSBURGTIMES, GETTYSBURG, PA,
 MORNINGJOURNAL, LISBON, OH,
 ELLWOODCITYLEDGER, ELLWOOD CITY, PA,
 DEWITT-EE, DEWITT, AR,
 ASHLEYCOUNTYLEDGER, HAMBURG, AR,
 THEBRAY, MAGNOLIA, AR,
 THEMCGEHEETIMES, MCGEHEE, AR,
 MYMONTICELLONEWS, MONTICELLO, AR,
 THEDAILYCITIZEN, SEARCY, AR,
 CHARLESTONMERCURY, CHARLESTON, SC,
 COLLETON TODAY, WALTERBORO, SC,
 LODINEWS, LODI, CA,
 CALAVERAESTERPRISE, SAN ANDREAS, CA,
 GULFCOASTNEWSTODAY, FAIRHOPE, AL,
 CCENTERDISPATCH, CLAY CENTER, KS,
 CCHEADLINER, CLAY CENTER, KS,
 CHAMBERLAIN SUN, CHAMBERLAIN, SD,
 FREEMANS D, FREEMAN, SD,
 LEADERCOURIER-TIMES, N. SIOUX CITY, SD,
 ONIDAWATCHMAN, ONIDA, SD,
 CAPJOURNAL, PIERRE, SD,
 VOLANTEONLINE, VERMILLION, SD,
 APP-PRINTING, ALBION, IN,
 FWBUSINESS, KENDALLVILLE, IN,
 FWDAILYNEWS, KENDALLVILLE, IN,
 KPCNEWS, KENDALLVILLE, IN,
 INDIANAGAZETTE, INDIANA, PA,
 CLASSICIMAGES, MUSCATINE, IA,
 WESTERNCOURIER, MACOMB, IL,
 SWIOWANEWSOURCE, ATLANTIC, IA,
 CHARITONLEADER, CHARITON, IA,
 ALGONA, DES MOINES, IA,
 THESIMPSONIAN, INDIANOLA, IA,
 CHAFFEECOUNTYTIMES, BUENA VISTA, CO,
 CHIEFTAIN, PUEBLO, CO,
 THEMOUNTAINMAIL, SALIDA, CO,
 TRICITIES, BRISTOL, VA,
 PAWPAWCOURIERLEADER, PAW PAW, MI,
 THREERIVERSNEWS, THREE RIVERS, MI,
 EMPORIA GAZETTE, EMPORIA, KS,
 WASHBURNREVIEW.ORG TN*, TOPEKA, KS,
 VERONEWS, VERO BEACH, FL,
 PALATKADAILYNEWS, PALATKA, FL,
 NEWS-GRAPHIC, GEORGETOWN, KY,
 VICKSBURGPOST, VICKSBURG, MS,
 STOWETODAY, STOWE, VT,
 NCCOAST, MOREHEAD CITY, NC,
 IOSCONEWS, EAST TAWAS, MI,
 GLADWINMI, GLADWIN, MI,
 THEROYALREGISTER, COEUR D'ALENE, ID,
 DNEWS, MOSCOW, ID,
 GAZETTERECORD, SAINT MARIES, ID,
 BOONEVILLEDEMOCRAT, BOONEVILLE, AR,
 CHARLESTONEXPRESS, CHARLESTON, AR,
 MCRECORDONLINE, HUNTSVILLE, AR,
 PARIS-EXPRESS, PARIS, AR,
 PRESSARGUS, VAN BUREN, AR,
 SEQUOYAHCOUNTYTIMES, SALLISAW, OK,
 BELOITDAILYNEWS, BELOIT, WI,
 HNGNEWS, SUN PRAIRIE, WI,
 LITTLERIVERNEWS, ASHDOWN, AR,
 HENDERSONDAILYNEWS, HENDERSON, TX,
 JIMPLECUTE, JEFFERSON, TX,
 ALICETX, ALICE, TX,
 RECORDSTAR, ALICE, TX,
 DELRIONEWSHERALD, DEL RIO, TX,
 CREIGHTONNEWS, CREIGHTON, NE,
 HARTINGTONSHOPPER, HARTINGTON, NE,
 NELIGHNEWS, NELIGH, NE,
 NORFOLKDAILYNEWS, NORFOLK, NE,
 MYWAYNENEWS, WAYNE, NE,
 IBERIANET, NEW IBERIA, LA,
 JOURNAL-EUREKA, ANAMOSA, IA,
 CPIONEER, CASCADE, IA,
 CRESCOTIMES, CRESCO, IA,
 THONLINE, DUBUQUE, IA,
 DYERSVILLECOMMERCIAL, DYERSVILLE, IA,
 KALONANEWS, KALONA, IA,
 NHTRIB, NEW HAMPTON, IA,
 VINTONDAILY, VINTON, IA,
 WAHPETONDAILYNEWS, WAHPETON, ND,
 ARGUSOBSERVER, ONTARIO, OR,
 PATRIOTTALON, TYLER, TX,
 GRANDRAPIDSMN, GRAND RAPIDS, MN,
 HIBBINGMN, HIBBING, MN,
 VIRGINIAMN, VIRGINIA, MN,
 ASHLANDWI, ASHLAND, WI,
 NEWS-SHIELD, BARRON, WI,
 HAYWARDWI, HAYWARD, WI,
 LADYSMITHNEWS, LADYSMITH, WI,
 SPOONERADVOCATE, SPOONER, WI,
 WALLOWA, ENTERPRISE, OR,
 EASTOREGONIAN, HERMISTON, OR,
 HERMISTONHERALD, HERMISTON, OR,
 BLUEMOUNTAINEAGLE, JOHN DAY, OR,
 BLOOMERADVANCE, BLOOMER, WI,

CHIPPEWAVALLEYMOMS, EAU CLAIRE, WI, FLORALA, FLORENCE, AL, DDTONLINE, GREENVILLE, MS,
 FULTONDEMOCRAT, CANTON, IL, MOULTONADVERTISER, MOULTON, AL, THERACQUETTE, POTSDAM, NY,
 LEECOUNTYCOURIER, TUPELO, MS, HICKORYRECORD, HICKORY, NC, TRI-PARISHTIMES, HOUMA, LA,
 THEINDEPENDENT, GRAND ISLAND, NE, JOURNALPATRIOT, N. WILKESBORO, NC, PARAGOULDDAILYPRESS, PARAGOULD, AR,
 LEXCH, LEXINGTON, NE, BROWNSVILLEHERALD, BROWNSVILLE, TX, RECORDGAZETTE, BANNING, CA,
 BRENHAMBANNER, BRENHAM, TX, VALLEYBARGAINBOOK, BROWNSVILLE, TX, IMPERIALVALLEYNEWS.COM, HOLTVILLE, CA
 THEEAGLE, BRYAN, TX, VALLEYMORNINGSTAR, HARLINGEN, TX, SANDIEGONEWSCAPE.COM, HOLTVILLE, CA
 WACOTRIB, WACO, TX, HARRISONDAILYTIMES, HARRISON, AR, YUMANNEWSNOW.COM, HOLTVILLE, CA, CENTRALWINEWS, ABBOTSFORD, WI, NEWTONCOUNTYTIMES, JASPER, AR, DESERTENTERTAINER, PALM DESERT, CA,
 PRICECOUNTYDAILY, PHILLIPS, WI, BOLIVARMONEWS, BOLIVAR, MO, HIDESERTSTAR, YUCCA VALLEY, CA,
 ARCHERCOUNTYNEWS, ARCHER CNTY, TX, BUFFALOREFLEX, BUFFALO, MO, LIBERTYCOUNTYTIMES, CHESTER, MT,
 THESUNFLOWER, WICHITA, TX, THELICKINGNEWS, LICKING, MO, CHOTEAUACANTHA, CHOTEAU, MT,
 MBVISIT, CONWAY, SC, MARSHFIELDMAIL, MARSHFIELD, MO, CUTBANKPIONEERPRESS, CUTBANK, MT,
 TRINITYJOURNAL, WEAVERVILLE, CA, MARYSVILLEONLINE, MARSHFIELD, MO, FAIRFIELDSUNTIMES, FAIRFIELD, MT,
 CASCADECATTLEMAN, YREKA, CA, NEWS-JOURNAL, MOUNTAIN GROVE, MO, LEWISTOWNNEWS, LEWISTON, MT,
 CASCADEHORSEMAN, YREKA, CA, REPUBLICMONEWS, REPUBLIC, MO, MONTROSEPRESS, MONTROSE, CO,
 SIDNEYHERALD, SIDNEY, MT, SOUTHCOUNTYMAIL, ROGERSVILLE, MO, TELLURIDENEWS, TELLURIDE, CO,
 WILLISTONHERALD, WILLISTON, ND, WEBSTERCOUNTYCITIZEN, SEYMOUR, MO, BROWNWOODTX, BROWNWOOD, TX,
 THEPENDERPOST, BURGAW, NC, CEDARREPUBLICAN, STOCKTON, MO, SAVANNAHREPORTER, SAVANNAH, MO,
 TOPSAILVOICE, BURGAW, NC, NAVIGATORJOURNAL, ALBION, IL, THECLAYTIMESJOURNAL, LINEVILLE, AL,
 STATEPORTPILOT, SOUTHPORT, NC, SITRADERS, WEST FRANKFORT, IL, THERANDOPHLEADER, ROANOKE, AL,
 WHITEVILLE, WHITEVILLE, NC, THESHOALSNEWS, SHOALS, IN, STARHERALD, SCOTTSBLUFF, NE,
 THECHARTONLINE, JOPLIN, MO, SUNCOMMERCIAL, VINCENNES, IN, WYOSPORTS, CHEYENNE, WY,
 BELMONDNEWS, BELMOND, IA, MCCLEANNEWS, CALHOUN, KY, THEEAGLEPOST, HOPKINSVILLE, KY,
 THEWILLISTONTRADER, LAKESIDE, MT, THE-MESSENGER, MADISONVILLE, KY, KENTUCKYNEWERA, HOKINSVILLE, MO,
 DAILYTOREADOR, LUBBOCK, TX, MESSENGER-INQUIRER, OWENSBORO, KY, JOURNALREVIEW, CRAWFORDSVILLE, IN,
 THEDAILYCOURIER, GRANTS PASS, OR, TIMESLEADER, PRINCETON, KY, NEWSBUG, RENNSALAER, IN,
 BOCOJO, ASHLAND, MO, THECORRYJOURNAL, CORRY, PA, DOUGLAS-BUDGET, DOUGLAS, WY,
 COCOMOVOICE, BOONVILLE, MO, TITUSVILLEHERALD, TITUSVILLE, PA, DAILYPROGRESS, CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA,
 LAKEEXPO, LAURIE, MO, AUBURNVILLAGER, AUNURN, AL, MCHNEWS, MCCONNELSVILLE, OH,
 DAILYDEM, FORT MADISON, IA, ATHENSOHIOTODAY, ATHENS, OH, PERRYDAILY, NEW LEXINGTON, OH,
 DAILYGATE, KEOBUK, IA, JACKSONCOUNTYDAILY, JACKSON, OH, MINICASSIA, BURLEY, ID,
 JOURNALPILOT, CARTHAGE, IL, PIKECOUNTYDAILY, WAVERLY, OH, ALBIANEWS, ALBIA, IA,
 PALMYRA-SPECTATOR, PALMYA, MO, ANCHORAGEPRESS, ANCHORAGE, AK, PORTLAVACAWAVE, PORT LAVACA, TX,
 EXPONENT-TELEGRAM, CLARKSBURG, WV, FRONTIERSMAN, WASILLA, AK, NPTELEGRAPH, NORTH PLATTE, NE,
 MOUNTAIN STATESMAN, GRAFTON, WV, PERRYVILLENEWS, PERRYVILLE, MO, DELTAWINDONLINE, DELTA JUNCTION, AK, DOTHANEAGLE, DOTHAN, AL, BHPIONEER, SPEARFISH, SD, NEWSMINER, FAIRBANKS, AK, SOUTHEASTSUN, ENTERPRISE, AL, TIMBERLAKES.DAKOTA, TIMBER LAKE, SD, STARNEWS, WAINWRIGHT, AB, GREATWHITEENTERPRISES, OMRO, WI, LAURELOUTLOOK, LAUREL, MT, THESHELBYNEWS, SHELBYVILLE, IN,

MOROCCO ON THE MOVE – 10 Postings of News and Blog Columns, Republished for almost 200 Total Placements

New Life for “Slat Al Fassiine” synagogue in Fez

February 12, 2013 by Morocco On The Move

The project of the Slat Fassiine synagogue in Fez is complete. This historic monument in the medina of Fez dating back to the XVIth century has been fully restored. Its inauguration will take place Wednesday, February 13 under the patronage of His Majesty King Mohammed VI and is organized by The Judeo-Moroccan Heritage Foundation (FPCJM) [...]

Morocco’s King Mohammed VI commends ‘spiritual diversity’ at synagogue renewal in Fez

February 13, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

Agence France Press/AFP, by Fadel Senna (Fez, Morocco, Feb. 13, 2013) — King Mohammed VI hailed the “spiritual wealth and diversity” of Morocco at a ceremony on Wednesday to mark the end of the restoration of a 17th century synagogue in the city of Fez. The ceremony was held in the medina, the Old [...]

King Hails Restoration of Synagogue,Urges Restoration for all Morocco Synagogues

February 14, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

* Click here for King Mohammed VI’s full remarks*

MACP (Washington, DC, Feb. 14, 2013) – In a message at the restoration ceremony of the 17th century Slat al Fassiine Synagogue in Fez, HM King Mohammed VI reiterated his commitment to religious freedom and spiritual diversity, and emphasized the importance of the three-thousand-year-old Jewish legacy [...]

Morocco Inaugurates Restored Synagogue In Push For Tolerance – Le Soir

February 18, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

LE SOIR/Worldcrunch, by Hassan Alaoui (Fez, Morocco, Feb. 18, 2013) – It had served over the years as a prison, a carpet factory and a boxing gym. But last week, the building in this ancient Moroccan city’s central medina was officially returned to its original incarnation: the Slat-al-Fassiine synagogue was inaugurated by King Mohammed [...]

King Mohammed VI Calls for Restoration of all Moroccan Synagogues – The Jewish Voice

February 20, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

The Jewish Voice, by JV staff (February 20, 2013) — In a message at the restoration ceremony of the 17th century Slat al Fassiine Synagogue in Fez, HM King Mohammed VI reiterated his commitment to religious freedom and spiritual diversity, and emphasized the importance of the three-thousand-year-old Jewish legacy in Morocco. “As [...]

Morocco: An emerging model for Muslim-Jewish relations – Common Ground

February 20, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

Common Ground, by Adina Friedman (Washington, DC, Feb. 19, 2013) – At a ceremony last Wednesday marking the end of the restoration of a 17th Century synagogue in Fez’s Old City, in a message read by Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane, King Mohammed hailed Morocco’s “spiritual wealth and diversity” and its “values of coexistence, tolerance and [...]”

Bill Clinton hails Morocco’s tolerance, democratization – Middle East Online

February 25, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

Middle East Online (Washington, DC, Feb. 25, 2013) — Former US president Bill Clinton, who was on a private visit to Morocco, was received on Sunday in the Rabat royal palace by HM King Mohammed VI. The audience underscored the ties of friendship uniting the royal family and the Clinton family, and the good will [...]

King Mohammed welcomes Bill Clinton, who lauds Morocco’s tolerance, democratization

February 25, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

Click here for video highlights of former US President Bill Clinton’s visit to Morocco

MACP, YouTube, MAP (Washington, DC, Feb. 25, 2013) – Former US president Bill Clinton, who was on a private visit to Morocco, was received on Sunday in the Rabat royal palace by HM King Mohammed VI. The audience underscored the friendship [...]

Press Release: Morocco’s King Mohammed VI Commends...

February 14, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

CONTACT: Garth Neuffer, 202.470.2055 gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com
FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: Thursday, February 14, 2013

Morocco’s King Mohammed VI Commends Restoration of Historic Synagogue, Stresses Spiritual Diversity, Calls for Restoration of all Synagogues in Morocco

Washington, DC (Feb. 14, 2013) – In a message at the restoration ceremony of the 17th century Slat al Fassayne Synagogue in Fez, [...]

Press Release: King Mohammed VI Welcomes Bill Clinton...

February 25, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

CONTACT: Garth Neuffer, 202.470.2055 gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com
FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: Monday, February 25, 2013

King Mohammed VI Welcomes Bill Clinton to Morocco; Former US President Praises North African Nation’s Tolerance, Democratization

Washington, DC (Monday, Feb. 25, 2013) — Former US president Bill Clinton, who was on a private visit to Morocco, was received on Sunday in [...]

2 MACP Releases on PR Newswire and Pitched to Reporters – Posts at 545 Major Media Outlets, 800+ Total Placements

MACP Press Releases:

- “Morocco’s King Mohammed VI Commends Restoration of Historic Synagogue, Stresses Spiritual Diversity, Calls for Restoration of all Synagogues in Morocco” (Feb. 14, 2013)
- “King Mohammed VI Welcomes Bill Clinton to Morocco; Former US President Praises N.African Nation’s Tolerance, Democratization” (Feb. 25)

- aePiot News
- AlipesNews
- Alpha Exclusive
- AlphaTrade Finance
- Anchorage Daily News
- AssignmentEditor.com
- Atlanta Business Chronicle
- Austin American-Statesman (Austin, TX)
- Austin Business Journal
- Baltimore Business Journal
- Belleville News-Democrat
- Best Growth Stock Market Report
- Beyond The Dow
- Birmingham Business Journal
- Biz Daily (Singapore)
- Biz Wire Express
- Bizjournals.com, Inc.
- boomerVilleUS.com
- Boston Business Journal
- Boston Globe
- Brian's Roar
- Buffalo News (Buffalo, NY)
- Business First of Buffalo
- Business First of Columbus
- Business First of Louisville
- Business Journal of Greater Milwaukee
- Business Journal of Phoenix
- Business Journal of the Greater Triad Area
- Business Review (Albany)
- BusinessRockford
- California Chronicle

<http://news.yahoo.com/morocco-king-mohammed-vi-commends-restoration-historic-synagogue-11282009.html>

YAHOO! NEWS

Thursday, Feb. 14, 2013

Morocco's King Mohammed VI Commends Restoration of Historic Synagogue, Stresses Spiritual Diversity, calls for Restoration of all Synagogues in Morocco

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14, 2013 /PRNewswire-USNewswire/ (MACP) – In a message at the restoration ceremony of the

<http://www.reuters.com/article/2013/02/25/morocco-king-mohammed-vi-welcomes-bill-clinton-idK69400275-1648810010026>

REUTERS

Monday, February 25, 2013

PRESS RELEASE

King Mohammed VI Welcomes Bill Clinton to Morocco; Former President Praises N.African Nation's Tolerance, Democratization

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25, 2013 /PRNewswire-USNewswire/ (MACP) – Former US President Bill Clinton, who was on a private visit to Morocco, was received on Sunday in the Rabat royal palace by His Majesty King Mohammed VI. The audience underscored the ties of friendship uniting the royal family and the Clinton family, and the good will and deep historical relations between Morocco and the USA.

"My family and I – my wife, her late mother, my daughter – we love this country," said Clinton at a speech on Sunday morning in Casablanca, at a conference attended by many figures.

"It was a great honor for me to work with both the late king, Hassan, and his son, King Mohammed VI," Clinton added, at the International University of Casablanca's conference on Challenges of Emerging Markets in the Global Economy. "I was excited to meet with representatives of the new government, because I like the idea that the country is becoming more democratic, more empowering."

Clinton noted the recent initiative taken by Morocco to restore the synagogue Sate al Fassayine in the medina of Fez, saying the project reflected the openness and religious tolerance of the kingdom. The 42nd US President (1993-2001) said Morocco has forged a model for responsible development that is meeting the aspirations of its citizens in a peaceful manner, and providing a source of inspiration for other countries in the region.

King Mohammed VI and Clinton met for the first time on July 26, 1999 when then-President Clinton was the first US President since Dwight Eisenhower to visit Morocco. They met again on June 20, 2000 when His Majesty King Mohammed VI made his first State visit to the US, the largest State visit held during the Clinton Administration.

Morocco is America's oldest friend and ally, having been the first nation to recognize the independence of the American colonies 240 years ago, and signing the Morocco-US Treaty of Friendship and Peace in 1786, which was ratified by the US Senate in 1787 and remains the longest-standing treaty of its kind in US history. Morocco is one of the few non-NATO US allies in the Middle East and North Africa region, and last year, Morocco entered into a formal Strategic Dialogue with the US to address the changes shaping the region.

For more on Morocco and the region, visit <http://www.moroccoonthemove.com/>. Also follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

The Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP) is a non-profit organization whose principal mission is to inform opinion makers, government officials, and interested publics in the United States about political and social developments in Morocco and the role being played by the Kingdom of Morocco in broader strategic developments in North Africa, the Mediterranean, and the Middle East. For more, please visit www.moroccoonthemove.com

This material is distributed by the Moroccan American Center for Policy on behalf of the Government of Morocco. Additional information is available at the Department of Justice in Washington, DC.

SOURCE Moroccan American Center for Policy

- Carlsbad Current-Argus (Carlsbad, NM)
- Charlotte Business Journal
- Chicago Business News
- Cincinnati Business Courier
- Cincinnati Enquirer
- Codewit News

Columbus Dispatch	InvestTalk
Columbus Ledger-Enquirer (Columbus, GA)	Island Packet (Bluffton, SC)
Contra Costa Times	iStockAnalyst
Crossover.co.ke (Magnificent Ltd/Kenya)	Jacksonville Business Journal
Daily Breeze (Torrance, CA)	Kansas City Business Journal
Daily Herald	Kansas City Star
Dallas Business Journal	KGO-TV ABC-7 (San Francisco, CA)
Dayton Business Journal	KING-TV NBC-5 (Seattle, WA)
Dealbreaker	KVOR 740-AM (Colorado Springs, CO)
Denver Business Journal	Las Cruces Sun-News
Design 4 Law - Articles About Design And Law	Las Vegas Business Press
Digital Journal	Las Vegas Review-Journal
El Nuevo Herald	Latest News Today
El Paso Times	Lexington Herald-Leader (Lexington, KY)
eMoneyDaily	Living by the Seasons
eZanga	Long Beach Press-Telegram (Long Beach, CA)
Ezerin'Com Communication Agency	Los Angeles Business from bizjournals
Farmington Daily Times (Farmington, NM)	Los Angeles Daily News (Woodland Hills, CA)
Fayetteville Observer	Luso Financial Planning
Feed Head Lines	Market Intelligence Center
FinancialContent - PR Newswire	Market Pulse
FindLaw Legal News	MarketWatch
FinRoad	Maxim Group
Fort Worth Star-Telegram (Fort Worth, TX)	Memphis Business Journal
Global Newsweek	Miami Herald
Government News (Ulitzer)	Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal
Great American Financial Resources	Money Canada
GYL: Licensing and Certification Resource Directory	Money Show
Health Care Enrichment Program	MrBayStreet.com
Houston Business Journal	myMotherLode.com
Houston Chronicle	Nashville Business Journal
Human Rights Today	New Mexico Business Weekly
Idaho Statesman	New York Business Journal
Indianapolis Business Journal	News & Observer (Raleigh, NC)
Inland Valley Daily Bulletin (Ontario, CA)	News Info Guide
inPixels	News Tribune (Tacoma, WA)
Inside Bay Area	Newsday (Melville, NY)
International Business Times	NorthStar News
International Development News Today	NorthWest Cable News (Seattle, WA)
Investle	Oklahoman (Oklahoma City, OK)
InvestorPoint.com	Olympian (Olympia, WA)

OnCuba Magazine	Tampa Bay Business Journal
One News Page Global Edition	TC Palm
Orlando Business Journal	Telegraph-Macon (Macon, GA)
Pacific Business News	The Bellingham Herald
Pasadena Star-News (Pasadena, CA)	The Daily Herald
Pettinga Financial	The Herald
Philadelphia Business Journal	The HRIS World
Pittsburgh Business Times	The Online Investor
Portland Business Journal	The Sacramento Bee
PR Newswire	The State (Columbia, SC)
Press-Enterprise	The Sun News (Myrtle Beach, SC)
Puget Sound Business Journal	TheStreet.com
Record Publishing Company (Ravenna, OH)	Ticker Technologies
Redlands Daily Facts (Redlands, CA)	Times Union (Albany, NY)
ReleasePlus	Triangle Business Journal
Reuters	Tribune (San Luis Obispo, CA)
Ruidoso News (Ruidoso, NM)	Twitter (Ulitzer)
Sacramento Bee	US Politics Today
Sacramento Business Journal	Value Investing News
San Antonio Business Journal	Vanguardia
San Bernardino County Sun (San Bernardino, CA)	Vertical Continuity Your Social Marketing Space
San Francisco Business Times	VisionMonday
San Francisco Chronicle	Wall Street Journal
San Gabriel Valley Tribune	Wall Street Select
San Jose Business Journal	Washington Business Journal
San Jose Mercury News	Web 2.0 Journal
Santa Cruz Sentinel (Santa Cruz, CA)	Web Lens
SiliconValley.com (Silicon Valley, CA)	WFMZ
Socialmulti	Whittier Daily News (Whittier, CA)
South Florida Business Journal	Wichita Business Journal
Spoke	Wichita Eagle (Wichita, KS)
St. Louis Business Journal	Worcester Telegram & Gazette
Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)	Worth
State House News Service (Affiliated Services)	WR Hambrecht & Co.
Stocklink	WRAL-TV CBS-5 (Raleigh, NC)
StockNod	WSBNN Wall Street Business News Network
Street Insider	Yahoo! Politics
Sun Herald (Biloxi, MS)	Zecco

Two Weekly E-Letters

The MAC Communications team also sent the two press releases out directly as Weekly E-Letters to MAC’s contact list of more than 3,000 policy makers, opinion leaders, reporters, and other interested US audiences in the Washington, DC area.

Morocco on the Move

Morocco’s King Mohammed VI Commends Restoration of Historic Synagogue in Fez, Stresses Spiritual Diversity, Calls for Restoration of All Synagogues in Morocco

February 18, 2013

Restoration of Slat al Fassayme Synagogue in Fez bears “elegant testimony to the wealth and diversity of the Kingdom of Morocco and its heritage,” said

WASHINGTON, DC - In a message of the restoration ceremony of the Fassayme Synagogue in Fez, HM King Mohammed VI reiterated his religious freedoms and spiritual diversity, and emphasized the important thousand-year-old Jewish legacy in Morocco.

“As Commander of the Faithful,” the King said, “I am committed to the community of believers, and to fulfilling my mission with respect of religions for all believers in the revealed religions, including Judaism, loyal citizens for whom I deeply care... The Moroccan people’s culture, steeped in history, are rooted in our citizens’ abiding commitment to coexistence, tolerance and harmony between the various components

Morocco on the Move

King Mohammed VI Welcomes Bill Clinton to Morocco; Former US President Praises North African Nation’s Tolerance, Democratization

February 25, 2013

HM King Mohammed VI received, on Sunday in the Rabat royal palace, former US President Bill Clinton who was visiting Morocco and praised the nation’s religious tolerance and progress on democratization.

WASHINGTON, DC - Former US president Bill Clinton, who was on a private visit to Morocco, was received on Sunday in the Rabat royal palace by HM King Mohammed VI. The audience underscored the tie of friendship uniting the royal family and the Clinton family, and the good will and deep historical relations between Morocco and the USA.

“My family and I – my wife, her late mother, my daughter – we love this country,” said Clinton at a speech on Sunday morning in Casablanca, at a conference attended by many figures.

Sampling of Jewish Press Coverage

The MAC Communications team contacted more than 100 US Jewish media outlets to generate additional coverage, which includes:

Here are the more prominent ones:

Jewish Week New York

<http://www.thejewishweek.com/features/lens/fez-synagogue-reopens>

Jewish Ledger (CT)

<http://www.jewishledger.com/2013/02/morocco-restores-ancient-synagogue/>

Israel International News (Arutz 7)

<http://www.israelnationalnews.com/News/Flash.aspx/262244>

Intermountain Jewish News (CO)

<http://www.ijn.com/ijn-news/international/3769-fez-moroccos-synagogue-is-restored>

GreenProphet.com

<http://www.greenprophet.com/2013/02/all-moroccan-synagogues-to-be-renovated-says-king-mohammed-vi/>

Times of Israel

<http://www.timesofisrael.com/moroccos-islamist-pm-inaugurates-fez-synagogue/>

Euro Jewish Congress

<http://www.eurojewcong.org/morocco/8916-morocco-pm-to-inaugurate-historic-fez-synagogue.html>

Your Jewish News

<http://www.yourjewishnews.com/2013/02/25768.html>

Jewish People Around the World

http://www.jpeopleworld.com/index.php?dir=site&page=country&subj_cs=3640

JSspace.com

<http://www.jspace.com/news/tags/architecture/6945>

<http://www.thejewishweek.com/fastlane/fez-synagogue-reopens>

Fez Synagogue Reopens

03/12/13 | Steve Libman | Staff Writer

Photo: By Gerry Images

Two years ago, as Morocco adopted a new constitution while the Arab Spring raged throughout the Arab world, Morocco's King Mohammed VI reached out to his country's small Jewish population. He called for the renovation of all Jewish houses of worship in Morocco, so they could serve as centers for cultural dialogue.

His seeds of interfaith outreach bore fruit earlier this month.

The 17th-century Slat Alfasfyne synagogue in Fez, following a two-year refurbishing effort, reopened with a ceremony that drew some 200 people, including Morocco's prime minister, who read a message from the king, as well as other members of the government, Islamic leaders and representatives of Germany. The German government contributed to the project.

The synagogue, which was used as a carpet workshop and a gym in recent centuries, had deteriorated before its recent renovation. The restoration bears "eloquent testimony to the spiritual wealth and diversity of the Kingdom of Morocco and its heritage," King Mohammed said in a statement read at the ceremony. "The Moroccan people's cultural traditions, which are steeped in history, are rooted in our citizens' abiding commitment to the principles of coexistence, tolerance and harmony between the various components of the nation."

steve@jewishweek.org

Media Coverage Report

RE: Media Report on the Gdeim Izik Trial and Sentencing

Pursuant to your request, this report provides you with a breakout of press coverage to date on the Gdeim Izik trial and sentencing in Rabat.

On Feb. 16, a Moroccan court handed down verdicts in the highly charged Gdeim Izik case, concluding an open and transparent judicial process, in the presence of more than 60 international observers from 11 countries and in accordance with Moroccan law, and finding 24 defendants guilty of murder, looting, and violence in the 2010 Laayoune riot that killed 11 policemen attempting to peacefully disperse a protest. More than a week prior, the MAC media team had begun posting and tweeting from MOTM to help shape the debate and set the stage for the court’s application of the rule of law to deliver justice in the case.

When the ruling came down on a Saturday night, the MAC team went to work, posting a story early Sunday to get into the weekend news cycle for US media. After reacting quickly to get the news on MOTM and in the MOTM twitter feed, the MAC team then issued a Press Release on PR Newswire, “Morocco Court Returns Verdicts in Gdeim Izik Case – International Observers Say Trial ‘Fair & Transparent’,” to drive publicity in both print and online spheres, and followed up with a longer-lead NAPS article, “Advancing Rule of Law In Morocco,” to extend Morocco’s key messages to thousands of newspapers across the US. The release and NAPS article formed the basis for MAC responses to inquiries and information to Hill offices, US media, and our other audiences in the policy community. Highlights of the MAC communications campaign are below.

Media/Web Coverage Highlights

- NAPS article – 2,056 US newspaper placements for article, “Advancing Rule of Law in Morocco,” written by MACP, and published in all 50 US states (see listed below). The combined print and online audience was almost 8 million readers, and the article appeared in 44 of the top 50 US media markets.
- Morocco On The Move – Four postings of news and blog columns, including Feb. 8 commentary by MACP Executive Director Jordan Paul, “Transparency, Justice, and the Rule of Law in Morocco.” Republished by allAfrica.com, Atlas Times, Legal News, Sahara Question, and elsewhere, resulting in 150 total placements and more than 2 million media impressions.
- PR Newswire – Press Release distributed on PR Newswire, picked up and posted by 194 media outlets on Feb. 18, 2013 (listed alphabetically at end of the report), including major media such as the Wall Street Journal, Houston Chronicle, Boston Globe, Miami Herald, Reuters, Yahoo News, Columbus Dispatch and San Francisco Chronicle. The postings led to more than 250 total media and Web placements, generating more than 20 million media impressions.

Placements of NAPS Article – 2,056 US Newspapers, print/online

NAPS Article: “ADVANCING RULE OF LAW IN MOROCCO” (Feb. 21, 2013)

The final report for the NAPS article, “Advancing Rule of Law in Morocco,” shows it generated 2,056 placements in newspapers (including those listed below) in all 50 US states. The combined print and online audience was almost 8 million readers. The article appeared in 44 of the top 50 US media markets, 79 of the top 100 markets, and 159 of the top 300 markets.

- CAPITAL GAZETTE , ANNAPOLIS, MD
- TIMES DISPATCH , RICHMOND, VA
- NEW JERSEY.COM, NEWARK, NJ
- HOME REPORTER NEWS, BROOKLYN, NY
- NORFOLK DAILY NEWS , NORFOLK, VA
- REGISTER STAR , HUDSON, NY
- IONIAN NEWS , NEW ROCHELLE, NY
- CHELSEA NOW , NEW YORK, NY
- THE HOUR.COM, NORWALK, CT
- DESERT NEWS, CALIFORNIA CITY, CA
- COAST REPORT ONLINE , COSTA MESA, CA
- FONTANA HERALD NEWS , FONTANA, CA
- HIGHLAND NEWS , HIGHLAND, CA
- MOUNTAIN-NEWS , LAKE ARROWHEAD, CA
- LA DOWNTOWN NEWS , LOS ANGELES, CA
- MALIBU TIMES , MALIBU, CA
- STAR DEMOCRAT, EASTON, MD
- THE GILMAN STAR , GILMAN, IL
- BUGLE NEWSPAPERS , PLAINFIELD, IL
- HERALD ARGUS , LA PORTE, IN
- THE NEWS DISPATCH , MICHIGAN CITY, IN
- GILROY DISPATCH , GILROY, CA
- SAN BENITO COUNTY TODAY , GILROY, CA
- GOOGLE NEWS.COM, MOUNTAIN VIEW, CA
- THE ATLANTA VOICE , ATLANTA, GA
- PACIFIC SUN , SAN RAFAEL, CA
- GALVESTON DAILY NEWS , GALVESTON, TX
- NEWARK POST ONLINE , NEWARK, DE

- EL NUEVO HERALDO , MIAMI, FL
- FOXBORO REPORTER , FOXBORO, MA
- SENTINEL SOURCE , KEENE, NH
- TAOS NEWS , TAOS, NM
- INSIDE NOVA , MANASSAS, VA
- SUN GAZETTE , SPRINGFIELD, VA

CLARKSVILLE NEWS , CLARKSVILLE, TX
 AIM MEDIA TEXAS , DALLAS, TX
 DALLAS WEEKLY , DALLAS, TX
 KAUFMAN HERALD , KAUFMAN, TX
 DAILY TRIBUNE , MT PLEASANT, TX
 BAY CITY TRIBUNE , BAY CITY, TX
 LEADER-NEWS , EL CAMPO, TX
 YOUR HOUSTON NEWS , HOUSTON, TX
 DELCO TIMES , PRIMOS, PA
 JOURNAL-SPECTATOR , WHARTON, TX
 PRESS OF ATLANTIC CITY , PLEASANTVILLE, NJ
 THE NEWS OBSERVER , BLUE RIDGE, GA
 THE HARTWELL SUN , HARTWELL, GA
 FRANKLIN COUNTY CITIZEN , LAVONIA, GA
 NORTHWEST GEORGIA NEWS , ROME, GA
 LEDGER NEWS , WOODSTOCK, GA
 CLEVELAND JEWISH NEWS , BEACHWOOD, OH
 THE POST NEWSPAPERS , MEDINA, OH
 CHASKA HERALD , CHASKA, MN
 EDEN PRAIRIE NEWS , EDEN PRAIRIE, MN
 JORDAN NEWS , JORDAN, MN
 INDEPENDENT REVIEW , LITCHFIELD, MN
 CORONADO NEWS CA , CORONADO, CA
 IMPERIAL BEACH NEWS CA , IMPERIAL BEACH, CA
 THE INTELLIGENCER , EDWARDSVILLE, IL
 THE JOURNAL-NEWS , HILLSBORO, IL
 HERALD PUBS , MASCOUTAH, IL
 OKAWVILLE TIMES , OKAWVILLE, IL
 ST LOUIS AMERICAN , ST. LOUIS, MO
 STEGEN HERALD , STE GENEVIEVE, MO
 SULLIVAN JOURNAL , SULLIVAN, MO
 SONOMA WEST , SEBASTOPOL, CA
 E MISSOURIAN , WASHINGTON, MO
 TIMES ONLINE , BEAVER, PA
 HERALD STANDARD , UNIONTOWN, PA

MOHAVE DAILY NEWS , BULLHEAD CITY, AZ
 HAVASU NEWS , LAKE HAVASU CITY, AZ
 PARKER PIONEER , PARKER, AZ
 LEBANON DAILY RECORD , LEBANON, MO
 THE MONITOR , MCALLEN, TX
 MY EASTERN SHORE MD , EASTON, MD
 CECIL DAILY , ELKTON, MD
 RAWLINS TIMES , RAWLINS, WY
 COAST WEEKEND , ASTORIA, OR
 DAILY ASTORIAN, ASTORIA, OR
 SEASIDE-SUN , SEASIDE, OR
 THE REFLECTOR , BATTLE GROUND, WA
 CHINOOK OBSERVER , LONG BEACH, WA
 NEWS RECORD, CINCINNATI, OH
 HERALD-ONLINE , LOUISBURG, KS
 REPUBLIC-ONLINE , PAOLA, KS
 KEARNEY COURIER , KEARNEY, MO
 LIBERTY TRIBUNE , LIBERTY, MO
 SEDALIA DEMOCRAT , SEDALIA, MO
 SMITHVILLE HERALD , SMITHVILLE, MO
 NEWS PRESS NOW , ST JOSEPH, MO
 BENTON COUNTY ENTERPRISE , WARSAW, MO
 PLATTE CHRONICLE , WESTON, MO
 FOREST HILLS MESSENGER , FORESTHILL, CA
 EG CITIZEN, GALT, CA
 GALT HERALD ONLINE, GALT, CA
 THE WHEATLAND CITIZEN, WHEATLAND, CA
 NEWS EXAMINER, CONNERSVILLE, IN HARTFORD CITY NEWS TIMES, HARTFORD CITY, IN INDIANAPOLIS RECORDER, INDIANAPOLIS, IN
 CHRONICLE-TRIBUNE, MARION, IN
 SHELBY NEWS, SHELBYVILLE, IN WINCHESTER NEWS GAZETTE, WINCHESTER, IN CIRCLEVILLE TODAY, CIRCLEVILLE, OH
 LOGAN DAILY , LOGAN, OH

HAMMOND STAR , HAMMOND, LA
 L'OBSERVATEUR , LA PLACE, LA
 THESTTAMMANYNEWS , SLIDELL, LA
 POST-VOICE , BURGAW, NC
 ELY NEWS , ELY, NV
 CACHE VALLEY DAILY , LOGAN, UT
 MOAB SUN NEWS , MOAB, UT
 RICHFIELD REAPER , RICHFIELD, UT
 GREEN RIVER STAR , GREEN RIVER, WY
 JOURNAL INQUIRER , MANCHESTER, CT
 MIDDLETOWN PRESS , MIDDLETOWN, CT
 TOWN TIMES NEWS , SOUTHURY, CT
 THE SUN CHRONICLE , NORTH ATTLEBORO, MA
 JAMESTOWN NEWS , JAMESTOWN, NC
 MONTGOMERY HERALD , TROY, NC
 JOURNAL NOW , WINSTON-SALEM, NC
 PORTLAND LEADER , PORTLAND, TN
 PRESS REGISTER , CLARKSDALE, MS
 DESOTO TIMES , HERNANDO, MS
 PURCELL REGISTER , PURCELL, OK
 HARBOR COUNTRY-NEWS , NEW BUFFALO, MI
 NASSAU COUNTY RECORD , CALLAHAN, FL
 NASSAU RECORD , CALLAHAN, FL
 LAKE CITY REPORTER , LAKE CITY, FL
 THE ALMA TIMES , ALMA, GA
 THE BLACKSHEAR TIMES , BLACKSHEAR, GA
 DOUGLAS ENTERPRISE , DOUGLAS, GA
 CHARLTON COUNTY HERALD , FOLKSTON, GA
 THE PRESS-SENTINEL , JESUP, GA
 RR DAILY HERALD , ROANOKE RAPIDS, NC
 FREDERICKSBURG STANDARD , FREDERICKSBURG, TX
 GONZALES INQUIRER , GONZALES, TX
 SOUTHSIDE MESSENGER , KEYSVILLE, VA
 THE SMOKY MOUNTAIN TIMES , BRYSON CITY, NC
 CROSSROADS CHRONICLE , CASHIERS, NC
 THE FRANKLIN PRESS , FRANKLIN, NC
 CLAY COUNTY PROGRESS , HAYESVILLE, NC
 CHEROKEE SCOUT , MURPHY, NC
 MITCHELL NEWS , SPRUCE PINE, NC
 CLINTON CHRONICLE , CLINTON, SC
 REEDLEY EXPONENT , REEDLEY, CA
 THE DINUBA SENTINEL , REEDLEY, CA
 THE SANGER HERALD , SANGER, CA
 NEWS ADVANCE , LYNCHBURG, VA
 SOUTH COUNTY LEADER , BIXBY, OK
 CATOOSA TIMES , CATOOSA, OK
 THE CLEVELAND AMERICAN , CLEVELAND, OK
 THE COLLINSVILLE NEWS , COLLINSVILLE, OK
 COWETA AMERICAN , COWETA, OK
 GRAND LAKE NEWS , GROVE, OK
 MANNFORD EAGLE , MANNFORD, OK
 OWASSO REPORTER , OWASSO, OK
 SAND SPRINGS LEADER , SAND SPRINGS, OK
 SAPULPA HERALD ONLINE , SAPULPA, OK
 TULSA BUSINESS , TULSA, OK
 WAGONER TRIBUNE , WAGONER, OK
 BENSON NEWS-SUN , BENSON, AZ
 EXPLORER NEWS , TUCSON, AZ
 INSIDE TUCSON BUSINESS , TUCSON, AZ
 WILLCOX RANGE NEWS , WILLCOX, AZ
 SOUTHWEST IOWA NEWS , COUNCIL BLUFFS, IA
 OMAHA NEWSTAND , OMAHA, NE
 SEWARD INDEPENDENT , SEWARD, NE
 RIO GRANDE SUN , ESPANOLA, NM
 STANDARD BANNER , JEFFERSON CITY, TN
 JOURNAL TRIBUNE , BIDDEFORD, ME
 PARIS BEACON , PARIS, IL
 ANNA NEWS , ANNA, IL
 COURIER INDEPENDENT , CARTERVILLE, IL
 WAYNE CO JOURNAL BANNER , PIEDMONT, MO

PARIS POST INTELLIGENCER, PARIS, TN
 BRYAN TIMES , BRYAN, OH
 GETTYSBURG TIMES , GETTYSBURG, PA
 MORNING JOURNAL , LISBON, OH
 ELLWOOD CITY LEDGER , ELLWOOD CITY, PA
 ASHLEY COUNTY LEDGER , HAMBURG, AR
 THE MCGEHEE TIMES , MCGEHEE, AR
 MY MONTICELLONEWS , MONTICELLO, AR
 THE DAILY CITIZEN , SEARCY, AR
 CHARLESTON MERCURY , CHARLESTON, SC
 COLLETON TODAY , WALTERBORO, SC
 LODI NEWS , LODI, CA
 GULF COAST NEWS TODAY , FAIRHOPE, AL
 CLAY CENTER DISPATCH , CLAY CENTER, KS
 CHAMBERLAIN SUN , CHAMBERLAIN, SD
 LEADER COURIER-TIMES , NORTH SIOUX CITY, SD
 ONIDA WATCHMAN , ONIDA, SD
 CAPITAL JOURNAL , PIERRE, SD
 INDIANA GAZETTE , INDIANA, PA
 WESTERN COURIER , MACOMB, IL
 CHARITON LEADER , CHARITON, IA
 THE SIMPSONIAN , INDIANOLA, IA
 CHAFFEE COUNTY TIMES , BUENA VISTA, CO
 CHIEFTAIN , PUEBLO, CO
 THE MOUNTAIN MAIL , SALIDA, CO
 THREE RIVERS NEWS , THREE RIVERS, MI
 EMPORIAGAZETTE , EMPORIA, KS
 WASHBURN REVIEW , TOPEKA, KS
 VERO NEWS , VERO BEACH, FL
 NEWS-GRAPHIC , GEORGETOWN, KY
 MAGEECOURIER-COUNTY NEWS , MAGEE, MS
 STOWE TODAY , STOWE, VT
 THE ROYAL REGISTER , COEUR D'ALENE, ID
 GAZETTE RECORD , SAINT MARIES, ID
 BOONEVILLE DEMOCRAT , BOONEVILLE, AR
 CHARLESTON EXPRESS , CHARLESTON, AR
 GREENWOOD DEMOCRAT , GREENWOOD, AR
 PARIS-EXPRESS , PARIS, AR
 PRESS ARGUS , VAN BUREN, AR
 SEQUOYAH COUNTY TIMES , SALLISAW, OK
 БЕЛОIT DAILY NEWS , БЕЛОIT, WI
 LITTLE RIVER NEWS , ASHDOWN, AR
 HENDERSON DAILY NEWS , HENDERSON, TX
 RECORD STAR , ALICE, TX
 CREIGHTON NEWS , CREIGHTON, NE
 NELIGH NEWS , NELIGH, NE
 NEWSPAPERS OF FAYETTE COUNTY , ELGIN, IA
 KALONA NEWS , KALONA, IA
 VINTON DAILY , VINTON, IA
 WAHPETON DAILY NEWS , WAHPETON, ND
 ARGUS OBSERVER, ONTARIO, OR
 SABINE COUNTY REPORTER LIVE , HEMPHILL, TX
 GRANDRAPIDS MN , GRAND RAPIDS, MN
 HAYWARD WI , HAYWARD, WI
 NEWS-SHIELD , BARRON, WI
 WALLOWA , ENTERPRISE, OR
 EAST OREGONIAN , HERMISTON, OR
 BLUE MOUNTAIN EAGLE , JOHN DAY, OR
 FULTON DEMOCRAT , CANTON, IL
 LEE COUNTY COURIER , TUPELO, MS
 THE INDEPENDENT , GRAND ISLAND, NE
 THE EAGLE , BRYAN, TX
 CENTRAL WINE WS , ABBOTSFORD, WI
 PRICE COUNTY DAILY , PHILLIPS, WI
 TRINITY JOURNAL , WEAVERVILLE, CA
 SIDNEY HERALD , SIDNEY, MT
 WILLISTON HERALD , WILLISTON, ND
 THE PENDER POST , BURGAW, NC
 STATEPORT PILOT , SOUTHPORT, NC
 WHITEVILLE , WHITEVILLE, NC

BELMOND NEWS , BELMOND, IA
 THE DAILY COURIER , GRANTS PASS, OR
 DAILY DEM , FORT MADISON, IA
 JOURNAL PILOT , CARTHAGE, IL
 PALMYRA-SPECTATOR , PALMYA, MO
 EXPONENT-TELEGRAM , CLARKSBURG, WV
 DOTHAN EAGLE , DOTHAN, AL
 SOUTHEAST SUN , ENTERPRISE, AL
 HICKORY RECORD , HICKORY, NC
 JOURNAL PATRIOT , NORTH WILKESBORO, NC
 BROWNSVILLE HERALD , BROWNSVILLE, TX
 VALLEY MORNING STAR , HARLINGEN, TX
 HARRISON DAILY TIMES , HARRISON, AR
 NEWTON COUNTY TIMES , JASPER, AR
 LAWRENCE COUNTY RECORD , MOUNT VERNON, MO
 NEWS-JOURNAL , MOUNTAIN GROVE, MO
 SOUTH COUNTY MAIL , ROGERSVILLE, MO
 WEBSTER COUNTY CITIZEN , SEYMOUR, MO
 THE STANDARD , SPRINGFIELD, MO
 PULASKI COUNTY MIRROR , ST. ROBERT, MO
 CEDAR REPUBLICAN , STOCKTON, MO
 NAVIGATOR JOURNAL , ALBION, IL
 THE SHOALS NEWS , SHOALS, IN MESSENGER-INQUIRER , OWENSBORO, KY
 TIMES LEADER , PRINCETON, KY
 THE CORRY JOURNAL , CORRY, PA
 TITUSVILLE HERALD , TITUSVILLE, PA
 ATHENS OHIO TODAY , ATHENS, OH
 JACKSON COUNTY DAILY , JACKSON, OH
 PIKE COUNTY DAILY , WAVERLY, OH
 ANCHORAG E-PRESS , ANCHORAGE, AK
 FLATHEAD NEWS GROUP , COLUMBIA FALLS, MT
 RECORD GAZETTE , BANNING, CA
 IMPERIAL VALLEY NEWS , HOLTVILLE, CA
 SAN DIEGO NEWSCAPE , HOLTVILLE, CA
 YUMA NEWS NOW , HOLTVILLE, CA
 DESERT ENTERTAINER , PALM DESERT, CA
 HI DESERT STAR , YUCCA VALLEY, CA
 LIBERTY COUNTY TIMES , CHESTER, MT
 FAIRFIELD SUN TIMES , FAIRFIELD, MT
 LEWISTOWN NEWS , LEWISTON, MT
 MONTROSE PRESS , MONTROSE, CO
 TELLURIDE NEWS , TELLURIDE, CO
 THE SAVANNAH REPORTER , SAVANNAH, MO
 THE RANDOPHLH LEADER , ROANOKE, AL
 STAR HERALD , SCOTTSBLUFF, NE
 THE EAGLE POST , HOPKINSVILLE, KY
 JOURNAL REVIEW , CRAWFORDSVILLE, IN DAILY PROGRESS , CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA
 PERRY DAILY , NEW LEXINGTON, OH

MOROCCO ON THE MOVE – 4 Postings of News & Blog Columns, Republished for 150 Total Placements

TRANSPARENCY, JUSTICE, AND THE RULE OF LAW IN MOROCCO – JORDAN PAUL, MACP

February 8, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

MACP, by Jordan Paul (Washington, DC, Feb. 8, 2013) – The Moroccan government has invited judges, lawyers, human rights activists, and reporters – from Morocco and around the world – to observe the trial, beginning today in Rabat, of 24 defendants charged with inciting violent riots that led to the brutal killing [...]

MOROCCAN COURT HANDS DOWN SENTENCES IN GDEIM IZIK CASE; INTERNATIONAL OBSERVERS CALL “JUST” – MIDDLE EAST ONLINE

February 17, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

International, Moroccan observers confirm sentences are ‘just and in accordance with requirements of fairness and transparency’

Middle East Online (Rabat, Morocco, Feb. 17, 2013) – A Moroccan military court on Sunday handed prison sentences, including life terms, to a group of individuals accused of killing members of the security forces in the Western Sahara in 2010. [...]

MOROCCO COURT RETURNS GDEIM IZIK VERDICTS – INTERNATIONAL OBSERVERS SAY TRIAL ‘FAIR & TRANSPARENT’

February 18, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

MACP (Rabat, Morocco, Feb. 18, 2013) — On Saturday night, a Moroccan court handed down verdicts in the highly charged Gdeim Izik case, concluding an open and transparent judicial process. In the presence of more than 60 international observers from 11 countries and in accordance with Moroccan law, 24 defendants were found guilty and sentenced [...]

PRESS RELEASE: MOROCCO COURT RETURNS VERDICTS...

February 18, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

CONTACT: Garth Neuffer, 202.470.2055 gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com
FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: Monday, February 18, 2013

Morocco Court Returns Verdicts On Gdeim Izik - International Observers Say Trial ‘Fair, Transparent’
Rabat, Morocco (Feb. 18, 2013) — On Saturday night, a Moroccan court handed down verdicts in the highly charged Gdeim Izik case, concluding an open and transparent judicial [...]

MACP Release on PR Newswire – Initial Posts at 194 Major Media Outlets, 250 Total Placements

MACP Press Release: “Morocco Court Returns Verdicts in Gdeim Izik Case – International Observers Say Trial ‘Fair and Transparent’” (Feb. 18, 2013)

- aePiot News
- AlipesNews
- Alpha Exclusive
- AlphaTrade Finance
- Anchorage Daily News
- AssignmentEditor.com
- Atlanta Business Chronicle
- Austin American-Statesman (Austin, TX)
- Austin Business Journal
- Baltimore Business Journal
- Belleville News-Democrat
- Best Growth Stock Market Report
- Beyond The Dow
- Birmingham Business Journal
- Biz Daily (Singapore)
- Biz Wire Express
- Bizjournals.com, Inc.
- boomerVilleUS.com
- Boston Business Journal
- Boston Globe
- Brian's Roar
- Buffalo News (Buffalo, NY)
- Business First of Buffalo
- Business First of Columbus
- Business First of Louisville
- Business Journal of Greater Milwaukee
- Business Journal of Phoenix
- Business Journal of the Greater Triad Area
- Business Review (Albany)
- BusinessRockford
- California Chronicle
- Carlsbad Current-Argus (Carlsbad, NM)
- Charlotte Business Journal
- Chicago Business News

- Cincinnati Business Courier
- Cincinnati Enquirer
- Codewit News
- Columbus Dispatch
- Columbus Ledger-Enquirer (Columbus, GA)
- Contra Costa Times
- Crossover.co.ke (Magnificent Ltd/Kenya)
- Daily Breeze (Torrance, CA)
- Daily Herald
- Dallas Business Journal
- Dayton Business Journal
- Dealbreaker
- Denver Business Journal

Design 4 Law - Articles About Design And Law	KING-TV NBC-5 (Seattle, WA)
Digital Journal	KVOR 740-AM (Colorado Springs, CO)
El Nuevo Herald	Las Cruces Sun-News
El Paso Times	Las Vegas Business Press
eMoneyDaily	Las Vegas Review-Journal
eZanga	Latest News Today
Ezerin'Com Communication Agency	Lexington Herald-Leader (Lexington, KY)
Farmington Daily Times (Farmington, NM)	Living by the Seasons
Fayetteville Observer	Long Beach Press-Telegram (Long Beach, CA)
Feed Head Lines	Los Angeles Business from bizjournals
FinancialContent - PR Newswire	Los Angeles Daily News (Woodland Hills, CA)
FindLaw Legal News	Luso Financial Planning
FinRoad	Market Intelligence Center
Fort Worth Star-Telegram (Fort Worth, TX)	Market Pulse
Global Newsweek	MarketWatch
Government News (Ulitzer)	Maxim Group
Great American Financial Resources	Memphis Business Journal
GYL: Licensing and Certification Resource Directory	Miami Herald
Health Care Enrichment Program	Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal
Houston Business Journal	Money Canada
Houston Chronicle	Money Show
Human Rights Today	MrBayStreet.com
Idaho Statesman	myMotherLode.com
Indianapolis Business Journal	Nashville Business Journal
Inland Valley Daily Bulletin (Ontario, CA)	New Mexico Business Weekly
inPixels	New York Business Journal
Inside Bay Area	News & Observer (Raleigh, NC)
International Business Times	News Info Guide
International Development News Today	News Tribune (Tacoma, WA)
Investle	Newsday (Melville, NY)
InvestorPoint.com	NorthStar News
InvestTalk	NorthWest Cable News (Seattle, WA)
Island Packet (Bluffton, SC)	Oklahoman (Oklahoma City, OK)
iStockAnalyst	Olympian (Olympia, WA)
Jacksonville Business Journal	OnCuba Magazine
Kansas City Business Journal	One News Page Global Edition
Kansas City Star	Orlando Business Journal
KGO-TV ABC-7 (San Francisco, CA)	Pacific Business News
	Pasadena Star-News (Pasadena, CA)

Pettinga Financial	The HRIS World
Philadelphia Business Journal	The Online Investor
Pittsburgh Business Times	The Sacramento Bee
Portland Business Journal	The State (Columbia, SC)
PR Newswire	The Sun News (Myrtle Beach, SC)
Press-Enterprise	TheStreet.com
Puget Sound Business Journal	Ticker Technologies
Record Publishing Company (Ravenna, OH)	Times Union (Albany, NY)
Redlands Daily Facts (Redlands, CA)	Triangle Business Journal
ReleasePlus	Tribune (San Luis Obispo, CA)
Reuters	Twitter (Ulitzer)
Ruidoso News (Ruidoso, NM)	US Politics Today
Sacramento Bee	Value Investing News
Sacramento Business Journal	Vanguardia
San Antonio Business Journal	Vertical Continuity Your Social Marketing Space
San Bernardino County Sun (San Bernardino, CA)	VisionMonday
San Francisco Business Times	Wall Street Journal
San Francisco Chronicle	Wall Street Select
San Gabriel Valley Tribune	Washington Business Journal
San Jose Business Journal	Web 2.0 Journal
San Jose Mercury News	Web Lens
Santa Cruz Sentinel (Santa Cruz, CA)	WFMZ
SiliconValley.com (Silicon Valley, CA)	Whittier Daily News (Whittier, CA)
Socialmulti	Wichita Business Journal
South Florida Business Journal	Wichita Eagle (Wichita, KS)
Spoke	Worcester Telegram & Gazette
St. Louis Business Journal	Worth
Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)	WR Hambrecht & Co.
State House News Service (Affiliated Services)	WRAL-TV CBS-5 (Raleigh, NC)
Stocklink	WSBNN Wall Street Business News Network
StockNod	Yahoo! Politics
Street Insider	Zecco
Sun Herald (Biloxi, MS)
Tampa Bay Business Journal
TC Palm
Telegraph-Macon (Macon, GA)
The Bellingham Herald
The Daily Herald
The Herald

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, June 17, 2013 4:29 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Blog Monitor June Week 2

Subject: Blog Monitor June Week 2

Blog Name	Article Title/Date	Summary	Comments
Magharebia	Islamists, secularists must co-operate, expert says June 7, 2013	This is an interview with Jawad Kerdoudi, head of the Moroccan Institute of International Relations (IMRI), in which he discusses the future of democracy in the country. Open and free democracy is not something that can be legislated, and is instead a long-term process that must grow organically to take root in the Maghreb. The rise of Islamist parties is a trend that has sprung up throughout the entire region, and while there is cause to be cautious about Islamists coming to power (Iran is an example), in order to protect the development of democracy the secularist parties and the Islamist parties must learn to cooperate, such that Morocco will have an all-inclusive democratic process. Kerdoudi suggests that secularists make more of an effort to reach out to moderate Islamists who, like them, favor democratic processes. He also states that economic and social development in the country is crucial for the flourishing of democracy.	0
Magharebia	Morocco signs migration deal with EU June 9, 2013	Morocco and the European Union on Friday (June 7th) signed a cooperation agreement on migration and mobility, MAP reported. "I am delighted that Morocco is the first country from the Mediterranean region to enter into a partnership of this kind with the EU," European Union Internal Affairs Commissioner Cecilia Malmström said after signing the accord in Luxembourg with Moroccan Foreign Minister Saadeddine El Othmani. Morocco and the EU will work together to combat illegal immigration and human trafficking. The EU will also begin facilitating visa procedures for certain groups of Moroccans, including students, researchers and business people.	0
Lakome	De l'absentéisme royal On royal absenteeism June 8, 2013	This article criticizes the king for his frequent and extended absences from Morocco since the beginning of the year. It suggests that he is neglecting his royal duties by remaining in France while Morocco is in the middle of a political crisis, and that he may be in violation of the Moroccan Constitution. Translated from French	32
Lakome	Finance islamique : le roi Mohammed VI, entre business et religion Islamic finance: King	Attijariwafa Bank, the banking affiliate of the royal holding company SNI, is in the top position in the Moroccan Islamic finance market. King Mohammed VI, in his position as Amir al-Mu'miniin, will moreover decide the composition and the operating procedures of the "Sharia Board," charged with controlling the conformity of future Islamic banks and their products on the Moroccan market. This article questions the potential conflict of interest inherent in the relationship between Attijariwafa and King Mohammed VI.	5

	Mohammed VI between business and religion June 13, 2013	Translated from French
Business Standard	Arab parliament's president visits Morocco June 8, 2013	Last Friday, Moroccan Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane received Ahmed Mohammed Al Jarwan, President of the Arab parliament, who is visiting the capital city of Rabat for a regional symposium on citizens and parliament. The Moroccan prime minister highlighted the role the Arab parliament was playing in expressing opinions and aspirations of Arab people. Al Jarwan praised Morocco's successes in maintaining peace and stability at national and regional levels.	0
The View From Fez	Fes Forum - Second Session on the Role of Global Markets June 9, 2013	The theme of Sunday's Fes Forum focused on the practical issue of the role that business and the markets play on the world stage. It posed the question: Can financial markets be made to work in harmony for the global good? The co-moderator of the Forum, Georgetown professor Katherine Marshall, summed up the debate by asking if it is possible to have a world of fairness, where competition is also an essential force? "It's a paradox not easily overcome," she said. We need both - competition is crucial for the free market, but competition also leaves people behind, and that hinders development. The two have to be balanced in order to foster economic growth without exacerbating poverty. Keynote speaker Gunnar Stalsett, Bishop Emeritus of Oslo, noted that for the markets to be harnessed for good, it is incumbent upon consumers to spend their money responsibly. "It's not the system that is responsible," he said, "it's individuals. We as consumers need to say to the brand owners that we will only use their products if certain conditions are imposed...Economic, social and cultural rights are essential to human rights."	0
Yabiladi	Bientot l'Expulsion des Migrants Subsahariens Irreguliers de l'UE vers le Maroc? Soon the Expulsion of Illegal African Migrants from the EU to Morocco? June 7, 2013	With the strengthening of the southern borders of the EU, the Union is pushing for Morocco to sign a 10-year agreement to allow illegal African immigrants back into Africa through Morocco. The 'Joint Statement on Mobility Partnership' implicates that Morocco will allow for the mobility of illegal immigrants in the EU to pass through their borders. However, there is backlash on the human rights front: "It is unacceptable that the EU intends to sign a readmission agreement [while currently] in Morocco, the violation of the rights of foreigners, migrants and refugees, reached an unprecedented level," said Stéphane Julinet charged with immigration law program and advocacy for GADEM. If Morocco signs the partnership, even boats coming from Africa carrying illegal immigrants will be turned over to Moroccan authorities rather than European authorities. Translated from French	5
Yabiladi	Maroc: L'Etat Prepare les Salafistes a Participer au Jeu Politique	The PJD is worried about the Salafist's recent bid for the Annahda wal Fadila party [Renaissance and Virtue]--a division of the PJD--to parliament. The five figures that represent Annahda wal Fadila that have taken leadership roles within parliament are Salafist specters looming within the government, with the PJD	0

	Morocco: The State Prepares the Salafists to Participate in the Political Game June 10, 2013	and Benkiraine now worried about Salafists potentially gaining more government control. This is a familiar occurrence in Morocco; in 1997 a group of nine Islamists entered government under the reign of El Khatib. "With the Salafists, the same outcome is possible, it is only a matter of time." Translated from French
Yabiladi	Maroc: Benkiraine n'Ecarte pas de Nouvelles Hausses des Prix Morocco: Benkiraine does not Rule out Further Price Increases June 10, 2013	Just over a year after a drastic increase in fuel prices, Benkiraine returns to the scene stating that more increases in the pricing of consumer goods is imminent. He stated that the government "could make painful but necessary [increases]," adding that "his government came to a crisis, which cannot be [solved with] smiles and increases in wages and pensions or lower prices." Benkiraine claims that the reform process will reap long-term macro-structural benefits despite short-term costs. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Maroc/Espagne: Un Nouvel Ambassadeur a Rabat Morocco/Spain: A New Ambassador in Rabat June 10, 2013	Jose de Carvajal will be replacing former Spanish ambassador to Morocco, Alberto Navarro. A Spanish newspaper, El Pais, described Carvajal as a competent diplomat with a long career in foreign affairs, and at the forefront of Spanish political relations with Ireland and Italy. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Le Maroc est sixième producteur mondial d'huile d'olive Morocco is the world's sixth largest producer of olive oil June 11, 2013	In 2010, Morocco was ranked the sixth largest supplier of olive oil. Its largest clients are the EU (50% of Morocco's olive oil exports) and the US (37%). Over the past couple of years the Moroccan olive oil industry has not seen any growth, but olive oil production is a key focus of the Green Morocco Plan. The Plan hopes to update the Kingdom's technology for producing olive oil in order to increase both the quantity and quality of production, which does not always meet international standards. Translated from French	5
Yabiladi	Armement : Israël a vendu du matériel électronique de pointe au Maroc et à l'Algérie	On Tuesday, Ha'aretz published a report on Israel's military exports, including a list of Muslim countries to which Israel has sold armaments, which were manufactured under a British label. This list included Morocco, Algeria, the UAE, Egypt, and Pakistan. The United States has also extended contracts to Israel to manufacture armaments to be sold to countries such as Egypt, Turkey, Jordan, the UAE, Bahrain, and Iraq. To Morocco,	7

	Armament: Israel has sold advanced electronic equipment to Morocco and Algeria June 12, 2013	it sold electronic systems and cockpit displays to outfit F16s that the Kingdom ordered from the United States in 2007. Translated from French
Yabiladi	Parlement : Le PJD veut plafonner les rémunérations des hauts fonctionnaires à 1.2 million dh par an Parliament: The PJD wants to cap salaries of senior officials at 1.2 million dirhams per year June 12, 2013	A PJD group in the lower chamber submitted a proposal June 7th of a bill that will have its first reading in the Commission of Finance and Economic Development. This law would be a way to avoid a potential remake of an earlier affair in which the former treasurer of the kingdom, Salaheddine Mezouar, and general treasurer, Bensouda, exchanged premiums. The proposition is essentially to reduce the increasing cost of salaries. From 2003-2012 salaries represented 35.6% of the general budget, increasing on average by 7% a year while the economy only increased by 4.7% Translated from French	3
Yabiladi	Italie : Arrestation d'un Marocain soupçonné de terrorisme Italy: Arrest of a Moroccan suspected of Terrorism June 12, 2013	Anas El Abboubi, alias Anas Abdu Shakur, 21, was arrested Wednesday morning in the northern Italian town of Brescia on suspicion of terrorism. According to the police report, el Abboubi had planned to attack a train station and a military barracks. He is also the head of the Italian branch of extremist group Sharia4. Four other Moroccans are under investigation. Translated from French	2
Yabiladi	Qatar Airways lance des vols directs entre Doha et Casablanca Qatar Airways Launches Direct Flights between Doha and Casablanca June 13, 2013	According to an official release, "with the launch of the new service of direct flights, passengers in Asia-Pacific, South Asia and Middle East can now enjoy a unique connection via the Casablanca hub operator in Doha." Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Argenteuil : Les deux	A second young, veiled Muslim woman was attacked in Argenteuil, and according to her lawyer these attackers	18

	_agressions de femmes voilées pourraient être liées Argenteuil: The two attacks against veiled women could be connected June 13, 2013	resemble those involved in the attack on a veiled woman on May 20. According to reports, the attackers took the woman's veil and beat her while calling her racial slurs. Following the attacks yesterday and 20 May, the Coalition against Racism and Islamophobia on Facebook called for a rally in front of the Mairie d'Argenteuil on Friday, June 21, 2013 at 3:00pm. Translated from French
AllAfrica	Morocco: UN Chief Committed to Negotiating a Solution in Western Sahara Conflict June 10, 2013	After meeting with the head of the Polisario Front, UN Secretary General Ban Ki Moon has reiterated the UN's prior assertions to assist both Morocco and the Polisario in negotiating a solution to the longtime dispute over the future status of the Western Sahara. UN Chief Ban also "expressed his concern over the increasing "frustration and vulnerability" that the absence of a settlement and the instability of the Sahel region have produced among young people in the refugee camps near Tindouf"-- therefore pointing out the need for a solution for the future generations of the region.	0
AllAfrica	Morocco: UN Decolonization Committee Assesses Western Sahara Question June 10, 2013	The UN Special Committee on Decolonization began its two week "Committee of 24" discussions to analyze the cases of the Falkland Islands, Puerto Rico, the Western Sahara, and other regions under contention. The meeting will consider the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and will especially evaluate the increasing need for the UN mission in Western Sahara, MINURSO, to monitor the human rights crises in the region.	0
AllAfrica	Morocco: Transferring Saharawi Political Prisoner Yahya Mohamed Hafed to Hospital June 12, 2013	Sahrawi human rights activist Yahya Mohamed Hafed has been transferred from Ait Melloul prison to the Aianczykan regional hospital. He is suffering from a number of severe gastrointestinal conditions and will be closely monitored.	0
AllAfrica	Morocco: President of Republic Invites Ban Ki-Moon to Visit Western Sahara June 12, 2013	Polisario Secretary General Mohammed Abdelaziz said on Tuesday, in a press conference in New York, that he has invited UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon to visit Western Sahara to give a boost to the peace process. Abdelaziz said he met with Ban and "invited him to give more interest, more attention to Western Sahara." He urged Ban to visit the region, saying his presence "will be seen as encouraging for the peace effort and could contribute to easing tensions."	0
Reuters	IMF Thinks Morocco is too Hesitant Over Reform	An IMF delegation currently visiting Morocco has asserted that the government has been too hesitant in moving ahead with economic reforms. The IMF is encouraging Morocco to reform its subsidy and pension systems to cut public spending.	0

	June 10, 2013	Benkiraine has responded: "I have received them (The IMF delegation) and they said that our government is hesitant about reforms," Benkirane told a meeting of his Islamist Justice and Development party (PJD) on Sunday. "I reassured them and I said that we are moving ahead with reforms at the right time."
POMED	Moroccan King Remains Abroad. Leaving Parliament in Deadlock June 11, 2013	King Mohammed VI of Morocco has been in France since May, leaving the country's government in a political deadlock after the opposition party, Istiqlal, said it would withdraw from the Islamist PJD-led government coalition earlier that month. The King then called upon Istiqlal's leaders to request that they remain in the government until he returned. The King's continued absence from Morocco also prevented him from meeting with Turkish PM Recep Tayyip Erdogan on his recent visit to the country. Some speculated that the snub was politically motivated, as Erdogan had dismissed Morocco in 2011 during his visit to the Arab Spring countries, while others said it was simply due to the king's absence. During this visit, Erdogan expressed support for UN moderated talks to resolve the Western Sahara dispute.	0
NASDAQ	Kosmos to Drill Offshore Morocco June 11, 2013	Kosmos Energy Inc has partnered with Atwood Oceanic Inc to begin a long-term drilling engagement off the coast of Morocco. The contract is set to last three years with a day rate of $595,000 and a total value of $652 million.	0
Bloomberg	Morocco Says Subsidy Cuts Dependency on Commodity Prices June 11, 2013	Morocco will have difficulty cutting subsidies so long as oil prices stay high despite pressure from the IMF for structural reform. The General Affairs and Governance Minister of Morocco stated: "If oil prices were to fall drastically, so would the size of the financial effort we would need to make to dismantle subsidies for fuels. As long as global commodity prices are high, the reform of the subsidy system will be difficult to implement." Last year, subsidies accounted for nearly 80% of Morocco's deficit, therefore, when the IMF extended their line of credit, the government agreed to a set of economic reforms including subsidy, tax, and pension reforms.	0
Bloomberg	Morocco's Citrus Shipments Seen Tripling to 1.3 Million Tons June 13, 2013	Morocco plans to more than triple its citrus fruit exports to 1.3 million metric tons by 2018 as a development program raises output, according to Ahmed Derrab, secretary general of industry group ASPAM. ASPAM represents 80% of Moroccan citrus producers. In the 1998-2011 period, Morocco's total citrus exports averaged 528,000 tons a year, according to finance and economy ministry data. The EU, which Derrab said offers the highest margins for Moroccan citrus, accounts for 30 percent of its exports while Russia takes 50 percent, with the remainder going mainly to the U.S., Canada and Saudi Arabia.	0
Brazil-Arab News Agency	Arab Brazilian Chamber Signs Agreement in Morocco June 11, 2013	The Arab Brazilian Chamber of commerce has signed a memorandum of understanding with the Moroccan Investment Promotion Agency to promote cooperation in investment and implementation of joint projects between the two countries.	0
International Adviser	Qatar and UAE to Upgrade as Morocco Falls	Qatar and UAE's MSCI indicators have been upgraded from frontier market to emerging market status for the 2013 fiscal year whereas Morocco has been downgraded from emerging	0 market back to frontier market. The MSCI indicator "is used by pension schemes and investors around the world to decide asset allocation and so a change in classification can have serious consequences for a country's economy. An upgrade can potentially mean a much higher weighting of global assets are allocated towards a country's index, therefore increasing foreign direct investment."

June 12, 2013

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, June 21, 2013 3:04 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitor June Week 3

FYI

Blog Name	Article Title/Date	Summary	Comments
All Africa	Morocco: Polisario Front Praises Positions Expressed in Washington, New York, and Geneva June 16, 2013	Secretary General of the Polisario Front, during his recent visit to the U.S, released a statement praising the commitment and encouragement demonstrated by the international community towards the need to accelerate a just solution, which ensures self-determination for the Saharawi people. The Secretary general also expressed concern "over the escalation of human rights violations in the Saharawi occupied territories, calling for addressing the protection and monitoring of human rights in the Territory."	0
All Africa	Morocco: U.S. Encourages Negotiations Between Polisario Front and Morocco. says Sherman June 16, 2013	U.S. Deputy Secretary of State, Wendy Sherman, released a statement in Algiers stating that the U.S. will support both the Polisario Front and Morocco in engaging in negotiations over the Western Sahara conflict. She stated that the U.S. encourages the settlement agreement between the two parties to "work with the Secretary-General of the United Nations Organization for a durable and credible solution acceptable by both parties."	0
The Jakarta Post	Islam Brings Moroccans, Indonesians Closer June 17, 2013	Due to the strong interest of Indonesian students to study Islam in Moroccan universities, Morocco has offered over 200 scholarships for Indonesian students to study in Morocco. "If Indonesian Muslims visit Morocco, they will be very happy to see that there is no difference in the way Moroccans and Indonesians practice Islam. They will feel at home."	0
Yabiladi	Maroc : 8 milliards de dirhams pour le prochain métro aérien de Casablanca Morocco: 8 Billion Dirhams for Casablanca's newest	Announced a few weeks ago, the Skytrain project is currently in a study, with the work scheduled to begin in January 2014, the Moroccan weekly Eco Life reported Friday. According to the report, the subway should be ready in 2017 "if all goes as planned." The new Skytrain will carry 400,000 passengers per day, significantly more than the 250,000 carried by the current tramway. Translated From French	0

	Skytrain June 14, 2013
Yabiladi	Crise en Espagne : + 62% d'Espagnols envoyés au Maroc par leurs entreprises Crisis in Spain: More than 62% of Spaniards sent to Morocco by their companies June 17, 2013	The number of Spaniards coming to Morocco for work has increased by 62% over the past two years, from 1637 in 2010 to 2660. Furthermore, according to a Spanish consultancy, many more Spaniards are believed to be working in Morocco without having registered. Abdelilah Benkirane declared that "there are many things to do for Spaniards in Morocco, and it will be a pleasure to receive our Spanish friends." Translated From French	0
Yabiladi	Le Maroc lance la chasse aux immigrés clandestins, enfin de manière très courtoise pour les Européens Morocco launches an illegal immigrant hunt, albeit very courteously for Europeans June 17, 2013	Last year, Morocco required applicants for residence permits to provide a criminal record and a medical certificate. This year, the Ministry of the Interior recommended in very courteous terms, that Europeans who have exceeded the three-month stay granted tourists regularize their situation. Translated From French	3
Yabiladi	Afrique : Le Maroc a participé à une saisie record de faux médicaments Africa: Morocco participated in a record seizure of	Morocco participated, starting in April, in a customs operation to seize a record number of fake, and potentially deadly, medications. According to the World Customs Organization, 550 million fake drugs, including fake antibiotics, anti-inflammatories, blood pressure medication, and insulin, were seized. Besides Morocco, customs services of 22 other African countries took part in this operation, organized in partnership with the Institute for anti-counterfeit medicines (IRACM), including Algeria, South Africa, Senegal, Cameroon and Côte d'Ivoire.	0

	fake medications June 17, 2013
Yabiladi	Sahara: Washington Revise sa Position et Salue. Depuis Algiers, le Plan d'Autonomie Sahara: Washington Revises its Position and Welcomes, from Algiers, the Autonomy Plan June 18, 2013	Wendy Sherman, deputy U.S. Secretary of State, has motioned that the Moroccan plan is a "credible option" in the negotiations over the Western Sahara. This is the first time that the Obama administration has appealed to the Moroccan initiative for the Western Sahara. This is a new development considering that two months ago, the U.S. conducted a sharply hostile policy in Morocco, when presented to the UN Security Council a draft resolution proposing to extend the mandate of MINURSO to monitor human rights in the Sahara. It was only after a diplomatic offensive by Morocco and its allies that Washington decided to withdraw its controversial project. Translated from French	9
Yabiladi	Pompage Solaire au Maroc: 400 Million Dirhams pour Developper le Projet Solar Pumps in Morocco: 400 Million Dirhams for Project Development June 18, 2013	Morocco has raised 400 Million dirhams for the implementation of a national program to provide small and medium farms with solar power. The project, whose implementation is planned for the end of 2013, aims to install a park of 3,000 photovoltaic pumping systems, all for a combined installed capacity of 15 MW-Peak (power of a photovoltaic panel per unit time). Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Parlement : En pleine crise, Karim Ghellab accorde des primes à ses collaborateurs Parliament: Amidst a crisis, Karim Ghellab gives his collaborators bonuses. June 19, 2013	"Budgetary rigor is not for everyone." Ghellab, the Istiqlalien president of the chamber of representatives, last week gave bonuses to his close collaborators from the public budget ranging from 110,000-140,000 dh ($13,000-$16,500). Moroccan daily Assabah alleged that he had also been unwilling to negotiate his decision with opposition members of the chamber of representatives. This is not the first time the Moroccan government has managed its finances poorly; on the occasion of International Women's Day Mohammed Biadallah offered his 150 female employes gold necklaces, and last April, after cutting the investment budget by 15 billion dirhams, Benkirane bought his ministers new BMWs.	10

		Translated from French
Yabiladi	Maroc-Algérie : Alger froissée par la manifestation pour l'ouverture de la frontière Morocco-Algeria: Algiers offended by a demonstration for opening the border June 19, 2013	The Algerian ministry of foreign affairs addressed a group of Arab lawyers who had come to protest for the reopening of the Moroccan border two weeks ago, claiming that the closure is entirely Morocco's fault. On 8 June, the International Union of Arab Attorneys organized a demonstration between Marsat Ben M'hidi (Algeria) and Saïdia (Morocco), to call for opening the border, which has been closed since 1994. According to an Algerian Foreign Ministry spokesperson, "The issue of the reopening of the border is a matter of sovereignty within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Algerian government and the conditions that must preside are known to our neighbors," including "stopping the smear campaign against Algeria, efficient cooperation in the war on drugs, and respecting the Algerian position on Western Sahara." Translated from French	39
Yabiladi	Maroc : Chabat annonce que sa rencontre avec le roi est prévue la semaine prochaine Morocco: Chabat announces that his meeting with the King is scheduled for next week. June 20, 2013	Hamid Chabat has not lost hope for his meeting with the King, because his position depends on it. However, he has not announced the place or date of the future meeting. In the meantime, he is with an entourage in Western Sahara, a traditional Istiqlalien stronghold, attempting to explain his decision to withdraw his party from government. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Maroc : Un homme condamné à 10 ans de prison pour pédophilie Morocco: A man condemned to 10 years in prison for pedophilia June 20, 2013	A man convicted of sexually abusing a minor was convicted and charged with 10 years in prison. The man lured a 10 year old boy in a hut located in a popular area of Kenitra, before violating the child "brutally", causing several injuries. The child was then taken to hospital for treatment, and the man was arrested. Translated from French	0

Yabiladi	Sahara: Mustapha Salma se Laisse Mourir de Faim pour sa Famille Sahara: Mustapha Salma On Hunger Strike to See his Family June 20, 2013	Polisario dissident Mustapha Salma was rushed to the hospital yesterday after fainting. Salma has been on hunger strike for the past month in an act of protest against the Mauritanian government for not being allowed to enter the Tindouf refugee camps to see his family. He has been banned from Mauritania for two years. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Le Maroc commence à réduire les subventions sur le pétrole et le sucre Morocco Begins Reduction of Sugar and Petrol Prices June 21, 2013	The Minister of General Affairs announces cuts in public subsidies for commodities under pressure from the IMF. On the eve of Ramadan, a period generally known for increases in prices, the Moroccan government announced that it will begin to reduce government subsidies for basic staples. "We will begin, in the next two weeks - before Ramadan - the automatic adjustment of prices for energy products and sugar, with the exception of city gas," said the Minister for General Affairs and governance, Mohamed Najib Boulif. The change would allow the government to lower subsidies by 20%, to be limited to 42 billion dirhams so that the public deficit remains within the specified limits for the 2013 budget. Translated from French	4
AFP	Morocco journalist convicted of defaming minister June 17, 2013	Youssef Jajili, editor of the Al-Aan magazine, has been given a 2 month suspended prison sentence and fined 50,000 dirhams on charges of defamation. His magazine ran an article last year claiming that PJD Trade Minister Abdelkader Amara had used 10,000 dirhams of public money to pay for a lavish champagne ball in Burkina Faso. The PJDist said that the magazine made "false claims," using "false witnesses and a false copy of the bill," and that Jajili was trying to "undermine the PJD." In response Reporters Without Borders issued a statement reading "Two years after the adoption of a new constitution... this prison sentence for defamation, even if suspended, and heavy fine, shows how little of the promised reform of Morocco's press code has been achieved."	0
Counting Pips	Morocco holds rate, encourages loans to small businesses	Morocco's central bank held its key rate steady at 3.0 percent, saying inflation is expected to remain in line with the bank's price stability objective and the risks are balanced. Bank Al-Magrib also said it would implement a new program to encourage banks to lend to very small, small, and medium-sized enterprises,	0

	June 18, 2013	particularly industrial companies that are export-oriented due to a continued deceleration in non-agricultural activity and bank credit. The program, with a minimum duration of two years, provides banks with liquidity collateralized mostly by private securities issued by such businesses.
Sahara Press Service	Western Sahara: the inconvenient uprising nobody wants to talk or hear about (Open Democracy) June 18, 2013	This article reports that the British periodical Open Democracy wrote an article in which it referred to the Western Sahara crisis as "the inconvenient uprising nobody wants to talk (or hear) about." It reiterated the point made by some analysts (including Stephen Zunes on Jadaliyya two weeks ago) that the Arab Spring actually began with the Gdeim Izik protests. The rest of the Sahara Press Service article was a series of block quotes.	0
Reuters	Morocco Inflation Rise to 2.8 % in May June 20, 2013	Morocco's annual consumer price inflation rose from 2.4% to 2.8% from April to May due to rising food prices. On a monthly basis, consumer price inflation rose 0.5% as vegetable prices jumped 6.6% while non-food inflation was 0.1%.	0
Reuters	Morocco's RAM Airline to buy 20 New Planes by 2020	Morocco's Royal Air Maroc (RAM) wants to buy between 20 and 30 new-generation planes, including 15 medium-haul and 5 long-haul jets as soon as possible, its chief executive said on Thursday. "We wish to renew our fleet with the new-generation planes, and we need between 20 and 30 additional jets by 2020", stated RAM CEO Driss Benhima.	0

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, June 26, 2013 4:20 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: May 2013 Events Bulletin
Attachments: ER_MayEventsBulletin.docx

Dear Team,
Below please find the May 2013 MAC Events Bulletin. Our team compiles a monthly list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

May Events Bulletin

May 20

How Arab Public Opinion is Reshaping the Middle East

May 21

The Growing Crisis in Africa's Sahel Region

May 22

The Middle East & North Africa FYI 2014 Budget: Priorities and Challenges

May 22

Perilous Desert: Security Challenges in the Sahara and Sahel

How Arab Public Opinion is Reshaping the Middle East

Date: May 20, 2013

1. Title: How Arab Public Opinion is Reshaping the Middle East

Hosted by Brookings Institution Saban Center

Participants:

Martin Indyk: Vice President and Director of Foreign Policy, Brookings

Shibley Telhami: Nonresident Senior Fellow, Brookings

Kim Ghattas: State Department Correspondent, BBC News

2. Overview

Shibley Telhami has recently published a book with roughly ten years of polling data from Egypt, Saudi Arabia, the UAE, Jordan, Lebanon, and Morocco. Despite the claims of the event's title, the talk mostly consisted of one point: how, as indicated by the data, do Arabs identify themselves? Related to this question is the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Kim Ghattas was there theoretically to question Telhami, but ended up adding an interesting dimension to his work, that of dignity.

3. Summary

Dr. Telhami summarized his key points and primarily covered one chapter of his new book, "Arab Identities," but also promised to return to a couple of related topics, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and Al Jazeera. Essentially, for Telhami the question for Westerners interested in the Middle East is not "Why do they hate us?" but "How do they see themselves?" Telhami believes that the central issue is foreign policy. To support this argument, he offered three points of evidence, namely:

1. There are no new demographic or economic problems that serve to explain the Arab Spring. Telhami believes it is due to a feeling of Arab governments either being impotent or collaborators, vis-à-vis Israel, the US, and the West in general.
2. Using one of his poll questions, "who is the world leader you most admire?" Popular answers included Jacques Chirac in 2003, when he treated Arafat as a foreign dignitary, Hassan Nasrallah in 2006, and Hugo Chavez in 2009. Following the Arab Spring a common answer was Recep Erdogan. What these individuals have in common is a real or perceived ability and record of standing up to the West, or in the case of Chirac a perception of siding with the Arabs.
3. Finally, Telhami indicated that in general, most of the people he polled self-identify as Arabs or Muslims more than Egyptians, Jordanians, etc. He sees this as a decline of identification with the state and a corresponding trans-national identification with ethnicity or religion. Cited as evidence were the increased consumption of transnational media and a widespread belief that the primary duty of Arab governments is to work to benefit all Arabs rather than solely their citizens.

Ghattas then added some context, in the form of asking Telhami if the question is not one exclusively of attitudes towards foreign policy, but the more basic question of human dignity. Indyk supported this question, by asking Telhami to explain how the Palestinian issue relates, and if it is emblematic of, an Arab lack of dignity. On this question, Telhami indicated Turkey, which, while not Arab, is acting from a position of power and has still made the Palestinian conflict a priority. He further clarified that the Palestinian conflict is a collective experience of humiliation ingrained in Arab history. Unsurprisingly, Ghattas disagreed, claiming that more often repressive governments use the Israeli issue to distract from real domestic problems, while admitting that an anti-Israel attitude has been ingrained in the minds of most Arabs.

Indyk then asked if the Sunni-Shi'a divide affected Arab identity, to which Telhami responded in the positive, citing the preferred news sources of various Lebanese sects. He clarified, however, that confession is not always the defining factor, stating that in Egypt (Sunni), 90% are pro-Syrian rebels (Sunni), but only 60% pro-Bahraini rebels (Shia). In both cases a majority side with the rebels, but confessional alignment skews the level of support.

There was then a brief discussion of how leaders manipulate the historical narrative to suit their own purposes and the empowering nature of the internet.

4. Q & A

Q: (Tamam Harazi Syrian Journalist) Assad said he was on the right side of the Israeli-Palestinian conference. I have seen people on Facebook congratulating Israel for carrying out airstrikes on Syria.

A: (Telhami) We are measuring majorities, obviously significant minorities may feel differently about Israel or Iran. (Ghattas) In Lebanon in 2006 Hezbollah welcomed Israeli action at first, but later changed their minds believing Israel went too far. In Syria in 2007 there were small acts of rebellion, prior to the civil war. Finally, for a dictator, nostalgia for the past is not a beneficial policy.

Q: (Jay Roddy, Arabic-English Translator) Is there any divergence of data between successful revolutions and failed demonstrations?

A: (Telhami) The only post-revolution country I covered was Egypt, where there was little change in attitudes, except for a slight increase in identification with the state.

Q: (Tom Sullivan, MA student) On the topic of Saddam Hussein selling the invasion of Kuwait, did he manipulate the historical narrative?

A: (Telhami) Saddam did manipulate it. I had access to the "Hussein tapes," like the "Nixon tapes," and what is surprising is Hussein made identical public and private statements, so they were not made only for public consumption, but also he actually believed these things, or at least wanted his private staff to think so.

Q: (Elana Farsah, Arab-Palestinian-American) The government is not respecting Palestine, and Kerry is with the EU negotiating not to label products of settlement origin as such, and Erdogan was not to go to Gaza?

A: (Telhami) John Kerry understands the importance of the Israeli-Palestinian problem, though he may not be going about it in the best way, which, by the way, Israeli public opinion matches Palestinian public opinion on this issue. The biggest factor is that people no longer believe; the majority of people on both sides have no trust in the two-state solution.

Q: (Indyk) On the Al Jazeera phenomenon, is it falling in popularity?

A: (Telhami): There's nothing in the polls to suggest this, though it is certainly anecdotally true, for two reasons. First, you can't decouple Al Jazeera from Qatar. In the past Qatar was a minor player, but today it is a relevant foreign policy player, and people realize that. Second, Al Jazeera is still the boldest news source. They have the most resources and deep pockets. The biggest threat to Al Jazeera is from the internet. In 2000, people's first choice for a news source was TV, but now, a significant minority says the internet.

(Ghattas) Al Jazeera was ahead in the Egyptian uprising, but there are different countries. Al Jazeera is seen as the sponsor of some, but not other revolutions. For example it is seen as being favorable to the Syrian rebels, but not to the Bahraini. Now, Lebanese who are pro-Hezbollah can't watch Al Jazeera! It's the wrong channel! Also the region is not monolithic, and people can have different opinions.

5. Observations

Roughly 100 people were in attendance, including an Arab League Ambassador. By my count, the word "Morocco" was used three times. However, the country is one of six used for sampling in Telhami's book, so it may be worthwhile to obtain a copy and see his arguments and conclusions vis-à-vis Morocco.

Audio of the event as well as a complete transcript are available here:

<http://www.brookings.edu/events/2013/05/21-arab-public-opinion>

\(Back to top\)

The Growing Crisis in Africa's Sahel Region

Date: May 21, 2013

1. Title: The Growing Crisis in Africa's Sahel Region

Hosted by the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, Global Human Rights, and International Organizations, the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Terrorism, Nonproliferation, and Trade, and the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on the Middle East and North Africa

Participants:

Panel 1

Donald Yamamoto: Acting Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of African Affairs

Nancy Lindborg: Assistant Administrator, Bureau for Democracy, Conflict and Humanitarian Assistance, USAID

-

Panel 2

Rudolph Atallah: Senior Fellow, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, Atlantic Council

Mima Nedelcovych: Partner, Schaffer Global Group

Nii Akuetteh: Independent Policy Analyst

2. Overview

This event had five speakers split over two panels. The first panel included members of the current administration discussing what the government is doing to address the crisis in Mali and what the government should do going forward to facilitate reconstruction. The second panel included speakers from think tanks and the private sector. Atallah spoke about how the US may address the security crisis in the region. Nedelcovych spoke about how private industry may support development in the region. Akuetteh spoke from an African perspective on how the US should play a key role in supporting the region's reconstruction.

3. Summary

Panel 1

Yamamoto began by noting the developmental difficulties that the countries of the region face. The 80 million people of the Sahel live in some of the poorest countries on earth and routinely rank amongst the lowest on the human development scale. This was exacerbated by the security vacuum left by the crises in Libya and Mali. The US been working in tandem with countries in the region as well as with regional organizations in order to address these myriad problems and help ensure the region's security capabilities. The primary vehicle in this effort has been the Trans-Sahel Counter Terrorism Partnership (TSCTP). He then explained the important roles that Sahel countries have played in supporting both the French and African (AFISMA) interventions in Mali. To that end, the US is providing $96 million to support AFISMA countries contributing troops and police, such as Niger and Burkina Faso. However, this military aid will mean little if we fail to address the longstanding political and economic issues (such as poor governance, weak democratic institutions, and lack of development and economic opportunities) that both contribute to and are exacerbated by these security crises. While these challenges are daunting, we have seen some progress in the region, in countries such as Niger, which has made "remarkable political and economic reforms" since its 2010 coup, and Mali, which is heading towards free and democratic elections and has created a Malian peace and reconciliation committee.

Lindborg began by mentioning the Brussels conference that she and Yamamoto had attended the previous week, where 80 nations had come together to show their support (both figurative and monetary) for Mali. At the conference, the Malian president commended the international community for their continued support in rebuilding Mali. Lindborg reaffirmed Yamamoto's statement that the complex network of issues, including poor governance, poverty, and humanitarian crises have left the region especially vulnerable, and that we need to address the root causes of this vulnerability if we are to ensure security in the region and lift its population out of their perpetual state of poverty. USAID is tackling these issues in four ways: (1) continued humanitarian assistance, (2) building resilience to reduce chronic crisis that results from chronic poverty, (3) improving governance, particularly establishing legitimacy of new governments, and (4) countering violent extremism. She concluded by emphasizing that the development of strong, legitimate governments will be at the heart of countering extremism and protecting development gains.

Panel 2

Atallah began by addressing the new threat of suicide bombing in Mali, a phenomenon that has never before seen in the Sahel and is indicative of an escalation of AQIM jihadist activity; he fears that this escalation will follow a pattern set by Boko Haram in Nigeria. The root causes of extremist violence in this region are complex, and understanding why extremism has taken root in the Sahel requires a thorough analysis of the principal regional issues that precipitated the Mali crisis. Atallah underscored two such issues: first, militants linked to al-Qaeda who had been repressed under authoritarian regimes, largely from countries such as Syria, Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Algeria, have experienced newfound freedom of movement since the start of the Arab Spring. AQIM's message has also been bolstered by Western intervention in Mali. Second, Mali's delicate security situation was stressed by the confluence of marginalized peoples into remote border regions. Extremist groups are attractive to such marginalized groups. Atallah then specifically noted Morocco, in contrast to Mali, as a model in the region for reform, progress, and security, noting its counterterrorism infrastructure that has both reactive and preventative components (the preventative components being the 2011 constitutional reforms - improvement of education, human rights, and the inclusion of the Amazigh population). He concluded by giving three recommendations for resolving the Mali crisis: (1) Bring USAID back into northern Mali, such that we may work to stamp out the poverty that fuels extremism in the so-called "Arc of Instability;" (2) Assist the countries of the Sahel to address their porous borders; and (3) Counter AQIM's ubiquitous media presence, especially in new social media such as Twitter.

Nedelcovych addressed the issue from a business perspective. He represents the Schaffer Group, which is an agroindustry company that has undertaken several partnerships in Africa to strengthen the farming industry in the region. Most recently, Schaffer has been working on a major project in Niger and Mali. The Group has always made a point of bringing small farmers into the company's investment scheme in order to promote the kind of resilience that Lindborg mentioned in her testimony. He mentioned Maslow's hierarchy of needs: if a society cannot meet its most basic needs (food, water, shelter), then extremism may flourish. This is where American businesses can step in to play their role in solving the Mali crisis - investing in the region to build up agricultural infrastructure and support local farmers (agroindustry has a particular role to play in this crisis because this industry employs people in high poverty areas). However, a base level of security is needed for American investors to take this risk.

Akuetteh's first point was that the crisis in the Sahel is difficult to address partially because it covers such a large area; he suggested that we make this area a bit larger by adding the Western Sahara to our definition of "Sahel," because the crisis in Western Sahara is spilling over into Mali. This is a large area with myriad stressors, and this has serious implications for US interests.. The US is likewise uniquely qualified to help the countries of this region address these myriad stressors. US interests in the area have really picked up since 9/11, and this is the basis of his first recommendation: the US needs to undergo a serious review of its strategy in the region now, over a decade after 9/11, particularly since there is escalating extremism in the region. His second recommendation was that we must "push hard on democracy" in the region, because inclusive, democratic governance is crucial to fighting home-grown terrorism. His third recommendation is that the US pay special attention to Mali (as it appears to be the epicenter of violence in the region), but not in terms of military support. The US should be a leader in supporting Mali in two areas. First, the US must help to facilitate free and open elections in Mali and help craft a contingency plan in the event that the July elections fail (he is not especially optimistic about the upcoming elections, following recent events in Côte d'Ivoire and Kenya). Second, the US must help to facilitate Mali's reconstruction, particularly in regards to the reconciliation between Bamako and the marginalized populations of the North.

4. Q & A

Panel 1

Q: (Representative Chris Smith, R-NJ) Can the Malian elections reasonably be held in July and be free, fair, and inclusive? Also, infectious diseases flourish in political crises and compound them. Ms. Lindborg, can you speak to how we plan to handle the Malaria crisis in the Sahel?

A: (Lindborg) For the elections, we are working closely with our international partners and with the Malians, taking on a support role in a reconciliation approach. We are also providing support to the UNDP and UNHCR in their handling of the mechanics of the upcoming elections. While we have not yet solved all of the structural issues in Mali that could impede free and fair elections, it is imperative that we hold these elections so that they can begin to rebuild democratic institutions. With respect to the malaria crisis, as part of USAID's resilience agenda, it has put together a cross-sector approach that will address all aspects of the spread of infectious diseases, including programs in disease prevention, family planning, and food distribution.

Q: (Smith) Was the Brussels conference a success?

A: (Lindborg) Yes, it was a success in that it managed to raise money for the Malian crisis and keep the crisis the center of attention in the international community.

Q: (Smith) Has the Pan-Sahel Initiative worked? Has the coordination thereof improved?

A: (Yamamoto) Yes, I would say so, in terms of both US involvement and cooperation from other African countries. The Initiative's handling of the Malian crisis will be crucial, both because it will prove the effectiveness of African cooperation in handling security crises and because the Mali crisis appears to be the lynchpin of all of the other Sahel crises that we must handle.

Q: (Representative Karen Bass, D-CA) Can you briefly discuss the role of AFRICOM in Mali?

A: (Yamamoto) In Mali, AFRICOM has played a key support role to the French and African interventions, providing such services as refueling French aircraft and giving strategic assistance to other African countries involved in the intervention.

Q: (Bass) Describe the character of the Brussels conference and what new information it brought to light that can help us. Also, how much money did the US pledge to this cause?

A: (Lindborg) We announced a $32 million pledge for humanitarian assistance, specifically for refugees. We have already pledged $550 billion in assistance over the entire region.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber, R-TX) Can we identify countries in the Sahel who are US-friendly? That is, who share our democratic, free-market values and do not pose the threat of radical Islamism, so that we can streamline our decisions about to whom we give aid money?

A: (Lindborg) Our humanitarian assistance program is entirely need-based, and is not influenced by the politics of the states that receive aid. Our development assistance program is about supporting democracies, and there are myriad different governments that receive this aid. Currently, the development assistance program operates primarily in Senegal; we did have a project in Mali, before it destabilized, and we are beginning to expand projects in Niger, Burkina Faso, Nigeria, and Mauritania.

Q: (Weber) Where will we be providing assistance next?

A: (Lindborg) It is impossible to tell; the Sahel is chronically underdeveloped. We need to expand our aid partnership with foreign allies, particularly the EU.

(Yamamoto) It is also important that we continue to coordinate with other regional organizations and the Sahel diaspora community.

Q: (Representative Tom Cotton, R-AR) I was surprised by Mali falling apart. We had previously considered it the greatest democratic success in the Sahel. Was it actually a strong democracy before this crisis began? If not, what did we miss in our assessment of Malian democracy? How does that bear on our assessments of other countries?

A: (Yamamoto) The key issue here is fragility. Mali was a very democratic country, but its democratic institutions were fragile. What we're trying to do is give aid in order to stabilize it, address the humanitarian crisis and extremism, and promote dialog between the north and Bamako.

(Lindborg) Any time that you have marginalized populations, such as the Tuareg in northern Mali, you are setting the stage for unrest.

Q: (Representative Paul Cook, R-CA) What is the glue that will hold some confederation of African states together? How can we help?

A: (Yamamoto) Every day we have a tremendous impact. One form in which we can bring the African states together is by honoring the AU as a regional governing body; to this end, we have nominated an ambassador to the AU. For smaller regional groups, such as ECOWAS, we can help them face challenges on their own, continue to promote good will, and set an example for good governance.

(Lindborg) Progress is possible, but it will take time. We need to help countries, communities, the private sector, and regional NGOs feel that they have a stake in their own future; people need to feel included in that future and understand the support we have for them.

Q: (Smith) In reference to this inclusion, are we including faith-based groups? Also, what is the unmet need for refugees and internally displaced persons?

A: (Lindborg) Faith-based groups are important because they have been there since the beginning. Also, we can use them to leverage the generosity of the public. As for the refugee issue, the UN has appealed for $410 million for Malian refugees, of which we have pledged $180 million.

Panel 2

Q: (Smith) Are you concerned about the July elections in Mali? Please elaborate.

A: (Akuetteh) Don't get me wrong, there is a real need for elections; properly run elections can ameliorate a number of other destabilizing issues in the country, such as ethnic divisions and the influence of the MNLA. However, it is critical that we make sure that we do this right. One key issue is registering people to vote - I am nervous about our ability to register refugees and IDPs, who must have a voice in these elections, before July. We need to come up with a contingency plan, in the likely event that something will go wrong.

(Nedelcovych) We need to have elections now; we cannot wait until we are sure that we can hold perfect elections, because that may never happen, and putting the elections on hold also means putting private investment on hold. Putting investment on hold would have devastating effects on Malian development.

(Atallah) I agree that we should push elections, but first it is critical that we address the local grievances that precipitated the beginning of the crisis. If we force the election without addressing these grievances, it will just be another failed election.

Q: (Smith) Why are American companies so reluctant to invest in Africa?

A: (Nedelcovych) The key issue in this reluctance is uncertainty. However, I think it is misplaced. Many of the reactions to investment throughout the rest of Africa are very positive; real business deals are happening.

Q: (Smith) Elaborate on the burden Malian refugees place on border countries, and how they may be repatriated.

A: (Akuetteh) Mali's neighbors are also at risk of implosion, and refugees stress them more. The US has been doing a good job in alleviating this issue through humanitarian assistance, but there is more work to be done. On another note, Africans want to know why there is not more US investment in Africa. China has been heavily investing in the continent; why is it that you can't upstage the Chinese? The US has far more positive assets for investment, such as a large African diaspora community, democracy, and free-market capitalism. The US should have a much bigger private sector presence on the continent.

Q: (Smith) How did we underestimate AQIM?

A: (Atallah) This issue has been festering for two decades. AQIM is a threat in that it subsumes and enhances regional extremist groups and is operating all across the Sahel and North Africa. We cannot quantify AQIM, and that would be irrelevant; the issue is that they always bring more people into the fold. We have to begin to address this issue before what is happening in the Sahel begins to happen in North Africa.

Q: (Bass) Is there a degree of coordination between the different factions of AQIM?

A: (Atallah) It depends on where and how we define it, but yes, there is basically coordination between the factions of AQIM. However, we do not know much about these links because we do not know much about the region. What we do know is this: AQIM has become the wealthiest branch of al-Qaeda. Many smaller extremist groups join them not because of ideological agreement, but because of financial necessity. We need to stop enabling AQIM by paying ransom for the hostages they take, which has become one of their main sources of funding.

Q: (Bass) Tell us more about the issue of drug trafficking in the Sahel. How can countries in the region best counter it?

A: (Akuetteh) Well, Kofi Annan has taken a step in the right direction by creating a West African committee on drugs. There are three big issues here that both perpetuate the drug trade and are exacerbated by it: corruption, the contamination of democracy, and health problems created by drug consumption. In order to truly break free of the drug trade, we are going to need international assistance.

Q: (Smith) What constructive criticism can you give us? And Mr. Atallah, can you elaborate upon your recommendations?

A: (Atallah) We aren't taking enough steps to facilitate AFRICOM. Also, USAID can be doing a lot more in the Sahel to facilitate its development and aid marginalized populations. As for my three recommendations: 1) We have no radar coverage in this strip of the Sahara. This is a problem; 2) Movements across the Sahara cannot be controlled because of the tough terrain; 3) AQIM is technologically savvy, and is using social media to its advantage. It has an audience, and we have to counter its message.

(Nedelcovych) We need to ask ourselves: Are we addressing the illness, or just the symptoms? Our current strategy of simply going after terrorists is like playing whack-a-mole; what we need to do is address the root issues of instability, such as poverty, hunger, and disease.

(Akuetteh) The US needs to make it clear that we are going to help Mali; we need to play a bigger role in Malian development. Also, I have to reiterate that we must come up with a contingency plan should the Malian elections become problematic, and we need to more thoroughly review what went wrong with Mali.

5. Observations

This hearing was, as most seem to be, not especially well attended. All in all, the second panel was of far more interest to MAC than the first, partially because it is easier for MAC to speak to/partner with members of the private sector, and partially because there were so many mentions of issues directly relating to Morocco. It would be worthwhile for MATIC to form a relationship with Nedelcovych; it could present Morocco's recent investment in wind and solar energy technology as a complement to his focus on agro industry. Akuetteh could also be a good person for MAC to approach because of his impressive credentials in Africa analysis and his recognition of the issue of Sahrawi extremism spilling over into the surrounding area. The most important person for MAC to form a relationship with is Atallah because of his ringing endorsement of Morocco's anti-terror strategy and constitutional reforms.

\(Back to top\)

The Middle East & North Africa FY 2014 Budget: Priorities and Challenges

Date: May 22, 2013

1. Title: The Middle East & North Africa FY 2014 Budget: Priorities and Challenges

Hosted by the Subcommittee on the Middle East and North Africa, House Committee on Foreign Affairs

Participants:Congressman Doug Collins (R-GA)*Congressman Ted Deutch (D-FL)*Congressman Ted Yoho (R-FL)*Congressman Gerald Connolly (D-VA)*Congressman Randy Weber (R-TX)*Ambassador Elizabeth Jones: Acting Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs, US Department of StateAlina Romanowski: Acting Assistant Administrator, Bureau for the Middle East, USAID2. Overview

The hearing provided an overview of allocations for State Department and USAID Middle East and North Africa programming budgets for the coming fiscal year (2014). The speakers presented their requests for budget allocations for new programming initiatives in the MENA region, including democratic initiatives, education reform, humanitarian aid, and security.

3. Summary

Ambassador Jones highlighted the tectonic nature of the political, social, and economic changes occurring in the Middle East and North Africa, which included developments in human rights, pluralism, and participation. The goal of State Department involvement in the region is to protect US interests, namely: protecting the security of Israel, promoting peace initiatives in the Middle East, tracking the Iranian defense systems, supporting the Syrian people in conflict, and ensuring the security of US diplomats and foreign workers.

The State Department requested funding to advance and protect US interests in the region and insists that US engagement in the region is vital to the global political climate. The State Department requests $7.36 billion to be distributed among regional programs; however, four major areas of funding allocation were highlighted:

1. Israel: Aid to Israel will be designated as military assistance to support US troops stationed there as well as aid in counter-terrorism efforts. A portion of the aid will also be allocated to Palestine for building cooperative partnerships with the Palestinian government and in pursuance of a mutually beneficial and peaceful transition to the two-state solution.
2. Egypt: Financial aid to Egypt will be designated to economic reform, investments, and strategy as well as military and security assistance to maintain strategic cooperative relations with Egypt in order to sustain access to strategic locations such as the Suez Canal.
3. MENA Incentive Fund: The MENA Incentive Fund is a $580 million project with the goal of incentivizing governments to initiate political, economic, social, and institutional reform with the hope of future democratization. The financial assistance will incentivize governments to create reform initiatives to benefit the whole of society including educational reform, pluralism, and security, among others.
4. Syria: Financial assistance will be provided to Syria in two manners: for humanitarian aid for displaced citizens and refugees, as well as to generate domestic investment and inclusive reform for the nation in transition. By proxy, these investments will also help to weaken Iranian influence in the region and aid in removing/weakening terrorist organizations.

Alina Romanowski requested $1.2 billion in USAID funding to support a region in democratic transition dedicated to programs for: constitution building, elections, inclusive investments to generate growth, civil society reconstruction, and to increase political participation. Romanowski highlighted five priority areas:

1. Syria: There are over a million refugees outside of Syria, mainly in Jordan; the priority for Syria domestically is humanitarian aid for civilians. In Jordan, priority lies in providing financial assistance to help refugees safely return to their nation of origin.
2. Egypt: USAID initiatives in Egypt are to help Egyptians invest back into the domestic economy through the restructuring of education, increased job support, and reform of citizen rights. Through the Egyptian-American Enterprise Fund, USAID will initiate the Egyptian Higher Education Initiative to raise higher education graduation rates and create more jobs.

3. Tunisia: USAID plans to assist in economic as well as political reform in Tunisia which includes workforce development, increased transparency of government proceedings, educational development, and human rights initiatives.
4. Yemen: Financial assistance in Yemen will prioritize constitutional review, facilitate elections, voter registry reform, healthcare reform, and restructure the educational system to be more inclusive, particularly for young girls.
5. Palestine: Financial assistance in Palestine is targeted toward democratic initiatives and increased international cooperation and relations with neighboring countries.

4. Q & A

Q: (Congressman Deutch) What conditions has the State Department put on foreign aid to Egypt?

A: (Jones) Due to Egypt's strategic location/position in the region, foreign military funding to the Egyptian military helps assure security in the region and provides benefits such as access to borders, Suez Canal access, etc. Assistance to support Egypt's transition to democracy also gives the US access to promote democratic values such as free speech, freedom of religion, participation, etc.

Q: (Congressman Deutch) Where is Egypt's "red line"—meaning, where is the point where US funding is no longer effective in rebuilding the state and we must withdraw our efforts?

A: (Jones) US engagement in Egypt is the most important strategy to continue democratic support in this time of transition.

Q: (Congressman Weber) What is the US' role in raising awareness about human rights violations in Iran?

A: (Jones) The US has been providing assistance to Iranian internet companies to circumvent Iranian restrictions to provide more access for the Iranian people to gain information. Strategies such as these are imperative in helping Iranian civil society to increase the space for which they have to operate.

Q: (Congressman Connolly) How can Congress increase help in the humanitarian crisis in Syria?

A: (Romanowski) Financial assistance in Syria is targeted at creating jobs for the Syrian workforce by providing funds to build schools, hospitals, etc. and then employing Syrians to build them and work in them.

Q: (Congressman Yoho) What are we doing differently in the Middle East (than before)?

A: (Jones) The State Department is providing two different kinds of assistance. The first is the MENA Incentive Fund which works with governments to incentivize them to promote and encourage democratic reform and work on the tools needed for democracy such as rule of law, weapon abatement, election and voter reform, etc. The second facet in which the State Department is involved is in civil society—training people and providing resources for groups to engage in political and public life.

(Romanowski) USAID's goal is to draw on the private sector by encouraging investment domestically and building on small and medium enterprises. For example, the Egyptian higher Education Enterprise, which will bring the private sector into the process of education reform.

5. Observations

The hearing brought to light several advantages and disadvantages to US financial assistance in the Middle East and North Africa. Firstly, it is clear that the US' strategic interests to promote democracy, protect security of Israel, and keep Iranian influence at bay is greatly aided by the State Department and USAID's financial assistance and humanitarian assistance. US foreign aid is also advantageous to the emergence of civil society and greater political participation in the region—both Jones and Romanowski pointed out various initiatives to promote pluralism, freedom of speech and religion, education reform, and, especially, constitutional reform. This could present the opportunity for MAC to highlight the independent reform initiatives that Morocco has facilitated such as constitutional reform, increased public openness and government transparency, human rights development, and greater participation. Though Morocco was not mentioned in the proceedings, the MENA Incentive Fund was expressed as an inclusive initiative to incentivize government leaders to promote and encourage democracy politically, socially, and economically in the region. Secondly, the Members of Congress in attendance seemed skeptical of providing additional funding to programs that had not succeeded in the past. Ambassador Jones and Ms. Romanowski spent a good portion of the hearing defending their requests—claiming that the new strategy of providing the plan, structure, and resources for reform will be incentives for governments to implement the reform.

For a video of the hearing, please visit:

<http://foreignaffairs.house.gov/hearing/subcommittee-hearing-middle-east-and-north-africa-fy-2014-budget-priorities-and-challenges>

\(Back to top\)

Perilous Desert: Security Challenges in the Sahara and Sahel

Date: May 22, 2013

1. Title: Perilous Desert: Security Challenges in the Sahara and Sahel

Hosted by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Participants:

Panel 1: Libya

Frederic Wehrey: Carnegie Endowment

Christopher Chivvis: RAND Corporation

Peter Cole: Small Arms Survey/United Nations

Anouar Boukhars: Moderator: Carnegie Endowment

Panel 2: Mali

Roland Marchal: CNRS

Bruce Whitehouse: Lehigh University

Gilles Yabi: International Crisis Group

Anouar Boukhars: Moderator: Carnegie Endowment

Panel 3: Regional Dynamics

Wolfram Lacher: Stifun Wissenschaft und Politik

Christophe Boutin: Observatoire d'Etudes Geopolitiques

Rudolph Atallah: Atlantic Council

Sarah Chayes: Moderator: Carnegie Endowment

Panel 4: Algeria

Geoff Porter: North Africa Risk Consulting, Inc.

Anouar Boukhars: Carnegie Endowment

Mohammed el-Katiri: The Hague Institute

Frederic Wehrey: Moderator: Carnegie Endowment

2. Overview

While the world's attention was fixed on the momentous events in Tunisia, Egypt, and Libya after the outbreak of the Arab Awakening, the states to the south were undergoing their own transformations with major global implications. Long overlooked by policymakers and scholars, the broader Sahara region has always been underappreciated for its geopolitical significance. Changes over the last two years mean that it is no longer possible to treat the region as a backwater since what happens there affects the Arab World, sub-Saharan Africa, and Southern Europe. In addition, the region is increasingly the source of transnational threats such as terrorism, trafficking, and migration flows. To explore regional sources of instability and what can be done to minimize the threat of simmering conflicts, Carnegie gathered top experts from the United States, Europe, and the region at an all-day conference to mark the launch of the new book Perilous Desert: Insecurity in the Sahara. The conference was held under Chatham House Rule.

3. Summary

Panel 1: Libya

Frederic Wehrey discussed the current political crisis in Libya, describing the situation as dire. The country faces a catch 22 – it needs reconciliation to reform the security sector, but it needs security sector reform for reconciliation. A dilemma that has complicated the situation further is that political groups have allied with armed groups on common aims.

Peter Cole addressed regional border security, arguing that it is managed through personal and family networks that circumvent official institutions. New security apparatus are emerging as new groups emerge and other groups fragment. This is the case for both personal and institutional groups alike – official border security is deeply fragmented and the state has no capacity to enforce border security.

Christopher Chivvis put the international approach to Libya in perspective. He noted that the international community was responsible for the military intervention but left the post-conflict reconstruction to the state. Why? There was no western funding available for it, the security situation seemed okay, and the Libyans themselves preferred it that way. That decision has obviously not worked as evident by the current mess in Libya. So the US and the international community now need to make a policy choice about what the international approach to Libya should be. Options include containment and dealing with the consequence or an assertive role to help mitigate the country's descent toward violence. Chivvis advocated the latter, arguing that progress on all other fronts will be difficult without security and that if there isn't an assertive role, it is possible that a redeployment of NATO or a UN peacekeeping mission will be required in the future.

Panel 2: Mali

– Bruce Whitehouse debunked the myth that Mali was a model democracy before the coup. Yes, it has made progress since 1991 in establishing a vibrant press and free media, decentralizing politically, promoting economic growth, and making key social advances, including increased school enrollment, infrastructure, and government services. Behind the good governance myth, however, was continued corruption and impunity, massive land expropriation, and increased mistrust in law enforcement and the justice system, and declining voter participation – the lowest in West Africa from 1992-2007.

Marchal explored the current security threat in Mali. He argued that Gao represents the most serious threat, largely due to the presence of MUJAO, which transformed itself from a drug trafficking katiba to a smart political actor over the past year. MUJAO took advantage of the Tuareg and social hierarchies in Mali, recruiting from captive lineages and among the youth in order to expand its ranks. It also used coercion. The French intervention interrupted some of MUJAO's activities, but did not address many of Mali's underlying issues and thus Marchal argued that withdrawal will be difficult in the near term.

Yabi addressed some of these underlying issues, namely the continued fragmentation of society and the lack of political leadership in Bamako, and proposed several solutions. Most importantly, addressing crisis in Mali requires regional cooperation. For reconciliation to occur, Mali needs to address the root causes of the rebellion and the coup, the emergence of extremist groups, and the consequences of those three elements. The problem is the result of a combination of a weak Malian state and a complicated regional environment. External realities certainly played a role rendering regional cooperation all the more important. The most important of these external factors were extremist groups and drug trafficking groups. AQIM's arrival in the north of Mali from Algeria certainly altered the dynamics, as did the arrival of cocaine trafficking, which Yabi argued changed the stakes financially and otherwise. To address these two critical issues, Mali's neighbors need to get involved; Mali isn't just a Malian problem and doesn't just require a Malian solution.

Panel 3: Regional Dynamics

– Wolfram Lacher discussed Sahel-Saharan security dynamics. He underscored the development of non-state actors operating in the region, the vast increase and importance of smuggling (notably Moroccan hash, Algerian subsidized products, and Libyan weapons, among others), and the movement of both AQIM and Tuareg fighters as the principle drivers of instability and insecurity in the region. He also pinpointed the Western interventions in Libya and Mali as having regional security repercussions, namely in the dissemination of jihadi activity. Lacher noted that fighters from Libya, the Western Sahara, Mauritania, and Algeria are all moving throughout the region, in some instances heading home when their countries have become safe havens themselves. He cited Libya as the epicenter of regional insecurity, but continued to stress smuggling as one of the most, if not the most, important drivers of conflict, particularly in Libya, Mali, and Niger. Smuggling is the key to the economy of conflict and is financing armed groups and fueling rivalries. Whatever success the French intervention in Mali had in disrupting terrorism, it hasn't disrupted smuggling networks meaning that that driver of insecurity is ever present. Overcoming these challenges requires an overall political approach to communities in the border areas, where these issues – and insecurity – are most prevalent.

Rudolph Atallah addressed the security threat in Tunisia, noting that the spread of AQIM-affiliated groups in the country and the rise of extremism has the potential to create a far bigger threat than in Libya if things go wrong. It is not clear at this point which way the security situation there is headed, but Tunisia has a bigger population and thus the potential threat is far greater. Atallah also briefly discussed the French intervention in Mali, arguing that it stopped the Islamists from moving south and also forced the international community to address the problem. However, it only forced a tactical withdrawal, not a strategic defeat for AQIM, which is still in the country.

Christophe Boutin spoke largely about the Western Sahara. He cited the UN report that noted the risk of a spillover of the Mali crisis into the Western Sahara and referenced French press citations of recruitment in the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf and Polisario-member involvement in terrorism with MUJAO in Northern Mali. He termed the Polisario's response to these allegations as "le démenti clair du Polisario (the clear denial of the Polisario)." Boutin stressed that the camps are insecure and that the broader area east of the berm was insecure as well. Only 20% of the area controlled by the Polisario east of the berm is actually controlled by the Polisario. As a result of this insecurity (and in fact exemplary of it), MINURSO has cancelled night patrols and patrols to the Mauritanian border are always accompanied by the Polisario. Boutin also stressed that the camps are a target for terrorism and trafficking in the region and that youth in the camps are a particular target. Boutin closed by quoting the UN report that argued that insecurity in the region reiterated the urgency of resolve the Western Sahara crisis. He called for a solution based on Morocco's autonomy plan, as Morocco has shown great leadership in counterterrorism cooperation, promoting a moderate version of Islam, and implementing reform under the leadership of King Mohammed VI.

Panel 4: Algeria

Frederic Wehrey opened by citing Algeria's important, albeit complex role in the region, noting that it has been called many things – "reluctant hegemon," "paranoid neighbor," and "indispensable power." The panel addressed some of those labels, assessing internal Algerian politics and Algeria's role in regional dynamics.

Geoff Porter argued that Algeria was at a turning point politically, with Bouteflika recovering from a health scare, an ongoing reform process, and a question of succession generating a lot of international attention. In spite of renewed attention to the country, Porter argued that western perceptions of Algerian politics are nevertheless wrong and sought to explain why that was the case. He caveated it by stressing that he doesn't know how Algerian politics works these days. The most important of these false perceptions is the concept of "le pouvoir" that is a term widely used by western analysts. What does this mean? It is used to refer to the political, military, and commercial elite, in addition to the DRS, to which the counterweight is Bouteflika's clan. There are a few issues with this. First, many of the military elite are retired or dead. Second, the mystique of the DRS has become infectious – is it really still omnipotent? Porter pointed to the In Amenas incident as raising questions about its omnipotence. With regard to Bouteflika's clan, many left and their replacements are not from Bouteflika's traditional center of power in Oran and the West. Porter thus argued that this term and these categories don't reflect realities on the ground. He also argued that there are shifting paradigms in Algeria and that current terms don't work either for "us or them." He concluded by noting that he felt a sense of excitement in Algiers about a real political transition – the country isn't befallen by anxiety about this, rather, there is a potential for a real shift toward political institutions.

Mohammed el-Katiri assessed the many challenges Algeria faces today. The most prominent of these include real protests, a generational transitional at the political level, a difficult regional environment given instability in neighboring countries, and social and economic grievances throughout the country. All of this has lead Algerians in power to question and re-align their priorities. El-Katiri argued that the government has shown resilience and capability in response to these challenges, particularly in its ability to adapt to address security threats in the region.

Anouar Boukhars presented the view of Algeria from the Sahel, namely perceptions of Algeria that he witnessed in Mali, Mauritania, and Niger. He found common perceptions that there is a need to harmonize regional views to promote peace and stability, which is challenged by fragmentation in Tunisia and Libya, transition in Algeria, distrust between Morocco and Algeria, and the weakness of states in the Sahel. Likewise, people agreed that Algeria's role in promoting peace is crucial and influential, given its army and equipment, its counterterrorism experience, its leadership in counterterrorism initiatives and the US counterterrorism structure in the Sahel. Neighbors nevertheless express frustration with the resources Algeria has expended to fight AQIM; its resources are applied disproportionate to its capabilities. Why is this the case? First, its policy of non-intervention; second, its distrust of foreign interference. Algeria rightly pointed out that the Libyan intervention and a NATO failure for post-conflict reconstruction led to weapons trafficking, which aided fighters in Mali. Despite these ongoing challenges, and the failure of CEMOC, the Algerian-created joint military operations center to fight regional terrorism, to propose and implement any concrete measures to help Mali, there is still a sense that Algeria is the best placed to be the region's counterterrorism leader. The US certainly remains the most supportive of Algerian leadership, while acknowledging that it could indeed do more.

4. Q & A

Panel 1: Libya

Q: (Yabi) Could you provide an assessment of the control of the southern and Algerian borders and touch on the role this plays in instability in the rest of the region?

A: (Cole) There is trafficking out of Mali for sure – of people, labor, etc. It is done by gangs and bands, not battalions.

Q: (Jamestown Foundation) Could you touch a bit more on arms trafficking in the region? Also, is there a Libyan link to terrorism in Algeria, most notably in the In Amenas attack?

A: (Cole) There was support from elements in Libya for the In Amenas – fueling and logistical support. Libya was also where the wounded terrorists were treated. It is possible that Libyan border guards were involved as well. The cross-border flows are significant. For the borders with Egypt and Tunisia, it is not on the same scale, but with Algeria, it can be measured in tons.

Q: Is there a threat to the US from AQIM? You seemed to have said no, but I disagree.

A: (Chivvis) AQIM has neither the capacity nor the desire to attack the US. That doesn't mean that won't change in the future.

Panel 2: Mali

Q: (Chayes) What was the role of the Malian state as dysfunctional and unjust in fueling radicalization? What is a substantive response to the fact that the state was unjust or is that just a pretext for radical groups?

A: (Yabi) It is both. But we need to make a distinction between radical groups and armed extremist groups. Gao had radical groups, but they weren't armed. When armed groups came from abroad, they had a ready pool of recruits. In addition, radicalization is not a passive process – there are active recruiters and entrepreneurs from the Gulf and Pakistan pushing this sort of thing. The lack of a state doesn't create radicalization, but it creates an environment that allows it to occur.

Q: (DCM, Embassy of Algeria) Why are you so pessimistic about our ability to stop narco-trafficking with the common fight against terrorism?

A: (Yabi) The number of people involved in trafficking is much higher than those involved in terrorism – it's a business and many countries not affected by terrorism are affected by trafficking. It would be a mistake to equate the two and to conflate policy toward combating them both – they are distinct and require distinct policies.

Panel 3: Regional Dynamics

Q: (Marchal) Why is the focus on Northern Mali when talking about smuggling and trafficking? Solutions need to be designed to address the problem across the region.

A: (Lacher) I don't think we have done that. The problem is different in each country and must be addressed accordingly. This is not the same historic smuggling that has been going on. The incentives and drivers shift and economic policies impact this as well.

Q: (Polisario Representative to the US) Could you please provide details on the links between Morocco and MUJAO?

A: (Boutin) Morocco is not supporting MUJAO. MUJAO is a threat to Morocco and Morocco is working to mitigate it. In Mali, it is Sahrawis that are joining MUJAO and AQIM.

Q: (Polisario Representative to US) Why are you saying that life is perfect west of the berm and that the threat is only east of the berm? Aren't there human rights issues west of the berm that are causing instability?

A: (Boutin) I didn't say that. I was merely citing the UN report that said that MINURSO has not been harassed on the West side of the berm, but that has happened on the east side. Even members of the Polisario have begun to reference the possibility of terrorist infiltration in the refugee camps.

Q: (Polisario Representative to US) You need to make a distinction between Sahrawi and Polisario.

A: (Boutin) You are right, AFP said that people were returning to the Polisario camps and the Sahrawi fighter captured in Mali was a Polisario fighter. Should we go further and distinguish them by tribe and say Rguibat?

Panel 4: Algeria

Q: (Marina Ottaway, Wilson Center) Could you clarify your point about “le pouvoir?”

A: (Porter) What I wanted to stress was that ministries are personality driven in the same way that they are in the US. They are responsive to vested interests, just like Congress is responsive to lobbyists here.

Q: (DCM, Embassy of Algeria) Algeria has institutions and a presidency and the power is in these institutions. It has also made a firm commitment to combat terrorism – setting up CEMOC?

A: (Boukhars) I don’t doubt Algeria’s commitment to combating terrorism. But CEMOC didn’t succeed. Look at Mali. Look at its request for French intervention. Where is the regional force CEMOC was designed to create? Where is the communications structure? If it succeed, if there are results, show me.

(Shouting from DCM)

(Shouting from Polisario Representative) Why do you have two Moroccans up there “diabolizing” (demonizing) Algeria?

Q: (Marchal) The assessment of DRS is a bit off – it is the only intelligence service that has allowed an armed group on its territory and not rooted it out.

A: (Boukhars) It has been effective in dealing with violent groups in Algeria – it has boxed in AQIM in the North. It is not the best, but it has been effective internally.

Q: Is too much blame being assigned to Algeria and to CEMOC?

A: (Boukhars) It needs to be bolstered, strengthened, and expanded. If CEMOC was operational, I am not saying what happened in Mali wouldn’t happen, but leadership is lacking. Likewise, I am not saying that Algeria is complicit or that it nurtures extremist groups. What I am saying is that if Algeria wants to play a leading role, it has to play that role. Algeria has the capacity to play a leadership role and with leadership comes responsibility.

(Porter) There is a policy debate going on in Algeria about changes to its foreign policy of non-intervention.

Q: (Yabi) What is your assessment of the terrorist threat in Algeria?

A: (Porter) Algeria has a problem with the enormity of its borders and the south is at risk because of the terrorist incursion into Mali. There is no threat in Algiers.

5. Observation

Approximately 75 policymakers, North Africa experts, and security specialists attended the all-day conference. The conference was important in and of itself in that it was exemplary of the increased attention being paid to the Maghreb and Sahel region, particularly among security experts. Carnegie nevertheless remains the think tank with the strongest Maghreb and Sahel focus, largely due to the work on Anouar Boukhars, but increasingly due to the work of other experts as well. The panels served as an important vehicle for disseminating information about the current security situation in four prominent Sahel countries, but there was little new information presented. The question and answer sessions thus proved more interesting, particularly as a result of continued rants courtesy of the DCM from the Embassy of Algeria, who seems to do the same thing at every event. This time he was supported in his ranting by the new representative of the Polisario Front to DC, who introduced himself to the think tank community with several shouts and interruptions contesting the vision of Western Sahara articulated by a number of the panelists during the two afternoon panels on regional dynamics and Algeria. Both Algeria and the Polisario continue to look foolish when they try to speak in public on these issues. The fact that Morocco does not do this is helpful, particularly since many of Morocco’s messages are already being articulated by the panelists. Even when they are not as positive as MAC would be in expressing them (which they often are, particularly on security), it is nevertheless better to have them coming from the panelists. That said, there is still a negative aspect of these kinds of exchanges. When Algeria and the Polisario have outbursts on the issue of the Sahara, it makes experts less likely to want to engage and discuss the subject matter, particularly in public forums. There isn’t much MAC can do about this, but it does render the personal meetings and direct engagement with think tank experts and policymakers all the more important in order to keep them apprised of developments in the conflict and the region.

\(Back to top\)

May Events Bulletin

May 20

How Arab Public Opinion is Reshaping the Middle East

May 21

The Growing Crisis in Africa's Sahel Region

May 22

The Middle East & North Africa FYI 2014 Budget: Priorities and Challenges

May 22

Perilous Desert: Security Challenges in the Sahara and Sahel

How Arab Public Opinion is Reshaping the Middle East

Date: May 20, 2013

1. Title: How Arab Public Opinion is Reshaping the Middle East

Hosted by Brookings Institution Saban Center

Participants:

Martin Indyk: Vice President and Director of Foreign Policy, Brookings

Shibley Telhami: Nonresident Senior Fellow, Brookings

Kim Ghattas: State Department Correspondent, BBC News

2. Overview

Shibley Telhami has recently published a book with roughly ten years of polling data from Egypt, Saudi Arabia, the UAE, Jordan, Lebanon, and Morocco. Despite the claims of the event's title, the talk mostly consisted of one point: how, as indicated by the data, do Arabs identify themselves? Related to this question is the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Kim Ghattas was there theoretically to question Telhami, but ended up adding an interesting dimension to his work, that of dignity.

3. Summary

Dr. Telhami summarized his key points and primarily covered one chapter of his new book, "Arab Identities," but also promised to return to a couple of related topics, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and Al Jazeera. Essentially, for Telhami the question for Westerners interested in the Middle East is not "Why do they hate us?" but "How do they see themselves?" Telhami believes that the central issue is foreign policy. To support this argument, he offered three points of evidence, namely:

1. There are no new demographic or economic problems that serve to explain the Arab Spring. Telhami believes it is due to a feeling of Arab governments either being impotent or collaborators, vis-à-vis Israel, the US, and the West in general.
2. Using one of his poll questions, "who is the world leader you most admire?" Popular answers included Jacques Chirac in 2003, when he treated Arafat as a foreign dignitary, Hassan Nasrallah in 2006, and Hugo Chavez in 2009. Following the Arab Spring a common answer was Recep Erdogan. What these individuals have in common is a real or perceived ability and record of standing up to the West, or in the case of Chirac a perception of siding with the Arabs.
3. Finally, Telhami indicated that in general, most of the people he polled self-identify as Arabs or Muslims more than Egyptians, Jordanians, etc. He sees this as a decline of identification with the state and a corresponding trans-national identification with ethnicity or religion. Cited as evidence were the increased consumption of transnational media and a widespread belief that the primary duty of Arab governments is to work to benefit all Arabs rather than solely their citizens.

Ghattas then added some context, in the form of asking Telhami if the question is not one exclusively of attitudes towards foreign policy, but the more basic question of human dignity. Indyk supported this question, by asking Telhami to explain how the Palestinian issue relates, and if it is emblematic of, an Arab lack of dignity. On this question, Telhami indicated Turkey, which, while not Arab, is acting from a position of power and has still made the Palestinian conflict a priority. He further clarified that the Palestinian conflict is a collective experience of humiliation ingrained in Arab history. Unsurprisingly, Ghattas disagreed, claiming that more often repressive governments use the Israeli issue to distract from real domestic problems, while admitting that an anti-Israel attitude has been ingrained in the minds of most Arabs.

Indyk then asked if the Sunni-Shi'a divide affected Arab identity, to which Telhami responded in the positive, citing the preferred news sources of various Lebanese sects. He clarified, however, that confession is not always the defining factor, stating that in Egypt (Sunni), 90% are pro-Syrian rebels (Sunni), but only 60% pro-Bahraini rebels (Shia). In both cases a majority side with the rebels, but confessional alignment skews the level of support.

There was then a brief discussion of how leaders manipulate the historical narrative to suit their own purposes and the empowering nature of the internet.

4. Q & A

Q: (Tamam Harazi Syrian Journalist) Assad said he was on the right side of the Israeli-Palestinian conference. I have seen people on Facebook congratulating Israel for carrying out airstrikes on Syria.

A: (Telhami) We are measuring majorities, obviously significant minorities may feel differently about Israel or Iran.

(Ghattas) In Lebanon in 2006 Hezbollah welcomed Israeli action at first, but later changed their minds believing Israel went too far. In Syria in 2007 there were small acts of rebellion, prior to the civil war. Finally, for a dictator, nostalgia for the past is not a beneficial policy.

Q: (Jay Roddy, Arabic-English Translator) Is there any divergence of data between successful revolutions and failed demonstrations?

A: (Telhami) The only post-revolution country I covered was Egypt, where there was little change in attitudes, except for a slight increase in identification with the state.

Q: (Tom Sullivan, MA student) On the topic of Saddam Hussein selling the invasion of Kuwait, did he manipulate the historical narrative?

A: (Telhami) Saddam did manipulate it. I had access to the "Hussein tapes," like the "Nixon tapes," and what is surprising is Hussein made identical public and private statements, so they were not made only for public consumption, but also he actually believed these things, or at least wanted his private staff to think so.

Q: (Elana Farsah, Arab-Palestinian-American) The government is not respecting Palestine, and Kerry is with the EU negotiating not to label products of settlement origin as such, and Erdogan was not to go to Gaza?

A: (Telhami) John Kerry understands the importance of the Israeli-Palestinian problem, though he may not be going about it in the best way, which, by the way, Israeli public opinion matches Palestinian public opinion on this issue. The biggest factor is that people no longer believe; the majority of people on both sides have no trust in the two-state solution.

Q: (Indyk) On the Al Jazeera phenomenon, is it falling in popularity?

A: (Telhami): There's nothing in the polls to suggest this, though it is certainly anecdotally true, for two reasons. First, you can't decouple Al Jazeera from Qatar. In the past Qatar was a minor player, but today it is a relevant foreign policy player, and people realize that. Second, Al Jazeera is still the boldest news source. They have the most resources and deep pockets. The biggest threat to Al Jazeera is from the internet. In 2000, people's first choice for a news source was TV, but now, a significant minority says the internet.

(Ghattas) Al Jazeera was ahead in the Egyptian uprising, but there are different countries. Al Jazeera is seen as the sponsor of some, but not other revolutions. For example it is seen as being favorable to the Syrian rebels, but not to the Bahraini. Now, Lebanese who are pro-Hezbollah can't watch Al Jazeera! It's the wrong channel! Also the region is not monolithic, and people can have different opinions.

5. Observations

Roughly 100 people were in attendance, including an Arab League Ambassador. By my count, the word "Morocco" was used three times. However, the country is one of six used for sampling in Telhami's book, so it may be worthwhile to obtain a copy and see his arguments and conclusions vis-à-vis Morocco.

Audio of the event as well as a complete transcript are available here:

<http://www.brookings.edu/events/2013/05/21-arab-public-opinion>

\(Back to top\)

The Growing Crisis in Africa's Sahel Region

Date: May 21, 2013

1. Title: The Growing Crisis in Africa's Sahel Region

Hosted by the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, Global Human Rights, and International Organizations, the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Terrorism, Nonproliferation, and Trade, and the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on the Middle East and North Africa

Participants:

Panel 1

Donald Yamamoto: Acting Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of African Affairs

Nancy Lindborg: Assistant Administrator, Bureau for Democracy, Conflict and Humanitarian Assistance, USAID

Panel 2

Rudolph Atallah: Senior Fellow, Michael S. Ansari Africa Center, Atlantic Council

Mima Nedelcovych: Partner, Schaffer Global Group

Nii Akuetteh: Independent Policy Analyst

2. Overview

This event had five speakers split over two panels. The first panel included members of the current administration discussing what the government is doing to address the crisis in Mali and what the government should do going forward to facilitate reconstruction. The second panel included speakers from think tanks and the private sector. Atallah spoke about how the US may address the security crisis in the region. Nedelcovych spoke about how private industry may support development in the region. Akuetteh spoke from an African perspective on how the US should play a key role in supporting the region's reconstruction.

3. Summary

Panel 1

Yamamoto began by noting the developmental difficulties that the countries of the region face. The 80 million people of the Sahel live in some of the poorest countries on earth and routinely rank amongst the lowest on the human development scale. This was exacerbated by the security vacuum left by the crises in Libya and Mali. The US been working in tandem with countries in the region as well as with regional organizations in order to address these myriad problems and help ensure the region's security capabilities. The primary vehicle in this effort has been the Trans-Sahel Counter Terrorism Partnership (TSCTP). He then explained the important roles that Sahel countries have played in supporting both the French and African (AFISMA) interventions in Mali. To that end, the US is providing $96 million to support AFISMA countries contributing troops and police, such as Niger and Burkina Faso. However, this military aid will mean little if we fail to address the longstanding political and economic issues (such as poor governance, weak democratic institutions, and lack of development and economic opportunities) that both contribute to and are exacerbated by these security crises. While these challenges are daunting, we have seen some progress in the region, in countries such as Niger, which has made "remarkable political and economic reforms" since its 2010 coup, and Mali, which is heading towards free and democratic elections and has created a Malian peace and reconciliation committee.

Lindborg began by mentioning the Brussels conference that she and Yamamoto had attended the previous week, where 80 nations had come together to show their support (both figurative and monetary) for Mali. At the conference, the Malian president commended the international community for their continued support in rebuilding Mali. Lindborg reaffirmed Yamamoto's statement that the complex network of issues, including poor governance, poverty, and humanitarian crises have left the region especially vulnerable, and that we need to address the root causes of this vulnerability if we are to ensure security in the region and lift its population out of their perpetual state of poverty. USAID is tackling these issues in four ways: (1) continued humanitarian assistance, (2) building resilience to reduce chronic crisis that results from chronic poverty, (3) improving governance, particularly establishing legitimacy of new governments, and (4) countering violent extremism. She concluded by emphasizing that the development of strong, legitimate governments will be at the heart of countering extremism and protecting development gains.

Panel 2

Atallah began by addressing the new threat of suicide bombing in Mali, a phenomenon that has never before seen in the Sahel and is indicative of an escalation of AQIM jihadist activity; he fears that this escalation will follow a pattern set by Boko Haram in Nigeria. The root causes of extremist violence in this region are complex, and understanding why extremism has taken root in the Sahel requires a thorough analysis of the principal regional issues that precipitated the Mali crisis. Atallah underscored two such issues: first, militants linked to al-Qaeda who had been repressed under authoritarian regimes, largely from countries such as Syria, Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Algeria, have experienced newfound freedom of movement since the start of the Arab Spring. AQIM's message has also been bolstered by Western intervention in Mali. Second, Mali's delicate security situation was stressed by the confluence of marginalized peoples into remote border regions. Extremist groups are attractive to such marginalized groups. Atallah then specifically noted Morocco, in contrast to Mali, as a model in the region for reform, progress, and security, noting its counterterrorism infrastructure that has both reactive and preventative components (the preventative components being the 2011 constitutional reforms - improvement of education, human rights, and the inclusion of the Amazigh population). He concluded by giving three recommendations for resolving the Mali crisis: (1) Bring USAID back into northern Mali, such that we may work to stamp out the poverty that fuels extremism in the so-called "Arc of Instability;" (2) Assist the countries of the Sahel to address their porous borders; and (3) Counter AQIM's ubiquitous media presence, especially in new social media such as Twitter.

Nedelcovych addressed the issue from a business perspective. He represents the Schaffer Group, which is an agroindustry company that has undertaken several partnerships in Africa to strengthen the farming industry in the region. Most recently, Schaffer has been working on a major project in Niger and Mali. The Group has always made a point of bringing small farmers into the company's investment scheme in order to promote the kind of resilience that Lindborg mentioned in her testimony. He mentioned Maslow's hierarchy of needs: if a society cannot meet its most basic needs (food, water, shelter), then extremism may flourish. This is where American businesses can step in to play their role in solving the Mali crisis - investing in the region to build up agricultural infrastructure and support local farmers (agroindustry has a particular role to play in this crisis because this industry employs people in high poverty areas). However, a base level of security is needed for American investors to take this risk.

Akuetteh's first point was that the crisis in the Sahel is difficult to address partially because it covers such a large area; he suggested that we make this area a bit larger by adding the Western Sahara to our definition of "Sahel," because the crisis in Western Sahara is spilling over into Mali. This is a large area with myriad stressors, and this has serious implications for US interests.. The US is likewise uniquely qualified to help the countries of this region address these myriad stressors. US interests in the area have really picked up since 9/11, and this is the basis of his first recommendation: the US needs to undergo a serious review of its strategy in the region now, over a decade after 9/11, particularly since there is escalating extremism in the region. His second recommendation was that we must "push hard on democracy" in the region, because inclusive, democratic governance is crucial to fighting home-grown terrorism. His third recommendation is that the US pay special attention to Mali (as it appears to be the epicenter of violence in the region), but not in terms of military support. The US should be a leader in supporting Mali in two areas. First, the US must help to facilitate free and open elections in Mali and help craft a contingency plan in the event that the July elections fail (he is not especially optimistic about the upcoming elections, following recent events in Côte d'Ivoire and Kenya). Second, the US must help to facilitate Mali's reconstruction, particularly in regards to the reconciliation between Bamako and the marginalized populations of the North.

4. Q & A

Panel 1

Q: (Representative Chris Smith, R-NJ) Can the Malian elections reasonably be held in July and be free, fair, and inclusive? Also, infectious diseases flourish in political crises and compound them. Ms. Lindborg, can you speak to how we plan to handle the Malaria crisis in the Sahel?

A: (Lindborg) For the elections, we are working closely with our international partners and with the Malians, taking on a support role in a reconciliation approach. We are also providing support to the UNDP and UNHCR in their handling of the mechanics of the upcoming elections. While we have not yet solved all of the structural issues in Mali that could impede free and fair elections, it is imperative that we hold these elections so that they can begin to rebuild democratic institutions. With respect to the malaria crisis, as part of USAID's resilience agenda, it has put together a cross-sector approach that will address all aspects of the spread of infectious diseases, including programs in disease prevention, family planning, and food distribution.

Q: (Smith) Was the Brussels conference a success?

A: (Lindborg) Yes, it was a success in that it managed to raise money for the Malian crisis and keep the crisis the center of attention in the international community.

Q: (Smith) Has the Pan-Sahel Initiative worked? Has the coordination thereof improved?

A: (Yamamoto) Yes, I would say so, in terms of both US involvement and cooperation from other African countries. The Initiative's handling of the Malian crisis will be crucial, both because it will prove the effectiveness of African cooperation in handling security crises and because the Mali crisis appears to be the lynchpin of all of the other Sahel crises that we must handle.

Q: (Representative Karen Bass, D-CA) Can you briefly discuss the role of AFRICOM in Mali?

A: (Yamamoto) In Mali, AFRICOM has played a key support role to the French and African interventions, providing such services as refueling French aircraft and giving strategic assistance to other African countries involved in the intervention.

Q: (Bass) Describe the character of the Brussels conference and what new information it brought to light that can help us. Also, how much money did the US pledge to this cause?

A: (Lindborg) We announced a $32 million pledge for humanitarian assistance, specifically for refugees. We have already pledged $550 billion in assistance over the entire region.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber, R-TX) Can we identify countries in the Sahel who are US-friendly? That is, who share our democratic, free-market values and do not pose the threat of radical Islamism, so that we can streamline our decisions about to whom we give aid money?

A: (Lindborg) Our humanitarian assistance program is entirely need-based, and is not influenced by the politics of the states that receive aid. Our development assistance program is about supporting democracies, and there are myriad different governments that receive this aid. Currently, the development assistance program operates primarily in Senegal; we did have a project in Mali, before it destabilized, and we are beginning to expand projects in Niger, Burkina Faso, Nigeria, and Mauritania.

Q: (Weber) Where will we be providing assistance next?

A: (Lindborg) It is impossible to tell; the Sahel is chronically underdeveloped. We need to expand our aid partnership with foreign allies, particularly the EU.

(Yamamoto) It is also important that we continue to coordinate with other regional organizations and the Sahel diaspora community.

Q: (Representative Tom Cotton, R-AR) I was surprised by Mali falling apart. We had previously considered it the greatest democratic success in the Sahel. Was it actually a strong democracy before this crisis began? If not, what did we miss in our assessment of Malian democracy? How does that bear on our assessments of other countries?

A: (Yamamoto) The key issue here is fragility. Mali was a very democratic country, but its democratic institutions were fragile. What we're trying to do is give aid in order to stabilize it, address the humanitarian crisis and extremism, and promote dialog between the north and Bamako.

(Lindborg) Any time that you have marginalized populations, such as the Tuareg in northern Mali, you are setting the stage for unrest.

Q: (Representative Paul Cook, R-CA) What is the glue that will hold some confederation of African states together? How can we help?

A: (Yamamoto) Every day we have a tremendous impact. One form in which we can bring the African states together is by honoring the AU as a regional governing body; to this end, we have nominated an ambassador to the AU. For smaller regional groups, such as ECOWAS, we can help them face challenges on their own, continue to promote good will, and set an example for good governance.

(Lindborg) Progress is possible, but it will take time. We need to help countries, communities, the private sector, and regional NGOs feel that they have a stake in their own future; people need to feel included in that future and understand the support we have for them.

Q: (Smith) In reference to this inclusion, are we including faith-based groups? Also, what is the unmet need for refugees and internally displaced persons?

A: (Lindborg) Faith-based groups are important because they have been there since the beginning. Also, we can use them to leverage the generosity of the public. As for the refugee issue, the UN has appealed for $410 million for Malian refugees, of which we have pledged $180 million.

Panel 2

Q: (Smith) Are you concerned about the July elections in Mali? Please elaborate.

A: (Akuetteh) Don't get me wrong, there is a real need for elections; properly run elections can ameliorate a number of other destabilizing issues in the country, such as ethnic divisions and the influence of the MNLA. However, it is critical that we make sure that we do this right. One key issue is registering people to vote - I am nervous about our ability to register refugees and IDPs, who must have a voice in these elections, before July. We need to come up with a contingency plan, in the likely event that something will go wrong.

(Nedelcovych) We need to have elections now; we cannot wait until we are sure that we can hold perfect elections, because that may never happen, and putting the elections on hold also means putting private investment on hold. Putting investment on hold would have devastating effects on Malian development.

(Atallah) I agree that we should push elections, but first it is critical that we address the local grievances that precipitated the beginning of the crisis. If we force the election without addressing these grievances, it will just be another failed election.

Q: (Smith) Why are American companies so reluctant to invest in Africa?

A: (Nedelcovych) The key issue in this reluctance is uncertainty. However, I think it is misplaced. Many of the reactions to investment throughout the rest of Africa are very positive; real business deals are happening.

Q: (Smith) Elaborate on the burden Malian refugees place on border countries, and how they may be repatriated.

A: (Akuetteh) Mali's neighbors are also at risk of implosion, and refugees stress them more. The US has been doing a good job in alleviating this issue through humanitarian assistance, but there is more work to be done. On another note, Africans want to know why there is not more US investment in Africa. China has been heavily investing in the continent; why is it that you can't upstage the Chinese? The US has far more positive assets for investment, such as a large African diaspora community, democracy, and free-market capitalism. The US should have a much bigger private sector presence on the continent.

Q: (Smith) How did we underestimate AQIM?

A: (Atallah) This issue has been festering for two decades. AQIM is a threat in that it subsumes and enhances regional extremist groups and is operating all across the Sahel and North Africa. We cannot quantify AQIM, and that would be irrelevant; the issue is that they always bring more people into the fold. We have to begin to address this issue before what is happening in the Sahel begins to happen in North Africa.

Q: (Bass) Is there a degree of coordination between the different factions of AQIM?

A: (Atallah) It depends on where and how we define it, but yes, there is basically coordination between the factions of AQIM. However, we do not know much about these links because we do not know much about the region. What we do know is this: AQIM has become the wealthiest branch of al-Qaeda. Many smaller extremist groups join them not because of ideological agreement, but because of financial necessity. We need to stop enabling AQIM by paying ransom for the hostages they take, which has become one of their main sources of funding.

Q: (Bass) Tell us more about the issue of drug trafficking in the Sahel. How can countries in the region best counter it?

A: (Akuetteh) Well, Kofi Annan has taken a step in the right direction by creating a West African committee on drugs. There are three big issues here that both perpetuate the drug trade and are exacerbated by it: corruption, the contamination of democracy, and health problems created by drug consumption. In order to truly break free of the drug trade, we are going to need international assistance.

Q: (Smith) What constructive criticism can you give us? And Mr. Atallah, can you elaborate upon your recommendations?

A: (Atallah) We aren't taking enough steps to facilitate AFRICOM. Also, USAID can be doing a lot more in the Sahel to facilitate its development and aid marginalized populations. As for my three recommendations: 1) We have no radar coverage in this strip of the Sahara. This is a problem; 2) Movements across the Sahara cannot be controlled because of the tough terrain; 3) AQIM is technologically savvy, and is using social media to its advantage. It has an audience, and we have to counter its message.

(Nedelcovych) We need to ask ourselves: Are we addressing the illness, or just the symptoms? Our current strategy of simply going after terrorists is like playing whack-amole; what we need to do is address the root issues of instability, such as poverty, hunger, and disease.

(Akuetteh) The US needs to make it clear that we are going to help Mali; we need to play a bigger role in Malian development. Also, I have to reiterate that we must come up with a contingency plan should the Malian elections become problematic, and we need to more thoroughly review what went wrong with Mali.

5. Observations

This hearing was, as most seem to be, not especially well attended. All in all, the second panel was of far more interest to MAC than the first, partially because it is easier for MAC to speak to/partner with members of the private sector, and partially because there were so many mentions of issues directly relating to Morocco. It would be worthwhile for MATIC to form a relationship with Nedelcovych; it could present Morocco's recent investment in wind and solar energy technology as a complement to his focus on agro industry. Akuetteh could also be a good person for MAC to approach because of his impressive credentials in Africa analysis and his recognition of the issue of Sahrawi extremism spilling over into the surrounding area. The most important person for MAC to form a relationship with is Atallah because of his ringing endorsement of Morocco's anti-terror strategy and constitutional reforms.

\(Back to top\)

The Middle East & North Africa FY 2014 Budget: Priorities and Challenges

Date: May 22, 2013

1. Title: The Middle East & North Africa FY 2014 Budget: Priorities and Challenges

Hosted by the Subcommittee on the Middle East and North Africa, House Committee on Foreign Affairs

Participants:

Congressman Doug Collins (R-GA)

Congressman Ted Deutch (D-FL)

Congressman Ted Yoho (R-FL)

Congressman Gerald Connolly (D-VA)

Congressman Randy Weber (R-TX)

Ambassador Elizabeth Jones: Acting Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs, US Department of State

Alina Romanowski: Acting Assistant Administrator, Bureau for the Middle East, USAID

2. Overview

The hearing provided an overview of allocations for State Department and USAID Middle East and North Africa programming budgets for the coming fiscal year (2014). The speakers presented their requests for budget allocations for new programming initiatives in the MENA region, including democratic initiatives, education reform, humanitarian aid, and security.

3. Summary

Ambassador Jones highlighted the tectonic nature of the political, social, and economic changes occurring in the Middle East and North Africa, which included developments in human rights, pluralism, and participation. The goal of State Department involvement in the region is to protect US interests, namely: protecting the security of Israel, promoting peace initiatives in the Middle East, tracking the Iranian defense systems, supporting the Syrian people in conflict, and ensuring the security of US diplomats and foreign workers.

The State Department requested funding to advance and protect US interests in the region and insists that US engagement in the region is vital to the global political climate. The State Department requests $7.36 billion to be distributed among regional programs; however, four major areas of funding allocation were highlighted:

- 1) Israel: Aid to Israel will be designated as military assistance to support US troops stationed there as well as aid in counter-terrorism efforts. A portion of the aid will also be allocated to Palestine for building cooperative partnerships with the Palestinian government and in pursuance of a mutually beneficial and peaceful transition to the two-state solution.
- 2) Egypt: Financial aid to Egypt will be designated to economic reform, investments, and strategy as well as military and security assistance to maintain strategic cooperative relations with Egypt in order to sustain access to strategic locations such as the Suez Canal.
- 3) MENA Incentive Fund: The MENA Incentive Fund is a $580 million project with the goal of incentivizing governments to initiate political, economic, social, and institutional reform with the hope of future democratization. The financial assistance will incentivize governments to create reform initiatives to benefit the whole of society including educational reform, pluralism, and security, among others.
- 4) Syria: Financial assistance will be provided to Syria in two manners: for humanitarian aid for displaced citizens and refugees, as well as to generate domestic investment and inclusive reform for the nation in transition. By proxy, these investments will also help to weaken Iranian influence in the region and aid in removing/weakening terrorist organizations.

Alina Romanowski requested $1.2 billion in USAID funding to support a region in democratic transition dedicated to programs for: constitution building, elections, inclusive investments to generate growth, civil society reconstruction, and to increase political participation. Romanowski highlighted five priority areas:

- 1) Syria: There are over a million refugees outside of Syria, mainly in Jordan; the priority for Syria domestically is humanitarian aid for civilians. In Jordan, priority lies in providing financial assistance to help refugees safely return to their nation of origin.
- 2) Egypt: USAID initiatives in Egypt are to help Egyptians invest back into the domestic economy through the restructuring of education, increased job support, and reform of citizen rights. Through the Egyptian-American Enterprise Fund, USAID will initiate the Egyptian Higher Education Initiative to raise higher education graduation rates and create more jobs.
- 3) Tunisia: USAID plans to assist in economic as well as political reform in Tunisia which includes workforce development, increased transparency of government proceedings, educational development, and human rights initiatives.
- 4) Yemen: Financial assistance in Yemen will prioritize constitutional review, facilitate elections, voter registry reform, healthcare reform, and restructure the educational system to be more inclusive, particularly for young girls.
- 5) Palestine: Financial assistance in Palestine is targeted toward democratic initiatives and increased international cooperation and relations with neighboring countries.

4. Q & A

Q: (Congressman Deutch) What conditions has the State Department put on foreign aid to Egypt?

A: (Jones) Due to Egypt's strategic location/position in the region, foreign military funding to the Egyptian military helps assure security in the region and provides benefits such as access to borders, Suez Canal access, etc. Assistance to support Egypt's transition to democracy also gives the US access to promote democratic values such as free speech, freedom of religion, participation, etc.

Q: (Congressman Deutch) Where is Egypt's "red line"—meaning, where is the point where US funding is no longer effective in rebuilding the state and we must withdraw our efforts?

A: (Jones) US engagement in Egypt is the most important strategy to continue democratic support in this time of transition.

Q: (Congressman Weber) What is the US' role in raising awareness about human rights violations in Iran?

A: (Jones) The US has been providing assistance to Iranian internet companies to circumvent Iranian restrictions to provide more access for the Iranian people to gain information. Strategies such as these are imperative in helping Iranian civil society to increase the space for which they have to operate.

Q: (Congressman Connolly) How can Congress increase help in the humanitarian crisis in Syria?

A: (Romanowski) Financial assistance in Syria is targeted at creating jobs for the Syrian workforce by providing funds to build schools, hospitals, etc. and then employing Syrians to build them and work in them.

Q: (Congressman Yoho) What are we doing differently in the Middle East (than before)?

A: (Jones) The State Department is providing two different kinds of assistance. The first is the MENA Incentive Fund which works with governments to incentivize them to promote and encourage democratic reform and work on the tools needed for democracy such as rule of law, weapon abatement, election and voter reform, etc. The second facet in which the State Department is involved is in civil society—training people and providing resources for groups to engage in political and public life.

(Romanowski) USAID's goal is to draw on the private sector by encouraging investment domestically and building on small and medium enterprises. For example, the Egyptian higher Education Enterprise, which will bring the private sector into the process of education reform.

5. Observations

The hearing brought to light several advantages and disadvantages to US financial assistance in the Middle East and North Africa. Firstly, it is clear that the US' strategic interests to promote democracy, protect security of Israel, and keep Iranian influence at bay is greatly aided by the State Department and USAID's financial assistance and humanitarian assistance. US foreign aid is also advantageous to the emergence of civil society and greater political participation in the region—both Jones and Romanowski pointed out various initiatives to promote pluralism, freedom of speech and religion, education reform, and, especially, constitutional reform. This could present the opportunity for MAC to highlight the independent reform initiatives that Morocco has facilitated such as constitutional reform, increased public openness and government transparency, human rights development, and greater participation. Though Morocco was not mentioned in the proceedings, the MENA Incentive Fund was expressed as an inclusive initiative to incentivize government leaders to promote and encourage democracy politically, socially, and economically in the region. Secondly, the Members of Congress in attendance seemed skeptical of providing additional funding to programs that had not succeeded in the past. Ambassador Jones and Ms. Romanowski spent a good portion of the hearing defending their requests—claiming that the new strategy of providing the plan, structure, and resources for reform will be incentives for governments to implement the reform.

For a video of the hearing, please visit:

<http://foreignaffairs.house.gov/hearing/subcommittee-hearing-middle-east-and-north-africa-fy-2014-budget-priorities-and-challenges>

\(Back to top\)

Perilous Desert: Security Challenges in the Sahara and Sahel

Date: May 22, 2013

1. Title: Perilous Desert: Security Challenges in the Sahara and Sahel

Hosted by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Participants:

Panel 1: Libya

Frederic Wehrey: Carnegie Endowment

Christopher Chivvis: RAND Corporation

Peter Cole: Small Arms Survey/United Nations

Anouar Boukhars: Moderator: Carnegie Endowment

Panel 2: Mali

Roland Marchal: CNRS

Bruce Whitehouse: Lehigh University

Gilles Yabi: International Crisis Group

Anouar Boukhars: Moderator: Carnegie Endowment

Panel 3: Regional Dynamics

Wolfram Lacher: Stiftung Wissenschaft und Politik

Christophe Boutin: Observatoire d'Etudes Geopolitiques

Rudolph Atallah: Atlantic Council

Sarah Chayes: Moderator: Carnegie Endowment

Panel 4: Algeria

Geoff Porter: North Africa Risk Consulting, Inc.

Anouar Boukhars: Carnegie Endowment

Mohammed el-Katiri: The Hague Institute

Frederic Wehrey: Moderator: Carnegie Endowment

2. Overview

While the world's attention was fixed on the momentous events in Tunisia, Egypt, and Libya after the outbreak of the Arab Awakening, the states to the south were undergoing their own transformations with major global implications. Long overlooked by policymakers and scholars, the broader Sahara region has always been underappreciated for its geopolitical significance. Changes over the last two years mean that it is no longer possible to treat the region as a backwater since what happens there affects the Arab World, sub-Saharan Africa, and Southern Europe. In addition, the region is increasingly the source of transnational threats such as terrorism, trafficking, and migration flows. To explore regional sources of instability and what can be done to minimize the threat of simmering conflicts, Carnegie gathered top experts from the United States, Europe, and the region at an all-day conference to mark the launch of the new book Perilous Desert: Insecurity in the Sahara. The conference was held under Chatham House Rule.

3. Summary

Panel 1: Libya

Frederic Wehrey discussed the current political crisis in Libya, describing the situation as dire. The country faces a catch 22 – it needs reconciliation to reform the security sector, but it needs security sector reform for reconciliation. A dilemma that has complicated the situation further is that political groups have allied with armed groups on common aims.

Peter Cole addressed regional border security, arguing that it is managed through personal and family networks that circumvent official institutions. New security apparatus are emerging as new groups emerge and other groups fragment. This is the case for both personal and institutional groups alike – official border security is deeply fragmented and the state has no capacity to enforce border security.

Christopher Chivvis put the international approach to Libya in perspective. He noted that the international community was responsible for the military intervention but left the post-conflict reconstruction to the state. Why? There was no western funding available for it, the security situation seemed okay, and the Libyans themselves preferred it that way. That decision has obviously not worked as evident by the current mess in Libya. So the US and the international community now need to make a policy choice about what the international approach to Libya should be. Options include containment and dealing with the consequence or an assertive role to help mitigate the country's descent toward violence. Chivvis advocated the latter, arguing that progress on all other fronts will be difficult without security and that if there isn't an assertive role, it is possible that a redeployment of NATO or a UN peacekeeping mission will be required in the future.

Panel 2: Mali

Bruce Whitehouse debunked the myth that Mali was a model democracy before the coup. Yes, it has made progress since 1991 in establishing a vibrant press and free media, decentralizing politically, promoting economic growth, and making key social advances, including increased school enrollment, infrastructure, and government services. Behind the good governance myth, however, was continued corruption and impunity, massive land expropriation, and increased mistrust in law enforcement and the justice system, and declining voter participation – the lowest in West Africa from 1992-2007.

Marchal explored the current security threat in Mali. He argued that Gao represents the most serious threat, largely due to the presence of MUJAO, which transformed itself from a drug trafficking katiba to a smart political actor over the past year. MUJAO took advantage of the Tuareg and social hierarchies in Mali, recruiting from captive lineages and among the youth in order to expand its ranks. It also used coercion. The French intervention interrupted some of MUJAO's activities, but did not address many of Mali's underlying issues and thus Marchal argued that withdrawal will be difficult in the near term.

Yabi addressed some these underlying issues, namely the continued fragmentation of society and the lack of political leadership in Bamako, and proposed several solutions. Most importantly, addressing crisis in Mali require regional cooperation. For reconciliation to occur, Mali needs to address the root causes of the rebellion and the coup, the emergence of extremist groups, and the consequences of those three elements. The problem is the result of a combination of a weak Malian state and a complicated regional environment. External realities certainly played a role rendering regional cooperation all the more important. The most important of these external factors were extremist groups and drug trafficking groups. AQIM's arrival in the north of Mali from Algeria certainly altered the dynamics, as did the arrival of cocaine trafficking, which Yabi argued changed the stakes financially and otherwise. To address these two critical issues, Mali's neighbors need to get involved; Mali isn't just a Malian problem and doesn't just require a Malian solution.

Panel 3: Regional Dynamics

Wolfram Lacher discussed Sahel-Sahara security dynamics. He underscored the development of non-state actors operating in the region, the vast increase and importance of smuggling (notably Moroccan hash, Algerian subsidized products, and Libyan weapons, among others), and the movement of both AQIM and Tuareg fighters as the principle drivers of instability and insecurity in the region. He also pinpointed the Western interventions in Libya and Mali as having regional security repercussions, namely in the dissemination of jihadi activity. Lacher noted that fighters from Libya, the Western Sahara, Mauritania, and Algeria are all moving throughout the region, in some instances heading home when their countries have becoming safe havens themselves. He cited Libya as the epicenter of regional insecurity, but continued to stress smuggling as one of the most, if not the most, important drivers of conflict, particularly in Libya, Mali, and Niger. Smuggling is the key to the economy of conflict and is financing armed groups and fueling rivalries. Whatever success the French intervention in Mali had in disrupting terrorism, it hasn't disrupted smuggling networks meaning that that driver of insecurity is ever present. Overcoming these challenges requires an overall political approach to communities in the border areas, where these issues – and insecurity – are most prevalent.

Rudolph Atallah addressed the security threat in Tunisia, noting that the spread of AQIM-affiliated groups in the country and the rise of extremism has the potential to create a far bigger threat than in Libya if things go wrong. It is not clear at this point which way the security situation there is headed, but Tunisia has a bigger population and thus the potential threat is far greater. Atallah also briefly discussed the French intervention in Mali, arguing that it stopped the Islamists from moving south and also forced the international community to address the problem. However, it only forced a tactical withdrawal, not a strategic defeat for AQIM, which is still in the country.

Christophe Boutin spoke largely about the Western Sahara. He cited the UN report that noted the risk of a spillover of the Mali crisis into the Western Sahara and referenced French press citations of recruitment in the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf and Polisario-member involvement in terrorism with MUJAO in Northern Mali. He termed the Polisario's response to these allegations as "le démenti clair du Polisario (the clear denial of the Polisario)." Boutin stressed that the camps are insecure and that the broader area east of the berm was insecure as well. Only 20% of the area controlled by the Polisario east of the berm is actually controlled by the Polisario. As a result of this insecurity (and in fact exemplary of it), MINURSO has cancelled night patrols and patrols to the Mauritanian border are always accompanied by the Polisario. Boutin also stressed that the camps are a target for terrorism and trafficking in the region and that youth in the camps are a particular target. Boutin closed by quoting the UN report that argued that insecurity in the region reiterated the urgency of resolve the Western Sahara crisis. He called for a solution based on Morocco's autonomy plan, as Morocco has shown great leadership in counterterrorism cooperation, promoting a moderate version of Islam, and implementing reform under the leadership of King Mohammed VI.

Panel 4: Algeria

Frederic Wehrey opened by citing Algeria's important, albeit complex role in the region, noting that it has been called many things – "reluctant hegemon," "paranoid neighbor," and "indispensable power." The panel addressed some of those labels, assessing internal Algerian politics and Algeria's role in regional dynamics.

Geoff Porter argued that Algeria was at a turning point politically, with Bouteflika recovering from a health scare, an ongoing reform process, and a question of succession generating a lot of international attention. In spite of renewed attention to the country, Porter argued that western perceptions of Algerian politics are nevertheless wrong and sought to explain why that was the case. He caveated it by stressing that he doesn't know how Algerian politics works these days. The most important of these false perceptions is the concept of "le pouvoir" that is a term widely used by western analysts. What does this mean? It is used to refer to the political, military, and commercial elite, in addition to the DRS, to which the counterweight is Bouteflika's clan. There are a few issues with this. First, many of the military elite are retired or dead. Second, the mystique of the DRS has become infectious – is it really still omnipotent? Porter pointed to the In Amenas incident as raising questions about its omnipotence. With regard to Bouteflika's clan, many left and their replacements are not from Bouteflika's traditional center of power in Oran and the West. Porter thus argued that this term and these categories don't reflect realities on the ground. He also argued that there are shifting paradigms in Algeria and that current terms don't work either for "us or them." He concluded by noting that he felt a sense of excitement in Algiers about a real political transition – the country isn't befallen by anxiety about this, rather, there is a potential for a real shift toward political institutions.

Mohammed el-Katiri assessed the many challenges Algeria faces today. The most prominent of these include real protests, a generational transitional at the political level, a difficult regional environment given instability in neighboring countries, and social and economic grievances throughout the country. All of this has lead Algerians in power to question and re-align their priorities. El-Katiri argued that the government has shown resilience and capability in response to these challenges, particularly in its ability to adapt to address security threats in the region.

Anouar Boukhars presented the view of Algeria from the Sahel, namely perceptions of Algeria that he witnessed in Mali, Mauritania, and Niger. He found common perceptions that there is a need to harmonize regional views to promote peace and stability, which is challenged by fragmentation in Tunisia and Libya, transition in Algeria, distrust between Morocco and Algeria, and the weakness of states in the Sahel. Likewise, people agreed that Algeria's role in promoting peace is crucial and influential, given its army and equipment, its counterterrorism experience, its leadership in counterterrorism initiatives and the US counterterrorism structure in the Sahel. Neighbors nevertheless express frustration with the resources Algeria has expended to fight AQIM; its resources are applied disproportionate to its capabilities. Why is this the case? First, its policy of non-intervention; second, its distrust of foreign interference. Algeria rightly pointed out that the Libyan intervention and a NATO failure for post-conflict reconstruction led to weapons trafficking, which aided fighters in Mali. Despite these ongoing challenges, and the failure of CEMOC, the Algerian-created joint military operations center to fight regional terrorism, to propose and implement any concrete measures to help Mali, there is still a sense that Algeria is the best placed to be the region's counterterrorism leader. The US certainly remains the most supportive of Algerian leadership, while acknowledging that it could indeed do more.

4. Q & A

Panel 1: Libya

Q: (Yabi) Could you provide an assessment of the control of the southern and Algerian borders and touch on the role this plays in instability in the rest of the region?

A: (Cole) There is trafficking out of Mali for sure – of people, labor, etc. It is done by gangs and bands, not battalions.

Q: (Jamestown Foundation) Could you touch a bit more on arms trafficking in the region? Also, is there a Libyan link to terrorism in Algeria, most notably in the In Amenas attack?

A: (Cole) There was support from elements in Libya for the In Amenas – fueling and logistical support. Libya was also where the wounded terrorists were treated. It is possible that Libyan border guards were involved as well. The cross-border flows are significant. For the borders with Egypt and Tunisia, it is not on the same scale, but with Algeria, it can be measured in tons.

Q: Is there a threat to the US from AQIM? You seemed to have said no, but I disagree.

A: (Chivvis) AQIM has neither the capacity nor the desire to attack the US. That doesn't mean that won't change in the future.

Panel 2: Mali

Q: (Chayes) What was the role of the Malian state as dysfunctional and unjust in fueling radicalization? What is a substantive response to the fact that the state was unjust or is that just a pretext for radical groups?

A: (Yabi) It is both. But we need to make a distinction between radical groups and armed extremist groups. Gao had radical groups, but they weren't armed. When armed groups came from abroad, they had a ready pool of recruits. In addition, radicalization is not a passive process – there are active recruiters and entrepreneurs from the Gulf and Pakistan pushing this sort of thing. The lack of a state doesn't create radicalization, but it creates an environment that allows it to occur.

Q: (DCM, Embassy of Algeria) Why are you so pessimistic about our ability to stop narco-trafficking with the common fight against terrorism?

A: (Yabi) The number of people involved in trafficking is much higher than those involved in terrorism – it's a business and many countries not affected by terrorism are affected by trafficking. It would be a mistake to equate the two and to conflate policy toward combating them both – they are distinct and require distinct policies.

Panel 3: Regional Dynamics

Q: (Marchal) Why is the focus on Northern Mali when talking about smuggling and trafficking? Solutions need to be designed to address the problem across the region.

A: (Lacher) I don't think we have done that. The problem is different in each country and must be addressed accordingly. This is not the same historic smuggling that has been going ok. The incentives and drivers shift and economic policies impact this as well.

Q: (Polisario Representative to the US) Could you please provide details on the links between Morocco and MUJAO?

A: (Boutin) Morocco is not supporting MUJAO. MUJAO is a threat to Morocco and Morocco is working to mitigate it. In Mali, it is Sahrawis that are joining MUHAO and AQIM.

Q: (Polisario Representative to US) Why are you saying that life is perfect west of the berm and that the threat is only east of the berm? Aren't there human rights issues west of the berm that are causing instability?

A: (Boutin) I didn't say that. I was merely citing the UN report that said that MINURSO has not been harassed on the West side of the berm, but that has happened on the east side. Even members of the Polisario have begun to reference the possibility of terrorist infiltration in the refugee camps.

Q: (Polisario Representative to US) You need to make a distinction between Sahrawi and Polisario.

A: (Boutin) You are right, AFP said that people were returning to the Polisario camps and the Sahrawi fighter captured in Mali was a Polisario fighter. Should we go further and distinguish them by tribe and say Rguibat?

Panel 4: Algeria

Q: (Marina Ottaway, Wilson Center) Could you clarify your point about "le pouvoir?"

A: (Porter) What I wanted to stress was that ministries are personality driven in the same way that they are in the US. They are responsive to vested interests, just like Congress is responsive to lobbyists here.

Q: (DCM, Embassy of Algeria) Algeria has institutions and a presidency and the power is in these institutions. It has also made a firm commitment to combat terrorism – setting up CEMOC?

A: (Boukhars) I don't doubt Algeria's commitment to combating terrorism. But CEMOC didn't succeed. Look at Mali. Look at its request for French intervention. Where is the regional force CEMOC was designed to create? Where is the communications structure? If it succeed, if there are results, show me.

(Shouting from DCM)

(Shouting from Polisario Representative) Why do you have two Moroccans up there "diabolizing" (demonizing) Algeria?

Q: (Marchal) The assessment of DRS is a bit off – it is the only intelligence service that has allowed an armed group on its territory and not rooted it out.

A: (Boukhars) It has been effective in dealing with violent groups in Algeria – it has boxed in AQIM in the North. It is not the best, but it has been effective internally.

Q: Is too much blame being assigned to Algeria and to CEMOC?

A: (Boukhars) It needs to be bolstered, strengthened, and expanded. If CEMOC was operational, I am not saying what happened in Mali wouldn't happen, but leadership is lacking. Likewise, I am not saying that Algeria is complicit or that it nurtures extremist groups. What I am saying is that if Algeria wants to play a leading role, it has to play that role. Algeria has the capacity to play a leadership role and with leadership comes responsibility.

(Porter) There is a policy debate going on in Algeria about changes to its foreign policy of non-intervention.

Q: (Yabi) What is your assessment of the terrorist threat in Algeria?

A: (Porter) Algeria has a problem with the enormity of its borders and the south is at risk because of the terrorist incursion into Mali. There is no threat in Algiers.

5. Observation

Approximately 75 policymakers, North Africa experts, and security specialists attended the all-day conference. The conference was important in and of itself in that it was exemplary of the increased attention being paid to the Maghreb and Sahel region, particularly among security experts. Carnegie nevertheless remains the think tank with the strongest Maghreb and Sahel focus, largely due to the work on Anouar Boukhars, but increasingly due to the work of other experts as well. The panels served as an important vehicle for disseminating information about the current security situation in four prominent Sahel countries, but there was little new information presented. The question and answer sessions thus proved more interesting, particularly as a result of continued rants courtesy of the DCM from the Embassy of Algeria, who seems to do the same thing at every event. This time he was supported in his ranting by the new representative of the Polisario Front to DC, who introduced himself to the think tank community with several shouts and interruptions contesting the vision of Western Sahara articulated by a number of the panelists during the two afternoon panels on regional dynamics and Algeria. Both Algeria and the Polisario continue to look foolish when they try to speak in public on these issues. The fact that Morocco does not do this is helpful, particularly since many of Morocco's messages are already being articulated by the panelists. Even when they are not as positive as MAC would be in expressing them (which they often are, particularly on security), it is nevertheless better to have them coming from the panelists. That said, there is still a negative aspect of these kinds of exchanges. When Algeria and the Polisario have outbursts on the issue of the Sahara, it makes experts less likely to want to engage and discuss the subject matter, particularly in public forums. There isn't much MAC can do about this, but it does render the personal meetings and direct engagement with think tank experts and policymakers all the more important in order to keep them apprised of developments in the conflict and the region.

\(Back to top\)

.....

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, June 29, 2013 10:26 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian situation report

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

June 28, 2013

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- President Bouteflika has been undergoing treatment in Paris for two full months.
- The first and to date only pictures of Bouteflika since he was medevacked to France created a stir when they were released on June 12, but have so far not been followed with any action.
- The need to pass the supplementary finance law is making it increasingly urgent to put an end to the President's absence - either by having Bouteflika impeached for incapacity or bringing him home to resume his duties.
- If, as seems increasingly possible, Bouteflika returns to Algeria in early July, his level of activity during Ramadan - when in previous years he has held a round of individual meetings with all his cabinet ministers - will provide a measure of how far he has really recovered from his stroke.
- While one source claims that Bouteflika has made a good recovery and even intends to run for president again next year, Prime Minister Sellal looks increasingly as if he is being groomed as a successor.

Foreign Relations

- Algeria, and in particular the military, has been drawing closer to the US since the In Amenas attack in January, and this rapprochement has moved forward with Washington's decision to put multi-million dollar bounties on the heads of Mokhtar Belmokhtar and other leading Algerian jihadis, and the G8's condemnation of ransom payments to terrorist groups.
- However, the Algerian regime remains incorrigibly suspicious of outside involvement in the region, and there will be elements within it who will look askance at AFRICOM's latest initiatives in Mali and Niger.
- In many ways, the Algerian regime remains psychologically and politically closer to the Russians, as evidenced during Foreign Minister Medelci's visit to Moscow in late June.
- Algiers' proximity to Moscow, and mistrust of the intentions of western countries, is further encouraged by events in Syria.

Security

- Political violence in the north appears to be increasingly limited to specific areas of Kabylia.
- The situation in the oil and gas producing south is increasingly alarming, due both to overspill from the conflict in northern Mali and to continued activity on the part of groups based close to or just over the eastern borders with Tunisia and Libya.
- Amid worrying signs that the latter have some interest in oil and gas industry targets, there are reports that security forces in the south have been placed on heightened alert until the end of Ramadan in response to intelligence suggesting that an attack on "vital infrastructure" is being prepared.
- All incidents in the south close to the borders with Mali and Mauritania have been attributed to AQMI offshoot MUJAO, while Mokhtar Belmokhtar's Katibat Al Moulathamine and the shadowy Sons of the Sahara for Islamic Justice have been mentioned in connection with incidents along the eastern borders.

Political Trends

It is now two full months since President Bouteflika was medevacked to Paris following what is now officially acknowledged to have been a stroke[1] (rather than a transient ischemia, or 'mini-stroke', as initially claimed). The first images of the President at the French military hospital where he is receiving treatment - in the company of Armed Forces Chief-of-Staff Maj-Gen. Ahmed Gaïd Saleh and Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal - may have created a stir when they were released on June 12, but they have not as yet been followed by any real change in the situation: Bouteflika remains abroad and apparently out of action, the government keeps ticking over, and the media continues to speculate about the past, present and future. It is almost as if Algerians were getting used to having an absentee head of state, and some Western observers have even suggested that, with business and the day-to-day life of the state effectively carrying on as normal, this bears out the late President Houari Boumedienne's adage that Algeria is a country of institutions, not personalities. It is, however, precisely for institutional reasons that this situation cannot be allowed to drag on indefinitely: the extended absence of the President of the Republic creates an institutional vacuum that must one way or another be filled. With or without Bouteflika's consent and/or participation, other stakeholders will therefore have to find a solution soon, and there are some indications that a solution - or at least a temporary fix - may be forthcoming within a week.

According to the Algerian constitution, all government bills must be discussed by the Council of Ministers before being submitted to parliament, and meetings of the Council of Ministers, the constitution stipulates, are chaired by the President of the Republic; after they have been discussed and approved by parliament, they must be signed into law by the President. While Bouteflika could theoretically sign laws in his Parisian hospital room - as, ostensibly, he has begun to do with presidential decrees, of which four, dated May 27, have been published in the latest official gazette[2] - it remains the case that the Council of Ministers cannot be convened without his physical presence. Thus, while ministers may be able to take care of day-to-day business, the government is unable to initiate legislation as long as the President is unavailable.

Various items have begun piling up, but one in particular requires urgent attention. In addition to the annual budget, usually approved in December for the following year, Algeria has become accustomed to passing a mid-year 'supplementary budget' (loi des finances complémentaire, or LFC). Generally approved in July, this has become a necessary part of the process of government: as well as adjusting revenue and expenditure for the rest of the year, these sometimes also introduce important new economic regulations (such as the now infamous '49-51 rule' providing for majority Algerian ownership of joint venture companies, enshrined in the 2009 LFC). This year, the LFC appears to have taken on special political importance. In response to the unprecedented protest movement that has been shaking the country's southern provinces[3], plans for new taxes and reductions in consumer subsidies crafted by Finance Minister Karim Djoudi to take account of weakening oil prices and declining demand for Algerian oil and gas have apparently been thrown out; instead, the supplementary budget has reportedly been rewritten to include a range of measures (such as the creation of new government jobs for southerners, including 6,000 positions in the police force, etc.) aimed at buying social peace in the south. With parliament due to go into recess for a month at the end of July at the very latest, the presence of the head of state is therefore increasingly urgently required to get this piece of legislation adopted.=

One option might have been to bring into play article 88 of the constitution, which provides for the impeachment of the President in case of "serious and lasting illness" and his replacement on an interim basis by the Speaker of the upper house of parliament. There has, however, been no indication that the Constitutional Council, which is responsible for initiating this process, is to be convened. It is thus looking increasingly likely that Bouteflika will be kept on as President, at least for the time being, and will be brought back to chair the upcoming Council of Ministers meeting. This was in effect the scenario that was suggested - to some scepticism, at the time - by a statement issued by the Algerian Presidency and dutifully carried by APS on June 12 to the effect that President Bouteflika had instructed Prime Minister Sellal to move ahead on finalising the 2013 LFC and "all other legislation that the government has been working on" in preparation for a Council of Ministers meeting. Sellal has since been promising that the Council of Ministers meeting will be held "soon". Against this background, there would seem to be an increasingly strong chance that the President may be brought home soon - perhaps in time for the holy month of Ramadan (begins July 8 or 9) and possibly for Algeria's independence day (July 5)[4].

If this does turn out to be the case, Ramadan will provide an important indicator as to Bouteflika's real condition. Over his three successive terms of office, Bouteflika has established a tradition of holding individual performance assessment meetings with each of his ministers during the holy month. Failure to do so this year would be a pointer that his stroke has left lasting damage to his physical and/or mental condition. If on the other hand he does hold his Ramadan interviews as usual, this would lend greater credence to the claims of a staffer at the Presidency, made in conversations with us in mid-June, that that Bouteflika is not only in relatively good health but also still intends to run for a fourth term next year.

The same source claims that Prime Minister Sellal has been chosen by Bouteflika himself as his future Vice President (if and when the constitution is amended) and ultimately his successor - perhaps mid-way through his hoped-for fourth term, circa 2017; others have implied that the Prime Minister has been designated by other players within the power structure, in particular DRS chief Tewfik, as their candidate to succeed Bouteflika, as of 2014 if not sooner. One way or another, it is noticeable that Sellal has been acquiring a distinctly presidential air. Over the past month he has made two visits to the provinces (El Bayadh in the west of the country, Souk Ahras in the east, as if to emphasise balance between Algeria's competing regions) with a large retinue of ministers in tow, which were highly reminiscent of the provincial inspection tours that used to be Bouteflika's speciality; presided over the annual meeting of the country's Walis (provincial governors), normally very much the President's job; and begun standing in for Bouteflika at international gatherings.

Foreign Relations

2013 has seen a certain rapprochement between Algiers and Washington, in large measure a consequence of the January 16 attack on the Tiguentourine gas facility near In Amenas in the southern Wilaya of Illizi. But with powerful forces still pulling in the opposite direction, it would probably be overhasty to conclude that a lasting and close strategic relationship is just around the corner.

Within a fortnight of the In Amenas attack, French specialist newsletter Maghreb Confidentiel claimed that "In Amenas is boosting the Algerian-American axis":

The attack against the In Amenas gas facility on January 16 has pushed Washington to further beef up its security ties with Algiers. According to Maghreb Confidentiel's sources, Algeria has since that date been placed on the "A list" of countries with which the United States cooperates fully in defence and intelligence. And US Ambassador in Algiers Henry S. Ensher is pressing to have that temporary classification made permanent. This could accelerate the negotiations for the purchase by Algiers of US-made drones. The talks, which were launched several years ago, have been in the doldrums, Washington having demanded a right of oversight over the way in which they are used as a prior condition for any sale, which Algiers sees as intolerable interference.

In exchange for this all-out assistance, the United States hopes to push Algeria to review its role in the region. For US diplomats, Algeria may have had the best analysis of events in Libya and their impact on the region, but it has remained far too stand-offish: if it had really played its role to the full, the French operation in Mali could have been avoided.

The prospect of closer military cooperation has since been confirmed to us, up to a point, by a retired Algerian Air Force officer, who told us in May that:

The In Amenas attack was a turning point for the Algerian armed forces. [Not least because] on a strategic level, the faction which has been arguing for years that Algeria should buy American-made military equipment now has the upper hand. Algeria is looking to acquire American drones and AWACS, and contacts are under way - with more formal talks likely to begin soon - concerning closer cooperation between Algeria and AFRICOM.

For a country which, as little as five or six years ago, was considered the Russian arms industry's biggest customer in Africa if not the world, this is already quite a turnaround.

On the diplomatic level, meanwhile, Algiers has been gratified to see the United States, together with the other G8 states when they gathered for the Lough Erne summit this month, formally adopting Algeria's long-held stance of complete opposition to the payment of ransoms to terrorist groups. Similarly, the US State Department's announcement in early June that it was offering a reward of up to $5m for information leading to the capture or killing of Mokhtar Belmokhtar (and similar bounties for Yahia Abou El Hammam and Malik Abou Abdelkarim of AQMI's Saharan branch and MUJAO's Oumar Ould Hamaha) has been greeted with satisfaction.

However, while Algiers may be pleased to see the US and other powers (notably France, which had become notorious for throwing money at Saharan hostage-takers) coming round to its positions, suspicion bordering on paranoia remains one of the hallmarks of the Algerian regime. A fear of imperialist encirclement, and even of dismemberment, having been part of its make-up since its earliest days, it was the regime's instinctive reaction to oppose NATO's intervention in Libya in 2011, and likewise French intervention in northern Mali (at least until it could no longer be avoided). Consequently, however keen some figures within the regime may be to move towards closer military cooperation with the United States, there will inevitably be others who look very much askance at any new encroachment by outside powers - including reports[5] that AFRICOM has begun airlifting matériel to Taoudeni in northern Mali (ostensibly for "elite units" of the Malian army) and building two new airstrips, one in Mali and the other in Niger, to facilitate "rapid interventions" by American forces.

Indeed, psychologically, and to a large extent politically, Algeria's elite still has more in common with the Russians than with the United States. This proximity has been reinforced by events in and around Syria - of late in particular by American, French and British moves to arm Syrian rebel forces, in collaboration with Qatar and Saudi Arabia - and was very much in evidence when Foreign Minister Mourad Medelci was in Moscow this past week for a meeting of the Algerian-Russian High Commission. At a joint press conference on June 25, his opposite number Sergei Lavrov stressed the "convergence" of views between the two countries:

We found that our approaches to international issues have traditionally been close. We and our Algerian colleagues are in favor of the supremacy of international law and strengthening the key role of the United Nations in ensuring balance and stability in international relations.

On the question of terrorism and security, Lavrov added, acidly:

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, July 04, 2013 8:55 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Growing concerns about terrorism in Africa
Attachments: SR_ChronologyDocumentedIncidents 10June2013 FINAL.pdf;
SR_PolisarioInvolvementinTerrorismforChron10June2013 FINAL.pdf

The attached should be seen. It's a very strong report on the terrorism in North Africa linked to the Polisario, and separately, a summary of the document. Although I'm sure you may not be able to read it entirely, you must/should glance through it please. It will be widely distributed on occasions when someone reports or makes statements positively about the Polisario. Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

Chronology

Documented incidents and reports linking members of the Polisario Front with AQIM, trafficking, and other illicit activities in the region.

May 22, 2013

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace releases a new book, Perilous Desert: Insecurity in the Sahel, edited by North Africa experts Frederic Wehrey and Anouar Boukhars. The book cites increasing inroads by AQIM and its allies in terrorism and trafficking across the Sahara/Sahel region, including Libya, Mali, Mauritania, and the Polisario-run refugee camps near Tindouf, Algeria. In a chapter on the Western Sahara, Boukhars writes that the unresolved Western Sahara conflict has “negatively impacted trans-Saharan security. The undergoverned areas abutting the Western Sahara, especially northern Mauritania and the Polisario-administered camps in southwest Algeria, are becoming major hubs for drug trafficking, the smuggling of contraband, and the circulation of weapons.” Boukhars further notes that, “There is growing evidence to suggest dangerous connections between criminal organizations, AQIM, and the Sahrawi refugees in Tindouf.”¹⁷

April 16, 2013

Agence France press reports that jihadists fleeing French and African forces are attempting to seek refuge and reorganize in neighboring countries and on Malian territory, including in the Algerian camps of the Polisario Front. According to an African soldier quoted by AFP, members of the Movement for Unity and Jihad in West Africa (MUJWA) had fled to the Algerian camps of the Polisario Front. The source further noted, “Recently, when the highest UN authorities have expressed their concern and called for urgent settlement of the Western Sahara problem, it is because of the risk of terrorists turning the refugee camps into a new home for jihadists.”¹⁸

April 9, 2013

UN leader Ban Ki-Moon calls for urgent international efforts to end the Western Sahara conflict because of fears the Mali war will spill over into the territory. In a report to the 15-member Security Council, Ban argued, “The rise of instability and insecurity in and around the Sahel requires an urgent settlement of this long-standing dispute.” The report continued, “All governments consulted raised serious concerns over the risk that the fighting in Mali could spill over into neighboring countries and contribute to radicalizing the Western Saharan refugee camps,” with one government leader in the region calling the Western Sahara camps “a ticking time bomb,” according to the report.¹⁹

March 16, 2013

The Foreign Minister of Mali, Tieman Coulibaly, confirms that Polisario fighters were among the al-Qaeda-linked terrorist groups in his country. “Polisario elements from the Tindouf camps have been identified with MUJAO fighters operating in northern Mali,” Coulibaly said, adding that Polisario militia members had been recruited to fight as mercenaries and paid monthly “salaries ranging from 200 to 600 Euros.”²⁰

March 1, 2013

Le Figaro reports that a fighter from the Polisario Front was among seven militants taken prisoner after a fierce battle between French/Chadian forces and al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) in Mali. The battle in the mountains of northern Mali reportedly killed key al-Qaeda leader Abou Zeid and 42 other jihadists.²¹

¹⁷ Wehrey, Frederic and Anouar Boukhars, eds. Perilous Desert: Insecurity in the Sahara (Washington: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 2013).

¹⁸ Daniel, Serge. “Defeated in Mali, Islamists begin to reorganize.” Agence France Presse, April 16, 2013,

< <http://www.globalpost.com/dispatch/news/afp/130416/defeated-mali-islamists-begin-reorganise>. >

¹⁹ Witcher, Tim. “Ban says W. Sahara risks being drawn into Mali war.” Agence France Presse, April 9, 2013,

< http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5iOnupKvBuc8l_WTR3J5BnNCFnmEw?docId=CNG.566cbe22180951c72bc8d9c6ad6fd9d1.d1. >

²⁰ “Ministre malien : Le Polisario livre des mercenaires au MUJAO contre des mensualités de 600 euros.” LeMag, March 16, 2013, <http://www.lemag.ma/Ministre-malien-Le-Polisario-livre-des-mercenaires-au-MUJAO-contre-des-mensualites-de-600-euros_a68461.html>.

²¹ “Mali : combattant d'Aqmi, il rapporte la mort d'Abou Zeid.” Le Figaro, March 1, 2013, <<http://www.lefigaro.fr/international/2013/03/01/01003-20130301ARTFIG00354-mali-combattant-d-aqmi-il-rapporte-la-mort-d-abou-zeid.php>>.

February 27, 2013

The Inter-University Center for Terrorism Studies of the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies publishes a new report on terrorism in North Africa, "Terrorism in North Africa and the Sahel in 2012: Global Reach and Implications," which notes that al-Qaeda has "established links with Latin cartels for 'drugs-for-arms' smuggling into Europe with terrorist-trafficking networks in the Sahel that include members of the Polisario Front." The report also recommends that the international community take a "closer look at the refugee camps run by the Polisario near Tindouf, Algeria: in order to reduce the flow of recruits to terrorist and criminal groups."²²

February 4, 2013

Malian foreign minister, Tiéman Coulibaly, confirms the presence of Polisario fighters among the terrorist groups in Mali. In an interview with AtlasInfo, he notes, "In the beginning, they were only 500 insurgents. Now they are between 5,500 to 7,000 terrorists in northern Mali who were joined by lost youths, including young Sahrawis from the camps."²³

January 29, 2013

Al-Arabiya reports that 300 fighters from the Polisario are fighting as part of the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa (MUJAO) in Northern Mali.²⁴

December 2012

A CNA Strategic Studies' report, "Security Challenges in Libya and the Sahel," warns "there is evidence that AQIM has infiltrated the Sahrawi refugee camps in Tindouf, Algeria, as well as indications that Sahrawi from the camps have joined terrorist groups based in Mali." The report stresses that this development poses "immediate concerns for the security of Western Sahara, Mauritania, Morocco, and Algeria."²⁵

November 11, 2012

Washington Post columnist Jennifer Rubin notes that jihadists have been flooding into Mali, arguing that "AQIM is on the rise throughout the Maghreb, opportunistically teaming up with other groups (like the violent, separatist Polisario) and setting up shot wherever the central government is in disarray."²⁶

October 28, 2012

Jeune Afrique publishes a feature article, "Mali : Polisario connection" citing updated reports that new recruits from the Polisario-run refugee camps and elsewhere across the Sahel have joined jihadists in Northern Mali. The article cites French intelligence reports that groups of 40-60 men, up to 300 volunteers, arrived in Timbuktu and Gao during October, many of whom express themselves in Hassaniya, the Arabic dialect used by Moors and Sahrawis. The article also discusses the presence of Salafi Jihadism in the camps, noting that it "is not a recent phenomenon." Jeune Afrique says Sahrawis who had received military training in the Polisario camps have been implicated in other terrorist incidents in the region and notes that neither the Polisario Front nor Algerians have been able to stop the "Salafist virus" among young people in the Tindouf camps, and have been even less able to prevent these "desperados" from leaving the camps to join jihadist movements. While Algerian and Polisario security forces now police the Tindouf camps together, the extremist appeal remains strong for young Sahrawis, and "no roadblock, no patrol, no minefield will prevent [them] from taking the path to Timbuktu."²⁷

²² Alexander, Yonah. "Terrorism in North Africa and the Sahel in 2012: Global Reach and Implications." Potomac Institute for Policy Studies/International Law Institute, February 2013, <<http://www.terrorisemelectronicjournal.org/knowledge-base/selected-special-reports/>>.

²³ "Le ministre malien des Affaires étrangères: 'Le soutien et l'aide du Maroc au Mali sont déterminants pour nous'." AtlasInfo, February 4, 2013, <http://www.atlasinfo.fr/Le-ministre-malien-des-Affaires-etrangees-Le-soutien-et-l-aide-du-Maroc-au-Mali-sont-determinants-pour-nous_a38888.html>.

²⁴ Allani, Alaya. "Does Mali's War feed or devastate al-Qaeda ambitions?" Al-Arabiya, January 29, 2013, <<http://english.alarabiya.net/articles/2013/01/29/263309.html>>.

²⁵ Volger, Sarah. "Security Challenges in Libya and the Sahel." CNA Strategic Studies, December 2012, <http://www.cna.org/sites/default/files/research/Libya_Sahel_Security_Workshop.pdf>.

²⁶ Rubin, Jennifer. "Al-Qaeda on the march." The Washington Post, November 11, 2012, <http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn/post/al-qaeda-on-the-march/2012/11/10/5c5faaa6-2abc-11e2-96b6-8e6a7524553f_blog.html>.

²⁷ Soudan, François. "Mali: Polisario Connection." Jeune Afrique, October 28, 2012, <<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Article/JA2703p010-013.xml0/>>.

October 22, 2012

Agence France Presse reports that hundreds of jihadist fighters have poured into Mali to support the Islamists of AQIM and MUJAO that have controlled the northern part of the country for seven months. Quoting a Malian security official, the article notes, “in the Timbuktu region and around Gao, hundreds of jihadists, mostly Sudanese and Sahrawi, have arrived as reinforcements to face an offensive by Malian forces and their allies.” The article also cites one of MUJAO’s top leaders, Habib Ould Issouf, who said that recruits were coming from the camps of Tindouf Algeria, Senegal, the Ivory Coast, and elsewhere.²⁸

October 8, 2012

Jeune Afrique publishes an editorial citing reports by European/Maghreb intelligences sources that hundreds of recruits are joining al-Qaeda-linked extremist groups in northern Mali from the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria and from across the region. The editorial argues that young Sahrawis have increasingly joined AQIM and MUJAO because of their lack of hope for a future – “trained in weapons, indoctrinated by Salafist imams who openly advocate in the camps for the creation of an Islamic State in the Western Sahara, these fighters are welcomed with open arms by their Algerian brothers.”²⁹

September 2012

The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace publishes a report written by Wolfram Lacher, “Organized Crime in the Sahara-Sahel region” examining the growing impact of organized crime in the region and the involvement of both state and militant groups in such crime. Lacher implicates Sahrawi networks with close ties to the Polisario in the drug and aid trafficking that accounts for much of the organized crime in the region: “In the triangle between Mauritania, Mali, and Algeria, Sahrawi networks—often with the direct involvement of officials in the Polisario movement, which seeks independence for Western Sahara—trade subsidized Algerian goods and humanitarian aid southward and cigarettes northward to Algeria and Morocco.” Lacher further notes, “In some cases, Sahrawi cannabis resin smugglers with close ties to the Polisario have been known to take cocaine to Morocco on their way back from Mali.”³⁰

August 9, 2012

Jeune Afrique reports that dozens of youth from the refugee camps near Tindouf have joined MUJAO, the AQIM splinter group whose current spokesman, Abou Walid Saharoui, is a former member of the Polisario Front.³¹

July 28, 2012

Spain evacuates all of its aid workers, as well as three other foreign nationals, from refugee camps in Tindouf, Algeria, citing “well-founded evidence of a serious increase in insecurity in the region” and “the serious risks of new kidnappings.”³²

July 20, 2012

The three Spanish aid workers kidnapped from a refugee camp near Tindouf, Algeria in October 2011 and held in northern Mali are released, allegedly for an $18.4 million ransom.³³

²⁸ Daniel, Serge. “Foreign jihadists pour into northern Mali.” Agence France Presse, October 22, 2012.

<<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5iKv6nQ28GeXS3g6FlueGWHfzdjw?docId=CNG.46aa49b0d9ec1aa0315758bc1eb223b5.221>>.

²⁹ Soudan, François. “Tempête de sable.” Jeune Afrique, October 8, 2012, <<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Article/JA2700p006-007.xml0>>.

³⁰ Lacher, Wolfram. “Organized Crime in the Sahel-Sahara Region.” Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, September 2012, <http://carnegieendowment.org/files/sahel_sahara.pdf>.

³¹ “Sahara Occidental: le syndrome malien.” Jeune Afrique, August 9, 2012, <<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Article/JA2691p006-007.xml0>>.

³² “Spain evacuates aid workers.” BBC, July 28, 2012, <<http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-africa-19034164>>.

³³ “Mali Islamists rebels say $18.4 million ransom paid, prisoners released to free 3 Europeans.” Associated Press, July 20, 2012, <<http://www.calgaryherald.com/news/Mali+Islamist+rebels+million+ransom+paid+prisoners+released+free/6964246/story.html>>.

June 27, 2012

Soufan Group issues an intelligence brief warning about the spread of violence extremism in the Sahel. The report details the fallout from the conflict in Libya and its unintended benefits for AQIM: “buoyed by the flow of arms and fighters out of Libya, the group initiated skirmishes with government forces in Mauritania, Mali, and Niger during the last months of 2011.” The report cites growing links between militants operating in the region, particularly AQIM and the Polisario Front. It notes, “More ominously, AQIM also increased its linkages with other rebel forces in the Sahel, including the Polisario Front... In late October, three aid workers—an Italian and two Spaniards—were seized by AQIM militants (aided by Sahrawi sympathizers) inside a camp administered by the Polisario separatists near the Algerian town of Tindouf. The connection was not surprising given that the large numbers of idle young Polisario fighters with no prospects present the terrorist group with a ready pool of potential recruits, both for its military operations as well as the drug smuggling and other criminal activities it is increasingly involved in.”³⁴

April 6, 2012

Malian separatists declare independence in northern Mali in what experts fear may be a “rogue state” in the Sahara.³⁵ The National Movement for the Liberation of Azawad received support from militant Islamic group Ansar Dine, AQIM, and an AQIM splinter group, the Movement for Unity and Jihad in West Africa, in its conquest of Gao and Timbuktu, creating “a security nightmare” in the region. Experts warn that along with AQIM, “the Polisario will gain more power,” as a result of the crisis in Mali.³⁶ Africa security expert Dr. J. Peter Pham echoes these concerns, emphasizing the importance of resolving the Western Sahara conflict. “It is like before 9/11, when we might have asked ourselves: ‘Who cares about Afghanistan?’ But jihadists ultimately need a place to operate and what we are now seeing is the creation of a safe haven for terrorists and extremists who are being squeezed out elsewhere.”³⁷

March 12, 2012

The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace publishes a paper underscoring the “disturbing reality” that growing numbers of disenfranchised Polisario youth and fighters are being recruited by AQIM and a “vast network” of regional drug traffickers. The paper, by McDaniel College professor Anouar Boukhars, cites the October 23 kidnapping of Western aid workers in the Polisario camps as confirmation that, “the deteriorating social and political conditions in the camps in Tindouf represent a tinderbox waiting to explode.” It also notes that AQIM-Polisario member links pose “a major security threat to the Maghreb and the Sahel.”³⁸

February 21, 2012

Experts testify to a United Nations Security Council special session that drug cartels and smugglers now traffic almost $1 billion in cocaine a year from Latin America into Africa’s Sahel. They add that traffickers are forming alliances with AQIM and other militants, in a region that has seen an influx of Libyan weapons. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon warned leaders: “inaction could be catastrophic.”³⁹

February 2, 2012

ICTS releases a study reporting the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria have become “a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises,” and recommends Western aid to the camps “prioritize permanent resettlement” for the refugees. Noting expanding AQIM links with Polisario members, South American drug cartels, Boko Haram, and al-Shabaab, as well as AQIM’s access to the influx of Libyan weapons in the Sahel, the study cites a 500% rise in terrorist attacks in the region since 9/11. It argues that AQIM is seeking to extend an “arc of instability” across Africa to exploit turbulence from the Arab Spring and destabilize the region.⁴⁰

³⁴ “Islamist Extremists Threaten Africa’s rise.” The Soufan Group, June 27, 2012, <http://soufangroup.com/briefs/details/?Article_Id=325>.

³⁵ “Analysis: Mali’s north feared new ‘rogue state’ in Sahara.” Reuters, April 4, 2012, <<http://www.reuters.com/article/2012/04/04/us-mali-rogue-idUSBRE8330X220120404>>.

³⁶ Karraky, Abdelaziz. “Mali coup strengthens rogue groups.” Zaywa, a service of Magharebia, April 4, 2012, http://zawaya.magharebia.com/en_GB/zawaya/opinion/627>.

³⁷ Pham, J. Peter. “J. Peter Pham Discusses Western Sahara at Council on Foreign Relations – ‘The Western Sahara Crisis: Why U.S. Leadership is Needed Now’.”

Atlantic Council, April 3, 2012, <<http://www.acus.org/news/j-peter-pham-discusses-western-sahara-council-foreign-relations>>.

³⁸ Boukhars, Anouar. “Simmering Discontent in Western Sahara.” Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, March 2012, <<http://carnegieendowment.org/2012/03/12/simmering-discontent-in-western-sahara/a2ah>>.

³⁹ “Ban calls for boost in efforts to fight organized crime in West Africa and Sahel.” UN Press Centre, February 21, 2012,

<<http://www.un.org/apps/news/story.asp?NewsID=41314&Cr=organized+crime&Cr1=>>.

⁴⁰ Alexander, Yonah. “Special Update Report – Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to the Arab Spring.” International Center for Terrorism Studies, at the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies, (January 2012), <http://moroccoonthemove.files.wordpress.com/2012/02/2012-special-update-report-full-report-terrorism-in-africa-from-9-11-to-arab-spring-icts-potomac-2feb2012.pdf>>.

January 11, 2012

Algerian and Mauritanian security agencies reportedly break up major trafficking and money laundering rings. Officials say the rings are believed linked with groups such as al-Qaeda, which is working with the Polisario to traffic arms and drugs from Mauritania to northern neighbors. Mali reportedly steps up efforts against AQIM and what is believed its latest offshoot, "Al Qaida in Polisario Camps."⁴¹

January 3, 2012

Security expert Dr. J. Peter Pham, Atlantic Council, reports that economic and political reforms in Africa are "threatened by the spread of violent extremism" and "increasing links" between AQIM and other militants in the Sahel, recently "buoyed by the flow of arms and fighters" from Libya. "More ominously, AQIM has increased its linkages with the Polisario," evident in AQIM's October 23 kidnappings near Tindouf, which were "aided by Polisario sympathizers" inside the Polisario's camps. The camps offer "a ready pool of potential recruits" from "large numbers of idle young fighters."⁴²

December 27, 2011

Mali reportedly distances itself from the Polisario, accusing it of kidnapping, drug trafficking, and suspected collusion with a Sahrawi branch of al-Qaeda in the Maghreb. A source close to the government says Mali is "angry" with the Polisario, and Malian officials say the October 23 kidnapping was done in collusion with the 'Sahrawi link' of AQIM.⁴³

December 24, 2011

Mali refuses entry to "eight young Sahrawis" coming from Niger. "They had no papers. There are laws to be respected in Mali especially when it comes to dubious propaganda," said Malian police.⁴⁴

December 17, 2011

Mali warns the Polisario, "our country is not the Wild West where they can come to kill and kidnap people." Bamako will "no longer accept the violation of its territorial integrity by the Polisario Front," says a Malian Minister. A local official adds, "everybody here knows who AQIM's accomplices are, they even assisted in abducting the Europeans in Tindouf. His name is Omar al Sahraoui, but neither Mali, nor Algeria, nor the Polisario are doing anything to capture him." In 2010, al Sahraoui, reportedly a Polisario veteran, was sentenced to 12 years for kidnapping Spanish aid workers for AQIM, according to Mauritanian court papers. He was later released in a trade for the aid workers.⁴⁵

December 15, 2011

Members of the Polisario launch an armed incursion into northern Mali, killing one and abducting three others, ostensibly looking for the kidnappers of three Western aid workers taken October 23 from the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria.⁴⁶

December 10, 2011

A splinter group of AQIM confirms it is holding three aid workers kidnapped October 23 near the Tindouf refugee camps in Algeria. The group, linked by some to al Sahraoui, calls itself "Unity Movement for Jihad in West Africa."⁴⁷

November 30, 2011

The US House Subcommittee on Counterterrorism & Intelligence hears testimony that AQIM is expanding its ties in the Sahel with the Polisario, as well as militant Nigerian group Boko Haram and Somalia-based al-Shabaab.⁴⁸

⁴¹ "N. African states take down major narco trafficking network." World Tribune, January 11, 2012, <<http://www.worldnewstribune.com/2012/01/11/n-african-states-take-down-major-narcoterror-drug-network/>>.

⁴² Pham, J. Peter. "Islamist Threat to Africa's Rise in 2012." Atlantic Council, January 3, 2012, <http://www.acus.org/new_atlanticist/islamist-threat-africas-rise-2012>.

⁴³ De Serge, Daniel. "Mali distancing itself from the Polisario Front." Agence France Presse, December 27, 2011, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5i4CHA2HdwpcQJ_XrfCkoFfM4eHBQ?docId=CNG.09c4b8e975cfc23c8718b820ade10fec.161&index=0>.

⁴⁴ Ibid

⁴⁵ Bamako warns Polisario: 'Mali is not Wild West.' Middle East Online, December 17, 2011, <<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=49540>>.

⁴⁶ Ibid

⁴⁷ "Al-Qaeda splinter group' claims kidnap of Westerners." Agence France Presse, December 10, 2011,

<<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5hJQYCSJBL5aONCGiPMIyCS8SryfQ?docId=CNG.4df034a80725d0c44da18538105d6420.dd1>>.

November 28, 2011

UK Foreign Secretary William Hague says AQIM's expanding terrorist ties to other militant groups in the Sahel could have a "profoundly destabilizing" effect on a region already rocked by the Arab Spring.⁴⁹

November 24, 2011

AQIM kidnaps two French tourists from their hotel at night in eastern Mali, claiming they are spies. Officials later report that the abductions were coordinated with the Polisario.⁵⁰

November 7, 2011

Algerian Chief of Staff General Qaid Saleh reportedly reprimands Polisario chief Mohammed Abdul Aziz for allowing an al-Qaeda presence inside the Polisario-controlled camps in Tindouf.⁵¹

November 6, 2011

Washington Post columnist Jennifer Rubin cites alarm at AQIM kidnappings in the Polisario camps. "This is a catastrophe waiting to happen. The need to empty the camps, deprive AQIM of a supply of victims and accomplices, and restore order has never been greater."⁵²

October 26, 2011

Spanish daily El Pais reports on the Tindouf abductions, noting that, "to cross the checkpoints of the Algerian army and Polisario, kidnapers benefited from support of Polisario's military."⁵³

October 25, 2011

Spain requests a UN security mission to the Polisario-run camps. "We've asked the UN to send a mission to Algeria to assess the security situation in the camps of Tindouf" – Foreign Minister Trinidad Jimenez.⁵⁴

October 23, 2011

An AQIM splinter group kidnaps three Western aid workers from the Polisario-run camps in Algeria, reportedly with Polisario-insider help. "Unarmed AQIM militants entered the Sahrawi refugee camp in Tindouf, western Algeria, where sympathizers of the Polisario Front gave them weapons and helped them seek out the hostages."⁵⁵

September 29, 2011

Mauritanian President reports that AQIM has acquired Libyan arms, including surface-to-air missiles.⁵⁶

September 20, 2011

US terrorism expert Yonah Alexander, International Center for Terrorism Studies, says the "Polisario is intensifying activities to transport and smuggle illegal drugs in both North Africa and Europe. The Polisario is working with Al Qaeda in both the drug and weapons trade."⁵⁷

⁴⁸ Madden, Christina L. "Western Sahara: Forgotten Corner of the Arab Spring." World Politics Review, December 15, 2011, <<http://www.worldpoliticsreview.com/articles/10947/western-sahara-forgotten-corner-of-the-arab-spring>>.

⁴⁹ Croft, Adrian. "EU police, experts to counter al Qaeda in Africa – UK." Reuters, November 28, 2011, <<http://af.reuters.com/article/worldNews/idAFTRE7AR29020111128?sp=true>>.

⁵⁰ "N. African states take down major narco trafficking network." World Tribune, January 11, 2012, <<http://www.worldnewtribune.com/2012/01/11/n-african-states-take-down-major-narcoterror-drug-network/>>.

"Report: Al-Qaeda denies Algeria kidnappings." Associated Press, November 28, 2011, <<http://www.usatoday.com/news/world/story/2011-12-09/al-qaeda-kidnappings/51766924/1>>.

⁵¹ "Algeria said to discipline Polisario commander over ties to Al Qaeda." World Tribune, November 7, 2011, <<http://www.worldnewtribune.com/2011/11/07/algeria-said-to-discipline-polisario-commander-over-ties-to-al-qaeda/>>.

⁵² Rubin, Jennifer. "Al-Qaeda affiliate flexing its muscles in the Maghreb." The Washington Post, November 6, 2011, <http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn/post/al-qaeda-affiliate-flexing-its-muscles-in-the-maghreb/2011/11/05/gIQAANMbDqM_blog.html>.

⁵³ Kidnappers of three European aid workers benefited from polisario security apparatus' support: Spanish paper says." Morocco World News, October 26, 2011, <<http://morocoworldnews.com/2011/10/kidnappers-of-three-european-aid-workers-benefited-from-polisario-security-apparatus-support-spanish-paper-says/12992>>.

"Hard Blow to pro-independence Sahrawis and their Host Algeria." El Pais, October 24, 2011, <http://politica.elpais.com/politica/2011/10/24/actualidad/1319409584_827405.html>.

⁵⁴ Ajbaili, Mustapha. "Has Spain switched gear on the Western Sahara?" Al Arabiya, October 25, 2011, <<http://english.alarabiya.net/articles/2011/10/25/173691.html>>.

⁵⁵ "Three Qaeda hostages seized last week alive: mediator." Agence France Presse, October 30, 2011,

<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5gfsKPTlgBS_IQzBQK_R-Fdj_-z0A?docId=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4c3f07.531>.

⁵⁶ Stearns, Scott. "Gadhafi Collapse Raises Concerns Over Arms for Africa al-Qaida." Voice of America, September 29, 2011, <<http://www.voanews.com/content/article--gadhafi-collapse-raises-concerns-over-arms-for-africa-al-qaeda-130788458/145923.html>>.

September 15, 2011

Malian security forces hunt for rival gangs of drug smugglers from Mali, Niger, and the Polisario, after a desert gun battle over ton of cocaine and hashish leaves four dead, according to a Malian army official.⁵⁸

September 10, 2011

Analysts say that Libyan dictator Qaddafi's fall seriously weakens the Polisario in its dispute with Morocco on the Western Sahara, after widespread reports that Polisario mercenaries sided with Qaddafi.⁵⁹

May 29, 2011

US Congressman Mario Diaz-Balart urges colleagues in Congress to give "serious attention" to evidence that Polisario members are "participating as mercenaries in Colonel Qaddafi's murderous campaign."⁶⁰

May 20, 2011

The US Administration expresses concern to Algeria that "credible sources report" that Polisario mercenaries are being paid by Qaddafi "to fight NATO-led forces and kill Libyan protesters and rebels."⁶¹

April 21, 2011

The London Telegraph reports that senior NATO officials have received information that Col. Qaddafi is hiring 450 Polisario mercenaries for $10,000 each to fight Libyan rebels and prop up his regime.⁶²

January 16, 2011

Former Polisario Chief Police Inspector, Mustapha Salma Ould Sidi Mouloud says "the situation is grave for the youth who are marginalized" in Polisario-run camps in Algeria. "The camps are fertile grounds for Islamic fundamentalist groups and drug traffickers."⁶³

January 6, 2011

Terrorism cell and arms cache broken up in W. Sahara suggest "links between AQIM and the Algeria-backed Polisario Front."⁶⁴ Washington Post columnist J. Rubin writes, "there is ample evidence the Polisario Front... is in league with al-Qaeda."⁶⁵

January 3, 2010

US DEA former Director of Operations, Michael Braun, calls conditions 'dismal for Saharans living in the Polisario-run camps,' which have become a "breeding-ground for potential future AQIM recruits."⁶⁶

December 21, 2010

Leaders arrested in one of the Sahel's largest drug-smuggling rings are purported to have close ties to the Polisario Front. Nigerien officials call it, "one of the major drug trafficking networks" in the Sahara. It is known as "Polisario" because 90% of its members come from camps of the Polisario Front.⁶⁷

⁵⁷ "Report: Polisario working with Al Qaida in drug, weapons trafficking." World Tribune, September 20, 2011, <http://www.worldtribune.com/worldtribune/WTARC/2011/ss_terror1178_09_20.asp>.

⁵⁸ "Mali security forces hunt desert drug traffickers." Agence France Presse, September 14, 2011,

<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5g8CmJx_raUtLYfTtRp39MbQmv_bzw?docId=CNG.84013840d691548b4d501bfc5f665885.51>.

⁵⁹ "Kadhafi's fall strengthens Morocco over Western Sahara." Agence France Presse, September 10, 2011, <<http://morocoworldnews.com/2011/09/9233/gaddafis-fall-strengthens-morocco-over-western-sahara/>>.

⁶⁰ Francheska, Alyangka. "U.S. wants probe on Gadhafi's alleged recruitment of mercenaries from Algeria-backed Polisario to fight NATO, rebels." International Business Times, May 30, 2011, <<http://au.ibtimes.com/articles/154113/20110530/gade-redafi-libya-rebels-morocco-algeria-u-s-congress.htm>>.

⁶¹ "Sources: Gadhafi paying Polisario mercenaries $10,000 each to fight for him." World Tribune, May 20, 2011, <http://www.worldtribune.com/worldtribune/WTARC/2011/me_libya0607_05_20.asp>.

⁶² Couglin, Con. "Libya: Col Gaddafi 'has spent £2.1m on mercenaries'." The Telegraph, April 21, 2011, <<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/africaandindianocean/libya/8464254/Libya-Col-Gaddafi-has-spent-2.1m-on-mercenaries.html>>.

⁶³ Rubin, Jennifer. "Exclusive: Ex-Polisario Front police chief tells his story." The Washington Post, January 16, 2011, <http://voices.washingtonpost.com/right-turn/2011/01/exclusive_ex-polisario_front_p.html>.

⁶⁴ "Arrests of Terrorism Suspects Announced." The Washington Post, January 6, 2011, <<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2011/01/05/AR2011010506468.html>>.

⁶⁵ Rubin, Jennifer. "Morocco: A Different Kind of Muslim Country." The Washington Post, January 12, 2011, <<http://voices.washingtonpost.com/right-turn/2011/01/morocco-a-different-kind-of-muslim-country.html>>.

⁶⁶ Lake, Alison. "Unlikely bedfellows: Are some Saharan Marxists joining Al-Qaida operations in North Africa?" Foreign Policy, January 3, 2011, <http://mideast.foreignpolicy.com/posts/2011/01/03/unlikely_bedfellows_are_some_saharan_marxists_joining_al_qaida_operations_in_north>.

December 9, 2010

Experts cite growing concern about violence instigated by pro-Polisario militants in Laayoune, W. Sahara. "Situation is becoming more dangerous, because of the violence and because al-Qaeda is now present." – Analyst T. Tarik.⁶⁸

November 10, 2010

Algeria reports "Cocaine that comes from Brazil, Peru, and Colombia supports the nucleus of al-Qaeda in the region" – Algerian head of the National Office for Combating Drugs & Addiction, Abdelmalek Sayeh.⁶⁹

October 18, 2010

Drug ring linked to AQIM is dismantled in Morocco. VOA cites experts, evidence from Mauritania, Mali indicating AQIM has worked in the last two years "to recruit Sahrawis who are trained fighters to carry out their operations."⁷⁰

August 23, 2010

AQIM frees three Spanish kidnapping victims after Mauritania agrees to release the perpetrator, Omar Sahraoui, who is "believed to have been a senior commander of the Polisario Front in Western Sahara."⁷¹

July 2010

Mauritania sentences reported Polisario veteran, Omar al Sahraoui, to 12 years for the 2009 kidnapping of Spanish aid workers. Mauritanian court papers document that he was paid by AQIM along with at least three other Polisario veterans to organize and carry out the crime.⁷²

April 12, 2010

Security expert calls the Western Sahara conflict a "vicious cycle" that terrorists can exploit; cites "evidence that members of the military arm of the Polisario Front have been involved in illicit activities."⁷³

February 2010

Polisario veteran Omar le Sahraoui arrested in Mali, extradited to Mauritania for kidnapping Spanish aid workers.⁷⁴

December 30, 2009

Armed assailants from AQIM katibat Tarek Ibn Zaid attacked Telemeses, Niger, killing one civilian and three soldiers. The Tarek Ibn Zaid katibat is largely comprised of Sahrawis.⁷⁵

November 29, 2009

AQIM claims responsibility for kidnapping three Spanish aid workers in Mauritania. Mauritanian security services later discover that AQIM had hired Omar al Sahraoui—who was reportedly a member of the Polisario's hierarchy—and at least three other Polisario veterans to organize and carry out the abductions.⁷⁶

June 4, 2005

Two GSPC katibas, including the katiba Tarek Ibn Ziad, comprised primarily of Sahrawis, attack an army base in Lemgheity, Mauritania, killed 15 Mauritanian soldiers and injuring 17.⁷⁷

⁶⁷ "Key members of Sahara drug ring captured are from Polisario." Middle East Online, December 21, 2010, <<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=43149>>.

⁶⁸ Worth, Robert F. and Souad Mekhennet. "Desert Land in Limbo is Torn Apart." The New York Times, December 9, 2010, <<http://www.nytimes.com/2010/12/09/world/africa/09morocco.html?pagewanted=all>>.

⁶⁹ "Al-Qaeda looks to Sahel for new funding sources." Magharebia, November 10, 2010, <http://www.magharebia.com/cocoon/awi/xhtml1/en_GB/features/awi/features/2010/11/10/feature-01>.

⁷⁰ Look, Anne. "Morocco says dismantled drug ring linked to terrorists." Voice of America, October 18, 2010, <<http://www.voanews.com/english/news/africa/north/Morocco-says-Dismantled-International-Drug-Trafficking-Ring-Linked-to-Terrorists-105188824.html>>.

⁷¹ "Spanish hostages freed by al-Qaida arrive in Spain." Associated Press, August 23, 2010, <http://seattletimes.nwsource.com/html/nationworld/2012699123_apafmalispanishhostages.html>.

⁷² Pham, J. Peter. "When Crime Does Pay: The Threat of an Emboldened al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb." World Defense Review, 23 September, 2010, <<http://worlddefensereview.com/pham092310.shtml>>.

⁷³ Pham, J. Peter. "Not Another Failed States: Toward a Realistic Solution in the Western Sahara." The Journal of the Middle East and Africa 1 (2010): 1-24.

⁷⁴ "Three Qaeda hostages seized last week alive: mediator." Agence France Presse, October 30, 2011, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5gfsKPTlgBS_lQzBQK_R-Fdj_-z0A?docId=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4c3f07.531>.

⁷⁵ Soudan, François. "Mali: Polisario Connection." Jeune Afrique, October 28, 2012, <<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Article/JA2703p010-013.xml0/>>.

« Incident Summary. » Global Terrorism Database, December 30, 2009, <<http://www.start.umd.edu/gtd/search/IncidentSummary.aspx?gtid=200912300005>>.

⁷⁶ "Three Qaeda hostages seized last week alive: mediator." Agence France Presse, October 30, 2011, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5gfsKPTlgBS_lQzBQK_R-Fdj_-z0A?docId=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4c3f07.531>.

⁷⁷ Soudan, François. "Mali: Polisario Connection." Jeune Afrique, October 28, 2012, <<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Article/JA2703p010-013.xml0/>>.

"Al-Qaeda 'behind' Mauritania raid." BBC, June 6, 2005, <<http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/africa/4613107.stm>>.

June 2013

Security in the Sahara and Sahel: The growing threat posed by the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf

Evidence has become overwhelming that members from the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria are fighting alongside al-Qaida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and the Movement for United and Jihad (MUJAO) in northern Mali, and continue to engage in drug and arms smuggling in the Sahara/Sahel. Recent reports confirm that the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf have become not only a recruiting ground for terrorists and traffickers operating in the region, but also a potential place of refuge for jihadists forced out of northern Mali by the actions of French and African forces.

Indeed, on May 22, the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace released a new book, "Perilous Desert: Insecurity in the Sahara," which reported that AQIM "has found an attractive base of supporters and recruits" in the Sahara/ Sahel region. It cited increasing inroads by the group in Libya, Mali, Mauritania, and the Polisario -run refugee camps near Tindouf, which the book said represent "a tinderbox waiting to explode."¹

A week earlier, the UN Security Council warned that an "Arc of Instability" was stretching across the region, which, if left unchecked, "could transform the continent into a breeding ground for extremists and a launch pad for larger-scale terrorist attacks around the world."²

These warnings followed earlier reports about the extent of Polisario-member involvement in terrorism and trafficking in the region. On April 16, Agence France Press cited reports from an African soldier that jihadists in northern Mali were attempting to reorganize in neighboring countries, including in the Algerian camps of the Polisario Front.³ According to the soldier quoted by AFP, members of MUJAO had fled to the Algerian camps of the Polisario Front.

On March 15, the Foreign Minister of Mali, Tieman Coulibaly, confirmed that, "Polisario elements from the Tindouf camps have been identified with MUJAO fighters operating in northern Mali," adding that Polisario militia members were recruited and paid monthly "salaries ranging from 200 to 600 Euros" to fight for the AQIM-linked MUJAO. A member of the Polisario Front was likewise among seven militants taken prisoner in the battle that killed AQIM leader Abou Zeid on March 1.⁴

These developments and the region's descent into instability and terrorist violence have only increased the urgency to negotiate a solution to resolve the dispute over the Western Sahara – a long-standing conflict that has significantly inhibited regional cooperation to fight terrorism. This urgency has recently been acknowledged by UN leader Ban-Ki Moon, who on April 9 called for urgent international efforts to end the Western Sahara conflict because of fears the Mali war will spill over into the territory.

In a report to the 15-member Security Council, Ban argued, "The rise of instability and insecurity in and around the Sahel requires an urgent settlement of this long-standing dispute."⁵

The UN report added, "All governments consulted raised serious concerns over the risk that the fighting in Mali could spill over into neighboring countries and contribute to radicalizing the Western Saharan refugee camps," which one government leader in the region called "a ticking time bomb."

A review of documented incidents and expert reports confirms that the Polisario-run camps are becoming a recruiting ground for AQIM, a hub for opportunistic Polisario members trafficking arms across the Sahel and drugs into Europe, and a threat to the security of the region and reforms of the Arab Spring. The most significant of these recent developments includes:

- Members of the Polisario are fighting alongside AQIM and MUJAO in northern Mali and are engaged in terrorist incidents throughout the region – On February 4, 2013, Malian foreign minister Tiéman Coulibaly confirmed the presence of Polisario fighters among terrorist groups in Mali. He noted that Polisario militia members had been recruited to fight as mercenaries for MUJAO. His statement reaffirmed previous reports that as many as 300 members of the Polisario were fighting in northern Mali.⁶
- Members of the Polisario have developed high-level links with al-Qaeda leaders operating in Mali - On March 1, 2013, Le Figaro and France 24 reported that a fighter from the Polisario Front was among seven militants take prisoner after the battle which killed key al-Qaeda leaders Abou Zeid.⁷
- The Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria have become a recruiting ground for traffickers and terrorists – In December 2012, CNA Strategic Studies warned "there is evidence that AQIM has infiltrated the Sahrawi refugee camps in Tindouf, as well as indications that Sahrawi from these camps have jointed terrorist groups based in Mali."⁸

The CNA study cited the threat as posing "immediate concerns for the security of Western Sahara, Mauritania, Morocco, and Algeria," not to mention US interests in the region.

According to the May 2013 book, "Perilous Desert," from the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, growing numbers of disenchanted Polisario youth and fighters are being recruited by AQIM and a vast network of regional drug traffickers, adding that "there is growing evidence to suggest dangerous connections between criminal organizations, AQIM, and the Sahrawi refugees in Tindouf."⁹

- Polisario-linked drug and arms smuggling rings are operating in the Sahel – In the last two years, Algeria, Mauritania, and Mali have arrested dozens of Polisario members caught leading or operating major drug and arms trafficking rings in the region. These rings have been linked to AQIM and South American cartels engaged in trans-Atlantic drugs-for-arms trade with end markets in Europe and the Americas.

Recent estimates of the value of this trafficking amount to nearly $1 billion US dollars annually.¹⁰

In September 2012, a Carnegie Endowment for International Peace report detailed the extent of Polisario involvement, implicating Sahrawi networks with close ties to the Polisario in the drug and aid trafficking that accounts for much of the organized crime in the region. The report notes, “In the triangle between Mauritania, Mali, and Algeria, Sahrawi networks—often with the direct involvement of officials in the Polisario movement, which seeks independence for Western Sahara—trade subsidized Algerian goods and humanitarian aid southward and cigarettes northward to Algeria and Morocco.”¹¹

Further, a February 2013 study by the IUCTS cites intelligence reports that confirm al-Qaeda “has established links with Latin cartels for ‘drugs-for-arms’ smuggling through terrorist-trafficking networks that include members of the Polisario Front” in Algeria.¹²

- Polisario recruits have carried out and assisted in AQIM kidnappings – On October 23, 2011, Polisario insiders reportedly helped an offshoot of AQIM kidnap three Western aid workers from the Polisario-run refugee camps near Tindouf, Algeria.¹³ The Spanish aid workers were held for 9 months and released for an alleged ransom of $18.4 million. As a result of the insecurity in the camps, in July 2012 Spain evacuated all of its aid workers, citing “well-founded evidence of a serious increase in insecurity in the region” and “the serious risk of new kidnappings.”¹⁴

- ¹ Wehrey, Frederic and Anouar Boukhars, eds. Perilous Desert: Insecurity in the Sahara (Washington: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 2013).
- ² "'Arc of Instability' across Africa, If Left Unchecked, Could Turn Continent into Launch Pad for Larger-Scale Terrorist Attacks, Security Council Told." UN News Centre, May 13, 2013, <<http://www.un.org/News/Press/docs/2013/sc11004.doc.htm>>.
- ³ Daniel, Serge. "Defeated in Mali, Islamists begin to reorganize." Agence France Presse, April 16, 2013, <<http://www.globalpost.com/dispatch/news/afp/130416/defeated-mali-islamists-begin-reorganise>>.
- ⁴ "Ministre malien : Le Polisario livre des mercenaires au MUJAO contre des mensualités de 600 euros." LeMag, March 16, 2013, <http://www.lemag.ma/Ministre-malien-Le-Polisario-livre-des-mercenaires-au-MUJAO-contre-des-mensualites-de-600-euros_a68461.html>.
- "Le ministre malien des Affaires étrangères: 'Le soutien et l'aide du Maroc au Mali sont déterminants pour nous'." AtlasInfo, February 4, 2013, <http://www.atlasinfo.fr/Le-ministre-malien-des-Affaires-etrangeres-Le-soutien-et-l-aide-du-Maroc-au-Mali-sont-determinants-pour-nous_a38888.html>.
- "Mali : combattant d'Aqmi, il rapporte la mort d'Abou Zeid." Le Figaro, March 1, 2013, <<http://www.lefigaro.fr/international/2013/03/01/01003-20130301ARTFIG00354-mali-combattant-d-aqmi-il-rapporte-la-mort-d-abou-zeid.php>>.
- ⁵ Witcher, Tim. "Ban says W. Sahara risks being drawn into Mali war." Agence France Presse, April 9, 2013, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5iOnupKvBuc8I_WTR3J5BnNCFnmEw?docId=CNG.566cbe22180951c72bc8d9c6ad6fd9d1.d1>.
- ⁶ "Le ministre malien des Affaires étrangères: 'Le soutien et l'aide du Maroc au Mali sont déterminants pour nous'." AtlasInfo, February 4, 2013, <http://www.atlasinfo.fr/Le-ministre-malien-des-Affaires-etrangeres-Le-soutien-et-l-aide-du-Maroc-au-Mali-sont-determinants-pour-nous_a38888.html>.
- ⁷ "Mali : combattant d'Aqmi, il rapporte la mort d'Abou Zeid." Le Figaro, March 1, 2013, <<http://www.lefigaro.fr/international/2013/03/01/01003-20130301ARTFIG00354-mali-combattant-d-aqmi-il-rapporte-la-mort-d-abou-zeid.php>>.
- ⁸ Volger, Sarah. "Security Challenges in Libya and the Sahel." CNA Strategic Studies, December 2012, <http://www.cna.org/sites/default/files/research/Libya_Sahel_Security_Workshop.pdf>.
- ⁹ Wehrey, Frederic and Anouar Boukhars, eds. Perilous Desert: Insecurity in the Sahara (Washington: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 2013). April 2013. Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.
- ¹⁰ "Ban calls for boost in efforts to fight organized crime in West Africa and Sahel." UN Press Centre, February 21, 2012, <<http://www.un.org/apps/news/story.asp?NewsID=41314&Cr=organized+crime&Cr1=>>>.
- ¹¹ Lacher, Wolfram. "Organized Crime in the Sahel-Sahara Region." Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, September 2012, <http://carnegieendowment.org/files/sahel_sahara.pdf>.
- ¹² Alexander, Yonah. "Terrorism in North Africa and the Sahel in 2012: Global Reach and Implications." Potomac Institute for Policy Studies/International Law Institute, February 2013, <<http://www.terroriselectronicjournal.org/knowledge-base/selected-special-reports/>>.
- ¹³ "Three Qaeda hostages seized last week alive: mediator." Agence France Presse, October 30, 2011, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5gfsKPTIgBS_IQzBQK_R-Fdj_z0A?docId=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4c3f07.531>.
- ¹⁴ "Spain evacuates aid workers." BBC, July 28, 2012, <<http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-africa-19034164>>.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, July 05, 2013 1:34 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitor July Week 1

FYI

Subject: Blog Monitor July Week 1

Blog	Article Title/Date	Summary	Comments
GayStar News	Morocco says no to the 'threat' of gay marriage June 27, 2013	Justice Minister Mustafa Ramid (PJD), has stated that "Morocco can not even open a public debate on the issue" of gay marriage, in response to the possibility of revising a legal agreement with France mutually recognizing the validity of marriages between the two countries' nationals to include homosexuals. A letter signed by French Justice minister Christiane Taubira said that France's legalization of gay marriage did not cover 11 countries, including Morocco. It reads "In the case of an intended marriage between two people of the same sex, if one of the spouses is a national of one of these countries, the state registrar shall not solemnise the marriage."	4
Kuwait News Agency	KFAED, Morocco sign seven agreements June 27, 2013	The Kuwait Fund for Arab Economic Development (KFAED) and Moroccan Minister of Economy and Finance Nizar Baraka have signed seven agreements to finance development projects, in deals totaling $1.25 billion. The projects, including roads, dams, and education, will be financed over the next five years at $250 million per year.	0
Yabiladi	Libertés individuelles : Y-a-t-il eu un mariage d'homosexuels français à Essaouira ? Individual liberties: Did a gay wedding take place in Essaouira? June 28, 2013	There is considerable controversy in Morocco over whether or not the wedding of two gay Frenchmen was held in Essaouira over the weekend. The Minister of Tourism, Lahcen Haddad, vehemently denies that such a ceremony took place, but various unions and parties are claiming that it did. Notably, it appears that those who are disseminating information about the homosexual event's existence are anti-Benkirane politicians, hoping to tarnish the PM's reputation. The Mogador Regional Council has echoed Haddad's denials, stating in a communiqué that the aforementioned information is "irresponsible and unfounded," and "likely to harm the image of our country." Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Etats en déliquescence : Le Maroc mieux classé que la Turquie, la Tunisie ou l'Algérie Failed states:	Morocco was ranked as #93 (out of 178) on the 2013 Failed States Index, a 6-place improvement from 2012. It was ranked above Turkey, Tunisia, and Algeria. States are ranked based on scores from 0 (most vulnerable) to 120 (least vulnerable), which represent tallies of a state's vulnerability based on twelve indicators; Morocco scored 74.3. While its ranking has improved since last year, Morocco is still in the "countries in danger" category.	10

	Morocco ranked higher than Turkey, Tunisia and Algeria June 28, 2013	Translated from French
Yabiladi	Femen au Maroc : Une première militante, seins nus, au royaume Femen in Morocco: The first militant, breasts uncovered, in the Kingdom June 28, 2013	For the first time, a representative of Femen Morocco has posted a nude picture of herself with her face uncovered. Until now, the Femen Morocco website, which was launched in March, only had a few photos of its members, all of them with their faces covered. This photo depicts a woman standing in front of the city of Essaouira holding a sign reading "FREE FEMEN," in support of Amina Sboui, the Femen Tunisia member who was the center of recent controversy. Femen announced that its movement is gaining traction in North Africa, stating that there will be "millions... from Morocco to Tunisia." Some Moroccans have warned that it is unsafe for these women to protest topless in the Kingdom, stating, "Morocco is not Tunisia." Translated from French	56
Yabiladi	France : Trois Marocains poursuivis pour coups et insultes racistes à cause d'une cigarette France: Three Moroccans sued for assault and racist insults because of a cigarette June 29, 2013	Three Moroccan nationals are currently being held in Agen for hurling racial insults at two women and violently beating a man. The three men allegedly approached the women while under the influence of alcohol and asked for a cigarette. When they refused, the men allegedly began to insult them and beat a man who came to their rescue. The trial had been scheduled for last Friday morning, but was postponed pending a psychiatric evaluation of the accused. Translated from French	9
Yabiladi	Maroc-Algérie : Alger accuse Rabat d'« escalade préméditée » Morocco-Algeria: Algiers accuses Rabat of "premeditated escalation" July 2, 2013	The war of words between Morocco and Algeria continues unabated. Friday, Rabat made it known that it refused the three conditions that Algiers laid out for the reopening of the land border, describing this approach as "a practice of another age." Algeria is, once again, quick to respond, accusing Morocco this time of "premeditated escalation" against Algeria. Translated from French	28
Magharebia	Morocco faces human trafficking crisis	UN Special Rapporteur Joy Ngozi Ezeilo, on an invitation by the Moroccan government, visited Rabat, Casablanca, and Tangier last week to discuss the problem of human trafficking.	0

	June 28, 2013	"Morocco faces considerable challenges as a source, transit, and increasingly as a destination country for trafficking in persons," the UN News Centre quoted the official as saying on 25 June.
Standard Digital	Trade pact gives Kenya strong foothold in North Africa, Europe June 28, 2013	Earlier this week, more than 130 Moroccan businessmen visited Nairobi to negotiate a trade partnership. The agreement, already signed by the Kenyans, could be ready as early as September, depending on when Moroccan authorities sign. The agreement allows Kenyan exporters access to Moroccan markets without having to pay customs duties. Trade between Kenya and Morocco has steadily risen since 1998.	0
EU Neighborhood Info Center	SME sector in Morocco: interdependence of policy and practice June 28, 2013	Moroccan government officials, businesspeople, and civic society leaders met with the European Training Foundation (ETF) to discuss options to improve human capital in the country's small business sector. Latifia Echihabi, the Director General of Morocco's National Agency for the Promotion of Small and Medium Enterprises, called the meeting, and at its closing emphasized the need for innovation to improve the small business sector.	0
Bloomberg	Morocco's Cooking Gas Distributors Poised to Strike Over Margins July 1, 2013	Mohamed Benjelloun, chairman of the Moroccan Gas Distributor's Association, has stated that his organization may strike as early as this week, in order to pressure the government to raise distribution margins. "Our margins have not changed since 1998," Benjelloun said. The threat of a strike increases pressure on the government's subsidy reform plans.	0
The Herald Scotland	New market for cereals as Morocco lifts controls on feed wheat imports July 2, 2013	The Moroccan Ministry of Agriculture and the state buying agency ONICL have confirmed that the restrictions on feed wheat imports have been lifted, allowing imports to meet Moroccan feed manufacturers' annual demand of 60,000 tons.	0
WSJ	A.T. Kearney's Global Business Policy Council Holds Annual CEO Retreat in Morocco Under Patronage of King Mohammed VI July 2, 2013	A group of nearly 60 international CEOs and thought leaders gathered under the patronage of His Majesty King Mohammed VI in Marrakech for the annual CEO Retreat of A.T. Kearney's Global Business Policy Council, June 27-29. This was the first time the closed-door symposium, founded over 20 years ago, was held in Morocco.	0
Jurist	Morocco's Fast Track to Guilty July 2, 2013	Eric Goldstein of HRW writes a piece criticizing torture. While he acknowledges the efforts of MVI's truth commission, he points out that "the judiciary has been a laggard in the reform process. A partially reformed state, as it eases up on naked force as a tool of repression, may rely more on a subservient judiciary to punish opponents who go too far."	0
The Local	Scuba skeleton sparks Morocco	The discovery of a wetsuit-clad skeleton floating in the sea near Alicante, Spain, with flippers, phone, waterproofed clothes, a	0

	.ID mystery July 2, 2013	Moroccan passport and a wad of cash has triggered speculation as to the victim's identity, origin and cause of death. According to the story, currents and sea creatures are believed to be responsible for stripping the body of flesh, of which "not an ounce" remained. The passport was issued to a Moroccan man, Abdelaziz Elfayafi, born January 8, 1989 in Imzouren.
Express Tribune	Expanding scope: Morocco for exploring avenues of cooperation July 3, 2013	Moroccan Ambassador Mustafha Salahdine has suggested that Pakistan's businessmen organise an Economic Day for Morocco and invite Moroccan businessmen to explore new avenues of cooperation between the two countries. In this regard, his embassy will do the maximum to facilitate the event and make it successful. He added that Morocco wanted increased trade with Pakistan as the two countries had good potential to promote bilateral trade in different areas.	0

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, July 10, 2013 7:33 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS: an important read

The information herein is from a generally reliable source, although it has not been corroborated by third party sources.

WESTERN SAHARA / SITUATION REPORT

05/07/13

A year and a half ago, in the wake of the election of the PJD-led government in Morocco, a heady rush of optimism with regard to Moroccan-Algerian relations in general and the question of the border in particular swept through the region. At the end of January 2012, Algerian Interior Minister Dahou Ould Kablia himself publicly described the future reopening of the border as "very plausible". In private a former adviser to the Algerian presidency suggested that, while reopening the border had not been broached officially with the Moroccans, the idea had indeed been discussed at the El Mouradia presidential palace. Although this initial impetus fizzled out in the following months, the goal of bringing Algiers and Rabat closer together came to the fore again at the end of November 2012, when Secretary General Ban Ki-moon's Personal Envoy Christopher Ross presented his report to the UN Security Council in which he argued, in effect, that progress on the Western Sahara question depended on improved relations between Algeria and Morocco and promised to engage in a round of shuttle diplomacy largely to this end.

Instead of the hoped for rapprochement, however, Rabat and Algiers have descended over the past weeks and months into an increasingly virulent war of words, beginning with the media and leaders of political parties and spreading to government spokesmen, to the point where by mid-June Algerian news portal TSA was evoking a full blown "diplomatic crisis"^[1]. By the end of June, Algerian Foreign Minister Mourad Medelci was complaining to the Arabic service of the Russia Today news channel that Algeria was "more or less a deliberate target" for Moroccan narcotics exports, while Foreign Ministry spokesman Amar Belani grumbled in a statement to official Algerian news agency APS about the "premeditated escalation" in Moroccan media attacks on Algeria. There has been speculation in the media that this could degenerate still further – with some of the more alarmist commentators even wondering whether it might result in armed confrontation. While such a dramatic outcome remains highly unlikely, it is clear that tension between the two neighbours is at a peak. How and why have we arrived at this situation, and what are the implications?

If the hoped for rapprochement has failed to materialise, it does not seem to have been for lack of trying on Christopher Ross' part at least. Touring the region this spring, the UN envoy added a second, unscheduled visit to Morocco on April 11 during which he met King Mohammed VI at his palace in Fes for discussions that centred chiefly on Moroccan-Algerian relations and the security situation in the Sahara-Sahel region. This unexpected stop-over was greeted with dismay by a majority of Polisario's leadership, according to an Algiers-based Saharawi activist (especially given that Ross had contented himself with politely listening to their positions when he had visited Tindouf shortly before, without engaging any substantive discussions). Most members of the Polisario leadership, including Secretary General Mohammed Abdelaziz, saw Ross' surprise audience with the King as a sign that he was moving towards giving his blessing to the Moroccan autonomy plan for Western Sahara in his upcoming report; according to the same source, only M'hamed Khaddad, Polisario's MINURSO coordinator, is said to have judged – accurately, it would seem – that Ross would mainly focus on attempting to convince the Moroccans to give open-minded consideration to Algeria's pre-conditions for opening the border between the two countries.

A diplomat from a North African country who has long been based in Algiers, where he has over years become friends with the present Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal, confirms that the question of reopening the Moroccan-Algerian border was raised with the governments of both countries in the first months of 2013 by various “friends and intermediaries”, including the US government as well as Christopher Ross. In response to these solicitations, the source says:

Two meetings were held discreetly in Europe between representatives of Algeria and of Morocco, in order to examine the question of reopening the border. Both countries sent a diplomat and a member of the intelligence services to these meetings, which came to nothing in the end. It was obvious from the outset that they would end in failure. The Algerians demanded that the Moroccans stop flooding Algeria with tons of cannabis before the borders could be opened; the Moroccans for their part stated up front that opening the borders also meant, as far as they were concerned, freedom of movement for Saharawi refugees in Tindouf – which came down to demanding that Algiers should allow the Saharawis of Tindouf to return to Morocco [or Moroccan-held territory] as soon as the borders are reopened. In fact, for both Algeria and Morocco these meetings were simply a chore that had to be done to keep the intermediaries and friends (USA, UN, etc.) satisfied, and each had decided in advance to blame the other for their failure. The Moroccans accuse the Algerians of showing bad faith and digging up pretexts to maintain the tension in the region; the Algerians accuse the Moroccans of setting prior conditions before reopening the border can even be discussed. Initially, both voiced these accusations only in private discussions with their friends and intermediaries, by way of justifying the failure of the bilateral contacts. But unforeseen events have prompted both Algeria and Morocco to make these disputes public^[2].

The Algiers-based Saharawi activist quoted above has suggested that any tentative moves that there may have been towards reopening the border between Morocco and Algeria fell victim – as “collateral damage” – to manoeuvring at the UN over Security Council Resolution 2099 in late April: the hopes of Polisario and its supporters in Algiers had been raised by a US-penned draft tasking MINURSO with human rights monitoring, only to be dashed at the last minute when it became apparent that Moroccan lobbying had been powerful enough to force a turn-around; the Algerians, the source argues, felt this to be a humiliating measure of the deficiencies of their own lobbying, for which a number of Algerian politicians sought to compensate by restating as loudly as possible their undying support for the Saharawi cause. Henceforth, the source suggests, the Algerians will “never agree” to reopen the border without reasonable grounds to believe that a solution to the Western Sahara question is near.

There is reason to believe, however, that the real origins of the deterioration of Algerian-Moroccan relations lie elsewhere: in the internal politics of both Morocco and Algeria.

On the Moroccan side, the coalition government formed in December 2011 around the moderate Islamist PJD (the largest single party in parliament) and the conservative nationalist Istiqlal (the second largest) has been in crisis since shortly after the election of Hamid Chabat as General Secretary of the Istiqlal in September 2012. Surfing on mounting popular discontent with the PJD-led government's performance in power, Chabat was openly critical of the government's record and began to call for a reshuffle that would give the Istiqlal a larger number of portfolios and therefore greater clout within the coalition. At an extraordinary meeting on May 12 of this year the party's National Council voted to quit the government, but Chabat was persuaded by King Mohammed to postpone action on this decision until he came back from his travel to France. Against this background, the Istiqlal and the PJD have been trying to score points by striving to outdo one another in patriotism – a theme which comes with virtually no political cost domestically, however much damage its misuse may cause to the country's foreign relations. Istiqlal politicians have proved particularly virulent, with Hamid Chabat in particular going as far as to revive – in the midst of the national panic over the possible inclusion of human rights monitoring in the MINURSO's mandate – his party's old irredentist line that calls for the “restitution” of the “eastern Sahara” (i.e. western Algeria^[3]). Chabat, who has taken to dressing in Saharawi traditional costume when appearing at public meetings, repeated this demand at a party rally on May 1, suggesting that the territorial claim ought to be taken to the United Nations and announcing that he would be demanding that the issue be placed on the agenda for discussion in the cabinet; less than a fortnight later, at another public meeting, he raised his irredentist demand again, adding that certain PJD ministers ought to be “tried for treason” for having dared to suggest that the question of the “eastern Sahara” was a thing of the past.

On the Algerian side, Chabat's provocations fell on fertile ground, for more than one reason. In earlier reports^[4] we suggested that the Bouteflika camp, looking ahead to the 2014 presidential election, tended to see all discussion of the need for a new departure in relations with Morocco as a challenge to Bouteflika and to his ambitions for a fourth successive term, and therefore had every interest in amplifying traditional points of discord between Algeria and Morocco in order to prevent this issue from gaining any traction. This might have been expected to fizzle out after President Bouteflika was flown to France on April 23 for treatment after suffering a stroke and his chances of standing for re-election began to fade. But instead the festering political and institutional crisis that has broken out since Bouteflika was medevacked to Paris has actually added new incentives for Morocco-bashing. To begin with, according to the North African diplomat quoted above, there is a deep-rooted fear among Algeria's political class of Morocco seeking to take advantage of any unplanned political transitions and other moments of instability in Algeria^[5]. On top of this, Bouteflika's incapacitation has led to speculation that he may be declared unfit for office and deposed in application of Article 88 of the Algerian constitution; in that case, the presidency would, according to the constitution, be entrusted on an interim basis, pending fresh elections in no more than 45 days, to the Speaker of the upper house of parliament, Abdelkader Bensalah – who happens to be of Moroccan extraction and only acquired Algerian nationality in 1965, and furthermore did not take part in the war of independence. Even though the interim President is barred by the constitution from standing in the ensuing election and could therefore only hold office for at most 45 days, according to the North African diplomat even this would be too much for many high-ranking officers in the Algerian army and the DRS intelligence and security service, unable to countenance someone with Bensalah's profile acceding to the highest office^[6]. Indeed, it has been plausibly suggested that it was in this knowledge that Bouteflika had Bensalah installed as Speaker of the upper house in 2002, as an added protection against a “medical coup d'état”. Thus, in today's particular circumstances, playing up tensions with Morocco can be seen as a defensive measure on the Bouteflika clan against the impeachment of the President, insofar as it serves to remind those who would invoke Article 88 in order to remove him of all the reasons for their mistrust of their western neighbour and its sons.

This is not to say, however, that the non-adoption by the UN Security Council of the initial American draft of Resolution 2099 has been without effect. Speaking to us very shortly after the final, expurgated draft was adopted towards the end of April, a member of Polisario's National Secretariat went so far as to describe it as a “turning point in the Western Sahara conflict”. Although the resolution did not in the end extend MINURSO's mandate to cover human rights monitoring, it did leave the door open for other UN institutions to take up the matter, argued the National Secretariat member, adding that it was “therefore important for the Saharawis to prove to the entire world that respect for human rights is an essential element in their struggle for independence. They must now show the world that the right to self-determination is the most primary of human rights.” Accordingly, Polisario, its leaders and sympathisers have indeed been actively lobbying both the UN and Washington on the issue of human rights. Pro-Polisario Saharawis who took to the streets of Laayoune on May in what the Moroccan press described as “the largest pro-independence demonstrations ever seen in Laayoune” pointedly waved American flags along with the flag of the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic. And, according to a leading member of a Saharawi association who accompanied Mohammed Abdelaziz on his trips to Washington and Geneva in early June, the Polisario General Secretary and SADR President focussed on just one request in his meetings with US Senators and State Department officials: that the US administration should renew its support for the idea of expanding MINURSO's mandate to include the protection of the civilian population of the Moroccan-administered territories of Western Sahara^[7]. On June 12, Mohamed Abdelaziz met UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon and the British ambassador to the United Nations Mark Lyall Grant, then holder of the rotating presidency of the Security Council, inviting them both to visit Western Sahara. This was followed up with a meeting in Geneva with United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights Navi Pillay, to whom he suggested that the High Commission should intervene to defend the rights of Saharawis living under Moroccan rule.

Meanwhile, the competition for influence in Africa and beyond has redoubled between Morocco and Algeria. In a specifically African context, both are clearly very much concerned with building and sustaining diplomatic leverage for use in relation to the Western Sahara question. Thus, coinciding with the African Union's 50th anniversary celebrations in May, Algeria has been playing up its African debt write-off initiative, which has seen it cancel debts it held for some 14 African countries^[8], worth a total of almost $1bn since 2010, while Morocco has been pursuing an economic and trade pact with the members of the West African Economic and Monetary Union (i.e. the countries that use the CFA franc^[9], which is guaranteed by the French treasury, binding them very much into France's orbit). At the same time, Rabat seems to have made the best of its own African connections and of the fact that it is this year's chair of the UN Counter-Terrorism Committee, at the United Nations in mid-May, when at the initiative of Togo the UN Security Council debated security in Africa and issued a Presidential Statement calling on Sahel and Maghreb states to intensify inter-regional cooperation and coordination and adopt a “comprehensive strategy” to fight terrorism. For its part, Algeria hosted a meeting on Sahel security of the Global Counter Terrorism Forum (a grouping first launched by then Secretary of State Hilary Rodham Clinton in September 2011) in Oran in late June, at which it was able to grandstand as both a victim of and a rampart against Islamist terrorism in the wake of January's attack on the BP/Statoil/Sonatrach gas facility at In Amenas.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
 President and CEO
 The Gabriel Company, LLC
 1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
 Washington DC, 20005
 Phone: +1 202.887.1113
 Fax: +1 202.887.1115
 Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
 Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

-
- [1] 'Le DRS déconseille à des députés algériens de se rendre au Maroc', TSA, 10/06/13. TSA's article claims that, “due to the context of diplomatic crisis” with Morocco, Algeria's intelligence and security service had advised a group of Algerian parliamentarians who had recently visited the “liberated zones” of Western Sahara on the eastern side of the berm against following this up with a fact-finding visit to Morocco so as to avoid any “provocations from the Moroccan authorities.”
- [2] Algerian Foreign Ministry spokesman Amar Belani appears to have been alluding to these meetings when he told official Algerian news agency APS on June 30 that “We were surprised, during discussions that we had wanted to keep confidential, to hear [Moroccan government representatives], as if they were laying down the law, that if they were to cooperate more effectively [in cracking down on drug smuggling to Algeria] the border would have to be opened first.”
- [3] Including, in Chabat's own words, Tindouf, Bechar, Kenadsa and Hassi Beida.
- [4] AMSR #123, April 19, 2013. WSSR 11/04/13.
- [5] The diplomat points in particular to two memories which, he suggests, remain very much alive: on the one hand, the border dispute which blew up in the chaotic atmosphere of the first months of Algerian independence and culminated in the “Guerre des Sables” of 1963, during which the Istiqlal Party's daily newspaper Al-Alam famously published the party's irredentist map of “Greater Morocco” taking in around a third of Algerian territory as well as the whole of the Western Sahara, Mauritania and a large slice of Mali; and on the other, the audience granted to FIS leader Abassi Madani by King Hassan II on his yacht when he docked in Algiers in 1990, during which they are reported to had a remarkably friendly exchange on the question of the Sahara.
- [6] Article 73 of the constitution, furthermore, specifically stipulates that any candidate for election as President must, amongst other things, be an Algerian national by birth and, if born before July 1942, be able to attest to his participation in the independence struggle.
- [7] Mohamed Abdelaziz' American interlocutors at both the Senate and the State Department are said to have listened politely without taking any particular position, or even implying such, other than to insist on the need to find a solution via negotiations with Morocco under the auspices of the UN Secretary General and his Special Representative. The same source implied that the extension of MINURSO's remit requested by the Polisario General Secretary's also freezing Morocco's exploitation of the natural resources of Western Sahara, although it is hard to see quite what role the UN mission might play in this regard.
- [8] Benin, Burkina Faso, Congo, Ethiopia, Guinea, Guinea Bissau, Mauritania, Mali, Mozambique, Niger, Sao Tomé and Príncipe, Senegal, the Seychelles and Tanzania.
- [9] Benin, Burkina Faso, Guinea Bissau, Mali, Niger, Senegal, Côte d'Ivoire and Togo.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, July 14, 2013 6:11 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitor July Week 2

Subject: Blog Monitor July Week 2

Blog Name	Article Title/Date	Summary	Comments
Yabiladi	Maroc : Vers une légalisation de l'exposition d'espèces protégées sur la place Jemaâ El Fna ? Morocco: Towards legalizing the exposition of protected species in Jemma El Fna? July 3, 2013	The high commission on water and forest is currently working on legalizing the activities of so-called "charmers" in the Jemaa El Fna, who often exhibit protected species. According to the institution, the exhibition is an integral part of Moroccan culture. According to opponents, it is a blow to the environment and animal welfare. Translated from French	6
Yabiladi	Collaboration avec les terroristes : 6 ans dans les geôles espagnoles pour un Marocain Collaboration with terrorists: 6 years in Spanish jail for a Moroccan July 3, 2013	Façail Errai, a Moroccan living in Spain, has been sentenced to six years in prison for collaborating with Ansar al Mujahidine, "an international terrorist organization affiliated with Al Qaeda." Errai used his computer skills to organize some 35 domain names for the organization, that used the websites for recruitment. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	L'ex-président musulman de Melilla expulsé d'Israël Muslim Ex-President of Melilla Expelled from Israel July 4, 2013	Mustafa Aberchan, former president of the autonomous city of Melilla and current leader of the opposition party CpM (Coalition for Melilla), as well as three other members of his group, were held at Ben Gurion Airport for several hours before being expelled to Turkey. The group attempted to enter Gaza. They had permission to enter Israel, but not Gaza. CpM later denounced the incident as being "very serious." Translated from French	3

Yabiladi	Armement : la Russie propose au Maroc le sous-marin conventionnel Amur 1650 Arms: Russia proposes Conventional Submarine Amur 1650 for Morocco July 5, 2013	Russia wishes to sell Morocco a diesel submarine of the Amur 1650 class, according to Viktor Komardin, adjunct chief of Russian company Rosoboronexport. The offer comes just a week after Saadedine El Otmani, minister of foreign affairs, had visited Russia. The submarine goes pretty fast and has torpedoes, and costs around $330 million. Morocco and Russia signed a military cooperation accord in February 2012. The sub would be Morocco's first. Translated from French	7
Yabiladi	Les services secrets marocains et espagnols traquent les jihadistes parmi les MRE Spanish, Moroccan secret services track jihadists among MFR July 6, 2013	Morocco and Spain are cooperating in an anti-terrorist operation to track individuals trying to escape justice by fleeing to North Africa. After the dismantling of cells in Ceuta and Melilla, the Spanish are increasing security precautions, including increasing police presence on ferry lines. Early last week, AQIM accused Mohammed VI of collaborating with "the occupiers," of Ceuta and Melilla, and called for the recovery of the two cities. Translated from French	2
Yabiladi	Sahara : Pourparlers entre le Maroc et le Polisario à Genève Sahara: Talks between Morocco and Polisario in Geneva July 7, 2013	On 2 and 3 July, representatives from the Polisario and Morocco, as well as from Algeria and Mauritania, met at the High Commission of Refugees offices in Geneva to discuss the possibility of voluntary return of refugees. The Moroccan delegation was led by the Secretary General for Foreign Affairs, Nacer Bourita (Nasser Burrito) while the Polisario were represented by MINURSO coordinator Mohamed Khadad. A statement from the HCR announced additional visits in 2014, as well as stressing that "the option of voluntary return of refugees to their places of origin is essential for future political solution agreed with the parties under the auspices of the United Nations." Translated from French	1
Yabiladi	Rencontre entre Marocains des Pays Bas et des députés marocains Meeting between Dutch-Moroccans and Moroccan MPs July 7, 2013	On Friday, July 5, Moroccan MPs took part in a meeting organized in the Netherlands at the initiative of the Moroccan community residing in Holland. On the agenda was the situation of Moroccans in the Europe and their indispensable position in the development of Morocco. MPs in the ruling coalition reaffirmed their dedication to serving the Moroccan expatriate community. Translated from French	0

Yabiladi	Maroc/Algérie : Hamid Chabat brandit de nouveau la récupération du Sahara oriental Morocco/Algeria: Hamid Chabat once again brandishes the recovery of Eastern Sahara July 8, 2013	On 1 May, Hamid Chabat called for the retrocession of Eastern Sahara. On 6 July, on the occasion of a party meeting in the border town of Bouarfa, he reiterated his demand. He declared that "his party maintains a claim for the recovery of the entire territory of Eastern Sahara, including Tindouf, Bechar, Knadssa, Hassi Beida, and all of the plundered territory." Translated from French	32
Yabiladi	Maroc-UE : l'accord de pêche sera-t-il renouvelé le 18 juillet ? Morocco-EU: Will the fisheries agreement be renewed on July 18? July 10, 2013	The sixth round of negotiations to renew the Morocco-EU fisheries agreement will occur on July 18. Previous negotiations failed due to controversy over the Western Sahara crisis. This article speculates that King Juan Carlos' visit to Morocco just before the negotiations are set to take place in Brussels may be a "catalyst" for successful negotiations. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Maroc : 68,5% de la population fait confiance à Abdelilah Benkirane selon un sondage Morocco: According to a poll, 68.5% of the population have confidence in Abdelilah Benkirane July 10, 2013	68.5% of Moroccans trust Abdelilah Benkirane, while only 46.8% of them are in favor of the economic policy of his government. These are some of the main conclusions of the recent poll released by the Averty Market Research & Intelligence Office, in partnership with Tariq Ibnou Ziad Initiative and Hespresse. According to the results, women have less confidence in Benkirane than men and older Moroccans have more confidence in Benkirane than younger Moroccans. Translated from French	3
Yabiladi	Maroc : Le cèdre de l'Atlas dans la liste rouge des espèces menacées de l'UICN Morocco: Atlas Cedar on the UICN red list of endangered	The International Union for the Conservation of Nature (UICN) has released its 2013 list of endangered species, in which it promotes the Atlas Cedar from Least Concern to Endangered. In addition to illegal harvesting, parasites and drought have contributed to the decrease in the number of trees.	0

	species July 11, 2013
Yabiladi	Gouvernement : Mezouar, l'ami d'El Himma, au secours de Benkirane Government: Mezouar, friend of El Himma, to Benkirane's rescue July 11, 2013	Benkirane has started negotiations with head of the RNI (National Assembly of Independents) Salaheddine Mezouar. However, more extremist PJDists are wary of Mezouar, who as former finance minister was a friend of former Interior Minister Fouad El Himma, who in turn was very close to the King. Mezouar is seen as a possible replacement for current President of the chamber of representatives Karim Ghellab. Translated from French	0
All Africa	Morocco: Local Thesis Has Always Lacked Sincerity, Says Abdelkader Bensalah July 7, 2013	The Speaker of Algeria's Council of the Nation (Upper House of Parliament) Mr. Abdelkader Bensalah said Sunday in relation to the Algerian-Moroccan relations that "Moroccan thesis has always lacked sincerity," especially when comes to the Western Sahara issue. Bensalah went on to say that "each time that the issue of Western Sahara is raised in international meetings, particularly in the United Nations, Morocco's officials and media do not hesitate to make accusations against Algeria, as if Algeria is the source of all the evils and disasters in Morocco."	0
All Africa	Morocco: Council of Ministers Renews Its Call for Urgent Intervention to End Local Practices in Western Sahara July 7, 2013	The Council of Ministers has reiterated Saharawi Government's call for the urgent intervention to put an end to the practices of Moroccan state, urging to set up a UN mechanism to protect human rights in the Western Sahara. The statement, in this regard, recalled to the unfair military trial of unarmed Saharawi civilians, calling on the United Nations to assume its responsibility vis-à-vis the decolonization of Western Sahara, through self-determination referendum for the Saharawi people.
Jadaliyya	Dissecting 'Opposing' Views: Morocco Reacts to Events in Egypt July 7, 2013	This article analyzed the potential meaning behind the differing reactions to the overthrow of Mohammed Morsi in Egypt, focusing specifically on the King's official statement and Minister of State Abdella Baha's (who is a member of PJD) press release - the King's statement welcomed interim president Adly Mansour, whereas Baha's press release decried the overthrow as a "coup d'état against a legitimate democracy." The article posited that this may not actually reflect divisions in the Moroccan regime, but may actually be a calculated move on the part of the palace and the PJD that would serve both parties' political ends. In short, the apparent difference in opinion would put distance between the palace and the governing coalition, which could serve to dispel rumors that the King had co-opted the PJD as a tool of control.	0
Maghrebia	Moroccans Prepare for Ramadan July 8, 2013	Many people participating in Ramadan are worried about the increases in prices that occur around the holidays. "Prices are very high," Hamid Settati, a teacher and father of three, who was shopping at the Bab Marrakech market, told Magharebia. "I have noticed increases in the prices of many Ramadan foods as compared to previous year. Good products are expensive as	0 compared to products of less quality." On the other hand, many small business owners welcome this time of year due to the high demand they see for their products. "Ramadan is very important to us, as sellers of dates, because it is an opportunity to recover from a year of recession," Souk Ould Mina date seller Omar told Magharebia. "Ramadan is the only month in the year where we make profit because of the strong demand on our consumer products as compared to other months." The Minister Delegate of General Affairs has reassured consumers that the government has taken strict measures to ensure price control of products due to the fact that the supply in markets is twice higher than demand for sugar, oil, and butter; four times higher for tomatoes; and six times higher for legumes during Ramadan.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, July 31, 2013 11:51 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian situation report

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

July 31, 2013

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- President Bouteflika has returned to spend the rest of Ramadan in Algeria, but his condition seems if anything worse than when PM Sellal and CoS Gaïd Saleh visited him in Paris in June.
- A fortnight after Bouteflika's return, no Council of Ministers meeting has been convened it is still unclear when this will be possible.
- Nonetheless, there are signs that the decision has been taken to keep Bouteflika on until the presidential election scheduled next April, if only to buy more time for the establishment to manage the unforeseen situation created by his health problems.
- Although there have been hints that former PM Ouyahia again has the favours of DRS chief Tewfik, there still seems to be no consensus candidate of the entire military-security establishment.

Foreign Relations

- The official message of greetings issued by the Algerian Presidency on the anniversary of King Mohamed VI's accession to the throne is surprisingly laudatory, suggesting that some in Algiers may want to contain the escalating war of words with Rabat.
- The conciliatory letter to Mohamed VI came a few days after PM Sellal slapped down Moroccan irredentists in a speech in Tindouf, in which he also announced that Algeria intends to develop alone the massive Gara Djebilet iron ore deposit near the contested border.
- Drug trafficking from Morocco has been declared "a new form of terrorism" and Algeria's "number one security threat", while the smuggling of Algerian refined products to Morocco and other neighbouring countries is also being highlighted as a major security and economic problem.
- On the eastern borders, in addition to smuggling of refined products, the presence of jihadist groups in Tunisia and Libya is a growing problem, prompting an unprecedented military mobilisation along the border with Tunisia. At the same time, Tunisian media close to the ruling Ennahda party have been trying to blame Algeria's DRS for the country's worsening security.

Security

- There has been no uptick in jihadist activity for Ramadan this year, but there has been a marked shift towards the use of explosives by AQMI instead of ambushes, road blocks, etc.
- While Algiers has remained quiet, small scale clashes have continued in the oil and gas producing south, with the more offensive jihadist operations still concentrated on the eastern borders.
- The Ministry of Energy is said to be considering building an airstrip at Tiguentourine to save expatriate workers from having to travel by road from In Amenas.
- To take account of the shifting security situation, the military authorities are reported to be considering establishing a 7th Military Region for the south-east, based at Illizi.

Political Trends

On July 16, some 82 days after he was flown to France for treatment following a stroke, President Bouteflika finally returned to Algeria. Pictured on arrival at Boufarik air base in a wheelchair, the President seemed, if anything, in an even weaker state than he had appeared in photographs and video released a month previously while he was still undergoing therapy at the Institution Nationale des Invalides in Paris, and once again TV images were broadcast without sound, suggesting that his voice (and perhaps even his mental faculties) may have been impaired. A curt communiqué from the Presidency informed the public that the head of state would be observing a period of “rest and rehabilitation”, of unspecified length.

It was immediately clear that Bouteflika was in no fit state to conduct the round of individual performance assessments that have become a Ramadan tradition since he took office in 1999. Indeed, it is dubious whether he is capable of working at all as things now stand: two weeks after his return, there has still been no Council of Ministers meeting – despite the increasingly urgent need for one, the last dating back to the end of December 2012 – and no new presidential decrees have been issued^[1]. The most pressing piece of business remains the 2013 supplementary finance law, which has to be approved by a meeting of the Council of Ministers before being enacted by presidential decree^[2]. Constitutionally, only the President can chair the Council of Ministers. But it is still not clear how soon he will be considered well enough – or presentable enough– to do so.

Nonetheless, it is looking increasingly as though the choice has been made to keep Bouteflika on as President until the end of his current term in April of next year, barring any sudden new worsening of his health. His very return, one week into the holy month of Ramadan, itself points in this direction: spending Ramadan, a month of spiritual communion, among one's fellow countrymen is to all intents and purposes a social and political obligation for all Arab heads of state; if, on the other hand, Bouteflika had been left to continue his treatment (or slowly fade away) abroad during Ramadan, this would have been a strong hint that he had been written off as a lost cause by the rest of the establishment. Despite all the inconvenience it may cause, muddling through with an enfeebled Bouteflika until the scheduled election date presents the advantage for the military and the DRS of buying time. Past experience suggests that the Algerian military-security establishment prefers to take its time digesting unforeseen political circumstances: back in September 1998, when then President Liamine Zeroul decided to throw in the towel, he had initially intended to resign with immediate effect but was prevailed upon by the military chiefs and DRS commander Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène to stay on for five more months to give them time to pick a successor and prepare the elections.

There have been some limited indications that preparations have begun. A scandal that has suddenly broken out concerning the use of government advertising budgets to favour certain newspapers over others for political reasons may, according to a source with decades of experience of the workings of the DRS, be a precursor to a purge of the 'independent' media, and in particular of those newspapers held to be too close to the Bouteflika clan (the President's brother Saïd Bouteflika is understood to have been instrumental in setting up a number of new newspapers recently, apparently with the connivance of the DRS's head of media management, 'Colonel Fawzi', who was dismissed as the advertising scandal broke). Meanwhile, Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal has been continuing his inspection visits to the provinces, during which, according to one usually well-informed media source, he has been distributing additional funding to the provincial authorities (wilayas) in a manner that is entirely reminiscent of the allocation of special funds to the wilayas in the run-up to the 2004 presidential election, which were used to boost the Bouteflika campaign against his challenger, Ali Benflis. Thus the media and the local administration seem to be being primed to give maximum support to the 'official' candidate when the time comes.

But there still appears to be no clear candidate of the establishment. While Sellal has been tipped as a likely successor and has begun, as we noted last month, to adopt something of a presidential bearing on his tours of the provinces, he is said not to be particularly keen to assume the role. On the other hand, there have been signs that former Prime Minister Ahmed Ouyahia, who was long thought to be DRS chief Tewfik's favoured candidate^[3] but seemed to have fallen by the wayside when he left the government in September of last year and the leadership of the RND a few months later, may be making a comeback: the day after Bouteflika's return, Ouyahia was summoned for an audience with Tewfik, news of which was duly leaked via an online newspaper of which Tewfik's own son is co-owner, in what one usually astute source has suggested was a deliberate hint that the head of the DRS had once again bestowed his blessing on the former PM. Meanwhile, Ali Benflis, the former head of government and FLN leader who stood against Bouteflika in 2004 with the complicity of the army chiefs (only to see victory snatched from him due to a rapprochement between Bouteflika and Tewfik), is actively putting together his campaign team and is said to be waiting for the nod from the top brass. Further complicating the search for a consensus candidate of the military-security establishment, there have been suggestions that some elements within the army's officer corps are more and more openly resentful of the predominant role that the DRS acquired at the expense of the army after Tewfik's 2004 deal with Bouteflika.

One possibility, if the army chiefs and the DRS prove incapable of finding a suitable candidate for 2014 that they can all agree on, might be a semi-open election, in which no single candidate would be clearly identified as the regime's choice (even if all would-be candidates are carefully screened and precautions are taken to ensure that no truly hostile contender stands a chance of winning). From a certain point of view, this might seem a tempting choice: it might help to re-engage the interest of an increasingly jaded electorate, offering at least the illusion of democratic change, while winning the praise of the international community. But the chaos that is currently engulfing Egypt, where the military is playing a very high-stakes game, may make their risk-averse Algerian counterparts think twice before taking such a leap into the unknown.

Foreign Relations

In a letter to King Mohamed VI of Morocco to mark the 14th anniversary of his accession to the throne on July 29, President Bouteflika (or whoever is currently writing his mail for him) spoke in glowing terms of his “firm determination to boost Algerian-Moroccan relations and raise them to the highest levels in the interest of our two brotherly peoples” and lauded the “grandiose achievements Morocco has made thanks to the important reforms that you initiated as of the beginning of your reign, [and which] reflect the wisdom of your policy.”

While protocol of course dictates that such greetings should at least be polite, this letter was outstandingly glowing in its praise for the Moroccan monarchy (“I pray that God Almighty grant you and the entire, honorable royal family health and prosperity and guide the Moroccan people to even greater progress” etc.), suggesting that the Algerian Presidency may feel it is time to tone down the rhetoric that has been flying in both directions of late.

In a speech five days before Morocco's Fête du Trône, Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal also seemed – at first glance, in any case – to be extending a hand of friendship. “Algeria has no problems with neighboring countries,” proclaimed Sellal. “Its position, based on good neighborliness, is constant. Algeria has no scores to settle with anyone and seeks no trouble with anyone. We are advocates of good, not evil. We support dialogue to ensure peace and security, in our Algerian nation and in the entire Maghreb nation.”

But the Prime Minister's remarks were not entirely devoid of ambiguity. In his ardent statement of Algeria's good faith, it is possible to read an implicit criticism of the bad faith of others, especially when taken together with his strident call, clearly directed at Morocco, “for the Maghreb countries to consult and cooperate in securing their common borders and fighting the phenomenon of smuggling”. Perhaps most significantly of all, he delivered his speech during his inspection visit to the south-western wilaya of Tindouf, on the border with Morocco – an area to which Hamid Chabat, head of Morocco's nationalist Istiqlal Party, has recently sought to revive the historic Moroccan claim, provoking paroxysms of indignation in the Algerian media and political class. While in Tindouf, furthermore, Sellal announced an immense, $15bn plan to develop the massive iron ore deposits at Gara Djebilet, some 140 km from the town of Tindouf. According to the 1972 Rabat accords on the Algerian-Moroccan border, in which Morocco theoretically renounced its claim to Tindouf, Morocco and Algeria were supposed to develop Gara Djebilet jointly – but this has remained a dead letter in light of Morocco's failure to ratify those accords. The last time Algiers raised the prospect of developing the deposits back in 2005, when the Ministry of Energy and Mining announced an (ultimately inconclusive) international bid round, was also during a period of heightened tension with Rabat. On balance, therefore, Sellal's statements in Tindouf seem to have been calculated more than anything else to cock a snook at Hamid Chabat and his fellow irredentists in Rabat.

At the same time, the hue and cry over cross-border smuggling, which has been building up for the past couple of months, reached new peaks in July. While official news agency APS reported that some 78 tonnes of Moroccan cannabis had been seized by the Algerian security forces in the first six months of this year (up 9.1% on last year), independent daily L'Expression, reporting that as much as a tonne had been seized in a series of raids in different parts of the country between July 13 and 23^[4], cast the phenomenon as “a new form of insecurity: narcoterrorism”. Interior Minister Daho Ould Kablia used similar language when he announced on July 24 that henceforth the army was to be put in charge of combatting drug smuggling: “We are waging a war. It is a war against a new form of terrorism: drugs trafficking.” Driving the point home, an anonymous “senior Algerian official” told Reuters that “we consider drug trafficking today to be the first threat to our security. Terrorism comes second.” And at the end of the month, Farouk Ksentini, head of the Algerian government's official human rights commission, chipped in with his contribution:

Drugs have become a weapon that is used against Algeria and it is the duty of the Algerian state to guard against this scourge through tough decisions to protect both its population and its economy. [The international community] knows that Morocco, Algeria's neighbor, is a drug producing and exporting country [and it is therefore somewhat surprising to hear] voices calling for the reopening of the border with Morocco while drug trafficking is in full swing.

As Morocco begins to debate the possibility of legalising the production and sale of cannabis – at the initiative of the ruling PJD and the Parti de l'Authenticité et de la Modernité, which is close to the Palace – such complaints are hardly likely to die down.

The other side of the coin, of course, is the trafficking of subsidised Algerian goods, and in particular refined products, out of Algeria. This too has been abundantly commented upon. Mid-month, Interior Minister Daho Ould Kablia condemned fuel smuggling as a threat both to national security and the economy, claiming that as much as 25% of petrol and diesel produced in Algeria is smuggled abroad, and a few days later Energy Minister Youcef Yousfi suggested that 1.5bn litres of fuel seep over the country's borders every year, enough to fuel 600,00 vehicles. Emergency measures taken so far to stem the flow include the digging of trenches along parts of Algeria's western and eastern borders, and fuel rationing in border areas, which is proving highly unpopular. Beyond this, it has been decided at an inter-ministerial meeting called by PM Sellal to discuss the problem of smuggling to mobilise no fewer than 17 “mobile operational brigades” of customs officers, comprising a total of 540 men, to patrol the border with Morocco, and another nine brigades comprising 217 men, on the border with Tunisia.

For while the Algerian political class' rhetoric tends to vilify Morocco almost as a matter of course, trafficking is a mounting problem on the country's eastern borders as well. Here, in addition to fuel smuggling, Algeria faces a growing threat not so much from the metaphorical terrorism of drugs but the altogether real terrorism of AQMI and allied groups, with small but tenacious armed groups active just across the border in the areas of Djebel Chaambi (Tunisia's highest mountain) and El Kef. This appears to have given rise to a new cross-border trade in fertilizer, for use in bomb-making (see below, Security). In addition, according to Tunisian radio station Mosaïque FM (July 12), Algeria has alerted Tunisian and Libyan authorities that Mokhtar Belmokhtar's Al Mouaqioun Bi Dimaa ('those who sign in blood') has established a thirty-strong group, which moves between northern Mali, Niger, south-east Libya and southern Tunisia and supposedly planning attacks against oil facilities and other French and US interests in Algeria, Tunisia and Libya. The group is said to be made up of jihadists of various nationalities sprung from prison in Niamey, Niger, in early June in a jailbreak that Belmokhtar's organisation is thought to have organised in collaboration with AQMI-offshoot MUJAO.

Algerian Gendarmerie sources quoted by the Algerian press have suggested that smuggling across the Tunisian border has been drastically reduced if not brought virtually to a halt over the last few days as a side-effect of the exceptional military mobilisation^[5] decreed after the arrest in the Algerian wilaya of El Oued in mid-July of Kamal Ben Arbia, a.k.a. Abou Fida, an Algerian jihadist who is said to have been one of the leaders of the group that is active in the Djebel Chaambi area. But while the interrogation of Ben Arbia is said to have provided valuable intelligence on the Djebel Chaambi group, this was not enough to prevent the slaying of nine Tunisian soldiers in a jihadist ambush near the border with Algeria on July 29 – the bloodiest single incident to date in Tunisia's incipient insurgency. Consequently, tension in the border area now running very high, and seems to be spilling over into the political arena: as of July 30, Tunisian media close to the ruling Ennahda party began to spread rumours that Algeria's DRS was somehow behind the “Chaambi massacre” and possibly even the killings of two leftist opposition politicians in Tunis, with one commentator calling on President Moncef Marzouki to summon the Algerian ambassador to provide an explanation. Although these conspiracy theories have not been taken up officially by the Ennahda-led government in Tunis, they can scarcely be expected to go down well in Algiers.

Security

With levels of jihadist activity in July running at about the same as in June and slightly below what we saw in May (10 jihadist operations in June, 11 in July), there has clearly been no “Ramadan effect” this year — the holy month of fasting, considered a particularly favourable period for martyrdom by jihadists, frequently saw a spike in armed activity in the past. As of the end of the 1990s, as the armed groups' strength dwindled, this effect has become more irregular (the last time it was observed was in 2011).

There was however one noticeable change in the pattern of AQMI operations: whereas in the recent past bomb attacks have made up only about a third of AQMI operations, in July all but one were bombings. No shooting ambushes, fake checkpoints, homemade mortar attacks or other types of the usual small-scale AQMI operations have been reported since late June — only bombings. The conclusion the Algerian press jumped to — namely that this is a sign of an “AQMI so weakened that it can no longer afford to attack the security forces directly” — may be a little hasty. The fact is that making and deploying IEDs requires infrastructure (smuggling networks, workshops and experts to make the bombs and operatives to place the devices and remotely detonate them, etc.), and AQMI clearly still has that infrastructure in place. It also of course requires access to the necessary inputs, and this factor may provide part of the explanation of the abrupt turn to bombings as the dominant tactic. Since the spring, there have been repeated reports of large quantities of ammonium nitrate fertilizer, the basic ingredient in the commonest form of homemade bomb, being smuggled into Algeria, where it is subject to strict controls, from increasingly lawless western Tunisia. Algerian daily Al Mihwar Al Yaoumi (29/07) reports that an Algerian gendarmerie investigation has traced shipments of ammonium nitrate seized near the border back to private trading companies in Tunisia, while El Watan (27/07) has claimed that confessions extracted from Kamal Ben Arbia (see above) had confirmed the existence of a Tunisian group belonging to AQMI operating along the border with Algeria (specifically with the Wilaya of El Oued) that specialises in fertilizer smuggling^[6].

ALGIERS and its environs were quiet over the past month, while AQMI's “heartland” in KABYLIA saw only four operations. In the wilaya of Bouira, after a wave of jihadist attacks starting in late May (see previous report), it was the army's turn to go on the offensive, with large-scale search and destroy missions in the central part of the wilaya that reportedly left 15 jihadists dead between July 5 and 15. In one notable incident in the NORTH-EAST, a roadside bomb exploded on July 28 on the path of a Gendarmerie patrol near the base camp of Japanese employees of COJAAL (the Japanese consortium working on Algeria's East-West highway development project) in the area of Harrouche, in the south of the wilaya of Skikda, causing no victims.

In the SOUTH and the OIL AND GAS PRODUCING REGIONS while there were no actual attacks on oil facilities in July, the Algerian authorities are clearly worried that jihadist groups coming from the eastern border might be targeting them. On July 7, according to El-Khabar, a purported attempt by two MUJAO jihadists to target facilities of Sonatrach drilling subsidiary ENTP in Hassi Messaoud was blocked when the army and Border Guard “managed to foil a sophisticated attempt to infiltrate the Algeria-Libya border” and arrested the two jihadists, seizing “80kg of Indian-made explosives hidden in a Toyota offroader” (the newspaper gave no further details). And on July 17-18 Algerian army helicopters reportedly intercepted two offroaders carrying six jihadists in the area of the Algeria-Tunisia-Libya tripoint and destroyed one of them, while the second managed to escape. Two men, believed to be of Tunisian nationality, were killed in the operation and a number of “heavy machine guns” and “mortar shells” were recovered. In this case, it is believed the group was trying to deliver weapons from Libya to Tunisian jihadists.

On July 20, L'Expression reported that the Algerian authorities considerably stepped up border security along the length of the border with Tunisia and put border guard and army units in the area “on maximum alert” in reaction to intelligence information obtained from a detained jihadist (presumably Kamal Ben Arbia) to the effect that a “$50m shipment of weapons” was on its way from Libya to Tunisian jihadists holding out in the Djebel Chaambi mountain area not far from the Algerian border. Meanwhile, in response to the concerns of international oil firms in the wake of the In Amenas attack in January^[7], the Ministry of Energy and Mining is reported to be considering building a runway at the Tiguentourine site so that staff can be flown in directly from Hassi Messaoud instead of flying to In Amenas and completing the journey by road.

On Algeria’s southern border, meanwhile, things were comparatively quiet, with only three noteworthy operations over the past month. According to “senior security sources” quoted in El-Khabar, Algerian army commandos on July 7 carried out a night-time raid on a jihadist group “near Tin Sika, west of Tinzaouatine” on the border with Mali, wilaya of Tamanrasset, in which seven armed men, believed to belong to AQMI, were killed and an eighth captured. “Informed sources” told the newspaper the operation was based on intelligence obtained from smugglers who had been “robbed” by the jihadists. A week later, on July 14, the army raided a “secret fuel depot” hidden in the desert to the east of Bordj Baji Mokhtar and “guarded by armed men”, believed to be smugglers working for jihadist groups. Seven armed men, two of them Malian nationals, were arrested and 10,000 litres of fuel recovered as well as an offroader, small arms, communications devices and GPS navigation instruments. And during the night of July 26, Army and Gendarmerie units intercepted a “suspect truck” near the village of Arak, about half way between In Salah and Tamanrasset, and killed two of the three people on board. The truck was found to be carrying 12 machine guns and 5 million Algerian dinars in cash (about $60,000). The two slain men are believed to be AQMI fighters; the third, the driver, said he did not know the two men were “terrorists” and had taken them for smugglers.

Hence the pattern we observed last month – whereby jihadist activity on Algeria’s southern border mostly turns around survival (smuggling supplies into Mali and fighters out of it) while on the eastern border it is generally more offensive in nature – appears to be holding and may even have grown more marked^[8]. To take account of this new reality the Algerian authorities are reportedly considering re-drawing the map of military command areas to create a 7th Military Region, based in Illizi, to cover the border areas with Libya and Niger. Currently that sector is part of the 4th Military Region, headquartered in Ouargla, more than 1,000 km from the southern section of Algeria's border with Libya.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
 President and CEO
 The Gabriel Company, LLC
 1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
 Washington DC, 20005
 Phone: +1 202.887.1113
 Fax: +1 202.887.1115
 Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
 Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

-
- [1] A handful of decrees were issued during Bouteflika's hospitalisation in France – including the annual round of military promotions on July 4, and before that the ratification of a memorandum of understanding on visas with Spain and the appointment of a new ambassador to Paris – but there are serious doubts as to the legality of these documents: either they were signed by Bouteflika himself from his Parisian sickbed, which according to certain Algerian constitutional lawyers controvenes the principle of national sovereignty; or, as seems more likely, they were signed on his behalf, perhaps using a scanned version of his signature, by his office in Algiers (most likely by his brother and advisor Saïd).
- [2] When parliament is in recess as it now is, the President is empowered to pass urgent legislation by decree, subject to ex post facto parliamentary approval when the assembly reconvenes.
- [3] Aside from his long-standing collaboration with the DRS and his appetite for hard work, Ouyahia's advantages, in Tewfik's eyes, lay in the fact that he does not belong to the generation that fought the war of independence, making it possible to present him as a candidate of renewal, and the fact that he is neither a westerner nor an easterner but a Kabyle, offering the hope that he could be passed off as a candidate of national unity.
- [4] At the end of the month, this haul was easily surpassed when 1.83 tonnes of cannabis were seized in a single operation in the Wilaya of Tlemcen.
- [5] Six Gendarmerie helicopters together with three Air Force fighters equipped with night-vision equipment are reported to be covering the border, from El Tarf in the north to El Oued in the south, while on land some 500 Gendarmerie and Army vehicles are patrolling the border strip. Orders have reportedly been issued to stop and check any person or vehicle moving within thirty miles of the border.
- [6] Strangely, however, El Watan's story – also covered by various Tunisian media – refers explicitly to the smuggling of phosphates (of which Tunisia is a significant producer) rather than ammonium nitrate. Although it is technically possible to use phosphate rock to produce white phosphorus, which can be used in incendiary devices and as such has some history of use by non-state actors dating back to the late 19th and early 20th century, it cannot be used to produce the kind of explosives typically used by AQMI. An earlier version of the story which appeared in El Khabar (24/07) did not mention the alleged AQMI fertilizer smuggling ring in Tunisia but did claim that an Algerian customs service patrol with army support had intercepted a shipment of one tonne of “phosphates for use in making bombs” near the Tunisian border east of El Oued during the night of July 20-21.
- [7] Representatives of BP and Statoil told Reuters (17/07) that they are still waiting for “cast-iron assurances” from Algiers before they send expat staff back to In Amenas:
 Sources close to BP and Statoil say the companies want to make sure the [troop] reinforcements [at the site] are sustained. One of the major issues is where the army's decisions are being made — at the Defence Ministry or at the base camp,” one of the sources said. Another source said: “We want to make sure the higher number of troops are maintained when we go back.”
- [8] Bucking this trend, however, an account in Algerian daily El Mihwar of the interception of the truck carrying weapons and other goods apparently destined for AQMI fighters near Arak, Wilaya of Tamanrasset, on July 26 seemed to imply that the vehicle was travelling north (perhaps towards Biskra) rather than south.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, August 01, 2013 12:16 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: EXTREMELY IMPORTANT: SENATE-HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS PROCESS
Attachments: House-Senate appros 2014 30July13 FINAL.docx

Enclosed is an a complete analysis of the encouraging actions taken in the House and Senate Appropriations committees that could turn out very favorable for Morocco. Please read the attached as it is very important to have a full understanding of the complexities and opportunity involved in this current action. I suggest that we carefully consult closely in the coming weeks, so as not to make any confusion. I am available to meet with you on this subject at your convenience. Also, we will translate this document into French tomorrow, so you will have it by the end of Friday. Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

Appropriations Report

One of our principle goals has been to secure appropriations bill language mandating the spending of US money in the Western Sahara and removing any restrictions on US assistance to Morocco, thus further supporting Moroccan sovereignty in the Sahara. This July, both the House and Senate Committees debated their versions of the Foreign Operations bill and below are the results:

House Appropriations Report

The language for Morocco was highly favorable, as this section that will have the full force of law (if passed and signed by the President) states that US assistance for Morocco shall be spent in territories administered by Morocco. It also requires that a report from the State Department be submitted to ensure that money is being spent according to their wishes. In the same report, the committee also requests information on what the US is doing to support a decision based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty, including efforts to find durable solutions to the refugee crisis in the Polisario-run camps.

After the House language became public, and before the Appropriations committee took action on the bill, the RFK Center sent a letter from Kerry Kennedy and Santiago Canton and lobbied the House Appropriations Committee to remove the language. The Polisario and Algerian lobbyists recruited Representative Betty McCollum to delete the provision favorable to Morocco and insert language that would ban spending US assistance in territories administered by Morocco, require a report on human rights conditions, and report on what the US is doing to support a referendum. This amendment was an attempt to remove our language that signals US support for autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty and funding in the south and replace it with language that would support a referendum.

McCollum and the Algeria/Polisario lobbies furiously lobbied both the Committee and the US State Department. In the below request from McCollum, the State Department sent the following misleading reply:

Email from Representative McCollum's staff to the State Department:

Hi,

Attached is the report language for your reference.

The earliest we can get an answer on if this is reflective of current policy and if the State Department has a position on this language and the language in the bill would be very helpful.

Part of the Reply from the State Department:

(SBU) The Western Sahara is disputed territory bordered by Morocco, Algeria, and Mauritania. It is currently administered by Morocco. Spain's withdrawal from its African colony, Spanish Sahara, in 1975, led to a territorial dispute which was taken up by the UN Security Council. In 1991, the Security Council established the UN Mission for the Organization of a Referendum in the Western Sahara to offer a choice between independence (favored by the Polisario Front) and integration into Morocco (favored by Morocco). When Morocco's current monarch, King Mohamed VI, ascended to the throne in July 1999, he strongly reasserted Morocco's claim to the Western Sahara.

(SBU) The United States does not recognize Morocco's claim of sovereignty over the Western Sahara. The U.S. government has sought to avoid actions which may be seen to undermine support for the UN-mediated process.

(SBU) Any aid provided in the Western Sahara could be perceived as tacit acceptance of Moroccan sovereignty there and as undermining our efforts to support the UN process. Thus, historically, the State Department has not directed U.S. foreign assistance to the territory of Western Sahara. For the same reasons, the U.S. government is not currently planning to use any bilateral assistance funds designated for Morocco for programming in the Western Sahara.

So with the support of the RFK Center, the Algeria and the Polisario lobbies, McCollum, and the misleading response from the State Department, McCollum was able to attempt to offer her amendment to remove our language and insert language that is harmful to Morocco.

Fortunately, we learned about this in advance from our sources on the Committee and were able to recruit three Champions: Representative Jim Moran (D-VA), Representative Kay Granger (R-TX, Chairwoman), and Representative Mario Diaz-Balart (R-FL)) to strongly support the favorable bill language. We also organized a broader outreach to every single member and staffer who was either neutral or supportive of our language (all members except Representatives Barbara Lee, Frank Wolf, and McCollum).

Due to our annual briefings on this issue, the committee Members were generally aware of it when we spoke with them before the vote, knew that they supported Morocco, and were able to understand why the amendment offered by Representative McCollum was so harmful to current US policy. Over 20 members of the Committee had signed public letters supporting current US policy and all of them were reminded of this before and during the debate.

Thanks to our efforts, both to secure the original provision in the bill and then to educate and organize Members to oppose the effort to remove it, the amendment was defeated by an overwhelming majority on voice vote (a voice vote is only allowed when the outcome is so one sided that a recorded vote is deemed unnecessary). If and when this bill is passed and signed by the President later this year, it will be a significant victory for Morocco, as it would send a strong signal that autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty is supported in American law.

Our ongoing efforts to educate Members on this issue resulted in a massive victory for Morocco and a clear defeat for Algeria and the Polisario. This overwhelming defeat in the House should enable us to retain the preferred language when the Senate and House meet in conference where Senator Leahy is almost certain to oppose it. We have the support of almost the entire Committee (Democrats and Republicans) and it will be difficult for Senator Leahy to remove something that has so much public support in the House.

Senate Appropriations Report

Last year, in our effort to remove the FMF restriction on Morocco, we helped secure support for removing the Leahy restriction from the bill and to remove any FMF restrictions on Morocco. This was never made public because Congress never passed the bill. However, the watered down compromise language that we secured last year now appears in this year's Senate report and has no restrictions on FMF funding to Morocco, a victory for Morocco. In this case, Senator Leahy's only recourse is to request a report on the Western Sahara. If this language is included in the final Senate version of the bill, it would mean that Leahy has nothing against Morocco in the bill and that FMF assistance to Morocco can go forward without restrictions.

Further, The Leahy language in the report acknowledges the strategic importance of Morocco, and then goes on, in a neutral manner, to request a report on certain human rights issues. The statement doesn't pass judgment, but simply asks for a State Department report. Most importantly, the report does not necessarily have to turn out negative. Morocco can work with the US Embassy and State to actually write a favorable report that would result in a positive situation for Morocco.

What next?

Given the amendment introduced by McCollum and the attempts by the RFK Center and the Algeria/Polisario lobbies, we expect a vigorous debate about our section of the House bill in the fall. We will remain extremely vigilant if either the House or Senate bill goes to the floor so as to prevent the opposition from removing this provision at any cost. Representative McCollum's amendment backfired on the opposition, which will only strengthen the position of the House, as the House leadership now knows their strength going into conference with the Senate. Since the Senate bill does not include any provision against Morocco, this means that we can focus our full efforts on retaining the positive language without worrying about also trying to remove something from the Senate bill.

Much work remains to be done before the appropriations bill is signed into law. However, our position is strong thanks to our continued outreach in the both the House and Senate, and represents for the first time an opportunity to concretize in US law support for autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty in the Sahara. It is important that we fully understand and appreciate the importance and complexity of what has been achieved in the appropriations process to date, and that we carefully consult closely in the coming weeks, so as not to cause any confusion during this effort. We look forward to speaking with you soonest on this issue.

Please find below is a side-by-side comparison of the House Bill and Report Language versus the Senate Report Language.

	House Bill & Report Language	Senate Report Language
FMF	In the House Report Morocco—The Committee supports not less than $7,000,000 for Morocco, which is the same as the request.	In the Senate Report Morocco- The Committee notes that Morocco is a strategic ally in North Africa where the United States has an interest in preventing terrorism and promoting democracy. The Committee directs the Secretary of State to update the report required by section 7041(g) of division I of Public Law 112-74, including on steps taken during the previous 12 months by the Government of Morocco to release political prisoners and support a human rights monitoring and reporting role for the U.N. Mission in Western Sahara in cooperation with the Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights.

Title III; Refugees; Autonomy- Sovereignty	In Section 7042 of House Bill (g) MOROCCO —Funds appropriated in Title III of this Act that are available for assistance for Morocco shall be made available for any region or territory administered by Morocco, including the Western Sahara: Provided, That the Secretary of State, in consultation with the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development, shall submit a report to the Committees on Appropriations, not less than 90 days after enactment of this Act, on requirements under this section in the report accompanying this Act. In the House Report Subsection (g), "Morocco" requires the Secretary of State, in consultation with the Administrator of USAID, to submit a report, not less than 90 days after enactment of this Act, which shall include:(1) a description of the needs related to development and democratic reform in the regions and territories administered by Morocco and how funds made available in Title III of this Act for assistance for Morocco will be used to address such needs; and (2) steps taken to resolve the longstanding dispute over the Western Sahara, based on autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty, including efforts to address durable humanitarian solutions to the protracted refugee crisis in the camps near Tindouf, Algeria.
--	---	--

Democratic Transition Fund	In the House Report Near East —The Committee recommendation includes not less than $360,000,000 for assistance for Jordan and supports continued funding for strategic priorities in the Middle East, including for Morocco, the Near East Regional Democracy program, and the Middle East Regional Cooperation program.	In the Senate Report The Committee recommends $5,000,000 for Transition Fund, a new multi-donor trust fund for extraordinary costs to assist Arab countries in transition, including Egypt, Tunisia, Jordan, Morocco, Libya, and Yemen.
--	---	--

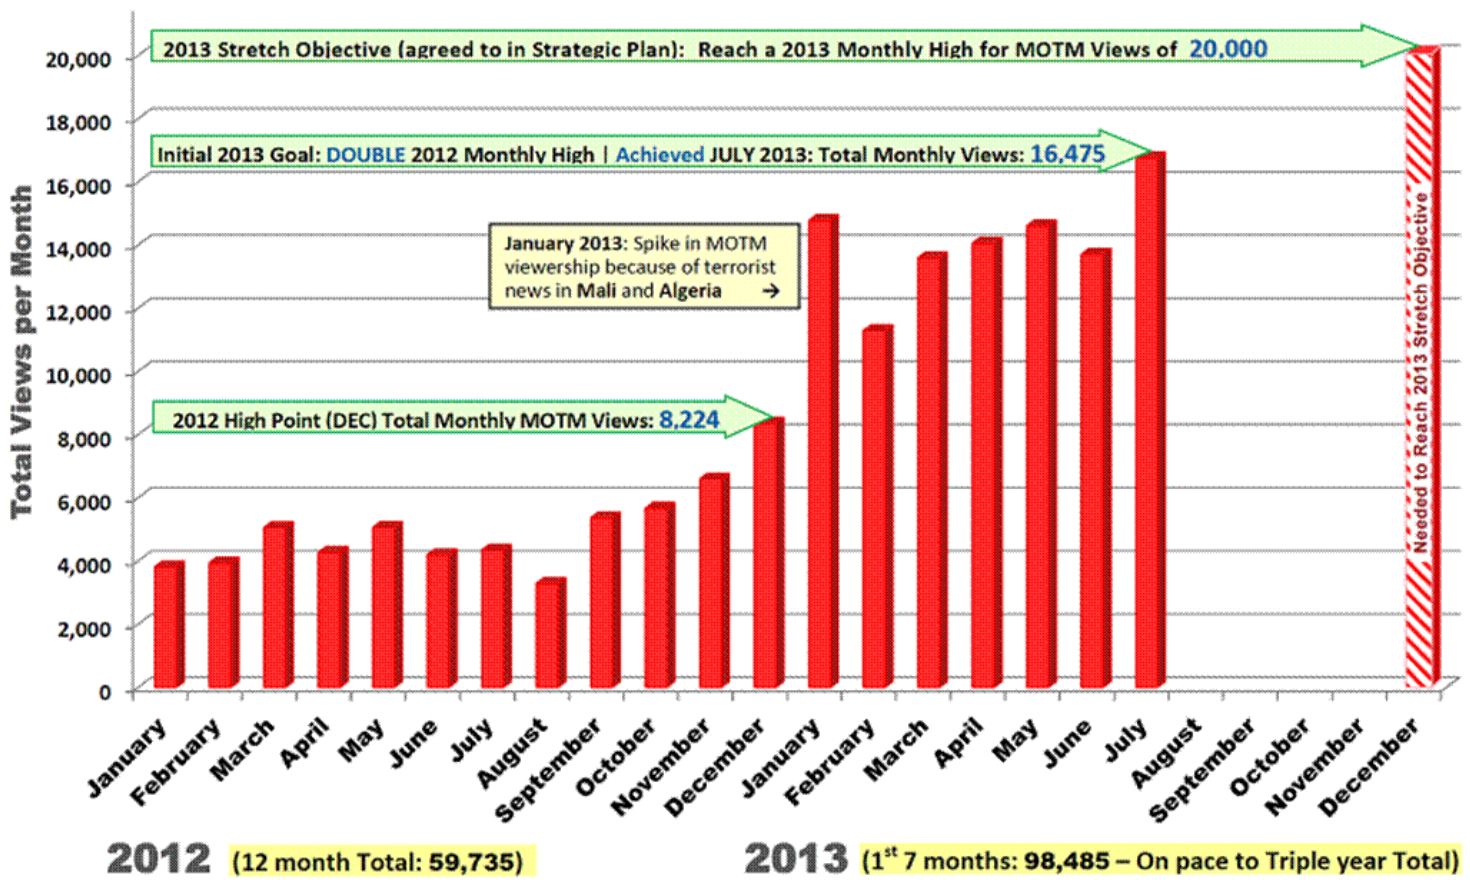

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, August 05, 2013 12:29 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Morocco On The Move UPDATE and Good News

Morocco on the Move just achieved its goal for the year in terms of monthly hits. See below

I wanted to give you a quick update with a few highlights from our Morocco On The Move stats, because we've got some good news:

- At about 11:30 PM Wednesday, July 31 (with about 30 minutes to spare), we succeeded in achieving one of our key MOTM goals for the year, which was to double the best monthly viewer total we had last year. In December 2012, a couple of months into a steep & steady climb that began in Oct-Nov. last year, we reached 8,224 views for the month, which was almost double our previous average monthly rate that had hovered around 4,000 a for most of the year before. Last month, July, we more than doubled it again, hitting 16,475 total views, which puts us on a good track to meet our final 2013 MOTM monthly target of exceeding 20,000 views for the month.
- In terms of annual totals, we had almost 60,000 views in 2012, which isn't bad for our first full year with the new website. In 2013, we passed that number in May, and now stand at more than 98,000 for the first seven months, and on a track to more than triple our total views in 2013 compared to last year. The first chart below and attached tells that story well.
- I've attached a second chart and map to give you a sense of where our viewers are coming from:
 - More than 60% are from the US. Anecdotal evidence indicates that is weighted toward the DC – NY corridor, but we also have plenty of evidence from tweets and comments of broader coverage across the US.
 - About 15% comes from Morocco, our second major market.
 - The final 25% comes most heavily from Western Europe, from India (Bollywood connection), from the Gulf states, from Australia and Japan, from Egypt and Israel, and from Algeria and South Africa. Quite an interesting mix.
- That's the quick highlights reel. There lots more where that came from, including the surprising popularity and staying power of many of our older MOTM posts, many reposts from our site by other blog sites, the increasing number of quality retweets from our Twitter casting, our increasingly popular Facebook page, and the broader opposition research were doing now via Twitter.
- And last but not least, the launch of our new MOTM page is only days away (counting on both hands). Tomi assured me on the phone today we would see the new beta version of site by Tuesday-Wednesday next week, and we should be able to launch publicly later the following week. It is taking our Web expert vendor team a little bit longer than they expected to make sure all of the content on the "old" MOTM is synched up properly with the new site. Our increasing audience and post and tweet numbers offers some good evidence as to why. But the launch is in sight, and we're looking forward to it helping us reach our final 2013 target. 20,000 views a month has a very nice ring to it. And we should certainly have more than enough news and content later this fall to keep viewers mighty interested...

Increasing Audience for MOROCCO on the Move

Statistics: Viewers by Country for Morocco On The Move – Since Jan. 1, 2013

Total January through July 2013 – 98,485

Country	Views
 United States	63,639
 Morocco	15,030
 United Kingdom	6,461
 Canada	5,057
 France	3,384
 Netherlands	2,768
 Spain	2,697
 Germany	2,350
 India	1,816
 Italy	1,485
 United Arab Emirates	1,255
 Belgium	1,241
 Australia	1,031
 Japan	919
 Switzerland	732
 Turkey	678
 Algeria	674
 South Africa	655
 Sweden	570
 Egypt	548
 Israel	408
 Saudi Arabia	402
 Norway	395
 Portugal	383
 Denmark	376
 Malaysia	351

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, August 11, 2013 4:13 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: Blog Monitor August Week 1

FYI

Magharebia	Moroccan youth enjoy 'Holidays for All' programme August 2, 2013	Nearly 200,000 young Moroccans are attending state-run "Holidays for All" camps this summer. Held under the theme, "summer camps, a place of citizenship and learning", the programme offers children and teenagers a chance to spend their school holiday at 237 sites.	1
Maghrebia	Morocco to Boost Exports August 5, 2013	The Moroccan government has launched stimulus contracts for exporting companies as part of an ambitious programme to increase employment. Some 25 companies, including 16 that are emerging and nine that are established, have benefited from the first stimulus contracts as of August 1st. This programme will be spread over three years with a budget of 1 billion dirhams and aims to strengthen exports of Moroccan companies, through support for contracts related to growth, consortia and auditing for export. "The goal is to generate additional exports, allow exporting companies to access certain resources needed to develop their products and strengthen their position in target markets," according to Industry and Trade Minister Abdelkader Amara.	0
Magharebia	Morocco political clashes draw youth attention August 6, 2013	Clashes between MPs and Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane have marked the monthly general policy evaluation sessions. Things went so far that the opposition within the Chamber of Representatives even boycotted several such meetings. The public had a first-hand look at the discord. Live debates broadcast on national television showed heated exchanges and some very strong language. But according to political analyst Samir Mechrafi, the situation has had one positive result: heightened attention to politics among young Moroccans.	0
Magharebia	Moroccan expatriates promised political representation August 7, 2013	On July 29th, Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane was questioned by parliament on the topic of Moroccans Living Abroad and the need to integrate them into Moroccan politics. Article 17 of the new constitution states that "Moroccans living overseas shall enjoy the rights of full citizenship, including the right to vote and be voted for. They may run for office in elections on lists and in voting districts at local, regional and national level." Benkirane responded to the questioning by stating that "The government is convinced that there is a need to guarantee the political participation of the Moroccan community living overseas, and it will reflect this conviction in electoral laws and laws concerning constitutional authorities."	0
Maghrebia	Morocco Coalition Talks Kick off	The withdrawal of the Istiqlal Party threatened political stability in Morocco, so the National Rally of Independents (RNI) decided to step into the breach. Party chief Salaheddine Mezouar accepted Prime Minister Abdelilah Benkirane's invitation to talk with the Justice and Development

	August 8, 2013	Party (PJD) on Monday (August 5th) about joining the governing coalition. "It was in nobody's interest to compromise the political stability of this country and its social cohesion", he told party members on August 2nd, adding that RNI now had an historic responsibility to shoulder.
Afrik Online	Maroc : poussé hors d'une fourgonnette en marche par un policier Marocain, un Congolais décède 6 jours plus tard. Morocco: Pushed out of a van driven by Moroccan police, Congolese dies 6 days later. August 5, 2013	Toussaint-Alex Mianzoukouta, a forty year old Congolese man who taught French in Rabat, died of his injuries after being pushed out of a police van. He had been visiting friends in the Boucalef quarter of Tangiers, known to be a neighborhood for irregular Sub-Saharan immigrants. On the route to Oujda, the desert camp where individuals in the country illegally are held, a dispute arose between those rounded up in the van and police. Mianzoukouta was thrown out of the van, receiving injuries to his head and neck. After being in a coma, he died in Hospital Mohammed V in Tangiers on 30 July. Translated from French	57
Yabiladi	DanielGate : Rabat dément l'interdiction du journal Le Monde au Maroc DanielGate: Rabat denies banning Le Monde in Morocco August 6, 2013	The Moroccan Ministry of Communication has denied reports that Le Monde was banned from the country after running an article called "The Dangerous Missteps of the King." Le Monde had previously reported that their paper was absent from Moroccan newsstands. According to a source in the Ministry, the newspapers arrived according to standard procedure. Translated from French	1
Yabiladi	Mustapha Ramid ouvre une enquête pour déterminer la partie qui a ordonné de charger les manifestants du vendredi à Rabat Mustapha Ramid opens investigation to determine who ordered charge against protesters	Mustapha Ramid, PJDist Minister of Justice, has opened an investigation into who ordered charges against protesters in Rabat. Moroccan news organization Akbar al Youm has reported that Benkirane was not consulted in the decision to take forceful action in the protests. Benkirane telephoned the Interior Minister, who said that he too was not informed on the decision. Translated from French	4

	Friday in Rabat August 6, 2013
Yabiladi	Opération transit : Boom des arrivées des MRE à la veille de l'Aid Operation Transit: Boom in arrivals of MLA at the close of Eid August 6, 2013	Transit lines between Spain and Morocco have recorded record numbers of Moroccans traveling to their home country in comparison with last year's figures. For example, the Algésiras-Tangiers line has recorded 106,368 passengers in one week, a 2.7% increase. Port officials believe the increase in usage is due to Moroccans returning home to celebrate Eid with their families. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Morocco/US: Is the Moroccan Lobby Strengthened by the Recruitment of Rev Jesse Jackson August 7, 2013	One of the strongest advocates of civil rights in the United States was yesterday received by King Mohammed VI. If this recruitment follows through, Morocco will have a brand advocate within the Democratic Party and the African-American community in the US. Reverend Jackson also "considered that the settlement of the Sahara issue through a fair and transparent negotiation process supervised by the United Nations, noting that Algeria and Morocco are able to find common ground," which should appeal to Moroccan officials. Translated from French	2
Yabiladi	Tétouan : des dizaines d'hectares de forêt consumés par le feu Tetouan: Dozens of hectares of forest consumed by fire August 7, 2013	Near the commune of Azla, in Northern Morocco, dozens of hectares of forest are ablaze. The Gendarmerie, civil security, and water and forest officials are working to control the fire. Despite the size of this fire, 2013 has shown a marked decrease in the amount of forest fires. So far only 429 hectares have been destroyed this year, as opposed to an average of 1530 each year. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Melilia : le président de la ville rejette les comparaisons avec Gibraltar Melilla: President of the city rejects comparison to Gibraltar	Juan Jose Imbrodo, president of Melilla, is tired of hearing about comparisons between the Spanish cities of Ceuta and Melilla and the British enclave of Gibraltar. He stated that Gibraltar is a "colony," unlike his town. His reasoning was quite absurd, claiming that "those who are born on the Rock have never been British because they were not born on English soil; Melillans yes, because we are born on Spanish territory." Translated from French	4

	August 8, 2013
Yabiladi	Maroc : Un réseau international de trafic de drogue démantelé par Europol Morocco: International drug-trafficking network dismantled by Europol August 8, 2013	Europol has made 36 arrests and seized 1.5 tons of hashish, with the cooperation of French, Spanish, and Moroccan police. 32,000 euros in cash, 200 mobile phones and 13 cars were also seized, in operations in Morocco, Portugal, Spain, and France. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Maroc/Espagne : Mounir Molina, un détenu gracié alors que son procès a débuté il y a une semaine. Morocco/Spain: Mouni Molina, an inmate pardoned despite his trial having begun one week ago August 8, 2013	Danielgate risks overshadowing a concurrent problem, that of the 29 other individuals "erroneously pardoned." The two Spanish police unions are pressing both the Spanish and Moroccan governments for a solution, knowing that Spain had demanded extradition and not pardons for these 29, most of whom were arrested for drugs charges. Molina's trial would have begun 1 August had he not been pardoned, however, the law provides that only those who have been definitely imprisoned can benefit from a pardon. Translated from French	2
Yabiladi	Maroc : Al Hoceima secoué par un séisme de 4.6 sur l'échelle de Richter Morocco: Al Hoceima shaken by earthquake of 4.6 on the Richter scale August 8, 2013	A 4.6 magnitude earthquake with an epicenter just outside of the city of Al Hoceima struck early Thursday morning, according to the National Center for Scientific and Technical Research (CNRST). While residents were able to feel the quake, no structural damage or injuries were reported. Translated from French	0
Yabiladi	Grace Royale: 385 Detenus Liberes Pour	Just days after the scandal DanielGate, a new batch of royal pardons was announced Thursday by the Palace, on the occasion of Eid El Fitr. This time, the king pardoned 385 prisoners for "humanitarian reasons."	6

	Aid El Fitr Royal Pardon: 385 Prisoners Freed for Eid al Fitr August 8, 2013
Times Live	Pedophile Pardon Embarrasses Spain, Morocco August 7, 2013	Spain had a seemingly simple request for Morocco's king: Pardon 18 Spaniards convicted in his country, and let 30 others return to Spain to serve out their prison terms. Instead, the monarch pardoned 48 Spanish prisoners, including a man convicted of raping children. The apparent bureaucratic mix-up has embarrassed both nations, prompting rare protests in Morocco and an ultimately successful scramble to find the freed paedophile. It has also raised legal questions about the fate of the other 29 Spaniards believed incorrectly pardoned.	0
International Business Times	Why Is Rev. Jesse Jackson In Morocco? August 8, 2013	MAP reports that Rev Jesse Jackson visited Morocco on a business trip. According to the National Newspaper Publisher's Association, Jackson met with human rights activists as well as the King. Actual Jackson quote of the day: "If blacks and whites in South Africa could work it out; if East and West Germany could work it could, then surely Morocco and Algeria can work it out."	2

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, August 12, 2013 6:27 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: NAPS Final Media Coverage Report for 'Morocco and the Progressive Path to Reform'
Attachments: NAPS Media Report on 'Morocco Progressive Path to Reform' USCoverage FINAL 5August2013.pdf

We are pleased to send you the final results on our NAPS articles regarding Morocco's march to reform. NAPS is proving to produce spectacular results. See attachment and below. Ed

Media/Web Coverage Highlights

- NAPS ARTICLE – 2,150 US newspaper placements for “Morocco and the Progressive Path to Reform,” written by MACP, and published in all 50 US states (see list in attached report). Combined print and online audience exceeded 23 million readers, and the article appeared in 44 of the top 50 US media markets.
- MOROCCO ON THE MOVE – Seven news and blog columns were posted to Morocco on the Move and then republished by allAfrica.com, Atlas Times, and elsewhere, resulting in more than 100 total placements and 2 million media impressions.
- PRESS RELEASE – MAC distributed a press release via PR Newswire, which was picked up and posted by 351 media outlets on March 7th, 2013 (listed by circulation at end of report), including major media such as Wall Street Journal, Reuters, New York Newsday, Boston Globe, Miami Herald, Minneapolis Star-Tribune, SF Chronicle, Yahoo News and more than 100 US local TV news stations.
- E-LETTER – The press release was also distributed directly to MACP's key contacts including more than 3,000 policymakers, opinion leaders, and journalists as MAC's weekly E-letter on March 11.
- RESULTS – Generated more than 2,500 total media and Web placements, and more than 40 million media impressions.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Media Coverage Report

RE: Media Report on “Morocco and The Progressive Path to Reform”

This report provides a full breakout of US press coverage from the announcement by King Mohammed VI this Spring regarding recommendations by the National Council of Human Rights for implementing key Morocco Constitutional reforms, particularly in the judiciary.

On March 3, King Mohammed VI announced that he welcomed the approach and content of four reports he had received from Morocco’s human rights watchdog, the National Human Rights Council (CNDH), with recommendations to advance changes in the judicial system as set forth by Morocco’s 2011 Constitutional reforms. To highlight the importance and context of this news for key US audiences, MAC launched a multi-faceted communications outreach effort that generated strong results throughout the Spring this year.

As soon as the story appeared on a Sunday, MAC’s media team immediately began posting and tweeting the news from MOTM, with banner stories from Middle East Online, Med Africa Times, and an eloquent column praising the King’s commitment to reform by analyst Joseph Braude in the Huffington Post. To reach print, broadcast, as well as online media, the MAC team issued a Press Release, “Committed to Speedy Reform, King Mohammed VI Welcomes New Recommendations From Morocco Human Rights Council,” via PR Newswire, and featured the news in an MOTM Blog Commentary. The Press Release was then sent as a MAC Weekly E-letter to policy makers and opinion leaders, coinciding with a Washington visit by CNDH’s Driss El Yazami. To extend Morocco’s key messages, a longer-lead NAPS article, “Morocco & the Progressive Path to Reform,” was sent out to thousands of US newspapers. Highlights of MAC’s communications campaign are below.

Media/Web Coverage Highlights

- NAPS ARTICLE – 2,150 US newspaper placements for “Morocco and the Progressive Path to Reform,” written by MACP, and published in all 50 US states (see list below). Combined print and online audience exceeded 23 million readers, and the article appeared in 44 of the top 50 US media markets.
- MOROCCO ON THE MOVE – Seven news and blog columns were posted to Morocco on the Move and then republished by allAfrica.com, Atlas Times, and elsewhere, resulting in more than 100 total placements and 2 million media impressions.
- PRESS RELEASE – MAC distributed a press release via PR Newswire, which was picked up and posted by 351 media outlets on March 7th, 2013 (listed by circulation at end of report), including major media such as Wall Street Journal, Reuters, New York Newsday, Boston Globe, Miami Herald, Minneapolis Star-Tribune, SF Chronicle, Yahoo News and more than 100 US local TV news stations.
- E-LETTER – The press release was also distributed directly to MACP’s key contacts including more than 3,000 policymakers, opinion leaders, and journalists as MAC’s weekly E-letter on March 11.
- RESULTS – Generated more than 2,500 total media and Web placements, and more than 40 million media impressions.

The screenshot shows a news article from the Annapolis Capital-Gazette, dated Thursday, April 11, 2013. The article title is "Morocco and The Progressive Path To Reform". The main text discusses the Moroccan government's efforts to reform its judicial system under King Mohammed VI. It mentions that the government is taking concrete steps to speed changes to the country's judicial system. The article also notes that Morocco began taking significant steps along a more progressive path in 2004, starting with a landmark family law that strengthened women's rights. Further reforms include the implementation of a commission to investigate human rights abuses, and the establishment of a constitutional court to oversee elections and uphold constitutional principles. The article concludes by stating that these reforms will be debated by Parliament and submitted for passage into law.

http://www.capitalgazette.com/online_features/13apr_11_morocco_and_the_progressive_path_to_reform_article_1704615-6310-3329-3134-000000033036.html

Annapolis Capital-Gazette
Thursday, April 11, 2013

Morocco and The Progressive Path To Reform

Under the leadership of King Mohammed VI, the Moroccan government is taking concrete steps to speed changes to the country's judicial system. (NAPS)

By NAPS, North American Precis Syndicate

(NAPS) — Those with an interest in events in North Africa may already be aware that the push toward democratic reforms in the region did not begin with what is known in the West as the Arab Spring.

For example, as early as 2004, under the leadership of King Mohammed VI, Morocco began to take a number of significant steps along a more progressive path, beginning with a landmark family law that ushered in stronger protections for women's rights.

This was followed by the implementation of a commission that investigated the previous regime's human rights abuses.

Building on these achievements, the Moroccan government is taking concrete steps to advance changes to its judicial system that were set forth in the country's 2011 Constitutional reforms. These were presented in four separate reports that focus on:

- Organization and procedures of the Constitutional Court, which will oversee free and fair elections and uphold principles and rights guaranteed by the Moroccan Constitution
- Procedures for allowing parties to a lawsuit to challenge the constitutionality of a law
- Narrowing the jurisdiction of military courts by limiting their authority to military personnel
- Establishment of the Higher Judiciary Council to promote separation of powers and increase judicial independence.

King Mohammed VI has welcomed these recommendations as a significant contribution to advancing Morocco's dialogue on democracy, the rule of law, human rights protections, and an independent judiciary. He called for their speedy implementation.

Under the Constitution, these recommendations will be debated by Parliament, drafted into legislation, and submitted for passage into law—demonstrating what the path to progress can look like.

This information is provided by Beckman on behalf of the government of Morocco. Further information is available at the U.S. Department of Justice.

On the Net: North American Precis Syndicate, Inc. (NAPS)

Placements of NAPS Article – 2,100 US Newspapers, print/online

✓ NAPS Article: “Morocco & Progressive Path to Reform” (April 11, 2013)

The final report for the NAPS article, “Morocco & Progressive Path to Reform,” shows it generated 2,150 placements in newspapers in all 50 US states (including those listed below). Combined print /online audience was 23 million readers (30% more than our 2nd NAPS article). The article appeared in 44 of the top 50 US media markets, 79 of the top 100 markets, and 160 of the top 300 markets.

THEHOUR, NORWALK, CT
 NJ.COM, NEWARK, NJ
 HOMEREPORTEERNEWS, BROOKLYN, NY
 REGISTERSTAR, HUDSON, NY
 DAILYFREEMAN, KINGSTON, NY
 CATSKILLSHOPPERONLINE, LIBERTY, NY
 IONIANNEWS, NEW ROCHELLE, NY
 CHELSEANOW, NEW YORK, NY
 QCHRON, REGO PARK, NY
 BIGBEARGRIZZLY, BIG BEARLAKE, CA
 DESERTNEWS, CALIFORNIACITY, CA
 CHAMPIONNEWSPAPERS, CHINO, CA
 COASTREPORTONLINE, COSTAMESA, CA
 FONTANAHERALDNEWS, FONTANA, CA
 HIGHLANDNEWS, HIGHLAND, CA
 WAVENEWSAPERS, LOS ANGELES, CA
 MALIBUTIMES, MALIBU, CA
 TBRNEWS, MANHATTAN BEACH, CA
 THEPOLYPOST, POMONA, CA
 PVNEWS, ROLLING HILL ESTATE CA
 NEWSMIRROR, YUCAIPA, CA
 JOURNAL-TOPICS, DES PLAINES, IL
 THEGILMANSTAR, GILMAN, IL
 HERSCHERPILOT, HERSCHER, IL
 BUGLENEWSPAPERS, PLAINFIELD, IL
 HERALDARGUS, LA PORTE, IN
 THENEWSDISPATCH, MICHIGAN CITY, IN
 GILROYDISPATCH, GILROY, CA
 MORGANHILLTIMES, GILROY, CA
 SANBENITOCOUNTYTODAY, GILROY, CA
 NEWS.GOOGLE.COM, MTN VIEW, CA
 PACIFICSUN, SAN RAFAEL, CA
 SONOMAWEST, SEBASTOPOL, CA
 HOMETOWN-SHOPPER, UKIAH, CA
 NEWARKPOSTONLINE, NEWARK, DE
 PRESSATLANTICITY, PLEASANTVILLE, NJ
 DELCOTIMES, PRIMOS, PA
 FOXBOROREPORTER, FOXBORO, MA

The screenshot shows the top portion of a newspaper article. The masthead reads "Annapolis Capital-Gazette" with the date "Thursday, April 11, 2013". The main headline is "Morocco and The Progressive Path To Reform". Below the headline is a sub-headline: "Under the leadership of King Mohammed VI, the Moroccan government is taking concrete steps to speed changes to the country's judicial system. (NAPS)". The byline is "By NAPS, North American Precis Syndicate". The article text begins with "(NAPS) — Those with an interest in events in North Africa may already be aware that the push toward democratic reforms in the region did not begin with what is known in the West as the Arab Spring. For example, as early as 2004, under the leadership of King Mohammed VI, Morocco began to take a number of significant steps along a more progressive path, beginning with a landmark family law that ushered in stronger protections for women's rights. This was followed by the implementation of a commission that investigated the previous regime's human rights abuses. Building on these achievements, the Moroccan government is taking several concrete steps to advance changes to its judicial system that were set forth in the country's 2011 Constitutional reforms. These were presented in four separate reports that focus on:" followed by a bulleted list of four points: 1. Organization and procedures of the Constitutional Court, which will oversee free and fair elections and uphold principles and rights guaranteed by the Moroccan Constitution. 2. Procedures for allowing parties to a lawsuit to challenge the constitutionality of a law. 3. Narrowing the jurisdiction of military courts by limiting their authority to military personnel. 4. Establishment of the Higher Judiciary Council to promote separation of powers and increase judicial independence. The article continues with a paragraph about King Mohammed VI welcoming these recommendations and a final paragraph about the legislative process. At the bottom, there is a small note: "This information is provided by the Bureau on behalf of the government of Morocco. Further information is available at the U.S. Department of Justice." and a credit line: "On the Net: North American Precis Syndicate, Inc. (NAPS)".

CAPEANNPLANET, GLOUCESTER, MA
 HOMENEWSHERE, READING, MA
 SENTINELSOURCE, KEENE, NH
 LEESBURG2DAY, LEESBURG, VA
 INSIDENOVA, MANASSAS, VA
 NORTHERNVSPORTS, SPRINGFIELD, VA
 SUNGAZETTE, SPRINGFIELD, VA
 CLARKSVILLENEWS, CLARKSVILLE, TX
 AIMMEDIATEXAS, DALLAS, TX
 DALLASWEEKLY, DALLAS, TX

KAUFMANHERALD, KAUFMAN, TX
 DAILYTRIBUNE, MT PLEASANT, TX
 SCNTX, PLANO, TX
 UTMERCURY, RICHARDSON, TX
 YOURSTEPHENVILLE, STEPHENVILLE, TX
 TERRELLTRIBUNE, TERRELL, TX
 WAXAHACHITX, WAXAHACHIE, TX
 ANTRIMREVIEW, BELLAIRE, MI
 ALVINSUN, ALVIN, TX
 THEANAHUACPROGRESS, ANAHUAC, TX

BAYCITYTRIBUNE, BAY CITY, TX
 LEADER-NEWS, EL CAMPO, TX
 GALVESTONDAILY, GALVESTON, TX
 YOURHOUSTONNEWS, HOUSTON, TX
 KATYTIMES, KATY, TX
 FBHERALD, ROSENBERG, TX
 JOURNAL-SPECTATOR, WHARTON, TX
 ELNUEVOHERALDO, MIAMI, FL
 THEATLANTAVOICE, ATLANTA, GA
 THENEWSOBSERVER, BLUE RIDGE, GA
 THECRIER, DUNWOODY, GA
 ELBERTON, ELBERTON, GA
 THEHARTWELLSUN, HARTWELL, GA
 NORTHWESTGEORGIANEWS, ROME, GA
 LEDGERNEWS, WOODSTOCK, GA
 YELMONLINE, YELM, WA
 CLEVELANDJEWISHNEWS,
 BEACHWOOD, OH
 THEPOSTNEWSPAPERS, MEDINA, OH
 CHANVILLAGER, CHASKA, MN
 CHASKAHERALD, CHASKA, MN
 EDENPRAIRIENEWS, EDEN PRAIRIE, MN
 JORDANNEWS, JORDAN, MN
 INDEPENDENTREVIEW, LITCHFIELD, MN
 LPLEADER, LONG PRAIRIE, MN
 SAVAGEPACER, PRIOR LAKE, MN
 SAVVY.MNTN, SHAKOPEE, MN
 SHAKOPEENEWS, SHAKOPEE, MN
 WALKERMN, WALKER, MN
 PRESSPUBS, WHITE BEAR LAKE, MN
 CORONADONEWSCA, CORONADO, CA
 NEWSCA, IMPERIAL BEACH, CA
 SCOOPSANDIEGO, SAN DIEGO, CA
 ALESTLELIVE, EDWARDSVILLE, IL
 THEINTELLIGENCER, EDWARDSVILLE, IL
 THEJOURNAL-NEWS, HILLSBORO, IL
 HERALDPUBS, MASCOUTAH, IL
 OKAWVILLETIMES, OKAWVILLE, IL
 BGDAILYNEWS, BOWLING GREEN, KY
 BGNEWS, BOWLING GREEN, KY
 MYIRONCOUNTYNEWS, IRONTON, MO
 STLAMERICAN, ST. LOUIS, MO
 STEGENHERALD, STE GENEVIEVE, MO
 SULLIVANJOURNAL, SULLIVAN, MO
 WARRENCOUNTYRECORD,
 WARRENTON, MO
 EMISSOURIAN, WASHINGTON, MO
 TIMESONLINE, BEAVER, PA
 HERALDSTANDARD, UNIONTOWN, PA
 HAVASUNEWS, LAKE HAVASU CITY, AZ
 PARKERPIONEER, PARKER, AZ
 EACOURIER, SAFFORD, AZ
 WMICENTRAL, SHOW LOW, AZ
 WICKENBURGSUN, WICKENBURG, AZ
 LEBANONDAILYRECORD, LEBANON, MO
 THEMONITOR, MCALLEN, TX
 CAPITALGAZETTE, ANNAPOLIS, MD
 MYEASTERNSHOREMD, EASTON, MD
 STARDDEM, EASTON, MD
 CECILDAILY, ELKTON, MD
 MYUPPERCHESAPEAKE, ELKTON, MD
 THEFLUME, BAILEY, CO
 RAWLINTIMES, RAWLINS, WY
 COASTWEEKEND, ASTORIA, OR
 DAILYASTORIAN, ASTORIA, OR
 SEASIDE-SUN, SEASIDE, OR
 THEREFLECTOR, BATTLE GROUND, WA
 CHINOOKOBSERVER, LONG BEACH, WA
 NEWSRECORD.ORG, CINCINNATI, OH
 HERALD-ONLINE, LOUISBURG, KS
 REPUBLIC-ONLINE, PAOLA, KS
 MYCALDWELLCOUNTY, HAMILTON, MO
 KEARNEYCOURIER, KEARNEY, MO
 LIBERTYTRIBUNE, LIBERTY, MO
 SEDALIADEMOCRAT, SEDALIA, MO
 SMITHVILLEHERALD, SMITHVILLE, MO
 GRAPHIC-ONLINE, ST JOSEPH, MO
 KCNURSINGNEWS, ST JOSEPH, MO
 NEWSPRESSNOW, ST JOSEPH, MO
 BENTONCOUNTYENTERPRISE,
 WARSAW, MO
 PLATTECHRONICLE, WESTON, MO
 MESSENGER, FORESTHILL, CA
 EGCITIZEN, GALT, CA
 GALTHERALDONLINE, GALT, CA
 LEDGER-DISPATCH, JACKSON, CA
 PNNA, SACRAMENTO, CA
 CITIZEN, WHEATLAND, CA
 WDTIMES, WATERTOWN, WI
 NEWSEXAMINER, CONNERSVILLE, IN
 NEWSTIMES, HARTFORD CITY, IN RECORDER, INDIANAPOLIS, IN
 CHRONICLE-TRIBUNE, MARION, IN
 SHELBYNEWS, SHELBYVILLE, IN NEWSGAZETTE, WINCHESTER, IN
 LAREDOSBARGAINBOOK, LAREDO, TX
 LMTONLINE, LAREDO, TX
 CIRCLEVILLETODAY, CIRCLEVILLE, OH
 LOGANDAILY, LOGAN, OH
 GOBOGALUSA, BOGALUSA, LA
 HAMMONDSTAR, HAMMOND, LA
 LOBSERVATEUR, LA PLACE, LA
 THEHULLABALOO, NEW ORLEANS, LA
 THESTTAMMANYNEWS, SLIDELL, LA
 POST-VOICE, BURGAW, NC
 THEDAILYNEWSONLINE, BATAVIA, NY
 MYWNYNEWS, EAST AURORA, NY
 ELYNEWS, ELY, NV
 CACHEVALLEYDAILY, LOGAN, UT
 MOABSUNNEWS, MOAB, UT
 RICHFIELDREAPER, RICHFIELD, UT
 UBMEDIA.BIZTN, VERNAL, UT
 GREENRIVERSTAR, GREEN RIVER, WY
 BRANFORDSEVEN, BRANFORD, CT
 JOURNALINQUIRER, MANCHESTER, CT
 MIDDLETOWNPRESS, MIDDLETOWN, CT
 TOWNTIMESNEWS, SOUTHURRY, CT
 VOICESNEWS, SOUTHURRY, CT
 THESUNCHRONICLE, NORTH
 ATTLEBORO, MA
 NEWPORTRI, NEWPORT, RI
 INDEPENDENTRI, WAKEFIELD, RI
 NCATREGISTER, GREENSBORO, NC
 UNCGCAROLINIAN, GREENSBORO, NC
 ACONES, HILLSBOROUGH, NC
 JAMESTOWNNEWS, JAMESTOWN, NC
 MONTGOMERYHERALD, TROY, NC
 JOURNALNOW, WINSTON-SALEM, NC
 FLTIMES, GENEVA, NY
 LAUGHLINERTAINER, LAUGHLIN, NV
 PORTLANDLEADER, PORTLAND, TN
 MYSPARTANEWS, SPARTA, TN
 PRESSREGISTER, CLARKSDALE, MS
 DESOTOTIMES, HERNANDO, MS
 NEWS, GERMANTOWN, TN
 PURCELLREGISTER, PURCELL, OK
 NASSAUCOUNTYRECORD, CALLAHAN, FL
 NASSAURECORD, CALLAHAN, FL
 LAKECITYREPORTER, LAKE CITY, FL
 THEALMATIMES, ALMA, GA
 TIMES, BLACKSHEAR, GA
 DOUGLASENTERPRISE, DOUGLAS, GA
 THEPRESS-SENTINEL, JESUP, GA
 RRDAILYHERALD, ROANOKE RAPIDS, NC

FREDERICKSBURGSTANDARD, SANGRECHRONICLE, ANGEL FIRE, NM TRICITIES, BRISTOL, VA
 FREDERICKSBURG, TX RIOGRANDESUN, ESPANOLA, NM THREERIVERSNEWS, THREE RIVERS, MI
 GONZALESINQUIRER, GONZALES, TX CIBOLABEACON, GRANTS, NM EMPORIAGAZETTE, EMPORIA, KS
 THEROTUNDAONLINE, FARMVILLE, VA TAOSNEWS, TAOS, NM VERONEWS, VERO BEACH, FL
 SOUTHSIDEMESSENGER, KEYSVILLE, VA MICHIGANSTHUMB, BAD AXE, MI PALATKADAILYNEWS, PALATKA, FL
 RICHMOND, RICHMOND, VA TCTIMES, FENTON, MI NEWS-GRAPHIC, GEORGETOWN, KY
 TIMESDISPATCH, RICHMOND, VA STANDARDBANNER, JEFFERSON CITY, TN SCTONLINE, FOREST, MS
 VANCNEWS, SOUTH HILL, VA JOURNALTRIBUNE, BIDDEFORD, ME VICKSBURGPOST, VICKSBURG, MS
 CROSSROADSCHRONICLE, CASHIERS, NC DENNEWS, CHARLESTON, IL STOWETODAY, STOWE, VT
 THEFRANKLINPRESS, FRANKLIN, NC PARISBEACON, PARIS, IL NCCOAST, MOREHEAD CITY, NC
 CHEROKEESCOUT, MURPHY, NC ANNANEWS, ANNA, IL IOSCONEWS, EAST TAWAS, MI
 MITCHELLNEWS, SPRUCE PINE, NC COURIERINDEPENDENT, CARTERVILLE, IL GLADWINMI, GLADWIN, MI
 CLINTONCHRONICLE, CLINTON, SC PARISPI, PARIS, TN DNEWS, MOSCOW, ID
 REEDLEYEXPONENT, REEDLEY, CA BRYANTIMES, BRYAN, OH GAZETTERECORD, SAINT MARIES, ID
 THEDINUBASENTINEL, REEDLEY, CA GETTYSBURGTIMES, GETTYSBURG, PA CHARLESTONEXPRESS, CHARLESTON, AR
 THESANGERHERALD, SANGER, CA MORNINGJOURNAL, LISBON, OH GREENWOODDEMOCRAT, WPCVA, CHATHAM, VA LEDGER, ELLWOOD CITY, PA GREENWOOD, AR
 NEWSADVANCE, LYNCHBURG, VA HSUORACLE, ARKADELPHIA, AR MCRECORDONLINE, HUNTSVILLE, AR
 SMITHMOUNTAINEAGLE, WITZ, VA DEWITT-EE, DEWITT, AR PARIS-EXPRESS, PARIS, AR
 PALLTIMES, OSWEGO, NY ASHLEYCOUNTYLEDGER, HAMBURG, AR PRESSARGUS, VAN BUREN, AR
 SOUTHCOUNTYLEADER, BIXBY, OK THEBRAY, MAGNOLIA, AR BELOITDAILYNEWS, BELOIT, WI
 BALEDGER, BROKEN ARROW, OK THEMCGEHEETIMES, MCGEHEE, AR HNGNEWS, SUN PRAIRIE, WI
 CATOOSATIMES, CATOOSA, OK NEWS, MONTICELLO, AR LITTLERIVERNEWS, ASHDOWN, AR
 CLEVELANDAMERICAN, CLEVELAND, OK THEDAILYCITIZEN, SEARCY, AR JIMPLECUTE, JEFFERSON, TX
 THENEWS, COLLINSVILLE, OK MERCURY, CHARLESTON, SC ALICETX, ALICE, TX
 COWETAAMERICAN, COWETA, OK COLLETONTODAY, WALTERBORO, SC RECORDSTAR, ALICE, TX
 GRANDLAKENEWS, GROVE, OK LODINEWS, LODI, CA ADS.ADSACK, CORPUS CHRISTI, TX
 MANNFORDEAGLE, MANNFORD, OK GULFCOASTNEWSTODAY, FAIRHOPE, AL ADSACK, CORPUS CHRISTI, TX
 MIAMIOK, MIAMI, OK CCENTERDISPATCH, CLAY CENTER, KS DELRIONEWSHERALD, DEL RIO, TX
 OWASSOREPORTER, OWASSO, OK CCHEADLINER, CLAY CENTER, KS CREIGHTONNEWS, CREIGHTON, NE
 LEADER, SAND SPRINGS, OK CHAMBERLAINSUN, CHAMBERLAIN, SD NELIGHNEWS, NELIGH, NE
 SAPULPAHERALDONLINE, SAPULPA, OK FREEMANS, FREEMAN, SD NORFOLKDAILYNEWS, NORFOLK, NE
 SKIATOOKJOURNAL, SKIATOOK, OK ONIDAWATCHMAN, ONIDA, SD MYWAYNENEWS, WAYNE, NE
 OCOLLY, STILLWATER, OK CAPJOURNAL, PIERRE, SD IBERIANET, NEW IBERIA, LA
 WAGONERTRIBUNE, WAGONER, OK VOLANTEONLINE, VERMILLION, SD JOURNAL-EUREKA, ANAMOSA, IA
 BENSONNEWS-SUN, BENSON, AZ APP-PRINTING, ALBION, IN CPIONEER, CASCADE, IA
 GVNEWS, GREEN VALLEY, AZ FWBUSINESS, KENDALLVILLE, IN CRESCOTIMES, CRESCO, IA
 EXPLORERNEWS, TUCSON, AZ FWDAILYNEWS, KENDALLVILLE, IN THONLINE, DUBUQUE, IA
 INSIDETUCSONBUSINESS, TUCSON, AZ KPCNEWS, KENDALLVILLE, IN COMMERCIAL, DYERSVILLE, IA
 WILLCOXRANGENEWS, WILLCOX, AZ INDIANAGAZETTE, INDIANA, PA KALONANEWS, KALONA, IA
 ELPASOINC, EL PASO, TX CLASSICIMAGES, MUSCATINE, IA NHTRIB, NEW HAMPTON, IA
 HARLANONLINE, HARLAN, IA WESTERNCOURIER, MACOMB, IL VINTONDAILY, VINTON, IA
 ENTERPRISEPUB, BLAIR, NE SWIOWANEWSOURCE, ATLANTIC, IA DAILYNEWS, WAHPETON, ND DOANELINE, CRETE, NE CHARITONLEADER, CHARITON, IA ARGUSOBSERVER, ONTARIO, OR DAILYNEBRASKAN, LINCOLN, NE ALGONA, DES MOINES, IA NEWS, MT. CARROLL, IL
 OMAHANEWSTAND, OMAHA, NE THESIMPSONIAN, INDIANOLA, IA KJAS, JASPER, TX
 CASS-NEWS, PLATTSMOUTH, NE CHIEFTAIN, PUEBLO, CO PATRIOTTALON, TYLER, TX
 SEWARDINDEPENDENT, SEWARD, NE THEMOUNTAINMAIL, SALIDA, CO GRANDRAPIDSMN, GRAND RAPIDS, MN

HIBBINGMN, HIBBING, MN	COCOMOVOICE, BOONVILLE, MO	ANCHORAGEPRESS, ANCHORAGE, AK
VIRGINIAMN, VIRGINIA, MN	LAKEEXPO, LAURIE, MO	FRONTIERSMAN, WASILLA, AK
ASHLANDWI, ASHLAND, WI	DAILYDEM, FORT MADISON, IA	WTXL, MIDWAY, FL
NEWS-SHIELD, BARRON, WI	DAILYGATE, KEOBUK, IA	PERRYVILLENEWS, PERRYVILLE, MO
HAYWARDWI, HAYWARD, WI	JOURNALPILOT, CARTHAGE, IL	BHPIONEER, SPEARFISH, SD
LADYSMITHNEWS, LADYSMITH, WI	PALMYRA-SPECTATOR, PALMYA, MO	LAURELOUTLOOK, LAUREL, MT
SPOONERADVOCATE, SPOONER, WI	DOTHANEAGLE, DOTHAN, AL	PENNESAVERPLUS, HORNELL, NY
WALLOWA, ENTERPRISE, OR	SOUTHEASTSUN, ENTERPRISE, AL	TIOGAPUBLISHING, WELLSBORO, PA
EASTOREGONIAN, HERMISTON, OR	GREATWHITEENTERPRISES, OMRO, WI	DDTONLINE, GREENVILLE, MS
HERMISTONHERALD, HERMISTON, OR	FLORALA, FLORENCE, AL	THERACQUETTE, POTSDAM, NY
BLUEMOUNTAINEAGLE, JOHN DAY, OR	WAAYTV, HUNTSVILLE, AL	TRI-PARISHTIMES, HOUMA, LA
BLOOMERADVANCE, BLOOMER, WI	MOULTONADVERTISER, MOULTON, AL	RECORDGAZETTE, BANNING, CA
FULTONDEMOCRAT, CANTON, IL	HERALD, UNION SPRINGS, AL	YUMANEWSNOW.COM HOLTVILLE, CA
LEECOUNTYCOURIER.COM, TUPELO, MS	MYMCR, FORSYTH, GA	DESERTENTERTAINER, PALM DESERT, CA
THEINDEPENDENT, GRAND ISLAND, NE	HICKORYRECORD, HICKORY, NC	HIDESERTSTAR, YUCCA VALLEY, CA
LEXCH, LEXINGTON, NE	VALLEYMORNINGSTAR, HARLINGEN, TX	LIBERTYCOUNTYTIMES, CHESTER, MT
BRENHAMBANNER, BRENHAM, TX	HARRISONDAILYTIMES, HARRISON, AR	CHOTEAUACANTHA, CHOTEAU, MT
THEEAGLE, BRYAN, TX	NEWTONCOUNTYTIMES, JASPER, AR	CUTBANKPIONEERPRESS, CUTBANK, MT
WACOTRIB, WACO, TX	BOLIVARMONEWS, BOLIVAR, MO	FAIRFIELDSUNTIMES, FAIRFIELD, MT
CENTRALWINEWS, ABBOTSFORD, WI	BUFFALOREFLEX, BUFFALO, MO	LEWISTOWNNEWS, LEWISTON, MT
THESHOPPERWI, ANTIGO, WI	THELICKINGNEWS, LICKING, MO	MONTROSEPRESS, MONTROSE, CO
PRICECOUNTYDAILY, PHILLIPS, WI	MARSHFIELDMAIL, MARSHFIELD, MO	TELLURIDENEWS, TELLURIDE, CO
NEWS, ARCHER COUNTY, TX	MARYSVILLEONLINE, MARSHFIELD, MO	BROWNWOODTX, BROWNWOOD, TX
THESUNFLOWER, WICHITA, TX	NIXAPRESS, NIXA, MO	THECLAYTIMESJOURNAL, LINEVILLE, AL
MBVISIT, CONWAY, SC	REPUBLICMONEWS, REPUBLIC, MO	THERANDOPHLEADER, ROANOKE, AL
SCNOW, HARTSVILLE, SC	SOUTHCOUNTYMAIL, ROGERSVILLE, MO	STARHERALD, SCOTTSBLUFF, NE
TRINITYJOURNAL, WEAVERVILLE, CA	CEDARREPUBLICAN, STOCKTON, MO	WYOSPORTS, CHEYENNE, WY
CASCADECATTLEMAN, YREKA, CA	KDHNEWS, KILLEEN, TX	KENTUCKYNEWERA, HOKINSVILLE, MO
CASCADEHORSEMAN, YREKA, CA	NAVIGATORJOURNAL, ALBION, IL	JOURNALREVIEW, CRAWFORDSVILLE, IN
SIDNEYHERALD, SIDNEY, MT	SITRADERS, WEST FRANKFORT, IL	NEWSBUG.INFO, RENNSALAER, IN
WILLISTONHERALD, WILLISTON, ND	THESHOALSNEWS, SHOALS, IN	DOUGLAS-BUDGET, DOUGLAS, WY
THEPENDERPOST, BURGAW, NC	SUNCOMMERCIAL, VINCENNES, IN	DAILYPROGRESS, CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA
TOPSAILVOICE, BURGAW, NC	MCCLEANNEWS, CALHOUN, KY	MCHNEWS, MCCONNELLSVILLE, OH
STATEPORTPILOT, SOUTHPORT, NC	THE-MESSENGER, MADISONVILLE, KY	PERRYDAILY, NEW LEXINGTON, OH
WHITEVILLE, WHITEVILLE, NC	TIMESLEADER, PRINCETON, KY	MINICASSIA, BURLEY, ID
SEKVOICE, BAXTER SPRINGS, KS	THECORRYJOURNAL, CORRY, PA	ALBIANEWS, ALBIA, IA
ISWNE.ORG, JOPLIN, MO	TITUSVILLEHERALD, TITUSVILLE, PA	PORTLAVACAWAVE, PORT LAVACA, TX
THECHARTONLINE, JOPLIN, MO	METTERADVERTISER, METTER, GA	NPTELEGRAPH, NORTH PLATTE, NE
BELMONDNEWS, BELMOND, IA	AUBURNVILLAGER, AUNURN, AL	NEWSMINER, FAIRBANKS, AK
THEWILLISTONTRADER, LAKESIDE, MT	OANOW, OPELIKA, AL	STARNEWS.CATN, WAINWRIGHT, AB
DAILYTOREADOR, LUBBOCK, TX	ATHENSOHIOTODAY, ATHENS, OH	THESHELBYNEWS, SHELBYVILLE, IN
THEDAILYCOURIER, GRANTS PASS, OR	JACKSONCOUNTYDAILY, JACKSON, OH	SOUTHERNMINN, FARIBAULT, MN
BOCOJO, ASHLAND, MO	PIKECOUNTYDAILY, WAVERLY, OH

MOROCCO ON THE MOVE – Seven Postings of News & Blog Columns, Republished for more than 100 Placements

- ✓ Moroccan King welcomes approach, content of CNDH reports on reform – Middle East Online

March 3, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

Middle East Online (Rabat, Morocco, March 3, 2013)—King Mohammed VI, welcomed the approach and content of thematic reports submitted by the National Council of Human...

- ✓ Human Rights Watchdog in Morocco calls for judicial reforms, King lauds approach – MedAfrica Times

March 4, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

MedAfrica Times, by S. Addamah (Rabat, Morocco, March 4, 2013) — The National Human Rights Council has called in four recent reports for reforms in the realm of justice [...]

- ✓ New Hopes From Rabat: King sends message systematic reform continues – Huffington Post

March 5, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

Huffington Post, by Joseph Braude, Middle East Specialist (Washington, DC, March 5, 2013) -- ...I feel encouraged by the announcement of the King's intention to dramatically reduce the role of military courts in Morocco. It would be in keeping with a tradition of reforms [...]

- ✓ Commentary: Not “American Way” but it’s working in Morocco – Jean AbiNader

March 7, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

MATIC, by Jean AbiNader (Washington, DC, March 7, 2013)—The US government has an almost knee-jerk reaction to democracy promotion [...]

- ✓ Press Release: Committed to Speedy Reform...

March 7, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

Committed to Speedy Reform, HM King Mohammed VI Welcomes New Recommendations From Morocco’s Human Rights Council

Washington, DC (March 7, 2013)—Keeping with his commitment to speedy implementation of reforms in Morocco, and dedication to advancing human rights & an independent judiciary [...]

- ✓ Committed to speedy reform, King welcomes Morocco’s Human Rights Council reports

March 7, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

MACP (Wash, DC, March 7, 2013)—Demonstrating Morocco’s commitment to systematic reform, advancing human rights, & implementation of its new Constitution, King Mohammed VI welcomed recommendations on judicial reform by National Human Rights Council/CNDH[...]

- ✓ CNDH President highlights Morocco’s efforts to protect human rights in US visit

March 14, 2013 by Morocco on the Move

MWN/MAP (Washington, DC, March 13, 2013) — President of Morocco’s National Council of Human Rights (CNDH), Driss El Yazami, highlighted in Washington progress in human rights and strengthening of the rule of law, in meetings with officials from the State Dept., Congress, [...]

MACP Press Release on PR Newswire & Pitched to Reporters – Posts at 351 Major Media Outlets, 450+ Total Placements

MACP Press Releases:

✓ “Committed to Speedy Reform, King Mohammed VI Welcomes New Recommendations From Morocco Human Rights Council” (March 7, 2013)

Yahoo! Politics

San Francisco Chronicle

Reuters

Boston Globe

MarketWatch

The Sacramento Bee

New York Business Journal

Orlando Business Journal

Nashville Business Journal

New Mexico Business Weekly

Pittsburgh Business Times

Portland Business Journal

Pacific Business News

Philadelphia Business Journal

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal

Memphis Business Journal

Los Angeles Business from bizjournals

Chicago Business News

Cincinnati Business Courier

Dallas Business Journal

Dayton Business Journal

Denver Business Journal

Houston Business Journal

Jacksonville Business Journal

Kansas City Business Journal

Charlotte Business Journal

Bizjournals.com, Inc.

Wichita Business Journal

Tampa Bay Business Journal

Triangle Business Journal

Washington Business Journal

San Francisco Business Times

San Jose Business Journal

<http://online.wsj.com/article/PR-CO-20130307-918219.html>

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

U.S. Edition
March 7, 2013

Committed to Speedy Reform, King Mohammed VI Welcomes New Recommendations From Morocco Human Rights Council

Article

WASHINGTON, March 7, 2013 /PRNewswire/ (MACP) -- In keeping with his commitment to speedy implementation of reforms in Morocco, and dedication to advancing human rights and an independent judiciary, His Majesty King Mohammed VI welcomed recommendations on judicial reform presented by the National Human Rights Council (CNDH), Morocco's human rights watchdog. These were detailed in four reports submitted by the Council to: advance changes to Morocco's judicial system as set forth in the 2011 Constitutional reforms; respond to the expectations of Moroccan society; and meet pertinent international norms of human rights, justice and the separation of powers.

King Mohammed VI stressed the importance of fast-paced reform and called on all government institutions to fully assume their responsibilities to achieve it. He described the recommendation as a significant contribution to advancing Morocco's dialogue on democracy, consolidating the rule of law, and protecting human rights and the independence of the judiciary.

- The first report outlines the organization and procedures of the Constitutional Court, which will oversee free and fair elections and uphold principles and rights guaranteed by the Constitution.
- The second report addresses proper procedures for carrying out a major innovation in the 2011 Constitution-allowing parties to a lawsuit to challenge the constitutionality of a law.
- The third report recommends narrowing the jurisdiction of military courts in keeping with the new Constitution and international law. CNDH president Driss El Yazami said the Council recommends that civilians no longer be tried before military courts, and tribunals should be limited to disciplinary measures against military personnel and trial of military personnel for "undermining state security or terrorism."
- The fourth report provides recommendations on the speedy establishment of the Higher Judiciary Council created by the Constitution, which will promote separation of powers and increase judicial independence.

The Council's recommendations, which come after six months of intense work, will now go to Morocco's Parliament. Under the Constitution, the recommendations have to be debated, turned into legislation, and passed by Parliament to become law.

In The Huffington Post, Middle East Specialist Joseph Braude wrote, "I feel encouraged by the announcement of the king's intention to dramatically reduce the role of military courts in Morocco. It would be in keeping with a tradition of reforms that won acknowledgment from human rights groups in the past, notably an Equity and Reconciliation Commission which acknowledged the suffering of victims of security service brutality under the reign of King Hassan II and compensated the families for their losses."

On Monday, El Yazami presented the reports at the UN Human Rights Council in Geneva in the presence of Juan Mendez, Special Rapporteur on Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment. Mendez has just returned from Morocco and issued a report that "highlights on the one side, the existence in Morocco of an important judicial and institutional arsenal which has allowed the emergence of a true culture of human rights; and identifies, on the other side, the challenges to be surmounted to put in place the international dispositions and practices." As it continues to promote human rights and finalizes a national mechanism for the prevention of torture, Morocco is also seeking membership on the Human Rights Council.

CNDH was established by HM the King in 2011, with El Yazami as its head, to protect human rights in Morocco. For more on CNDH, go to Morocco's National Council on Human Rights, at: <http://www.ccdh.org.ma/?lang=en>.

For more on Morocco and the region, visit <http://www.moroccoonthemove.com/>.
Also follow us on Twitter -@MorocOnTheMove

The Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP) is a non-profit organization whose principal mission is to inform opinion makers, government officials, and interested publics in the United States about political and social developments in Morocco and the role being played by the Kingdom of Morocco in broader strategic developments in North Africa, the Mediterranean, and the Middle East. For more, please visit www.moroccoonthemove.com

This material is distributed by the Moroccan American Center for Policy on behalf of the Government of Morocco. Additional information is available at the Department of Justice in Washington, DC.

South Florida Business Journal

St. Louis Business Journal

Puget Sound Business Journal

San Antonio Business Journal

Sacramento Business Journal

Business First of Louisville

Business First of Columbus

Business Journal of Phoenix

Business Journal of Greater Milwaukee

Birmingham Business Journal

Baltimore Business Journal

Business First of Buffalo

Boston Business Journal
 Business Review (Albany)
 Business Journal of the Greater Triad Area
 Austin Business Journal
 Atlanta Business Chronicle
 International Business Times
 TheStreet.com
 Cincinnati Enquirer
 Columbus Dispatch
 WFSB-TV CBS-3 (Hartford, CT)
 PR Newswire
 KPTV-TV FOX-12 (Beaverton, OR)
 Press-Enterprise
 WTHR NBC-13 (Indianapolis, IN)
 KWTW-TV CBS-9 (Oklahoma City, OK)
 WSMV-TV NBC-4 (Nashville, TN)
 KCTV-TV CBS-5 (Kansas City, MO)
 WISTV NBC-10 (Columbia, SC)
 KGO-TV ABC-7 (San Francisco, CA)
 Daily Herald
 WFIE NBC-14 (Evansville, IN)
 KPHO-TV CBS-5 (Phoenix, AZ)
 KOTV-TV CBS-6 (Tulsa, OK)
 KLTV ABC-7 (Tyler, TX)
 WAFB CBS-9 (Baton Rouge, LA)
 Digital Journal
 WAVE NBC-3 (Louisville, KY)
 Quincy Herald-Whig (Quincy, IL)
 WFMZ
 WKRN ABC-2 (Nashville, TN)
 WXIX FOX-19 (Cincinnati, OH)
 Spoke
 WAFF NBC-48 (Huntsville, AL)
 WSFA NBC-12 (Montgomery, AL)
 WNEM-TV CBS-5 (Saginaw, MI)
 The Herald
 Ticker Technologies
 WLOX ABC-13 (Biloxi, MS)
 WTOG CBS-11 (Savannah, GA)
 KHNL-TV NBC-8 (Honolulu, HI)
 KFMB-TV CBS-8 (San Diego, CA)
 WHTM-TV ABC-27 (Harrisburg, PA)
 WECT NBC-6 (Wilmington, NC)
 WOIO CBS-19 (Cleveland, OH)
 WBOC CBS-16 (Salisbury, MD)
 WBAY ABC-2 (Green Bay, WI)
 WBTV CBS-3 (Charlotte, NC)
 WCAX CBS-3 (Burlington, VT)
 KVVU-TV FOX-5 (Las Vegas, NV)
 KSTP-TV ABC-5 (Saint Paul, MN)
 WLBT NBC-3 (Jackson, MS)
 KTUL-TV ABC-8 (Tulsa, OK)
 WWTW-TV CBS-9 (Cadillac, MI)
 WWBT NBC-12 (Richmond, VA)
 KHQ-TV NBC-6 (Spokane, WA)
 WCSC CBS-5 (Charleston, SC)
 WGCL-TV CBS-46 (Atlanta, GA)
 WMC NBC-5 (Memphis, TN)
 WTVG-TV ABC-13 (Toledo, OH)
 KFVS CBS-12 (Cape Girardeau, MO)
 KWWL-TV NBC-7 (Waterloo, IA)
 WDRB FOX-41 (Louisville, KY)
 WHNS-TV FOX-21 (Greenville, SC)
 KSLA CBS-12 (Shreveport, LA)
 WBRC-TV FOX-6 MyFox Birmingham
 (Birmingham, AL)
 KAIT ABC-8 (Jonesboro, AR)
 WSET-TV ABC-13 (Lynchburg, VA)
 Vanguardia
 WRCB-TV NBC-3 (Chattanooga, TN)
 WBMA-TV ABC-33 / ABC-40 (Birmingham, AL)
 KCBD NBC-11 (Lubbock, TX)
 WRIC ABC-8 (Richmond, VA)
 WALB NBC-10 (Albany, GA)
 KPLC NBC-7 (Lake Charles-Lafayette, LA)
 KBMT-TV ABC-12 (Beaumont, TX)
 KATV-TV ABC-7 (Little Rock, AR)
 WAOW-TV ABC-9/WYOW-TV CW-34 (Wausau, WI)

KOLD CBS-13 (Tucson, AZ)	Miami Herald
WTVM ABC-9 (Columbus, GA)	News & Observer (Raleigh, NC)
KXXV-TV ABC-25 (Waco, TX)	Market Pulse
WTRF-TV CBS-7 (Wheeling, WV)	Maxim Group
InvestTalk	Newsday (Melville, NY)
Inside Bay Area	News Tribune (Tacoma, WA)
Inland Valley Daily Bulletin (Ontario, CA)	Olympian (Olympia, WA)
Island Packet (Bluffton, SC)	Oklahoman (Oklahoma City, OK)
Whittier Daily News (Whittier, CA)	San Gabriel Valley Tribune
Idaho Statesman	Ruidoso News (Ruidoso, NM)
Great American Financial Resources	San Bernardino County Sun (San Bernardino, CA)
Fort Worth Star-Telegram (Fort Worth, TX)	Record Publishing Company (Ravenna, OH)
Wichita Eagle (Wichita, KS)	Redlands Daily Facts (Redlands, CA)
Kansas City Star	Pasadena Star-News (Pasadena, CA)
Carlsbad Current-Argus (Carlsbad, NM)	Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)
BusinessRockford	Santa Cruz Sentinel (Santa Cruz, CA)
Buffalo News (Buffalo, NY)	San Jose Mercury News
Beyond The Dow	Street Insider
Belleville News-Democrat	Sun Herald (Biloxi, MS)
Worth	TC Palm
Anchorage Daily News	Telegraph-Macon (Macon, GA)
WRAL-TV CBS-5 (Raleigh, NC)	The Bellingham Herald
WR Hambrecht & Co.	The Daily Herald
Fayetteville Observer	The Sun News (Myrtle Beach, SC)
Farmington Daily Times (Farmington, NM)	The State (Columbia, SC)
Contra Costa Times	Tribune (San Luis Obispo, CA)
Columbus Ledger-Enquirer (Columbus, GA)	Value Investing News
Daily Breeze (Torrance, CA)	Times Union (Albany, NY)
WBOY-TV NBC-12 (Clarksburg, WV)	KCEN-TV NBC-9 (Temple, TX)
WTOL CBS-11 (Toledo, OH)	Indianapolis Business Journal
WMBF NBC-32 (Myrtle Beach, SC)	KLFY CBS-10 (Lafayette, LA)
FinancialContent - PR Newswire	KTVN-TV CBS-2 (Reno, NV)
KVOR 740-AM (Colorado Springs, CO)	One News Page Global Edition
LaMusica	WJRT-TV ABC-12 (Flint, MI)
Long Beach Press-Telegram (Long Beach, CA)	KTRE ABC-9 (Lufkin, TX)
Los Angeles Daily News (Woodland Hills, CA)	Web 2.0 Journal
Las Cruces Sun-News	KUSI-TV IND-51 (San Diego, CA)
Lexington Herald-Leader (Lexington, KY)	La Mega 97.9 FM
Market Intelligence Center

SYS-CON Media
 US Politics Today
 International Development News Today
 WDAM NBC-7 (Hattiesburg-Laurel, MS)
 WVVA NBC-6 (Bluefield, WV)
 WCIV-TV ABC-4 (Charleston, SC)
 KALB-TV CBS-2 / NBC-5 (Alexandria, LA)
 WGFL-TV CBS-4 (Gainesville, FL)
 WFXG-TV FOX-54 (Augusta, GA)
 WFMJ-TV NBC-21 (Youngstown, OH)
 WFLX FOX-29 (West Palm Beach, FL)
 WFFF-TV FOX-44 / WVNY-TV ABC-22 (Colchester, VT)
 WDSI-TV FOX-61 (Chattanooga, TN)
 AD HOC NEWS
 Money Canada
 WFXS-TV FOX-55 (Wausau , WI)
 WFXR-TV FOX-21/27 (Roanoke, VA)
 WGEM-TV NBC-10 (Quincy, IL)
 WHBF CBS-4 (Rock Island, IL)
 KDUH-TV ABC-3 (Scottsbluff, NE)
 WKOW-TV ABC-27 (Madison, WI)
 WICU-TV NBC-12 (Erie, PA)
 KCOY CBS-12 (Santa Maria, CA)
 KFRE-TV CW-59 (Fresno, CA)
 KFDA CBS-10 (Amarillo, TX)
 WMBB-TV ABC-13 (Panama City, FL)
 WLTZ-TV CW-38 (Columbus, GA)
 KAUZ-TV CBS-6 (Wichita Falls, TX)
 WLAX-TV FOX-25/48 (LaCrosse, WI)
 KCAU ABC-9 (Sioux City, IA)
 WLNS CBS-6 (Lansing, MI)
 KAZT IND-7 (Phoenix/Prescott, AZ)
 US News Online
 WOI ABC-5 (West Des Moines, IA)
 WMDT-TV ABC-47 /CW-3 (Salisbury, MD)
 WQOW-TV ABC-18 (Eau Claire, WI)
 WOWK-TV CBS 13 (Huntington, WV)
 WREX-TV NBC-13 (Rockford, IL)

eZanga
 Dealbreaker
 WSJV-TV FOX-28 (South Bend, IN)
 WFSX-TV FOX-26 (Wilmington, NC)
 Telecom Innovation (Ulitzer)
 WTNZ FOX-43 (Knoxville, TN)
 WTEN ABC-10 (Albany, NY)
 Twitter (Ulitzer)
 Government News (Ulitzer)
 Biz Daily (Singapore)
 AssignmentEditor.com
 Amor 93.1 FM
 All Port Jobs
 aePiot News
 WBOC-TV FOX-21 (Salisbury, MD)
 WAND-TV NBC-17 (Decatur, IL)
 The State Journal (Charleston, WV)
 KXMB-TV CBS-12(Bismarck, ND)
 NOCO-TV CBS-5 (Fort Collins, CO)
 State House News Service (Affiliated News Services)
 KION CBS-46 (Salinas, CA)
 KWES-TV NBC-9 (Midland, TX)
 KFVE MyNetworkTV-5 (Honolulu, HI)
 KXJB-TV CBS-4 / KVLV-TV NBC-11 (Fargo, ND)
 KMEG-TV CBS-14 (Sioux City, IA)
 KLKN ABC-8 (Lincoln, NE)
 KLJB-TV FOX-18 (Davenport, IA)
 KSTC-TV IND-45 (Saint Paul, MN)
 KSWT-TV CBS-13 (Yuma, AZ)
 KRHD-TV ABC-40 (Bryan-College Station, TX)
 KSFY-TV ABC-13 (Sioux Falls, SD)
 KTTC NBC-10 (Rochester, MN)
 KNOE-TV CBS-8 (Monroe, LA)
 WXOW ABC-19 (La Crosse, WI)
 KOAM-TV CBS-7 (Pittsburg, KS)
 WXVT-TV CBS-15 (Greenville, MS)
 WZDX-TV FOX-54 (Huntsville, AL)
 KOTA ABC-3 (Rapid City, SD)

KMPH-TV FOX-26 (Fresno, CA)
 KNDU-TV NBC (Kennewick, WA)
 KPTH-TV FOX-44 (Dakota Dunes, SD)
 KPTM-TV FOX-42 (Omaha, NE)
 KQCW CW-12/19 (Tulsa, OK)
 WPFO-TV FOX-23 (Portland, ME)
 Vertical Continuity Your Social Marketing Space
 Socialmulti
 The HRIS World
 WSHM-TV CBS-3 (Springfield, MA)
 WTLH-TV FOX-49 (Tallahassee, FL)
 WUPV-TV CW-65 (Ashland, VA)
 KNDO-TV NBC-3 (Yakima, WA)
 KIII-TV ABC-3 (Corpus Christi, TX)
 KGWN-TV CBS-5 (Fort Collins, CO)
 KFMB 760-AM (San Diego, CA)
 KFMB 100.7 Jack-FM (San Diego, CA)
 KFJX-TV FOX-14 (Pittsburg, KS)
 KEYC-TV CBS-12 / FOX-12 (Mankato, MN)
 NorthStar News
 MrBayStreet.com
 ReleasePlus
 One News Page Unites States Edition
 OnCuba Magazine
 WLNE-TV ABC-6 (Providence, RI)
 WLTZ-TV NBC-38 (Columbus, GA)
 WOLF-TV FOX-56 (Wilkes-Barre, PA)
 FinanzNachrichten.de (ABC New Media AG)
 Web Lens
 WSBNN The Wall Street Business News Network
 Ezerin'Com Communication Agency
 Feed Head Lines
 DCXposed
 eMoneyDaily
 Codewit News
 Crossover.co.ke (Magnificent Ltd/Kenya)
 AlphaTrade Finance
 Austin American-Statesman (Austin, TX)
 KTEN NBC-10 (Denison, TX)
 KSWO-TV ABC-7 (Lawton, OK)
 KTIV NBC-4 (Sioux City, IA)
 KTVG-TV FOX-17 / KSNB-TV FOX-4 (Kearney, NE)
 AlipesNews
 KUAM-TV NBC-8 / CBS-11 (Hagatna, Guam)
 California Chronicle
 Brian's Roar
 boomerVilleUS.com
 Biz Wire Express
 Luso Financial Planning
 WXTX-TV FOX-54 (Columbus, GA)
 WVNS-TV CBS-59 (Ghent, WV)
 Latest News Today
 Living by the Seasons
 News Info Guide
 KWQC NBC-6 (Davenport, IA)
 NorthWest Cable News (Seattle, WA)
 KYTX CBS-19 (Tyler, TX)
 KXVO-TV CW-15 (Omaha, NE)
 KXLT FOX-47 (Rochester, MN)
 El Paso Times
 KING-TV NBC-5 (Seattle, WA)
 Las Vegas Review-Journal
 Las Vegas Business Press
 myMotherLode.com
 Health Care Enrichment Program
 GYL: Licensing and Certification Resource Directory Investle
 inPixels
 Global Newsweek
 Money Show
 NebraskaTV (Kearney, NE)
 Worcester Telegram & Gazette
 Stocklink
 StockNod
 Wall Street Select
 WBCB-TV CW-21 (Youngstown, OH)

MAC Weekly E-Letter

- ✓ On March 11, MAC Communications team also sent the press release out directly as a Weekly E-Letter to MAC's contact list of more than 3,000 policy makers, opinion leaders, reporters, & other interested US audiences in the Washington, DC area.

Morocco on the Move

Committed to Speedy Reform,
King Mohammed VI Welcomes New
Recommendations on Judicial Reform from Morocco's National Human Rights Council

March 11, 2013

King Mohammed VI welcomes recommendations by National Human Rights Council to advance changes to Morocco's judicial system as set forth by 2011 Constitutional reforms.

WASHINGTON -- Demonstrating Morocco's commitment to systematic reform, advancing human rights, and speedy implementation of its new Constitution, King Mohammed VI welcomed recommendations on judicial reform presented by the National Human Rights Council (CNDH), Morocco's human rights watchdog. These were detailed in four reports submitted by the Council to: advance changes to Morocco's judicial system as set forth in the 2011 Constitutional reforms; respond to the expectations of Moroccan society; and meet pertinent international norms of human rights, justice and the separation of powers.

King Mohammed VI stressed the importance of fast-paced reform and called on all government institutions to fully assume their responsibilities to achieve it. He described the recommendation as a significant contribution to advancing Morocco's dialogue on democracy, consolidating the rule of law, and protecting human rights and the independence of the judiciary.

Driss El Yazami, presiding over Morocco's National Human Rights Council (CNDH), which King Mohammed VI established in 2011 and UN officials call "an independent and highly credible body."

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, August 29, 2013 6:37 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algeria situation report

The following information is provided from private and public sources, none of which has been corroborated.

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

August 28, 2013

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- President Bouteflika has still not resumed his official duties and remains largely out of sight.
- While most sources seem to agree that Bouteflika remains so badly weakened by his stroke that a fourth term of office is unthinkable, one well informed private source claims on the contrary that he has made a full recovery, is in control of the situation and intends to run again in 2014. The forthcoming Council of Ministers may provide important pointers as to which version is correct.
- Prime Minister Sellal has been continuing his inspection visits of the provinces, during which his manner seems increasingly confident and statesmanlike, not to say presidential.
- With parliament due to reconvene on Sept. 2, the fractious FLN leadership has been instructed to put its house in order ahead of what looks like being a busy legislative season.

Foreign Relations

- A recent speech PM Sellal clearly expressed the siege mentality of Algeria's rulers since the outbreak of the Arab Spring, and restated Algiers' refusal to assume regional leadership.
- Algiers is nonetheless being dragged into a more interventionist role, especially to the east, where it is contributing very heavily to the crackdown on a jihadist group in Tunisia's Djebel Chaambi and providing training and other assistance to the Tunisian and Libyan military.
- An outbreak of ugly ethnic violence in Bordj Badji Mokhtar on Algeria's border with Mali is the result of overspill from the conflict in northern Mali and is symptomatic of the dwindling efficiency of Algiers' traditional mechanisms of control in the Sahara region.
- To the west, Algeria's crackdown on fuel smuggling has caused severe socio-economic and even political tension in Morocco's Orientale province.
- Polisario and its supporters have picked up on the hue and cry in the Algerian press over Moroccan drug smuggling.

Security

- There has been a marked uptick in jihadist activity, notably in AQMI's principal base in Kabylia.
- Threats of attacks against the Egyptian embassy in Algiers in response to the Egyptian government's crackdown on the Muslim Brotherhood probably did not emanate from a bona fide terrorist group, and the capital remained quiet throughout the month.
- There have been fewer incursions across Algeria's eastern borders, although there were reports that a group of MUJAO fighters had entered the country in an attempt to spring a number of their imprisoned comrades from jail in Ouargla.
- With the Algerian army and gendarmerie heavily committed along the border with Tunisia, there has been an upsurge in jihadist activity along the southern borders with Mali and Niger, suggesting that there may be limits to the Algerian military's ability to lock down all the borders, all the time.

- Mokhtar Belmokhtar has announced the merger of his group with MUJAO to form a new united jihadist organisation calling itself Al Mourabitoun, with ambitions to become Al-Qaeda's leading franchisee "between the Nile and the Atlantic".

Political Trends

With parliament in recess and much of the country on holiday, August in Algeria is usually a slack period, politically speaking. This year it has been particularly slow, the usual inhibiting factors being compounded by the illness of the once all-powerful head of state. However, with a clutch of important political issues requiring urgent attention, there is a latent tension in the situation, which seems increasingly ripe for release.

As expected, President Bouteflika failed to conduct the individual assessment meetings with government ministers that had been a fixture of Ramadans past. Neither did he put in an appearance at nighttime prayers for the 27th Ramadan^[1] at the Grand Mosque in Algiers, or for the Eid Al-Fitr prayers at the end of Ramadan, occasions he has always made a point of attending in the past. Rumours began to fly after his Eid no-show that he had been flown back to France for further treatment, and on Aug. 24 there was a sudden Twitter-fuelled burst of reports that he had died. Neither stories turned out to be true, but they were very much indicative of public perceptions of the President's condition since he returned to Algeria, apparently wheelchair-bound, in mid-July.

Bouteflika did, however, make two short appearances on Algerian state TV news in the middle of the month. On Aug. 14, he was pictured receiving Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal at his Algiers residence, wearing a dark-blue dressing gown; the following day he was shown, again at his residence in the capital, in the company of armed forces Chief of Staff Lt-Gen. Ahmed Gaïd Salah (for whom he donned a white shirt). In both instances, the images were broadcast without the sound. Speaking to us some time later, a usually well informed Algerian source, who is close to a number of DRS officers at various levels, volunteered the information that as a result of the stroke he suffered in April Bouteflika can still barely speak, and stutters when he does.

The same source added that the country's top decision-makers, looking ahead to next year's presidential election, are actively looking for a “compromise candidate” – a compromise, that is, between the different elements within the establishment – who can be relied upon not to challenge their power and privileges once in office. The source remained somewhat vague as to just who was involved in this search, but seemed to suggest that the armed forces' officer corps would not have much of a say: the military, the source claimed, is thoroughly dominated by the DRS and, contrary to earlier suggestions from other sources, has not been able to capitalise on events in Mali in order to reassert itself as an independent actor. Furthermore, the source pointed out, the military's leading figure, Lt-Gen. Gaïd Salah, who is 73, is likely soon to take retirement. This would seem to imply that the hunt for a successor is essentially the DRS's business. This picture may up to a point reflect the source's own closeness to the DRS, however. Indeed, the very fact that so much effort is going into reaching a consensus – and the fact that no such consensus has yet been found – would seem to suggest that this is not a matter DRS chief Lt-Gen. Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène can decide on his own. More broadly, possible shifts in the balance of forces between the DRS and the armed forces' top brass remain very much worth monitoring over the coming period, in particular with the army cast once again, thanks to the turmoil on Algeria's borders, as the saviour of the nation.

As for the range of potential establishment candidates, the source's only observation was that Ali Benflis – Bouteflika's former chief-of-staff and one-time Prime Minister who ended up running against him in 2004 with the tacit approval of the then head of the armed forces, and whose name has again been floated this year as a possible contender in 2014 – does not seem well placed as things stand. And indeed, after a very brief flurry of interest, the press has largely been ignoring Benflis of late. On the other hand, PM Ahmed Ouyahia – who, it will be recalled, was received by Tewfik in mid-July – received another boost in early August when members of the RND (the party he headed until January of this year) from across the country began signing a petition calling on him to run for President in 2014. Arguably, however, the most likely candidate remains the current Prime Minister, Abdelmalek Sellal, who has been continuing his inspection visits to the provinces, now at a rate of around one per week, and displaying an increasingly assured and presidential manner.

The general consensus at the present time, therefore, is that Bouteflika's prospects of recovering sufficiently to run for a fourth term of office next year are negligible, and that he is being kept so to speak on political life support while the rest of the establishment casts around for an alternative. There have been a few dissenting voices, however. Kabyle news agency Siwel, for example, claimed on Aug. 24 that Bouteflika was planning to convene a meeting of the Council of Ministers in the coming days after which he would announce a thorough shake-up of the government, with several ministers set to lose their jobs for failing to show sufficient loyalty to the President during his spell in hospital in France. Siwel is the media arm of Kabyle-separatist singer Ferhat Mehenni's self-proclaimed “Provisional Government of Kabylia” and as such would not normally be expected to have privileged access to the inner circles of the Algerian executive branch. Curiously, however, the tone of its report does chime with the account given to us by a private source of long standing at the Presidency itself. The source, who has proved generally reliable and often highly valuable over the years, is not only adamant that Bouteflika “has recovered, speaks, and walks” but even goes as far as to claim that the President's return to Algeria in a wheelchair was nothing but “a ploy”: having realised while in hospital in France that most of the establishment and the political class had written him off as all but dead, he wanted to be able to gauge their attitude towards him, in this putatively moribund state, up close and in person, and so chose to play the part on arrival in Algiers. Once the political/security elite realised that he was not dying after all, everyone “fell back into line”. DRS chief Tewfik, the source insists, remains faithful to the President and is not trying to undermine him or squeeze him out. Pointing out that Bouteflika is “only” 75 years old, the source further claims that he still intends to run for a fourth successive term of office in 2014.

This account is radically at odds with the few openly observable signs so far, not to mention with what other sources have been telling us for some time, and the suggestion that Bouteflika has gone to the length of using props to help him play mind-games with other members of the establishment appears, prima facie, almost outlandish. But it is worth underlining the fact that the source has, in principle, excellent access and has over many years provided numerous invaluable insights. On the crucial question of how far Bouteflika remains an active player, therefore, there is little choice but to reserve one's judgement for the time being. On this and related issues, however, events over the coming days may provide important pointers.

While Siwel may be alone in casting it as a prelude to Bouteflika's own version of the night of the long knives, it is by no means the only news source to have evoked an imminent Council of Ministers meeting: media of various stripes, including the international Al-Jazeera news channel, had been confidently reporting that a Council of Ministers meeting – which of course can only be chaired by the President of the Republic – was to be held on Aug. 28. There was never any official announcement to this effect, however, and in the end ministers are reported to have gathered without President Bouteflika for a regular and very low-key working meeting under the chairmanship of PM Sellal.

But there is still an urgent need for a Council of Ministers meeting, insofar the constitution requires that all government legislation – including this year's supplementary finance law and the long-awaited bill to amend the constitution – be discussed and approved by this body before being submitted to parliament. When it finally does take place, the Council of Ministers meeting should provide important clues as to Bouteflika's physical and political vitality. If, as our source at the Presidency claims, Bouteflika has made a full recovery, it would provide the opportunity to demonstrate this to the media, and the nation at large; should it be followed by the reshuffle predicted by Siwel, this would suggest that Bouteflika has recovered not only his physical but also his political potency. On the other hand, minimal or no photographic coverage of the Council of Ministers would suggest that the President is still in weak health and has made only a token appearance to enable a 'pro forma' meeting to be held.

Meanwhile, the commission in charge of drafting the constitutional amendments is understood to have submitted its report to the executive branch, with Algerian media reports suggesting that a bill to amend the constitution was to be presented to the Council of Ministers “at the end of August”. Its contents have not yet been officially released, but leaks to the press indicate that the draft does include provisions for the President to appoint a Vice President, who would take over the running of the country should the head of state be incapacitated. This would clearly put whoever is designated Vice President – PM Sellal is currently seen as the most obvious candidate – on track to succeed Bouteflika formally at the end of his current term of office. If, as per our first source, Bouteflika has failed to make an adequate recovery and the DRS is driving the succession process, such a mechanism could conceivably provide a means of easing Bouteflika out and his successor in^[2].

Whatever the reasons for the delay in convening the Council of Ministers, the resumption of the legislative process after the summer break will also require the removal of a number of other blockages. Once adopted by the Council of Ministers, government bills must be passed to the Bureau of the National People's Assembly (lower house of parliament) for inclusion in the schedule of parliamentary debates. However, contrary to usual practice the Assembly went into recess at the end of July without electing a new bureau for the forthcoming autumn session, which begins on Sept. 2. This appears to have been because chronic faction fighting within the FLN, which has just under half the seats in the National People's Assembly, had effectively made it impossible to hold a vote. In preparation for a particularly busy parliamentary session, not to mention the upcoming presidential election, the FLN needed fixing.

Accordingly, the Interior Ministry has “authorised” (“ordered” would probably be closer to the mark) the party to hold a long overdue Central Committee meeting at which it is supposed to dispense with the provisional leadership that has been in charge since the ouster of Abdelaziz Belkhadem in February and elect a new General Secretary. Former Speaker of parliament Amar Saadani is tipped as the favourite for post, and according to several Algerian media reports enjoys the backing of Bouteflika (Saadani, it is worth remarking, was one of the leading lights of the pro-Bouteflika faction within the FLN in 2003-2004 when the majority of the party stood behind Ali Benflis, and unlike Belkhadem has never been known to express any presidential ambitions of his own). With the CC meeting scheduled for Aug. 29-30, the hope is clearly that this will make it possible for the FLN to put its house in order in time for the opening of the autumn session of parliament on Sept. 2. In the run-up to the meeting, the FLN's various factions have by and large persisted in their fractious ways. A sudden outbreak of peace and unanimity behind Saadani, however, might be a sign that Bouteflika, having risen from his wheelchair, is once more casting his disciplinary shadow over the former single party.

Foreign Relations

Visiting the Wilaya of Jijel on Aug. 15, Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal delivered a speech to a gathering of local representatives of civil society. Addressing the situation on Algeria's borders and the after-effects of the Arab Spring, his comments gave an unusually clear reflection of the siege mentality that has beset Algeria's leadership since the first tremors of the Arab Spring in late 2010.

"We are," intoned the Prime Minister, "sitting on a volcano". The effects of the Arab Spring had been devastating, he argued, leading amongst other things to a climate of civil war in Egypt and an increasingly unstable situation in neighbouring Tunisia. But "there will be no Arab Spring in Algeria. We are working to make sure of that, and we are on the right path." With upheavals and armed conflict afflicting so many of its neighbours, Algeria had "come under pressure from all sides to take on the role of a regional power" (an apparent allusion to the solicitations of Washington, and to a lesser extent France). "But our policy is and always has been quite clear, and it is this which has enabled us to maintain the stability of our country": Algeria remains true to its principled stance of "non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries", and its only ambition with regard to its neighbours is to "ease tensions, not inflame them". At the same time, Algeria is "on its guard [and] determined to confront any attempts at destabilisation", for Algerians "know how precious stability is, especially after having lived through a decade of difficulties that almost threatened the very existence of the Algerian state and the Algerian people". While "we shall never use force against our own children", Algeria has the means to counter any attacks on its stability and national security, the Prime Minister warned.

And yet, despite (or indeed because of) the means at its disposal, the Algerian regime finds itself being pulled, volens nolens, into an increasingly interventionist role, notably to the east. An incipient dispute with the Tunisian authorities over wild allegations of DRS manipulation of Tunisia's violent islamists (see previous report) has been patched up^[3], and security cooperation between Algeria, Tunisia and Libya is becoming more organised. At the very end of July, senior officers from the Algerian and Tunisian militaries are reported to have met to plan a common response to the deteriorating situation in the Djebel Chaambi area on the Tunisian side of the border, where a jihadist group had killed nine Tunisian soldiers on July 25. In early August a Tunisian security official told us:

On the military side of things, Tunisian army units in Djebel Chaambi have formed a joint operations room with Algerian army units. The Algerians have extended logistical and intelligence assistance to the Tunisians and mobilised elite units and some 20,000 troops on the border between the two countries, including 7,000 on the Djebel Chaambi sector of the border.

The Algerian press subsequently quoted a Tunisian army spokesperson as describing “the exchange of information between Tunisia and Algeria” as “the key to the success of this operation”. Meanwhile, the Algerian and Libyan governments are setting up a joint commission to coordinate counter-terrorism and anti-smuggling operations following Libyan Prime Minister Ali Zeidan's visit to Algiers on Aug. 5, and Algiers is also reported to have begun counter-terrorism training programmes with the Tunisian and Libyan militaries.

But this is scarcely a partnership of equals. The 20,000 troops reportedly committed by Algiers to the Tunisian border area is the equivalent of around two thirds of the entire strength of the Tunisian land forces, which are badly overstretched with internal security commitments across the country, while the Libyan army is, if not altogether a fiction, a shaky and unreliable force to say the least. Faced with threats that are increasingly clearly transnational – as emphasised by Tunisian Prime Minister Ali Laareyedh on Aug. 27 when he announced that the Tunisian hardline Islamist group Ansar Al-Sharia, held responsible for the murders of two secularist politicians and henceforth considered a terrorist organisation, had pledged allegiance to Abdelmalek Droukkel, leader of Algeria's AQMI – the Algerian army and security forces are obviously going to be called upon to do a lot of the heavy lifting. It will be increasingly difficult to do so while remaining strictly within Algeria's borders, as events in Djebel Chaambi have shown.

Meanwhile, events on Algeria's southern borders, which for a time seemed to be more or less contained, have again taken a worrying turn for Algiers with an outbreak of extremely ugly ethnic violence between Arabs and Tuaregs in the town of Bordj Badji Mokhtar on the border with Mali^[4]. The precise circumstances which sparked the bloodletting are hazy (some press reports claimed, probably fancifully, that the two groups “quarrelled over a smuggled arms shipment”, while others indicated that the violence erupted when Arab shop owners killed a Tuareg youth who had opened a store in their area, and others still suggested a petty theft provided the spark). But it is fairly clear that the Bordj Badji Mokhtar violence is, one way or another, an overflow from the conflict in neighbouring Mali. Many, if not most, of the Tuaregs involved in the fighting were refugees from northern Mali^[5], who have often been treated by the Algerian authorities with shocking disregard (some told the press that when they sought the Gendarmerie's protection during the rioting they were told to “go get help from France or Burkina Faso”). Their competition with locals for scarce resources and opportunities to make a living appears to have been exacerbated by a strike by local lorry drivers, on whom the town relies for almost all supplies, in protest at fuel rationing – itself a consequence of the conflict in northern Mali, the Algerian authorities having imposed draconian restrictions on sales of refined products in the area in a bid to dry up supplies of smuggled fuel to AQMI and allied groups across the border.

A source close to the DRS has hinted that the Bord Badji Mokhtar events are seen in Algiers as a worrying manifestation of a broader problem. It is particularly striking that the authorities' traditional strategy of relying on local notables to maintain the peace in the vast, ethnically diverse south proved largely ineffective in containing the violence – a peace initiative relying on elders of both communities, fostered by the Wali (provincial governor) of Adrar, brought only a short lull in the fighting – forcing the gendarmerie to bring in as many as 1,500 reinforcements from Algiers to separate the camps. Although the violence appears now to have died down, the Bordj Badji Mokhtar events may be seen as another symptom of a longer-term trend, on which we have commented in the past, whereby the DRS, a past master in manipulating the tribes and clans of the Sahara, seems to be progressively losing its hand, first in northern Mali and Niger, and now within Algeria itself.

By contrast, Algeria's western border with Morocco may seem relatively stable, but tension has been rising here too over the past months, as we have observed on several occasions, as Algeria moves to crack down on smuggling of Moroccan cannabis into Algeria and subsidised Algerian fuel into Morocco. As well as increasing patrols along the border and restricting supplies of fuel to retailers in nearby areas, the authorities have now begun to dig a trench along sections of the border – an expedient which, like the wall of shipping containers hurriedly built along sections of the border with Libya earlier this year, smacks of improvisation, if not desperation. Such measures do, however, seem to be having an effect, in particular on fuel smuggling – to the point where drastic fuel shortages have been reported in eastern Morocco, impacting on the local economy (including the crucial agricultural sector, which it would seem had become reliant on cheap Algerian diesel to run tractors and other farm machinery). This, understandably enough, is fuelling considerable bitterness and even political tensions in eastern Morocco: Orientale province is reported to be “on the brink of rioting” as a result of the fuel shortages, and a pharmacy belonging to the mayor of the provincial capital Oujda (a member of the nationalist Istiqlal Party) has been burnt down by local residents enraged by his blandishments in the press about Moroccans having “no need of Algeria to get by”. At the same time, the crackdown on drug smuggling is producing ever more hauls of Moroccan cannabis, often quite far from the border (6.4 tonnes of sifted cannabis resin were seized by the Algerian army near Hassi R'mel in the Wilaya of Laghouat on Aug. 19), generating ever more virulent coverage in the Algerian media^[6].

This theme has also been picked up on by Polisario and its supporters, with Pierre Galand, the Belgian chairman of the European Coordinating Committee of Saharawi support groups (EUCOCO) proclaiming from the platform of the summer school for SADR cadres near Algiers in August that “Morocco is taking on a very serious responsibility in threatening to flood [Algeria] with tons of drugs in an attempt to influence its position on the Western Sahara conflict”. In a similar vein, Speaker of the Saharawi National Council Khatri Addouh stated from the same platform that:

Morocco harbors terrorists and criminal groups which are active in northern Mali and parts of Africa, terrorists it is preparing to carry out attacks in order to destabilize the region and hinder the process of settling the Saharawi question in accordance with international law. The Moroccan authorities were behind the establishment of the terrorist group MUJAO, in order to weaken the position of the Saharawi state, [as was shown by MUJAO's] kidnapping of Western nationals from the refugee camps [in Tindouf] and its attacks on the interests of certain countries in the region, including Algeria.

To be sure, neither Galand nor Addouh were speaking for the Algerian government. But their remarks – made at an event held under the watchful eye of the DRS, and reported uncritically by Algeria's official news agency APS – can certainly be said to partake of a general climate of Morocco-bashing in the Algerian media that the Algerian authorities, for the time being, show no particular sign of wanting to restrain.

Security

Jihadist activity, which had been running at relatively low levels earlier in the summer, spiked in the last week of July and has remained high throughout August. With 25 security incidents reported, including 13 jihadist operations, in the period 01/08 to 25/08, this August may in fact have seen the heaviest jihadist activity since May 2012. Furthermore, whereas in July AQMI used only bombings (see previous report), the past few weeks have seen it revert to its usual mix of operations, including shootings and fake checkpoints (albeit with a marked preference for remote-controlled bomb attacks).

ALGIERS was calm throughout the month, despite a rash of threats of violence against diplomatic missions. The US embassy and consulates in Algeria remained closed for several days in early August in response to a terror alert covering most of the Middle East and North Africa. And on August 21 Algerian daily Echourouk quoted the Egyptian ambassador to Algeria as saying that the authorities had tightened security around Egyptian diplomatic facilities after diplomats received faxes and phone calls from unknown individuals — some styling themselves the “Amazigh Islamist Front” — threatening “physical elimination” of embassy staff and attacks against the facilities “similar to what happened in Benghazi, Libya” (where the Egyptian consulate had been hit by a bomb blast on Aug. 17 in apparent retaliation for the crackdown by the Egyptian army on the Muslim Brotherhood). The Egyptian embassy in Tunisia reportedly received similar messages. These threats do not, however, appear to emanate from organised groups capable of following them up with action: there is no evidence that the hitherto unheard of Amazigh (i.e. Kabyle or Berber) Islamist Front actually exists, and it is conceivable that it may have been an embellishment by Echourouk, which has acquired a certain reputation for Kabyle-baiting.

KABYLIA itself, meanwhile, saw a sharp upsurge of AQMI activity, with nine operations recorded between July 29 and August 25, up from only four in the preceding month and four in June. And while jihadist activity in Kabylia over the period of May-July had been concentrated in the northwest and centre of the wilaya of Bouira, over the past few weeks it has spread to other parts of Bouira and across the wilayas of Boumerdès and Tizi Ouzou.

The only incident reported in the OIL AND GAS PRODUCING REGIONS came around August 11 when, according to El-Khabar, the army and Gendarmerie tightened security and launched a search and destroy mission around the towns of Ouargla and Chott (wilaya of Ouragla), hunting for jihadists who had reportedly crossed in from Libya with the intention of attacking the prison in Ouargla to help MUJAO members held there escape. The authorities were also investigating escape attempts by the prisoners themselves, claimed the newspaper, adding that “judicial sources” would neither deny nor confirm the report. The situation around the prison “appeared perfectly calm” on August 11, “with no trace of exceptional security measures”, according to El-Khabar, whose story comes in the wake of (and may even have been inspired by) a wave of attacks on prisons in Iraq and Yemen by local Al-Qaeda affiliates in late July, in which dozens of jihadist prisoners were freed.

To the EAST, on the border with Tunisia, there have been fewer incursions since the massive joint Algerian-Tunisian operation against jihadists in Tunisia's Djebel Chaambi was launched in late July, probably because of the heavy presence of Algerian security forces in the area. The only incident of note came on August 2 when Algerian security forces, according to El-Mihwar (04/08), intercepted and killed three jihadists who were trying to cross the border on foot from Tunisia to Algeria in the Bir El-Ater sector (wilaya of Tébessa). They were carrying suicide belts and are thought to have been planning to attack an Algerian border post. The slain jihadists were said to belong to the Djebel Chaambi group.

The SOUTHERN BORDERS, on the other hand, saw more jihadist activity than in the previous months – suggesting, perhaps, that with its heavy new commitments on the border with Tunisia, the Algerian military is becoming dangerously stretched and may not be able to sustain a prolonged lockdown along all the country's borders simultaneously. The security forces on Aug. 3-4 intercepted a jihadist group, believed to be MUJAO members, at a point near Bordj Baji Mokhtar on the border with Mali. An army helicopter destroyed five offroaders, killed five jihadists and recovered five kalashnikovs. It is believed the jihadists were “on their way to Libya to arrange a weapons shipment”. As of August 3, according to El-Khabar quoting “reliable security sources,” the Algerian army stepped up security on the border and put units on alert around Bordj Baji Mokhtar after receiving information that a group of seven jihadists had sneaked in from Mali with the intention of carrying out suicide bombings inside Algeria before the end of Ramadan (Aug. 8). Then on August 6, “informed security sources” told El-Mihwar that the Gendarmerie had foiled a suicide bombing attack against an observation post in the wilaya of Tamanrasset, near the border with Mali. Two MUJAO jihadists were detained and “a huge quantity of explosives, up to 680 kg, seized”. El-Mihwar later reported that the army on August 22 foiled an attempt by AQMI to smuggle weapons into Algeria, probably from Libya, close to the Niger-Libya-Algeria tripoint. Three army and Border Guard units detained five smugglers and seized a shipment of 18 machine guns, 10 RPGs and “three anti-aircraft missiles”^[7].

Finally, in a potentially very significant development beyond Algeria’s borders, MUJAO and Mokhtar Belmokhtar’s Moulathhamoun Brigade issued a statement via Mauritanian news agency ANI on August 22 announcing the merger of the two groups into a new outfit, named Al-Mourabitoun^[8]. Both Belmokhtar and MUJAO’s leader Ahmad Ould Amer “stepped aside” and pledged allegiance to a new emir of the unified group, whom they did not name but described as “a veteran of the Afghan jihad against the Soviets in the 80s and against the Americans in 2002 [who] came to Azawad a while ago and was one of the leaders of the fight against France”. The statement continues with a litany of threats against the jihadists’ enemies, with a special emphasis on France and French interests in North Africa.

A day later, Belmokhtar gave an interview to ANI in which he said the merger decision was “unanimous” and explained that Al-Mourabitoun aims to “unite all jihadis, indeed all Muslims, from the Nile to the [Atlantic] ocean”. The new outfit, he added, “remains committed to its pledge of allegiance to Al-Qaeda’s leadership in Afghanistan and we reaffirm our allegiance to Sheikh Ayman al-Zawahiri and to Al-Qaeda’s way of jihad and its political and military vision as laid down by the late Sheikh Osama bin Laden may God bless his soul”. Belmokhtar explained his decision to step aside as emir by his belief that “it is now time to let a new generation of leaders take charge” – a somewhat disingenuous argument, since a “veteran of the Afghan jihad against the Soviets” would be at least as old as if not older than Belmokhtar himself (born 1972). Indeed, it seems likely that Belmokhtar, who is now the most experienced surviving jihadist leader in the Sahara-Sahel region, remains the de facto emir of the group and that his “resignation” is little more than window-dressing. Belmokhtar’s rhetoric suggests that he is positioning the new group to compete with, or even supplant, the much weakened AQMI as the main Al-Qaeda franchise in the region. It remains to be seen how the remnants of AQMI’s Sahara branch, its leadership in Kabyliya and the Al-Qaeda leadership in Afghanistan will react to this.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

^[1] Laylat Al-Qadr, or the 'night of destiny': the date on which, according to Islamic tradition, the first verses of the Holy Quran were revealed to the Prophet Muhammad.

- [2] On the other hand, it is worth recalling that the source at the Presidency did suggest in June that Bouteflika, intent on standing for re-election in 2014, wanted the constitution amended to include an appointed Vice President, which would give him the possibility of bowing out in the middle of his fourth term and handing over to his designated successor.
- [3] At the end of July, Rachid Ghannouchi, leader of Tunisia's ruling Ennahda party, issued a statement stressing the "importance of relations with neighbouring countries, first and foremost Algeria" and firmly condemning rumours of Algerian involvement in destabilising Tunisia that had been propagated by press and social media close to Ennahda. This was followed on Aug. 1 by a very similar communiqué from the Tunisian Foreign Ministry, and on Aug. 6 Foreign Minister Othman Jarandi and Defence Minister Rachid Sebbagh flew to Algiers for talks with the Algerian government, chiefly centering on security cooperation.
- [4] Clashes between the Arab tribe of Barabiche and the Tuareg tribe of Idnan broke out on Aug. 14, with a pitched battle raging in the main street of the town for several hours before the security forces intervened. Six people were killed and dozens wounded. Violence flared up again on Aug. 19, again leaving several dead and dozens wounded. Officially the death count of the whole episode is ten, although some press accounts have suggested that in reality more than 40 people were killed.
- [5] Algerian daily Echorouk (21/08) reported that the army on August 19 intercepted ten offroaders at the border with Mali carrying Idnan tribesmen who were apparently on their way to Bordj Baji Mokhtar to "support their cousins" in the fight against the Barabiche. The army "dealt with them peacefully" after they were found to be armed with no more than sticks.
- [6] "Morocco just will not stop pouring its poison into Algeria," screeched Algerie1.com, a news site understood to be close to the DRS. Commenting on the economic and social crisis in eastern Morocco caused by the crackdown on smuggling of subsidised Algerian products, the same outlet commented: "THIS JUST GOES TO SHOW HOW THE ILLEGAL EXPORTATION OF ALGERIAN FUEL AND FOOD CONTRIBUTES TO THE STABILITY OF THE KINGDOM, WHICH NONETHELESS HAS NO HESITATION IN USING ITS DIPLOMATIC AND MEDIA MACHINE AGAINST ALGERIA, [SEEN AS NO MORE THAN] A MILCH COW."
- [7] This is the first time the threat of anti-aircraft missile smuggling – formerly a leitmotiv of the Algerian press' reporting of security incidents on the southern and south-eastern borders – has been mentioned since October 2012.
- [8]

Literally “people of the garrisons,” a name given to fighters who manned the border outposts of the early Muslim empires. Later it became the name of a Berber Muslim dynasty that ruled Morocco, Muslim Spain and parts of what is today Algeria and Mauritania in the 11th-12th centuries, known in the West as the Almoravids.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, September 09, 2013 12:18 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal
Subject: FYI: My US Cell is now working

And I'm home in DC this week, Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, September 11, 2013 4:11 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: NARCO: Bouteflika's Back

FYI

Subject: Bouteflika's Back

He's back. After almost five months out of the public eye, first in a Paris hospital and then at home in Algiers recuperating, President Abdelaziz Bouteflika shuffled some high profile posts in his cabinet on 11 September 2013, thereby signaling that anyone who had counted him out has severely underestimated his endurance. Beyond that, though, the shuffle's implications are less than certain.

Of note, Tayeb Belaiz replaced Daho Ould Kabila as Interior Minister. Army Chief of Staff Ahmed Gaid Salah replaced Abdelmalek Guenaizia as Deputy Defense Minister (but also significantly retained his post as Chief of Staff.) And Mourad Medelci was replaced by Ramtane Lamamra as Foreign Minister.

There will no doubt be ample speculation about what the cabinet shuffle means: that Bouteflika was acting up his illness in order to lure out his detractors, that Bouteflika sacked those who proved less loyal during his absence, or that the fact that the cabinet shuffle went ahead is proof that the head of military intelligence (DRS) is well and truly sick.

But the shuffle defies easy interpretation. Although some of Bouteflika's allies were promoted, others were dismissed. And still others remained in their positions. In particular, Bouteflika ended up dismissing his staunch allies Ould Kabila, Guenaizia, and Medelci. Although he did manage to promote close allies Belaiz and Gaid-Salah to Interior and Defense, Foreign Affairs has gone to a technocratic diplomat. Equally important, the technocratic Youcef Yousfi retained his post as Minister of Energy and Mines. Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal hung in too, but there was really no alternative to him at this juncture. At the end of the day, high-level Algerian politics are about consensus and negotiation, rather than outright confrontation. The cabinet shuffle fits this pattern. Final tally for Bouteflika: some victories, some losses, some ties.

It is hard to discern what precipitated the shifts. It has long been recognized that Bouteflika has been battling with his antagonists over the future division of power and influence in Algeria. The struggle has mostly been glimpsed like a shadow play, with puppets moving behind a scrim and only vague suggestions of their confrontations' actual damage and implications. At times, the fighting claims victims, but because the sides are so equally matched, it has largely been a stalemate and the few victims are usually marginal.

At risk of mixing analogies, what has transpired since Bouteflika's hospitalization in April has been akin to the late stages of a drawn-out chess match, with Bouteflika and his antagonists chasing each other's pieces around the board, sometimes opportunistically snatching a pawn here, sometimes losing a rook or knight there, but neither side has enough pieces left to craft a series of moves that would checkmate the other. Making matters worse, most of the remaining pieces aren't black or white. They're grey.

In fact, the cabinet shuffle has only two definitive immediate implications. First, Bouteflika is not done yet. To what end, it is not entirely clear. Is he laying the groundwork to run again in 2014? Will he revive his constitutional amendment proposal to change his current term from five years to seven years and thereby sidestep a 2014 presidential contest? Has he accepted his fate and is now simply trying to shore up his legacy and protect those dear and near to him from being persecuted and prosecuted after he is gone?

Second, the diplomatic and business communities will welcome the development because the shuffle could ease some of the uncertainty that has effected Algiers for the last five months. On the diplomatic front, at the very least Algeria's partners and allies now know who they will be interacting with for the immediate future. The business community is also breathing a small sigh of relief. Although business largely proceeded apace even during Bouteflika's absence, Bouteflika's indeterminate status hung like a heavy cloud over companies' strategic decision-making. Even though the cabinet shuffle is far from definitive, at the very least, companies now have a data point that is less than five months old upon which to base their decisions about how to proceed in Algeria.

There are also other developments which are as of yet unsubstantiated, particularly regarding transferring some functions that were historically part of the DRS's remit to the Army. If these prove to be true, Bouteflika may well have captured his opponent's queen and checkmate may not be too far off.

I'm off to Stockholm next week for the IISS Global Strategic Review, and then Tunis next month for the North Africa Oil and Gas Summit. I'll be speaking about North Africa politics, security and the hydrocarbons sector at both. Hope to see some of you there.

Best, Geoff

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, October 28, 2013 4:27 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Event Report: Atlantic Council (Security)
Attachments: ER_ACUSsecurity22October2013finaldraft.docx

Please see attached report on Atlantic Council's report on "Morocco's Role in Regional Security and Development".
Thanks

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

MAMS Event Report

Date: October 22, 2013

1. Title: Morocco's Role in Regional Security and Development

Hosted by the Atlantic Council

Participants:

Dr. J. Peter Pham: Moderator: Director, Africa Center, Atlantic Council

Christopher Leins: Deputy Director, Politico-Military Affairs, Department of Defense

2. Overview

This event, the fourth in a series on the strategic value of Morocco-US relations in key sectors that include recommendations for US policy actions in support of Morocco, began with a brief review of the topics presented in the draft paper which had been circulated in advance of the event. Dr. Pham gave an overview of Morocco's role in regional security and the merits of their counterterrorism strategy, while highlighting opportunities and recommendations for changes in US policy. The group discussion focused on Morocco's growing role as a regional leader in regional security, and how their economic influence has increased their regional potentially global security influence. The group also evaluated and expanded the paper's recommendations.

3. Summary

Dr. Pham began by discussing an increasing recognition of Morocco's role in African security, which is further enhanced by Morocco's economic and cultural ties on the continent. Despite this, he said, the US takes Morocco. A prime example of this was the "unfortunate drop-in" during the latest MINURSO renewal, which resulted in the cancellation of the bilateral US-Moroccan African Lion security exercises in the spring. In a region where government fragility is "par for the course", he said, Morocco is stable and its interests are often aligned with those of the US. As a regional economic leader, notably in the financial sector, Morocco is expanding its networks throughout Africa, which could help pave the way for increased security cooperation.

There are lessons to be learned from Morocco's counterterrorism strategy, which is both aggressive and comprehensive. The three main tenants are a law-and-order approach to security, a targeting of terrorists through their financial networks, and an economic development approach to marginalize the enabling causes of radicalism. Specific Moroccan programs, including religious training exchanges, as well as the security forces training in places such as Mali, are not adequately lauded or supported. The holistic approach taken by Morocco stands out in the field of counterterrorism, one with certain replicable parts. From a US policy perspective, there is great opportunity for triangulation; scaling up effective programs carried out by a leader in regional security of increasing geopolitical 'heft'.

One main stumbling block to Morocco's growing role in regional security is the Western Sahara. The dispute is no longer 'frozen,' Dr. Pham said. The legally dubious inclusion of the Western Sahara - officially recognized by only nine member countries in the African Union (AU) effectively holds the other members hostage. At present, there is no defined mechanism for the removal of an AU member, so the issue would have to be resolved by other means. Until this happens, the regionalization of security cooperation is more piecemeal and difficult to scale-up, facilitating an environment that has proven to be ideal for global terrorist networks.

Group discussion began with the assertion that current US policy does not do enough to encourage regional economic integration in Africa. The US should insist on a regional dimension to programs and investments, it was recommended. US aid should follow this guideline, focusing on initiatives such as the Trans-African Highway Network. Good security cooperation is based on good economic cooperation, one participant said.

The US should also support Moroccan efforts towards security regionalization, supporting existing programs and forums that Morocco has led. US Military efforts, including the African Lion exercises, have gradually aimed to become more regional, though the process is a slow one. Joint military exercises can pay real dividends, in terms of both training and relations. It's hard to understate how the US-Morocco relationship improved after 1999, one participant said, when both US and UN exercises were performed with Morocco.

More regional-based security efforts are inhibited in part because, it was said, "Algeria gets in the way of everything". The US is somewhat of an enabler to Algerian intransigence, it was suggested, by not calling them to account for misdeeds in Libya and Mali, and by not making the improvement of Moroccan-Algerian relations a diplomatic priority. The US can help by supporting programs that already exist "below the political noise level" as a foundation for improving Moroccan-Algerian relations. Again, economics can be a strong facilitator of improved relations. The US can leverage its free trade agreement with Morocco by supporting value-added chains that encourage cross-border economic activity. The North Africa Partnership for Economic Opportunity (NAPEO) could also be re-tooled to support better relations across North Africa.

Morocco is expanding ties not only throughout Africa, but also across the Atlantic basin into South America. This not only carries economic implications but also potential US policy opportunities. Just as Morocco's influence in Africa can be leveraged into high-impact policy outcomes, the same could potentially be done as Morocco becomes a leader in the broader South-South context. Triangulation and the scaling-up of Moroccan initiatives are excellent ways to have low-input, high-impact policy outcomes, and their scope could potentially increase as the Moroccan economic influence expands globally. US policy should further emphasize its strategic partnership with Morocco with a focus on triangulation in order to achieve shared goals.

4. Observations

This event was attended by more than 20 foreign policy professionals. The paper was well-received, as the commentary indicated, and the Atlantic Council will publish a final paper, without attribution, that has a strong section on recommendations for US actions in support of and expanding Morocco's leadership efforts in regional security.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, October 29, 2013 1:03 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: North African Downfall Spells Success for Morocco"

Very good article on Morocco's oil success story, announcing the farm-in by Kosmos with British company Cairn regarding the offshore Sahara. Combined with the Kosmos-BP announcement last week for Agadir, this points to a very positive story for Moroccan oil development. Kudos to Amina and her team for successfully bringing in such huge companies to Morocco, including the Sahara. She has created a very good image for her country with the major oil companies. Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

<http://oilprice.com/Geopolitics/Africa/North-African-Downfall-Spells-Success-for-Morocco.html>

OilPrice.com

Mon, 28 October 2013

North African Downfall Spells Success for Morocco

By Daniel J. Graeber |

Libyan efforts to get its oil sector back to pre-war levels were stymied last weekend when protests disrupted operations in the west of the country. Work was halted at the El Sharara oilfield, which interrupted activity at the western port of Zawiya. That complicates an already fragile situation lingering in the east of the country. Meanwhile, U.S. supermajor Marathon tried, unsuccessfully, to pull out of the country amid the ongoing turmoil. Further west, however, sits Morocco, where Marathon's rivals are eagerly laying the groundwork for what could be a major oil and gas bonanza.

Companies operating in the once-mighty Libya are reviewing their commitments more than two years after former leader Moammar Gadhafi died after falling into rebel hands. Two short weeks ago, the bulls were running through the streets of Tripoli on word oil production in the war-torn country was on the rebound. Last week, however, the government moved to thwart Marathon's efforts to leave a country still wandering aimlessly through the post civil-war era. Mid-October enthusiasm ensued when oil production moved close to 700,000 barrels per day, though that was roughly half of its pre-civil war level.

Libya has struggled to deal with protesters demanding the centers of oil power move east to Benghazi, home of the revolution that ultimately brought an end to the Gadhafi era. That struggle started a new epoch where oil may be seen as one of Libya's key weaknesses. Now, demonstrations in the west of the country have halted production at oil fields and export terminals, pushing exports down to 250,000 bpd. The "institutional vacuum" in Libya prompted economists from the World Bank and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development to warn the region was in serious economic trouble.

Enter Morocco: Cairn Energy is the latest company to sweep deeper into the country, announcing Monday it farmed into frontier exploration acreage in a deal with regional explorer Kosmos Energy and the Moroccan National Oil Co. Cairn said it would help finance surveys offshore, where it plans to start drilling by the middle of next year. The company added it started drilling an exploration well offshore in a play where it already serves as the operator. Meanwhile, Gulfsands Petroleum, once a standout in the Syrian market, announced it started drilling into its concessions in Morocco. Gulfsands' CEO Mahdi Sajjad said the company plans to announce its results as early as November.

Morocco is considered frontier territory. Exploration activity offshore, however, is bustling along at twice the pace as it was during the past decade. Onshore, the U.S. Energy Department's Energy Information Administration estimates Morocco may hold 20 trillion cubic feet in recoverable shale oil and natural gas reserves. Wary of political instability and terrorism further east, investors may be looking for a safe port in the West African nation, which was isolated from much of the Arab Spring. Nearby Ghana is already capitalizing on the success from its 600 million barrel Jubilee field. If Morocco can duplicate that victory, and keep its political house in order, it could take over where Libya once reigned.

By. Daniel J. Graeber of Oilprice.com

Garth D. Neuffer

Director of Press | Moroccan American Center

1220 L Street NW - Suite 411, Washington, DC 20005

(o) 202-470-2055 (cell) 215-840-3692 (fax) 202-536-4210

gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com

Visit us at <http://www.MoroccoOnTheMove.com>

Follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, October 29, 2013 3:33 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: MACP Release: "From Tindouf to Timbuktu: Report Documents Threat in Africa's Sahara/Sahel from Polisario-Run Camps in Algeria"

FYI - MACP today issued the attached press release to PR Newswire and key US media, citing a new report that provides a detailed chronology of documented incidents and expert reports confirming Polisario-member involvement in illicit activities - including terrorism and trafficking - in the Sahara/Sahel region from 2005 to 2013. The report, "Security in the Sahara and Sahel: The growing threat posed by the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf

<http://moroccoonthemove.com/wp-content/uploads/2013/10/SR_IntroChronology-TruthAboutPolisario-Oct2013.pdf>

, " is available as a PDF file at:

http://moroccoonthemove.com/wp-content/uploads/2013/10/SR_IntroChronology-TruthAboutPolisario-Oct2013.pdf

<http://moroccoonthemove.com/wp-content/uploads/2013/10/SR_IntroChronology-TruthAboutPolisario-Oct2013.pdf> .

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE I HAVE ALSO REPRINTED THE MACP REPORT REFERRED TO IN THE PRESS RELEASE BELOW, SO YOU CAN SEE IT EASILY WITHOUT GOING ON LINE

*This story is also posted at Morocco On The Move at:

<http://moroccoonthemove.com/2013/10/29/tindouf-timbuktu-report-documents-threat-saharasahel-polisario-run-camps-algeria/#sthash.40DyI5Bv.I65MA00N.dpbs>

<<http://moroccoonthemove.com/2013/10/29/tindouf-timbuktu-report-documents-threat-saharasahel-polisario-run-camps-algeria/#sthash.40DyI5Bv.I65MA00N.dpbs>>

*For more on the topic, check out MOTM's new page on "The Truth About The Polisario," where you can find additional fact sheets and reports:

<http://moroccoonthemove.com/policy/the-truth-about-the-polisario/#sthash.7DX2jNbT.dpbs>

<<http://moroccoonthemove.com/policy/the-truth-about-the-polisario/#sthash.7DX2jNbT.dpbs>>

Chronology

Moroccan American Center for Policy

The Truth about the Polisario October 2013

Documented incidents and reports linking members of the Polisario Front with AQIM, trafficking, and other illicit activities in the region.

May 28, 2013

Washington Post's Jennifer Rubin interviewed N. Africa expert Anouar Boukhars, who cited the UN Secretary General's warning about terrorist reach into the Polisario-run camps in Algeria. "This is the first time that the UN chief acknowledged what many experts have been describing for years now as a 'ticking time bomb'...Even the Polisario have not ruled out terrorist infiltrations." Rubin wrote: "In a region awash with weapons, human and drug trafficking, and political unrest, al-Qaeda's local affiliates, especially AQIM, are flourishing. Throw into the mix the violent separatist Polisario Front, which seeks independence for the Western Sahara while maintaining squalid refugee camps in Algeria, and you have a breeding ground for new generations of terrorists."¹⁷

17 Rubin, Jennifer. "North Africa: Breeding Grounds for Terror." Washington Post, 28 May, 2013, <<http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn/wp/2013/05/28/north-africa-breeding-grounds-for-terror/>>

18 "Mokhtar Belmokhtar 'masterminded' Niger suicide bombs." BBC World News. 24 May, 2013, <<http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-africa-22654584>>

19 Bozonnet, Charlotte, Nathalie Guibert, and Christophe Châtelot. "Des djihadistes frappent le Niger et la France." Le Monde, 24 May, 2013.

<http://www.lemonde.fr/international/article/2013/05/24/des-djihadistes-frappent-le-niger-et-la-france_3416795_3210.html>

20 Wehrey, Frederic and Anouar Boukhars, eds. Perilous Desert: Insecurity in the Sahara (Washington: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 2013).

21 Daniel, Serge. "Defeated in Mali, Islamists begin to reorganize." AFP, April 16, 2013, <<http://www.globalpost.com/dispatch/news/afp/130416/defeated-mali-islamists-begin-reorganise>>

22 Witcher, Tim. "Ban says W. Sahara risks being drawn into Mali war." Agence France Presse, April 9, 2013, May 23, 2013

Mokhtar Belmokhtar, who led the Jan. 16, 2013 attack at In Amenas in Algeria, joined Mali-based al-Qaeda splinter group Movement for Unity and Jihad in West Africa (MUJWA) for two attacks in Niger that killed 20 people at a military base and uranium-mine site supplying France's nuclear power plants.¹⁸ MUJWA spokesman Abu Walid Sahraoui, identified as a former Polisario Front member by LeMonde,¹⁹ said the attacks targeted "the enemies of Islam in Niger... We attacked France, and Niger because of its co-operation with France, in the war against Sharia."

May 22, 2013

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace releases a new book, Perilous Desert: Insecurity in the Sahel, edited by N. Africa experts Frederic Wehrey and Anouar Boukhars. The book cites increasing inroads by AQIM and allies in terrorism and trafficking across the Sahara/Sahel region, including Libya, Mali, Mauritania, and Polisario-run refugee camps in Algeria. In a chapter on W. Sahara, Boukhars writes the unresolved conflict has "negatively impacted trans-Saharan security. The undergoverned areas abutting the W. Sahara, especially N. Mauritania and the Polisario-administered camps in SW Algeria, are becoming major hubs for drug trafficking, the smuggling of contraband, and the circulation of weapons." Boukhars further notes, "There is growing evidence to suggest dangerous connections between criminal organizations, AQIM, and the Sahrawi refugees in Tindouf."²⁰

April 16, 2013

AFP reports that jihadists fleeing French and African forces are trying to seek refuge and reorganize in Mali and neighboring countries, including Algerian camps of the Polisario Front. According to an African soldier quoted by AFP, MUJWA members had fled to the Algerian camps of the Polisario. The source further noted, "Recently, when the highest UN authorities have expressed their concern and called for urgent settlement of the Western Sahara problem, it is because of the risk of terrorists turning the refugee camps into a new home for jihadists."²¹

April 9, 2013

UN leader Ban Ki-Moon calls for urgent international efforts to end the Western Sahara conflict because of fears the Mali war will spill over into the territory. In a report to the Security Council, Ban argued, "The rise of instability and insecurity in and around the Sahel requires an urgent settlement of this long-standing dispute." The report added, "All governments consulted raised serious concerns over the risk that the fighting in Mali could spill over into neighboring countries and contribute to radicalizing the Western Saharan refugee camps," with one government leader in the region calling the Western Sahara camps "a ticking time bomb," according to the report.²²

This information has been produced by the Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP).
www.moroccoonthemove.com

MACP is a registered agent of the Government of Morocco. Additional information is available at the Justice Department in Washington, D.C. 4

<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5iOnupKvBuc8I_WTR3J5BnNCFnmEw?docId=CNG.566cbe22180951c72bc8d9c6ad6fd9d1.d1>

23 "Ministre malien : Le Polisario livre des mercenaires au MUJAO contre des mensualités de 600 euros." LeMag, March 16, 2013, <http://www.lemag.ma/Ministre-malien-Le-Polisario-livre-des-mercenaires-au-MUJAO-contre-des-mensualites-de-600-euros_a68461.html>.

24 "Mali : combattant d'Aqmi, il rapporte la mort d'Abou Zeid." Le Figaro, March 1, 2013, <<http://www.lefigaro.fr/international/2013/03/01/01003-20130301ARTFIG00354-mali-combattant-d-aqmi-il-rapporte-la-mort-d-abou-zeid.php>>.

25 Alexander, Yonah. "Terrorism in North Africa and the Sahel in 2012: Global Reach and Implications." Potomac Institute for Policy Studies/International Law Institute, February 2013, <<http://www.terrorismelectronicjournal.org/knowledge-base/selected-special-reports/>>.

26 "Le ministre malien des Affaires étrangères: 'Le soutien et l'aide du Maroc au Mali sont déterminants pour nous'." AtlasInfo, February 4, 2013,
<http://www.atlasinfo.fr/Le-ministre-malien-des-Affaires-etrangeres-Le-soutien-et-l-aide-du-Maroc-au-Mali-sont-determinants-pour-nous_a38888.html>

27 Allani, Alaya. "Does Mali's War feed or devastate al-Qaeda ambitions?" Al Arabiya, January 29, 2013,
<<http://english.alarabiya.net/articles/2013/01/29/263309.html>>.

28 Volger, Sarah. "Security Challenges in Libya and the Sahel." CNA Strategic Studies, December 2012, <http://www.cna.org/sites/default/files/research/Libya_Sahel_Security_Workshop.pdf>.

29 Rubin, Jennifer. "Al-Qaeda on the march." The Washington Post, November 11, 2012, <http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn/post/al-qaeda-on-the-march/2012/11/10/5c5faaa6-2abc-11e2-96b6-8e6a7524553f_blog.html>

March 16, 2013

The Foreign Minister of Mali, Tieman Coulibaly, confirms that Polisario fighters were among the al-Qaeda-linked terrorist groups in his country. "Polisario elements from the Tindouf camps have been identified with MUJAO fighters operating in northern Mali," Coulibaly said, adding that Polisario militia members had been recruited to fight as mercenaries and paid monthly "salaries ranging from 200 to 600 Euros."²³

March 1, 2013

Le Figaro reports that a fighter from the Polisario was among seven militants taken prisoner after a fierce battle between French/Chadian forces and al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) in Mali. The battle in the mountains of northern Mali reportedly killed key al-Qaeda leader Abou Zeid and 42 other jihadists.²⁴

February 27, 2013

The Inter-University Center for Terrorism Studies at the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies publishes a new report on terrorism, "Terrorism in North Africa & the Sahel in 2012: Global Reach & Implications," which notes that al-Qaeda has "established links with Latin cartels for 'drugs-for-arms' smuggling into Europe with terrorist-trafficking networks in the Sahel that include members of the Polisario Front." The report recommends that the international community take a "closer look at the refugee camps run by the Polisario near Tindouf, Algeria: in order to reduce the flow of recruits to terrorist and criminal groups."²⁵

February 4, 2013

Malian foreign minister Tiéman Coulibaly confirms the presence of Polisario fighters among terrorist groups in Mali. In an AtlasInfo interview he notes, "In the beginning, they were only 500 insurgents. Now they are between 5,500 to 7,000 terrorists in N. Mali who were joined by lost youths, including young Sahrawis from the camps."²⁶

January 29, 2013

Al-Arabiya reports that 300 fighters from the Polisario are fighting as part of the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa (MUJAO) in Northern Mali.²⁷

December 2012

A CNA Strategic Studies' report, "Security Challenges in Libya and the Sahel," warns "there is evidence that AQIM has infiltrated the Sahrawi refugee camps in Tindouf, Algeria, as well as indications that Sahrawi from the camps have joined terrorist groups based in Mali." The report stresses that this development poses "immediate concerns for the security of Western Sahara, Mauritania, Morocco, and Algeria."²⁸

November 11, 2012

Washington Post columnist Jennifer Rubin notes that jihadists have been flooding into Mali, arguing that "AQIM is on the rise throughout the Maghreb, opportunistically teaming up with other groups (like the violent, separatist Polisario) and setting up shop wherever the central government is in disarray."²⁹ 5

October 28, 2012

Jeune Afrique publishes an article, "Mali: Polisario connection" on reports that recruits from the Polisario-run camps and Sahel have joined jihadists in N. Mali. It cites French intelligence reports that groups of 40-60 men, up to 300 volunteers, arrived in Timbuktu and Gao in October, "many of whom express themselves in Hassaniya, the Arabic dialect used by Moors and Sahrawis." Jeune Afrique says Sahrawis with military training in the Polisario camps have been implicated in other terrorist incidents and notes neither the Polisario nor Algerians have been able to stop the "Salafist virus" in the Tindouf camps, and have been even less able to prevent "desperados" leaving the camps to join jihadist movements. While Algerian and Polisario security now police together, the extremist appeal remains strong and "no roadblock, no patrol, no minefield will prevent [them] from taking the path to Timbuktu." ³⁰

30 Soudan, François. "Mali: Polisario Connection." Jeune Afrique, October 28, 2012, <<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Article/JA2703p010-013.xml>>

31 Daniel, Serge. "Foreign jihadists pour into northern Mali." Agence France Presse, October 22, 2012, <<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5iKv6nQ28GeXS3g6FlueGWHfzdzjw?docId=CNG.46aa49b0d9ec1aa0315758bc1eb223b5.221>>.

32 Soudan, François. "Tempête de sable." Jeune Afrique, October 8, 2012,

<<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Article/JA2700p006-007.xml>>.

33 Lacher, Wolfram. "Organized Crime in the Sahel-Sahara Region." Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, September 2012, <http://carnegieendowment.org/files/sahel_sahara.pdf>.

34 "Sahara Occidental: le syndrome malien." Jeune Afrique, August 9, 2012,

<<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Article/JA2691p006-007.xml>>.

October 22, 2012

Agence France Presse reports that hundreds of jihadist fighters have poured into Mali to support the Islamists of AQIM and MUJAO that have controlled the northern part of the country for seven months. Quoting a Malian security official, the article notes, "in the Timbuktu region and around Gao, hundreds of jihadists, mostly Sudanese and Sahrawi, have arrived as reinforcements to face an offensive by Malian forces and their allies." The article also cites one of MUJAO's top leaders, Habib Ould Issouf, who said that recruits were coming from the camps of Tindouf Algeria, Senegal, the Ivory Coast, and elsewhere.³¹

October 8, 2012

Jeune Afrique publishes an editorial citing reports by European/Maghreb intelligences sources that hundreds of recruits are joining al-Qaeda-linked extremist groups in northern Mali from the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria and from across the region. The editorial argues that young Sahrawis have increasingly joined AQIM and MUJAO because of their lack of hope for a future - "trained in weapons, indoctrinated by Salafist imams who openly advocate in the camps for the creation of an Islamic State in the Western Sahara, these fighters are welcomed with open arms by their Algerian brothers."³²

September 2012

The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace publishes a report written by Wolfram Lacher, "Organized Crime in the Sahara-Sahel region" examining the growing impact of organized crime in the region and the involvement of both state and militant groups in such crime. Lacher implicates Sahrawi networks with close ties to the Polisario in the drug and aid trafficking that accounts for much of the organized crime in the region: "In the triangle between Mauritania, Mali, and Algeria, Sahrawi networks-often with the direct involvement of officials in the Polisario movement, which seeks independence for Western Sahara-trade subsidized Algerian goods and humanitarian aid southward and cigarettes northward to Algeria and Morocco." Lacher further notes, "In some cases, Sahrawi cannabis resin smugglers with close ties to the Polisario have been known to take cocaine to Morocco on their way back from Mali."³³

August 9, 2012

Jeune Afrique reports dozens of youth from the refugee camps near Tindouf have joined MUJAO, the AQIM splinter group whose current spokesman, Abou Walid Saharoui, is a former member of the Polisario Front. ³⁴

July 28, 2012

Spain evacuates all its aid workers, as well as three other foreign nationals, from camps in Tindouf, Algeria, citing "well-founded evidence of a serious increase in insecurity in the region" and "serious risks of new kidnappings."³⁵ ⁶

³⁵ "Spain evacuates aid workers." BBC, July 28, 2012, < <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-africa-19034164>>.

³⁶ "Mali Islamists rebels say $18.4 million ransom paid, prisoners released to free 3 Europeans." Associated Press, July 20, 2012, <<http://www.calgaryherald.com/news/Mali+Islamist+rebels+million+ransom+paid+prisoners+released+free/6964246/story.html>>.

³⁷ "Islamist Extremists Threaten Africa's rise." The Soufan Group, June 27, 2012, <http://soufangroup.com/briefs/details/?Article_Id=325>.

³⁸ "Analysis: Mali's north feared new 'rogue state' in Sahara." Reuters, April 4, 2012, <<http://www.reuters.com/article/2012/04/04/us-mali-rogue-idUSBRE8330X220120404>>.

³⁹ Karraky, Abdelaziz. "Mali coup strengthens rogue groups." Zaywa, a service of Magharebia, April 4, 2012, http://zawaya.magharebia.com/en_GB/zawaya/opinion/627

⁴⁰ Pham, J. Peter. "J. Peter Pham Discusses Western Sahara at Council on Foreign Relations - 'The Western Sahara Crisis: Why U.S. Leadership is Needed Now'." Atlantic Council, April 3, 2012, <<http://www.acus.org/news/j-peter-pham-discusses-western-sahara-council-foreign-relations>>.

41 Boukhars, Anouar. "Simmering Discontent in Western Sahara." Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, March 2012, <<http://carnegieendowment.org/2012/03/12/simmering-discontent-in-western-sahara/a2ah>>.

42 "Ban calls for boost in efforts to fight organized crime in West Africa and Sahel." UN Press Centre, February 21, 2012,

<<http://www.un.org/apps/news/story.asp?NewsID=41314&Cr=organized+crime&Cr1=>>.

43 Alexander, Yonah. "Terrorism in North, West, & Central Africa: From 9/11 to Arab Spring." International Center for Terrorism Studies, Potomac Institute for Policy Studies, (January 2012), <http://moroccoonthemove.files.wordpress.com/2012/02/2012-special-update-report-full-report-terrorism-in-africa-from-9-11-to-arab-spring-icts-potomac-2feb2012.pdf>>.

July 20, 2012

The three Spanish aid workers kidnapped from a refugee camp near Tindouf, Algeria in October 2011 and held in northern Mali are released, allegedly for an $18.4 million ransom.³⁶

June 27, 2012

Soufan Group issues an intelligence brief warning of fallout of the Libya conflict and unintended benefits for AQIM: "buoyed by the flow of arms and fighters out of Libya, the group initiated skirmishes with government forces in Mauritania, Mali, and Niger during the last months of 2011." It notes, "More ominously, AQIM also increased its linkages with other rebel forces in the Sahel, including the Polisario Front... In late October, three aid workers-Italian & 2 Spaniards-were seized by AQIM militants (aided by Sahrawi sympathizers) inside a camp administered by the Polisario separatists near the Algerian town of Tindouf. The connection was not surprising given that the large numbers of idle young Polisario fighters with no prospects present the terrorist group with a ready pool of potential recruits, both for its military operations as well as the drug smuggling and other criminal activities." ³⁷

April 6, 2012

Malian separatists declare independence in N. Mali in what experts fear may be a "rogue state" in the Sahara.³⁸ National Movement for the Liberation of Azawad is backed by militant Islamic group Ansar Dine, AQIM, and AQIM splinter, Movement for Unity and Jihad in West Africa, in seizing Gao & Timbuktu, creating "a security nightmare." Experts warn that along with AQIM, "the Polisario will gain more power" from the crisis in Mali.³⁹ Africa expert Dr. J. Peter Pham cites the importance of resolving the W. Sahara. "It is like before 9/11, when we might have asked ourselves: 'Who cares about Afghanistan?' But jihadists ultimately need a place to operate and what we are now seeing is the creation of a safe haven for terrorists and extremists who are being squeezed out elsewhere."⁴⁰

March 12, 2012

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace publishes a paper citing the "disturbing reality" that rising numbers of disenfranchised Polisario youth and fighters are recruited by AQIM and a "vast network" of traffickers. The paper, by Anouar Boukhars, cites the Oct. 23 kidnapping of Western aid workers in the Polisario camps as confirmation that "deteriorating social & political conditions in the camps in Tindouf represent a tinderbox waiting to explode." It also notes that AQIM-Polisario member links pose "a major security threat to the Maghreb and the Sahel."⁴¹

February 21, 2012

Experts testify to UN Security Council that drug cartels and smugglers now traffic almost $1 billion in cocaine a year from Latin America into Africa's Sahel, and traffickers are forming alliances with AQIM and other militants, in a region flooded by Libyan weapons. Sec. General Ban Ki-moon warns leaders: "inaction could be catastrophic."⁴²

February 2, 2012

ICTS releases a study reporting the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria have become "a recruiting ground for terrorists, traffickers, and other criminal enterprises," recommending Western refugee aid "prioritize permanent resettlement." Noting expanding AQIM ties to Polisario members, S. American cartels, Boko Haram, al-Shabaab, and Libyan weapons, the study cites a 500% rise in terrorism in the region since 9/11. It argues AQIM seeks to extend an "arc of instability" across Africa to exploit Arab Spring turbulence and destabilize the region. ^{43 7}

January 11, 2012

Algerian and Mauritanian security agencies reportedly break up major trafficking and money laundering rings. Officials say the rings are believed linked with groups such as al-Qaeda, which is working with the Polisario to traffic arms and drugs from Mauritania to northern neighbors. Mali reportedly steps up efforts against AQIM and what is believed its latest offshoot, "Al Qaida in Polisario Camps." ⁴⁴

⁴⁴ "N. African states take down major narco trafficking network." World Tribune, January 11, 2012, <<http://www.worldnewstribune.com/2012/01/11/n-african-states-take-down-major-narcoterror-drug-network/>>.

⁴⁵ Pham, J. Peter. "Islamist Threat to Africa's Rise in 2012." Atlantic Council, January 3, 2012, <http://www.acus.org/new_atlanticist/islamist-threat-africas-rise-2012>.

⁴⁶ De Serge, Daniel. "Mali distancing itself from the Polisario Front." Agence France Presse, December 27, 2011, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5i4CHA2HdwpcQJ_XrfCkoFfM4eHBQ?docId=CNG.09c4b8e975cfc23c8718b820ade10fec.161&index=0>

⁴⁷ Ibid

⁴⁸ Bamako warns Polisario: 'Mali is not Wild West.' Middle East Online, December 17, 2011, <<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=49540>>.

⁴⁹ Ibid

⁵⁰ "'Al-Qaeda splinter group' claims kidnap of Westerners." Agence France Presse, December 10, 2011, <<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5hJQYCSJBL5a0NCGjPMIyCS8SryfQ?docId=CNG.4df034a80725d0c44da18538105d6420.dd1>>.

51 Madden, Christina L. "Western Sahara: Forgotten Corner of the Arab Spring." World Politics Review, December 15, 2011, <<http://www.worldpoliticsreview.com/articles/10947/western-sahara-forgotten-corner-of-the-arab-spring>>.

January 3, 2012

Security expert Dr. J. Peter Pham, Atlantic Council, reports that economic and political reforms in Africa are "threatened by the spread of violent extremism" and "increasing links" between AQIM and other militants in the Sahel, recently "buoyed by the flow of arms and fighters" from Libya. "More ominously, AQIM has increased its linkages with the Polisario," evident in AQIM's October 23 kidnappings near Tindouf, which were "aided by Polisario sympathizers" inside the Polisario's camps. The camps offer "a ready pool of potential recruits" from "large numbers of idle young fighters."⁴⁵

December 27, 2011

Mali reportedly distances itself from the Polisario, accusing it of kidnapping, drug trafficking, and suspected collusion with a Sahrawi branch of al-Qaeda in the Maghreb. A source close to the government says Mali is "angry" with the Polisario, and Malian officials say the October 23 kidnapping was done in collusion with the 'Sahrawi link' of AQIM.⁴⁶

December 24, 2011

Mali refuses entry to "eight young Sahrawis" coming from Niger. "They had no papers. There are laws to be respected in Mali especially when it comes to dubious propaganda," said Malian police.⁴⁷

December 17, 2011

Mali warns the Polisario, "our country is not the Wild West where they can come to kill and kidnap people." Bamako will "no longer accept the violation of its territorial integrity by the Polisario Front," says a Malian Minister. A local official adds, "everybody here knows who AQIM's accomplices are, they even assisted in abducting the Europeans in Tindouf. His name is Omar al Sahraoui, but neither Mali, nor Algeria, nor the Polisario are doing anything to capture him." In 2010, al Sahraoui, reportedly a Polisario veteran, was sentenced to 12 years for kidnapping Spanish aid workers for AQIM, according to Mauritanian court papers. He was later released in a trade for the aid workers. ⁴⁸

December 15, 2011

Members of the Polisario launch an armed incursion into northern Mali, killing one and abducting three others, ostensibly looking for the kidnappers of three Western aid workers taken October 23 from the Polisario-run camps near Tindouf, Algeria.⁴⁹

December 10, 2011

A splinter group of AQIM confirms it is holding three aid workers kidnapped October 23 near the Tindouf refugee camps in Algeria. The group, linked by some to al Sahraoui, calls itself "Unity Movement for Jihad in West Africa."⁵⁰

November 30, 2011

The US House Subcommittee on Counterterrorism & Intelligence hears testimony that AQIM is expanding its ties in the Sahel with the Polisario, as well as militant Nigerian group Boko Haram and Somalia-based al-Shabaab.^{51 8}

November 28, 2011

UK Foreign Secretary William Hague says AQIM's expanding terrorist ties to other militant groups in the Sahel could have a "profoundly destabilizing" effect on a region already rocked by the Arab Spring.⁵²

52 Croft, Adrian. "EU police, experts to counter al Qaeda in Africa - UK." Reuters, November 28, 2011, <<http://af.reuters.com/article/worldNews/idAFTRE7AR29020111128?sp=true>>

53 "N. African states take down major narco trafficking network." World Tribune, January 11, 2012, <<http://www.worldnewstribune.com/2012/01/11/n-african-states-take-down-major-narcoterror-drug-network/>>.

"Report: Al-Qaeda denies Algeria kidnappings." Associated Press, November 28, 2011, <<http://www.usatoday.com/news/world/story/2011-12-09/al-qaeda-kidnappings/51766924/1>>.

54 "Algeria said to discipline Polisario commander over ties to Al Qaida." World Tribune, November 7, 2011, <<http://www.worldnewstribune.com/2011/11/07/algeria-said-to-discipline-polisario-commander-over-ties-to-al-qaida/>>.

55 Rubin, Jennifer. "Al-Qaeda affiliate flexing its muscles in the Maghreb." The Washington Post, November 6, 2011, <http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn/post/al-qaeda-affiliate-flexing-its-muscles-in-the-maghreb/2011/11/05/gIQANMbDqM_blog.html>.

56 Kidnappers of three European aid workers benefited from polisario security apparatus' support: Spanish paper says." Morocco World News, October 26, 2011, <<http://moroccoworldnews.com/2011/10/kidnappers-of-three-european-aid-workers-benefited-from-polisario-security-apparatus-support-spanish-paper-says/12992>>.

"Hard Blow to pro-independence Sahrawis and their Host Algeria." El Pais, October 24, 2011, <http://politica.elpais.com/politica/2011/10/24/actualidad/1319409584_827405.html>.

57 Ajbaili, Mustapha. "Has Spain switched gear on the Western Sahara?" Al Arabiya, October 25, 2011, <<http://english.alarabiya.net/articles/2011/10/25/173691.html>>.

58 "Three Qaeda hostages seized last week alive: mediator." Agence France Presse, October 30, 2011, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5gfsKPTIgBS_IQzBQK_R-Fdj_-z0A?docId=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4c3f07.531>.

59 Stearns, Scott. "Gadhafi Collapse Raises Concerns Over Arms for Africa al-Qaida." Voice of America, September 29, 2011,

<<http://www.voanews.com/content/article--gadhafi-collapse-raises-concerns-over-arms-for-africa-al-qaida-130788458/145923.html>>.

60 "Report: Polisario working with Al Qaida in drug, weapons trafficking." World Tribune, September 20, 2011, <http://www.worldtribune.com/worldtribune/WTARC/2011/ss_terror1178_09_20.asp>.

November 24, 2011

AQIM kidnaps two French tourists from their hotel at night in eastern Mali, claiming they are spies. Officials later report that the abductions were coordinated with the Polisario.⁵³

November 7, 2011

Algerian Chief of Staff General Qaid Saleh reportedly reprimands Polisario chief Mohammed Abdul Aziz for allowing an al-Qaeda presence inside the Polisario-controlled camps in Tindouf.⁵⁴

November 6, 2011

Washington Post columnist Jennifer Rubin cites alarm at AQIM kidnappings in the Polisario camps. "This is a catastrophe waiting to happen. The need to empty the camps, deprive AQIM of a supply of victims and accomplices, and restore order has never been greater."⁵⁵

October 26, 2011

Spanish daily El Pais reports on the Tindouf abductions, noting that, "to cross the checkpoints of the Algerian army and Polisario, kidnappers benefited from support of Polisario's military."⁵⁶

October 25, 2011

Spain requests a UN security mission to the Polisario-run camps. "We've asked the UN to send a mission to Algeria to assess the security situation in the camps of Tindouf" - Foreign Minister Trinidad Jimenez.
57

October 23, 2011

An AQIM splinter group kidnaps three Western aid workers from the Polisario-run camps in Algeria, reportedly with Polisario-insider help. "Unarmed AQIM militants entered the Sahrawi refugee camp in Tindouf, western Algeria, where sympathizers of the Polisario Front gave them weapons and helped them seek out the hostages."⁵⁸

September 29, 2011

Mauritanian President reports that AQIM has acquired Libyan arms, including surface-to-air missiles. 59

September 20, 2011

US terrorism expert Yonah Alexander, International Center for Terrorism Studies, says the "Polisario is intensifying activities to transport and smuggle illegal drugs in both North Africa and Europe. The Polisario is working with Al Qaida in both the drug and weapons trade."⁶⁰ 9

September 15, 2011

Malian security forces hunt for rival gangs of drug smugglers from Mali, Niger, and the Polisario, after a desert gun battle over ton of cocaine and hashish leaves four dead, according to a Malian army official.⁶¹

61 "Mali security forces hunt desert drug traffickers." Agence France Presse, September 14, 2011, <http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5g8Cmjx_raUtLYFtRp39MbQmv_bzw?docId=CNG.84013840d691548b4d501bfc5f665885.51>.

62 "Kadhafi's fall strengthens Morocco over Western Sahara." Agence France Presse, September 10, 2011, <<http://moroccoworldnews.com/2011/09/9233/gaddafis-fall-strengthens-morocco-over-western-sahara/>>.

63 Francheska, Alyangka. "U.S. wants probe on Gadhafi's alleged recruitment of mercenaries from Algeria-backed Polisario to fight NATO, rebels." International Business Times, May 30, 2011, <<http://au.ibtimes.com/articles/154113/20110530/gade-redafi-libya-rebels-morocco-algeria-u-s-congress.htm>>.

64 "Sources: Gadhafi paying Polisario mercenaries $10,000 each to fight for him." World Tribune, May 20, 2011, <http://www.worldtribune.com/worldtribune/WTARC/2011/me_libya0607_05_20.asp>.

65 Coughlin, Con. "Libya: Col Gaddafi 'has spent £2.1m on mercenaries'." The Telegraph, April 21, 2011, <<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/africaandindianocean/libya/8464254/Libya-Col-Gaddafi-has-spent-2.1m-on-mercenaries.html>>.

66 Rubin, Jennifer. "Exclusive: Ex-Polisario Front police chief tells his story." The Washington Post, January 16, 2011, <http://voices.washingtonpost.com/right-turn/2011/01/exclusive_ex-polisario_front_p.html>.

67 "Arrests of Terrorism Suspects Announced." The Washington Post, January 6, 2011, <<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2011/01/05/AR2011010506468.html>>.

68 Rubin, Jennifer. "Morocco: A Different Kind of Muslim Country." The Washington Post, January 12, 2011, <http://voices.washingtonpost.com/right-turn/2011/01/morocco_a_different_kind_of_muslim_country.html>.

69 Lake, Alison. "Unlikely bedfellows: Are some Saharan Marxists joining Al-Qaida operations in North Africa?" Foreign Policy, January 3, 2011, <http://mideast.foreignpolicy.com/posts/2011/01/03/unlikely_bedfellows_are_some_saharan_marxists_joining_al_qaida_operations_in_north_>.

70 "Key members of Sahara drug ring captured are from Polisario." Middle East Online, December 21, 2010, <<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=43149>>.

September 10, 2011

Analysts say that Libyan dictator Qaddafi's fall seriously weakens the Polisario in its dispute with Morocco on the Western Sahara, after widespread reports that Polisario mercenaries sided with Qaddafi. ⁶²

May 29, 2011

US Congressman Mario Diaz-Balart urges colleagues in Congress to give "serious attention" to evidence that Polisario members are "participating as mercenaries in Colonel Qaddafi's murderous campaign."⁶³

May 20, 2011

The US Administration expresses concern to Algeria that "credible sources report" that Polisario mercenaries are being paid by Qaddafi "to fight NATO-led forces and kill Libyan protesters and rebels."⁶⁴

April 21, 2011

The London Telegraph reports that senior NATO officials have received information that Col. Qaddafi is hiring 450 Polisario mercenaries for $10,000 each to fight Libyan rebels and prop up his regime.⁶⁵

January 16, 2011

Former Polisario Chief Police Inspector, Mustapha Salma Ould Sidi Mouloud says "the situation is grave for the youth who are marginalized" in Polisario-run camps in Algeria. "The camps are fertile grounds for Islamic fundamentalist groups and drug traffickers."⁶⁶

January 6, 2011

Terrorism cell and arms cache broken up in W. Sahara suggest "links between AQIM and the Algeria-backed Polisario Front."⁶⁷ Washington Post columnist J. Rubin writes, "there is ample evidence the Polisario Front... is in league with al-Qaeda."⁶⁸

January 3, 2010

US DEA former Director of Operations, Michael Braun, calls conditions 'dismal for Saharans living in the Polisario-run camps,' which have become a "breeding-ground for potential future AQIM recruits." ⁶⁹

December 21, 2010

Leaders arrested in one of the Sahel's largest drug-smuggling rings are purported to have close ties to the Polisario Front. Nigerien officials call it, "one of the major drug trafficking networks" in the Sahara. It is known as "Polisario" because 90% of its members come from camps of the Polisario Front.⁷⁰ ¹⁰

December 9, 2010

Experts cite growing concern about violence instigated by pro-Polisario militants in Laayoune, W. Sahara. "Situation is becoming more dangerous, because of the violence and because al-Qaeda is now present." - Analyst T. Tarik.⁷¹

⁷¹ Worth, Robert F. and Souad Mekhennet. "Desert Land in Limbo is Torn Apart." The New York Times, December 9, 2010, <<http://www.nytimes.com/2010/12/09/world/africa/09morocco.html?pagewanted=all>>.

72 "Al-Qaeda looks to Sahel for new funding sources." Magharebia, November 10, 2010, <http://www.magharebia.com/cocoon/awi/xhtml1/en_GB/features/awi/features/2010/11/10/feature-01>.

73 Look, Anne. "Morocco says dismantled drug ring linked to terrorists." Voice of America, October 18, 2010,
<<http://www.voanews.com/english/news/africa/north/Morocco-says-Dismantled-International-Drug-Trafficking-Ring-Linked-to-Terrorists-105188824.html>>

74 "Spanish hostages freed by al-Qaida arrive in Spain." Associated Press, August 23, 2010, <http://seattletimes.nwsourc.com/html/nationworld/2012699123_apafmalispanishhostages.html>.

75 Pham, J. Peter. "When Crime Does Pay: The Threat of an Emboldened al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb." World Defense Review, 23 September, 2010, <<http://worlddefensereview.com/pham092310.shtml>>.

76 Pham, J. Peter. "Not Another Failed States: Toward a Realistic Solution in the Western Sahara." The Journal of the Middle East and Africa 1 (2010): 1-24.

77 "Three Qaeda hostages seized last week alive: mediator." Agence France Presse, October 30, 2011,
<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5gfsKPTlgBS_IQzBQK_R-Fdj_-z0A?docId=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4c3f07.531>.

78 Soudan, François. "Mali: Polisario Connection." Jeune Afrique, October 28, 2012,
<<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Article/JA2703p010-013.xml0/>>.

« Incident Summary. » Global Terrorism Database, December 30, 2009,
<<http://www.start.umd.edu/gtd/search/IncidentSummary.aspx?gtdid=200912300005>>.

79 "Three Qaeda hostages seized last week alive: mediator." Agence France Presse, October 30, 2011,
<http://www.google.com/hostednews/afp/article/ALeqM5gfsKPTlgBS_IQzBQK_R-Fdj_-z0A?docId=CNG.fb5674e8c48dbb7ef3f59c256d4c3f07.531>.

80 Soudan, François. "Mali: Polisario Connection." Jeune Afrique, October 28, 2012,
<<http://www.jeuneafrique.com/Article/JA2703p010-013.xml0/>>.

"Al-Qaeda 'behind' Mauritania raid." BBC, June 6, 2005, <<http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/africa/4613107.stm>>.

November 10, 2010

Algeria reports "Cocaine that comes from Brazil, Peru, and Colombia supports the nucleus of al-Qaeda in the region" - Algerian head of the National Office for Combating Drugs & Addiction, Abdelmalek Sayeh.72

October 18, 2010

Drug ring linked to AQIM is dismantled in Morocco. VOA cites experts, evidence from Mauritania, Mali indicating AQIM has worked in the last two years "to recruit Sahrawis who are trained fighters to carry out their operations."73

August 23, 2010

AQIM frees three Spanish kidnapping victims after Mauritania agrees to release the perpetrator, Omar Sahraoui, who is "believed to have been a senior commander of the Polisario Front in Western Sahara."74

July 2010

Mauritania sentences reported Polisario veteran, Omar al Sahraoui, to 12 years for the 2009 kidnapping of Spanish aid workers. Mauritanian court papers document that he was paid by AQIM along with at least three other Polisario veterans to organize and carry out the crime.75

April 12, 2010

Security expert calls the Western Sahara conflict a "vicious cycle" that terrorists can exploit; cites "evidence that members of the military arm of the Polisario Front have been involved in illicit activities."76

February 2010

Polisario veteran Omar le Sahraoui arrested in Mali, extradited to Mauritania for kidnapping Spanish aid workers.77

December 30, 2009

Armed assailants from AQIM katibat Tarek Ibn Zaid attacked Telemeses, Niger, killing one civilian and three soldiers. The Tarek Ibn Zaid katibat is largely comprised of Sahrawis.78

November 29, 2009

AQIM claims responsibility for kidnapping three Spanish aid workers in Mauritania. Mauritanian security services later discover that AQIM had hired Omar al Sahraoui-who was reportedly a member of the Polisario's hierarchy-and at least three other Polisario veterans to organize and carry out the abductions.79

June 4, 2005

Two GSPC katibas, including the katiba Tarek Ibn Ziad, comprised primarily of Sahrawis, attack an army base in Lemgheity, Mauritania, killed 15 Mauritanian soldiers and injuring 17.80

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.

President and CEO

The Gabriel Company, LLC

1220 L Street NW, Suite 411

Washington DC, 20005

Phone: +1 202.887.1113

Fax: +1 202.887.1115

Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com <mailto:ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>

Website: <http://thegabrielco.com> <<http://thegabrielco.com/>>

CONTACT:

Garth Neuffer

202.470.2055

gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com <<mailto:gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com>>

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: Tuesday, October 29, 2013

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, November 04, 2013 2:39 PM
To: Garth Neuffer
Cc: Aziz El Harchi; David Bloom; Edward Gabriel; fatima.kurtz@thegabrielco.com; gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com; Jean Abinader; Jordana Merran; jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com; kkouttab@moroccanamericancenter.com; Leila Alaoui; Robert Holley
Subject: FW: Fall 2013 Issue of The Ambassadors REVIEW

FYI. See below

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Stephanie Harley [<mailto:ipa@americanambassadors.org>]
Sent: Monday, November 04, 2013 9:33 AM
To: ipa@americanambassadors.org
Subject: Fall 2013 Issue of The Ambassadors REVIEW

Dear Ambassador,

We are pleased to announce that the Fall 2013 issue of The Ambassadors REVIEW will be released on November 12, 2013. All members will receive their copies in the mail.

Also, please note that all articles from the journal will be posted on the Council's website following the Council's Fall conference.

Articles in the Fall issue deal with a variety of timely subjects, including:

India: Ambassador Timothy J. Roemer discusses the strategic relationship between the United States and India.

Syria: Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel argues that the United States has a strategic and humanitarian interest in Syria.

Mexico: Ambassador Antonio O. Garza, Jr. discusses Mexico's growing energy sector.

Africa: Ambassador David Bruce Wharton reflects on Zimbabwe's failed presidential elections. Ambassador Princeton N. Lyman discusses developments in South Sudan.

EU-US Trade: His Excellency João Vale de Almeida, Head of the Delegation of the European Union to the United States, discusses current Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership negotiations between the United States and the European Union.

National Security: Acting Under Secretary of State Rose Gottemoeller explains how the State Department contributes to national security through the work of the "T Family" Bureaus.

The complete table of contents from the Fall 2013 issue follows.

Best regards,
Stephanie

The Ambassadors REVIEW
Fall 2013
Table of Contents

The United States and India: A Vital Strategic Partnership by Ambassador Timothy J. Roemer

The United States Has a Strategic and Humanitarian Interest in Syria by Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel

Zimbabwe's 2013 Elections: Opportunity Lost by Ambassador David Bruce Wharton

The United States and South Sudan: A Relationship Under Pressure by Ambassador Princeton N. Lyman

EU-US Trade Deal to Strengthen the Transatlantic Relationship by Ambassador João Vale de Almeida

Latvia: Out of the Crisis, Coming into its Own by Ambassador Mark A. Pekala

Council of American Ambassadors' 30th Anniversary: Honoring our Founders' Legacy by Ambassador Abelardo L. Valdez

National Security and the State Department "T Bureaus" by Acting Under Secretary of State Rose Gottemoeller

Creating Change in a Changing World: Building a DARPA for Democracy by Senior Advisor to the Secretary of State Tomica
Tillemann

Mexico's Push for a New Energy Era: Will the Border Be Ready? by Ambassador Antonio O. Garza, Jr.

The United States and the Caribbean Community: Building on Forty Years of Partnership by Ambassador D. Brent Hardt

The Liberation of Rome, 1944: Did Hitler Know? by Ambassador Thomas Patrick Melady

Stephanie Harley
International Program Associate
Council of American Ambassadors
888 17th Street, NW
Suite 306
Washington, DC 20006-3312
Phone: 202.296.3757
Fax: 202.296.0926
Email: ipa@americanambassadors.org

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, November 18, 2013 2:25 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: 9 US Former Ambassadors to Morocco sign letter to the President: Letter PDF
Attachments: Frmr_Amb_Ltr_111813.pdf

Attached is a letter to President Obama from all 9 living US Ambassadors to Morocco, delivered electronically directly to the Chief of Staff to President Obama, the Deputy National Security Adviser, and Assistant Secretary for the NEA. Please make sure we get maximum press coverage. Thanks Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Kristen Kouttab [<mailto:kkouttab@moroccanamericancenter.com>]
Sent: Monday, November 18, 2013 2:05 PM
To: Edward Gabriel; meussery@earthlink.net
Cc: Jordan Paul
Subject: RE: Former Ambassadors Letter PDF

Ambassador Beth Jones – assistant is Sandy Grigola, grigolast2@state.gov

Attaching the PDF again. Use this version.

Thank you!

From: Edward Gabriel [<mailto:ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>]
Sent: Monday, November 18, 2013 2:02 PM
To: meussery@earthlink.net; Kristen Kouttab
Cc: Jordan Paul
Subject: RE: Former Ambassadors Letter PDF

Yes, Mike should email PDFs to the following three addresses. Mike do not pass these contacts on please:

McDonough, Denis: Denis_R_McDonough@who.eop.gov

Tony Blinken: Blinken, Anthony: Antony_J_Blinken@who.eop.gov

Plus the assistant to the A/S for NEA. Kristen will supply that one. Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com

Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Mike Ussery [<mailto:meussery@earthlink.net>]
Sent: Monday, November 18, 2013 12:52 PM
To: Kristen Kouttab; Edward Gabriel
Cc: Jordan Paul
Subject: Re: Former Ambassadors Letter PDF

Not in that WH.....No messengers work with copies for NSC etc.?

----- Original Message -----

From: Kristen Kouttab
To: Michael Ussery ; Edward Gabriel
Cc: Jordan Paul
Sent: Monday, November 18, 2013 12:13 PM
Subject: RE: Former Ambassadors Letter PDF

With edits.

I called the WH. They say that they no longer have a fax machine and that we should send it by regular mail. Do either of you have a personal contact inside the WH that could handle this for us?

From: Michael Ussery [<mailto:meussery@earthlink.net>]
Sent: Monday, November 18, 2013 11:46 AM
To: Kristen Kouttab; Edward Gabriel
Subject: Re: Former Ambassadors Letter PDF

I am not a good proof-reader and someone else with fresh eyes should do that, but looks good to me if the date, address heading and Dear Mr. President are spaced right. Mike

----- Original Message -----

From: Kristen Kouttab
To: Edward Gabriel ; [Ambassador Michael Ussery \(meussery@earthlink.net\)](mailto:Ambassador Michael Ussery (meussery@earthlink.net))
Sent: Monday, November 18, 2013 11:35 AM
Subject: Former Ambassadors Letter PDF

Please see the attached PDF and let me know if there's anything further that needs to be done.

Thank you.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

FORMER US AMBASSADORS TO MOROCCO

November 18, 2013

The Honorable Barack Obama
President of the United States
The White House
1600 Pennsylvania Ave, NW
Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Mr. President:

As former US Ambassadors to Morocco who have served over the past 32 years, appointed by five Presidents, we want to express our support and encouragement for your invitation to His Majesty, King Mohammed VI of Morocco, to come to Washington for an official meeting on November 22nd. We hope that this meeting will strengthen our strategic partnership with a country in the MENA region that genuinely shares our values and vision for the region's future.

For too long, Morocco has often been overlooked by US policy makers because it is not a "problem country." There have been missed opportunities to help Morocco as a country in finding solutions for the region. We urge you to seize this opportunity, especially in these times of tumult and instability in the Middle East, North Africa, and the Sahel.

Morocco has been steadfast in its alliance with the US, and now is the time to support Morocco's efforts to achieve our shared goals for the region. Despite instability in the region, King Mohammed VI has demonstrated a continuing commitment to guiding the country in the meaningful growth of democratic practice and the rule of law. Morocco weathered the chaos of the Arab Spring by further advancing its own reforms and making significant progress on human rights.

Morocco continues to hold firm on its own reformist path, and needs US political and resource assistance to consolidate its own reformist agenda and contribute to stabilizing the threatening situations in North Africa. That help should begin with US efforts to support Morocco's common sense and legitimate effort to resolve the problem in Western Sahara by granting the territory broad autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty. It is time for the US to make clear in the UN Security Council and elsewhere that this is the only realistic way to resolve this issue so that the international community can move on to more urgently needed solutions to the more pressing problems in the region. It is also a crucial time for the US to assist Morocco with the implementation of its ambitious regionalization plan, which devolves substantial political power to democratically elected local officials and implements programs that will make it a model for others in the region.

It was 50 years ago that His Majesty's father, King Hassan II, visited President Kennedy and stated, "My people are hopeful, also, that this visit will prove to be a means for further understanding and closer relations between them and the people of the United States. And that it may usher in a new era of stronger ties, in the field of true and honest and unselfish cooperation in their mutual interests, as well as in the interest of the cause of freedom, peace, and human dignity throughout the world."

These words ring so true today and echo the words of George Washington, in a December 1, 1789 letter to King Mohammed VI's ancestor, Sultan Mohammed III, when he wrote to the King, "We flatter ourselves that one day we will be useful to our friends."

The moment is right for you, Mr. President, to clearly declare the importance of the strategic relationship with Morocco and to partner with it on its path towards economic, democratic, political, and human rights reforms.

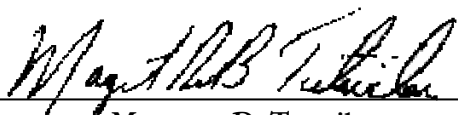

Sincerely,

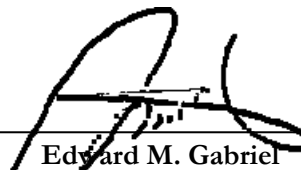

Samuel L. Kaplan
Former United States Ambassador to Morocco

Thomas Riley
Former United States Ambassador to Morocco

Margaret D. Tutwiler
Former United States Ambassador to Morocco

Edward M. Gabriel
Former United States Ambassador to Morocco

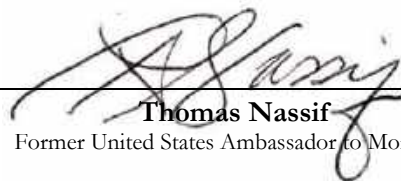

Marc Ginsburg
Former United States Ambassador to Morocco

Frederick Vreeland
Former United States Ambassador to Morocco

Michael Ussery
Former United States Ambassador to Morocco

Thomas Nassif
Former United States Ambassador to Morocco

Joseph Verner Reed, Jr.
Former United States Ambassador to Morocco

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, November 18, 2013 2:30 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Good news: The Atlantic Council event is full; all new acceptances are being put on a waiting list

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, December 03, 2013 5:44 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algeria situation report

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT #130

November 29, 2013

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- Following the FLN's endorsement of Bouteflika as its champion in next spring's presidential election, it seems that the usual machinery is being set in motion to promote the election of Bouteflika as the regime's candidate.
- Bouteflika's schedule remains limited to occasional photo opportunities with members of the government and a very few visiting foreign dignitaries.
- There are signs that PM Sellal and FLN leader Amar Saïdani may be engaged in a thinly disguised battle for the position of vice-presidential candidate.
- Press reports that the DRS has been instructed to cease surveillance of political parties are likely to prove incorrect.

Foreign Relations

- A large part of Algeria's military might remains oriented towards a perceived "Moroccan threat", limiting the forces that are available for deployment to the far more troubled eastern and southern borders.
- Foreign Minister Lamamra has begun to speak of the "liberation" of northern Mali by French forces, reflecting Algiers' tacit, tactical alliance with France against jihadist groups in the Sahara.
- Nonetheless, fear and suspicion of the activities of "imperialist" powers on Algeria's borders still run deep within the Algerian establishment, as evidenced by remarks made in private by Algerian officers to the leader of Tunisia's ruling party concerning US drones operating along the Algerian-Tunisian border.

Security

- Judging by accounts in the Algerian media, political violence may have reached a historic low in November, although a news blackout may still be in effect in certain areas such as the Tunisian border.
- There have been a number of incidents along the eastern and southern borders. Some – including the alleged arrest of an AQMI liaison officer with armed groups in Tunisia's Djebel Chaambi – seem to offer confirmation that the Algerian security forces now operate beyond the country's borders.
- Mokhtar Belmokhtar's right-hand man has reportedly been killed by French forces in northern Mali, and there have been unconfirmed reports that his organisation is grooming suicide bombers for operations in Algeria and Tunisia.
- A propaganda video released by AQMI's Saharan units at the end of October shows for the first time one of its fighters wielding a SA-7 MANPADS.
- There is circumstantial evidence to suggest that while Belmokhtar's Al-Mourabitoun is gravitating to the east (Niger, Mali and perhaps Libya), AQMI's Saharan units may be gravitating to the west (Mauritania).

Political Trends

When President Bouteflika told his government ministers, assembled at the end of September for the first Council of Ministers meeting in nine months, to take "all necessary measures and steps to enable our country to move towards the forthcoming elections in the best possible conditions", he effectively put an end to speculation that the constitution might be rewritten specially to extend the President's term of office and so spare him the burden of having to run for re-election next spring. Since then, FLN General Secretary Amar Saïdani has thrown himself enthusiastically into the role of cheerleader for Bouteflika's fourth successive term. Having, as noted in our last report, proclaimed his own belief in the President in a succession of party meetings and interviews in October, in November he moved things up a notch, convening first a meeting of the party's mouhafedhs (provincial leaders) to adopt a motion of support for a fourth term for Bouteflika and then, on Nov. 11, a meeting of the FLN's parliamentary caucus, which unanimously declared its support for Bouteflika's expected candidacy. Four days later the party's central committee gathered (minus 50 or so dissidents) and unanimously approved a resolution adopting Bouteflika as the FLN's candidate in the upcoming presidential election (upon which the assembled delegates rose for what El Watan described as a "timid standing ovation" - a symptom perhaps of the awkwardness of the situation).

With other endorsements during the month from the RND's General Secretary Abdelkader Bensalah and its politburo, Abdelmadjid Sidi-Saïd of the UGTA^[1] and the Coordinating Committee of Children of Independence War Martyrs (CNEC) – which went one step further, passing a resolution imploring Bouteflika to stand for re-election for a fourth term "or as President for life" – it would seem that the usual machinery is being set in motion for the re-election of Bouteflika as the regime's candidate.

Bouteflika's own level of activity, however, remains extremely modest. Absent from the official ceremonies marking the anniversary of the beginning of Algeria's independence war on Nov. 1, the President was nonetheless pictured by official news agency APS receiving formal greetings for the occasion from the most senior government ministers and the speakers of both houses of parliament. There have been a handful of other photo opportunities throughout the month – the President with his young nephews, the President receiving veteran Algerian diplomat and UN envoy for Syria Lakhdar Brahimi, audiences with the leader of Tunisia's ruling Ennahda party Rached Ghannouchi and, towards the end of the month, the Socialist mayor of Paris Bertrand Delanoë – but there have been no further meetings of the Council of Ministers or other official engagements, and the Algerian public has still not heard the President's voice.

It is expected that the long-awaited constitutional amendments, when finally unveiled, will include the creation of a position of Vice President, who in addition to standing ready to take over the Presidency in case of the President's death or incapacitation might be called upon to carry out many of the day-to-day tasks of the President should Bouteflika's condition fail to improve enough for him to resume a full schedule. Furthermore, the creation of a vice-presidential slot before the 2014 poll would allow Bouteflika to designate a running mate who, as well as being his chosen successor, would be able to take care of most of the actual election campaigning. Consequently there are some signs of a tussle for the vice-presidential nomination. Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal, who had seemed like a strong contender, has over the past few weeks been subject to a campaign of denigration (centring notably on his poor mastery of classical Arabic) and of heckling and harassment during his visits to the provinces, and it is suspected that the FLN may be behind this, perhaps in order to boost Saïdani's chances. Saïdani himself has been openly disparaging of Sellal's political skills, dismissively suggesting that the Prime Minister should concentrate on the technicalities of running the administration rather than getting involved in political campaigning to which he is not suited. Saïdani, for his part, has been attacked in the media for speaking out of turn – and even for "attacking state institutions" – in his interview to Reuters in October, in which he predicted that the constitutional amendments would redefine the roles of the DRS and the army in such a way that the security and intelligence service "will no longer get involved in politics, including in the political parties, media and justice."

Intriguingly, reports have now begun to appear in the Algerian media^[2] claiming that the Ministry of Defence – of which, as Saïdani pointed out in his Reuters interview, the DRS is formally a department – has instructed the DRS to cease all "investigations into political parties, surveillance of rallies and public meetings and surveillance of members of the Movement for the Autonomy of Kabylia", handing these tasks over to the Renseignements Généraux (intelligence branch) of the police force. A source with many years experience of the operations of the DRS and the Algerian state generally argues, however, that such reports should be treated with the utmost scepticism – even suggesting that they might be a "smoke screen" deliberately generated by the DRS itself.

Foreign Relations

In an interesting, yet largely unnoticed, semantic shift, Algerian Foreign Minister Ramtane Lamamra referred to the "liberation of northern Mali, which had been dominated by terrorist groups" in a speech in the Mauritanian capital Nouakchott on October 24. This is a far more positive characterisation of the French military intervention in Mali – the very idea of which Algiers had opposed until it became a fait accompli – than had previously been heard from any Algerian official. But while Lamamra may have been the first to voice it so clearly, a substantive change of policy does indeed seem to have taken place. As report by a French parliamentary delegation that visited Algeria in May of this year notes:

Algeria used to refuse categorically to accept that any foreign power – especially Western – might intervene on its southern flank. This concerned France in particular, both because of the weight of history and because of its supposed “hidden agenda”.

[However, the Algerian authorities were swift to] adapt to the new situation created by Operation Serval [granting permission for overflight by French aircraft]. They also contributed by supplying fuel to our troops and this assistance was really very valuable when our soldiers were fighting under difficult conditions near the Algerian-Malian border.

[This] quite remarkable opening towards our country, in the form of facilitating military operations against terrorist movements in Mali [would have been] unimaginable just a few weeks previously, and was probably made possible by the warming of relations between France and Algeria. [...] There are now good chances for bilateral military cooperation to get under way, and the Franco-Algerian agreement in this field, which came into force in February, if implemented with resolve, opens up promising perspectives in this important sector.

At the same time, however, the French parliamentary delegation found it “striking that the Algerian military machine, by far the largest in the region, was entirely oriented towards the Moroccan ‘threat’ and not towards the southern border”. This strategic preoccupation with Morocco – confirmed to us independently by a source close to the DRS, according to whom Algeria’s military and political leadership have thus far shied away from shifting forces away from the western borders for fear that the Moroccans might “take advantage” of their weakened vigilance – puts a serious drain on the manpower and resources of the Algerian military machine and is a potentially serious handicap as it struggles to confront the new challenges thrown up by turmoil not only in Mali but also in Tunisia and Libya.

The French parliamentarians also pick out another self-imposed weakness in Algeria’s ability to confront the challenges of its environment:

There is no doubt that Algeria is a regional power. [...] This power, however, has no direct diplomatic expression because, in foreign policy, Algeria remains true to its founding principles dating back to the moment of its independence [including a refusal to intervene in other countries]. The defence of the founding principles of independent Algeria remains a reality today and seems to be preventing the country from developing an active and enterprising diplomacy.

This may now be changing, however, as Algeria is progressively sucked into the complex situations in Libya and Tunisia. As we have suggested in earlier reports, the ban on over-the-border military operations seems to have been ended (see also below – Security), and as it gets more and more deeply involved in combatting jihadists on the Algerian-Tunisian border, Algiers seems to be becoming increasingly involved in Tunisian politics, too. Having already travelled to Algiers for consultations with President Bouteflika and other officials in September, Rached Ghannouchi of Tunisia’s ruling Ennahda Movement and opposition leader Béji Caïd Essebsi were back in the Algerian capital for further conversations with Bouteflika et al in mid-November, as the Tunisian “national dialogue” process floundered.^[3]

Officially, little if anything of what was discussed with the Tunisian politicians has been made public. Speaking to us after Ghannouchi’s return, however, a member of Ennahda’s Shoura Council (central committee) shed some interesting light on the exchanges, and in particular on the concerns of the Algerians:

Rached Ghannouchi went to Algeria to attend the congress of the Algerian Ennahda Party.^[4] While he was there he asked to meet Algerian officials, who were also keen to meet him. The Algerians, including President Bouteflika and Prime Minister Sellal, told him that Algeria supports Tunisia’s democratic process and national dialogue. During his visit, Sheikh Rached Ghannouchi also met – at his request – with Algerian officers in charge of security on the border between the two countries, in order to reassure them that Tunisia intends to cooperate fully with them in the fight against terrorism. A number of Algerian officers told him firmly that Tunisia would be well advised to avoid calling on any foreign power to assist it in settling its internal problems, including the fight against terrorism. Tunisia, they told him, should limit itself to respecting international conventions. We in Ennahda’s leadership understood this to mean that the Algerians are not happy to see drones controlled by foreigners operating from Tunisian soil just a few kilometres from their borders.

This is clearly an allusion to the UAVs recently loaned to Tunisia by the United States for use in counter-terrorism operations, which operate out of a small airport, formerly mainly used by oil companies, at El Borma in southern Tunisia, close to the border with Algeria. Notwithstanding Algiers’ tacit, tactical alliance with France in northern Mali, it would seem that there are still powerful elements within the Algerian state apparatus who remain very wary indeed of any encroachment by ‘imperialist’ powers on the country’s borders.

Security

Jihadist activity in Algeria, as reported in open sources, fell to what may be the lowest levels ever this past month: only nine armed engagements or other incidents of violence were recorded up to November 26, only two of which were at the initiative of AQMI or other jihadist/armed groups. Even the troubled border areas appeared to be calmer, with perhaps as few as five violent incidents in November (down from nine in October). This ostensibly sharp fall could be a reflection of the cyclical nature of AQMI activity, especially with the onset of winter in northern Algeria, but it may also reflect restrictions on reporting, in particular in the border areas – it is of note, for example, that not a single incident was reported on the border with Tunisia in the Algerian media throughout the month.^[5]

ALGIERS and its environs remained quiet, and just two confirmed violent incidents were recorded in AQMI's heartland in KABYLIA. There were no reports in the Algerian media of jihadist activity in the OIL & GAS PRODUCING AREAS.^[6] A number of revealing incidents were reported along the country's southern and south-eastern borders, however.

Close to the SOUTH-EASTERN BORDER with Libya, the security forces arrested a national of Niger carrying two machine guns and several rounds of ammunition in early November near In Amenas (wilaya of Illizi). Under interrogation he said he had bought the weapons in Ghadames, Libya, for 600 Libyan dinars^[7] a piece and was carrying them to Mali. Similarly, the security forces arrested a Malian national trying to cross into Algeria on foot near Debdeb (just to the north of In Amenas) on November 15; he was also reportedly found to be carrying two machine guns. On November 11, again near Debdeb, the security forces foiled an attempt by an armed group to attack a fuel tanker: the truck had crossed into Algeria from Ghadames and was heading for Stah, in the wilaya of Tébessa, when it was attacked by a "heavily armed group of masked men"; the Algerian army intervened, killing five of the attackers and arresting a sixth, who was seriously wounded. Algerian daily Wakt el-Djazair (13/11) reported that the armed men are believed to be "Tuaregs from Sebha, Libya".^[8]

A potentially far more significant incident is reported to have occurred on Nov. 15, when Algerian Special Forces apprehended a Libyan jihadist by the name of Riyad El Toufi "on the road between the Libyan town of Daraj and the village of Tin Alkoum, near Djanet" in the far south of the wilaya of Illizi,^[9] according to Algerian Arabic-language dailies Wakt Al-Djazair and Al-Mihwar, quoting "high-level security sources". If confirmed, their partial account of Riyad El Toufi's career provides some novel insights into interrelations between the various jihadist groups operating in northern Mali, Niger, southern Libya and western Tunisia. El Toufi, who is said to have broken away from MUJAO at the end of last year to join AQMI, is purported to be one of the founding members of the Katiba Oqba Ibn Nafi, the AQMI-linked jihadist group that has been fighting the Tunisian security forces in the Djebel Chaambi region close to the Algerian border since late 2012. El Toufi, it is claimed, had been tasked by AQMI's southern commander Djamel Okacha, a.k.a. Yahia Abou El Hammam, with recruiting other jihadists who had broken away from MUJAO, Ansar Dine, Mokhtar Belmokhtar's group or other islamist outfits in the Sahara to fight in the ranks of Katiba Oqba Ibn Nafi, and is suspected of taking some 21 fighters to Djebel Chaambi in August. According to Al-Mihwar, El Toufi has survived at least three attempts on his life – at least one of them in Ghat, Libya – since Belmokhtar ordered one of his men to eliminate him.

There have also been a number of incidents along the SOUTHERN BORDER with Mali.^[10] On November 9 security forces, reportedly acting on a tip-off, ambushed and arrested two jihadists in Bordj Baji Mokhtar, wilaya of Adrar, and a little over a week later an operation was launched to search for weapons caches in the environs; several were found according to Algerian daily El-Watan (23/11). Further to the south-east, security forces found an abandoned offroader loaded with weapons near Tin Zaouatine, wilaya of Tamanrasset, at the beginning of November. It is believed the smugglers had abandoned the vehicle and fled when they realised they were being tracked by the security forces. On November 10-11 not far from Tin Zaouatine, security forces backed up by helicopters intercepted and arrested three jihadists, none of them of Algerian nationality, wounding one seriously. The incident took place to the north of Timiaouine, wilaya of Adrar, just across the border from the northern Malian town of Tessalit.

There have also been reports (El-Khabar 29/10) that an Algerian army unit "intercepted a group of armed jihadists that had approached the Algeria-Mali border" on October 27. The jihadists, in a convoy of ten offroaders, had attacked a camp of the MNLA in northern Mali, 20 km south of the Algerian border; in the "heavy fighting" that ensued, several MNLA fighters were wounded, who were transported to Algeria for treatment. Some hours later the jihadist group "approached the Algerian border where it was intercepted by an army unit manning an advanced position not far from Timiaouine"; the clash left two jihadists dead and others wounded. This appears to be a clear admission that Algerian troops cross into Malian territory to confront the jihadists, and would therefore seem to confirm press reports in September to the effect that the Algerian army is now authorised to hunt down jihadists beyond the country's borders, in a breach with Algeria's official doctrine since independence.^[11]

Meanwhile, AQMI's Sahara units have released a recruitment video entitled "France and the Hunt for the Mirage", appealing to the "Muslim youth" of the world to "join the jihad against France in northern Mali". Posted to YouTube on October 29, the half-hour film is the first video produced by the "new Sahara branch" of Al-Andalus Organisation, AQMI's propaganda arm, and is also remarkable in a number of ways:

- In one short, three-second scene, a fighter identified as Abou Layth Al-Maghribi (i.e. 'the Moroccan') is pictured carrying what appears to be a Strela-2 manpads (also known as the SA-7, a Russian made surface-air missile believed to have been stockpiled in large quantities by the Qaddafi regime in Libya), which he calls his "gift" to the French. This seems to be the first confirmation by AQMI that it has such weapons in its possession^[12] (although elsewhere in the same video other fighters brag about how they "confront French helicopters armed with nothing but machine guns").
- Sophisticated as some of the group's weaponry may be, the video itself is distinctly amateurish, especially compared with the slick propaganda film Mokhtar Belmokhtar's group released in September. Whereas the latter was very professionally put together and showed a group of well-organised men undertaking serious preparations for major operations, the AQMI video is mainly made up of footage, which appears largely to have been shot on mobile telephone cameras, of rank-and-file jihadists larking around in the desert, with no mention of any specific operations. AQMI's southern emir, Yahia Abou El Hammam, appears fleetingly in one sequence, but does not speak.
- In designating the organisation's enemies, the video focuses exclusively on France. The call to attack France, French interests and French nationals, including civilians, whenever and wherever the opportunity arises, is driven home by several of the fighters who speak to the camera, with Franco-Algerian "lone wolf" Mohamed Merah^[13] held up as an example by one. Consulates and schools are explicitly mentioned as possible targets. In this sense, the video is at variants with recent statements by Al-Qaeda's international leader Ayman Zawahiri, on which we commented in earlier reports, calling on his followers not to kill non-combatants and generally to eschew the ultra-violence and sectarianism that have come to be associated with the Al-Qaeda label. While greetings are sent to Zawahiri at the end of the video, fighters also invoke the memory of "our sheikh, emir and leader Abu Musaab al-Zarqawi", the Jordanian-born founder of Al-Qaeda in Iraq who championed the most brutal forms of urban terrorism.^[14]

Finally it is worth noting that only one of the fighters who appear in the video is Algerian, and only two of them Malian. By contrast, there are no fewer than five Moroccans and three Mauritians (plus a sprinkling of Tunisians, Egyptians and Sudanese). The three Mauritians explicitly recommend launching attacks on French nationals and/or interests in Mauritania, specifically in Nouakchott and in the towns of Kaedi and Seilibaby. This seems to suggest that under pressure from the French-led military campaign in northern Mali, the Saharan branch of AQMI, may be gravitating towards the west, and in particular Mauritania (its reported connections to the jihadist group fighting in Tunisia's Djebel Chaambi notwithstanding), while Belmokhtar's Al-Mourabitoun gravitates broadly speaking towards the east.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.

President and CEO

The Gabriel Company, LLC

1220 L Street NW, Suite 411

Washington DC, 20005

Phone: +1 202.887.1113

Fax: +1 202.887.1115

Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com

Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

^[11] The main trade union federation, which was de facto a wing of the FLN under the single-party regime.

- [2] Arabic-language daily Al-Hadath (24/11), subsequently picked up by Franco-Algerian news portal TSA.
- [3] Prompting no little grumbling in the Tunisian media, which, noting that Ghannouchi seems always to pay a visit to the US Ambassador in Tunis before his trips to Algiers, has expressed indignation that a solution to Tunisia's domestic political crisis seems to be being cooked up abroad.
- [4] A small, moderate Islamist opposition party which, although similarly named, has no organic links to Tunisia's Ennahda Movement.
- [5] On the other hand, Tunisian Arabic-language daily Al-Sarih (28/11) claimed to have been told by "Algerian security sources" that the Algerian security forces had recently arrested two members of Mokhtar Belmokhtar's Al-Mourabitoun near the southern part of the border with Tunisia. The two men are said to have told their interrogators that the organisation was preparing some 13 volunteers for suicide operations in Tunisia and Algeria.
- [6] The security forces are however reported to have arrested two jihadists on November 17 as they drove into the town of Djemaa (wilaya of El-Oued) which lies north of Touggourt (wilaya of Ouargla) on the road to Hassi Messaoud.
- [7] Approximately $475.
- [8] Which suggests that this might have been a case of apolitical banditry rather than an attack by committed jihadists, although the distinction is sometimes a fine one.
- [9] The localisation of the arrest is somewhat ambiguous. Although Al-Mihwar and Wakt el-Djazair's headlines place it "in Illizi", their articles merely state that it took place "on the road between Daraj and Tin Alkoum". Tin Alkoum actually lies right on the border with Libya (it is the southernmost of the three official border crossings with Libya), while Daraj (also rendered Derej or Dirj) is an oasis town east of Ghadames, several hundred kilometres to the north; the road between them, which passes through the Libyan city of Ghat before reaching Tin Alkoum, runs very close to the border with Algeria for most of its length. This very vague indication, together with Al-Mihwar's claim that the operation was carried out by "elements of the Special Forces supported by two army brigades and in coordination with units of the Border Guards from the Gendarmerie's 4th Military Region command in Ouargla", seems to suggest that El-Toufi may have been snatched in a cross-border raid by Algerian forces.
- [10] In addition to the incidents involving the Algerian security forces, it is also worth noting an operation by French special forces in the Malian desert around 200 km west of Tessalit on Nov. 14, in which several jihadists were killed, among them Hassan Ould Khalil, a.k.a. Jouleibib, reportedly the second-in-command of Mokhtar Belmokhtar's group. A Mauritanian national, Ould Khalil had been the group's de facto spokesman and reportedly took part in the planning of the attack on the Tiguentourine gas plant in January and a French-run uranium mine at Arlit, Niger, in May. Algerian daily El Watan claims that the French had been able to track down Ould Khalil thanks to information they had extracted from four other members of Al-Mourabitoun (Belmokhtar's new organisation) captured by the Tuareg separatist MNLA and handed over to the French military.
- [11] This remains a highly sensitive issue, however. An incident on which we commented in our last report, in which the Algerian armed forces are alleged to have discovered a huge weapons cache "200 km from In Amenas" on Oct. 24, was recast by French news magazine Le Nouvel Observateur (06/11) as a cross-border raid by Algerian forces against a jihadist camp inside Libyan territory. According to the French newspaper: "On October 24, hundreds of soldiers from the Algerian army's special forces units, backed up by jet fighters, helicopters and tanks, led a raid on a jihadist base in Libya, 200 km south of the gas site at In Amenas. [...] Over the previous two months, information gathered by the Algerian intelligence services had pointed to a new attack in preparation against the [In Amenas] site. [...] True to its tradition of secrecy, the Algerian Defence Ministry would not say how many were killed from either side or if any jihadists were captured." This was angrily, if rather clumsily, denied by Algerian daily L'Expression (11/11), which quoted "very well-informed security sources" as suggesting that the Nouvel Observateur story was nothing but Moroccan-inspired disinformation. L'Expression's article goes on to reaffirm Algeria's traditional stance – namely that Algerian troops will not intervene in neighbouring countries "under any circumstances" – apparently oblivious of the fact that L'Expression itself was one of the sources that back in September first published reports about Algiers' change of stance on cross-border operations (although its source at the time insisted Algerian troops would intervene outside the country's borders "only if neighbouring countries request it").
- [12] Or at any rate the launch tube, for the footage does not show the missile itself and there is no explicit confirmation that AQMI possesses or has used such missiles.
- [13] In March 2012, Merah, a 23 year-old petty criminal who had drifted into radical Islamism, shot dead three French soldiers and seriously wounded another in a series of attacks in south-west France before attacking a Jewish school in Toulouse, killing a rabbi and three children.
- [14] Zarqawi, it is worth recalling, is said to have played an instrumental role in establishing ties between Algeria's Salafist Group for Preaching and Struggle (GSPC) and Al-Qaeda, leading ultimately to its transformation into AQMI.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, December 04, 2013 1:47 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: WS source report

According to a leading member of a Saharawi NGO in Tindouf, the Algerian authorities have banned Saharawis from transporting, selling, buying or otherwise procuring gaz and refined products anywhere beyond the perimeters of the Saharawi refugee camps. Algerian truckers have been assigned to deliver refined products (gasoline, kerosene etc.) to the camps. As of Nov.1, the Algerian authorities began confiscating refined products transported by Saharawi truckers outside the camps. No decision has been announced, however, and the Polisario/SADR authorities have not been formally notified. The Algerian local authorities in Tindouf have indicated that the measure has been taken as part of a broader crackdown on smuggling and black-marketeering.

A group of 12 common law prisoners are reported recently to have walked out of the Chahid Abderrahman prison (also known as Al-Dhahibiya), in the Tindouf camps, illegally but without any use of violence against the prison guards. Polisario's security forces failed to apprehend them and say that they have now left the Tindouf camps altogether for an unknown destination or destinations. According to a relative of a member of the Saharawi National Council (the SADR's pseudo-parliament), this "escape" was facilitated by accomplices within the administration, and that SADR Defence Minister Mohamed Lamine Bouhali is behind it. Bouhali, claims the source, runs an extortion racket whereby prisoners and their families are offered the alternative between "escaping" (in exchange for a payment in hard currency) or staying in prison even after completing their official sentence.

[Note: SADR Justice Minister Hamada Selma told Human Rights Watch in 2008 that Al-Dhahibiya prison had been closed around the beginning of 2007. In its December 2008 report Human Rights in Western Sahara and in the Tindouf Refugee Camps, HRW commented: "There are persistent allegations that the Polisario operates secret places of detention. With respect to the period we examined – 2006 to the present – no one we interviewed, including Sahrawis who had recently worked in the Polisario security forces before resettling in the Moroccan-controlled Western Sahara, claimed to have information about unacknowledged places of detention or of prisoners being held in secret."]

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, December 21, 2013 9:03 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Fall/Winter 2013 MAC Events Bulletin
Attachments: Fall 2013 Events Bulletin.docx

FYI: Below please find the Fall/Winter 2013 MAC Events Bulletin, including events from September, October, November, and December (it was a busy time –sorry for the delay!). Our team compiles a list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

Happy Holidays and Best Wishes for a happy and healthy New Year!

Caitlin Dearing Scott

Fall 2013 Events Bulletin

September 16

Egypt's Impact on Maghreb Political Dynamics

September 27

Roundtable on Morocco after the Arab Uprisings: Evolution rather than Revolution

October 1

Roundtable on the Cultural Heritage of Morocco

October 10

Why Moroccan Protests Failed

October 11

Morocco's New Geo-Economics

October 22

Morocco's Role in Regional Security and Development

October 25

Morocco's Strategic Engagement in Africa

November 6

Resolving Regional Conflicts: The Western Sahara and the Quest for a Durable Solution

November 20

Charting Morocco's Reform Strategy

November 21

Revolution and Political Transitions in North Africa

November 21

Advancing the New US-Morocco Strategic Partnership

December 5

A Strategy for American Engagement in the Middle East with Rep. Adam Smith

Egypt's Impact on Maghreb Political Dynamics

Date: September 16, 2013

1. Title: "Egypt's Impact on Maghreb Political Dynamics"

Hosted by CSIS Middle East Program

Participants:

Ellen Lust: Associate Professor of Political Science, Yale

William Lawrence: former Director, North Africa Project, International Crisis Group

Opening Remarks:

Jon Alterman: Director, CSIS Middle East Program

Moderator:

Haim Malka: Deputy Director and Senior Fellow, CSIS Middle East Program

2. Overview

As part of the Middle East program's coverage of the Arab Spring, this event brought together a political scientist, Lust, and a North Africa expert, Lawrence, to examine the question of how the people of North Africa interpret the events of the past year in Egypt. This question was the starting point for the examination of the national characters of the Maghreb countries and their people, including what they do and do not want in government and also their own identities.

3. Summary

Alterman was brief in his introductions, and set out the topic question very straightforwardly: how do people in North Africa interpret what is happening in Egypt?

Lust focused exclusively on Libya and Tunisia, and then laid out the argument that whether transition is seen optimistically or pessimistically depends on whether the observer has had positive or negative examples of consequences of change in the past. Her reasoning in using Libya and Tunisia was that the two countries are at the same point in their transitions, which have followed a process of initial euphoria, followed by political bickering, and now general frustration. The difference between the two countries is that while Tunisians are primarily divided in their opinions of the relationship between religion and the state, Libyans are divided by regionalism. Another difference is one of relative strength. In Libya, because no one group of actors has an overwhelming majority, they make up for this shortcoming through the use of arms. This, combined with a lack of institutional authority, leads to the inability of any one group to act unilaterally, as was the case in Egypt. In Tunisia, the Assembly has stayed in session, but has been unable to provide services for the people, leading radicals to fill gaps left by the state. In both countries, a key lesson from Egypt is for actors to stop and take stock of the situation and act deliberately, rather than pressing ahead recklessly, as the Egyptians did.

Lawrence prefaced his extensive remarks by pointing out that there is a disconnect between how Egyptians see Egypt and how the rest of MENA does. Egypt is generally seen through the filter of Islamism: if observers have negative feelings about Islamism, then they have a nuanced position; if positive, then they are more pro-Morsi. Lawrence also pointed out that analysts of the Arab Spring are often too focused on the revolutionary aspect, and not enough on its effect of attempting to overcome old dichotomies, such as religious/secular, socialist/capitalist, etc. Another frequent misinterpretation is that the most recent Egyptian revolution was primarily in opposition to Morsi, while it was in truth more economically motivated.

Lawrence argued that Tunisia is closest to Egypt, but that there are important differences between the former's Constitutional Democratic Rally and the latter's National Democratic Party. He also believes that the Tunisian constitutional experiment is potentially most threatened by events in Egypt. Like in Egypt, the ruling party, Ennahda, has aligned itself with Salafists. However, Tunisia still has the potential for the best outcome.

Lawrence discussed Algeria, but only briefly. He mentioned that in Algeria, any discussions of transition are filtered through past conflicts with Islamism. He estimated that Morocco is more similar to Egypt than Algeria, but not as similar as Tunisia. His evidence for this is twofold. Firstly, the PJD has experience ruling through coalition. Secondly, a powerful elite keep the economy under control, in Egypt the military, in Morocco the Makhzen. This arrangement is "keeping things on track in Morocco." The Makhzen used the PJD to survive the Arab Spring, and so Morocco has remained relatively stable. There are however rumors that reforms were enacted too quickly, and that perhaps too much was ceded to the people.

Finally, in Libya's case, the federalists and secularists are emboldened by events in Egypt. Libyans are highly secular, votes for Islamist parties are consistently low, and the salafists are out of the political arena, hence their use of arms. In summary, one thing most groups have in common is a desire to avoid what is happening in Egypt presently.

4. Q & A

Malka asked about the nature of centrist and reformist movements in the region. Lawrence responded that in Morocco cleavages tend to be generational, with al Adl wal Ihssane coming out to support the 20th February Movement, but not participate in it. As in the other Arab Spring countries, he sees this as an example of the youth believing that they can build a better future. Lust believes that while there is a public demand for centrist movements, political parties are increasingly polarizing, and thereby not making grassroots gains. Lawrence agreed and said that this is why there is a disconnect between the youth and organized parties.

Q: (David Mack, Middle East Institute) To what extent do Islamist and secular elites in the Maghreb look to Turkey in the past two decades or Egypt in the past 2 years?

A: (Lawrence) The Erdogan model is dying. The countries are looking for other models.
(Lust) Tunisia had been pro Erdogan, but less so now that he has become more authoritarian.

Q: (Zack Gold, Brookings Institution) To what extent are jihadi or salafist calls to be active in Egypt influencing North Africa?

A: (Lawrence) What do you mean by salafists? The scientific salafists are growing, but the political salafists are not making any gains, and then there are the jihadi salafists. There's also a blurring between what jihadi means in the US and what it means in North Africa. Our categories block us from understanding. They are useful only as ideal types. And jihadis are often jihadis more due to their personal lives than to politics; they have bad breakups with their girlfriends and then go fight in Syria.

Q: (Dan Sisnoi, Tel Aviv University) You mentioned how Nahda the party is involved in the transition. What about the voters?

A: (Lawrence) Well, like in Algeria in 1991, you vote for the group you fear less. There were young, idealistic supporters, beautiful young people who wanted to un-corrupt Tunisia. 1.5 million people voted for Nahda, 1/3 of the total votes. Some voted for them because they had family reasons, some because they thought it was the least corrupt party, but Nahda's popularity has decreased by half.

(Lust) Even in comparison to its supporters, to the general public, Nahda is more for a close relationship between religion and the state than the public. The public wanted to make sure the revolution succeeded, and thought that Nahda could stop any backsliding.

Q: (Ricky Goldstein, HRW) Can Tunisia have an impact on Egypt? Are there any lessons from Tunisia in 2011 that Egyptians could learn from?

A: (Lawrence) I wrote an article on lessons from Algeria that apply to Egypt. Now Egyptians are the last to admit that they want to learn, and they are not amenable at all to learning from Tunisia. Egyptians are proud that they had a revolution, but unhappy that they came in second. But there are lessons, constitutional debates, judicial and secular reform, and so on.

(Lust) I want to note that I believe the beginning of the Egyptian coup was in June, when Parliament was disbanded. But as for lessons from Tunisia, start with the Assembly, and don't rush reforms.

5. Observations

Around 50 people were in attendance, roughly 2/3 professionals and 1/3 students or interns. While there were disagreements on interpretation, the tone of the roundtable was cordial and informative. Lawrence in particular offered a noticeably unbiased account of events, supporting his statements with either polling data or repeating directly what he had heard from informants in the region. The event was light on Morocco-specific information, but as an analysis of the Maghreb not focused entirely on Egypt, the event covered many lesser-known and unexplored aspects of the Arab Spring.

\(Back to top\)

Roundtable on Morocco after the Arab Uprisings: Evolution rather than Revolution

Date: September 27, 2013

1. Title: "Roundtable on Morocco after the Arab Uprisings: Evolution rather than Revolution"

Hosted by the Fund for Peace

Participants:

Professor Ricardo René Larémont: Professor of Political Science, Binghamton State University of New York
J.J. Messner: Moderator: Senior Associate, the Fund for Peace

2. Overview

This event, the first in a series on the strategic value of Morocco-US relations in key sectors to include recommendations for US policy actions to support Morocco, began with a review of the draft paper on the topic presented by Professor Larémont and was then open to general discussion. The goal of the series is to encourage a number of topical papers in advance of the King's visit to build interest in the Morocco-US relationship and existing and potential benefits of greater bilateral cooperation.

3. Summary

As an academic and an analyst, Larémont is most comfortable in presenting a historical and comparative framework for viewing the transitions ongoing in the Arab world. When addressing this topic, he looked for common threads among countries in transition. He was quite complimentary of how King Mohammed VI, in his ability to understand the needs of the Moroccan people, responded so quickly to the initial demonstrations, continuing a process that he began early in his reign. The central core of his argument was that monarchies with religious legitimacy have more "symbolic capital" over time than republican regimes, which eventually lose support because they do not respond effectively to rising expectations.

In comparing Morocco and Spain, Larémont noted the importance of an alliance between a progressive monarch and liberal elites who support reforms. He believes that the US foreign policy is experiencing dissonance because of the push back from Iraq and Afghanistan, where good intentions did not make effective policy. Larémont also noted, based on youth surveys he has done in Morocco, that there is great confidence in the King among young people, but very low expectations when it comes to the results of reforms as a result of political parties.

4. Q & A

Haim Malka (CSIS), Karim Mezran (the Atlantic Council), Pauline Baker (Fund for Peace), Pilar Garcia Martinez (IMF), and others engaged in a discussion of why Morocco's path after the Arab uprisings is different than the rest of the MENA region. In addition to the King's role, they noted that opposition groups were quite different in Morocco than elsewhere in the region, which resulted in a reform agenda that was clearer and less confrontational than in other countries. Larémont added that there is more room for policy impact in places like Morocco, which could become a model for the rest of the region.

With regard to recommendations, participants discussed the need to promote investments across a broad range of sectors, and the need to expand education, especially for women. Reform of subsidies and banking reform was also mentioned along with creating a more proactive environment for start-ups and entrepreneurs. The group agreed that forging a better link between education and the labor market is a crucial next step to ensure continued progress in myriad areas.

Krista Hendry (Fund for Peace) added that an important factor for US involvement with reforms should be approaching Morocco on equal footing. She said that presenting a skill set, rather than offering recommendations, would go a long way towards better aid and program efficacy.

5. Observations

This event was attended by 22 foreign policy professionals. The paper was well-received and Fund for Peace will publish a final paper, without attribution, that has a strong section on recommendations for US actions in support of reform in Morocco.

Attendees:

Jean AbiNader: MAC
Dr. Pauline Baker: Board of Trustees, Fund for Peace
Lauren Berry: Kosmos Energy
David Bloom: MAC
Asibi Danjuma: Fund for Peace
Calvin Dark: BLJ Worldwide
Fred Enochs: TD International
Pilar Garcia Martinez: IMF
Krista Hendry: Fund for Peace
Amal Kandeel: Pioneers International
Francoise Kirby: Management Systems International
Dylan Maguire: International Republican Institute
Maren Maland: Chemonics
Haim Malka: CSIS Middle East Program
Leila Mooney: Partners for Democratic Change
Ralph Nurnberger: Georgetown University
Adrienne Ross: Strategic Communications Advisor
Fatima Taki: AFRICOM
Lara Talverdian: Atlantic Council
Meredith Wilson: Kosmos Energy

\(Back to top\)

Roundtable on the Cultural Heritage of Morocco

Date: October 1, 2013

1. Title: Roundtable on the Cultural Heritage of Morocco

Hosted by the Georgetown Center for Contemporary Arab Studies

Participants:

Dr. Kenneth Honerkamp: Professor of Arabic, Islamic texts, Shar'iah (Islamic Law), North African Sufism.

University of Georgia

Dr. Paul Heck: Discussant: Associate Professor, Georgetown University

Rev. Michael Calabria: Discussant: Georgetown University

2. Overview

This event, the second in a series on the strategic value of Morocco-US relations to include recommendations for US policy actions to support Morocco, began with a review of the draft paper on the topic presented by Dr. Honerkamp. Dr. Heck and Rev. Calabria also provided input before a general discussion with attendees. The goal of the series is to encourage a number of topical papers in advance of the King's visit to build interest in the Morocco-US relationship and existing and potential benefits of greater bilateral cooperation.

3. Summary

Dr. Honerkamp drew from his extensive experience in Morocco to explain the historical roots of Morocco's famed cultural and religious moderation based on an embrace of diversity. Described in the discussion draft as a pragmatic yet spiritual path throughout 1400 years of Moroccan history, what began as scholarly and religious work resonated and became engrained in the culture.

The key tenants of the Moroccan values of moderation are largely inspired by the al-Murshid al mu'in text on Imām Mālik, the theological doctrine of Imām al-Ash'arī, and the Sufism of Imām al-Junayd. Describing the effect of these influences, Dr. Honerkamp shared his experience of feeling 'at home in a strange land'; a unique and visceral sentiment of Morocco that he believes is a common and historical one. Importantly, Dr. Honerkamp reminded the group that although these three sources are a dominant force in Moroccan culture, they have never taken on the role of attempting to define the function and means of government. The emphasis on its Islamic identity is not something expedient but a function of Morocco's cultural heritage. Similarly, the King's great attention to this facet of Morocco's heritage is institutional, and the respect for the King is for that institution, not a personality cult.

Dr. Honerkamp also discussed Morocco's role in spreading this particular evolution of Islam. He highlighted the King's recent speech in Mali and the kinship amongst moderates that was evident. Beyond being an epicenter of learning, Morocco has recently begun to counter the Saudi influence by printing Quran texts and distributing them across the country. More could be done, he suggested, in expanding that distribution across the Islamic world.

Dr. Heck began his intervention by looking at the prominent role Morocco should play in the future. Morocco, and the form of Islam that it takes, will have a lot to say towards international harmony, he said. He described it as a feeling of nostalgia for diverse harmony in Morocco, which required a true experience of shared knowledge of the other. Reverend Calabria agreed, stating that Morocco can teach hospitality as well as its particular brand of Islam. Dr. Heck also agreed with Dr. Honerkamp that many Moroccans are very unsettled by a religiosity defined by the state, and that this goes beyond simply tolerance. On the other hand, Dr. Heck emphasized the enormous obstacles presented by a growing skepticism and resentment.

Dr. Heck emphasized that the US is a good and capable partner, but also that it should approach programs with Morocco in a different way. The US is very strong on the knowledge part, he said, but the intertwining of Security Studies and Islam is not an open and welcoming approach. Not all American involvement should have a security twist. Dr. Heck also lauded cultural, educational, and religious exchanges between the US and Morocco. It's not scholarly tourism, he said, it's deeper. This echoed the comments of Dr. Honerkamp.

4. Q & A

Richard McKee (State Department, Ret.) began the discussion by asking why Shiism has gained traction amongst young people. Dr. Honerkamp mentioned the financial backing of Iran as one factor, the other being that for disaffected people it is the 'next step' from Salafism. Daoud Casewit added that Salafism and Shiism are magnets for opposition and being beyond the cultural norms gives its adherents a political edge by being a touch traitorous.

Fulbright Administrator asked if there is a rural/urban difference in perceptions of Islamic identity, in Dr. Honerkamp's comparison of Pakistan and Morocco. Dr. Honerkamp replied that it does exist to some extent, but not enough to consider the moderate nature of Moroccan culture a city-based phenomenon.

With regard to recommendations, participants discussed the need to continue promoting cultural, religious, and educational exchanges, and Morocco's efforts to be a center of religion and learning. The group agreed that there is no shortage of good ideas to doing so, but that funding is too limited to support many endeavors. Although some signs are encouraging, more must be done to quickly stem the tide of resentment and anger amongst the youth.

5. Observations

This event was attended by 24 foreign policy professionals and academics. The paper was well-received and the Georgetown Center for Contemporary Arab Studies will publish a final paper, without attribution, that has a strong section on recommendations for US actions in support of Morocco's role as a cultural and religious leader in the Arab and Islamic world.

\(Back to top\)

Why Moroccan Protests Failed: A Panel Discussion

Date: October 10, 2013

1. Title: "Why Moroccan Protests Failed: A Panel Discussion"

Hosted by The Project on Middle East Political Science at the Elliott School of International Affairs, The George Washington University

Participants:

Aboubakr Jamai: Richard von Weizsacker Fellow, Bosch Foundation; Editor, French version of Lakome.com
Ahmed Benchemsi: Visiting Scholar, Program on Arab Reform and Democracy at the Center on Democracy, Development, and the Rule of Law, Stanford University; Founder, freearabs.com a
Adria Lawrence: Assistant Professor of Political Science, Yale University
Marc Lynch: Moderator: Assistant Professor of Political Science, The George Washington University

2. Overview

This event analyzed the singularity of Morocco's lack of revolution and eventual reforms in response to Arab Spring protests. The speakers raised many important points of analysis about internal politics of Morocco and how they influenced the results of the February 20 movement in the country. Given his association with Lakome.com, Jamai was often acerbic in his comments, while Benchemsi offered a more moderate perspective. Dr. Lawrence discussed the results of her studies into individuals in the protest movement.

3. Summary

Aboubakr Jamai began his opening remarks questioning the definitiveness of the event's title, suggesting that Moroccan protests could yet result in more political change. He elaborated by reminding the audience that the protests in Morocco initially asked solely for reform, while later calls for the removal of King Mohammed VI were superficial. In response, Jamai explained, the King "scolded" the February 20th Movement, which played a central role in the protests. However, on March 9, the King shifted course and delivered a "Thomas Jefferson like speech" essentially promising reform and a transition to democracy. Jamai added that the speech only tempered the protests momentarily because on March 20, 2011 the largest number of protesters to date took to the streets demanding reform. Jamai suggested a major reason the protests "did fail" was due to the "learning curve" of the regime from the Tunisian and Egyptian examples, whereby the Government of Morocco was better able to anticipate likely responses from protesters. However, he mentioned that the regime did use some violence against protesters, but was careful to stop short of lethal violence.

Jamai pointed out that the previous King, Hassan II, allowed minimal amounts of opposition activism, which was limited to various human rights organizations that served as an "outlet" to moderate society and provide the regime with "someone to negotiate with." He suggested that the current King Mohammed VI follows a similar strategy. Next, Jamai explained the importance of understanding the internal dynamics of the popular Islamist party, the Justice and Development Party (PJD). He explained how the Justice and Charity movement appeals to the same constituency as the PJD, though the Justice and Charity movement, he argued, does not support reform within the government and instead calls for waiting for the regime to collapse under its own corruption. The PJD, on the other hand, approved of the constitutional process and supported working with the King. Jamai suggested, as a non-pro-monarchy party, the PJD provided legitimacy to the King and moderated the protest movement. Jamai concluded by explaining that societal values (particularly Islamism versus secularism) and subsidy programs are the two issues of the Arab Spring in need of resolution.

Ahmed Benchemsi also opened his remarks questioning the title of the event. He noted that if the "cursor" was on removal of the King, than protests did fail, but he is not sure the cursor should be placed there. Benchemsi suggested that the King's March 9 speech "checked all the big democratic issues raised in the street," including a parliamentary monarchy, free press, and a new constitution. The Makhzen, he argued, manipulated the protesters by "bringing everyone to the table," which resulted in "too many recommendations to employ," leaving the Makhzen to select the issues to address. The youth, he suggested, prided themselves on being leaderless since leadership ends in either corruption or arrest. The problem, Benchemsi challenged, was the protesters had no direction or guidance. He also noted ironically that the protesters, who were asking for democratic reform, refused to establish internal voting because, they argued, it leads nowhere. Throughout, the PJD remained "one step behind" the protesters, cautious of fully embracing the movement for fear of losing support to the Justice and Charity movement. Benchemsi concluded by arguing that the regime "outfoxed" the protesters. The removal of the King failed according to Benchemsi, but he remained optimistic that the protests "planted a seed in society," which "may well prove a game changer," in the years to come.

Adria Lawrence began her remarks explaining that she conducted many interviews with core activists in the February 20th Movement. Initially, she focused on the micro level of the core protesters, suggesting most of them were previously involved in human rights organizations, children of activist parents, and children of victims of rights abuses by the state. On the macro level, Lawrence suggested that revolutionaries are almost always young, inexperienced, and prone to mistakes. Lawrence's research found that the monarchy was the difference for Morocco compared to other states like Egypt and Tunisia. Moroccans, she argued, value stability and democracy, and their unique situation in the region allowed for the possibility of reform without regime change. Authoritarian regimes "cannot democratize without becoming unstable," whereas a monarchy can reform "without losing the head of state," noted Lawrence. Therefore, she explained, the choice was between the French model (forming a Republic), which could lead to instability, or the British model (an evolving constitutional monarchy), with a stable transition more likely. Though not all protesters favored this model, the division further weakened the fragmented movement.

4. Q & A

Q: (Eric Goldstein, Human Rights Watch) Why did no one cast their lot with the 20 February Movement?

A: (Benchemsi) I disagree. Others did coalesce because they thought they could save the organization. The problem is the Support Council was unable to come up with a counteroffer and you can't engage in democracy without compromise.

Q: (Adina Friedman, George Mason University) Are the Jews and Berbers important to the movement?

A: (Jamai) It's important to note that it's the Ministry of Justice, not the ministry of freedom. But there is this idea that you cannot claim to be Moroccan without also claiming the Jewishness of the Moroccan identity. Hassan II had credibility on both sides [of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict]. What we have now is a declarative, non-substantial Constitution. The price for this is freedom of conscience in the Constitution. Now, the King is Commander of the Faithful, but to be that, he needs to have "faithfuls." Now how do Sunni Malikis see apostasy? As punishable by death. So they and other Islamists said no [to freedom of conscience in the Constitution].

(Benchemsi) There were lots of tactics used, notably lip service to minorities in order to preempt all demands, but use the groups for PR purposes.

Q: (Rachel, former Fulbright Scholar to Morocco) Did the protests leave any opening for women or socialists?

A: (Lawrence) Well, al Adl wa Ihsane is a mysterious organization, and it's unknown if that group is the most powerful opposition. It's important not to lose track of the PJD. Now, they're not clever, but there was certainly no paternalism on their part.

(Benchemsi) There was a case where a reporter was sued for calling Mohammed VI "my brother." He went to court, and offered the defense that Hassan II called himself the father of all Moroccans, so if Mohammed VI is also his son, then... The court reacted just like you did, and he was let off. The message here is that there are groups who are not saying, but thinking, "we know better," on questions of politics, the economy, and so on. We don't know exactly what the military thinks. As for al Adl wa Ihsane, they like to portray themselves as pious grandfathers.

(Jamai) Anouzla convinced me to return to journalism a few weeks before the Arab Spring. If I had any inkling of a doubt about the nastiness of this regime, it would have been gone with news of Anouzla's arrest. It is important to remember that Anouzla is Sahrawi as well. We need to come to terms with diverse Islamist parties; we need to open a debate. The problem there is that the radical left is enamored with French laïcité and aren't open to any questions of religion. What they should do is sit down and read some Locke, because there is a place for religion in a democracy.

5. Observations

This event was attended by about 35 people, approximately half being students. The conversation was largely negative, focusing on flaws in the protest movement and perceived stratagem on the part of the Moroccan government to mitigate reform. Speakers agreed that the existence of the monarchy is primarily responsible for Morocco's stability pre- and post-Arab Spring. They also agreed that there does not seem to be a widespread initiative to unseat the king; however, there is all-around disappointment with the governing bodies and the pace of reform.

The speakers raised many points of analysis about King Mohammed VI's relationship with the government and society. First, it was widely acknowledged that the existence of the monarchy is primarily reason for Morocco's stability. Second, there does not seem to be a widespread initiative to unseat the King; however, there is all-around disappointment with the governing bodies and with the fact that the King has not relinquished more executive powers to create a more open government that is able to address the demands of its citizens autonomously [i.e. Adria Lawrence's suggestion of the British model for the monarchy]. Lastly, Morocco's public image seems to follow the pattern of "one step forward, two steps back" when presented in international media and among scholars in these types of forums. For example, in 2013 positive and optimistic periods of reforms, such as the King's August 20th speech or his decision to regularize immigrants residency status, were followed by some indication of repressive human rights and civil liberties, the "Daniel-gate" protests and Ali Anouzla's arrest.

\(Back to top\)

Morocco's New Geo-Economics

Date: October 11, 2013

1. Title: Morocco's New Geo-Economics

Hosted by the German Marshall Fund of the United States

Participants:

Ian Lesser: Moderator: Executive Director, Transatlantic Center, GMFUS

Uri Dadush: Senior Associate, International Economics Program, The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

2. Overview

This event, the third in a series on the strategic value of Morocco-US relations in key sectors to include recommendations for US policy actions to support Morocco, began with a brief review of the topics presented in the draft paper which had been circulated in advance of the event. Dr. Lesser then passed the discussion to Dr. Dadush, who spoke about the latest economic indicators in Morocco and how they related to the discussion. The roundtable discussion was the bulk of the event, as the group was well-informed and able to address a range of issues and recommendations.

3. Summary

Dr. Dadush's analysis of Morocco was that many economic fundamentals remain strong – especially on relative terms in the MENA context. He described Morocco as one of the few reasonably diversified economies, featuring stability and strong connections with both Europe and the US. Morocco probably deserves more attention than it receives, he said, with strong growth, inflation under control, and continuous positive reforms giving more weight to the government.

The centerpiece of the event was the group discussion. Despite the encouraging signs, the group agreed, much more can and must be done to encourage growth in Morocco and take advantage of the free trade arrangement with the US. Adding to the stakes are Morocco's core economic dependence on exports and the unyielding pressure that unemployment puts on political stability.

The group questioned the emphasis that US officials and commentators should put into establishing a true economic union in the Maghreb. Though it remains the obvious choice for economic development – it was mentioned that it could result in an estimated 4% GDP growth for Morocco alone - and clearly deserving of continued support, many in the room agreed that true regional integration in North Africa is unlikely in this lifetime.

In terms of policy recommendations, the discussion indicated that more emphasis should be placed on fostering partnerships and knowledge-sharing by the private sector across the region. Several suggestions were made to give the private sector more tools to take advantage of the free trade apparatus. For example, there is presidential discretion to act without Congressional action, for example, providing technical assistance such as Department of Commerce programs, working with multilateral organizations such as The World Bank and IMF to provide technical assistance and funding for governance reforms, and initiate more economic diplomacy with the EU to support Morocco's transition to a stronger market economy.

Among other interesting recommendations was that more focus should be put on the US enabling Morocco to do more in Africa rather than promoting the Morocco-US economic relationship. To do this, the US should adopt a Japanese method of triangular aid to help Morocco expand trade into new African markets, using known strengths in electrification, manufacturing, value added services, pharmaceuticals, and banking. A focus on encouraging South-South trade will help Morocco expand and diversify its economy where it has the competitive advantage in Greater Africa as well as Latin America and Southern Asia.

The US could also engage more on economic diplomacy with Europe with a similar triangular method. The US could also pay more attention to the GCC and work to become a 3rd partner to those investments. More technical assistance and knowledge-sharing should be provided, perhaps in a field such as cell-phone manufacturing, which in Africa is a booming end-user market that contributes zero manufacturing market share.

Lastly, the US should help Morocco invest in young professionals. The US is a bastion of risk capital mentality, whereas Morocco lacks it, resulting in more of a trading culture and less entrepreneurship, venture capital, and industrialization. Promoting this mentality could go a long way in maximizing the rewards of policy frameworks which are already in place. Morocco could perhaps restructure subsidy money to further benefit SMEs. US-Morocco trade could also benefit from more widespread teaching and use of English, to stem the tide of an old-guard bias towards French and Arabic-speaking countries.

4. Observations

This event was attended by 23 foreign policy professionals. The paper was well-received and GMF will publish a final paper, without attribution, that has a strong section on recommendations for US actions in support of economic development and growth opportunities in Morocco.

Attendees:

Jean AbiNader: MAC

Neyla Arnas: National Defense University

Bradley Bosserman: NDN

David Bloom: MAC

Jean-François Dauphin: IMF

Barrie Freeman: National Democratic Institute for International Affairs

Kelsey Guyette: GMF

Geoffrey Kemp: Center for the National Interest

Ian Lesser: GMF

Carol Castiel: Voice of America

Odeh Aburdene: OAI Advisors

Uri Dadush: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

LouElin Dwyer: National Defense University

Eric Goldstein: Human Rights Watch

Haim Malka: CSIS Middle East Program

Simon Henderson: The Washington Institute for Near East Policy

Mohsin Khan: The Atlantic Council of the United States

Kerry McNamara: OCP Group

J.E. Rash: Legacy International

Vish Sakthivel: The Washington Institute for Near East Policy

Daniele Moro: Johns Hopkins University

Timothy Ridout: GMF

Simon Serfaty: GMF

\(Back to top\)

Morocco's Role in Regional Security and Development

Date: October 22, 2013

1. Title: "Morocco's Role in Regional Security and Development"

Hosted by the Atlantic Council

Participants:

Dr. J. Peter Pham: Moderator: Director, Africa Center, Atlantic Council

Christopher Leins: Deputy Director, Politico-Military Affairs, Department of Defense

2. Overview

This event, the fourth in a series on the strategic value of Morocco-US relations in key sectors that include recommendations for US policy actions in support of Morocco, began with a brief review of the topics presented in the draft paper which had been circulated in advance of the event. Dr. Pham gave an overview of Morocco's role in regional security and the merits of their counterterrorism strategy, while highlighting opportunities and recommendations for changes in US policy. The group discussion focused on Morocco's growing role as a regional leader in regional security, and how their economic influence has increased their regional, and potentially their global, security influence. The group also evaluated and expanded the paper's recommendations.

3. Summary

Dr. Pham began by discussing an increasing recognition of Morocco's role in African security, which is further enhanced by Morocco's economic and cultural ties on the continent. Despite this, he said, the US takes Morocco for granted. A prime example of this was the "unfortunate drop-in" during the latest MINURSO renewal, which resulted in the cancellation of the bilateral US-Moroccan African Lion security exercises in the spring. In a region where government fragility is "par for the course", he said, Morocco is stable and its interests are often aligned with those of the US. As a regional economic leader, notably in the financial sector, Morocco is expanding its networks throughout Africa, which could help pave the way for increased security cooperation.

There are lessons to be learned from Morocco's counterterrorism strategy, which is both aggressive and comprehensive. The three main tenants are a law-and-order approach to security, a targeting of terrorists through their financial networks, and an economic development approach to marginalize the enabling causes of radicalism. Specific Moroccan programs, including religious training exchanges, as well as the security forces training in places such as Mali, are not adequately lauded or supported. The holistic approach taken by Morocco stands out in the field of counterterrorism, one with certain replicable parts. From a US policy perspective, there is great opportunity for triangulation; scaling up effective programs carried out by a leader in regional security of increasing geopolitical 'heft'.

One main stumbling block to Morocco's growing role in regional security is the Western Sahara. The dispute is no longer 'frozen,' Dr. Pham said. The legally dubious inclusion of the Western Sahara - officially recognized by only nine member countries in the African Union (AU) effectively holds the other members hostage. At present, there is no defined mechanism for the removal of an AU member, so the issue would have to be resolved by other means. Until this happens, the regionalization of security cooperation is more piecemeal and difficult to scale-up, facilitating an environment that has proven to be ideal for global terrorist networks.

Group discussion began with the assertion that current US policy does not do enough to encourage regional economic integration in Africa. The US should insist on a regional dimension to programs and investments, it was recommended. US aid should follow this guideline, focusing on initiatives such as the Trans-African Highway Network. Good security cooperation is based on good economic cooperation, one participant said.

The US should also support Moroccan efforts towards security regionalization, supporting existing programs and forums that Morocco has led. US Military efforts, including the African Lion exercises, have gradually aimed to become more regional, though the process is a slow one. Joint military exercises can pay real dividends, in terms of both training and relations. It's hard to understate how the US-Morocco relationship improved after 1999, one participant said, when both US and UN exercises were performed with Morocco.

More regional-based security efforts are inhibited in part because, it was said, "Algeria gets in the way of everything". The US is somewhat of an enabler to Algerian intransigence, it was suggested, by not calling them to account for misdeeds in Libya and Mali, and by not making the improvement of Moroccan-Algerian relations a diplomatic priority. The US can help by supporting programs that already exist "below the political noise level" as a foundation for improving Moroccan-Algerian relations. Again, economics can be a strong facilitator of improved relations. The US can leverage its free trade agreement with Morocco by supporting value-added chains that encourage cross-border economic activity. The North Africa Partnership for Economic Opportunity (NAPEO) could also be re-tooled to support better relations across North Africa.

Morocco is expanding ties not only throughout Africa, but also across the Atlantic basin into South America. This not only carries economic implications but also potential US policy opportunities. Just as Morocco's influence in Africa can be leveraged into high-impact policy outcomes, the same could potentially be done as Morocco becomes a leader in the broader South-South context. Triangulation and the scaling-up of Moroccan initiatives are excellent ways to have low-input, high-impact policy outcomes, and their scope could potentially increase as the Moroccan economic influence expands globally. US policy should further emphasize its strategic partnership with Morocco with a focus on triangulation in order to achieve shared goals.

4. Observations

This event was attended by more than 20 foreign policy professionals. The paper was well-received, as the commentary indicated, and the Atlantic Council will publish a final paper, without attribution, that has a strong section on recommendations for US actions in support of and expanding Morocco's leadership efforts in regional security.

Attendees:

Jean AbiNader: Executive Director, Moroccan American Trade & Investment Center

Sean McFate: Professor, National Defense University

Bradley Bosserman: Director, MENA Initiative, New Democrat Network

David Bloom: Research Associate, Moroccan American Center

Fouad Arif: Bureau Chief, Moroccan News Agency

Mahfoud Bahbouhi: Counselor, Embassy of the Kingdom of Morocco

Majida Bargach: Interim Director, Center for International Relations, University of Virginia

Carol Castiel: Director, Current Affairs Programming, Voice of America News

Bronwyn Bruton: Deputy Director, Africa Center, Atlantic Council

Anne Moisan: Professor, Near East South Asia Center for Strategic Studies, National Defense University

Edward Gabriel: Former US Ambassador to Morocco

Francoise Kirby: Public Relations Director, Management Systems International

Alan Larson: Senior International Policy Advisor, Covington & Burling LLP

Scott Mastic: Regional Director, Middle East & North Africa, International Republican Institute

Karim Mezran: Senior Fellow, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, Atlantic Council

Laura Talverdian: Assistant Director, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, Atlantic Council

Lawrence Velte: Associate Professor, Near East South Asia Center for Strategic Studies, National Defense University

\(Back to top\)

Morocco's Strategic Engagement in Africa

Date: October 25, 2013

1. Title: Morocco's Strategic Engagement in Africa

Hosted by the Center for Strategic and International Studies

Participants:

Haim Malka: Deputy Director and Senior Fellow, Middle East Program, CSIS

Jon B. Alterman: Moderator: Director, Middle East Program, CSIS

2. Overview

This event, the fifth and final event in a series on the strategic value of Morocco-US relations in key sectors that include recommendations for US policy actions in support of Morocco, began with a review of the topics presented in the draft paper which had been circulated in advance of the event. Haim Malka gave an overview of Morocco's increasing economic and diplomatic emphasis on Sub-Saharan Africa and analyzed the implications and opportunities of this policy shift. The group discussion focused on Morocco's comparative advantages in a South-South approach to economic and diplomatic policy, as well as the role the United States can play in promoting these efforts to mutual benefit.

3. Summary

Haim Malka began the event by describing how Sub-Saharan Africa appears to be central to Morocco's attempts to grow and diversify its economy, and ultimately increase its international influence. The driving force behind this policy decision appears to be the urgent need to diversify Morocco's economic base and trade partners to deal with growing socio-economic pressures. It was a lesson made painfully evident as the slump in European demand had a dramatic effect on Morocco – Europe being the source of more than 60% of its trade, as well as the main source of Morocco's tourism industry and remittances.

Some of the seemingly low-hanging fruit for Moroccan trade hasn't panned out as hoped. Regional integration in the Maghreb is unlikely without a political solution to Western Sahara. The "reality we all know is; this is stuck," Malka stated. On the other side of the Atlantic, Morocco has a free trade agreement with the US that went into effect in 2006 and the US market offers an opportunity for boosting Moroccan exports. However, the results of the FTA have been underwhelming and it's clear that the FTA hasn't been a game-changer for Morocco.

The pivot towards Sub-Saharan Africa offers competitive advantages for Morocco that match up nicely with high-growth sectors in Africa, especially in banking and agriculture. Outward foreign direct investment has reflected this trend, as 90% of investment from Morocco stays on the continent. Morocco also took initiative during the financial crisis in Europe, picking up investments dropped by more risk-averse Europeans, notably in banking. Moroccan banks are now in 22 African countries and are some of the biggest on the continent. Morocco's phosphates are already a strategic asset for increasing output from Sub-Saharan Africa's farms, with the potential for developing a downstream fertilizer sector and a research and development hub. Morocco also has the second largest pharmaceutical industry in Africa, so the economy is well-positioned to take advantage of the maturation of the Sub-Saharan African market.

Morocco also continues to position itself as a manufacturing and outsourcing base for European companies. Companies such as Renault, Bombardier, Boeing, GE, and Dassault have moved manufacturing to Morocco, where labor costs remain competitive. Malka stressed that the need now is to develop a manufacturing ecosystem, with training and expertise that could fuel Africa-centric spinoff ventures that further diversify Morocco's manufacturing base.

The success of Morocco's attempts at diversifying its economy and increasing its presence in Sub-Saharan Africa will depend largely on policy choices. As the discussants noted, there is much that the US can do to help this process along for mutual benefit. The US can use existing funding to support triangular programs that take advantage of Morocco's existing networks and competencies. Power Africa is a prime example, where the US could rely on Morocco's experience with rural electrification to boost the efficacy and efficiency of the program.

The US should also take the pivot to Sub-Saharan Africa as a good reason to leave behind the "artificial seam" that separates North Africa and Sub-Saharan Africa in the eyes of US policymakers. Many companies now look at Morocco as a hub for Africa; the US should do the same. Adjusting rules of origin regulations in the FTA could also help encourage Morocco as a business hub and expand trade links with Sub-Saharan Africa. The US should also support more regional and continental infrastructure projects. Morocco is already a leader in air and port transportation links, but road and rail networks should be improved. As one participant said, "the traffickers are showing us the way" in terms of potential South-South trade.

4. Observations

This event was attended by more than 30 foreign policy professionals. The paper was well-received, as the commentary indicated, and CSIS will publish a final paper, without attribution, that has a strong section on recommendations for US actions in support of and expanding Morocco's leadership efforts to expand programs and networks into Sub-Saharan Africa.

Attendees:

Jon B. Alterman: Center for Strategic and International Studies
Alexis Arieff: Congressional Research Service
Carolyn Barnett: Center for Strategic and International Studies
Alexandre Bilodeau: US Department of State
David Bloom: Moroccan American Center
Mary Ellen Connell: Center for Naval Analysis
Jennifer Cooke: Center for Strategic and International Studies
Richard Downie: Center for Strategic and International Studies
Alice Friend: US Department of Defense
Martin Kessler: Peterson Institute for International Economics
Mohsin Khan: Atlantic Council
Christopher Kisco: US Agency for International Development
William Lawrence: George Washington University
Haim Malka: Center for Strategic and International Studies
Peggy McKean: US Department of Defense
Karim Mezran: Atlantic Council
Marina Ottaway: Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars
Milena Sanchez de Boado: American Bar Association
Carrie Schenkel: International Republican Institute
Fatima Taki: US Department of Defense
Susan C. Tuttle: IBM
Bruno Versailles: International Monetary Fund
Maja Volk: US Department of Defense
Kathleen Walsh: The Stimson Center

\(Back to top\)

Resolving Regional Conflicts: The Western Sahara and the Quest for a Durable Solution

Date: November 6, 2013

1. Title: "Resolving Regional Conflicts: The Western Sahara and the Quest for a Durable Solution"

Hosted by The Middle East Program of the Woodrow Wilson Center

Participants:

Bernabe Lopez-Garcia: Professor of Contemporary History of Islam, Autónoma University of Madrid
Anna Theofilopoulou: Independent political analyst, and writer; Former UN official and member of James Baker's negotiating team covering the Western Sahara conflict (1994-2006)
Marina Ottaway: Senior Scholar, Woodrow Wilson Center
Haleh Esfandiari: Moderator: Director, Middle East Program, Woodrow Wilson Center

2. Overview

This panel discussion was the first in a series on the Western Sahara, as announced at the event, taking place on the 38th anniversary of the Green March. The panel discussed their observations of the Western Sahara dispute and the possibility of resolution scenarios for the conflict, including the autonomy plan introduced by Morocco.

3. Summary

Bernabe Lopez-Garcia began the session with a frank statement on the Western Sahara conflict; "we see no way to resolve it," he said. His talk, in Spanish and translated into English for the audience, focused on the historical, legal and political development of the dispute. Lopez-Garcia spent much of his time on the Moroccan approach to the issue, associating it with an "ambiguous approach," that suffers from a lack of open national debate, in turn stifled by an ongoing "taboo" on Western Sahara dialogue. Further, Lopez-Garcia frequently mentioned that misinformation and "demonizing", admittedly from both sides, but with his comments focused on the Moroccan side, are reinforcing ideological entrenchment that makes resolution impossible. He added that Morocco "insists obsessively on an Algeria focus" on the issue, and that despite the obvious linkage, the Polisario has its own voice. The result is that the Western Sahara issues remains unresolved despite various diplomatic efforts, leaving a serious humanitarian crisis of "40,000-150,000" refugees in camps near Tindouf, Algeria.

Lopez-Garcia also spoke about Morocco's 2007 autonomy plan and recent political reforms, linking them both as signs of change deemed disingenuous by the Polisario. He noted that there has been no real progress on the negotiations and that human rights violations continue in the territory, undermining Morocco's credibility on issues of governance and providing the Polisario with the opportunity to make human rights the basis of its international strategy (which it has done), an issues Morocco deems an affront to its sovereignty. Lopez-Garcia did state that the 2007 plan proposed some novel aspects, such as elections, broad legislative powers and an important amnesty provision, but argued that it did not sufficiently address the question of self-determination. He postulated that the 2011 reform of the Constitution would have been an opportune time to debate this idea of autonomy and offer something to the other side, described it as a "missed opportunity" because the Western Sahara was not mentioned, even though one small step was made with regard to Hassania culture being recognized in the Constitution. Lopez-Garcia was dire in his current assessment of the region and cited serious problems of infighting and violence between people living in the territories.

Lopez-Garcia was more even-handed in his prescription for resolution, although he was pessimistic about the many obstacles inhibiting a resolution. First, there is misinformation on both sides about the nature of the problem. For example, Sahrawis feel that their voices have been marginalized, and northerners living in the territory believe that the Sahrawis have privileges and feel ill-will towards them. Timid steps, such as the CNDH, have been taken to mitigate this, but the local CNDH branches have not been very active. Second, Lopez-Garcia reiterated that Moroccan demonization of the Polisario also presents a serious obstacle, adding that the Polisario must likewise stop efforts to demonize the other side and remove its strict ideological control over the refugee population. Third, the role of Algeria – and whether or not the Polisario is truly independent of it – presents additional hurdles. Finally, there is no climate of confidence between the two parties – something that is essential for finding a solution to the conflict. He hinted that time might suddenly be an encouraging factor for change, given the emergence of a security threat in the Sahel that is causing greater desire on the part of Western Powers to have final resolution for the sake of border integrity and the fight against global terrorism. Additionally, both sides have suffered and made sacrifices and a mutual recognition of this could go some way in creating a shared understanding between the two parties.

In terms of moving forward, Lopez-Garcia argued that there was to be some type of referendum for the Sahrawis to express themselves independently of both the Polisario and Morocco, a requirement the 2007 autonomy plan acknowledges. If the details of such a referendum could be figured out, a negotiated political solution could be achieved. For the moment, however, the Polisario is not willing to play that game. Lopez-Garcia argued that maybe if Morocco acknowledged some of these issues and demonstrated true democracy in the Sahara, the Polisario may come to the table. However, he also added that the Polisario must "take a decisive step forward" in negotiations. Perhaps relaxing his initial despondency towards the outlook on a resolution, Lopez-Garcia said that "we (do) have formulas for Sahrawi democracy linked with Morocco," which could help to end the conflict in a scenario that doesn't create 'winners and losers.'

Continuing on Lopez-Garcia's mention of 'winners and losers' in a potential resolution, Anna Theofilopoulou began her comments by saying that the conflict is still in the same position as it was in 2004, when the UN weakened its support for the peace plan and shifted to achieving a mutually acceptable political solution. She reflected back to that time, stating that the UN plan was misguided because it presented a plan that didn't offer a face-saving solution for both sides. She added that the UN allowed the parties to block the process, with the Polisario being the more obstructive of the two. Theofilopoulou suggested that the UN process was flawed from the beginning because it was more interested in resolution than the parties themselves, and the lack of real solutions was a symptom of this root problem.

Since 2004, the geopolitics of the region have greatly changed, with the Arab Spring and the rise of AQIM, but the UN has not become more active in response, "refusing to take firm positions and push both parties," by claiming that the conflict falls under Chapter 6 rather than Chapter 7 (with the latter allowing the UN to force a resolution, rather than mediate between the two parties). As a result, Morocco maintains its position in favor of negotiations on the basis of autonomy/sovereignty with a referendum on the final autonomy statute, and the Polisario maintains its insistence on a referendum with three options: integration, independence, and autonomy. Four rounds of formal and ten rounds of informal negotiations have thus achieved nothing.

So where do things stand now? Theofilopoulou argued that international civil society supports the Polisario based on legal arguments, but ignores political realities; the Polisario has a legal case and Morocco has a political case. Theofilopoulou reminded the audience that legal issues don't offer much help towards resolution, saying that if the Western Sahara dispute was to be resolved by legal grounds, it would have been done so already, implicitly stating that a political resolution is the only feasible solution. Theofilopoulou's description of the UN's role in the process was one of an 'enabler,' providing cover for each side as they pursued inherently incompatible goals. She added that neither Morocco's Polisario bashing nor the Polisario's insistence on discussing the issue solely in terms of legality serves any practical purpose. Theofilopoulou stated that a resolution mainly requires the aforementioned 'face-saving' for both sides. She suggested that a return to the initial terms of the Baker Plan with an extended 10-year option for a vote on autonomy (rumored to be a CORCAS plan) as one of several options would provide sufficient political 'cover' for both sides to make a deal.

Marina Ottaway spoke mainly about how the Moroccan proposal for Western Sahara was essentially an "advanced regionalization" plan, which happened to include the disputed territory as one of the regions comprising Morocco, arguing that "it's time to recognize that the autonomy plan isn't all it's cracked up to be." "It is worth going back to the King's speech" in the wake of the Arab Spring, she said, noting that the proposed decentralization was mentioned more prominently than the new constitution was, even though that was what people paid attention to at the time. She stressed that the only thing special for the Sahara is that it will be the first region to be decentralized. Ottaway expressed her dismay at this, noting, "I have nothing against decentralization, but this is not an autonomy plan." She also argued that both sides are even less willing to compromise than before and the same goes for Algeria, although she expressed optimism that the "CORCAS plan" references by Theofilopoulou could work if there was a push from the UN.

Ottaway also addressed what she referred to as the new prevalence of "nebulous conflicts" in the world – intractable conflicts that are far beyond a solution based on legality and that require some alternative arrangement. Ottaway compared the Western Sahara dispute to similar autonomy conflicts in Kirkuk (Iraq) and Somaliland (Somalia), saying that these kinds of disputes are increasingly common. In these instances there is no real way to determine the "real, original inhabitants" and thus who has the legal right to vote. Ottaway predicted that more ambiguous solutions, such as de facto independence over time while under existing sovereignty or de facto annexation, will be increasingly common in similar conflicts. These solutions will avoid legal and political issues in favor of "facts on the ground" without legal recognition.

4. Q & A

Q: What is the validity of reports of terrorist recruitment and infiltration of the Polisario camps by AQIM?

A: (Theofilopoulou) There are no credible reports about AQIM activity in Western Sahara proper, but there is always the possibility of young, frustrated people resorting to terrorism.

(Ottaway) The intricacies of terrorist networks operating in the region are beyond our understanding, but there is no evidence of AQIM recruiting in the Tindouf camps, nor is there evidence that it isn't. It is all too likely sooner or later.

(Lopez-Garcia) These reports are the result of Morocco's efforts to demonize the Polisario – this is what I have been consistently referring to. There is always the possibility of steps towards fundamentalism in the camps.

Q: (Nadine Hoffman, International Women's Media Foundation) Could you discuss the role of lobbying in the conflict? Is it primarily obstructive to a resolution of the conflict?

A: (Ottaway) Of course...but what exactly can we do about it?

(Theofilopoulou) Lobbyists contribute to the hardening of position on both sides, because they can both say they have people on their sides.

(Lopez-Garcia) There is a saying "I'd rather talk to a radical than a lobbyist."

Q: (David Ottaway, The Wilson Center) Could you clarify your earlier remark estimating the refugee population at 40,000 to 150,000 refugees?

A: (Lopez-Garcia) There is no census that would allow us to know – the UN doesn't dare wade into the issue.

(Theofilopoulou) It is the Polisario and Algeria who do not allow the census. I am skeptical that 150,000 is a legitimate number. If the Spanish census was around 75,000 and half left, we are looking at around 35,000 and then of course some expansion with families. The UN conclusion in 1999 was that there were around 100,000, but “nobody really knows.”

Q: (Mohamed Yeslem Bissat) (Bissat was interrupted early in his comment with an insistence that he actually pose a succinct question, as requested by the moderator. The exchange was back and forth, with Bissat demonstrating an attitude with feigned politeness) Is it possible to have autonomy in a dictatorship?

A: (Lopez-Garcia) Of course not. Morocco is not currently a democratic regime, and the missed opportunity for reform shows a country in stagnation or even regression in this regard.

(Ottaway) I don't agree. It is indeed possible to have autonomy despite a lesser degree of democracy.

Q: (Eric Goldstein, Human Rights Watch) So should we just abandon the idea of a referendum on self-determination?

A: (Ottaway) Determining in practice who exactly should vote is not likely possible.

Q: (Gare Smith, Foley Hoag (did not identify himself as a lobbyist for Algeria)) Should the US just really set aside the rule of law in dealing with the issue?

A: (Theofilopoulou) It is simply a question of political reality. Lip service will be paid, however, to certain principles.

(Lopez-Garcia) Morocco must be a country where the rule of law is respected first and foremost.

Q: (I. William Zartman, Johns Hopkins University) Can Spain's experience with decentralization can help inform the process in Morocco?

A: (Lopez-Garcia) The process in Spain is flawed and does not provide a lot of valuable lessons for this issue.

5. Observations

Approximately 80 scholars, experts, and advocates on both sides attended the event. Notably, UN Envoy Chris Ross was in attendance, highlighting that the Wilson Center has a large draw with high-profile figures. Nadine Hoffman of IWMF was also in attendance – a likely indication of IWMF engagement on this issue in the future. Overall, the speakers were neutral on the issue and with regard to Morocco, though they primarily spoke about Morocco's alleged human rights violations and made little mention of those of the Polisario. Lopez-Garcia was largely critical of Morocco's role in the dispute, though he did take a few opportunities to blame both sides for certain malfeasance and intransigence. The other two panelists approached the subject more dispassionately, with a comparative and realist approach. Remarkably, Theofilopoulou's positions on a referendum (and on Morocco's position) seem to have evolved toward a more practical, rather than legal, assessment of the conflict. Unfortunately, Ottaway's views of the autonomy plan have likewise evolved, and her pronouncements on the matter were wholly unhelpful. All panelists held a similar lack of optimism towards the potential for resolution, yet they did have similar outlines for how a potential settlement deal could be shaped and made feasible, mostly by moving forward based on political realities, rather than legality. The audience was very eager to ask questions, though most panelist answers were repetitions of their earlier comments. This was especially true in the case of the Bissat and Smith questions, which weren't received as entirely serious additions to the conversation. The behavior of pro-Polisario people at these events is a continual validation of how not to act – the moderator and the panel expressed real annoyance with the Polisario representative and did not appear to take him very seriously. By staying above the fray, Morocco will be taken more seriously by experts working on these issues. It will be interesting to follow the Wilson series as it develops, and while there is certainly room for improvement, there is also an opportunity for realistic, if not positive messaging on Morocco's position on the issue.

\(Back to top\)

Charting Morocco's Reform Strategy

Date: November 20, 2013

1. Title: “Charting Morocco's Reform Strategy”

Hosted by the German Marshall Fund

Participants:

Mustafa el Khalfi: Minister of Communications, Morocco

Nizar Baraka: President of CESE, Morocco

Driss el Yazami: President of CNDH, Morocco

Serge Berdugo: Ambassador at Large, Morocco

Ivan Vejvoda: Moderator: Vice President of Programs, GMF

2. Overview

In the context of the King's meeting with President Obama, several high level Moroccan officials presented their work on Morocco's reform process. The speakers gave an overview of Morocco's current situation and steps being taken to move forward. The 2011 Constitution was a common point of reference in all speakers' presentations.

3. Summary

Minister El Khalfi began by saying that Morocco is currently facing two challenges, democratization and stability. In his opinion, Morocco is a model of engaging in reforms, succeeding in democracy, and providing strength and stability. The reason Morocco is able to do this is because it is following the "third path" between outright revolution and maintaining the status quo, which allows the country to enact reforms while preserving stability. There are three factors specific to Morocco that allow it to follow this third path. First, the King's leadership, as seen in the 2011 speech and the 2011 election of a new government, which remains in power two years later. Second, the strength of civil society and political parties. There are many groups represented in the reform process and increased participation has led to the acceleration of reforms. Third, Morocco has a "culture of consensus," which is to say there is a focus on finding common solutions to challenges.

Minister El Khalfi said that the new constitution represents the driving force for democratization, and that it has several obligations to implement, including making the courts more responsible and under less government oversight, reforming the press code, and increasing access to information. Another priority is increasing regionalization, including allowing the local population in the Western Sahara to manage its own affairs. There is also a need to increase protection of human rights and open the country to UN rapporteurs. Finally, freedom of the press is a priority. Minister El Khalfi claimed that there are "no journalists jailed" currently in Morocco and that "no website has been blocked by the government," given that Lakome.com had been blocked at its owner's request. He directed curious parties to examine Freedom House's report on the internet, and said that most of the media is private in Morocco, with the government providing only "20% of all reports." He closed with prospects for the future, namely broadening support for the above initiatives.

Nizar Baraka spoke on democracy and reforms. He also mentioned the need to improve independence of the judiciary and listed the reforms called for in the 2011 Constitution. He then turned to his own organization, the CESE, saying that it provides advice to the government on the basis of its 99 members, who represent unions, NGOs, and citizens. He described the CESE report on the Sahara, which took the form of a one year survey, as one built on consensus and neutral assessments. The report calls for the application of orderly law and notes that the GDP of Western Sahara actually beats the national average by 50%. This is deceptive, however, as the economy needs to be made more sustainable, and 30% of the GDP goes to administrative costs. He noted that unemployment is only 5% in Western Sahara, whereas the rest of the country has 9% unemployment. He took these figures as evidence that the development model has reached its limit, and that there needs to be a new model, designed by and for the local population, taking the form of regional councils elected on the principle of universal suffrage. A civil forum would then be held in each region, and the results would be applied to the development model. Baraka stated that CESE's current goals are to spend $17 billion over the next 10 years to create 120,000 jobs, provide efficient social services, and promote the sustainable use of natural resources. To this end, there is a development fund to finance SMEs and a social fund to provide a safety net for those who need it. CESE also aims to improve skills and health care in the region. He closed by saying that these goals are "ambitious, realistic, and sustainable."

Driss El Yazami then posed the rhetorical question as to whether Arabs can build democracy and improve human rights by themselves. In Morocco's case, he noted that the path to democratization began in the mid 1990's. The family code was released in 2004, the Royal Berber Institute was created in 2003, and there were public reconciliation hearings. El Yazami also referenced the 2011 Constitution and its requirements to increase human rights protections nationally. He closed by saying that justice reform is necessary and that the country is working hard to do so, but changing laws alone is insufficient.

Ambassador Serge Berdugo introduced himself as an Ambassador at Large and the President of the Jewish Committee. He spoke of the Moroccan exception, which he defined as equilibrium between cultures. He believes Morocco handled the Arab Spring in a "peaceful and responsible way," thanks to Moroccan's deeply rooted sense of identity. The next steps, in his opinion, are to build democracy and a market economy without radical solutions and to transform society without disturbing societal harmony. He made reference to Morocco's strong civil society, citing 45 NGOs spending 8.8 billion dirhams with 1 million volunteers. He also praised the 2011 Constitution for establishing protection for Moroccan identities. Ambassador Berdugo closed by discussing religion, the King's position as the religious authority, specifically in the Sunni Maliki rite, and the work he has done on behalf of the Jewish community, restoring synagogues and cemeteries. He also said the Moroccan Jewish community enjoys full civil rights and is an important part in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

4. Q&A

Q: (Diane Pollack, WINEP) Could you tell us more about the demonstrators? Who are they, what do they want, are there any patterns, and what have been your responses?

A: (Minister El Khalfi) 95% of it was social issues - employment, housing, health, and education. Morocco has 36 unions and a strong civil society. There are only 40-50 demonstrators each day. This is a social dialogue and it reflects Moroccan democracy.

(El Yazami) The number of protests was a high figure before the Arab Spring. They are asking for their rights, they want to negotiate. NGOs need to be more active.

Q: Can you say something on the integration of the Berber community? Has there been a backlash from Arab nationalists? What are the effects of the Berber reform?

A: (Minister El Khalfi) Berbers are not a minority group; they are a component of the Moroccan identity. We also have the Royal Institute for Amazigh Culture, we are criminalizing discrimination, and we offer classes in Amazigh. The first Amazigh website started this year. We are also going to increase state aid by 20%. There is also the use of the Amazigh language in courts; we are aiming at full integration - political, economic, and cultural. So this is not a political issue.

(El Yazami) If you want more information, you can read the 2004 UNDP report on Morocco. We are having a public debate, and now educate people in three languages.

(Note: The moderator then took a round of questions, to which the speakers responded at choice.)

Q: (Eric Goldstein, Human Rights Watch) You mentioned Morocco's model for Human Rights monitors, as well as reform of the press code and the penal code. Will you achieve those goals, and if not, why?

Q: (Charles Dahan, Vice President for Moroccan Jewry) There were recently a group of Moroccan politicians who refused to go to Israel for a meeting of the Mediterranean Group. There are also 1 million Israeli Moroccans. Is it time to look seriously at Morocco-Israel relations?

Q: Where does Morocco fit in the larger religious discourse? What are Morocco's positions on current issues in the Levant?

Q: (JE Rash, Legacy International) Could you say more about young professionals in Morocco? What is the state of public health?

A: (Minister El Khalfi) We have had successes in education, the problem is of quality. Children get financial aid. We had a debate on the national language. As I said, we are criminalizing discrimination. The press code reform is my personal priority. We established a commission and received more than 100 recommendations; we are going to hold another on online media. We have started implementation of press reform: there is now legal recognition of online media. Then there is the issue of decriminalizing article 27. Article 28 says that "freedom of the press is guaranteed." By the end of 2013, the first draft will be up for public debate. The Constitution says that Jews are a source of identity. We had public coverage for Yom Kippur. We are also training Malian imams to fight extremism. We also hosted a conference with UNESCO on the internet.

(Ambassador Berdugo) Morocco is on a quest for tolerance. We host 10 to 15 events promoting tolerance. People don't know, but one of Morocco's big exports is rabbis; there are Moroccan rabbis all around the world. Morocco is also a pioneer in the Middle East peace process to promote a peace that recognizes the rights of the Palestinians to a viable, dignified state. Morocco is not an actor, per se, but is certainly directing things from the pit.

Q: (Alexis Arieff, Congressional Research Service) My question is for Mr. Baraka. How does your proposal for Western Sahara differ from decentralization?

A: (Baraka) Our proposal is for autonomy. The other party prefers the status quo, but it is important not to leave the citizens waiting. In his speech on the 6th of November, 2012, the King said that it is time for a new development model and to implement regionalization throughout the country, but more so in Western Sahara. The Sahrawi people will have to be involved in government for three reasons. We need to develop a participative democracy. We need agreement on what the regions need. Governance is insufficient; we need a development model to create an attractive economy. So we are targeting safety nets, valuing development over security, and working on long-term goals over short-term ones. This is an integrated strategy, based on human development, win ambition for a better future.

Q: (Ralph Nurnberger) What is the Human Rights situation in Western Sahara, and Tindouf?

A: (El Yazami) As for Tindouf and Human Rights commissions, there is one in Tantan, and despite the population being the same, international reporters focus on the Sahara, but less so on Tindouf because there is no access. We are working on these issues, though we still have problems. There is a national mechanism against torture, for example. The international community needs to monitor Tindouf on the same basis as Morocco. The RFK Center report is biased, as they spent two weeks in Western Sahara but only a few days in Tindouf.

(Minister El Khalfi) Look to the work of our conciliation commission. Morocco is open. Morocco is ready to deal with civil society, ready to work with the UN, but within our sovereignty. Dissenting opinions are tolerated. The government has even decided to financially support an opposition paper, because "democracy obliges us." Algeria refuses to implement a UN census of the Tindouf camps. The Polisario is a one party system, based on ignoring human rights. NGO's should examine the Polisario as well as Morocco.

5. Observations

The event was attended by approximately 50 foreign policy professionals. The presentations focused on Morocco's reform efforts and centered on the 2011 Constitution. Each speaker elaborated on their personal areas of expertise, but given the large number of speakers and limited time allotted, comments were broader as compared to smaller events during the delegation. The reform strategy outlined was one of vision, consultation, deliberation, and ongoing action, stressing the accelerating pace and number of reforms as well as an honest self-assessment of areas for continued improvement.

\(Back to top\)

Revolution and Political Transitions in North Africa

Date: November 21, 2013

1. Title: "Revolution and Political Transitions in North Africa"

Hosted by Georgetown University Center for Contemporary Arab Studies (CCAS) and the Maghreb Center

Participants:

Osama Abi-Mershed: Director, CCAS, Georgetown

Lahouari Addi: Carnegie Centennial Fellow, Georgetown

Amira Aleya-Sghaier: Professor, University of Tunis

Nejib Ayachi: Founder and President, the Maghreb Center

Michael Hudson: Director, Middle East Institute

Noureddine Jebnoun: Adjunct Professor, CCAS, Georgetown

Ricardo René Larémont: Professor, SUNY-Binghamton

Azzedine Layachi: Professor, St. John's University

Joseph Sassoon: Visiting Professor, CCAS, Georgetown

Emad El-Din Shahin: Professor, AUC

2. Overview

This event was broken into three separate discussions, each with a question and answer session. The first focused on the army and police in transitions to democracy; the second on constitutions, elections, and their sequencing; and the third on youth and their interactions with secular and religious parties. The overarching theme of the discussions was the process of political transition and factors currently impeding it. Understandably, the roundtable focused on countries going through a transition, namely Egypt, Tunisia, and Libya. A large portion of the first panel was also dedicated to Algeria.

3. Summary

Roundtable 1: Power: The Army and the Police in Transitions to Democracy

Participants: Layachi, Addi, Jebnoun, Ayachi (Moderator)

Noureddine Jebnoun addressed political transformations in Egypt, Libya, and Tunisia with a focus on the three main reasons that security services can hold up democratic transitions. First, limited institutionalization of the military creates political challenges. Ideally, the military would be a professional force. However, the situation in North Africa is not ideal. Factors limiting institutionalization include tribal/regional alliances, as in Libya; an imbalance between the regular army and intelligence services, as in Egypt; and the army as a social welfare system rather than a fighting force, as in Egypt. In Libya, following Gadhafi's rise to power, the military was almost entirely composed of members of the Warfala tribe, until he passed leadership on to his son. In Egypt, the Global War on Terror has blurred the line between standard security services and counterterrorism, leading to confusion in leadership. Additionally, the Egyptian army has 2 million members, and what is essentially its own private economy.

The second reason is a changing concept of security. Over the past 50 years, there has been a transition in many countries from state-based security, i.e. making sure the country is not invaded, to human-based security, i.e. making sure citizens are free from want, fear, etc. In Tunisia, Libya, and Egypt, the human-centric approach is missing, and the military is thereby preparing for attacks that most likely will not happen.

The third reason is misinterpretation of the meaning of civilian oversight. For example, Rachid Ghannouchi claimed that Ennahda had almost achieved Salafi control of the military. The military should not be "controlled" by a political party, but rather managed. Problems here include the military not trusting politicians, politicians using the military as a patronage system, and a lack of understanding of civilian control on the part of the military.

Jebnoun concluded by addressing specific issues in Egypt. He argued that these all fall under the heading of politicization of the security sector. He provided several examples to highlight this phenomenon. First, heads of police units were sacked by Morsi, leaving the police opposed to him and contributing to his ouster. Second, the judiciary is politicized, as is the new constitution which accords supremacy to the military (specifically articles 170-175). Third, corruption is a perennial problem, as is competition between the army and the police. Finally, the military co-opts popular movements, as evidenced in Morsi's removal.

Layachi contextualized the Arab Spring as a response of the military to the street and focused his remarks on Algeria. In Algeria, the military is not only a security force, but "transformist," implementing socialist policy on the economy and dominating political life. The presence of the military leads back to the War of Independence and military leadership of the country to the 1965 coup, although its position was significantly strengthened – and reformists tendencies weakened - after the failed "Algerian Spring" and subsequent civil war in the early 1990s. Layachi argued that Bouteflika has stayed in power not through his own will, but because he embodies civilian-military relations. The real leadership is, and has been, the intelligence services (DRS) and the question now is whether or not the DRS will allow Bouteflika a fourth term.

Addi further analyzed Algeria's lack of an Arab Spring. According to his analysis, Algeria is currently post-Arab Spring, as that country had a failed popular uprising 20 years ago. He noted several factors that limit Algeria's current transition to democracy. First, the failure of efforts to do so in 1992. Second, the fact that rising oil prices over the last decade have allowed the regime to buy off the populace. Third, since Boumedienne, the president has had no power; Bouteflika remains in power because he has given up trying to change things. Again, the DRS is in control, and it doesn't matter if he lives or dies. Addi thus argued that democratic transition is unlikely because the people have firsthand experience what happens when civilians challenge the military. He ended with a quote from an Algerian author: "All states have an Army; Algeria is an Army that has a State."

Roundtable 2: Process: Constitutions, Elections, and their Sequencing in Transitions to Democracy

Participants: Shahin, Hudson, Sassoon, Larémont (Moderator)

Larémont gave an opening statement by posing five framing issues for the discussion. 1) To what degree is an elite consensus required to create a democratic state? This happened in Spain and South Africa, but as of yet not in Libya or Tunisia. 2) Does the sequence of events, of elections, matter? They can be harmful, when held for their own sake. 3) Besides courts, are there effective institutions in the state? Effective legislatures? 4) The military must be subordinate. This is probable in Tunisia, impossible in Algeria, and difficult in Egypt. 5) Can the world system sustain the implosion of critical Arab States, by which I mean Egypt?

Shahin, who was at AUC during the revolutions, spoke on the process of democratic transitions with Egypt. In the old state, institutions were very strong, but as recent events have shown, now external actors can thwart transitions. The hope is the country will be able to move from moderate vs. radical to a free state where everyone can speak freely. However, there is little agreement on a prototypical democratic transition. Shahin outlined five essential characteristics for such a transition. First, there must be boundaries of the political system. Essential questions for such a system include: Will it define identity, will it be simply a state, will it have civil-military relations, and will it define religion? Second, there must be skilled and trained agents to guide the transition, or it will fall to old state institutions. Third, the economic conditions must be right. Fourth, there must be a process for the Constitution and a decision about whether the state will be presidential or parliamentary. Fifth, projects must be consistent. In Egypt, the rules have kept changing. Shanin concluded by making some pronouncements about the future. Assuming the roadmap continues, there will be instability until al-Sisi comes to power. If he doesn't run, on the other hand, things will stabilize. However, if there is no dominant power, repression will continue. Shanin lastly speculated that it was possible that there may be an actual revolution or a restoration of the Muslim Brotherhood. At this point, anything is possible in Egypt.

Sassoon addressed the question of the role of the Army, saying that durability of institutions is not particular to the Arab Spring, but is applicable worldwide. In Egypt, the security apparatus has been durable pre and post-revolt, with no changed economic or business structures. However, the new regimes have not addressed the people's grievances, namely 1) economic inequality and cronyism, and 2) youth unemployment. Other countries inherited weak institutions from colonial powers, and in the case of Libya, Gadhafi destroyed what institutions were left, leading to the current situation. Finally, Sassoon noted that elections do not solve problems, citing Iraq. Transitions are only successful with a middle class, and less government patronage, unemployment, and corruption.

Hudson warned not to concentrate on the process, as it can distract from the reality. As in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the saying is "all process, no peace." Hudson also stressed the need to keep an eye on who is proposing the constitutions. In Egypt, elections were held first, but in Tunisia, there is a constitutional assembly that is effectively governing. It is also important to remember that not all groups see democracy as the goal. What the goal is may vary, but it will likely include a national identity, a central authority, and political capability in some political system. Democracy may be the second or third choice of some of the groups, but if everyone loses a little, then democracy will be left as there will be "no better alternative." The problem is, in Egypt at least, one side thinks it can have it all, without having to lose a little. The "winners" have missed out on the question of civil society; as they are in charge, they are wondering why there needs to be a transition at all. The fight between elites and counter-elites is a serious problem.

Roundtable3: Moving Forward: Youth and their Interactions with Religious and Secular Parties

Participants: Larémont, Ayachi, Aleya-Sghaier, Abi-Mershed (Moderator)

Abi-Mershed gave some opening remarks, stating that North African youth are stuck in a pre-adult state, due to unemployment and other factors. He presented two framing questions for the discussion: Can there then be a political transition with the youth stuck as they are? Can the youth play any role beyond street protests?

Ayachi qualified the Arab Spring as a primarily peaceful youth movement - not anti-West, not anti-Israel, not pro-Islam, but largely non-ideological. The demands were for more transparency and less authority, as well as an acknowledgement of the youth. Now, what do the Islamists propose in return? More authority. At present, there is thus a clash of values with the young protesters calling for freedom and the Islamist responding with authority. The Islamists have also not made any consistent political or economic proposals and have no answer to the question of unemployment. They say they value justice, but there has been no reform of the judiciary in Tunisia, in Egypt, or elsewhere. Ayachi concluded by noting that where Islamists are in power, they keep the same government structure and refuse to reform.

Aleya-Sghaier argued that the Arab Spring uprisings were revolts, not revolutions – a revolution involves someone new coming to power. He then turned to the topic of youth in Tunisia. The youth made up the Tunisian revolution, but those in power today are older (of the 217 representatives, only 10 are youth). Some people even miss Ben Ali, because under him economic conditions were better. The Tunisian youth are now facing having to leave the country for work. This is a sign of the complete failure of those in power in Tunisia. However, they insist on staying in power despite their failures. In closing, Aleya-Sghaier lamented about the sad state of the revolution.

4. Q&A

Roundtable 1

-

Q: Can you comment on the military in Libya and Tunisia, or do those states have a lack of security services?

A: (Jebnoun) The Libyan uprising was not national, but a collection of local uprisings. Without the NATO no-fly zone, Gaddhafi would still be in power. There are something like 225 militias in Libya. The problem there is that there is no army, but thousands of colonels, leaders without units! We speak of the DDR process: demobilize, disarm, and reintegrate. This is what will have to happen in Libya, but what we have now are incompetent rebels who believe they liberated the country from Gaddhafi! In Tunisia, on the other hand, there is an army, but it is currently marginalized, as it is apolitical and professional.

(Addi) That is an asset in Tunisia, the apolitical army.

(Layachi) In contrast, in Algeria, the Army controls the state.

Q: (Michael Hudson) Is Egypt replicating the Algerian events of 1992, or will it perhaps follow the Turkish model?

A: (Addi) Unfortunately, Egypt is taking the same path. I foresee no democratic elections for the next 2-3 years, and it is still possible there will be an Islamist victory. In Egypt, you have the same groups, the army, urbanites, and Islamists.

(Layachi) There is less of a taste for violence in Egypt than there was in Algeria. Remember, in the FIS, we had "Afghans" (Jihadis returning from fighting the Soviets in Afghanistan) mobilized and ready to fight, but in Egypt there is a strong resistance to violence. The best case is Egypt looks at Algerian history, and says no. I agree it will take 2-3 years, but I foresee the Turkish model.

Q: (Ex-member, FIS) The Algerian army confiscated, didn't create, the state. It is a myth that the army was liberators. Is this a good thing or a bad thing?

A: (Addi) We could have an endless debate on the nature of the Algerian army; but in 1962 it was divided. In any case, the state was created by violence against the colonial power.

(Layachi) In Algeria, the problem is that we don't know where the buck stops. The Algerian army needs open leadership for people to know who decides what. In short, the Army needs institutionalization.

(Addi) In Egypt,, the intelligence services belong to the Army. In Algeria, the DRS is the most powerful and controls the rest of the military.

Roundtable 2

Q: Do you see fair elections or continued resistance in Egypt?

A: (Shahin) Egyptians have to sit down and talk. There is no other way. The only other option is violent confrontations and economic collapse. One side thinks that they're winning, but in order to move forward, they have to negotiate an inclusive, pluralistic system. Right now the military is "insisting to be on the wrong side of history."

Q: Will the military negotiate with the Muslim Brotherhood? Are the Brotherhood ready to make concessions?

A: (Shahin) Well, Egyptian media sees it the other way around. The Muslim Brotherhood is making concessions! The Brotherhood is willing to negotiate, but at what price? Their money has been confiscated, their leadership has been jailed, and they have been banned as a party. So you see the position from which they have to negotiate.

Roundtable 3

Q: (Ex-member, FIS) You must not stereotype Islamists!

A: (Larémont) We are not trying to define any group, but look at the ideological fracturing of society. There has been a decline in support for Islamist groups. That is not to say there is no support for Islamists, they still do have some significant support, but it is not unanimous. Finally, "there is no way forward from chaos other than compromise." All groups need to realize that they have to work together.

Q: Are there any other ways of speaking of "the youth?" Is it possible to see the youth as stakeholders rather than just a demographic group?

A: (Aleya-Sghaier) In response to the first question, the Islamists in Tunisia took power through elections, but out of a population of 8 million, there were only 1 million votes, so you cannot say they have overwhelming support. In response to the second question, it doesn't matter how old someone is; it's not people between 18 and 35, it's people who are out campaigning for transparency and a better future.

5. Observations

When the roundtable began, there were around 35 participants; latecomers increased the number to around 50. Due to the length of the event, the number had dwindled to around 20 by the end. There was a rough mixture of half students and academia and half community members and professionals. The event was quite disjointed. Several of the participants appeared unaware of the event's format; a roundtable is generally intended for unprepared discussion, whereas certain participants gave extensive prepared remarks. This necessitated restructuring on the part of the moderators, with later speakers' time cut short to provide time for Q&A. The Q&A was similarly unruly; individuals did not announce themselves, and certain among them acted as though they were participating in the roundtable.

The discussions were interesting, but several strayed from their purported topics. Speakers tended to analyze events from their country of expertise, making conversation difficult. Understandably, there was no mention of Morocco. The analysis of Algeria was very thorough, and one of the few points of fruitful discussion among panelists.

\(Back to top\)

Advancing the New US-Morocco Strategic Partnership

Date: November 21, 2013

1. Title: "Advancing the New US-Morocco Strategic Partnership"

Hosted by the Atlantic Council Africa Center

Participants:

Fred Kempe: President and CEO, Atlantic Council

Stuart Eizenstat: Executive Committee Member, Atlantic Council

Salaheddine Mezouar: Minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, Morocco

Nizar Baraka: President of CESE, Morocco

Miriam Bensalah Chaqroun: President, General Federation of Moroccan Enterprises

Mohamed Salah Tamek: Chief of Staff, Minister of the Interior, Morocco

Ahmed Abbadi: Secretary General, Muhammadan League of Scholars

Assiah Bensalah Alaoui: Ambassador at Large, Morocco Peter Pham: Moderator: Director, Africa Center, Atlantic Council

2. Overview

This event was held in the context of King Mohammed VI's meeting with President Obama. The discussion largely focused on specific Moroccan attributes and activities that make that country a beneficial partner to the United States, along with a positive outlook for the ongoing Strategic Dialogue. Eizenstat praised Morocco for its commitment to being a good partner, while Minister Mezouar noted the steps that need to be taken for Morocco to ensure stability in North Africa. The question and answer session was brief and reflected the positive tone of the speakers.

3. Summary

Dr. Peter Pham opened with a description of the Africa Center's aims, notably informing decision makers of Africa's strategic importance. He welcomed Foreign Minister Mezouar and the delegation and complimented Morocco's management of regional security and development challenges. He ceded the floor to Fred Kempe.

Fred Kempe re-emphasized the Atlantic Council's mission, saying that it is more important now than ever, due to the increased pace of political change, to expand the Atlantic group and for the US to understand the strategic importance of Morocco. He hoped the King's visit would be held in the spirit of intelligent collaboration. Kempe noted that The Africa Center has always had a link to Morocco, because it is "a unique place between Europe, America, and Africa." He then introduced Eizenstat, who launched the US-North Africa Economic Partnership, also known as the Eizenstat Initiative.

Stuart Eizenstat underscored the exceptional nature of the King's visit, and expressed his personal commitment to Morocco and developing economic connections with that country, including his work with Ambassador Gabriel. While frequently "the Maghreb falls between the political cracks," Eizenstat believes the US-Morocco relationship is now more important than ever due to tensions in the Middle East. Eizenstat recounted the shared values between the US and Morocco, including diversity and religious tolerance, and the willingness to work on societal problems. He praised Morocco's commitment to improving growth and expanding democracy, as well as supporting human rights. Eizenstat called Morocco an isle of stability in the arc of instability that actively works to promote a better world. He listed many US companies with ties to Morocco as an example of Morocco's outward reaching policy to "reinforce peace, stability, and shared growth."

He then gave a partial list of reforms, including the new Constitution, free and fair elections, the creation of the CNDH, education and employment initiatives, and the protection of women's rights. He noted that Morocco is one of the largest recipients of an MCC grant. He cited the Southern Provinces Development report as a sign that Morocco is a willing partner for reform. He closed with a list of strategic areas that would benefit from US-Morocco cooperation, including the need to tackle AQIM, monitor Iran, end the Syrian conflict, promote rule of law in the Maghreb, including an end to closed borders and unproductive divisions, support the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, and bolster regional stability. As for the US, Eizenstat expressed his hope to see increased economic exchange in the context of the Free Trade Agreement. Eizenstat noted that the shared values and common purpose of the US and Morocco will help to confront these aforementioned strategic challenges.

Minister Mezouar thanked the council for their welcome and their objective, sincere descriptions of Morocco, which he believes reflect Morocco's choice to make an open, democratic state in a changing world. He described Morocco as a country with clear leadership that guarantees stability, as well as a country of institutions working to reinforce liberties. In his analysis, Morocco weathered the Arab Spring through turning to development, reform, and openness, in addition to the intelligence and mutual respect of the Moroccan people. He then turned to analyzing Islam and democracy, stating that in Morocco, "a party ran, it came first in the elections, and it now rules." Minister Mezouar said that Moroccan Islam in particular values moderation and balance, and is therefore compatible with democracy, and that the Moroccan example proves it is possible to have democracy and religious belief.

Minister Mezouar next addressed the Morocco-US relationship, stating that those two countries have shared convictions, interests, and strategic visions. In his opinion, the Strategic Dialogue is a means for the countries to improve their relationship. On a personal note, Minister Mezouar said that this was his first official visit to the United States, and it made him realize just how sincere the relationship between the countries is. He underscored that United States judges countries based on their actions, and Morocco is a country that acts. Minister Mezouar said that "when His Majesty makes an engagement, he respects it. When Morocco decides to do something, it does it."

Minister Mezouar continued with the topic security and Morocco's foreign policy. He discussed Libya, as stabilizing that country is of interest to the United States as well as Morocco, recounted Morocco's promotion of dialogue to resolve the Syrian Civil War and support of Russo-American diplomacy in Syria; and mentioned Morocco's efforts to stabilize the Sahel, specifically in Mali. He summed up Morocco's worldview as a country that "acts where it is necessary, in Africa and the Middle East, to help friends and overcome challenges. Morocco has the goal of being a strong regional actor that values democratic values. We want to share this effort for stability and development in Africa with the US." Minister Mezouar then summarized a list of means Morocco uses to achieve these ends, including human development, foreign investment, and economic support, in addition to security. Minister Mezouar closed by saying that he was certain the meeting between King Mohammed and President Obama would confirm all these things, and that Strategic Dialogue is the way forward. Minister Mezouar then introduced the other members of the delegation.

Nizar Baraka spoke on the economic relationship between Morocco and the US. He noted that while Morocco-US trade has doubled over the past 10 years, it only represents 10% of Moroccan trade, adding that US investments in Morocco were only 5% of the total. Looking forward, Baraka said that Morocco is positioned to be an industrial exporter and is a favorable environment for investment. He cited an IMF figure that expects 5% growth over the next year, which would be highest in the MENA region. Baraka mentioned the potential for green energy in Morocco, including the Ouarzazate solar plant, and that Morocco aims to cover half of its energy needs domestically with renewables by 2020. He then echoed Minister Mezouar's comments on how Morocco stabilizes neighboring countries, citing the fact that Morocco is the top African investor in Central and West Africa. Baraka closed by saying that Morocco is strategically positioned as a bridge between the United States and African and MENA countries.

Miriem Bensalah Chaqroun, discussed business development in Morocco. After expressing her optimism for the King's meeting with Obama, Chaqroun gave a few examples of the delegation's private sector activity, including signing an MOU with the US Chamber of Congress and planning to host two meetings in Morocco for the American business community. She praised the speed of developing business relationships between US and Morocco. She also described the successes of Moroccan entrepreneurship, especially in Africa. Maroc Telecom, for example, is doing very well. In terms of Foreign Direct Investment in Africa, Morocco is second only to South Africa. Chaqroun said that the reasons for Morocco's business success are not only that the country has good infrastructure and everything necessary to do business, but also that Morocco is always improving, in business, democracy, human rights, and security.

Dr. Mohamed Salah Tamek began by thanking Kempe and Minister Mezouar for their speeches, and not leaving him anything to say, except to praise Morocco for its ability to convert intellectuals into security people. Dr. Tamek went in to more depth explaining the commonalities between Moroccan and American objectives, saying that they are made up of three components: promoting democratic change, providing economic opportunity, and ensuring regional security. Looking forward, the broader goal is enhancing the chance that moderates will shape the future of the region rather than extremists. There is also a common set of values between the US and Morocco, including respect for rule of law, peaceful inclusivity, protecting fundamental rights, a focus on building democratic institutions, and vibrant civil society.

Dr. Tamek then listed some current challenges in North Africa, including the Northern Malian insurgency, the persistence of terrorist threats, AQIM terrorist networks operating across the Sahel, and the emergence of al-Mourabitoun. In Dr. Tamek's analysis, Belmokhtar is trying to create a new Islamic state from Morocco to Egypt. Boko Haram is also a significant threat, trained and guided by AQIM. Another is Al-Shabab in Somalia. The possibility that geographically distant, yet ideologically similar groups could create a network of mutual support is a real threat. Dr. Tamek echoed Minister Mezouar's position on Syria, recalling that Morocco hosted a Friends of Syria meeting and can play a role in resolving that crisis. He also recounted that when Eric Holder was in Morocco a few weeks earlier, they discussed training and tracking programs to confront international jihadists. He closed by saying that Eizenstat's recommendations are good ones to take.

Ahmed Abbadi noted that certain political analysts believed the primary focus of international relations was to shift from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but the fact remains that the DNA for solutions to current problems lays in the Atlantic region. Abbadi again made reference to Morocco's unique geographic position as the door to the Middle East, Europe, and Africa. He said that the reason Morocco is so open was the choice of following the Maliki rite 1200 years ago, as well as the fact that Moroccan Sufism is practiced throughout Africa, which gives Morocco and other African countries the opportunity to work together to counteract extremism. Abbadi urged Morocco and the US to cooperate on education, since culture is the content to give alternatives to hate.

Assiah Bensalah Alaoui who introduced herself as Ambassador at Large for the Kingdom of Morocco. She expressed her belief that the King is anxious to offer a better future not only to Moroccans, but also to Africa and beyond. She agreed with Minister Mezouar in stating that Morocco is the perfect partner for the US in addressing security in North Africa. Alaoui recognized that the road to realizing the reform goals set out in the 2011 Constitution would be a long one. Looking forward, she said that in addition to being a historical ally of the United States, Morocco can be the loyal partner to developing the future of the region. Morocco will succeed thanks to its vibrant civil society, determined women, and determined, loyal youth who recognize the power of Moroccan leadership. She highlighted that Morocco is a valuable partner at this point in time, with the ambition to go beyond bilateral relations, as presently European and US influence are declining in Africa, with China is rising. Economically and politically, Morocco is "punching above its weight" and has the potential to help mend the transatlantic relationship.

4. Q&A

Q: (Gen. William Ward, former head of AFRICOM) It's easy for me to understand why the US and Morocco have been great partners. Could you offer some prescription for Morocco to achieve regional successes? We know the US cannot do it all, but with partners, those goals are achievable. How does Morocco see its role in the region for accomplishing the goals you laid out?

A: (Dr. Tamek) You are right to raise the point of cooperation, things the US cannot do alone, and these are things we have been working on since the last meeting of the Strategic Dialogue. The Moroccan approach is multifaceted. Other methods of dealing with terrorism include economic development, education in the Maliki rite, developing education, human development, rights for minorities and women, and including people of all faiths. You cannot face these things in binaries between good and evil, this is what we are telling our friends in Mali, so that this region will not be a bastion for terrorism, but might be a bastion for peace. (Minister Mezouar) To give concrete examples on Morocco's approach, I'll take up Mali. In Mali, there is a problem called the North. Morocco naturally has good relations with the democratically elected government, the president, but also with the movement in the North. Morocco is working to maintain dialogue between the two groups. It is fundamental to preserve the dialogue to preserve national unity. Morocco is also working in the humanitarian sector because the conflict touches the average Malian. Morocco is also working in the spiritual sector, bringing 500 Malian imams to Morocco for religious instruction. Morocco transfers its expertise in human development. Morocco also has agricultural expertise it is sharing with Mali. Morocco gives its competence and aids cultural development, both for traditional and modern cultures. I give these examples to say it is possible, and that the problems Mali is facing are common: how to transform society? How to help immigration? How to implement strategic development? How to reassure security? Many countries have resources and expertise, but the reality and results are not ideal. What is needed is an approach tailored to the specificities of Africa. For example, most commerce is conducted in traditional markets. If we want to reassure, stabilize, and make an inclusive dialogue, we have to include the population - to work with the population is the only guarantee of stabilization. Because there are those who exploit misery and transform it into a threat. Securing the country is important and urgent. Morocco is training the security workers in Libya, but this approach is of a different dimension. What is necessary is to approach the reality of the people and reassure the population with community engagement.

Q: (Charles Dahan, VP World Federation of Moroccan Jews) We should work on the exchange of education between the US and Morocco. It is important we have a transmission of knowledge between the US and Morocco to advance higher education. That will transform the economy. Investment, building new factories, and creating jobs in Morocco will be essential, and in order to build good investment, you have to build a good knowledge base.

A: (Minister Mezouar) I agree. In the field of training, Morocco has something like 10,000 places for training, in universities and schools, of which 7,000 are funded by the Moroccan government. There is also professional development and administration training, like customs, finance. Each sector participates in training in its own program. This is equally supported by the Moroccan private sector. This is a fundamental dimension, and as noted in many countries, those that have adopted Morocco's path are in what is called "the economic emergence." And since we have gone through this experience we can put in place a strategy to identify needs in competencies. So we oriented training to the needs of the market of today and the market of tomorrow. So we provide our expertise to obtain concrete results. But Africa has changed. It has exceptional elites at every level. It has great competence, affirmed by private sector success. But there is a new generation, economic and political, and stereotypes have closed the world's eyes to this transformation or development. One must have confidence in Africa and Africans that we will put in place good mechanisms, because success must come from within, it cannot be imposed from without. We must let society produce the elements of development.

5. Observations

This event was attended by approximate 90 foreign policy professionals and members of both the American and Moroccan media, who conducted interviews in the hallway before and after the event. It was one of the major events of the delegation, which took on a tone of celebrating the past and future of the US-Morocco relationship. Given the namesake of the host think-tank, the speakers aimed to bring about more awareness of Morocco as a keystone of the transatlantic relationship. Speakers lauded the leadership in Morocco that has led to a serious commitment to reform and to improving security and human development across the region and the continent. The question and answer session was brief (two questions) and reflected the positive tone of the speakers.

Video of the event is available here.

\(Back to top\)

A Strategy for American Engagement in the Middle East with Rep. Adam Smith

Date: December 5, 2013

1. Title: A Strategy for American Engagement in the Middle East with Rep. Adam Smith

Hosted by NDN

Participants:

Rep. Adam Smith: Ranking Member of the House Armed Services Committee

Simon Rosenberg: Moderator: President & Founder, NDN

2. Overview

This event invited a leading voice on US foreign policy in Congress to discuss the future of US policy in the Middle East and North Africa (MENA). Rep. Smith serves on the House Armed Services Committee and is very well versed in foreign affairs, security, and the MENA region. He spoke on current affairs such as Syria and Egypt, as well as more broadly on how the US could improve its prospects for policy outcomes in the region. There were several questions asked and answered before the Congressman had to leave.

3. Summary

After a brief introduction of the guest of honor, Rep. Smith began detailing priorities for US policy in the Middle East and North Africa (MENA). Dealing with the “youth bulge” and the economics of creating employment and upward mobility are paramount for US goals in the region, he said. There is equal threat and promise inherent in a young population. He added that the US needs to work with companies to encourage Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) to create economic opportunity. Rep. Smith concluded that policymakers lose sight of that a bit when the focus is fixated on politics and security. Despite some assertions that poverty doesn’t lead to extremism, Rep. Smith stated that he believes strongly in this connection, and that it should be a priority for foreign policy.

It has been suggested that growing pessimism amongst policymakers and the American public regarding foreign policy outcomes will result in a significant de-emphasis of the MENA region in US policy. Rep. Smith stated that the US must continue to be engaged, but that expectations must be tempered with the knowledge that a limited role will be most effective. No country can magically fix another country with a policy, he said. In addition, there is a persistent mistrust of the US in the region. Policymakers should thus be realistic, though optimistic, about expected outcomes.

Most of all, US policy needs more clarity. Focusing on economic opportunity, political freedom, stability, and discouraging extremism, the US needs to be honest and open about its balance of principles and priorities in the region – much more so than it has, Rep. Smith said. “We need to help our friends in the region more than we have.” He added that the US cannot afford to neglect MENA nor be unclear as to what our policies are.

4. Q&A

Q: What are your short-term concerns with current US policy?

A: The manner in which we interact with our allies in the region, characterized by a lack of clarity, concerns me most. There isn’t really any “perfect way” to handle foreign policy, and in the case of Syria’s chemical weapons, the US “stumbled into an okay place.” There is still much room for improvement.

Q: (Ed Kutler, Managing Director at Mercury) Is withholding military aid an effective policy tool?

A: Military aid is a good way to build and maintain relationships between countries, but what recourses are available when countries don’t meet policy standards? Policymakers need to be aware of multiple priorities and the unlikelihood of direct outcomes from such actions.

Q: (Nelson Cunningham, Chair of the Latin America Policy Initiative at NDN) Is there a possibility of shifting priorities from military aid to economic aid with regard to US aid to Egypt?

A: US emphasis here has been generally unbalanced in that regard. Much of the aid ends up going towards the purchase of American weaponry, resulting in a credible industrial consideration that can’t be ignored.

Q: Could you please address obstructionism in Congress against certain foreign policy goals, notably the threat of new sanctions against Iran?

A: The case for aid needs to be made better, especially in Congress. There is also an ideological dimension at play, given that investment at home has continued to decrease as well. Increasing sanctions against Iran would be a huge mistake, despite my personal belief that Iran will never be a good actor on the international scene.

Q: Does US aid have any real impact?

A: Credibility is paramount to foreign policy and aid and help during crisis does actually play a role in increasing that credibility.

5. Observation

This event was attended by approximately 30 foreign policy professionals. NDN is looking to raise the profile of its relatively new MENA initiative, using political connections to bring in policymakers and help shape the conversation. Questions seemed to reflect similar ideologies for improving US policy as those of Rep. Smith. The event was also open to the press and streamed online on the NDN website.

\(Back to top\)

Fall 2013 Events Bulletin

September 16

Egypt's Impact on Maghreb Political Dynamics

September 27

Roundtable on Morocco after the Arab Uprisings: Evolution rather than Revolution

October 1

Roundtable on the Cultural Heritage of Morocco

October 10

Why Moroccan Protests Failed

October 11

Morocco's New Geo-Economics

October 22

Morocco's Role in Regional Security and Development

October 25

Morocco's Strategic Engagement in Africa

November 6

Resolving Regional Conflicts: The Western Sahara and the Quest for a Durable Solution

November 20

Charting Morocco's Reform Strategy

November 21

Revolution and Political Transitions in North Africa

November 21

Advancing the New US-Morocco Strategic Partnership

December 5

A Strategy for American Engagement in the Middle East with Rep. Adam Smith

.....

Egypt's Impact on Maghreb Political Dynamics

Date: September 16, 2013

1. Title: "Egypt's Impact on Maghreb Political Dynamics"

Hosted by CSIS Middle East Program

Participants:

Ellen Lust: Associate Professor of Political Science, Yale

William Lawrence: former Director, North Africa Project, International Crisis Group

Opening Remarks:

Jon Alterman: Director, CSIS Middle East Program

Moderator:

Haim Malka: Deputy Director and Senior Fellow, CSIS Middle East Program

2. Overview

As part of the Middle East program's coverage of the Arab Spring, this event brought together a political scientist, Lust, and a North Africa expert, Lawrence, to examine the question of how the people of North Africa interpret the events of the past year in Egypt. This question was the starting point for the examination of the national characters of the Maghreb countries and their people, including what they do and do not want in government and also their own identities.

3. Summary

Alterman was brief in his introductions, and set out the topic question very straightforwardly: how do people in North Africa interpret what is happening in Egypt?

Lust focused exclusively on Libya and Tunisia, and then laid out the argument that whether transition is seen optimistically or pessimistically depends on whether the observer has had positive or negative examples of consequences of change in the past. Her reasoning in using Libya and Tunisia was that the two countries are at the same point in their transitions, which have followed a process of initial euphoria, followed by political bickering, and now general frustration. The difference between the two countries is that while Tunisians are primarily divided in their opinions of the relationship between religion and the state, Libyans are divided by regionalism. Another difference is one of relative strength. In Libya, because no one group of actors has an overwhelming majority, they make up for this shortcoming through the use of arms. This, combined with a lack of institutional authority, leads to the inability of any one group to act unilaterally, as was the case in Egypt. In Tunisia, the Assembly has stayed in session, but has been unable to provide services for the people, leading radicals to fill gaps left by the state. In both countries, a key lesson from Egypt is for actors to stop and take stock of the situation and act deliberately, rather than pressing ahead recklessly, as the Egyptians did.

Lawrence prefaced his extensive remarks by pointing out that there is a disconnect between how Egyptians see Egypt and how the rest of MENA does. Egypt is generally seen through the filter of Islamism: if observers have negative feelings about Islamism, then they have a nuanced position; if positive, then they are more pro-Morsi. Lawrence also pointed out that analysts of the Arab Spring are often too focused on the revolutionary aspect, and not enough on its effect of attempting to overcome old dichotomies, such as religious/secular, socialist/capitalist, etc. Another frequent misinterpretation is that the most recent Egyptian revolution was primarily in opposition to Morsi, while it was in truth more economically motivated.

Lawrence argued that Tunisia is closest to Egypt, but that there are important differences between the former's Constitutional Democratic Rally and the latter's National Democratic Party. He also believes that the Tunisian constitutional experiment is potentially most threatened by events in Egypt. Like in Egypt, the ruling party, Ennahda, has aligned itself with Salafists. However, Tunisia still has the potential for the best outcome.

Lawrence discussed Algeria, but only briefly. He mentioned that in Algeria, any discussions of transition are filtered through past conflicts with Islamism. He estimated that Morocco is more similar to Egypt than Algeria, but not as similar as Tunisia. His evidence for this is twofold. Firstly, the PJD has experience ruling through coalition. Secondly, a powerful elite keep the economy under control, in Egypt the military, in Morocco the Makhzen. This arrangement is "keeping things on track in Morocco." The Makhzen used the PJD to survive the Arab Spring, and so Morocco has remained relatively stable. There are however rumors that reforms were enacted too quickly, and that perhaps too much was ceded to the people.

Finally, in Libya's case, the federalists and secularists are emboldened by events in Egypt. Libyans are highly secular, votes for Islamist parties are consistently low, and the salafists are out of the political arena, hence their use of arms. In summary, one thing most groups have in common is a desire to avoid what is happening in Egypt presently.

4. Q & A

Malka asked about the nature of centrist and reformist movements in the region. Lawrence responded that in Morocco cleavages tend to be generational, with al Adl wal Ihssane coming out to support the 20th February Movement, but not participate in it. As in the other Arab Spring countries, he sees this as an example of the youth believing that they can build a better future. Lust believes that while there is a public demand for centrist movements, political parties are increasingly polarizing, and thereby not making grassroots gains. Lawrence agreed and said that this is why there is a disconnect between the youth and organized parties.

Q: (David Mack, Middle East Institute) To what extent do Islamist and secular elites in the Maghreb look to Turkey in the past two decades or Egypt in the past 2 years?

A: (Lawrence) The Erdogan model is dying. The countries are looking for other models. (Lust) Tunisia had been pro Erdogan, but less so now that he has become more authoritarian.

Q: (Zack Gold, Brookings Institution) To what extent are jihadi or salafist calls to be active in Egypt influencing North Africa?

A: (Lawrence) What do you mean by salafists? The scientific salafists are growing, but the political salafists are not making any gains, and then there are the jihadi salafists. There's also a blurring between what jihadi means in the US and what it means in North Africa. Our categories block us from understanding. They are useful only as ideal types. And jihadis are often jihadis more due to their personal lives than to politics; they have bad breakups with their girlfriends and then go fight in Syria.

Q: (Dan Sisnoi, Tel Aviv University) You mentioned how Nahda the party is involved in the transition. What about the voters?

A: (Lawrence) Well, like in Algeria in 1991, you vote for the group you fear less. There were young, idealistic supporters, beautiful young people who wanted to un-corrupt Tunisia. 1.5 million people voted for Nahda, 1/3 of the total votes. Some voted for them because they had family reasons, some because they thought it was the least corrupt party, but Nahda's popularity has decreased by half.

(Lust) Even in comparison to its supporters, to the general public, Nahda is more for a close relationship between religion and the state than the public. The public wanted to make sure the revolution succeeded, and thought that Nahda could stop any backsliding.

Q: (Ricky Goldstein, HRW) Can Tunisia have an impact on Egypt? Are there any lessons from Tunisia in 2011 that Egyptians could learn from?

A: (Lawrence) I wrote an article on lessons from Algeria that apply to Egypt. Now Egyptians are the last to admit that they want to learn, and they are not amenable at all to learning from Tunisia. Egyptians are proud that they had a revolution, but unhappy that they came in second. But there are lessons, constitutional debates, judicial and secular reform, and so on.

(Lust) I want to note that I believe the beginning of the Egyptian coup was in June, when Parliament was disbanded. But as for lessons from Tunisia, start with the Assembly, and don't rush reforms.

5. Observations

Around 50 people were in attendance, roughly 2/3 professionals and 1/3 students or interns. While there were disagreements on interpretation, the tone of the roundtable was cordial and informative. Lawrence in particular offered a noticeably unbiased account of events, supporting his statements with either polling data or repeating directly what he had heard from informants in the region. The event was light on Morocco-specific information, but as an analysis of the Maghreb not focused entirely on Egypt, the event covered many lesser-known and unexplored aspects of the Arab Spring.

\(Back to top\)

Roundtable on Morocco after the Arab Uprisings: Evolution rather than Revolution

Date: September 27, 2013

1. Title: "Roundtable on Morocco after the Arab Uprisings: Evolution rather than Revolution"

Hosted by the Fund for Peace

Participants:

Professor Ricardo René Larémont: Professor of Political Science, Binghamton State University of New York

J.J. Messner: Moderator: Senior Associate, the Fund for Peace

2. Overview

This event, the first in a series on the strategic value of Morocco-US relations in key sectors to include recommendations for US policy actions to support Morocco, began with a review of the draft paper on the topic presented by Professor Larémont and was then open to general discussion. The goal of the series is to encourage a number of topical papers in advance of the King's visit to build interest in the Morocco-US relationship and existing and potential benefits of greater bilateral cooperation.

3. Summary

As an academic and an analyst, Larémont is most comfortable in presenting a historical and comparative framework for viewing the transitions ongoing in the Arab world. When addressing this topic, he looked for common threads among countries in transition. He was quite complimentary of how King Mohammed VI, in his ability to understand the needs of the Moroccan people, responded so quickly to the initial demonstrations, continuing a process that he began early in his reign. The central core of his argument was that monarchies with religious legitimacy have more "symbolic capital" over time than republican regimes, which eventually lose support because they do not respond effectively to rising expectations.

In comparing Morocco and Spain, Larémont noted the importance of an alliance between a progressive monarch and liberal elites who support reforms. He believes that the US foreign policy is experiencing dissonance because of the push back from Iraq and Afghanistan, where good intentions did not make effective policy. Larémont also noted, based on youth surveys he has done in Morocco, that there is great confidence in the King among young people, but very low expectations when it comes to the results of reforms as a result of political parties.

4. Q & A

Haim Malka (CSIS), Karim Mezran (the Atlantic Council), Pauline Baker (Fund for Peace), Pilar Garcia Martinez (IMF), and others engaged in a discussion of why Morocco's path after the Arab uprisings is different than the rest of the MENA region. In addition to the King's role, they noted that opposition groups were quite different in Morocco than elsewhere in the region, which resulted in a reform agenda that was clearer and less confrontational than in other countries. Larémont added that there is more room for policy impact in places like Morocco, which could become a model for the rest of the region.

With regard to recommendations, participants discussed the need to promote investments across a broad range of sectors, and the need to expand education, especially for women. Reform of subsidies and banking reform was also mentioned along with creating a more proactive environment for start-ups and entrepreneurs. The group agreed that forging a better link between education and the labor market is a crucial next step to ensure continued progress in myriad areas.

Krista Hendry (Fund for Peace) added that an important factor for US involvement with reforms should be approaching Morocco on equal footing. She said that presenting a skill set, rather than offering recommendations, would go a long way towards better aid and program efficacy.

5. Observations

This event was attended by 22 foreign policy professionals. The paper was well-received and Fund for Peace will publish a final paper, without attribution, that has a strong section on recommendations for US actions in support of reform in Morocco.

Attendees:

Jean AbiNader: MAC

Dr. Pauline Baker: Board of Trustees, Fund for Peace

Lauren Berry: Kosmos Energy

David Bloom: MAC
Asibi Danjuma: Fund for Peace
Calvin Dark: BLJ Worldwide
Fred Enochs: TD International
Pilar Garcia Martinez: IMF
Krista Hendry: Fund for Peace
Amal Kandeel: Pioneers International
Francoise Kirby: Management Systems International
Dylan Maguire: International Republican Institute
Maren Maland: Chemonics
Haim Malka: CSIS Middle East Program
Leila Mooney: Partners for Democratic Change
Ralph Nurnberger: Georgetown University
Adrienne Ross: Strategic Communications Advisor
Fatima Taki: AFRICOM
Lara Talverdian: Atlantic Council
Meredith Wilson: Kosmos Energy

\(Back to top\)

Roundtable on the Cultural Heritage of Morocco

Date: October 1, 2013

1. Title: Roundtable on the Cultural Heritage of Morocco

Hosted by the Georgetown Center for Contemporary Arab Studies

Participants:

Dr. Kenneth Honerkamp: Professor of Arabic, Islamic texts, Shar'iah (Islamic Law), North African Sufism. University of Georgia

Dr. Paul Heck: Discussant: Associate Professor, Georgetown University

Rev. Michael Calabria: Discussant: Georgetown University

2. Overview

This event, the second in a series on the strategic value of Morocco-US relations to include recommendations for US policy actions to support Morocco, began with a review of the draft paper on the topic presented by Dr. Honerkamp. Dr. Heck and Rev. Calabria also provided input before a general discussion with attendees. The goal of the series is to encourage a number of topical papers in advance of the King's visit to build interest in the Morocco-US relationship and existing and potential benefits of greater bilateral cooperation.

3. Summary

Dr. Honerkamp drew from his extensive experience in Morocco to explain the historical roots of Morocco's famed cultural and religious moderation based on an embrace of diversity. Described in the discussion draft as a pragmatic yet spiritual path throughout 1400 years of Moroccan history, what began as scholarly and religious work resonated and became engrained in the culture.

The key tenants of the Moroccan values of moderation are largely inspired by the al-Murshid al mu'in text on Imām Mālik, the theological doctrine of Imām al-Ash'arī, and the Sufism of Imām al-Junayd. Describing the effect of these influences, Dr. Honerkamp shared his experience of feeling 'at home in a strange land'; a unique and visceral sentiment of Morocco that he believes is a common and historical one. Importantly, Dr. Honerkamp reminded the group that although these three sources are a dominant force in Moroccan culture, they have never taken on the role of attempting to define the function and means of government. The emphasis on its Islamic identity is not something expedient but a function of Morocco's cultural heritage. Similarly, the King's great attention to this facet of Morocco's heritage is institutional, and the respect for the King is for that institution, not a personality cult.

Dr. Honerkamp also discussed Morocco's role in spreading this particular evolution of Islam. He highlighted the King's recent speech in Mali and the kinship amongst moderates that was evident. Beyond being an epicenter of learning, Morocco has recently begun to counter the Saudi influence by printing Quran texts and distributing them across the country. More could be done, he suggested, in expanding that distribution across the Islamic world.

Dr. Heck began his intervention by looking at the prominent role Morocco should play in the future. Morocco, and the form of Islam that it takes, will have a lot to say towards international harmony, he said. He described it as a feeling of nostalgia for diverse harmony in Morocco, which required a true experience of shared knowledge of the other. Reverend Calabria agreed, stating that Morocco can teach hospitality as well as its particular brand of Islam. Dr. Heck also agreed with Dr. Honerkamp that many Moroccans are very unsettled by a religiosity defined by the state, and that this goes beyond simply tolerance. On the other hand, Dr. Heck emphasized the enormous obstacles presented by a growing skepticism and resentment.

Dr. Heck emphasized that the US is a good and capable partner, but also that it should approach programs with Morocco in a different way. The US is very strong on the knowledge part, he said, but the intertwining of Security Studies and Islam is not an open and welcoming approach. Not all American involvement should have a security twist. Dr. Heck also lauded cultural, educational, and religious exchanges between the US and Morocco. It's not scholarly tourism, he said, it's deeper. This echoed the comments of Dr. Honerkamp.

4. Q & A

Richard McKee (State Department, Ret.) began the discussion by asking why Shiism has gained traction amongst young people. Dr. Honerkamp mentioned the financial backing of Iran as one factor, the other being that for disaffected people it is the 'next step' from Salafism. Daoud Casewit added that Salafism and Shiism are magnets for opposition and being beyond the cultural norms gives its adherents a political edge by being a touch traitorous.

Fulbright Administrator asked if there is a rural/urban difference in perceptions of Islamic identity, in Dr. Honerkamp's comparison of Pakistan and Morocco. Dr. Honerkamp replied that it does exist to some extent, but not enough to consider the moderate nature of Moroccan culture a city-based phenomenon.

With regard to recommendations, participants discussed the need to continue promoting cultural, religious, and educational exchanges, and Morocco's efforts to be a center of religion and learning. The group agreed that there is no shortage of good ideas to doing so, but that funding is too limited to support many endeavors. Although some signs are encouraging, more must be done to quickly stem the tide of resentment and anger amongst the youth.

5. Observations

This event was attended by 24 foreign policy professionals and academics. The paper was well-received and the Georgetown Center for Contemporary Arab Studies will publish a final paper, without attribution, that has a strong section on recommendations for US actions in support of Morocco's role as a cultural and religious leader in the Arab and Islamic world.

\(Back to top\)

Why Moroccan Protests Failed: A Panel Discussion

Date: October 10, 2013

1. Title: "Why Moroccan Protests Failed: A Panel Discussion"

Hosted by The Project on Middle East Political Science at the Elliott School of International Affairs, The George Washington University

Participants:

Aboubakr Jamaï: Richard von Weizsacker Fellow, Bosch Foundation; Editor, French version of Lakome.com

Ahmed Benchemsi: Visiting Scholar, Program on Arab Reform and Democracy at the Center on Democracy, Development, and the Rule of Law, Stanford University; Founder, freearabs.com

Adria Lawrence: Assistant Professor of Political Science, Yale University

Marc Lynch: Moderator: Assistant Professor of Political Science, The George Washington University

2. Overview

This event analyzed the singularity of Morocco's lack of revolution and eventual reforms in response to Arab Spring protests. The speakers raised many important points of analysis about internal politics of Morocco and how they influenced the results of the February 20 movement in the country. Given his association with Lakome.com, Jamaï was often acerbic in his comments, while Benchemsi offered a more moderate perspective. Dr. Lawrence discussed the results of her studies into individuals in the protest movement.

3. Summary

Aboubakr Jamaï began his opening remarks questioning the definitiveness of the event's title, suggesting that Moroccan protests could yet result in more political change. He elaborated by reminding the audience that the protests in Morocco initially asked solely for reform, while later calls for the removal of King Mohammed VI were superficial. In response, Jamaï explained, the King "scolded" the February 20th Movement, which played a central role in the protests. However, on March 9, the King shifted course and delivered a "Thomas Jefferson like speech" essentially promising reform and a transition to democracy. Jamaï added that the speech only tempered the protests momentarily because on March 20, 2011 the largest number of protesters to date took to the streets demanding reform. Jamaï suggested a major reason the protests "did fail" was due to the "learning curve" of the regime from the Tunisian and Egyptian examples, whereby the Government of Morocco was better able to anticipate likely responses from protestors. However, he mentioned that the regime did use some violence against protestors, but was careful to stop short of lethal violence.

Jamai pointed out that the previous King, Hassan II, allowed minimal amounts of opposition activism, which was limited to various human rights organizations that served as an "outlet" to moderate society and provide the regime with "someone to negotiate with." He suggested that the current King Mohammed VI follows a similar strategy. Next, Jamai explained the importance of understanding the internal dynamics of the popular Islamist party, the Justice and Development Party (PJD). He explained how the Justice and Charity movement appeals to the same constituency as the PJD, though the Justice and Charity movement, he argued, does not support reform within the government and instead calls for waiting for the regime to collapse under its own corruption. The PJD, on the other hand, approved of the constitutional process and supported working with the King. Jamai suggested, as a non-pro-monarchy party, the PJD provided legitimacy to the King and moderated the protest movement. Jamai concluded by explaining that societal values (particularly Islamism versus secularism) and subsidy programs are the two issues of the Arab Spring in need of resolution.

Ahmed Benchemsi also opened his remarks questioning the title of the event. He noted that if the "cursor" was on removal of the King, than protests did fail, but he is not sure the cursor should be placed there. Benchemsi suggested that the King's March 9 speech "checked all the big democratic issues raised in the street," including a parliamentary monarchy, free press, and a new constitution. The Makhzen, he argued, manipulated the protestors by "bringing everyone to the table," which resulted in "too many recommendations to employ," leaving the Makhzen to select the issues to address. The youth, he suggested, prided themselves on being leaderless since leadership ends in either corruption or arrest. The problem, Benchemsi challenged, was the protestors had no direction or guidance. He also noted ironically that the protestors, who were asking for democratic reform, refused to establish internal voting because, they argued, it leads nowhere. Throughout, the PJD remained "one step behind" the protestors, cautious of fully embracing the movement for fear of losing support to the Justice and Charity movement. Benchemsi concluded by arguing that the regime "outfoxed" the protestors. The removal of the King failed according to Benchemsi, but he remained optimistic that the protests "planted a seed in society," which "may well prove a game changer," in the years to come.

Adria Lawrence began her remarks explaining that she conducted many interviews with core activists in the February 20th Movement. Initially, she focused on the micro level of the core protestors, suggesting most of them were previously involved in human rights organizations, children of activist parents, and children of victims of rights abuses by the state. On the macro level, Lawrence suggested that revolutionaries are almost always young, inexperienced, and prone to mistakes. Lawrence's research found that the monarchy was the difference for Morocco compared to other states like Egypt and Tunisia. Moroccans, she argued, value stability and democracy, and their unique situation in the region allowed for the possibility of reform without regime change. Authoritarian regimes "cannot democratize without becoming unstable," whereas a monarchy can reform "without losing the head of state," noted Lawrence. Therefore, she explained, the choice was between the French model (forming a Republic), which could lead to instability, or the British model (an evolving constitutional monarchy), with a stable transition more likely. Though not all protestors favored this model, the division further weakened the fragmented movement.

4. Q & A

Q: (Eric Goldstein, Human Rights Watch) Why did no one cast their lot with the 20 February Movement?

A: (Benchemsi) I disagree. Others did coalesce because they thought they could save the organization. The problem is the Support Council was unable to come up with a counteroffer and you can't engage in democracy without compromise.

Q: (Adina Friedman, George Mason University) Are the Jews and Berbers important to the movement?

A: (Jamai) It's important to note that it's the Ministry of Justice, not the ministry of freedom. But there is this idea that you cannot claim to be Moroccan without also claiming the Jewishness of the Moroccan identity. Hassan II had credibility on both sides [of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict]. What we have now is a declarative, non-substantial Constitution. The price for this is freedom of conscience in the Constitution. Now, the King is Commander of the Faithful, but to be that, he needs to have "faithfuls." Now how do Sunni Malikis see apostasy? As punishable by death. So they and other Islamists said no [to freedom of conscience in the Constitution].

(Benchemsi) There were lots of tactics used, notably lip service to minorities in order to preempt all demands, but use the groups for PR purposes.

Q: (Rachel, former Fulbright Scholar to Morocco) Did the protests leave any opening for women or socialists?

A: (Lawrence) Well, al Adl wa Ihsane is a mysterious organization, and it's unknown if that group is the most powerful opposition. It's important not to lose track of the PJD. Now, they're not clever, but there was certainly no paternalism on their part.

(Benchemsi) There was a case where a reporter was sued for calling Mohammed VI "my brother." He went to court, and offered the defense that Hassan II called himself the father of all Moroccans, so if Mohammed VI is also his son, then... The court reacted just like you did, and he was let off. The message here is that there are groups who are not saying, but thinking, "we know better," on questions of politics, the economy, and so on. We don't know exactly what the military thinks. As for al Adl wa Ihsane, they like to portray themselves as pious grandfathers.

(Jamai) Anouzla convinced me to return to journalism a few weeks before the Arab Spring. If I had any inkling of a doubt about the nastiness of this regime, it would have been gone with news of Anouzla's arrest. It is important to remember that Anouzla is Sahrawi as well. We need to come to terms with diverse Islamist parties; we need to open a debate. The problem there is that the radical left is enamored with French laïcité and aren't open to any questions of religion. What they should do is sit down and read some Locke, because there is a place for religion in a democracy.

5. Observations

This event was attended by about 35 people, approximately half being students. The conversation was largely negative, focusing on flaws in the protest movement and perceived stratagem on the part of the Moroccan government to mitigate reform. Speakers agreed that the existence of the monarchy is primarily responsible for Morocco's stability pre- and post-Arab Spring. They also agreed that there does not seem to be a widespread initiative to unseat the king; however, there is all-around disappointment with the governing bodies and the pace of reform.

The speakers raised many points of analysis about King Mohammed VI's relationship with the government and society. First, it was widely acknowledged that the existence of the monarchy is primarily reason for Morocco's stability. Second, there does not seem to be a widespread initiative to unseat the King; however, there is all-around disappointment with the governing bodies and with the fact that the King has not relinquished more executive powers to create a more open government that is able to address the demands of its citizens autonomously [i.e. Adria Lawrence's suggestion of the British model for the monarchy]. Lastly, Morocco's public image seems to follow the pattern of "one step forward, two steps back" when presented in international media and among scholars in these types of forums. For example, in 2013 positive and optimistic periods of reforms, such as the King's August 20th speech or his decision to regularize immigrants residency status, were followed by some indication of repressive human rights and civil liberties, the "Daniel-gate" protests and Ali Anouzla's arrest.

\(Back to top\)

Morocco's New Geo-Economics

Date: October 11, 2013

1. Title: Morocco's New Geo-Economics

Hosted by the German Marshall Fund of the United States

Participants:

Ian Lesser: Moderator: Executive Director, Transatlantic Center, GMFUS

Uri Dadush: Senior Associate, International Economics Program, The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

2. Overview

This event, the third in a series on the strategic value of Morocco-US relations in key sectors to include recommendations for US policy actions to support Morocco, began with a brief review of the topics presented in the draft paper which had been circulated in advance of the event. Dr. Lesser then passed the discussion to Dr. Dadush, who spoke about the latest economic indicators in Morocco and how they related to the discussion. The roundtable discussion was the bulk of the event, as the group was well-informed and able to address a range of issues and recommendations.

3. Summary

Dr. Dadush's analysis of Morocco was that many economic fundamentals remain strong – especially on relative terms in the MENA context. He described Morocco as one of the few reasonably diversified economies, featuring stability and strong connections with both Europe and the US. Morocco probably deserves more attention than it receives, he said, with strong growth, inflation under control, and continuous positive reforms giving more weight to the government.

The centerpiece of the event was the group discussion. Despite the encouraging signs, the group agreed, much more can and must be done to encourage growth in Morocco and take advantage of the free trade arrangement with the US. Adding to the stakes are Morocco's core economic dependence on exports and the unyielding pressure that unemployment puts on political stability.

The group questioned the emphasis that US officials and commentators should put into establishing a true economic union in the Maghreb. Though it remains the obvious choice for economic development – it was mentioned that it could result in an estimated 4% GDP growth for Morocco alone – and clearly deserving of continued support, many in the room agreed that true regional integration in North Africa is unlikely in this lifetime.

In terms of policy recommendations, the discussion indicated that more emphasis should be placed on fostering partnerships and knowledge-sharing by the private sector across the region. Several suggestions were made to give the private sector more tools to take advantage of the free trade apparatus. For example, there is presidential discretion to act without Congressional action, for example, providing technical assistance such as Department of Commerce programs, working with multilateral organizations such as The World Bank and IMF to provide technical assistance and funding for governance reforms, and initiate more economic diplomacy with the EU to support Morocco's transition to a stronger market economy.

Among other interesting recommendations was that more focus should be put on the US enabling Morocco to do more in Africa rather than promoting the Morocco-US economic relationship. To do this, the US should adopt a Japanese method of triangular aid to help Morocco expand trade into new African markets, using known strengths in electrification, manufacturing, value added services, pharmaceuticals, and banking. A focus on encouraging South-South trade will help Morocco expand and diversify its economy where it has the competitive advantage in Greater Africa as well as Latin America and Southern Asia.

The US could also engage more on economic diplomacy with Europe with a similar triangular method. The US could also pay more attention to the GCC and work to become a 3rd partner to those investments. More technical assistance and knowledge-sharing should be provided, perhaps in a field such as cell-phone manufacturing, which in Africa is a booming end-user market that contributes zero manufacturing market share.

Lastly, the US should help Morocco invest in young professionals. The US is a bastion of risk capital mentality, whereas Morocco lacks it, resulting in more of a trading culture and less entrepreneurship, venture capital, and industrialization. Promoting this mentality could go a long way in maximizing the rewards of policy frameworks which are already in place. Morocco could perhaps restructure subsidy money to further benefit SMEs. US-Morocco trade could also benefit from more widespread teaching and use of English, to stem the tide of an old-guard bias towards French and Arabic-speaking countries.

4. Observations

This event was attended by 23 foreign policy professionals. The paper was well-received and GMF will publish a final paper, without attribution, that has a strong section on recommendations for US actions in support of economic development and growth opportunities in Morocco.

Attendees:

Jean AbiNader: MAC

Neyla Arnas: National Defense University

Bradley Bosserman: NDN

David Bloom: MAC

Jean-François Dauphin: IMF

Barrie Freeman: National Democratic Institute for International Affairs

Kelsey Guyette: GMF

Geoffrey Kemp: Center for the National Interest
Ian Lesser: GMF
Carol Castiel: Voice of America
Odeh Aburdene: OAI Advisors
Uri Dadush: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace
LouElin Dwyer: National Defense University
Eric Goldstein: Human Rights Watch
Haim Malka: CSIS Middle East Program
Simon Henderson: The Washington Institute for Near East Policy
Mohsin Khan: The Atlantic Council of the United States
Kerry McNamara: OCP Group
J.E. Rash: Legacy International
Vish Sakthivel: The Washington Institute for Near East Policy
Daniele Moro: Johns Hopkins University
Timothy Ridout: GMF
Simon Serfaty: GMF

\(Back to top\)

Morocco's Role in Regional Security and Development

Date: October 22, 2013

1. Title: "Morocco's Role in Regional Security and Development"

Hosted by the Atlantic Council

Participants:

Dr. J. Peter Pham: Moderator: Director, Africa Center, Atlantic Council

Christopher Leins: Deputy Director, Politico-Military Affairs, Department of Defense

2. Overview

This event, the fourth in a series on the strategic value of Morocco-US relations in key sectors that include recommendations for US policy actions in support of Morocco, began with a brief review of the topics presented in the draft paper which had been circulated in advance of the event. Dr. Pham gave an overview of Morocco's role in regional security and the merits of their counterterrorism strategy, while highlighting opportunities and recommendations for changes in US policy. The group discussion focused on Morocco's growing role as a regional leader in regional security, and how their economic influence has increased their regional, and potentially their global, security influence. The group also evaluated and expanded the paper's recommendations.

3. Summary

Dr. Pham began by discussing an increasing recognition of Morocco's role in African security, which is further enhanced by Morocco's economic and cultural ties on the continent. Despite this, he said, the US takes Morocco for granted. A prime example of this was the "unfortunate drop-in" during the latest MINURSO renewal, which resulted in the cancellation of the bilateral US-Moroccan African Lion security exercises in the spring. In a region where government fragility is "par for the course", he said, Morocco is stable and its interests are often aligned with those of the US. As a regional economic leader, notably in the financial sector, Morocco is expanding its networks throughout Africa, which could help pave the way for increased security cooperation.

There are lessons to be learned from Morocco's counterterrorism strategy, which is both aggressive and comprehensive. The three main tenants are a law-and-order approach to security, a targeting of terrorists through their financial networks, and an economic development approach to marginalize the enabling causes of radicalism. Specific Moroccan programs, including religious training exchanges, as well as the security forces training in places such as Mali, are not adequately lauded or supported. The holistic approach taken by Morocco stands out in the field of counterterrorism, one with certain replicable parts. From a US policy perspective, there is great opportunity for triangulation; scaling up effective programs carried out by a leader in regional security of increasing geopolitical 'heft'.

One main stumbling block to Morocco's growing role in regional security is the Western Sahara. The dispute is no longer 'frozen,' Dr. Pham said. The legally dubious inclusion of the Western Sahara - officially recognized by only nine member countries in the African Union (AU) effectively holds the other members hostage. At present, there is no defined mechanism for the removal of an AU member, so the issue would have to be resolved by other means. Until this happens, the regionalization of security cooperation is more piecemeal and difficult to scale-up, facilitating an environment that has proven to be ideal for global terrorist networks.

Group discussion began with the assertion that current US policy does not do enough to encourage regional economic integration in Africa. The US should insist on a regional dimension to programs and investments, it was recommended. US aid should follow this guideline, focusing on initiatives such as the Trans-African Highway Network. Good security cooperation is based on good economic cooperation, one participant said.

The US should also support Moroccan efforts towards security regionalization, supporting existing programs and forums that Morocco has led. US Military efforts, including the African Lion exercises, have gradually aimed to become more regional, though the process is a slow one. Joint military exercises can pay real dividends, in terms of both training and relations. It's hard to understate how the US-Morocco relationship improved after 1999, one participant said, when both US and UN exercises were performed with Morocco.

More regional-based security efforts are inhibited in part because, it was said, "Algeria gets in the way of everything". The US is somewhat of an enabler to Algerian intransigence, it was suggested, by not calling them to account for misdeeds in Libya and Mali, and by not making the improvement of Moroccan-Algerian relations a diplomatic priority. The US can help by supporting programs that already exist "below the political noise level" as a foundation for improving Moroccan-Algerian relations. Again, economics can be a strong facilitator of improved relations. The US can leverage its free trade agreement with Morocco by supporting value-added chains that encourage cross-border economic activity. The North Africa Partnership for Economic Opportunity (NAPEO) could also be re-tooled to support better relations across North Africa.

Morocco is expanding ties not only throughout Africa, but also across the Atlantic basin into South America. This not only carries economic implications but also potential US policy opportunities. Just as Morocco's influence in Africa can be leveraged into high-impact policy outcomes, the same could potentially be done as Morocco becomes a leader in the broader South-South context. Triangulation and the scaling-up of Moroccan initiatives are excellent ways to have low-input, high-impact policy outcomes, and their scope could potentially increase as the Moroccan economic influence expands globally. US policy should further emphasize its strategic partnership with Morocco with a focus on triangulation in order to achieve shared goals.

4. Observations

This event was attended by more than 20 foreign policy professionals. The paper was well-received, as the commentary indicated, and the Atlantic Council will publish a final paper, without attribution, that has a strong section on recommendations for US actions in support of and expanding Morocco's leadership efforts in regional security.

Attendees:

Jean AbiNader: Executive Director, Moroccan American Trade & Investment Center

Sean McFate: Professor, National Defense University

Bradley Bosserman: Director, MENA Initiative, New Democrat Network

David Bloom: Research Associate, Moroccan American Center

Fouad Arif: Bureau Chief, Moroccan News Agency

Mahfoud Bahbouhi: Counselor, Embassy of the Kingdom of Morocco

Majida Bargach: Interim Director, Center for International Relations, University of Virginia

Carol Castiel: Director, Current Affairs Programming, Voice of America News

Bronwyn Bruton: Deputy Director, Africa Center, Atlantic Council

Anne Moisan: Professor, Near East South Asia Center for Strategic Studies, National Defense University

Edward Gabriel: Former US Ambassador to Morocco

Francoise Kirby: Public Relations Director, Management Systems International

Alan Larson: Senior International Policy Advisor, Covington & Burling LLP

Scott Mastic: Regional Director, Middle East & North Africa, International Republican Institute

Karim Mezran: Senior Fellow, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, Atlantic Council

Laura Talverdian: Assistant Director, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, Atlantic Council

Lawrence Velte: Associate Professor, Near East South Asia Center for Strategic Studies, National Defense University

\(Back to top\)

Morocco's Strategic Engagement in Africa

Date: October 25, 2013

1. Title: Morocco's Strategic Engagement in Africa

Hosted by the Center for Strategic and International Studies

Participants:

Haim Malka: Deputy Director and Senior Fellow, Middle East Program, CSIS

Jon B. Alterman: Moderator: Director, Middle East Program, CSIS

2. Overview

This event, the fifth and final event in a series on the strategic value of Morocco-US relations in key sectors that include recommendations for US policy actions in support of Morocco, began with a review of the topics presented in the draft paper which had been circulated in advance of the event. Haim Malka gave an overview of Morocco's increasing economic and diplomatic emphasis on Sub-Saharan Africa and analyzed the implications and opportunities of this policy shift. The group discussion focused on Morocco's comparative advantages in a South-South approach to economic and diplomatic policy, as well as the role the United States can play in promoting these efforts to mutual benefit.

3. Summary

Haim Malka began the event by describing how Sub-Saharan Africa appears to be central to Morocco's attempts to grow and diversify its economy, and ultimately increase its international influence. The driving force behind this policy decision appears to be the urgent need to diversify Morocco's economic base and trade partners to deal with growing socio-economic pressures. It was a lesson made painfully evident as the slump in European demand had a dramatic effect on Morocco – Europe being the source of more than 60% of its trade, as well as the main source of Morocco's tourism industry and remittances.

Some of the seemingly low-hanging fruit for Moroccan trade hasn't panned out as hoped. Regional integration in the Maghreb is unlikely without a political solution to Western Sahara. The "reality we all know is; this is stuck," Malka stated. On the other side of the Atlantic, Morocco has a free trade agreement with the US that went into effect in 2006 and the US market offers an opportunity for boosting Moroccan exports. However, the results of the FTA have been underwhelming and it's clear that the FTA hasn't been a game-changer for Morocco.

The pivot towards Sub-Saharan Africa offers competitive advantages for Morocco that match up nicely with high-growth sectors in Africa, especially in banking and agriculture. Outward foreign direct investment has reflected this trend, as 90% of investment from Morocco stays on the continent. Morocco also took initiative during the financial crisis in Europe, picking up investments dropped by more risk-averse Europeans, notably in banking. Moroccan banks are now in 22 African countries and are some of the biggest on the continent. Morocco's phosphates are already a strategic asset for increasing output from Sub-Saharan Africa's farms, with the potential for developing a downstream fertilizer sector and a research and development hub. Morocco also has the second largest pharmaceutical industry in Africa, so the economy is well-positioned to take advantage of the maturation of the Sub-Saharan African market.

Morocco also continues to position itself as a manufacturing and outsourcing base for European companies. Companies such as Renault, Bombardier, Boeing, GE, and Dassault have moved manufacturing to Morocco, where labor costs remain competitive. Malka stressed that the need now is to develop a manufacturing ecosystem, with training and expertise that could fuel Africa-centric spinoff ventures that further diversify Morocco's manufacturing base.

The success of Morocco's attempts at diversifying its economy and increasing its presence in Sub-Saharan Africa will depend largely on policy choices. As the discussants noted, there is much that the US can do to help this process along for mutual benefit. The US can use existing funding to support triangular programs that take advantage of Morocco's existing networks and competencies. Power Africa is a prime example, where the US could rely on Morocco's experience with rural electrification to boost the efficacy and efficiency of the program.

The US should also take the pivot to Sub-Saharan Africa as a good reason to leave behind the “artificial seam” that separates North Africa and Sub-Saharan Africa in the eyes of US policymakers. Many companies now look at Morocco as a hub for Africa; the US should do the same. Adjusting rules of origin regulations in the FTA could also help encourage Morocco as a business hub and expand trade links with Sub-Saharan Africa. The US should also support more regional and continental infrastructure projects. Morocco is already a leader in air and port transportation links, but road and rail networks should be improved. As one participant said, “the traffickers are showing us the way” in terms of potential South-South trade.

4. Observations

This event was attended by more than 30 foreign policy professionals. The paper was well-received, as the commentary indicated, and CSIS will publish a final paper, without attribution, that has a strong section on recommendations for US actions in support of and expanding Morocco’s leadership efforts to expand programs and networks into Sub-Saharan Africa.

Attendees:

Jon B. Alterman: Center for Strategic and International Studies

Alexis Arieff: Congressional Research Service

Carolyn Barnett: Center for Strategic and International Studies

Alexandre Bilodeau: US Department of State

David Bloom: Moroccan American Center

Mary Ellen Connell: Center for Naval Analysis

Jennifer Cooke: Center for Strategic and International Studies

Richard Downie: Center for Strategic and International Studies

Alice Friend: US Department of Defense

Martin Kessler: Peterson Institute for International Economics

Mohsin Khan: Atlantic Council

Christopher Kisco: US Agency for International Development

William Lawrence: George Washington University

Haim Malka: Center for Strategic and International Studies

Peggy McKean: US Department of Defense

Karim Mezran: Atlantic Council

Marina Ottaway: Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars

Milena Sanchez de Boado: American Bar Association

Carrie Schenkel: International Republican Institute

Fatima Taki: US Department of Defense

Susan C. Tuttle: IBM

Bruno Versailles: International Monetary Fund

Maja Volk: US Department of Defense

Kathleen Walsh: The Stimson Center

\(Back to top\)

Resolving Regional Conflicts: The Western Sahara and the Quest for a Durable Solution

Date: November 6, 2013

1. Title: "Resolving Regional Conflicts: The Western Sahara and the Quest for a Durable Solution"

Hosted by The Middle East Program of the Woodrow Wilson Center

Participants:

Bernabe Lopez-Garcia: Professor of Contemporary History of Islam, Autónoma University of Madrid

Anna Theofilopoulou: Independent political analyst, and writer; Former UN official and member of James Baker's negotiating team covering the Western Sahara conflict (1994-2006)

Marina Ottaway: Senior Scholar, Woodrow Wilson Center

Haleh Esfandiari: Moderator: Director, Middle East Program, Woodrow Wilson Center

2. Overview

This panel discussion was the first in a series on the Western Sahara, as announced at the event, taking place on the 38th anniversary of the Green March. The panel discussed their observations of the Western Sahara dispute and the possibility of resolution scenarios for the conflict, including the autonomy plan introduced by Morocco.

3. Summary

Bernabe Lopez-Garcia began the session with a frank statement on the Western Sahara conflict; "we see no way to resolve it," he said. His talk, in Spanish and translated into English for the audience, focused on the historical, legal and political development of the dispute. Lopez-Garcia spent much of his time on the Moroccan approach to the issue, associating it with an "ambiguous approach," that suffers from a lack of open national debate, in turn stifled by an ongoing "taboo" on Western Sahara dialogue. Further, Lopez-Garcia frequently mentioned that misinformation and "demonizing", admittedly from both sides, but with his comments focused on the Moroccan side, are reinforcing ideological entrenchment that makes resolution impossible. He added that Morocco "insists obsessively on an Algeria focus" on the issue, and that despite the obvious linkage, the Polisario has its own voice. The result is that the Western Sahara issues remains unresolved despite various diplomatic efforts, leaving a serious humanitarian crisis of "40,000-150,000" refugees in camps near Tindouf, Algeria.

Lopez-Garcia also spoke about Morocco's 2007 autonomy plan and recent political reforms, linking them both as signs of change deemed disingenuous by the Polisario. He noted that there has been no real progress on the negotiations and that human rights violations continue in the territory, undermining Morocco's credibility on issues of governance and providing the Polisario with the opportunity to make human rights the basis of its international strategy (which it has done), an issues Morocco deems an affront to its sovereignty. Lopez-Garcia did state that the 2007 plan proposed some novel aspects, such as elections, broad legislative powers and an important amnesty provision, but argued that it did not sufficiently address the question of self-determination. He postulated that the 2011 reform of the Constitution would have been an opportune time to debate this idea of autonomy and offer something to the other side, described it as a "missed opportunity" because the Western Sahara was not mentioned, even though one small step was made with regard to Hassania culture being recognized in the Constitution. Lopez-Garcia was dire in his current assessment of the region and cited serious problems of infighting and violence between people living in the territories.

Lopez-Garcia was more even-handed in his prescription for resolution, although he was pessimistic about the many obstacles inhibiting a resolution. First, there is misinformation on both sides about the nature of the problem. For example, Sahrawis feel that their voices have been marginalized, and northerners living in the territory believe that the Sahrawis have privileges and feel ill-will towards them. Timid steps, such as the CNDH, have been taken to mitigate this, but the local CNDH branches have not been very active. Second, Lopez-Garcia reiterated that Moroccan demonization of the Polisario also presents a serious obstacle, adding that the Polisario must likewise stop efforts to demonize the other side and remove its strict ideological control over the refugee population. Third, the role of Algeria – and whether or not the Polisario is truly independent of it – presents additional hurdles. Finally, there is no climate of confidence between the two parties – something that is essential for finding a solution to the conflict. He hinted that time might suddenly be an encouraging factor for change, given the emergence of a security threat in the Sahel that is causing greater desire on the part of Western Powers to have final resolution for the sake of border integrity and the fight against global terrorism. Additionally, both sides have suffered and made sacrifices and a mutual recognition of this could go some way in creating a shared understanding between the two parties.

In terms of moving forward, Lopez-Garcia argued that there was to be some type of referendum for the Sahrawis to express themselves independently of both the Polisario and Morocco, a requirement the 2007 autonomy plan acknowledges. If the details of such a referendum could be figured out, a negotiated political solution could be achieved. For the moment, however, the Polisario is not willing to play that game. Lopez-Garcia argued that maybe if Morocco acknowledged some of these issues and demonstrated true democracy in the Sahara, the Polisario may come to the table. However, he also added that the Polisario must “take a decisive step forward” in negotiations. Perhaps relaxing his initial despondency towards the outlook on a resolution, Lopez-Garcia said that “we (do) have formulas for Sahrawi democracy linked with Morocco,” which could help to end the conflict in a scenario that doesn’t create ‘winners and losers.’

Continuing on Lopez-Garcia’s mention of ‘winners and losers’ in a potential resolution, Anna Theofilopoulou began her comments by saying that the conflict is still in the same position as it was in 2004, when the UN weakened its support for the peace plan and shifted to achieving a mutually acceptable political solution. She reflected back to that time, stating that the UN plan was misguided because it presented a plan that didn’t offer a face-saving solution for both sides. She added that the UN allowed the parties to block the process, with the Polisario being the more obstructive of the two. Theofilopoulou suggested that the UN process was flawed from the beginning because it was more interested in resolution than the parties themselves, and the lack of real solutions was a symptom of this root problem.

Since 2004, the geopolitics of the region have greatly changed, with the Arab Spring and the rise of AQIM, but the UN has not become more active in response, “refusing to take firm positions and push both parties,” by claiming that the conflict falls under Chapter 6 rather than Chapter 7 (with the latter allowing the UN to force a resolution, rather than mediate between the two parties). As a result, Morocco maintains its position in favor of negotiations on the basis of autonomy/sovereignty with a referendum on the final autonomy statute, and the Polisario maintains its insistence on a referendum with three options: integration, independence, and autonomy. Four rounds of formal and ten rounds of informal negotiations have thus achieved nothing.

So where do things stand now? Theofilopoulou argued that international civil society supports the Polisario based on legal arguments, but ignores political realities; the Polisario has a legal case and Morocco has a political case. Theofilopoulou reminded the audience that legal issues don't offer much help towards resolution, saying that if the Western Sahara dispute was to be resolved by legal grounds, it would have been done so already, implicitly stating that a political resolution is the only feasible solution. Theofilopoulou's description of the UN's role in the process was one of an 'enabler,' providing cover for each side as they pursued inherently incompatible goals. She added that neither Morocco's Polisario bashing nor the Polisario's insistence on discussing the issue solely in terms of legality serves any practical purpose. Theofilopoulou stated that a resolution mainly requires the aforementioned 'face-saving' for both sides. She suggested that a return to the initial terms of the Baker Plan with an extended 10-year option for a vote on autonomy (rumored to be a CORCAS plan) as one of several options would provide sufficient political 'cover' for both sides to make a deal.

Marina Ottaway spoke mainly about how the Moroccan proposal for Western Sahara was essentially an "advanced regionalization" plan, which happened to include the disputed territory as one of the regions comprising Morocco, arguing that "it's time to recognize that the autonomy plan isn't all it's cracked up to be." "It is worth going back to the King's speech" in the wake of the Arab Spring, she said, noting that the proposed decentralization was mentioned more prominently than the new constitution was, even though that was what people paid attention to at the time. She stressed that the only thing special for the Sahara is that it will be the first region to be decentralized. Ottaway expressed her dismay at this, noting, "I have nothing against decentralization, but this is not an autonomy plan." She also argued that both sides are even less willing to compromise than before and the same goes for Algeria, although she expressed optimism that the "CORCAS plan" references by Theofilopoulou could work if there was a push from the UN.

Ottaway also addressed what she referred to as the new prevalence of "nebulous conflicts" in the world – intractable conflicts that are far beyond a solution based on legality and that require some alternative arrangement. Ottaway compared the Western Sahara dispute to similar autonomy conflicts in Kirkuk (Iraq) and Somaliland (Somalia), saying that these kinds of disputes are increasingly common. In these instances there is no real way to determine the "real, original inhabitants" and thus who has the legal right to vote. Ottaway predicted that more ambiguous solutions, such as de facto independence over time while under existing sovereignty or de facto annexation, will be increasingly common in similar conflicts. These solutions with avoid legal and political issues in favor of "facts on the ground" without legal recongiiton.

4. Q & A

Q: What is the validity of reports of terrorist recruitment and infiltration of the Polisario camps by AQIM?

A: (Theofilopoulou) There are no credible reports about AQIM activity in Western Sahara proper, but there is always the possibility of young, frustrated people resorting to terrorism. (Ottaway) The intricacies of terrorist networks operating in the region are beyond our understanding, but there is no evidence of AQIM recruiting in the Tindouf camps, nor is their evidence that it isn't. It is all too likely sooner or later.

(Lopez-Garcia) These reports are the result Morocco's efforts to demonize the Polisario – this is what I have been consistently referring to. There is always the possibility of steps towards fundamentalism in the camps.

Q: (Nadine Hoffman, International Women's Media Foundation) Could you discuss the role of lobbying in the conflict? Is it primarily obstructive to a resolution of the conflict?

A: (Ottaway) Of course...but what exactly can we do about it?

(Theofilopoulou) Lobbyists contribute to the hardening of position on both sides, because they can both say they have people on their sides.

(Lopez-Garcia) There is a saying "I'd rather talk to a radical than a lobbyist."

Q: (David Ottaway, The Wilson Center) Could you clarify your earlier remark estimating the refugee population at 40,000 to 150,000 refugees?

A: (Lopez-Garcia) There is no census that would allow us to know – the UN doesn't dare wade into the issue.

(Theofilopoulou) It is the Polisario and Algeria who do not allow the census. I am skeptical that 150,000 is a legitimate number. If the Spanish census was around 75,000 and half left, we are looking at around 35,000 and then of course some expansion with families. The UN conclusion in 1999 was that there were around 100,000, but "nobody really knows."

Q: (Mohamed Yeslem Bissat) (Bissat was interrupted early in his comment with an insistence that he actually pose a succinct question, as requested by the moderator. The exchange was back and forth, with Bissat demonstrating an attitude with feigned politeness) Is it possible to have autonomy in a dictatorship?

A: (Lopez-Garcia) Of course not. Morocco is not currently a democratic regime, and the missed opportunity for reform shows a country in stagnation or even regression in this regard.

(Ottaway) I don't agree. It is indeed possible to have autonomy despite a lesser degree of democracy.

Q: (Eric Goldstein, Human Rights Watch) So should we just abandon the idea of a referendum on self-determination?

A: (Ottaway) Determining in practice who exactly should vote is not likely possible.

Q: (Gare Smith, Foley Hoag (did not identify himself as a lobbyist for Algeria)) Should the US just really set aside the rule of law in dealing with the issue?

A: (Theofilopoulou) It is simply a question of political reality. Lip service will be paid, however, to certain principles.

(Lopez-Garcia) Morocco must be a country where the rule of law is respected first and foremost.

Q: (I. William Zartman, Johns Hopkins University) Can Spain's experience with decentralization can help inform the process in Morocco?

A: (Lopez-Garcia) The process in Spain is flawed and does not provide a lot of valuable lessons for this issue.

5. Observations

Approximately 80 scholars, experts, and advocates on both sides attended the event. Notably, UN Envoy Chris Ross was in attendance, highlighting that the Wilson Center has a large draw with high-profile figures. Nadine Hoffman of IWMMF was also in attendance – a likely indication of IWMMF engagement on this issue in the future. Overall, the speakers were neutral on the issue and with regard to Morocco, though they primarily spoke about Morocco's alleged human rights violations and made little mention of those of the Polisario. Lopez-Garcia was largely critical of Morocco's role in the dispute, though he did take a few opportunities to blame both sides for certain malfeasance and intransigence. The other two panelists approached the subject more dispassionately, with a comparative and realist approach. Remarkably, Theofilopoulou's positions on a referendum (and on Morocco's position) seem to have evolved toward a more practical, rather than legal, assessment of the conflict. Unfortunately, Ottaway's views of the autonomy plan have likewise evolved, and her pronouncements on the matter were wholly unhelpful. All panelists held a similar lack of optimism towards the potential for resolution, yet they did have similar outlines for how a potential settlement deal could be shaped and made feasible, mostly by moving forward based on political realities, rather than legality. The audience was very eager to ask questions, though most panelist answers were repetitions of their earlier comments. This was especially true in the case of the Bissat and Smith questions, which weren't received as entirely serious additions to the conversation. The behavior of pro-Polisario people at these events is a continual validation of how not to act – the moderator and the panel expressed real annoyance with the Polisario representative and did not appear to take him very seriously. By staying above the fray, Morocco will be taken more seriously by experts working on these issues. It will be interesting to follow the Wilson series as it develops, and while there is certainly room for improvement, there is also an opportunity for realistic, if not positive messaging on Morocco's position on the issue.

\(Back to top\)

Charting Morocco's Reform Strategy

Date: November 20, 2013

1. Title: "Charting Morocco's Reform Strategy"

Hosted by the German Marshall Fund

Participants:

Mustafa el Khalfi: Minister of Communications, Morocco

Nizar Baraka: President of CESE, Morocco

Driss el Yazami: President of CNDH, Morocco

Serge Berdugo: Ambassador at Large, Morocco

Ivan Vejvoda: Moderator: Vice President of Programs, GMF

2. Overview

In the context of the King's meeting with President Obama, several high level Moroccan officials presented their work on Morocco's reform process. The speakers gave an overview of Morocco's current situation and steps being taken to move forward. The 2011 Constitution was a common point of reference in all speakers' presentations.

3. Summary

Minister El Khalfi began by saying that Morocco is currently facing two challenges, democratization and stability. In his opinion, Morocco is a model of engaging in reforms, succeeding in democracy, and providing strength and stability. The reason Morocco is able to do this is because it is following the "third path" between outright revolution and maintaining the status quo, which allows the country to enact reforms while preserving stability. There are three factors specific to Morocco that allow it to follow this third path. First, the King's leadership, as seen in the 2011 speech and the 2011 election of a new government, which remains in power two years later. Second, the strength of civil society and political parties. There are many groups represented in the reform process and increased participation has led to the acceleration of reforms. Third, Morocco has a "culture of consensus," which is to say there is a focus on finding common solutions to challenges.

Minister El Khalfi said that the new constitution represents the driving force for democratization, and that it has several obligations to implement, including making the courts more responsible and under less government oversight, reforming the press code, and increasing access to information. Another priority is increasing regionalization, including allowing the local population in the Western Sahara to manage its own affairs. There is also a need to increase protection of human rights and open the country to UN rapporteurs. Finally, freedom of the press is a priority. Minister El Khalfi claimed that there are "no journalists jailed" currently in Morocco and that "no website has been blocked by the government," given that Lakome.com had been blocked at its owner's request. He directed curious parties to examine Freedom House's report on the internet, and said that most of the media is private in Morocco, with the government providing only "20% of all reports." He closed with prospects for the future, namely broadening support for the above initiatives.

Nizar Baraka spoke on democracy and reforms. He also mentioned the need to improve independence of the judiciary and listed the reforms called for in the 2011 Constitution. He then turned to his own organization, the CESE, saying that it provides advice to the government on the basis of its 99 members, who represent unions, NGOs, and citizens. He described the CESE report on the Sahara, which took the form of a one year survey, as one built on consensus and neutral assessments. The report calls for the application of orderly law and notes that the GDP of Western Sahara actually beats the national average by 50%. This is deceptive, however, as the economy needs to be made more sustainable, and 30% of the GDP goes to administrative costs. He noted that unemployment is only 5% in Western Sahara, whereas the rest of the country has 9% unemployment. He took these figures as evidence that the development model has reached its limit, and that there needs to be a new model, designed by and for the local population, taking the form of regional councils elected on the principle of universal suffrage. A civil forum would then be held in each region, and the results would be applied to the development model. Baraka stated that CESE's current goals are to spend $17 billion over the next 10 years to create 120,000 jobs, provide efficient social services, and promote the sustainable use of natural resources. To this end, there is a development fund to finance SMEs and a social fund to provide a safety net for those who need it. CESE also aims to improve skills and health care in the region. He closed by saying that these goals are "ambitious, realistic, and sustainable."

Driss El Yazami then posed the rhetorical question as to whether Arabs can build democracy and improve human rights by themselves. In Morocco's case, he noted that the path to democratization began in the mid 1990's. The family code was released in 2004, the Royal Berber Institute was created in 2003, and there were public reconciliation hearings. El Yazami also referenced the 2011 Constitution and its requirements to increase human rights protections nationally. He closed by saying that justice reform is necessary and that the country is working hard to do so, but changing laws alone is insufficient.

Ambassador Serge Berdugo introduced himself as an Ambassador at Large and the President of the Jewish Committee. He spoke of the Moroccan exception, which he defined as equilibrium between cultures. He believes Morocco handled the Arab Spring in a "peaceful and responsible way," thanks to Morocco's deeply rooted sense of identity. The next steps, in his opinion, are to build democracy and a market economy without radical solutions and to transform society without disturbing societal harmony. He made reference to Morocco's strong civil society, citing 45 NGOs spending 8.8 billion dirhams with 1 million volunteers. He also praised the 2011 Constitution for establishing protection for Moroccan identities. Ambassador Berdugo closed by discussing religion, the King's position as the religious authority, specifically in the Sunni Maliki rite, and the work he has done on behalf of the Jewish community, restoring synagogues and cemeteries. He also said the Moroccan Jewish community enjoys full civil rights and is an important part in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

4. Q&A

Q: (Diane Pollack, WINEP) Could you tell us more about the demonstrators? Who are they, what do they want, are there any patterns, and what have been your responses?

A: (Minister El Khalfi) 95% of it was social issues - employment, housing, health, and education. Morocco has 36 unions and a strong civil society. There are only 40-50 demonstrators each day. This is a social dialogue and it reflects Moroccan democracy.

(El Yazami) The number of protests was a high figure before the Arab Spring. They are asking for their rights, they want to negotiate. NGOs need to be more active.

Q: Can you say something on the integration of the Berber community? Has there been a backlash from Arab nationalists? What are the effects of the Berber reform?

A: (Minister El Khalfi) Berbers are not a minority group; they are a component of the Moroccan identity. We also have the Royal Institute for Amazigh Culture, we are criminalizing discrimination, and we offer classes in Amazigh. The first Amazigh website started this year. We are also going to increase state aid by 20%. There is also the use of the Amazigh language in courts; we are aiming at full integration - political, economic, and cultural. So this is not a political issue.

(El Yazami) If you want more information, you can read the 2004 UNDP report on Morocco. We are having a public debate, and now educate people in three languages.

(Note: The moderator then took a round of questions, to which the speakers responded at choice.)

Q: (Eric Goldstein, Human Rights Watch) You mentioned Morocco's model for Human Rights monitors, as well as reform of the press code and the penal code. Will you achieve those goals, and if not, why?

Q: (Charles Dahan, Vice President for Moroccan Jewry) There were recently a group of Moroccan politicians who refused to go to Israel for a meeting of the Mediterranean Group. There are also 1 million Israeli Moroccans. Is it time to look seriously at Morocco-Israel relations?

Q: Where does Morocco fit in the larger religious discourse? What are Morocco's positions on current issues in the Levant?

Q: (JE Rash, Legacy International) Could you say more about young professionals in Morocco? What is the state of public health?

A: (Minister El Khalfi) We have had successes in education, the problem is of quality. Children get financial aid. We had a debate on the national language. As I said, we are criminalizing discrimination. The press code reform is my personal priority. We established a commission and received more than 100 recommendations; we are going to hold another on online media. We have started implementation of press reform: there is now legal recognition of online media. Then there is the issue of decriminalizing article 27. Article 28 says that "freedom of the press is guaranteed." By the end of 2013, the first draft will be up for public debate. The Constitution says that Jews are a source of identity. We had public coverage for Yom Kippur. We are also training Malian imams to fight extremism. We also hosted a conference with UNESCO on the internet.

(Ambassador Berdugo) Morocco is on a quest for tolerance. We host 10 to 15 events promoting tolerance. People don't know, but one of Morocco's big exports is rabbis; there are Moroccan rabbis all around the world. Morocco is also a pioneer in the Middle East peace process to promote a peace that recognizes the rights of the Palestinians to a viable, dignified state. Morocco is not an actor, per se, but is certainly directing things from the pit.

Q: (Alexis Arieff, Congressional Research Service) My question is for Mr. Baraka. How does your proposal for Western Sahara differ from decentralization?

A: (Baraka) Our proposal is for autonomy. The other party prefers the status quo, but it is important not to leave the citizens waiting. In his speech on the 6th of November, 2012, the King said that it is time for a new development model and to implement regionalization throughout the country, but more so in Western Sahara. The Sahrawi people will have to be involved in government for three reasons. We need to develop a participative democracy. We need agreement on what the regions need. Governance is insufficient; we need a development model to create an attractive economy. So we are targeting safety nets, valuing development over security, and working on long-term goals over short-term ones. This is an integrated strategy, based on human development, win ambition for a better future.

Q: (Ralph Nurnberger) What is the Human Rights situation in Western Sahara, and Tindouf?

A: (El Yazami) As for Tindouf and Human Rights commissions, there is one in Tantan, and despite the population being the same, international reporters focus on the Sahara, but less so on Tindouf because there is no access. We are working on these issues, though we still have problems. There is a national mechanism against torture, for example. The international community needs to monitor Tindouf on the same basis as Morocco. The RFK Center report is biased, as they spent two weeks in Western Sahara but only a few days in Tindouf.

(Minister El Khalfi) Look to the work of our conciliation commission. Morocco is open. Morocco is ready to deal with civil society, ready to work with the UN, but within our sovereignty. Dissenting opinions are tolerated. The government has even decided to financially support an opposition paper, because "democracy obliges us." Algeria refuses to implement a UN census of the Tindouf camps. The Polisario is a one party system, based on ignoring human rights. NGO's should examine the Polisario as well as Morocco.

5. Observations

The event was attended by approximately 50 foreign policy professionals. The presentations focused on Morocco's reform efforts and centered on the 2011 Constitution. Each speaker elaborated on their personal areas of expertise, but given the large number of speakers and limited time allotted, comments were broader as compared to smaller events during the delegation. The reform strategy outlined was one of vision, consultation, deliberation, and ongoing action, stressing the accelerating pace and number of reforms as well as an honest self-assessment of areas for continued improvement.

\(Back to top\)

Revolution and Political Transitions in North Africa

Date: November 21, 2013

1. Title: "Revolution and Political Transitions in North Africa"

Hosted by Georgetown University Center for Contemporary Arab Studies (CCAS) and the Maghreb Center

Participants:

Osama Abi-Mershed: Director, CCAS, Georgetown
Lahouari Addi: Carnegie Centennial Fellow, Georgetown
Amira Aleya-Sghaier: Professor, University of Tunis
Nejib Ayachi: Founder and President, the Maghreb Center
Michael Hudson: Director, Middle East Institute
Noureddine Jebnoun: Adjunct Professor, CCAS, Georgetown
Ricardo René Larémont: Professor, SUNY-Binghamton
Azzedine Layachi: Professor, St. John's University
Joseph Sassoon: Visiting Professor, CCAS, Georgetown
Emad El-Din Shahin: Professor, AUC

2. Overview

This event was broken into three separate discussions, each with a question and answer session. The first focused on the army and police in transitions to democracy; the second on constitutions, elections, and their sequencing; and the third on youth and their interactions with secular and religious parties. The overarching theme of the discussions was the process of political transition and factors currently impeding it. Understandably, the roundtable focused on countries going through a transition, namely Egypt, Tunisia, and Libya. A large portion of the first panel was also dedicated to Algeria.

3. Summary

Roundtable 1: Power: The Army and the Police in Transitions to Democracy
Participants: Layachi, Addi, Jebnoun, Ayachi (Moderator)

Noureddine Jebnoun addressed political transformations in Egypt, Libya, and Tunisia with a focus on the three main reasons that security services can hold up democratic transitions. First, limited institutionalization of the military creates political challenges. Ideally, the military would be a professional force. However, the situation in North Africa is not ideal. Factors limiting institutionalization include tribal/regional alliances, as in Libya; an imbalance between the regular army and intelligence services, as in Egypt; and the army as a social welfare system rather than a fighting force, as in Egypt. In Libya, following Gadhafi's rise to power, the military was almost entirely composed of members of the Warfala tribe, until he passed leadership on to his son. In Egypt, the Global War on Terror has blurred the line between standard security services and counterterrorism, leading to confusion in leadership. Additionally, the Egyptian army has 2 million members, and what is essentially its own private economy.

The second reason is a changing concept of security. Over the past 50 years, there has been a transition in many countries from state-based security, i.e. making sure the country is not invaded, to human-based security, i.e. making sure citizens are free from want, fear, etc. In Tunisia, Libya, and Egypt, the human-centric approach is missing, and the military is thereby preparing for attacks that most likely will not happen.

The third reason is misinterpretation of the meaning of civilian oversight. For example, Rachid Ghannouchi claimed that Ennahda had almost achieved Salafi control of the military. The military should not be "controlled" by a political party, but rather managed. Problems here include the military not trusting politicians, politicians using the military as a patronage system, and a lack of understanding of civilian control on the part of the military.

Jebnoun concluded by addressing specific issues in Egypt. He argued that these all fall under the heading of politicization of the security sector. He provided several examples to highlight this phenomenon. First, heads of police units were sacked by Morsi, leaving the police opposed to him and contributing to his ouster. Second, the judiciary is politicized, as is the new constitution which accords supremacy to the military (specifically articles 170-175). Third, corruption is a perennial problem, as is competition between the army and the police. Finally, the military co-opts popular movements, as evidenced in Morsi's removal.

Layachi contextualized the Arab Spring as a response of the military to the street and focused his remarks on Algeria. In Algeria, the military is not only a security force, but "transformist," implementing socialist policy on the economy and dominating political life. The presence of the military leads back to the War of Independence and military leadership of the country to the 1965 coup, although its position was significantly strengthened – and reformists tendencies weakened – after the failed "Algerian Spring" and subsequent civil war in the early 1990s. Layachi argued that Bouteflika has stayed in power not through his own will, but because he embodies civilian-military relations. The real leadership is, and has been, the intelligence services (DRS) and the question now is whether or not the DRS will allow Bouteflika a fourth term.

Addi further analyzed Algeria's lack of an Arab Spring. According to his analysis, Algeria is currently post-Arab Spring, as that country had a failed popular uprising 20 years ago. He noted several factors that limit Algeria's current transition to democracy. First, the failure of efforts to do so in 1992. Second, the fact that rising oil prices over the last decade have allowed the regime to buy off the populace. Third, since Boumedienne, the president has had no power; Bouteflika remains in power because he has given up trying to change things. Again, the DRS is in control, and it doesn't matter if he lives or dies. Addi thus argued that democratic transition is unlikely because the people have firsthand experience what happens when civilians challenge the military. He ended with a quote from an Algerian author: "All states have an Army; Algeria is an Army that has a State."

Roundtable 2: Process: Constitutions, Elections, and their Sequencing in Transitions to Democracy

Participants: Shahin, Hudson, Sassoon, Larémont (Moderator)

Larémont gave an opening statement by posing five framing issues for the discussion. 1) To what degree is an elite consensus required to create a democratic state? This happened in Spain and South Africa, but as of yet not in Libya or Tunisia. 2) Does the sequence of events, of elections, matter? They can be harmful, when held for their own sake. 3) Besides courts, are there effective institutions in the state? Effective legislatures? 4) The military must be subordinate. This is probable in Tunisia, impossible in Algeria, and difficult in Egypt. 5) Can the world system sustain the implosion of critical Arab States, by which I mean Egypt?

Shahin, who was at AUC during the revolutions, spoke on the process of democratic transitions with Egypt. In the old state, institutions were very strong, but as recent events have shown, now external actors can thwart transitions. The hope is the country will be able to move from moderate vs. radical to a free state where everyone can speak freely. However, there is little agreement on a prototypical democratic transition. Shahin outlined five essential characteristics for such a transition. First, there must be boundaries of the political system. Essential questions for such a system include: Will it define identity, will it be simply a state, will it have civil-military relations, and will it define religion? Second, there must be skilled and trained agents to guide the transition, or it will fall to old state institutions. Third, the economic conditions must be right. Fourth, there must be a process for the Constitution and a decision about whether the state will be presidential or parliamentary. Fifth, projects must be consistent. In Egypt, the rules have kept changing. Shanin concluded by making some pronouncements about the future. Assuming the roadmap continues, there will be instability until al-Sisi comes to power. If he doesn't run, on the other hand, things will stabilize. However, if there is no dominant power, repression will continue. Shanin lastly speculated that it was possible that there may be an actual revolution or a restoration of the Muslim Brotherhood. At this point, anything is possible in Egypt.

Sassoon addressed the question of the role of the Army, saying that durability of institutions is not particular to the Arab Spring, but is applicable worldwide. In Egypt, the security apparatus has been durable pre and post-revolt, with no changed economic or business structures. However, the new regimes have not addressed the people's grievances, namely 1) economic inequality and cronyism, and 2) youth unemployment. These countries inherited weak institutions from colonial powers, and in the case of Libya, Gaddafi destroyed what institutions were left, leading to the current situation. Finally, Sassoon noted that elections do not solve problems, citing Iraq. Transitions are only successful with a middle class, and less government patronage, unemployment, and corruption.

Hudson warned not to concentrate on the process, as it can distract from the reality. As in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the saying is "all process, no peace." Hudson also stressed the need to keep an eye on who is proposing the constitutions. In Egypt, elections were held first, but in Tunisia, there is a constitutional assembly that is effectively governing. It is also important to remember that not all groups see democracy as the goal. What the goal is may vary, but it will likely include a national identity, a central authority, and political capability in some political system. Democracy may be the second or third choice of some of the groups, but if everyone loses a little, then democracy will be left as there will be "no better alternative." The problem is, in Egypt at least, one side thinks it can have it all, without having to lose a little. The "winners" have missed out on the question of civil society; as they are in charge, they are wondering why there needs to be a transition at all. The fight between elites and counter-elites is a serious problem.

Roundtable3: Moving Forward: Youth and their Interactions with Religious and Secular Parties

Participants: Larémont, Ayachi, Aleya-Sghaier, Abi-Mershed (Moderator)

Abi-Mershed gave some opening remarks, stating that North African youth are stuck in a pre-adult state, due to unemployment and other factors. He presented two framing questions for the discussion: Can there then be a political transition with the youth stuck as they are? Can the youth play any role beyond street protests?

Ayachi qualified the Arab Spring as a primarily peaceful youth movement - not anti-West, not anti-Israel, not pro-Islam, but largely non-ideological. The demands were for more transparency and less authority, as well as an acknowledgement of the youth. Now, what do the Islamists propose in return? More authority. At present, there is thus a clash of values with the young protesters calling for freedom and the Islamist responding with authority. The Islamists have also not made any consistent political or economic proposals and have no answer to the question of unemployment. They say they value justice, but there has been no reform of the judiciary in Tunisia, in Egypt, or elsewhere. Ayachi concluded by noting that where Islamists are in power, they keep the same government structure and refuse to reform.

Aleya-Sghaier argued that the Arab Spring uprisings were revolts, not revolutions – a revolution involves someone new coming to power. He then turned to the topic of youth in Tunisia. The youth made up the Tunisian revolution, but those in power today are older (of the 217 representatives, only 10 are youth). Some people even miss Ben Ali, because under him economic conditions were better. The Tunisian youth are now facing having to leave the country for work. This is a sign of the complete failure of those in power in Tunisia. However, they insist on staying in power despite their failures. In closing, Aleya-Sghaier lamented about the sad state of the revolution.

4. Q&A

Roundtable 1

Q: Can you comment on the military in Libya and Tunisia, or do those states have a lack of security services?

A: (Jebnoun) The Libyan uprising was not national, but a collection of local uprisings. Without the NATO no-fly zone, Gadhafi would still be in power. There are something like 225 militias in Libya. The problem there is that there is no army, but thousands of colonels, leaders without units! We speak of the DDR process: demobilize, disarm, and reintegrate. This is what will have to happen in Libya, but what we have now are incompetent rebels who believe they liberated the country from Gadhafi! In Tunisia, on the other hand, there is an army, but it is currently marginalized, as it is apolitical and professional.

(Addi) That is an asset in Tunisia, the apolitical army.

(Layachi) In contrast, in Algeria, the Army controls the state.

Q: (Michael Hudson) Is Egypt replicating the Algerian events of 1992, or will it perhaps follow the Turkish model?

A: (Addi) Unfortunately, Egypt is taking the same path. I foresee no democratic elections for the next 2-3 years, and it is still possible there will be an Islamist victory. In Egypt, you have the same groups, the army, urbanites, and Islamists.

(Layachi) There is less of a taste for violence in Egypt than there was in Algeria. Remember, in the FIS, we had "Afghans" (jihadis returning from fighting the Soviets in Afghanistan) mobilized and ready to fight, but in Egypt there is a strong resistance to violence. The best case is Egypt looks at Algerian history, and says no. I agree it will take 2-3 years, but I foresee the Turkish model.

Q: (Ex-member, FIS) The Algerian army confiscated, didn't create, the state. It is a myth that the army was liberators. Is this a good thing or a bad thing?

A: (Addi) We could have an endless debate on the nature of the Algerian army; but in 1962 it was divided. In any case, the state was created by violence against the colonial power.

(Layachi) In Algeria, the problem is that we don't know where the buck stops. The Algerian army needs open leadership for people to know who decides what. In short, the Army needs institutionalization.

(Addi) In Egypt,, the intelligence services belong to the Army. In Algeria, the DRS is the most powerful and controls the rest of the military.

Roundtable 2

Q: Do you see fair elections or continued resistance in Egypt?

A: (Shahin) Egyptians have to sit down and talk. There is no other way. The only other option is violent confrontations and economic collapse. One side thinks that they're winning, but in order to move forward, they have to negotiate an inclusive, pluralistic system. Right now the military is "insisting to be on the wrong side of history."

Q: Will the military negotiate with the Muslim Brotherhood? Are the Brotherhood ready to make concessions?

A: (Shahin) Well, Egyptian media sees it the other way around. The Muslim Brotherhood is making concessions! The Brotherhood is willing to negotiate, but at what price? Their money has been confiscated, their leadership has been jailed, and they have been banned as a party. So you see the position from which they have to negotiate.

Roundtable 3

Q: (Ex-member, FIS) You must not stereotype Islamists!

A: (Larémont) We are not trying to define any group, but look at the ideological fracturing of society. There has been a decline in support for Islamist groups. That is not to say there is no support for Islamists, they still do have some significant support, but it is not unanimous. Finally, "there is no way forward from chaos other than compromise." All groups need to realize that they have to work together.

Q: Are there any other ways of speaking of "the youth?" Is it possible to see the youth as stakeholders rather than just a demographic group?

A: (Aleya-Sghaier) In response to the first question, the Islamists in Tunisia took power through elections, but out of a population of 8 million, there were only 1 million votes, so you cannot say they have overwhelming support. In response to the second question, it doesn't matter how old someone is; it's not people between 18 and 35, it's people who are out campaigning for transparency and a better future.

5. Observations

When the roundtable began, there were around 35 participants; latecomers increased the number to around 50. Due to the length of the event, the number had dwindled to around 20 by the end. There was a rough mixture of half students and academia and half community members and professionals. The event was quite disjointed. Several of the participants appeared unaware of the event's format; a roundtable is generally intended for unprepared discussion, whereas certain participants gave extensive prepared remarks. This necessitated restructuring on the part of the moderators, with later speakers' time cut short to provide time for Q&A. The Q&A was similarly unruly; individuals did not announce themselves, and certain among them acted as though they were participating in the roundtable.

The discussions were interesting, but several strayed from their purported topics. Speakers tended to analyze events from their country of expertise, making conversation difficult. Understandably, there was no mention of Morocco. The analysis of Algeria was very thorough, and one of the few points of fruitful discussion among panelists.

\(Back to top\)

Advancing the New US-Morocco Strategic Partnership

Date: November 21, 2013

1. Title: "Advancing the New US-Morocco Strategic Partnership"

Hosted by the Atlantic Council Africa Center

Participants:

Fred Kempe: President and CEO, Atlantic Council

Stuart Eizenstat: Executive Committee Member, Atlantic Council

Salaheddine Mezouar: Minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, Morocco

Nizar Baraka: President of CESE, Morocco

Miriam Bensalah Chaqroun: President, General Federation of Moroccan Enterprises

Mohamed Salah Tamek: Chief of Staff, Minister of the Interior, Morocco

Ahmed Abbadi: Secretary General, Muhammadan League of Scholars

Assiah Bensalah Alaoui: Ambassador at Large, Morocco
Peter Pham: Moderator:
Director, Africa Center, Atlantic Council

2. Overview

This event was held in the context of King Mohammed VI's meeting with President Obama. The discussion largely focused on specific Moroccan attributes and activities that make that country a beneficial partner to the United States, along with a positive outlook for the ongoing Strategic Dialogue. Eizenstat praised Morocco for its commitment to being a good partner, while Minister Mezouar noted the steps that need to be taken for Morocco to ensure stability in North Africa. The question and answer session was brief and reflected the positive tone of the speakers.

3. Summary

Dr. Peter Pham opened with a description of the Africa Center's aims, notably informing decision makers of Africa's strategic importance. He welcomed Foreign Minister Mezouar and the delegation and complimented Morocco's management of regional security and development challenges. He ceded the floor to Fred Kempe.

Fred Kempe re-emphasized the Atlantic Council's mission, saying that it is more important now than ever, due to the increased pace of political change, to expand the Atlantic group and for the US to understand the strategic importance of Morocco. He hoped the King's visit would be held in the spirit of intelligent collaboration. Kempe noted that The Africa Center has always had a link to Morocco, because it is "a unique place between Europe, America, and Africa." He then introduced Eizenstat, who launched the US-North Africa Economic Partnership, also known as the Eizenstat Initiative.

Stuart Eizenstat underscored the exceptional nature of the King's visit, and expressed his personal commitment to Morocco and developing economic connections with that country, including his work with Ambassador Gabriel. While frequently "the Maghreb falls between the political cracks," Eizenstat believes the US-Morocco relationship is now more important than ever due to tensions in the Middle East. Eizenstat recounted the shared values between the US and Morocco, including diversity and religious tolerance, and the willingness to work on societal problems. He praised Morocco's commitment to improving growth and expanding democracy, as well as supporting human rights. Eizenstat called Morocco an isle of stability in the arc of instability that actively works to promote a better world. He listed many US companies with ties to Morocco as an example of Morocco's outward reaching policy to "reinforce peace, stability, and shared growth."

He then gave a partial list of reforms, including the new Constitution, free and fair elections, the creation of the CNDH, education and employment initiatives, and the protection of women's rights. He noted that Morocco is one of the largest recipients of an MCC grant. He cited the Southern Provinces Development report as a sign that Morocco is a willing partner for reform. He closed with a list of strategic areas that would benefit from US-Morocco cooperation, including the need to tackle AQIM, monitor Iran, end the Syrian conflict, promote rule of law in the Maghreb, including an end to closed borders and unproductive divisions, support the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, and bolster regional stability. As for the US, Eizenstat expressed his hope to see increased economic exchange in the context of the Free Trade Agreement. Eizenstat noted that the shared values and common purpose of the US and Morocco will help to confront these aforementioned strategic challenges.

Minister Mezouar thanked the council for their welcome and their objective, sincere descriptions of Morocco, which he believes reflect Morocco's choice to make an open, democratic state in a changing world. He described Morocco as a country with clear leadership that guarantees stability, as well as a country of institutions working to reinforce liberties. In his analysis, Morocco weathered the Arab Spring through turning to development, reform, and openness, in addition to the intelligence and mutual respect of the Moroccan people. He then turned to analyzing Islam and democracy, stating that in Morocco, "a party ran, it came first in the elections, and it now rules." Minister Mezouar said that Moroccan Islam in particular values moderation and balance, and is therefore compatible with democracy, and that the Moroccan example proves it is possible to have democracy and religious belief.

Minister Mezouar next addressed the Morocco-US relationship, stating that those two countries have shared convictions, interests, and strategic visions. In his opinion, the Strategic Dialogue is a means for the countries to improve their relationship. On a personal note, Minister Mezouar said that this was his first official visit to the United States, and it made him realize just how sincere the relationship between the countries is. He underscored that United States judges countries based on their actions, and Morocco is a country that acts. Minister Mezouar said that "when His Majesty makes an engagement, he respects it. When Morocco decides to do something, it does it."

Minister Mezouar continued with the topic security and Morocco's foreign policy. He discussed Libya, as stabilizing that country is of interest to the United States as well as Morocco, recounted Morocco's promotion of dialogue to resolve the Syrian Civil War and support of Russo-American diplomacy in Syria; and mentioned Morocco's efforts to stabilize the Sahel, specifically in Mali. He summed up Morocco's worldview as a country that "acts where it is necessary, in Africa and the Middle East, to help friends and overcome challenges. Morocco has the goal of being a strong regional actor that values democratic values. We want to share this effort for stability and development in Africa with the US." Minister Mezouar then summarized a list of means Morocco uses to achieve these ends, including human development, foreign investment, and economic support, in addition to security. Minister Mezouar closed by saying that he was certain the meeting between King Mohammed and President Obama would confirm all these things, and that Strategic Dialogue is the way forward. Minister Mezouar then introduced the other members of the delegation.

Nizar Baraka spoke on the economic relationship between Morocco and the US. He noted that while Morocco-US trade has doubled over the past 10 years, it only represents 10% of Moroccan trade, adding that US investments in Morocco were only 5% of the total. Looking forward, Baraka said that Morocco is positioned to be an industrial exporter and is a favorable environment for investment. He cited an IMF figure that expects 5% growth over the next year, which would be highest in the MENA region. Baraka mentioned the potential for green energy in Morocco, including the Ouarzazate solar plant, and that Morocco aims to cover half of its energy needs domestically with renewables by 2020. He then echoed Minister Mezouar's comments on how Morocco stabilizes neighboring countries, citing the fact that Morocco is the top African investor in Central and West Africa. Baraka closed by saying that Morocco is strategically positioned as a bridge between the United States and African and MENA countries.

Miriam Bensalah Chaqroun, discussed business development in Morocco. After expressing her optimism for the King's meeting with Obama, Chaqroun gave a few examples of the delegation's private sector activity, including signing an MOU with the US Chamber of Congress and planning to host two meetings in Morocco for the American business community. She praised the speed of developing business relationships between US and Morocco. She also described the successes of Moroccan entrepreneurship, especially in Africa. Maroc Telecom, for example, is doing very well. In terms of Foreign Direct Investment in Africa, Morocco is second only to South Africa. Chaqroun said that the reasons for Morocco's business success are not only that the country has good infrastructure and everything necessary to do business, but also that Morocco is always improving, in business, democracy, human rights, and security.

Dr. Mohamed Salah Tamek began by thanking Kempe and Minister Mezouar for their speeches, and not leaving him anything to say, except to praise Morocco for its ability to convert intellectuals into security people. Dr. Tamek went in to more depth explaining the commonalities between Moroccan and American objectives, saying that they are made up of three components: promoting democratic change, providing economic opportunity, and ensuring regional security. Looking forward, the broader goal is enhancing the chance that moderates will shape the future of the region rather than extremists. There is also a common set of values between the US and Morocco, including respect for rule of law, peaceful inclusivity, protecting fundamental rights, a focus on building democratic institutions, and vibrant civil society.

Dr. Tamek then listed some current challenges in North Africa, including the Northern Malian insurgency, the persistence of terrorist threats, AQIM terrorist networks operating across the Sahel, and the emergence of al-Mourabitoun. In Dr. Tamek's analysis, Belmokhtar is trying to create a new Islamic state from Morocco to Egypt. Boko Haram is also a significant threat, trained and guided by AQIM. Another is Al-Shabab in Somalia. The possibility that geographically distant, yet ideologically similar groups could create a network of mutual support is a real threat. Dr. Tamek echoed Minister Mezouar's position on Syria, recalling that Morocco hosted a Friends of Syria meeting and can play a role in resolving that crisis. He also recounted that when Eric Holder was in Morocco a few weeks earlier, they discussed training and tracking programs to confront international jihadists. He closed by saying that Eizenstat's recommendations are good ones to take.

Ahmed Abbadi noted that certain political analysts believed the primary focus of international relations was to shift from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but the fact remains that the DNA for solutions to current problems lays in the Atlantic region. Abbadi again made reference to Morocco's unique geographic position as the door to the Middle East, Europe, and Africa. He said that the reason Morocco is so open was the choice of following the Maliki rite 1200 years ago, as well as the fact that Moroccan Sufism is practiced throughout Africa, which gives Morocco and other African countries the opportunity to work together to counteract extremism. Abbadi urged Morocco and the US to cooperate on education, since culture is the content to give alternatives to hate.

Assiah Bensalah Alaoui who introduced herself as Ambassador at Large for the Kingdom of Morocco. She expressed her belief that the King is anxious to offer a better future not only to Moroccans, but also to Africa and beyond. She agreed with Minister Mezouar in stating that Morocco is the perfect partner for the US in addressing security in North Africa. Alaoui recognized that the road to realizing the reform goals set out in the 2011 Constitution would be a long one. Looking forward, she said that in addition to being a historical ally of the United States, Morocco can be the loyal partner to developing the future of the region. Morocco will succeed thanks to its vibrant civil society, determined women, and determined, loyal youth who recognize the power of Moroccan leadership. She highlighted that Morocco is a valuable partner at this point in time, with the ambition to go beyond bilateral relations, as presently European and US influence are declining in Africa, with China is rising. Economically and politically, Morocco is "punching above its weight" and has the potential to help mend the transatlantic relationship.

4. Q&A

Q: (Gen. William Ward, former head of AFRICOM) It's easy for me to understand why the US and Morocco have been great partners. Could you offer some prescription for Morocco to achieve regional successes? We know the US cannot do it all, but with partners, those goals are achievable. How does Morocco see its role in the region for accomplishing the goals you laid out?

A: (Dr. Tamek) You are right to raise the point of cooperation, things the US cannot do alone, and these are things we have been working on since the last meeting of the Strategic Dialogue. The Moroccan approach is multifaceted. Other methods of dealing with terrorism include economic development, education in the Maliki rite, developing education, human development, rights for minorities and women, and including people of all faiths. You cannot face these things in binaries between good and evil, this is what we are telling our friends in Mali, so that this region will not be a bastion for terrorism, but might be a bastion for peace. (Minister Mezouar) To give concrete examples on Morocco's approach, I'll take up Mali. In Mali, there is a problem called the North. Morocco naturally has good relations with the democratically elected government, the president, but also with the movement in the North. Morocco is working to maintain dialogue between the two groups. It is fundamental to preserve the dialogue to preserve national unity. Morocco is also working in the humanitarian sector because the conflict touches the average Malian. Morocco is also working in the spiritual sector, bringing 500 Malian imams to Morocco for religious instruction. Morocco transfers its expertise in human development. Morocco also has agricultural expertise it is sharing with Mali. Morocco gives its competence and aids cultural development, both for traditional and modern cultures. I give these examples to say it is possible, and that the problems Mali is facing are common: how to transform society? How to help immigration? How to implement strategic development? How to reassure security? Many countries have resources and expertise, but the reality and results are not ideal. What is needed is an approach tailored to the specificities of Africa. For example, most commerce is conducted in traditional markets. If we want to reassure, stabilize, and make an inclusive dialogue, we have to include the population - to work with the population is the only guarantee of stabilization. Because there are those who exploit misery and transform it into a threat. Securing the country is important and urgent. Morocco is training the security workers in Libya, but this approach is of a different dimension. What is necessary is to approach the reality of the people and reassure the population with community engagement.

Q: (Charles Dahan, VP World Federation of Moroccan Jews) We should work on the exchange of education between the US and Morocco. It is important we have a transmission of knowledge between the US and Morocco to advance higher education. That will transform the economy. Investment, building new factories, and creating jobs in Morocco will be essential, and in order to build good investment, you have to build a good knowledge base. A: (Minister Mezouar) I agree. In the field of training, Morocco has something like 10,000 places for training, in universities and schools, of which 7,000 are funded by the Moroccan government. There is also professional development and administration training, like customs, finance. Each sector participates in training in its own program. This is equally supported by the Moroccan private sector. This is a fundamental dimension, and as noted in many countries, those that have adopted Morocco's path are in what is called "the economic emergence." And since we have gone through this experience we can put in place a strategy to identify needs in competencies. So we oriented training to the needs of the market of today and the market of tomorrow. So we provide our expertise to obtain concrete results. But Africa has changed. It has exceptional elites at every level. It has great competence, affirmed by private sector success. But there is a new generation, economic and political, and stereotypes have closed the world's eyes to this transformation or development. One must have confidence in Africa and Africans that we will put in place good mechanisms, because success must come from within, it cannot be imposed from without. We must let society produce the elements of development.

5. Observations

This event was attended by approximate 90 foreign policy professionals and members of both the American and Moroccan media, who conducted interviews in the hallway before and after the event. It was one of the major events of the delegation, which took on a tone of celebrating the past and future of the US-Morocco relationship. Given the namesake of the host think-tank, the speakers aimed to bring about more awareness of Morocco as a keystone of the transatlantic relationship. Speakers lauded the leadership in Morocco that has led to a serious commitment to reform and to improving security and human development across the region and the continent. The question and answer session was brief (two questions) and reflected the positive tone of the speakers.

Video of the event is available here.

(Back to top)

A Strategy for American Engagement in the Middle East with Rep. Adam Smith

Date: December 5, 2013

1. Title: A Strategy for American Engagement in the Middle East with Rep. Adam Smith

Hosted by NDN

Participants:

Rep. Adam Smith: Ranking Member of the House Armed Services Committee

Simon Rosenberg: Moderator: President & Founder, NDN

2. Overview

This event invited a leading voice on US foreign policy in Congress to discuss the future of US policy in the Middle East and North Africa (MENA). Rep. Smith serves on the House Armed Services Committee and is very well versed in foreign affairs, security, and the MENA region. He spoke on current affairs such as Syria and Egypt, as well as more broadly on how the US could improve its prospects for policy outcomes in the region. There were several questions asked and answered before the Congressman had to leave.

3. Summary

After a brief introduction of the guest of honor, Rep. Smith began detailing priorities for US policy in the Middle East and North Africa (MENA). Dealing with the “youth bulge” and the economics of creating employment and upward mobility are paramount for US goals in the region, he said. There is equal threat and promise inherent in a young population. He added that the US needs to work with companies to encourage Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) to create economic opportunity. Rep. Smith concluded that policymakers lose sight of that a bit when the focus is fixated on politics and security. Despite some assertions that poverty doesn’t lead to extremism, Rep. Smith stated that he believes strongly in this connection, and that it should be a priority for foreign policy.

It has been suggested that growing pessimism amongst policymakers and the American public regarding foreign policy outcomes will result in a significant de-emphasis of the MENA region in US policy. Rep. Smith stated that the US must continue to be engaged, but that expectations must be tempered with the knowledge that a limited role will be most effective. No country can magically fix another country with a policy, he said. In addition, there is a persistent mistrust of the US in the region. Policymakers should thus be realistic, though optimistic, about expected outcomes.

Most of all, US policy needs more clarity. Focusing on economic opportunity, political freedom, stability, and discouraging extremism, the US needs to be honest and open about its balance of principles and priorities in the region – much more so than it has, Rep. Smith said. “We need to help our friends in the region more than we have.” He added that the US cannot afford to neglect MENA nor be unclear as to what our policies are.

4. Q&A

Q: What are your short-term concerns with current US policy?

A: The manner in which we interact with our allies in the region, characterized by a lack of clarity, concerns me most. There isn’t really any “perfect way” to handle foreign policy, and in the case of Syria’s chemical weapons, the US “stumbled into an okay place.” There is still much room for improvement.

Q: (Ed Kutler, Managing Director at Mercury) Is withholding military aid an effective policy tool?

A: Military aid is a good way to build and maintain relationships between countries, but what recourses are available when countries don’t meet policy standards? Policymakers need to be aware of multiple priorities and the unlikelihood of direct outcomes from such actions.

Q: (Nelson Cunningham, Chair of the Latin America Policy Initiative at NDN) Is there a possibility of shifting priorities from military aid to economic aid with regard to US aid to Egypt?

A: US emphasis here has been generally unbalanced in that regard. Much of the aid ends up going towards the purchase of American weaponry, resulting in a credible industrial consideration that can’t be ignored.

Q: Could you please address obstructionism in Congress against certain foreign policy goals, notably the threat of new sanctions against Iran?

A: The case for aid needs to be made better, especially in Congress. There is also an ideological dimension at play, given that investment at home has continued to decrease as well. Increasing sanctions against Iran would be a huge mistake, despite my personal belief that Iran will never be a good actor on the international scene.

Q: Does US aid have any real impact?

A: Credibility is paramount to foreign policy and aid and help during crisis does actually play a role in increasing that credibility.

5. Observation

This event was attended by approximately 30 foreign policy professionals. NDN is looking to raise the profile of its relatively new MENA initiative, using political connections to bring in policymakers and help shape the conversation. Questions seemed to reflect similar ideologies for improving US policy as those of Rep. Smith. The event was also open to the press and streamed online on the NDN website.

\(Back to top\)

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Saturday, January 25, 2014 2:57 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian Situation report

The information contained in this report is from public and private sources; and has not been corroborated by other sources as to its accuracy.

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

January 24, 2014

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- President Bouteflika has again confounded rumours of his demise by returning from Paris, where he had been undergoing medical tests, just in time to sign the decree calling the presidential election, which is to be held on April 17.
- Although he seems physically badly diminished in his rare public appearances and his speech has been impaired, a usually reliable source close to Bouteflika's inner circle insists that he intends to stand for re-election in April, and that his health is strong enough to permit it.
- The new Special Security Commission has met for the first time, under the chairmanship of CoS Gaïd Saleh, to approve a number of measures including early retirement for several senior DRS officers, giving the appearance that the military has the upper hand over the intelligence services and, indeed, the civilian wing of the state.
- On the other hand, Bouteflika's special security advisor, who is a lieutenant-colonel in the DRS, has been appointed secretary of the High Security Council, suggesting that there is still life in the Bouteflika-Tewfik tandem.

Foreign Relations

- Algerian defence spending shows an increase of over 15% in the 2014 budget, accounting for a fifth of total government expenditure, while Morocco has approved a four-year plan to increase defence spending by 18.5%.
- Talk of an all-out arms race between the two countries appears to be overblown, however, with Algeria launching big-ticket programmes that had been postponed during the years of civil war while Morocco has to spend increasing amounts on repairing and upgrading second-hand equipment acquired from its Western allies.
- There is no noticeable change in Algerian military doctrine, which seems to be built around the concept of "advanced defence".

Security

- Algiers remains calm, and there have been a scant few reports of incidents in the oil and gas producing areas.
- AQMI has announced that the small Defenders of Salafi Preaching group, based in north-west Algeria, has finally decided to join forces with it in a united organisation.
- Three suspected members of the Sons of the Sahara movement – which has reportedly merged with a hitherto unknown Tuareg group – have been arrested on suspicion of serving as guides for jihadists between south-west Libya and northern Mali.
- Mokhtar Belmokhtar's Al-Mourabitoun group has issued a report on its operations in 2013 suggesting a strong focus on fighting French forces in northern Mali.
- Sources at Sonatrach indicate that the military is moving to establish direct control over Sonatrach's own security operations and that plans to establish a security subsidiary seem to have been put on hold until after the presidential election.
- The military is said to have agreed in principle to allow IOCs to hire foreign private security firms to secure facilities in southern Algeria, although this has not been made public.

Political Trends

On Jan. 13, official government news agency APS unexpectedly announced that President Bouteflika had flown to France that day for medical tests at the military-run Val de Grâce hospital in central Paris. Although this was, according to APS, all part of the scheduled follow-up treatment after the stroke he suffered in April of last year, the announcement inevitably sparked a new, fevered bout of rumour and speculation: Bouteflika had been medevacked again after a sudden deterioration in his condition, it was widely assumed; some news sites reported that the President's family were in Paris to accompany him, lodging at the de luxe George V hotel, while Algerian daily El Watan claimed that the military's High Command had met in urgent session to take stock of the situation; and pretty soon social media and certain news outlets (Radio France Maghreb and Israeli French-language website Jerusalem Plus, for example) were reporting that Bouteflika had passed away.

The suggestion that the President had been flown to Paris for emergency treatment after a decline in his health rather than for a “routine check-up” appeared all the more plausible in light of his last public appearance, just a fortnight previously: Bouteflika had seemed shockingly diminished in TV footage of the signing of the 2014 Finance Law at a meeting of the Council of Ministers convened for that purpose alone on Dec. 30 (just 24 hours short of the legal deadline). Furthermore, the President had suddenly left the country, with no date initially set for his return, just before another crucial deadline: the constitution requires the head of state to issue a decree formally convening a presidential election at the latest 90 days before the expiry of the current presidential term of office^[1], which in this instance meant that the President had to put his signature to the decree by Jan. 19 at the latest. A separate APS dispatch, issued after Bouteflika had been admitted to Val de Grâce, announcing the forthcoming decree “except in case of force majeure and notwithstanding the provisions of article 88 of the constitution^[2]”, only added to the suspicion that the President's absence at this crucial juncture was anything but “routine”.

Bouteflika at least put paid to the rumours of his death^[3] by returning to Algiers in the afternoon of Jan. 16, and the following day he duly signed the decree convening the presidential election for April 17. As expected, his old rival Ali Benflis was the first out of the starting blocks, officially announcing his candidacy as of Jan. 19. Bouteflika has made no such declaration himself – although this has not stopped a fresh wave of speculation concerning the supposed launch of his campaign for re-election for a fourth consecutive term, however weak his health might be (with at least one Algerian journalist claiming that the President's influential brother and advisor Saïd had contacted the editors of several newspapers and other media as of the evening of Jan. 17 to instruct them to begin campaigning for the re-election of the President)^[4].

In the midst of all this, a trusted source at the Presidency assured us, during the afternoon of Jan. 16, that Bouteflika had indeed been in Paris for a routine check-up, would be back in Algiers later that same day “or on Jan. 17 at the latest”, and would be running for a fourth term; the President was in a reasonable condition, the source insisted, admitting that his speech is impaired but claiming that this is not the consequence of his April 2013 stroke but rather of an operation on his oesophagus “three or four years ago”. This account may appear in many respects counter-intuitive^[5], but it is noteworthy that the source – who has almost always proved reliable in the past – was correct about Bouteflika's return at a time when most commentators were busily writing the President off as moribund, suggesting continued close proximity with the head of state's inner circle. On balance, it would in our view be unwise to dismiss the possibility that Bouteflika will indeed attempt to run for a fourth term of office, despite his apparent physical frailty (although if he does, it seems increasingly likely that it will be without the prop of a formal vice-presidential candidate, since there would no longer seem to be time to amend the constitution prior to the election).

The same source at the Presidency also confirmed that a high-level military meeting had taken place on Jan. 13, but insisted that it had nothing to do with Bouteflika's condition but rather was a “routine” meeting to decide on various retirements and appointments within the military and security apparatus. This appears to be borne out by a report dated Jan. 13 by news portal Tout Sur l'Algérie (which seems to have been used as a conduit for information relating to changes within the security services on numerous occasions over the past year) indicating that a meeting had been held earlier in the day under the chairmanship of Chief-of-Staff of the armed forces Lt-Gen. Ahmed Gaïd Saleh to formally approve the retirement of a number of high-ranking DRS officers: the ex-head of the Direction Centrale de la Sécurité de l'Armée Maj-Gen. Mhenna Djebbar^[6], the former head of the media management department Col. Fawzi, and the former commander of the DRS' special intervention force Col. Hassen. TSA indicated that this was the first meeting of the Special Security Commission^[7] – a body that was reportedly set up by presidential order late last year to vet and approve decisions of the General Staff relating to all promotions, retirements, procurement etc. (see previous report). Intriguingly, initial reports in the Algerian media in early December had suggested that the Special Security Commission was to be chaired by PM Sellal and as such was intended to signify the submission of the military and security apparatus to the elected, civilian executive branch. In the event, however, it would seem that it is chaired by the Chief-of-Staff, thus symbolising quite the opposite: the relative autonomy of the military and security apparatus, at least at the present juncture.

Furthermore, the fact that it is the CoS who chairs meetings of the body that officially approves personnel changes at the DRS would seem, on the surface of things, to signify the submission of the DRS to the regular military. Appearances can be deceptive, however, and it may be premature to conclude that Lt-Gen. Gaïd Saleh – who is close to retirement himself and reportedly despised by many of his own colleagues within the regular army as well as being on bad terms with various senior DRS officers – is really lording it over both the civilian branch of the regime and the powerful intelligence and security service. In this connection, it may be worth noting a small item, tucked away at the bottom of a page in the Journal Officiel (the Algerian government gazette) in mid-December, officialising the appointment of Djamel Eddine Bouzghaia as secretary of the High Security Council – a body made up of top military officers and senior ministers^[8] which meets irregularly under the chairmanship of the President of the Republic, whom it is supposed to advise on matters relating to national security. Lt-Col. Bouzghaia, who hails from western Algeria and has a doctorate from a French university in international relations and energy cooperation, has been President Bouteflika's special security advisor since around 2010, with particular responsibility for issues relating to the Sahara and the Sahel. Significantly, he is a

DRS officer, who is understood to have made his career in the Direction de la Documentation et de la Sécurité Extérieur (foreign intelligence branch), and for years served as the head of the Institut Supérieur des Etudes de Sécurité, a research centre run by the DRS. This would seem to suggest that there may be still life left in the partnership between Bouteflika and DRS chief Lt-Gen. Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène that has dominated the power structure for almost a decade.

Foreign Relations

Ratified and signed into law on Dec. 30, the Algerian government's budget for 2014 has been criticised by some members of parliament and journalists for the remarkably high levels of spending devoted to defence and security: with a total of $19bn (DA 1,496,635bn) the Ministries of Defence and the Interior take up no less than 31.75% of the government's budget for this year^[9]. The $12.132b (DA 955,926bn) earmarked for the Ministry of National Defence alone represents just over 20% of total state expenditure, and is up some 15.75% on last year. At the same time, Morocco's government has approved a staggered increase in defence spending of 18.5% over four years (rising from $3.8bn in 2014 to $4.5bn in 2018). Do these figures signify an arms race between the two countries, as some media have suggested?

The first observation that needs to be made is that, while the 15.75% increase in Algeria's defence budget that has drawn so much attention is undeniably a hefty increase, it is by no means exceptional: one has to go as far back as 2007 to find a year-on-year increase in military expenditure of less than 10%, with figures in the 20s being fairly typical^[10]. Moroccan defence spending has also been growing constantly since at least 2003, but at significantly lower rates (only in 2008 did year-on-year growth exceed 10%), and it is since the mid-2000s that the gap between levels of defence spending in Algeria and Morocco really began to open up^[11].

It has been suggested^[12] that the increase in Algerian defence spending reflects “the renewal of military equipment, which fell ten years behind because of the embargo of the 1990s and the stoppage of the Russian defence industry”. There is a grain of truth in this, but only a grain. It is certainly the case that Russia's military production was subject to disruption in the 1990s following the collapse of the Soviet Union (traditionally Algeria's leading supplier), and there was some reticence on the part of certain Western countries about selling weapons systems to Algeria during this period due to concerns about human rights. But the “embargo” (about which Algerian politicians and media love to complain) was never a formal one, and certainly never total – Algiers continued to buy weapons systems and other materiel throughout the conflict, notably from suppliers such as South Africa but even, on occasion, from Western countries including the United States. But Algerian defence spending through the 1990s – a period when resources were stretched due to low oil prices and the high cost of lending for the then decidedly unbankable Algerian state – was obviously mainly focussed on winning the civil war. Spending began to balloon as of the mid-2000s, with the pressure of the civil war receding and oil prices on the rise^[13], as Algeria turned back massively to Russia for big-ticket projects, for the air force and land forces in particular, that seem to have been postponed during the 1990s^[14]. Attention has since been paid to the navy also.

The latest increases in defence spending can be seen as a continuation of that trend. But it is very much worth noting that these new – or rather postponed – acquisitions do not seem to correspond with any significant change in Algeria's military doctrine. The Algerian armed forces' orientation remains essentially defensive, with no investment in weapons systems that could be said clearly to be designed for major, long-term operations beyond the country's borders; recent acquisitions seem intended in part to build the capability to sanctuarise Algeria's territory while maintaining the possibility of launching limited strikes beyond its borders in case of war^[15] - an orientation that has been described as “advanced defence”. Other acquisitions – such as the three planned squadrons of Mi28 heavy attack helicopters – remain focussed on counter-insurgency operations.

Meanwhile, Morocco's four-year defence expenditure plans – which represent an average annual increase of only 4.5% – seem to have less to do with a race to catch up with Algeria than with the need to maintain and/or modernise existing equipment. Rabat has for some time had a strategy of buying used equipment from the surplus stocks of the United States and other NATO countries, including France, at cut-rate prices – for example the 200 Abrams M1A1 main battle tanks, which had served in the Gulf War, acquired from the US in 2011, and in recent weeks three Harfang drones that had been used by French forces in Afghanistan – while on occasion persuading friendly and far wealthier Arab countries, notably Saudi Arabia, to finance certain big-ticket acquisitions (over recent years, the more expensive and more advanced systems have tended to be for the air force and the navy, which had been lagging behind Morocco's land forces). This strategy has turned out to have hidden costs, however. The second-hand weapons systems that have fleshed out the land forces' inventory have frequently required repairs and upgrades to make them fully operational – reportedly costing as much a $1bn in the case of the Abrams MBTs. The newer and more advanced systems that Rabat has acquired, meanwhile, may turn out to be prohibitively costly to use: the Moroccan air force's 22 new F-16 fighters, of which the last three were delivered in mid-2012, reportedly rarely leave the tarmac at Ben Guerir air base, at least in part for budgetary reasons. Thus, while in certain areas the Moroccan military may arguably have the qualitative edge over Algeria thanks to occasional acquisitions of high-quality Western weaponry, it remains a moot point whether its personnel have been able to acquire the training and practice needed to operate some of its more advanced systems.

Security

By the end of December, the monthly level of political violence nationwide was slightly lower than average of previous months, with 13 incidents over all, of which six were at the initiative of AQMI (or other jihadist groups). So far January appears to be on a par for the number of incidents (nine up to Jan. 19), but not in terms of AQMI operations, of which only two have been recorded so far.

ALGIERS and its immediate environs have remained quiet. The most significant development in the north of the country over the past month came on Dec. 22, when AQMI issued a brief statement^[16] announcing “the good news” that “our brothers of the Defenders of Salafi Preaching group have decided to join Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb to join one united group”. The Defenders of Salafi Preaching, also known by the Arabic acronym, is a small jihadist group of a few dozen fighters at most that has been active on and off in north-western Algeria under this name since 1998. Like AQMI's ancestor the GSPC, HDS is a split-off from the former GIA, but it had until the latest announcement steadfastly rejected merger suggestions from the GSPC/AQMI. The fact that HDS has at last decided to join forces with AQMI may be a sign that it is under pressure and increasingly unable to recruit, as would-be jihadists prefer to go Syria or other, more active theatres (a consideration which seems also to apply to AQMI itself).

There have been scant reports of jihadist activity in the OIL & GAS PRODUCING REGIONS:

- Algerian security sources told Chinese news agency Xinhua that the Algerian army, using helicopter gunships, on January 14 intercepted and killed three jihadists in the Grand Erg Occidental some 700 km south of Algiers. The jihadists were travelling on an offroader and were “aiming to infiltrate the gas-producing zone of Hassi Rmel in the wilaya of Laghouat”. Their car was destroyed. El-Khabar (16/01) reported that 50,000 soldiers were mobilised across eight wilayas in the Algerian south and the eastern and southern borders after the operation (a deployment it claimed was related to “intelligence reports” suggesting that jihadist groups were planning a big operation against oil and gas sites to mark the first anniversary of the In Amenas attack).
- In a somewhat garbled report, Algerian daily Echourouk (15/12/13) claimed that three smugglers were captured by the Army and the Gendarmerie in an area it referred to as “Takalguemine” south of In Salah, wilaya of Tamanrasset, on Dec. 14. The smugglers were said to have been travelling in an offroader believed to have been stolen from “the American company Global”, operating at “Khechiba” (Krechba?) oil field. They were reportedly carrying a number of machine guns and a large sum in cash, and are believed to have been on their way to rendez-vous at In Amguel (wilaya of Tamanrasset) with a group of “new Libyan recruits to AQMI” arriving from Bordj El Haoues (wilaya of Illizi).

In addition, mirroring the HDS-AQMI merger in the north of the country, El-Khabar reported on Jan. 8 that the Sons of the Sahara Movement for Islamic Justice had announced in a video statement its merger with a hitherto unknown group calling itself the Free Tuareg Group and pledged to “keep fighting the Algerian army until their demands are met”.

The EASTERN BORDERS were, ostensibly at least, unusually calm. Just one incident was reported near the border with Libya or Tunisia (at least on the Algerian side^[17]):

- El-Khabar on January 12 said security forces had arrested in Djanet, wilaya of Illizi, three people suspected of belonging to the Sons of the Sahara Movement for Islamic Justice during the first week of January. They are suspected of having worked as guides for jihadist groups along the desert tracks from Sebha in Libya to Khelil in northern Mali.

The SOUTHERN BORDERS, too, were relatively quiet, with only three incidents reported:

- The security services on January 3 led a series of raids on smugglers in the areas between Tinzaouatine and Timiaouine in the areas between the wilayas of Tamanrasset and Adrar, near the Malian border. After a brief clash with smugglers in one of the raids, four smugglers were arrested, 16 trucks seized and five weapons recovered. Fuel and foodstuffs made up most of the smuggled goods.
- A similar operation was carried out in the Bordj Baji Mokhtar sector on January 8, resulting in the seizure of four machine guns, ammunition, and more than seven trucks carrying mostly foodstuffs. Seventeen people were arrested.
- El-Khabar also reported that a jihadist belonging to the hitherto unknown “Preaching and Jihad Brigades” surrendered to the security forces in the wilaya of Adrar on January 12, and quoted security sources as saying he had “taken part in 22 operations in the area of Bordj Baji Mokhtar and Tinzaouatine”. He is also reported to have confessed to having been involved in the Tiguentourine operation a year ago, being “in charge of supplies”.

Beyond Algeria's borders, Mauritanian press agency ANI on January 4 said it had received a statement from Mokhtar Belmokhtar's Al-Mourabitoun group giving an account of operations in 2013 (those conducted by its two components, MUJAO and Belmokhtar's own Katiba Al-Moulathamin up to August 2013, and those by the merged group thereafter). Although the list began with the In Amenas attack of January 2013, all other operations were in Mali and consisted mainly of roadside bombs or small attacks against French forces, and indeed the group's statement, as described by ANI, was a long diatribe against France, promising the French forces in Mali “a Soviet fate” and “punishment for the French people for their aggression”.

Meanwhile, one year on from the In Amenas attack, private sources at Sonatrach have shed new light on how security for the oil and gas sector is being reorganised. According to a security manager within Sonatrach's HSE department, speaking to us at the end of the first week of January:

The Ministry of Defence tells us that oil and gas sites in the south have been secured by the army, using its own manpower and resources. Sonatrach's own security structures have been marginalised, playing an occasional role only, providing the army with intelligence. The Ministry of Defence is trying to establish full control over all security-related matters, including Sonatrach's internal security and Sonatrach's own security personnel.

It is clear now that the Sonatrach security subsidiary will not see the light of day before the Ministry of Defence has completed its purge and take-over of security at the national oil company. And this will take several months.

The worst thing about all this, from the point of view of Sonatrach's security personnel, is that discussions are now under way between the Ministry of Energy, the Ministry of Defence and IOCs operating in Algeria with a view to setting up a system to finance security provisions at oil and gas facilities whereby IOCs will be granted significant reductions in taxes and other charges so that they can pay for their own security. This principle has been agreed on, and the discussions are currently focussing on the size of these reductions. But this financial question may end up sparking protests by Sonatrach security personnel, including staff on permanent contracts as well as security guards with short-term contracts.

A few days later, a source at Sonatrach's legal department gave a slightly different appreciation of developments:

All questions relating to the security of oil and gas installations have been put on hold pending the presidential election. Some measures have already been taken, however, including two decisions that were taken at the recent meeting of the Special Security Commission at the Ministry of Defence. Firstly, responsibility for security at oil and gas installations is to remain in the hands of Sonatrach and the army. Secondly, and more importantly, it was decided that IOCs will be allowed to employ the services of foreign private security companies, subject to certain conditions – notably that Sonatrach must be involved in managing and recruiting foreign security personnel, on the strength of individual dossiers that will first have to be validated by the Defence Ministry's Special Security Commission. Applications to operate in Algeria have already been submitted for a number of foreign private security companies that only employ foreign personnel, such as the Dubai-based Olive for example. This decision to allow the use of foreign private security companies has not been made public^[18].

An earlier decision, applied as of Dec. 25, has to do with Sonatrach's own internal security staff: security officials at Sonatrach headquarters and within other administrative units of the national oil company will no longer belong to the DRS but to the Ministry of Defence. Their transfers are under way currently.

Plans for a security subsidiary at Sonatrach have not been abandoned, but they have been put off until a later date – probably until after April 2014. The managers in charge of setting up the subsidiary are still working on it and say they have made a lot of headway, and are now waiting for the Defence Ministry's green light to begin setting up the new structure.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

- [1] To be more precise, the constitution stipulates that a presidential election must be held “within the month preceding the expiry of the president's term of office” and that the electorate must be formally convened 90 days before the chosen date of the election. Bouteflika was sworn in for his present term on April 19, 2009.
- [2] Which allows for the impeachment of the President should “serious and lasting illness” render him incapable of discharging his duties.
- [3] The most alarmist rumours appear to have been propagated by media and websites such as Algérie Express that are close to the RCD, a mainly Kabyle secularist party.
- [4] Technically he has up to 45 days as of the decree convening the election in which to do so – meaning that an announcement could be pushed back as late as March 2 or 3.
- [5] Indeed, the source's assertion that Bouteflika's speech has been impaired for several years is demonstrably inaccurate: in his last public address, the now famous Setif speech of May 8, 2012, the President read clearly and fluently from a prepared text for some 40 minutes.
- [6] When the DCSA was transferred to the General Staff of the armed forces in September of last year, Maj-Gen. Djebbar was reported to have stayed at the DRS, taking over as head of the security and intelligence service's Bureau d'Organisation. One source, with many years experience of the inner workings of Algerian intelligence, at the time tipped him as a strong contender to succeed Lt-Gen. Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène as head of the DRS. The same source now argues that taking retirement does not in any way preclude returning at a later stage to take up higher responsibilities (pointing to the example of Bachir Tartag, who formally retired in 1999 but was later brought back to head the Direction de la Sécurité Intérieure for over two and a half years) and suggests that Djebbar – whose relations with CoS Gaïd Saleh are said to be very poor – may still be in line for the top job at the DRS.
- [7] This was later confirmed to us by a well-informed source at Sonatrach's legal department, quoted at length below (Security).
- [8] While the constitution defines in broad terms the responsibilities of the High Security Council, it does not stipulate who its members should be, this being left to the legislator to define. Although constitutionally it is an advisory body, the High Security Council played a decisive role in suspending the electoral process, ousting President Chadli Bendjedid and designating a new collective presidency in January 1992.
- [9] Listed as operating budget. The Finance Law does not list capital expenditure for the defence and internal security sectors separately.
- [10] 2012 saw an exceptionally large hike of 40%, due largely to pay increases for military personnel that were rushed through in 2011 in response to the Arab Spring.
- [11] In absolute terms, Morocco consistently outstripped Algeria in military spending in the late 1980s and first half of the 1990s, with Algeria only overtaking its western neighbour as of 1997, after five years of very hefty increases as the civil war flared.
- [12] Algerian defence specialist Akram Khariief, quoted in El Watan, 30/12/13.
- [13] Oil prices had fallen to historic lows at the end of 1998, just before Bouteflika came to power, but had more than doubled by the end of his first term of office in April 2004 and the upward trend has by and large continued since (to the exclusion of the drastic but ultimately short-lived correction in the second half of 2008, after a particularly dramatic spike in the first half).
- [14] In 2006, Algiers and Moscow signed a massive arms transfer deal worth an estimated $7.5bn, which included 28 Su-30MKA fighter aircraft, 36 Mig-29SMT fighter aircraft, 16 Yak-130 advanced training aircraft; 8 battalions of S-300 PMU-2 SAM systems, a number of Pantsir-S1

(SA-22) air defence missile systems, and a number of T-90S Main Battle Tanks. It also involved the write-off of the residual Algerian military debt to Moscow inherited from Soviet times.

- [15] Hence for example reported plans to buy between four and six Airbus 330 MRTTs to replace the air force's existing fleet of Ilyushin Il-78 in-flight refuelling tanker aircraft, and a likely order for Su34 long-range bombers.
- [16] Unusually, the statement made no mention of HDS fighters swearing allegiance to the emir of AQMI — and in fact made no mention at all of the emir of AQMI, Abdelmalek Droukdel.
- [17] The Tunisian press did however report that a group of armed young men, described as “bandits” attacked the frontier post of Bouchebka, near the Tunisian wilaya of Kassrine, on January 8. An 18-year-old man was killed on the attack and a Tunisian border guard was wounded and transferred to Tébessa, Algeria, for treatment.
- [18] There do however appear to have been some echoes in the media. On Jan. 16 – three days after the Security Commission meeting – El Watan ran an article entitled “Tiguentourine: the oil majors' Trojan horse” reprising a guest column by former Sonatrach Vice President Hocine Malti published by the same daily on Dec. 23, 2013. In his op-ed, ostensibly celebrating Sonatrach's 50th anniversary, Malti argued that the recent changes in the DRS and the military had in fact been imposed on Algeria by BP, Statoil and other Western oil companies, together with the British and American intelligence services in response to the perceived security and intelligence failures that led to the In Amenas attack. He continued:
- “BP is looking to entrust protection of the Tiguentourine and In Salah sites to private security companies. If BP manages to impose this choice – and everything suggests that it will [...] - other foreign oil companies operating in Algeria will follow suit. And what does Sonatrach have to say by way of a reply, after its outraged protestations that security is a question of national sovereignty? That BP can employ consultants; in other words, security specialists, foreign ones of course, who will tell the Algerian security forces what they have to do. Where is the sovereignty of the state in that set-up?
- “BP and Statoil will of course play the lead parts, but they will not be the only ones demanding changes. All IOCs are now demanding new modifications to the Hydrocarbons Law because, they say, security-related costs have gone up 15%. In other words, what they want is a reduction in the taxes they pay in Algeria.
- “All in all, the IOCs want to set the security standards for Algerian oil installations themselves, privatise the fight against terrorism by employing mercenaries to protect those very installations, and impose their own financial terms for their operations in Algeria.”
- Malti (and the El Watan journalist who summarised his op-ed on Jan. 16) also referenced an article in Le Soir d'Algérie (29/10/13) reporting that “Stirling, BP's British security contractor, has just signed a strategic partnership with Olive, another British company based in the UAE which is renowned for using armed mercenaries to provide security for the sites and personalities with which it is entrusted.”

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, March 02, 2014 4:02 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian Situation Report

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

February 26, 2014

Executive Summary in FRENCH

ALGÉRIE : RAPPORT DE SITUATION MENSUEL

26 février 2014

Résumé

Les Tendances politiques

- PM Sellal a confirmé que le Président Bouteflika se présenterait aux élections en avril.
- Secrétaire Général du FLN Amar Saadani a fait une attaque franche sur le DRS et son commandant, Lieutenant-Général 'Tewfik' Médièn, déclenchant une guerre de mots acharnée dans les médias et encourageant la spéculation fiévreuse sur scissions au sommet de la structure du pouvoir.
- Le Président Bouteflika a cherché à mettre fin à cette controverse de plus en plus préjudiciable dans un long et anormalement franc discours lu en son nom à la télévision nationale, dans lequel il a réaffirmé sa confiance dans le DRS comme une partie intégrante et fidèle des forces armées.
- Il semble y avoir un froid dans les relations entre Tewfik et Bouteflika, datant de retour de Bouteflika de son hospitalisation prolongée en France juillet dernier, mais des sources concordantes indiquent que Tewfik ne s'oppose pas à la réélection de Bouteflika.
- Le discours de Bouteflika a également fait référence à une ordonnance de 2006 sur le statut du personnel militaire qui fixe des limites d'âge maximum pour les officiers supérieurs, et il semble qu'elle sera maintenant appliquée, ce qui augure un changement de génération au sein de l'armée et du DRS desquels Tewfik et chef d'état majeur Gaïd Saleh pourrait finalement se retirer.
- Des sources ont laissé entendre une nouvelle restructuration - et selon toute vraisemblance, un changement de nom - à la DRS, comme le service tente de se distancer de l'image désagréable qu'il a acquise dans les années 1990. Une source suggère que Washington pourrait avoir une carte à jouer dans ce domaine.

Relations étrangères

- Bien que les relations entre les deux pays restent très glacials, l'attitude publique des hauts responsables algériens envers le Maroc a en gros été remarquablement restreinte par rapport à la guerre de mots vicieuse qui a éclaté l'automne dernier.
- Toutefois, l'Algérie et le Maroc sont enfermés dans une lutte d'influence dans la cour de l'Algérie dans le Sahel, comme le Rabat cherche à combler le vide de leadership dans le groupe de pays CEN- SAD.
- La rivalité algéro-marocaine en ce moment focalise essentiellement sur le Mali, où les deux pays sont candidats pour le poste de «courtier honnête» entre le gouvernement central et les groupes rebelles du Nord.
- Après avoir suggéré que Rabat aide Washington dans l'établissement d'une zone de libre-échange américano-africain quand il a rencontré le Président Obama en novembre, le Roi Mohammed VI a entrepris une tournée africaine qui met en lumière les questions commerciales et économiques.

La Sécurité

- Bien qu'Alger reste calme, les zones de production pétrolières et gazières ont vu une poignée d'incidents - dont deux dans les environs d'In Amenas- la plupart du temps liés à la contrebande.

- La frontière de l'Algérie avec la Tunisie, en particulier son secteur nord, a vu une forte activité sur les deux côtés au cours des dernières semaines.
- Il y a des rapports que l'armée algérienne a bombardé des positions du Mouvement des Fils du Sahara dans le sud de la wilaya d'Illizi.
- Une « feuille de route » pour le succursale saharien de l'AQMI a refait surface sur les forums djihadistes ; il appelle à concentrer les attaques sur la France, l'Algérie et les intérêts occidentaux.
- Le groupe de Belmokhtar est dit d'avoir 20 kamikazes formés et prêt à frapper contre la France et ses alliés dans la région.
- Les plans pour une filiale Sonatrach totalement dédié à la sécurité semblent d'avoir été reportés, mais les employés de sociétés privées de sécurité exigent que leur situation soit traitée rapidement.

Political Trends

On Feb. 22 during a visit to Oran, Prime Minister Sellal finally broke the suspense and confirmed that President Bouteflika will be standing for re-election on April 17. Two days later, footage of the President receiving an envoy of the Emir of Kuwait was broadcast on state TV, in which he appeared somewhat livelier than in his previous TV appearance at the end of last year. But there was still no sound, and his message to mark the double anniversary of the founding of the UGTA trade union confederation and the nationalisation of Algeria's oil and gas industry on Feb. 24 was distributed in text form by official news agency APS rather than being delivered as a speech by the head of state in person.

Sellal's announcement of Bouteflika's candidacy broke a suspense that had been growing, in a very real sense, unbearable for the regime itself, the tensions it had generated having given rise to an unprecedented round of public infighting between figures associated with different clans within the power structure. A close look at this extended episode is highly instructive.

Marking National Martyrs' Day on Feb. 18, Veterans' Affairs Minister Mohamed Cherif Abbas delivered a speech in the name President Bouteflika, the full text of which was subsequently issued by official news agency APS and, later, read out in toto during the evening news bulletin on state TV. Lasting a good 15 minutes, the President's address paid only the briefest homage to those who fell in the war of independence before launching into a long, stern and remarkably forthright appeal for an end to attacks in the media on the military and, in particular, the DRS, the powerful intelligence and security service headed by Lt-Gen. Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène. To get a sense of its extraordinary tenor, the speech is worth quoting at some length:

Thoughtless statements made by certain public figures, which have been amplified by commentary from all quarters, have provided the domestic and foreign media with grounds for comments and speculation that are detrimental to the unity of the National People's Army.

Our adversaries, be they hidden or out in the open, have seized on this prejudicial situation to try to impose the idea that there is an internal conflict within the National People's Army, casting the Department of Intelligence and Security (DRS) as a structure that acts in violation of the rules governing its duties and responsibilities.

[...]

The DRS must continue to perform its duties and responsibilities under the law. As part of the National People's Army, the DRS carries out its tasks under the law and in accordance with the laws governing its activities. The point of these reminders is to reaffirm clearly that, contrary to the allegations and speculation reported by the press that are detrimental to the stability of the state and the National People's Army, the DRS, like all other components of the National People's Army, remains fully mobilized to fulfil its missions.

Given the tangible threats that Algeria now faces, in light of the current security situation on its borders, I ask all the officials concerned to take all necessary measures to restore the right degree of consultation and healthy cooperation at all levels and to ensure that every official and every structure should act in accordance with the regulations governing their activities, in the best interests of the nation.

[...]

Stirring up fictitious conflicts between the structures of the National People's Army is part of a process of destabilization that has been carefully prepared by those who are inconvenienced by Algeria's influential position and its role in the region. [...]

Faced with this danger, which is quite perceptible, all officials must listen to their patriotic conscience and act to reduce all forms of tension that might arise between them. It is a question of the very future of the state, of its defence and security. The political and social context as the presidential election draws near – marked as it is by the confusion that has begun to spread throughout the media and the political scene, causing alarm among our fellow citizens under the influence of internal and external disinformation campaigns citing the supposed existence of conflicts between the highest institutions of the country, with serious consequences for Algeria's security and stability – compels me to speak out and say what I have to say in order to put things in their proper perspective.

[...]

I ask all citizens, and especially those citizens who hold positions within the state, be they civilian or military, to realise what is at stake and to take action, each in his own position, in favour of consolidating stability and peace, which are t o have the honor of serving the people, through the positions they hold, have a duty to rise to the level of responsibility that is required by the defence of the general interest.

[...]

The citizens should know that the national security apparatus, about which all kinds of remarks are being made, is governed by regulations that clearly define its tasks and responsibilities, both at the level of the state and within the Ministry of Defence.

In all countries, [the military] may be restructured when the need arises, as a matter of course. It is in this spirit that I decided, in 2006, to restructure the national security apparatus. When implemented in other countries, restructuring does not give rise to any alarmist and subjective commentary. In Algeria, some people, with their subjective and malicious reading of the facts, try to present such restructuring as proof that there is a crisis within the state or within the Ministry of Defence.

While the evocation of foreign plots against Algeria may be a hackneyed trope, the rest of Bouteflika's speech is highly unusual, not to say unprecedented, in its direct and explicit allusions to the DRS and its grave warnings to “civilian and military officials” to cease and desist from infighting that risks putting in jeopardy the unity and stability of the state.

This extraordinary speech comes in response to an equally extraordinary exchange of salvos over the past months, which has escalated alarmingly in recent weeks:

- The escalation appears to have been sparked by Amar Saadani, a controversial figure ever since he took over as General Secretary of the FLN at the beginning of September^[1] and, especially, since his Reuters interview the following month in which he claimed that Bouteflika, of whom he is an ardent supporter, was planning to introduce reforms once re-elected that would put an end to interference by the DRS in politics. On Feb. 3, Saadani gave an interview to Franco-Algerian news portal TSA, in which he returned to the same theme with a vengeance: attempts by his opponents within the FLN to unseat him were being piloted by the DRS under direct orders from Tewfik, he claimed, adding that Tewfik “ought to have resigned” long ago, given the intelligence and security service's record of “failures”^[2]; the DRS was also responsible, he claimed, for spreading “rumours and lies” about the involvement of figures such as President Bouteflika's brother and advisor Saïd or former Energy Minister Chakib Khelil in corruption, warning darkly that “if something bad happens to me, it will be Tewfik's doing”.
- Saadani's remarks immediately drew an astounding barrage of criticism, with most Algerian newspapers rushing to defend Tewfik and many not hesitating to attack Saadani personally: the most lurid example being Le Jeune Indépendent, which ran photos of the FLN General Secretary and the DRS commander side by side on its front page, under the banner headline “When A Homo Attacks A Man”^[3]. Former Justice Minister Mohamed Cherfaoui, for his part, penned a lengthy open letter to Saadani published by El Watan, taking him to task for casting aspersions on the probity of the armed forces, the DRS and the criminal justice system, and revealing that Saadani himself had approached him when he was still Justice Minister to ask him “as a friend” to see to it that the courts would not bother Chakib Khelil when looking into the “Sonatrach II” corruption scandal.
- Meanwhile, leading Arabic-language daily El Khabar claimed to have learnt from unnamed security sources that Bouteflika was preparing to push Tewfik into retirement, along with at least 100 other officers belong to the DRS and various branches of the military. Although El Khabar did not labour the point, other media were swift to conclude that this was because Tewfik had (as Saadani had insinuated) opposed the idea of Bouteflika standing for a fourth consecutive term of office. Within days, media of all stripes were reporting that Chief of Staff Lt-Gen. Gaïd Saleh had deliberately snubbed Tewfik at the mid-January meeting of the Special Security Commission that approved the retirement of as many as 83 officers, including up to 50 from the DRS alone – among them, it would seem, the head of the DRS's Groupe d'Intervention Spéciale, Gen. Hacène. On Feb. 8, the story broke that Gen. Hacène had been placed under judicial supervision or even arrested, with each newspaper and website advancing its own version of the reasons – retention of sensitive documents after leaving his post, the mishandling of the Tiguentourine siege, or even (in the most alarmist version published by Algérie Express^[4]) hoarding weapons and establishing “an armed organisation”.

- In the midst of all this, former DRS agent and newspaper editor Hicham Aboud, who stirred controversy last year by publishing a series of “scoops” on President Bouteflika's state of health and prospects for recovery during his hospitalisation in France, penned a letter to Saïd Bouteflika accusing him at length and in detail of being involved in various cases of corruption^[5]. Aboud's letter, supposedly sent to the President's brother as part of a “fact-checking” exercise in preparation for a book on the Bouteflika clan, was published in facsimile by TSA on Feb. 9. Barely had Saïd Bouteflika had the time to state his intention of suing Aboud for libel when he came under attack from another quarter: on Feb. 11, El Watan and Al-Khabar simultaneously published, respectively in French and in Arabic, an interview with Gen. Hocine Benhadid (rtd.)^[6] accusing Saïd of “running the country by telephone from the Presidency”, with the DRS as his “sole adversary”. Tewfik, Gen. Benhadid argued, is “Algeria's last rampart, without whom the country will go under”. Claiming to speak on behalf of many serving officers who are unable to speak out publicly, Benhadid reserved most of his venom for Chief of Staff Gaïd Saleh, who, he argued, “completely lacks credibility and is liked by nobody within the army” and was responsible for needlessly “provoking” Tewfik. Amar Saadani and others who have attacked Tewfik and the DRS, Benhadid insinuated, had been put up to it by Saïd Bouteflika and/or Gaïd Saleh.
- In a first effort to call time-out, a letter from Bouteflika to Gaïd Saleh presenting condolences after the crash of an Algerian Air Force aircraft carrying the families of servicemen based in the far south of the country, was read on national television on Feb. 11: “Accustomed as we may have become to excesses from some quarters at the approach of each election, this time the vicious attacks have reached a level that our country has never seen since independence, going as far as to try to undermine the unity of the Army [...] No one, irrespective of his responsibilities, is entitled to attack the National People's Army or other constitutional institutions,” warned the President. The following day, Abdelmadjid Sidi-Saïd, General Secretary of the UGTA (the powerful official trade union confederation), issued a communiqué condemning Amar Saadani's attacks on the DRS – conveniently forgetting that Saadani, himself a former trade unionist, had been decorated by the UGTA last October shortly after he had taken over at the head of the FLN.

For those with long memories, this outpouring is in some respects reminiscent of the period preceding the presidential election of 2004, when the Algerian independent press was awash with negative reporting – some of it fabrication, some of it grounded in the truth – on the behind-the-scenes activities of the Bouteflika clan (with Saïd Bouteflika's name already cropping up in relation to stifled corruption scandals). This extremely ugly press campaign was conducted mainly by journalists close to or manipulated by sections of the military and the DRS, as the army chiefs led by then Chief of Staff Lt-Gen Mohamed Lamari sought to get rid of Bouteflika, with whom they had grown exasperated, through the ballot box^[7]. But whereas in 2004 the brickbats were hurled in one direction alone, with Bouteflika unable or unwilling to hit back at the military chiefs via the media, this time round there has been an unprecedented multidirectional free-fire shoot-out. Members of one and the same camp have been taking pot-shots at one another (Saadani and Sidi Saïd, for example, are both vocal supporters of a fourth term for Bouteflika) and, more importantly, the core institutions of the state – the DRS and the Army – have begun to take hits.

What lies behind this unedifying spectacle? The testimony of three private sources, each with differing perspectives and differing degrees of access to the Presidency and the DRS, seems to suggest that there has indeed been at least a partial breakdown in relations between key players at the top of the state, albeit not in the dramatic form claimed by some of the more alarmist press reports:

- A civil servant at the Presidency argues that Amar Saadani's declarations “should not be taken seriously”. Saadani was “acting on orders from Saïd Bouteflika”, and the aim of the whole episode was to send a message to the FLN dissidents, led by Abderrahmane Belayat, “to the effect that Saadani and his mentor, Saïd Bouteflika, were not afraid of the DRS,” to which Belayat had appealed for support. Saïd, continues the same source, “is bent on keeping his brother on as President, even if he is confined to a hospital bed. It is Saïd who has done everything to minimise the effects and consequences of the two Sonatrach corruption scandals. One of his friends told him at the end of January that the DRS would not drop the cases until it has shown him to be up to his neck in corruption at Sonatrach. Saïd, who was drunk at the time, launched into a tirade of insults and threats against Tewfik, attaching obscenities to his name every time he was mentioned”. As for Bouteflika's letter to Gaïd Saleh^[8], responding to Saadani's attacks on Tewfik, it was intended to show that the President is not an adversary of Tewfik or the DRS and that the changes that were made at the DRS last September were necessary and carried out with Gen. Tewfik's consent.
- On the other hand, a source who is close to the middle ranks of the DRS and has many years' experience of the way in which the Algerian military and intelligence services operate, claims that Saadani “is being used by Gaïd Saleh against Tewfik”. In the same way, Gaïd Saleh has also instrumentalised the case of Gen. Hacène in order to damage Tewfik. This, the source argues, has occurred in the context of a tug-of-war between the clans, over whether Bouteflika should stand for a fourth term or whether the power structure should find an alternative candidate. There would have been consensus, in the name of stability and continuity, in favour of Bouteflika standing again had he not suffered his stroke in April of last year, but “now the army is split in two, between those who support Gaïd Saleh and a fourth term of office for Bouteflika, and those who are opposed to both. The DRS is for the most part opposed to a fourth term, but not Tewfik. Tewfik's big mistake was to enter into contact with Ali Benflis and other potential replacement candidates^[9] while Bouteflika was in hospital in France”. The source suggests that what is really at stake in the tug-of-war between competing factions is the nature and extent of the guarantees that can be given to those who have acquired wealth and power under Bouteflika, and even what guarantees can be given with regard to Bouteflika's place in history.
- Speaking to us on the day of Saadani's fateful TSA interview, a presidential staffer close to Bouteflika claimed that the FLN General Secretary had lashed out at Tewfik because he knew he was about to be ditched and his predecessor Abdelaziz Belkhadem brought back to replace him. “Saadani thinks Tewfik is behind this, but in fact it is what Bouteflika wants,” claimed the source, who a week later, as the polemics raged in the press, assured us blithely that “nothing serious” was going on – “only belly dancing”. However, the same source had slightly earlier shed interesting light on the state of relations at the top. After Bouteflika's return from his hospitalisation in Paris last September, the head of the national police force Gen. Abdelghani Hamel “maliciously” told the President that Tewfik had been making disparaging remarks about him in his absence, claims the source, leading to a cooling in relations between Bouteflika and Tewfik that lasts to this day. This should not affect Bouteflika's plans to run for a fourth term, argues the source, who suggested that Tewfik would not attempt to stand in his way, preferring to continue to act as a “faithful servant of the state”. Gaïd Saleh, meanwhile is totally subservient to Bouteflika. The President will go ahead and run for a fourth term, and is physically up to it^[10]. The “only problem is Saïd, who filters everything, so everything the President hears comes via his brother”.

While the sources – all of whom spoke to us before Sellal confirmed Bouteflika's candidacy – may differ in their evaluation of the President's present state of health and readiness to run for re-election, the overall picture which emerges is that the brain haemorrhage that he suffered in April of last year did provoke doubts and misunderstandings, at least for a time, and ultimately caused damage to the trust between Bouteflika and Tewfik. Nonetheless, the DRS chief himself does not seem to be opposed to Bouteflika's re-election (and indeed the presidential staffer seemed to suggest that the rift between the two may ultimately prove repairable). However, the President's stroke also seems to have led to a situation in which the influence of his brother Saïd has grown considerably, while Chief of Staff Gaïd Saleh appears to have drawn very close to Bouteflika, and this situation appears to be making the situation even more difficult for Tewfik.

Beyond this, it is also worth dwelling on Bouteflika's somewhat obscure reference in his Martyrs' Day speech to a “restructuring of the national security apparatus” he supposedly ordered “in 2006”. This appears to refer to a document signed into law by Bouteflika in early 2006, Ordinance 06-02 of Feb. 28 2006 on the general status of military personnel, which, amongst other things, sets maximum age limits and maximum numbers of years of service for various ranks (the top age limit for a lieutenant-general, the highest rank in the military, held by both Tewfik and Gaïd Saleh, is in principle 64; for a major-general, 60; and for a general, 56). The ordinance does go on to stipulate that “a waiver of [the maximum] age [limit] may be granted by the President of the Republic to generals and senior officers occupying senior positions in the military hierarchy”, and it would seem that this has been fairly extensively used over the past few years (both Gaïd Saleh and Tewfik, to name but them, are 74 years old), but reports of a wave of retirements being approved at the January meeting of the Special Security Commission suggest that this may no longer be the case. This conclusion is borne out by the source close to the middle ranks of the DRS quoted above, who tells us that “there are big changes ahead in the DRS and the armed forces, if only for 'biological' reasons, because like Bouteflika, Tewfik and Gaïd Saleh are getting old and will have to go soon”^[11].

But in addition to this generational shift – which itself is likely to extend farther than just the two most senior officers in the military and security services – further restructuring of the DRS would appear to be in the works. Both the source close to mid-ranking DRS officers and the presidential staffer have intimated that, at very least, the intelligence and security service is likely to be renamed in the not-too-distant future, and may possibly undergo additional, more substantive organisational changes as well. The former suggests that such changes are being made because Tewfik and the DRS as a whole want to turn the page on the legacy of the 1990s, when the intelligence and security service was “over-exposed”, while the latter claims that the reorganisation of the DRS comes at least partly in response to pressure from US – two visions which need not, in fact, be considered antinomical.

Foreign Relations

Despite the latent tension that persists in Algerian-Moroccan relations, senior Algerian officials, no doubt preoccupied by more pressing dangers to the east and south, have by and large shown a surprising degree of restraint vis à vis their western neighbour over the past two to three months – especially when set against the virulent war of words that flared, after months of steady deterioration in relations, in October and November of last year.

To be sure, Prime Minister Sellal – never the most careful of speakers – did lash out in mid-December during a public meeting in Tlemcen, claiming that the Algerian authorities had “irrefutable proof” that Moroccan drug money was being used to finance terrorist cells in Tunisia^[12]. But this aside, Algerian government representatives have generally tended to ignore or downplay potential occasions for a new flare-up: Algerian Foreign Ministry spokesmen reacted philosophically to reports in December that Morocco was to build a barbed-wire fence along the border, from Saïdia in the north to Figuig, arguing that that would be Morocco's business as long as construction was limited to uncontested Moroccan territory; the very lenient treatment by the Moroccan courts of the 'Royalist Youth' member who tore down the Algerian flag at Algeria's consulate in Casablanca on Nov. 1 drew no official comment whatsoever; a group of Syrian refugees that the Moroccan authorities had reportedly attempted to expel via the closed border with Algeria at the end of January were refused access by Algerian border guards, but there was no attempt to make political capital out of the incident; revelations in the French media^[13] that Rabat bought two French-made Pléiade spy satellites in 2013 at a cost of €500m passed without comment from Algiers; and even a potentially serious incident on Feb. 17, when according to Rabat Algerian soldiers fired shots towards a Moroccan border observation post at Aït Jomrane near Figuig, seems to have fizzled out after a brief exchange of self-righteous communiqués^[14].

There is no denying, however, that relations remain extremely frosty. Bilateral political contacts appear to be effectively frozen, and by some accounts Algiers has resolved to boycott all international gatherings in Morocco as well^[15]. Furthermore, the two neighbours are increasingly deeply involved in a battle for influence in sub-Saharan Africa generally, and in Algeria's backyard in the Sahel in particular. Since 2012, Morocco has quietly been trying to fill the leadership vacuum in the Community of Sahel-Saharan States (CEN-SAD) left by the overthrow of Libya's Col. Qaddafi^[16], hosting a summit of the regional grouping in October of last year. More recently, Morocco's Assistant Foreign Minister Mbarka Bouaida (who happens to be of Saharawi origin) held fresh talks with the General Secretary of CEN-SAD during the last week of January in Addis Abeba, where she had been sent to conduct informal meetings with delegations attending the 22nd summit of the African Union (of which, of course, Morocco is not a member).

Mbarka Bouaida's highest-level contact while in Addis Abeba, however, was with Malian President Ibrahim Boubacar Keïta. The Malian head of state is now being actively courted by both Morocco and Algeria – he was received by President Bouteflika in Algiers on Jan. 19 – as they compete for the role of mediator in the north Mali conflict. In this, Algiers' efforts appear to be floundering of late: Foreign Minister Ramtane Lamamra's attempts to reconcile Tuareg, Arab and other factions of northern Mali as a prelude to talks between the Malian government and northern rebel movements that are supposed to be held under the terms of the Ouagadougou agreement of June 2013 effectively collapsed in January, with the Tuareg MNLA refusing to send a delegation to a round table that was planned in Algiers and most other groups changing their minds at the last minute. Morocco, on the other hand, has been making noticeable headway: the MNLA has officially requested King Mohamed VI's good offices in the quest for a lasting solution in northern Mali, and sent its General Secretary Bilal Ag Cherif to Marrakesh for an audience with the Moroccan monarch on Jan. 31. In response, Algeria is reported to have unceremoniously bundled another leading member of the MNLA, Akli Iknan Ag Suleiman, who was in Algiers for medical treatment onto a plane for Ouagadougou.

Driving home Morocco's advantage, Mohamed VI this month embarked on another tour of French-speaking countries of sub-Saharan Africa, taking him first to Mali and then on to Guinée, Côte d'Ivoire and Gabon. Chiming with the Moroccan King's suggestion during his meeting with President Obama in Washington last November that the United States and Morocco work together towards creating a new US-Africa free-trade zone, the focus of his latest African tour was essentially economic: no fewer than 17 bilateral economic cooperation agreements were signed while he was in Bamako, and similar initiatives were expected in the other capitals on his schedule.

As noted in earlier reports, career diplomat Ramtane Lamamra appears to have been chosen as Foreign Minister when the government was reshuffled last September largely because of his years of experience as an Africa specialist (and as it happens, on Feb. 19, even as Mohamed VI began his latest African tour, Lamamra was on his way to Niger). But even with the savvy Lamamra at the helm, it is beginning to look uncertain that Algerian diplomacy in Africa will be able to match Rabat's all-out efforts south of the Sahara – not least because President Bouteflika would appear to be physically unable to devote the kind of personal attention King Mohamed VI has been giving to courting African governments.

Security

Taking the month as a whole, the level of jihadist activity in January was comparable to that in December, with 14 reported incidents over all (against 13 in December), though the number of operations initiated by AQMI or other jihadist groups dropped from six in December to only three in January. So far in February (up to Feb. 19) three jihadist operations were recorded out of a total of six security incidents (which include jihadist operations plus security forces operations).

ALGIERS and its surrounding area were quiet. AQMI's stronghold in Kabylia and the western parts of the wilaya of Bouira was also largely quiet over this reporting period (Jan. 19-Feb. 19), with only one operation reported: a remote controlled bomb that killed one soldier and wounded three civilians in the town on Bordj Menaiel, wilaya of Boumerdès, on February 3.

It was the EASTERN BORDERS, and in particular the border with Tunisia, that saw the heaviest action:

- Algerian Arabic-language daily Echorouk (22/01) and others quoted security sources as saying the commander of the 5th military region was in the eastern border zone to oversee a search and destroy mission in the Beni Salah mountains, wilaya of El Tarf, looking for 16 jihadists who were believed to have sneaked in from Tunisia's Djebel Chaambi region. TSA (20/01) said the operation was launched after a Tunisian national, believed to belong to the group, was arrested in the neighbouring wilaya of Guelma a few days earlier. Later press reports indicated that the army engaged the 16-strong jihadist group from Tunisia near Aïn Karma, wilaya of El-Tarf, on Jan. 23-26, killing seven of them.
- Echorouk (10/02) reported that the army had killed another two jihadists in the wilaya of El Tarf “in the areas near the border with Tunisia” on February 8.
- On February 14 security forces arrested two jihadists, believed to have come from Tunisia, in the area between the wilayas of El Tarf and Guelma.
- The Tunisian press reported Feb. 3 that Algerian and Tunisian security forces had “foiled a terrorist plot to attack vital public interests in Tunisia and security positions on both sides of the border area with Algeria”.
- On February 16, a group of four armed men, wearing Tunisian security forces uniforms, attacked a Tunisian security patrol near the town of Djendouba, close to the border with Algeria, killing two soldiers and two civilians and wounding others. Witnesses said two of the attackers “spoke with an Algerian accent”. As the Tunisian press was swift to point out, their tactic of setting up a fake checkpoint is a classic technique of AQMI and other jihadist groups in Algeria.

Two incidents were reported on the SOUTHERN BORDERS:

- The Algerian Defence Ministry announced on February 7 that security forces in the Bordj Baji Mokhtar area had “captured a major consignment of weapons near the town on February 5”. The seizure included “a machine gun, a Kalashnikov assault rifle, two Simonov semi-automatic rifles, and a significant load of ammunition of different calibres.” There was no indication as to how, or exactly where, the weapons were seized.
- The army, acting on information, ambushed a jihadist group near Bordj Baji Mokhtar, on the border with Mali, around February 10-11. The jihadists were travelling on five offroaders when the army forces intercepted them and chased them for three hours, killing six. The rest fled towards Khelil, in Mali.

Three incidents were reported in the OIL & GAS PRODUCING REGIONS of the south, two of them close to In Amenas:

- News portal Algérie 1 quoted local security sources as saying that an attempted attack on an ENAGEO worksite “between In Amenas and Illizi, not far from the Libyan border” was repulsed by the “elements in charge of securing the site” on January 20. The assailants, who were believed to be linked to “criminal networks” (as opposed to any openly jihadist organisation), are reported to have taken a number of 4WD vehicles and lorries before disappearing into the desert. No deaths or serious injuries were reported.
- On February 7, according to El Khabar (Feb. 8) a convoy of security forces vehicles “came under heavy machine gun fire” from an armed group near In Amenas. The soldiers riposted and repelled the attackers, suffering no losses. It is believed the assailants were a group of smugglers that wanted to seize the soldiers’ offroaders.
- Security forces on January 18 “seized a major arsenal” in a cache near In Amguel, just south of In Salah, wilaya of Tamanrasset, including “20 machine guns, more than 15 RPGs and 10 anti-aircraft missiles”. It is believed the weapons were hidden there by smugglers.

Also in the far south, the Sons of the Sahara Movement for Islamic Justice (which in early January announced its merger with a hitherto unknown group calling itself the Free Tuareg Group and pledged to “keep fighting the Algerian army until their demands are met”) issued another statement around January 20 claiming its positions in the Tassili n’Ajjjer mountains, wilaya of Illizi, had been bombed by Algerian warplanes in what it described as “the beginning of military operations against the Movement”. The statement went on to affirm that “our weapons are only to defend ourselves and are not directed against anyone” and that the movement would continue its “struggle for justice and full and equal citizenship rights for the Algerian south”. This statement appeared on social media and blogs, and the incident itself was not reported in any mainstream media, although on January 26 the elbark.com website reported that the Sons of the Sahara Movement “had broken the truce it reached with the Algerian authorities and taken up arms, claiming that its demands — justice for the Algerian south — have not been met”. El Watan (07/02) reported on a demonstration by a few dozen people in Djanet, wilaya of Illizi, on February 2 calling for “an immediate end to military operations in Tassili n’Ajjjer” and for dialogue with Abdessalam Tarmoune, the movement's leader^[17].

Meanwhile, beyond Algeria's borders, a purported “roadmap” of AQMI in the Sahara, supposedly “issued between November and January”, has been circulating on jihadist forums, detailing the strategy of priorities of Yahia Abou El Hamam (Djamel Okacha), emir of AQMI’s Sahara branch. The document suggests that the group intends to focus its attacks chiefly on “the most dangerous foes”, namely the French and “their Algerian allies”, with the Malian army and its local allies in second place. UN and African forces, seen as weak and ineffective, are not considered a priority target. While escalating attacks against the French “at the time when the French decided to withdraw”, the group is also said to be plotting a big operation “to shake Bamako”, targeting, if possible, Western interests, including embassies. At the same time, the document talks of the need to “broaden the scope” of its operations to including Western interests in Algeria and Tunisia and other countries in the region.

At the same time, the Tamanrasset-based CEMOC (Comité d'état-major opérationnel — joint military committee of Algeria, Mali, Niger and Mauritania) is reported to have issued an alert concerning Mokhtar Belmokhtar's Al Mourabitoun organisation, naming some 20 individuals of various nationalities^[18] who have allegedly been trained and prepared for suicide operations. According to Algerian daily El Watan, “interrogations of terrorists arrested in Algeria and information gathered by Algerian, Malian and French intelligence agencies in northern Mali” revealed that Al Mourabitoun is planning to deploy the “group of martyrs” for a large-scale attack against the interests of France or its allies in one of the four CEMOC countries, to be dubbed “Operation Vengeance for the Martyrs Abderrahmane El Nigiri^[19] and Abou Zeïd^[20]”.

As for plans to establish a Sonatrach subsidiary wholly focussed on security for the oil and gas industry, a source at the Presidency, speaking to us in mid-February, confirms these have been postponed:

Discussions about the creation of a subsidiary for Sonatrach's security arrangements have been suspended at the Presidency, and that is also the case at the Ministry of Energy and Sonatrach. The decision to suspend discussions, which is provisional, has been taken because there are more important priorities: securing the borders with Tunisia and Libya, which is drawing heavily on army, gendarmerie and DRS personnel; the presidential election in April, etc. However, there are certain pressure groups, within the UGTA and Sonatrach, that are campaigning for a shorter timetable for the creation of this security subsidiary. The demonstrations by employees of private security companies in Oran on Feb. 9 and 10^[21] are part of this, and oil industry trade unionists have handed out leaflets on the subject in Hassi Messaoud.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Peter Cross [<mailto:peter.cross@tacticalstudies.eu>]
Sent: Thursday, February 27, 2014 9:25 AM
To: Edward Gabriel; Fatima Kurtz; Jean AbiNader; Bob Holley; Jordan Paul
Subject: AMSR etc

Our latest AMSR attached.

Notwithstanding our observation in this month's AMSR that Algerian government officials have been relatively restrained in their comments re Morocco over the past couple of months, there is a spot of unpleasantness brewing as a result of Rabat's current spat with France, with suggestions in the Moroccan press that the whole affair (and in particular the serving of writs for torture against DGST commander Abdellatif Hammouchi while in France) is the result of dirty tricks by a supposed 'Algerian lobby' in France.

You may also be interested in the following, from Moroccan newsmagazine Tel Quel, summarising Eliza Barclay and Kirsten Chick's piece published by Foreign Policy earlier this week.

Rgds
PC

Les secrets du lobbying marocain aux Etats Unis dévoilés

Tel Quel

27/02/14

Le site américain spécialisé en relations internationales , Foreign Policy (FP), a publié, le mercredi 26 février, un article dans lequel une analyse du lobbying marocain aux Etats-Unis est effectuée. De grandes sommes ont été dépensées par le royaume en vue de s'assurer le soutien des Etats-Unis sur le dossier du Sahara. Un lobbying qui se révèle être efficace.

Le Maroc a dépensé plus de 20 millions de dollars en lobbying

20 millions de dollars ont été dépensés par le royaume depuis 2007 pour faire du lobbying si l'on en croit les données du gouvernement américain. Le Maroc aurait d'ailleurs employé les services de plus de neuf compagnies de lobbying durant cette période. En 2009, le royaume a dépensé plus d'argent que tous les pays arabes, et deux fois plus que l'Egypte.

La firme Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP) est la plus sollicitée, 13,7 millions de dollars lui ont été versés par le Maroc. Les diplomates américains, passés par le Maroc, sont également sollicités. Exemple, la firme de l'ancien ambassadeur américain au royaume, Edward Gabriel, a reçu plus de 3,7 millions de dollars depuis 2002.

Le Maroc domine la guerre du lobbying

Le Maroc domine largement l'Algérie, principal soutien au Polisario, en termes de lobbying. Depuis 2007, celle-ci a dépensé « 2,4 millions de dollars pour le lobbying ». Une maigre somme comparée aux 20 millions dépensés par le royaume durant la même période. Le front Polisario a, quant à lui, dépensé 42 433 dollars dans ce domaine depuis 2009.

Le lobbying marocain semble être plutôt efficace. En effet, une proposition de loi a été soumise au congrès américain, qui stipule que le département d'état américain (ndlr : l'équivalent du ministère des affaires étrangères) « doit établir un projet en vue de résoudre cette longue dispute avec le Sahara Occidental basé sur le plan d'autonomie sous souveraineté »

Autre illustration de l'efficacité du lobbying marocain, l'annulation du projet américain d'ajout de la composante des droits de l'homme à la MINURSO et celle de l'opération militaire conjointe Desert Lion. La rencontre entre Obama et Mohammed VI, en novembre dernier, est également mentionnée. A l'issue de celle-ci, le président Obama avait qualifié la solution marocaine au conflit de « sérieuse, réaliste et crédible ».

Ce courrier électronique ne contient aucun virus ou logiciel malveillant parce que la protection Antivirus avast! est active.

[1] His opponents within the FLN, led by Abderrahmane Belayat, claim to have mustered the support of the two thirds of the members of the party's central committee necessary for a meeting of the party's ruling body to be convened without the General Secretary's consent, in an effort to unseat him, but have so far failed to receive authorisation from the authorities in Algiers to proceed with the meeting.

- [2] Saadani listed the assassination of President Boudiaf in 1992, the abduction and murder of seven French monks from the Tibehrine monastery in 1996, the assassination of UGTA General Secretary Abdelhak Benhamouda in 1997, the suicide bombings against the Palais du Gouvernement and other targets in central Algiers in 2007, the failed assassination attempt against President Bouteflika in Batna later the same year, and the Tiguentourine attack in Jan. 2013.
- [3] A reference to scurrilous rumours spread by another daily, Algérie Patriotique, which is co-owned by the sons of Tewfik and former Defence Minister and Chief of Staff Gen. Khaled Nezzar, to the effect that Saadani had in his youth worked as a transvestite belly dancer.
- [4] A news portal close to the opposition RCD party.
- [5] Taking a page out of Algérie Patriotique's book, Aboud also invites Saïd Bouteflika to confirm that he is homosexual.
- [6] Former commander of the Algerian army's 8th armoured brigade and then of the 3rd military region, Benhadid was a protégé of President Liamine Zeroual and his powerful security advisor Mohamed Betchine in the 1990s. Having already taken retirement, Benhadid openly supported the candidacy of Ali Benflis against Bouteflika in the 2004 presidential election.
- [7] A plan that was scuppered by a last minute deal between Bouteflika and Tewfik, enabling the President and his Interior Minister, Yazid Zerhouni, to orchestrate a landslide victory. Humiliated by the experience, CoS Lamari subsequently resigned, and the most harmful press attacks on Bouteflika and his 'clan' largely ceased.
- [8] The source was speaking before Bouteflika's Martyrs' Day speech.
- [9] Former Prime Minister Ahmed Ouyahia was summoned for an audience with Tewfik in July, the day after Bouteflika's return from his extended stay in France. The news was duly leaked by Algérie Patriotique (of which Tewfik's own son is co-owner), in what one usually astute source suggested at the time was a deliberate hint that the head of the DRS had bestowed his blessing on the former PM. At the same time, there were suggestions that Ali Benflis was waiting for the nod from the top brass, although there were no reports in the media of any meetings between him and Tewfik.
- [10] A leader of a Tunisian political party, who visited Bouteflika in Algiers at the beginning of February, was also very upbeat about his health, reporting that he greeted him standing up, showed no sign of any particular deterioration in his physical condition and appeared as mentally alert as ever. The source came away from the meeting "convinced that Bouteflika will run for a fourth term – which suits Tunisia and Libya very well, even if the Moroccans would rather see someone more flexible". Note however that the source is a personal friend of Bouteflika's of many years standing, a factor which might conceivably affect his testimony.
- [11] The source suggests Gaïd Saleh will be the first to go, perhaps as early as June of this year.
- [12] Echoing SADR Prime Minister Abdelkader Taleb Oumar, who alleged in a speech on Dec. 8 that "the SADR has evidence of Morocco's support for terrorism and criminal groups in the region in order to destabilize and thus hinder the process of solving the Saharawi question in accordance with the principles and resolutions of the United Nations on decolonization. [The SADR's army, gendarmerie and police] are mobilized to fight against all forms of terrorism and crime supported by Morocco, including the trafficking of narcotics produced in the Kingdom of Morocco."
- [13] La Tribune, 03/02/14: 'Armement : la France a vendu deux satellites espions au Maroc en 2013'
- [14] The allegations were first made in a Moroccan Interior Ministry communiqué on Feb. 17, followed by a Foreign Ministry statement announcing that Morocco's ambassador in Algiers had "entered into contact with the competent authorities" to protest. The following day, Algerian Foreign Ministry spokesman Amar Belani denied that there had been any communication from the Moroccan ambassador and wondered out loud about the "motives behind the mediatisation of démarches that never took place". Belani stopped short of denying outright that any shooting had occurred, however, while Foreign Minister Ramtane Lamamra, questioned at a press conference, seemed to imply that the Algerian forces may have opened fire on "drug traffickers, smugglers or illegal migrants".
- [15] Furthermore, Morocco's official news agency MAP was swift to detect Algiers' hand in the decision prevent a Moroccan delegation from taking part in a three-day workshop jointly organised by the Global Counter-Terrorism Forum (of which Morocco is a member) and the African Union's Center on the Study and Research on Terrorism (CSRT) in Algiers as of February 4. The Algerian Foreign Ministry denied any hand in the matter, insisting that the decision was made by the CSRT on the grounds that Morocco is not a member of the AU.
- [16] Qaddafi was instrumental in establishing CEN-SAD in the late 1990s, and provided the bulk of its funding. Irked by Qaddafi's hegemonic tendencies, Algeria – alone among the states of the region – stayed out, but Morocco joined as of 2001. In June 2012, Rabat hosted a meeting of CEN-SAD aimed at reviving the recently orphaned organisation.
- [17] Tarmoune is reported to have taken over the leadership of the Sons of the Sahara, which has contacts with Belmokhtar's Al-Mourabitoun, after the death of Lamine Bencheneb in the In Amenas attack in January, and to be seconded by the latter's brother, Youssef Bencheneb. In September, there were hints in the press that the DRS had been negotiating with Illizi notables and local youth who were in contact with the group to persuade the Sons of the Sahara to lay down their arms.
- [18] Nine Malians, four Mauritians, three Algerians, two Tunisians, one Egyptian and one Nigerian.
- [19] Killed in the raid on the Tiguentourine gas facility in January 2013.
- [20] The former leader of AQMI's Saharan branch, killed by French forces in northern Mali in February 2013.
- [21] Security guards working for 2SP security firm held a sit-in before Sonatrach Downstream headquarters in Oran on February 9, calling for pay and conditions on a par their colleagues working for Sonatrach itself, according to reports in the Algerian press. Their representatives threatened to hold further protests every Sunday if their demands were not addressed, and the movement appears to be continuing: around 100 2SP personnel held another sit-in in front of the Sonatrach Downstream HQ on Feb. 16, according to Le Quotidien d'Oran (February 17).

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, March 06, 2014 5:17 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: The massive ambassadorial backlog, explained in 2 charts.

INTERESTING, FYI, Ed

Subject: The massive ambassadorial backlog, explained in 2 charts, including Dwight Bush.

<http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/the-fix/wp/2014/03/06/the-backlog-of-u-s-ambassadors-in-2-charts/>

Fatima-Zohra Kurtz
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street, NW Suite 411
Washington DC 20005
Tel: 202-887-1113
Fax: 202-887-1115
www.thegabrielco.com

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, March 11, 2014 1:01 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Recent IHS Reports
Attachments: IHS Morocco-Algeria.pdf; IHS Resources.pdf

I thought you might be interested in these recent articles on the Sahara from IHS – both on resources. This is a subscription-only service, and I am not sure how wide the distribution is, but likely read by quite a few companies.

Thanks, Ed

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Saharan squabble - Morocco and Algeria row over untapped resources

The possibility of finding oil off the disputed territory of the Western Sahara has led to a deterioration in relations between Morocco and Algeria. Nigel Wilson examines the long-running disagreement and its effect on stemming insurgent activity in the region.

Key Points

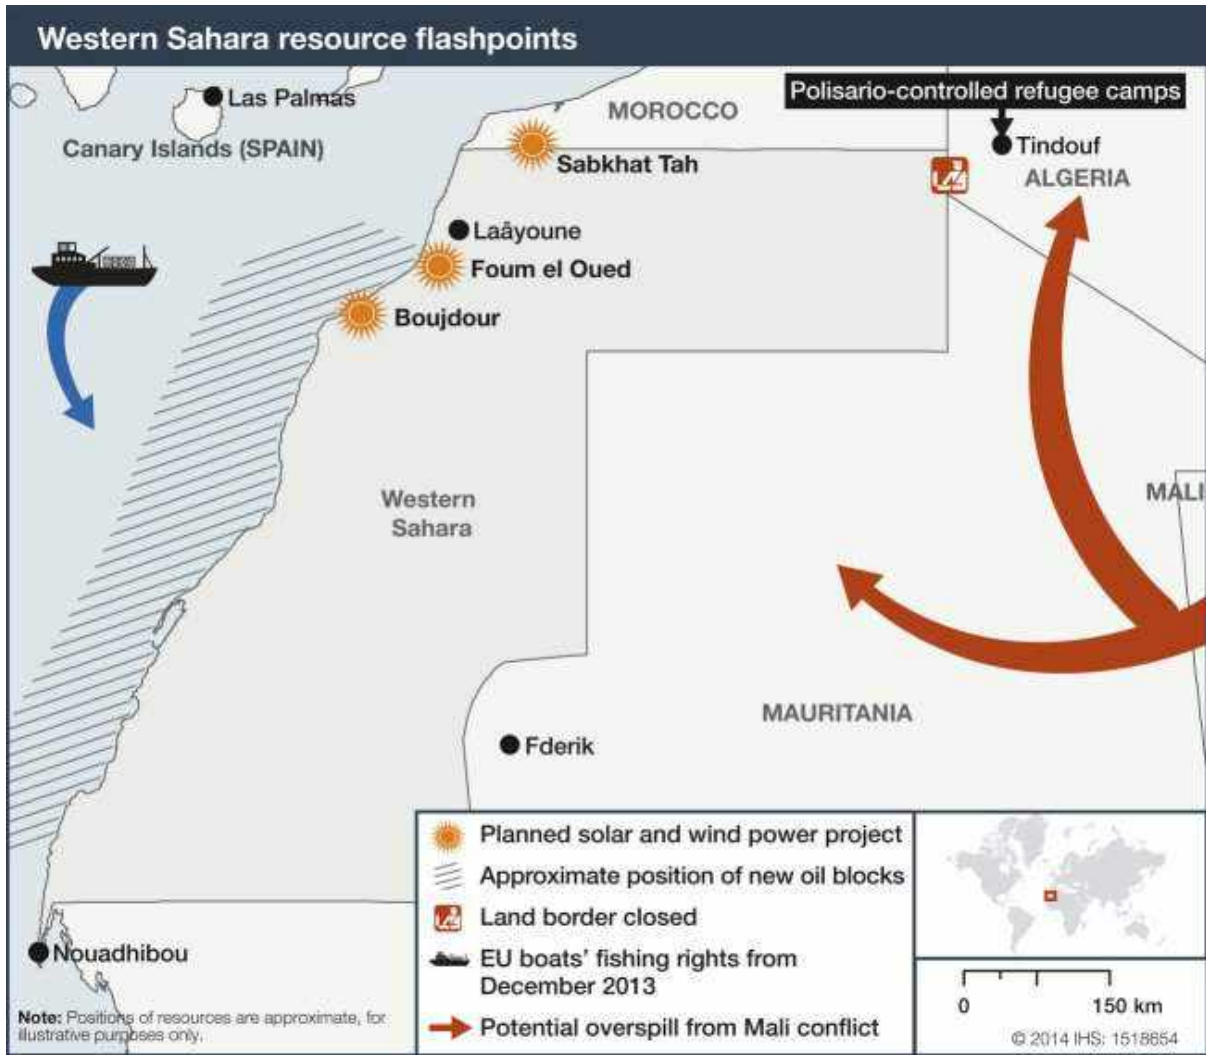

- The stagnant conflict over the Western Sahara looks set to escalate in 2014 as Morocco places more emphasis on resource exploitation in the region.
- Instability in the Sahel region is compounded by some refugees from Polisario refugee camps and Al-Qaeda affiliates apparently colluding on drug and arms smuggling.
- With Polisario losing momentum, the dispute between Morocco and Algeria could escalate if a significant oil discovery is made off Western Sahara.

Morocco's brief recall of its ambassador from Algeria in October 2013 marked a major escalation in the neighbours' bitter and long-running disagreement over the Western Sahara.

Since Rabat first awarded oil permits for blocks off the Western Sahara in 2002, the decades-old dispute over the territory has simmered with increasing ferocity. Moroccan moves to encourage more investment in resource exploitation in Western Sahara have strained diplomatic relations between Morocco and Algeria further.

Western Sahara is considered a Non-Self-Governing Territory by the United Nations, while Morocco has assumed control of most of the territory, which it refers to as its "southern provinces". Moroccan hegemony is contested by the Algerian-backed Polisario Front, an indigenous Sahrawi group based in Algeria. It claims independence in the territory, which it calls the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR).

Infographic showing potential natural resource flashpoints off the Western Sahara. (IHS)

1518654

Morocco-Algeria relations

The animosity between Algeria and Morocco goes back decades, and a significant discovery of hydrocarbons in the Western Sahara would probably provide a catalyst for both sides to step up their diplomatic battle for a share of potential revenues.

The two governments regularly spar over the sovereignty of the territory, which has been largely controlled by Morocco since the withdrawal of Spanish troops in 1975. Following years of war between Polisario and Morocco in the disputed territory, and a UN-brokered ceasefire in 1991, Algeria has maintained diplomatic pressure by calling for a referendum on the governance of the territory as set out in the terms of the ceasefire.

For its part, Morocco has proposed wide-ranging autonomy for the territory, but under its control. Along with the UN, the two sides have failed to reach an agreement on who would be eligible to vote in a referendum on independence in the territory and a vote is not imminent.

In October 2013, Algeria called for international human rights monitors to be allowed into the Western Sahara to investigate reports of abuses by Moroccan security forces. Rabat responded by recalling its ambassador from Algiers. Although he returned to his post within a week, it marked a significant escalation in the diplomatic battle.

With both onshore and offshore energy potential being assertively pursued by Morocco in the Western Sahara, a discovery would be most likely to lead to a hardening of both sides' current positions.

Moreover, the long-running Morocco-Algeria feud is a cause of concern for Western governments aiming to combat the spread of Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and its affiliates throughout the region. The land border between the countries remains closed, with no sign of its reopening in the near future. Following a bombing at a cafe in Marrakech in April 2011, Rabat accused Algeria of assisting the attackers. Algeria staunchly denied the accusations. A continuing lack of co-operation on security between the neighbours would make it easier for Al-Qaeda and affiliated groups to conduct operations across the Sahara and Sahel and pose a security risk for the whole region.

The Polisario-controlled refugee camps at Tindouf in Algeria have allegedly been targeted by recruiters from AQIM, whose members are able to move unchecked between the largely ungoverned Algerian-Malian border, close to the Polisario camps. Residents at the camps are denied citizenship and refugee status by Algeria, leaving tens of thousands of marginalised Sahrawi who could be ripe for radicalisation. In a report to the UN Security Council in April 2013, UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon reported the concerns of regional governments that fighting in Mali could "spill into neighbouring countries and contribute to radicalising the Western Sahara refugee camps".

Refugees from the Polisario camps have colluded with AQIM on lucrative drug and arms smuggling routes throughout the Sahara and Sahel. In the same Security Council report, Ban argued, "The rise of instability and insecurity in and around the Sahel requires an urgent settlement of this long-standing dispute." Although the alleged links between Polisario and AQIM have not resulted in attacks in the Western Sahara itself, collaboration could pose an immediate threat to Algeria, Morocco, and the wider region.

Offshore exploration

Morocco meets approximately 95% of its energy needs through imported supplies, according to figures from the World Bank. Rabat began issuing oil and gas exploration licences for blocks off the Western Sahara coastline in 2002 in a bid for increased energy self-sufficiency. Wariness of the territorial dispute and Morocco's poor track record of viable oilfield finds resulted in the licences attracting modest attention from international firms, because investing in the Western Sahara remains legally ambiguous for international companies. Under UN guidelines, deals struck in the Non-Self-Governed Territory should benefit the indigenous population.

However, since 2013, a number of oil majors have been attracted to Morocco, despite the unresolved conflict. A flurry of offshore activity is expected to take place later in the year. Additional investor interest is most likely a result of the declining stability in the Eastern Maghreb region and increased confidence because of geological surveys suggesting the disputed waters off the Western Sahara are rich in hydrocarbons.

However, if a discovery is made there, Algeria is likely to push harder for a referendum in the Western Sahara, while Morocco will probably try to assert its control over the territory and its resources.

Fisheries and solar

The presence of two other natural resources complicates the Western Sahara issue: fisheries and renewable energy.

Moroccan hegemony in the disputed waters off the coast of the Western Sahara received a boost in December 2013, when the European Union signed a four-year fisheries accord with the Moroccan government, allowing European boats to fish in Moroccan and Western Saharan waters.

The EU had balked at renewing the accord in 2012, amid concern in Brussels that such a deal could strengthen Morocco's claim to Western Sahara. Upon its completion, Moroccan media portrayed the December deal as a political victory, while Polisario strongly denounced the agreement and small-scale protests were held across the territory.

Elsewhere, when Morocco drew up plans for a huge solar and wind power project spanning five plants in 2009, two of the sites earmarked as locations fell within the disputed territory, at Fom el Oued and close to Boujdour.

Morocco hoped the USD9 billion project would generate up to 4 gigawatts (GW) of power upon its completion in 2020. However, almost five years after Rabat announced the project, the sites within and bordering the disputed region remain undeveloped. International backers have stayed away, deterred by the legal uncertainties.

Progress on the project has been limited to a 160 MW solar plant site at Ouarzazate in Morocco. Rabat intends to launch tenders for two more solar plants close to the partly finished plant at Ouarzazate this year, and will probably seek investment from the Gulf region for its projects in the Western Sahara if it fails to court other investors.

Although Gulf state actors have poured money into energy investments across North Africa, they are yet to show any appetite for the onshore solar projects within the Western Sahara. With no long-term solution to the territorial dispute on the cards, Gulf state actors will be attracted by less risky opportunities in the region.

Outlook

The ongoing political uncertainty over the future of the Western Sahara shows no sign of being resolved in the near future. Moroccan-led resource exploration and extraction in the disputed territory looks set to escalate in 2014, following the securing of the fishing and oil deals.

However, the situation remains precariously poised. The dispute between Morocco and Algeria could escalate with increased Moroccan energy investment in the Western Sahara, particularly if oil is found.

Meanwhile, Polisario is losing ground on the global diplomatic stage, as Mauritius became the fourth country in less than four months to withdraw recognition of the SADR. The decision, on 16 January, followed similar moves by Haiti, Panama, and Paraguay, which no longer recognise Polisario. Moreover, strengthening ties between Polisario and AQIM could further destabilise regional security and pose an immediate and long-term risk to resource exploitation in the Western Sahara.

Copyright © IHS Global Limited, 2014

Firms partnering Moroccan state in Western Sahara face higher legal and reputational risks than security concerns

EVENT

Energy firms Total and Kosmos issued declarations made in partnership with the Moroccan government on 5 February, assuring investors that exploration off Western Sahara would be in compliance with international law.

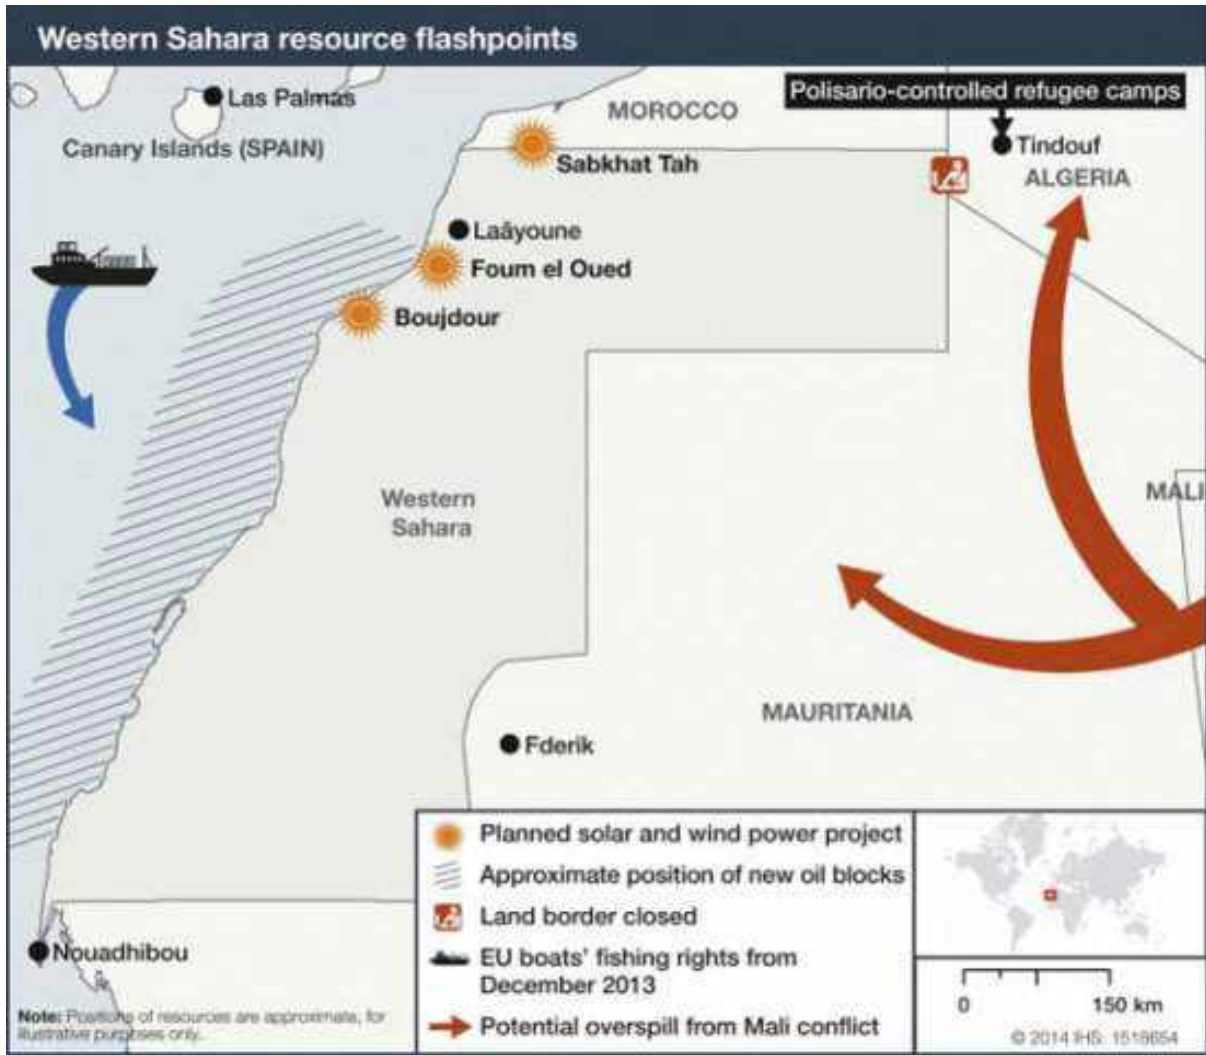

Key Points

- Development of renewable energy projects and hydrocarbons in Western Sahara is key to Morocco's bid to reduce its 95% energy import dependency and meet 42% of its electricity needs from renewables by 2020.
- Morocco probably calculates that Algeria, the main backer of Sahrawi independence movement Polisario, is too occupied with preserving internal stability to pose any serious threat to Moroccan plans in Western Sahara.
- Overwhelming security force capability to suppress protests means that violent risks to Western Saharan projects are only moderate. However, legal and reputational risks are presented by the vague wording of UN legal opinion on resource exploitation, a pro-Sahrawi lobbying campaign, and rival exploration licences issued by the Sahrawi government-in-exile.

Western Sahara is considered a Non-Self-Governing Territory by the United Nations, which has never recognised Morocco's annexation of the territory after 1975. Following a guerrilla war by the secular leftist Algeria-backed Sahrawi Polisario Front against Morocco, a UN-brokered ceasefire was agreed in 1991 and Polisario's armed forces withdrew to Algeria and a small strip of Polisario-controlled territory adjoining Morocco-controlled Western Sahara. However, a promised referendum on self-determination has never materialised due to disputes over who is eligible to vote.

In the meantime, Morocco has attempted to secure its rights to Western Sahara through a combination of encouraging Moroccan migration to the territory, and heavily subsidising aid and welfare in the region in order to foster loyalty to the state.

Infographic showing potential natural resource flashpoints off the Western Sahara. (IHS)

1528514

Morocco's development plans

Morocco sees resource exploitation in Western Sahara as key to helping reduce its 95% energy import dependency. Morocco granted the first licences for oil reconnaissance activities offshore Western Sahara in 2001. Following promising studies, Kosmos Energy, which holds 55% of the Cap Boujdour block along with Cairn Energy (20%) and Morocco's Office National des Hydrocarbures et Mines (ONHYM), plans to start drilling an exploration well (Gargaa 1) in the second half of 2014. France's Total is due to announce the result of its own reconnaissance studies in the Anzarane Offshore block towards the end of 2014. Onshore, reconnaissance studies led by Longreach and San Leon in partnership with ONHYM are occurring in two main areas: Tarfaya, where there are oil prospects overlapping the border between Morocco and Western Sahara, and Zag, near the Western Saharan capital of Laayoune, which has gas prospects and is located towards the north of the territory.

Meanwhile, Morocco is aiming for 42% of its electricity to be provided from renewable sources by 2020. Nareva Holdings, the energy arm of the Moroccan king's holding company Société Nationale d'Investissements (SNI), has entered into a joint project with GDF Suez and Siemens to construct and operate the largest wind farm site in Africa with a capacity of 300MW, also at Tarfaya; another is under construction at Foug El Oued south of Laayoune. Morocco is hoping to attract foreign investment for further wind farm sites with a further 300MW capacity at Tiskrad near Laayoune, and 100MW at Boujdour around 100km southwards down the coast. Solar projects are also planned for the Tarfaya area, at Sabkhat Tah.

Legal and reputational risks

However, there are reputational and legal risks surrounding all of these projects. The United Nations Legal Counsel assessed in 2002 that exploration and exploitation of resources in the territory was only legal if it took into account "the interests and wishes of the people of Western Sahara". The legality of any contract hinges on the question of how this should be judged. The UN opinion as originally issued in relation to mineral resources, but has also been used by the European Commission to justify a fishing agreement with Morocco in Western Saharan waters. As such, any future dispute on the legality of wind and solar projects is also likely to hinge on this opinion. Kosmos's planned drilling in the second half of 2014 will be an important test case in this regard, as it would be the first drilling in Western Saharan territory since the 1970s. The outcome of any legal challenge by the Polisario to either the fisheries agreement (which it said in January 2014 that it would contest via the European Court) or the Kosmos drilling will set an important precedent for other contracts granted by Morocco in the territory.

A further potential problem is raised by the fact that the SADR government-in-exile in Algeria's Tindouf province has granted its own exploration contracts for some blocks overlapping those granted by Morocco. Companies who have entered into contracts with the SADR are small operators, including Ophir and Tower Resources, who have likely acquired the blocks at a knock-down price. Although very unlikely in the next few years, any resolution of the Western Saharan question in the SADR's favour would put these firms at an advantage over the larger operators that signed with Morocco.

Meanwhile, project operators in Western Sahara remain unable to access financing from the World Bank or European Investment Bank, and it is questionable whether they will be able to obtain Clean Development Mechanism emission credits, administered under the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. Reputational risk due to pro-Sahrawi lobbying is a further factor, with four Swedish pension funds, for instance, divesting from firms with connections to Western Sahara in October 2013.

The Algerian position

Morocco likely calculates that despite the legal grey areas, the long deadlock over the referendum works in its favour, and the prospects of commercial benefit from Western Sahara will increase international support for Morocco's proposal of an autonomous Western Saharan region within a Moroccan state rather than a referendum on self-determination.

Despite deteriorating Moroccan relations with Algeria, the Polisario's main backer is focused on maintaining internal stability ahead of presidential succession in April 2014 and is unlikely to devote much attention in the next year to disrupting Western Saharan resource development. Any such attempts would in any case take the form of political lobbying on the international stage, rather than backing for attacks on projects or a return to insurgency. Algeria's appetite to interfere in renewable power project development plans is probably also reduced by the fact that these pose no competitive threat to its own hydrocarbon export-dominated economy.

Security risks

Protest risks relating to grievances over Moroccan exploitation of Western Saharan resources are likely to be centred in Western Sahara's main towns of Laayoune and Dakhla. A heavy Moroccan security force presence means that such protests are very unlikely to cause disruption to power or energy projects. In May 2013, Laayoune witnessed its largest protests since 2010, sparked by the failure to ensure a human rights remit for the renewed UN peacekeeping force mandate. Yet even then, they attracted no more than 2,000 people, and did not affect commercial operations in the area. Sites closer to Laayoune (for example Fom El Oued) are more likely to experience protests than those further from main urban centres, for example at Boujdour or Tarfaya. However, road blockades of more than a few hours, or damage to property at project sites, are unlikely.

FORECAST

Morocco's aim appears to be to convince international investors and bodies that its international legal obligations to protect Sahrawi interests are fulfilled via the channelling of energy revenues to fund development aid for the region. Already, around half of Morocco's national aid budget goes to Western Sahara. Yet this is not matched by genuine political representation for Sahrawis, with Morocco's Royal Advisory Council for Saharan Affairs appointed by the king rather than elected, and meeting only infrequently. However, the failure of the Polisario and SADR to make any political progress on behalf of Sahrawis is also harming Sahrawi loyalty to their leadership.

As a result, although protest risks are still containable, there is a risk of protests erupting against the Polisario leadership itself in the next few years. This would probably happen first in Sahrawi refugee camps in Algeria's Tindouf area, but with a risk of spreading to Western Saharan towns. This disillusionment with Polisario is also likely to lead some to turn to jihadist ideology, although the limitations on capability imposed by the Moroccan security presence in the region means that these Sahrawis are more likely to travel for jihad elsewhere, for instance in Mali.

Copyright © IHS Global Limited, 2014

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, March 26, 2014 5:32 PM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: Algerian situation report

The information contained in this report are from public and private sources, and none of information contained herein has been corroborated by third parties.

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

March 21, 2014

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- Still unable to stand and struggling to speak clearly, President Bouteflika has formally submitted his candidacy papers for the April 17 presidential election.
- Demonstrations against a fourth term for Bouteflika have mostly been fairly small so far, but show some signs of coalescing with other protest movements over socio-economic issues.
- Several important civil society organisations which backed Bouteflika's earlier presidential campaigns as a matter of course have proved reluctant to support him this time round, which seems to reflect a lack of full consensus within the power structure itself.
- DRS chief Tewfik appears to have thrown his weight behind the fourth term option, and is likely to have been instrumental in installing former PM Ahmed Ouyahia, who is known to be close to the DRS, as Bouteflika's chief of staff, in order to counterbalance the overbearing influence of the President's brother and 'grand chamberlain' Saïd.
- Abdelmalek Sellal, who has handed over the premiership to Energy Minister Youcef Yousfi in order to take on the job of Bouteflika's campaign manager, has further complicated matters by making disparaging comments about the Berber-speaking Chaoui community of the northeastern Aurès region, home to the core of Algeria's military elite.

Foreign Relations

- Fighting jihadist groups in northern Mali that are able to move with ease to and from their rear base in southern Libya, France's military is reorganising its deployment across the Sahel states.
- Coordination between the French military and intelligence services and their US counterparts in the Sahel and the Maghreb appears to be flourishing.
- On the other hand, a degree of mistrust persists between France and Algeria in the Sahara-Sahel region. The situation is not helped by Algerian manoeuvring in northern Mali, partly aimed at countering growing Moroccan influence.
- The French redeployment and the growing US presence across the zone have fuelled alarmist reporting in the Algerian media about supposed plots against Algeria, in which Morocco is depicted as assisting Western powers in their efforts to destabilise and carve up the country.
- Such reporting seems however to be largely driven by domestic political imperatives, and may quieten down once the presidential election is past.

Security

- Despite unconfirmed reports of a lone terrorist from the south of the country planning attacks against Western embassies in the Algerian capital, Algiers has remained calm.
- There have been several incidents along Algeria's eastern borders with Tunisia and Libya, including one in which a haul of smuggled MANPADS was reportedly captured.
- The Algerian security forces appear to be getting better at gathering operational intelligence on the Libyan side of the border, enabling them to intercept at least two incursions by armed groups.

Political Trends

On Feb. 22 during a visit to Oran, Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal finally broke the suspense and confirmed that President Bouteflika will be standing for re-election on April 17. Two days later, footage of the President receiving an envoy of the Emir of Kuwait was broadcast on state TV, in which he appeared slightly livelier than in his previous, catastrophic TV appearance at the end of last year, but once again without sound; on March 3 the TV news broadcast showed Bouteflika submitting the sponsorship signatures and other paperwork necessary to formalise his candidacy to the Constitutional Council and even included a very short sequence^[1] in which he was heard speaking briefly, in a shaky and barely audible voice – the first words ordinary Algerians had heard from the head of state since his Setif speech of May 8, 2012. A fortnight later, Sellal stepped down as Prime Minister in order to take up the job of Bouteflika's campaign manager (a role he filled in the 2004 and 2009 presidential elections), with Energy Minister Youcef Yousfi taking over from him as Premier. At the same time, former Prime Minister Ahmed Ouyahia was named Bouteflika's chief of staff (directeur de cabinet) and Abdelaziz Belkhadem returned to his old position as Minister of State and Personal Representative of the President; both are understood to be part of Bouteflika's campaign team.

No matter how widely expected it had been, Sellal's confirmation that Bouteflika was standing for re-election was met with dismay in many quarters. Three of the other contenders – former Prime Minister Ahmed Benbitour, retired general Mohand Tahar Yala, and Soufiane Djilali of the Jil Jadid party – instantly cried foul and announced their withdrawal from the presidential contest (although Ali Benflis, arguably the most serious challenger, has opted to remain in the race and has stated his belief that the army “will remain neutral”). A new group calling itself Barakat! ('Enough!'^[2]), which does not seem to have connections to any established political party, has been set up by civil society activists to protest Bouteflika's bid for a fourth term, and while its repeated attempts to hold demonstrations in Algiers have mostly been quashed unceremoniously by the security forces^[3], it has successfully inspired a growing number of (mostly small) protests in other towns and cities. Students at the universities of Tizi Ouzou and Bejaïa have also demonstrated in their hundreds against Bouteflika's re-election bid, and the same slogans have been taken up by demonstrations of the unemployed in the southern city of Ouargla and by the ongoing movement of disaffected former members of the Garde Communale.

Meanwhile, the “mass organisations” and civil society bodies that rushed to back Bouteflika during his previous presidential campaigns seem by and large far less eager to do so this time round. Although the UGTA (Algeria's official trade union federation) and the Coordinating Committee of Children of Independence War Martyrs (CNEC) did speak out in favour of a fourth term well before Bouteflika's candidacy had been publicly confirmed, it is striking that the Organisation Nationale des Moudjahidine (national organisation of independence war veterans – historically the centrepiece of the so-called “revolutionary family”, which has in the past consistently supported the regime's candidate) initially failed to come out with a clear endorsement of Bouteflika. In a statement issued on March 12, the ONM merely called on the electorate “to fulfil its national duty and choose the person who is best suited to lead the country towards a socio-economic and cultural transition”; commenting on the statement, ONM chairman Saïd Abadou told Arabic-language daily El Khabar that “what matters to us is that this election should be held in the best possible conditions. As for the rest, whoever wins, we will welcome him”. It would seem that the ONM was swiftly called to account, however, since the following day official news agency APS quoted the organisation's spokesman as explaining that “[our] support for Bouteflika is a question that has been settled” (although even this formulation could be said to be somewhat ambiguous). Similarly, Mahmoud Chaâlal, head of the Union Nationale des Zaouias d'Algérie (one of two national federations of Sufi lodges, which enthusiastically supported Bouteflika in the 2004 and 2009 presidential elections^[4]) told reporters on March 7 that “our movement will adopt a position of neutrality and will not support any one candidate” in the presidential election, only to be disavowed, after unspecified “pressure” was reportedly brought to bear, by a communiqué issued in the name of the UNZA on March 18 calling on “all followers of the zaouias and Sufi currents to turn out in force on polling day to elect the servant of the Holy Quran, Mr. Abdelaziz Bouteflika, so as to enable him to complete his political programme”. As for the Fédération des Chefs d'Entreprise, Algeria's leading employers' organisation, a general meeting convened on March 13 – after two failed attempts to reach an agreement among members on the matter – finally resolved to throw the organisation's weight behind Bouteflika, but without the required quorum in attendance for the show-of-hands vote.

Such tergiversations are symptomatic of deep divisions within these organisations as to the wisdom of granting Bouteflika a fourth successive term. A source close to the middle ranks of the DRS and with many years of experience of the modus operandi of the Algerian regime argues that these divisions reflect similar splits within each of the wings of the power structure – the army, the DRS, perhaps even at the Presidency itself. The fourth term option has been steamrolled through in the absence of any consensus among the various clans and interest groups on an alternative candidate, argues the source. The fact that organisations such as the ONM and the UNZA are being whipped into line suggests that the DRS as an institution is backing Bouteflika's re-election, which would be coherent with earlier reports from well informed sources that DRS commander Lt-Gen. Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène has lined up behind the fourth term option. The appointment of Ahmed Ouyahia – who is known to be Tewfik's man – as chief of staff to the President would also seem to be indicative of Tewfik's active participation, and may be intended to build greater consensus within the power structure by introducing a counterweight to, if not actively sidelining, the President's widely mistrusted brother Saïd Bouteflika (earlier said by separate source at the Presidency to have taken on the role of grand chamberlain, controlling access to the President and the President's access to information). There have even been suggestions – which the source close to mid-ranking DRS officers describes as credible – that Ouyahia is being pre-positioned by Tewfik to take on the yet-to-be-created post of Vice President after the election, and thus to succeed Bouteflika when he dies.

But this does not mean that the misgivings of all elements within the DRS and other wings of the power structure have been dispelled, argues the same source, pointing to the case of independent TV channel Atlas TV, effectively forced to close down after a squad of uniformed and plainclothes Gendarmes entered its premises and confiscated cameras and other broadcasting equipment on March 11, apparently in response to its coverage of Barakat! protests and the alleged sympathies of its director of programming Hafnaoui Ghoul^[5] for Ali Benflis. Atlas TV, explains the the source, is effectively owned^[6] by Maj-Gen. Mhenna Djebbar, the former head of the Direction Centrale de la Sécurité des Armées when it was still part of the DRS who was reportedly pushed into retirement in January, and who is understood to be strongly opposed to a fourth term for Bouteflika.

It is not entirely unclear whether such efforts to contain dissent from within the power structure itself will prove effective. If they are not, dissenters such as Djebbar may continue to exploit and encourage dissent in the population at large, with a heightened risk of things slipping out of control in the month that remains before the presidential election. Decisions by the authorities over the past few days^[7] to allow Barakat! to go hold a small protest in Algiers unmolested and to authorise a public meeting by political groups calling for a boycott of the presidential election in the capital on March 21 would seem to denote a degree of confidence on the part of the regime that it has the situation under control. But heightened vigilance would seem to be in order over the coming days and weeks, especially if public protests against Bouteflika's candidacy begin to snowball and merge with socio-economic protests.

The situation is further complicated by an ugly flare-up in sectarian and regionalist violence. In the town of Ghardaia and outlying areas in the southern Mzab valley, communal tensions between the local Sunni Arab and Berber-speaking Ibadite communities have been running very high since the beginning of the year, and flared again in mid-March into extremely violent rioting in which at least three people were killed and countless shops in central Ghardaia torched. This sparked impromptu demonstrations by Ibadites living in Algiers, calling for the army to be sent in to restore peace. On March 16, interim Prime Minister Youcef Yousfi, Interior Minister Taïeb Belaïz and Gendarmerie commander Maj-Gen. Ahmed Bousteïla flew to Ghardaia in an effort to show that the government was taking the situation seriously – only to find themselves compelled to make a stop-over in the north-eastern city of Batna on the way back to Algiers the following day in response to angry demonstrations and rioting by members of the Berber-speaking Chaoui minority, enraged by unguarded remarks made by Abdelmalek Sellal on national TV in which he appeared to insult their community^[8]. Sellal being Bouteflika's campaign manager, anger at his gaffe has naturally merged into opposition to Bouteflika's fourth term, provoking the creation of a new grouping calling itself B'zayed ('Enough' in the local dialect) in opposition to both. Given the recent tensions within the power structure, the incident is all the more damaging politically in light of the fact that the Chaouis, unlike other Berber speakers in Kabylia and the Mzab, have historically provided a large part of the post-independence military elite.

Foreign Relations

Painfully aware of the trans-national nature of the armed groups it has been pitted against in northern Mali since the beginning of Operation Serval in January 2013, and increasingly concerned about the security vacuum in southern Libya, the French military quietly embarked on a reorganisation of its forces in northern Africa late last year. Described as a “regionalisation of the Sahel strip”, this move is largely driven by the need to take account of the fact that jihadist groups active in northern Mali have been able to move to and from rear bases in southern Libya via a corridor that passes through the territory of both Niger and Algeria.

Unable to intervene openly in southern Libya itself and with still less possibility of crossing the border into Algeria, the French military is now looking at a single theatre of operations stretching across the three states in the region which are ready to cooperate: Mali, Niger and Chad. French forces will henceforth have four main bases in the zone^[9]: N'Djamena (Rafale and Mirage 2000 combat aircraft, supported by tankers and ground forces – plus the general staff controlling operations across the Sahel), Niamey (intelligence assets, including two new Reaper drones and Atlantique 2 patrol aircraft, together with combat aircraft), Gao (land forces, plus a large helicopter detachment) and Ouagadougou (the discreet rear base for France's Sabre special forces). In addition to these four main bases, the French army is establishing forward bases further north, closer to the areas where jihadist groups are likely to be engaged: at Tessalit, in the far north of Mali very close to the Algerian border, at Faya-Largeau in northern Chad, and a third in north-eastern Niger. These forward bases are to serve as dropping-off points to which light combat vehicle and other matériel can be airlifted, as well as centres for the collection of human and/or electronic intelligence. Overall, this deployment in the Sahel will mobilise some 3,000 French troops permanently, supported by around thirty aircraft.

French Defence Minister Jean-Yves Le Drian visited Washington in January, partly in order to explain this redeployment to the US administration, and it would seem that cooperation between US and French forces in the region is flourishing. A geographical and technical division of labour seems to have emerged, with the US focussing on the northern half of Libya and collection of satellite and other technical intelligence, while the French cover the more southerly regions and provide more human intelligence (informed by local knowledge of their former colonies in the Sahel). A lengthy report in French daily Le Monde (12/03/14), largely based on conversations with French military and intelligence officers, highlighted this cooperation, noting that there are daily consultations between representatives of the CIA, NSA, and France's DGSE (foreign intelligence) and DRM (military intelligence). Chief of General Staff Admiral Edouard Guillaud is even quoted as saying that “when it comes to confronting Al-Qaeda, we are in almost hourly contact with our American interlocutors at AFRICOM and the Special Operations Command (SOC)”. The US military collaborates with the French in operating drone surveillance missions out of Niamey, and Le Monde suggests that the SOC is working together with French special operations forces based in Ouagadougou.

On the other hand, Le Monde's article concludes with a note of regret with regard to Algeria's role:

Paris has not managed to get the European countries involved as much as it would have liked in southern Libya, where military intervention is ruled out. Better to rely on Libya's neighbours [...]. But for regional action to be effective, the major player that is Algeria is still missing. In early 2013, Algeria did close its border with Mali and support Serval in the Adrar des Ifoghas by supplying fuel, signs that Paris felt were very positive. But in the end [even] the In Amenas attack did not change Algeria's traditional line, which rejects any foreign scrutiny of its handling of terrorism.

Le Monde's military and intelligence sources seem to stop just short of wondering out loud whether Algiers is part of the solution or part of the problem in the Sahel. Similarly, the usually well informed French blog Secret Défense regrets that “on paper, Algiers and Paris are fighting the same jihadist groups, but realities on the ground and sensitivities on both sides mean that this has not led to close and trusting cooperation. Algeria may therefore remain the blind spot of France's 'regionalisation of the Sahel'.”

More specifically, Le Monde quotes a French MoD official as complaining that Algiers has brought Iyad Ag Ghali, head of the Tuareg Islamist faction Ansar Dine and until recently an ally of AQMI in northern Mali, “back into the game”, further complicating regional counter-terrorism cooperation. Before embarking on his short-lived alliance with AQMI in 2012, Ag Ghali had a long history of contacts with Algeria's DRS. Since the fall of the jihadi statelet in northern Mali under the hammer blows of Operation Serval, he appears to have resumed contacts with Algiers, and has reportedly relocated with his family to the village of Tinzaouten, on the Algerian side of the border, with the blessing of the DRS. Algiers' efforts to re-establish its influence in the complex situation in northern Mali, and to counter growing Moroccan involvement in its “back yard”, have also led it to back the creation of a new breakaway group by Ibrahim Ag Mohamed Assaleh, formerly a leading member of the Tuareg separatist MNLA. The new group, calling itself Conseil du Peuple pour l'Azawad, was formally established at Hassi Labyad in the desert of northern Mali on March 18 at a ceremony attended by some 700 people, including members of other ethnic groups according to Ibrahim Ag Mohamed Assaleh. The new movement's leader has explicitly stated MNLA leader Bilal Ag Acherif's rapprochement with Morocco as one of the main reasons for the split, telling Paris-based newsmagazine Jeune Afrique that he opposed Bilal Ag Acherif:

Trying to put the legitimate struggle of the people of Azawad at the service of other ends, notably those of certain states, which do not correspond with ours. [...] I am speaking in particular of the conflict between Rabat and Algiers, in which we should not get involved [...]. It is not so much that he is too close to Rabat. We share a border with Algeria. If it wasn't for French colonisation, there wouldn't even be a border between Azawad and Algeria. Our people is present on either side of this line. But we don't exist at all in Morocco. [...] He asked the King of Morocco to mediate. Instead of soliciting this new mediation [...] we should be accepting Algeria's.

Moroccan involvement in the Sahara-Sahel zone – real or imagined – has been linked to a supposed Western plot against Algeria in a slew of articles in the Algerian press^[10]. French language daily L'Expression has been particularly virulent on this subject, running no fewer than three highly alarmist articles – under the headlines 'L'Algérie est-elle réellement en danger?', 'Moscou alerte Alger' and 'Les dessous d'un plan de déstabilisation de l'Algérie' – in the space of less than a fortnight. The overall tone is distinctly paranoid:

France is going to establish a military base in northern Mali, near the Algerian border. It is already present in force in Mauritania.

The US Marines have chosen southern Tunisia, Italy and Spain to establish their bases in order to intervene in North Africa in case of force majeure. And there is such a good excuse! The fight against terrorism [...] is a cover for the West's true objective: to besiege Algeria, a major producer of oil and natural gas. It would be naive not to believe in a strategic and geopolitical conspiracy against the only state that has not been subject to the vagaries of the Arab Spring.

[...]

The contours of a Machiavellian plot against Algeria are becoming clearer. Moscow, in the person its Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, has taken the trouble of alerting the Algerian authorities.

[...]

During a brief visit to Tunisia a few days ago, the Russian Foreign Minister argued that “foreign parties” are marketing an “Algerian spring” with the real aim of laying waste to Algeria. Without naming them, the Russian diplomat added that these same parties “have opened several fronts near the Algerian borders, in Libya, Tunisia and Mali.” [...]

The Russian Foreign Minister directly incriminated those who lay behind the upheavals that were deliberately stirred up in Tunisia, Libya and Mali, whence comes the biggest threat against Algeria. He believes that the conspirators of the new world order draw up their their plans based on a policy of influence, focusing on minority groups and terrorist networks^[11].

[...]

Even Morocco is a party. Does not [King Mohamed VI's] recent trip to Mali point to a predetermined agenda? The hand of the Makhzen is no stranger to what is going on in Ghardaia, where revolts among local people have broken out again. Drug barons and members of MUJAO are behind this, according to very well informed sources. The goal, obviously, being to create an unsettled environment in order to destabilise the country.

[...]

To achieve his objectives, Uncle Sam first praises Algeria, portraying it as a pivotal country in the fight against terrorism in North Africa, a leader. While flattering Algeria's skills and military power, [Washington] is in the process of gathering together all the necessary ingredients.

[...] Even if the US puts forward coordinating the fight against terrorism as a pretext for its mobilization in Africa, it is hard to believe that the US has no interest in an area of Algeria that is rich in shale gas, conventional gas and other minerals such as uranium. Complicit local clans are already on the ground, ready to fire up the engine of destabilisation.

On the surface of things, such analyses – which pass without comment in a mainstream Algerian daily newspaper – do not bode at all well for the future of Algerian security cooperation with France and the United States. However, while L'Expression's articles might be said to express a siege mentality that does seem to exist within sections of Algeria's power structure, it is worth noting that the particularly overblown rhetoric appears to be generated at least as much by the present domestic political situation as by developments beyond Algeria's borders. Dark references to “complicit clans” acting in cahoots with Algeria's enemies speaks to the lingering rivalry between antagonistic factions within and around the power structure, while the scarecrows of destabilisation and “foreign plots” (which of course had pride of place in the speech read on behalf of Bouteflika by Veterans' Affairs Minister Mohamed Cherif Abbas on Feb. 18, warning against criticism of the DRS) have become central to the regime's arguments against those who dare to protest against the fourth term option. Viewed in this context, it would therefore seem likely – if the regime manages successfully to weather the next few, crucial weeks without any serious outbreak of unrest – that such rhetoric will fade once the presidential election is past.

Security

Levels of violence in February were broadly on a par with previous months, with 11 security-related incidents overall including five jihadist operations. Levels of activity rose sharply in the last week of February, however, and have remained high so far in March, with 17 security related incidents, including four jihadist operations, up until March 19.

ALGIERS and surrounding areas were quiet, although there were claims in the Tunisian media on March 11 that the Algerian security forces were hunting for a “terrorist”, apparently from the southern town of Djelfa, who was said to be planning an attack against the US or Canadian embassies in Algiers. Although this report was not corroborated by any other sources, it does call to mind the document, attributed to AQMI's leader in the Sahara Djamel Okacha (a.k.a. Abou Yahia El Hamam), that has been circulating in jihadist internet forums since the beginning of the year, promising terror attacks against Western interests, including embassies, in Algeria, Tunisia and other countries of the region.

Immediately to the east of the capital, Kabylia has seen heavy activity these past few weeks, mostly army operations. The security forces led two major search and destroy missions, one in the Sidi Ali Bounab area between the wilayas of Boumerdès and Tizi Ouzou in late February-early March, and the other in the area of Azeffoun-Iflissen-Aghribs in the north of the wilaya of Tizi Ouzou starting from March 11 and still ongoing. Each resulted in a number of clashes with jihadists leaving 14 of them dead.

There have been several incidents along both the northern and southern stretches of Algeria's EASTERN BORDERS:

- A total of 40 missiles were seized by the Algerian army near the border with Libya, a security source told Chinese news agency Xinhua on February 26. The weapons were reportedly being transported by “members of AQMI” heading to northern Mali, who were intercepted by Algerian army in the locality of Djanet in the province of Illizi. Some 40 Katyusha missiles and a number of SA-7 surface-to-air missiles [\[12\]](#) were seized, according to Xinhua's source. During this operation, the army forces managed to arrest two of the members of the group, one of whom was seriously injured, while an undetermined number fled to neighbouring Libya. Although Xinhua did not say exactly when the operation took place, Algerian Arabic-language daily Echorouk said it was around February 24, and claimed that the smugglers were “probably” members Abdessalam Tarmoune's Sons of the South for Islamic Justice movement. Algerian Arabic-language daily El-Khabar reported that the vehicles had been detected before crossing the border, while in the vicinity of the Libyan town of Ghat.
- El-Khabar said on March 12 that security forces in the first week of March dismantled a terrorist cell in the area of Tarat, wilaya of Illizi, on the border with Libya. The group of four to six men was led by a certain Abou Tareq Mehdi, half-brother of Ahmad Tlemci, “leader of MUJAO”, who was working to create a jihadist-smuggling outfit of local Tuareg to oversee the smuggling routes between Libya and Niger “in partnership with militias in Libya”.
- The Algerian army on March 18 reportedly intercepted and killed “five Libyan militiamen” south of Deb Deb, wilaya of Illizi, on the border with Libya. Four kalashnikovs and one heavy machine gun were recovered in the operation. As with the interception of the missile shipment near Djanet, press reports suggested that the group had been detected by an Algerian surveillance aircraft before crossing into Algeria from Ghadames, Libya.
- Further to the north, on the border with Tunisia, security forces on March 13 foiled an attempt by a jihadist group to set up a fake check point on the RN-10 road in the wilaya of Tébessa, near the Bouchebka border post. Soldiers spotted the jihadist group and moved in their direction, prompting them to flee, leaving behind two cars. The army launched a search and destroy mission in the area.
- The next day, March 14, the army is reported to have intercepted and killed seven jihadists in the same area around Bouchebka, wilaya of Tébessa. Some press reports said two other jihadists were arrested and two soldiers were wounded in the operation. The group had reportedly crossed into Algeria from Tunisia. Three days later, Tunisian police shot and killed three suspected jihadists near Jendbouba, on the other side of the border; it is not clear whether there is a direct link between the two incidents.

One incident was reported on the SOUTHERN BORDERS, in which the security forces ambushed and detained a “dangerous jihadist” in the town of Timiaouine, wilaya of Adrar, near the border with Mali on March 12.

Elsewhere in the SOUTH of the country:

- On February 25, according to El-Khabar, the Algerian army discovered an explosives cache in the desert near Reggane wilaya of Adrar, containing “1,420 explosive canisters ready for use.” Three men were arrested “after a long chase”.
- Algerian military aviation on March 8 bombarded a jihadist group in the area between the wilayas of Ouargla and Illizi, destroying an offroader and killing three people on board.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
 President and CEO
 The Gabriel Company, LLC
 1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
 Washington DC, 20005
 Phone: +1 202.887.1113
 Fax: +1 202.887.1115
 Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
 Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

-
- [1] French TV channel Canal +, which had caused a stir in December of last year when it analysed Algerian state TV footage of Bouteflika's meeting with French Prime Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault and demonstrated that it had been doctored to make the President appear far more lively than he actually was, again picked apart the footage of Bouteflika's appearance at the Constitutional Council, arguing that two takes seemed to have been necessary simply to splice together 15 seconds of the President's voice.
- [2] To the outside observer at least, the name is reminiscent of Egypt's Kefaya ('Enough') movement, which campaigned against Hosni Mubarak's presidency in the years preceding the 2011 uprising. But in the Algerian context it is a more direct reference to the slogan (sbaâ snin barakat! - 'seven years [of war] are enough!') of the spontaneous movement in Algeria's cities against the internecine fighting that broke out immediately after independence in 1962 between the civilian leadership of the FLN (backed by part of the revolutionary army of the interior) and the Morocco-based Armée des Frontières headed by Houari Boumedienne – and from which the original “Oujda clan” emerged victorious.
- [3] Demonstrations have been banned in the capital since the massive march on Algiers organised by the aârouch (traditional tribal councils) of Kabylia in June 2001.
- [4] Just two years ago, Mahmoud Chaâlal was still boasting that “in the 2004 and 2009 presidential elections, Abdelaziz Bouteflika was returned thanks to us. Which we are delighted about. What is more, the President is a sufi.”
- [5] Journalist and activist Hafnaoui Ghouli is a long-standing member of the Ligue Algérienne de Défense des Droits de l'Homme and formerly of the Mouvement des Enfants du Sud pour la Justice.
- [6] Technically, the company is understood to be in the name of Djebbar's son-in-law.
- [7] Apparently in response to the French government's public call for the right to peaceful protest to be respected
- [8] “You know what we say in Constantine? The Chaoui, hasha rizk rabbi” - a virtually untranslatable colloquialism that expresses regret for having mentioned something obscene. Sellal's subsequent insistence that he was only joking and that some of his best friends are Chaouis has, predictably enough, done little to calm things.
- [9] Supported by three larger rear bases in West Africa: Dakar (Senegal), Abidjan (Côte d'Ivoire) and Libreville (Gabon).
- [10] Referencing a number of far more serious articles that have appeared recently in the American mainstream and specialist press, notably: 'US Military Presence in Africa Growing in Small Ways', Los Angeles Times 07/03/14; 'U.S. Takes Training Role in Africa as Threats Grow and Budgets Shrink', New York Times, 05/03/14; and 'The In Amenas Attack in the Context of Southern Algeria's Growing Social Unrest', CTC

Sentinel (Combatting Terrorism Center, West Point), February 2014.

[11] No trace of the remarks attributed to Lavrov while in Tunisia is to be found elsewhere than in the Algerian media.

[12] A report by a UN panel of experts on arms transfers concerning Libya dated February 19 states that it has documented the presence of “Libyan SA-7b” MANPADS in “Chad, Mali, Tunisia, Lebanon and potentially in the Central African Republic”. Algeria did not feature on the list – perhaps because Algiers would not allow the panel of experts to inspect seized weapons reportedly smuggled from Libya. According to the same report: “Several media articles in 2013 and 2014 reported seizures by Algeria of materiel originating from Libya. Security sources in Libya, Tunisia and the Niger have indicated that transfers are still occurring from Libya to Algeria, sometimes through Tunisia, to groups based in Algeria and Mali. [...] The Panel sent several letters to Algeria following its mission to Algiers in 2012. It also met with the Permanent Representative of Algeria to the United Nations in New York in May 2013 to request a visit and to gain access to the seized materiel. The Committee [overseeing the panel of experts] wrote to Algeria in September 2013 in that regard, and again in January 2014, when it suggested the week of 4 March 2014 for the visit. No response has been conveyed to the Committee or the Panel.”

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, March 30, 2014 10:41 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: January-February 2014 MAC Events Bulletin
Attachments: January-February 2014 Events Bulletin.docx

Dear Team,

Below please find the January-February 2014 MAC Events Bulletin. Our team compiles a list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

January-February 2014 Events Bulletin

January 24

Restoring Peace in Africa, Revitalizing European Defense, and Renewing NATO: The View from Paris

January 24

International Cooperation in Combating Terrorism: Review of 2013 and Outlook for 2014

January 30

The Geopolitics of North African Energy Trends

January 31

Arab Spring or Arab Autumn? Women's Political Participation in the Uprisings and Beyond: Implications for International Donor Policy

February 5

Energy and Security: Strategies for a World in Transition

February 10

Crisis Response in the Mediterranean and Africa

February 18

Political Islam: Revival, Retreat, or Adaptation

February 28

Regional Solutions to Challenges in Africa

.....
Restoring Peace in Africa, Revitalizing European Defense, and Renewing NATO: The View from Paris

Date: January 24, 2014

1. Title: Restoring Peace in Africa, Revitalizing European Defense, and Renewing NATO: The View from Paris

Hosted By CSIS Statesmen Forum

Participants:

H.E. Jean-Yves le Drian: Minister of Defense, The Republic of France

Dr. John J. Hamre: President, CEO and Pritzker Chair, CSIS

Heather A. Conley: Moderator: Director and Senior Fellow, CSIS Europe Program

2. Overview

At this event, the French Minister of Defense, H.E. Jean-Yves Le Drian, discussed the importance of French military intervention in Africa for regional and global stability with particular emphasis on the recent French defense operations in Mali and The Central African Republic (CAR). He also discussed his vision for the future of French military activity in Africa.

3. Summary

Le Drian posited that French military intervention in Africa is of major importance for global security. He argued that the recent examples of interventions in Mali and The Central African Republic (CAR) serve as evidence that without a French military presence in the region, many more people would have died and Mali and CAR would have plunged into deeper chaos. He stated that the defense operation in Mali prevented its government from falling into the hands of terrorists. This prevention maintained regional stability and global security. Meanwhile, in CAR, the French and CAR forces seized over 250 tons of weapons from terrorists and other criminals. This, he noted, is just one example of what the French and African forces can accomplish together when combating terrorist threats in the region.

He stated that in the future, France seeks to continue to have a military presence in Africa to maintain stability. He went on to say that the actions in Mali and in CAR are not sufficient to maintain that stability. The neighboring countries around Mali and CAR are growing concerns, particularly Libya. He stated that Africa stands out as a continent with more failed states than any other region. Therefore, France will adapt itself in Africa by reorganizing its military response capabilities to ensure security. The goal is for military leaders to be able to make quicker decisions when a crisis strikes.

He claimed that France's commitment to stabilizing Africa is part of its responsibility as a protector of global security and its fight against terrorism. Without France, the Minister argued, Africa would have fallen into complete chaos and become a haven for terrorists and spread its instability around the world.

4. Q & A

Q. (Josh Rogin, Daily Beast) What is your stance on Iran's decision to continue to enrich Uranium?

A. I agree with our Western allies. We are committed to preventing Iran from continuing to enrich Uranium.

Q. (Stanly Roth, Boeing Co.) How are France's military expeditionary units being affected by the sluggish European economies?

A. I am not worried about France's capacity to act in this regard. Furthermore, I am not worried about the capacity to mobilize France's allies in a pulling effort since these interventions in Africa are for the sake of international security.

Q. (Leo Michel, National Defense University) Do you see opportunities for increased military to military cooperation in the Asia Pacific region?

A. I see France as a Pacific nation as it has territories in the region. Thus, we want to participate in all of the international security initiatives throughout the Pacific.

Q. (Michael Mosettig, PBS Online Newshour) How will the new cuts to the French national defense budget will affect the military?

A. I have no particular concern with the recent cuts. They would not significantly affect the military's capabilities.

Q. (Stanislas Moussa-Kembe, Ambassador of CAR to the US) What is the role of the CAR military in the efforts to rid the country of jihadist mercenaries and disarm the terrorists?

A. The mercenaries must go. And the concern of the collective security in Africa is to avoid pockets of mercenaries in neighboring states. Regarding disarmament, greater efforts must be made and must be lead by the president of CAR. The CAR military must be rebuilt in order for it to play a role in securing the region.

5. Observation

The Minister spoke to a packed room. Among the crowd, there were military officers from Guatemala, The Central African Republic, the United States and other countries. There were also a number of journalists and foreign diplomats, including the ambassador of The Central African Republic to the United States. While no mention was made of Morocco, directly or indirectly, the Minister asserted that France will maintain a military presence in Africa and it sounds like this role will expand as instability continues and spreads across the region. Throughout the talk, the Minister repeatedly mentioned that France has spent a great deal of blood and treasure in Africa for the sake of global stability. This repetition, coupled with hints at an expanding role in Africa, underscored a strong and aggressive message to the world that France has and will continue to fight and serve a custodian for regional and global stability. At one point this message was softened with the acknowledgement that there should be a civilian role in stabilizing the region focused on humanitarian efforts. However, this was mentioned as an afterthought. The talk was vague, but the message is clear: France will, for the foreseeable future, maintain a strong and expanding military presence in Africa and act as a safeguard for global peace and security.

\(Back to top\)

International Cooperation in Combating Terrorism: Review of 2013 and Outlook for 2014

Date: January 24, 2014

1. Title: International Cooperation in Combating Terrorism: Review of 2013 and Outlook for 2014

Hosted by the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies at the National Press Club

Participants:

Michael Swetnam: CEO and Chairman, Potomac Institute for Policy Studies

General (ret.) Alfred Gray: 29th Commandant of the USMC; Senior Fellow and Chairman of the Board of Regents, Potomac Institute for Policy Studies

Ambassador Mohamed M. Tawfik: Ambassador of the Arab republic of Egypt to the US

Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal: Ambassador of the Kingdom of Morocco to the US

Ambassador (ret.) Al Maamoun Baba Lamine Keita: Embassy of the Republic of Mali

Dr. Edward Luttwak: Senior Associate, Center for Strategic and International Studies

Prof. Don Wallace, Jr.: Chairman, International Law Institute; Professor of Law, Georgetown Law Center

Dr. Yonah Alexander: Moderator: Director of Inter-University Center for Terrorism Studies; Senior Fellow, and Member, Board of Regents, Potomac Institute for Policy Studies

2. Overview

This event marked the 16th annual review of international terrorism hosted by the Potomac Institute and launched their 5th annual report on terrorism in North Africa and the Sahel. The panelists provided a bleak assessment of terrorism in 2013, given the significant increase of terrorism in the region as noted in the report. The discussion then largely focused on prospects and strategies available to fight terrorism in the years to come. Participants agreed that a deeper understanding of cultural and religious motivators on a case-by-case basis is absolutely necessary for those looking to stem the tide of extremist violence in the region.

3. Summary

Michael Swetnam opened with a description of the report, focusing on the alarming spread of terrorist violence in the Sahel-Sahara and beyond. This "scourge of our society" is increasing in both frequency and lethality, he said, despite the vast increase of international security cooperation, which he claimed was the "silver lining" of the situation. Dr. Yonah Alexander noted that the numbers represented a 605% increase in incidents since he began tracking after 9/11, for a total of around 230 for the year of 2013. The area deserves much more attention, he said.

General Alfred Gray provided recommendations for better fighting terrorism, though he began by saying that "we are making progress, generally." Terrorism has been a big concern of the US military since Vietnam, which he considered to be an early terror conflict. "What's really needed is a total global effort," he said, involving each government, where no one country has a "corner of the market." This would create an environment conducive to a series of comprehensive strategies, with a dynamic focus oriented towards local, regional, and global initiatives. "Start with what you want the world to look like and work backwards," he added. General Gray said that the role for military force is limited. Working towards consensus, on the other hand, is essential. Keeping the high moral ground every step of the way is essential to containing the appeal of violent fundamentalism. General Gray stressed that the US must educate everyone on what it is up against and have a disciplined media that keeps higher goals of society in mind regarding the overall narrative. General Gray said that there are many challenges, but believes that they are solvable.

Ambassador Mohamed Tawfik elucidated three tenets to keep in mind in the fight against terrorism. First, terrorism is culturally universal and not endemic to one group or another. Second, incidents of terrorism are a nebulous culmination of a network: propaganda, financing, training, logistics, etc. Thirdly, states cannot deal with the threat alone. He cited the attack that occurred in Egypt that day as an example – a result of an ongoing political process. He stressed that the Egyptian people would not succumb to these efforts, as turnout for the referendum vote was very high despite attacks and intimidation. Ambassador Tawfik added that Egypt could see more terrorism due to questionable pardons issued under former president Muhammad Morsi. He mentioned a "bizarre" statement in which Morsi essentially tied the hands of the Army by valuing the lives of terrorist kidnappers equally with their victims. Tawfik added that the new government has undertaken many efforts to reverse the trend under Morsi, notably by closing 80 percent of smuggling tunnels in Gaza. He agreed that targeting development and marginalization are a big part of the fight against terrorism, adding that Egypt has a plan to do the same. Egypt is also sending scholars to the Sahel region to combat fundamentalist ideology, among other efforts.

Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal stated that Morocco is well aware of the scope and phenomenon of terrorism, a manifestation of violent political ideology that exploits religion for political purposes. The solution to this, he said, is a structured and methodological framework that features a proactive approach and solidarity development. Morocco continues to promote moderate Islam and build state capacity in countries where terrorism is spreading. A sustained regional and international system of cooperation would help expand Morocco's efforts. Morocco's mandate as United Nations Security Council President focused on the elevation of cooperation in the region for that purpose. Morocco has worked to draft a common vision in the fight against terrorism, echoing previous comments. Ambassador Bouhlal cited Morocco's migration policy reform as a positive example of the proactive approach, working to combat a real threat to peace and stability. Morocco has also demonstrated its commitment to security throughout the Mali crisis, and the training of 500 Malian Imams is again part of the comprehensive approach to stamp out terror there.

Ambassador Al Maamoun Baba Lamine Keita agreed that terrorism in the region has become more lethal and more dispersed geographically, as the successive reports by the Potomac Institute have shown. He predicted that al-Qaeda and similar organizations would again expand in 2014, as the mode of attacks moves from sporadic to serial in many countries. Terrorists, he added, are becoming more entrepreneurial and disparate, gaining experience and networks from fighting in Syria. "The Sahel has become a hideout" for terrorists and transnational organized crime, Ambassador Keita added. Promoting competencies and increasing cooperation among African governments is necessary to solve the problem, he concluded.

Dr. Edward Luttwak wrapped up the individual comments by stating that US foreign policy cannot address the problems until it acquires a more nuanced perception of the factors at play on the ground. The US national security structure is meant to deal with “high-contrast targets,” he said, but ever since the end of the Cold War, it has faced mostly low-contrast targets. This, he added, requires much more situational awareness. Citing State Department reports on Turkey that incorrectly identify religious sects there, Luttwak stated that the inability to correctly analyze religious factors behind conflicts is an enormous problem among US officials. In Egypt, for example, he said that loyalty in many sects is to God and not to the people, so it’s no surprise that public sentiment is deemed irrelevant. In light of this, how can democracy be directly applied to Muslim countries? The US needs to better evaluate groups based on core religious philosophy and the extent to which they are devoted to that philosophy and tolerant of others. Luttwak cited the example of the US having labor attachés in countries where there are no trade unions. Yet, there are no religious attachés from the US. If you are going to engage, he said, you need better situational awareness.

4. Q & A

Q: (Lawrence Freeman, Director, Africa Desk at Executive Intelligence Review magazine) With the increasingly apparent involvement in terrorist activities on the part of Saudi Arabia, why isn’t the country more subject to scrutiny? And regarding Africa, what we really need is a massive Marshall Plan strategy to eradicate terrorism.

A: (Dr. Edward Luttwak) Saudi Arabia is a self-styled Salafist-like country, though al-Qaeda turned against them at some point. The country doesn’t support terrorism, except maybe indirectly by way of schools they established in places like Pakistan, but not directly as a state. The best thing we can do is stop them from teaching across the world.

(Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal) You are right about economic development as an important goal for Africa. It is a challenge for domestic and international cooperation. It is also part of why Morocco undertakes reforms such as with migration policy, which seeks to promote opportunity for youthful populations.

(Ambassador Mohamed Tawfik) I agree with Morocco’s focus on economic development. There are two types of Islamist organizations: those with extreme views espoused peacefully, and those with extreme or even moderate views which are expressed violently. People have a right to express their views, but we should end links between violent extremists and parallel political organizations.

Concluding Remarks

Prof. Don Wallace Jr. agreed with the other panelists and said that terrorism represented a “sea of troubles” for the entire world. He added that it appears as though 2014 will again bring more acts of terrorism and expansion of violent extremist groups. It is “a growth industry in the Sahel,” he said.

5. Observation

This event was attended by around 40 foreign policy professionals. The panelists had a similar assessment of the outlook for terrorism in the Sahel/Sahara region as well as a common prescription for eradicating violent extremists: a comprehensive, international effort with well-informed stakeholders that addresses economic opportunity and capacity building to be executed locally, regionally, and globally. Although the solution demands a lot of a great number of stakeholders and the short-term outlook is for more violence in the coming year, the panelists seemed confident that the causes of terrorism can be successfully addressed by the global community.

For a complete video of the event, please visit:

<http://www.potomac institute.org/past-events/2616-16th-annual-event-international-cooperation-in-combating-terrorism>.

\(Back to top\)

The Geopolitics of North African Energy Trends

January 30, 2014

1. Title: The Geopolitics of North African Energy Trends

Hosted by the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS)

Participants:

Leonardo Bellodi: Executive Vice President of Government Affairs, Eni

Arezki Daoud: Editor, The North Africa Journal

Haim Malka: Moderator: Deputy Director and Senior Fellow, Middle East Program, CSIS

2. Overview

To discuss the state of energy production in North Africa and its impact on geopolitics, this event brought together North African expert, Arezki Daoud and the VP of Eni, Leonardo Balladi, to examine the issues of insecurity, domestic consumption, and new sources of hydrocarbons in North Africa. They also discussed exploration plans to develop renewable energy sources in the Maghreb.

3. Summary

Malka briefly introduced the topic, noting that North African energy environment is shifting, particularly as a result of instability in the region.

Leonardo Bellodi discussed Eni's work in the region. Eni is the biggest oil and gas operator in Algeria, Libya, and Egypt. The circumstances surrounding the production of oil and gas in each country are unique, though it is globally acknowledged that North Africa is a difficult place to work in because of the political instability of the region. However, those invested in the region must continue to be optimistic. Of course, security of facilities and personnel is a major concern, but Ballodi is confident that their assets are secure.

Ballodi discussed circumstances on the ground in each country and how they affect companies like Eni. If the country becomes either a failed state or the security situation further deteriorates, as it has in previous months with the assassinations of persons in political power, companies such as Eni will have to take action. Egypt is running out of money to pay international companies who are there extracting gas and oil. Egypt is also having issues exporting fossil fuels, as they must fulfill domestic needs first, which in turn causes great concern to companies deeply invested in gas and oil facilities as the domestic economy in Egypt is unstable.

And then there is Algeria, a country that appears more stable than Libya or Egypt for energy companies. Algeria is the 2nd biggest exporter of gas to Europe and although there have been some setbacks last year, terrorism or instability in the country has been less pervasive. However, the upcoming presidential election in April is something Eni is paying close attention to. These issues aren't a priority for the US because, as Ballodi stated, the United States has the luxury of choosing its energy partners, which means the oil production and the political stability in Libya is not a priority for the US. Italy, however, is much closer and experiences the effects vastly different than those in the United States.

Daoud began his comments by asking, "how are energy trends shaping government policy?" He claimed that the most important factor in government policy affecting energy is crisis management. If a government can demonstrate an ability to manage and control instability, they will be able to grow their energy industries. Daoud stated that there are a lot of constraints on the industry in North Africa, mainly other countries producing oil and gas within a more politically stable environment. Some of the other main constraints include the reality that the US is a tier 1 producer, meaning that it is a direct supplier of oil to original equipment manufacturers who sell the final product, and is thus a competitor, as are Iran and Iraq. Additionally, the Chinese economy is beginning to slow down and therefore investing less into North African oil and gas reserves. Non-producing countries are in a good place right now because oil and gas prices are beginning to fall.

Daoud discussed the industry in Libya, Algeria, and Tunisia more specifically. With Libya's continued political crisis, its oil revenue came out 20% lower than projected and its economy may even get worse as instability continues. Daoud nevertheless predicts a 50% increase in oil and gas production in Libya in the next 10 years. As for Tunisia, it is trying to be pro-active and reduce the impact of oil and gas imports on the economy. For countries that are non-producers, like Morocco for example, it is perfect time to distance themselves from oil subsidies. This heightens popular discontent, which the Moroccan government is partly countering by increasing the minimum wage. Morocco has been looking for a balanced source of energy, including nuclear, solar, hydroelectric, natural gas, wind, solar, and off shore drilling. Not relying on a single source puts them in a comfortable position. Daoud concluded by noting that the evolution of the oil market is important as social balance and domestic politics tend to outweigh regular economic logic.

4. Q & A

Q: (Malka) The oil and gas companies in the Maghreb region need international companies' capital for investment and growth, however investing in this region is risky, what are some of their incentives?

A: (Ballodi) US oil companies are going home because they have options, notably on US soil. There are still a lot of companies investing in the North African region because of their proximity to the region. European countries cannot count on North American oil as it is far too expensive. They must instead look to the Mediterranean countries, North Africa, and Russia.

(Daoud) Political security is a reality. The cost of security has increased immensely in the months following the Arab Spring. Algeria is investing in terrorism security, which may increase the price of oil and gas production, adding another element. Companies such as BP continue to be skeptical of investing in Algeria and are looking for safer, cheaper places to land.

Q: (Frank Verrastro, CSIS) If the Algerian government continues to manage conflict and remain stable resulting in oil and gas companies to remain active in the country, how do you expand production with fewer investors?

A: (Bellodi) With regards to Algeria, In Amenas was a terrible accident, but it is not a constant concern. Algeria is keen to attract international investment. There are many international gas and oil companies that want to get into Algeria. If they can find a way to pay international companies they will stay in a good place. As for Libya, there are no major problems.

(Daoud) Algeria is the wild card. Their president is old, and their policies swing back and forth between being liberal and conservative. However, they usually end somewhere in the middle of that spectrum.

Q: (Raton, Congressional Research Service) What milestones will you look for, as your company decides to continue investing or leave the North African region entirely?

A: (Bellodi) We are drafting our business plan for the next four years and that is difficult because we are unsure of the next few months. Security is our biggest risk in the region. If the situation gets worse in each country, we'll have to pull our company out. If we look at the biggest issue, it is the price of oil and gas. They have what we need for a cheap price. If you would have asked me three years ago about the Libya situation, I would have said it was completely fine, but now we are in a different era.

5. Observation

Around 50 people attended this round table; nearly all attendees were foreign policy professionals with students or interns. The tone of the roundtable was explanatory and cordial. Bellodi seemed to have somewhat of an optimistic bias towards the region because of the business he has there with Eni. The event was light on specific information relating to Morocco, but what was stated about the country was positive and optimistic, as the country was mentioned as the most stable of the region and a country where many are looking for investment opportunities.

\(Back to top\)

Arab Spring or Arab Autumn? Women's Political Participation in the Uprisings and Beyond: Implications for International Donor Policy

Date: January 31, 2014

1. Title: Arab Spring or Arab Autumn? Women's Political Participation in the Uprisings and Beyond: Implications for International Donor Policy

Hosted by The Wilson Center and CARE

Participants:

Stephanie Foster: Senior Policy Advisor, State Department's Office of Global Women's Issues

Maryam Jamshidi: Founder, Muftah.org

Sherine Ibrahim: Senior Regional Management in the Middle East and Asia, CARE

Haleh Esfandiari: Moderator: Director of the Middle East Program, Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars

2. Overview:

As part of their efforts to support and expand women's political participation in the Middle East, CARE and the Woodrow Wilson Center brought together three speakers who serve as leaders in the fight for women's rights around the world. They spoke on the state of women's rights organizations focused on the Middle East at the informal, formal, grassroots, and institutional levels. They identified the issues and the problems that these organizations face and hypothesized on what can be done to fix these issues.

3. Summary:

Sherine Ibrahim provided an overview of the state of women's rights movements in the Middle East and what can be done to improve them. She started out by declaring that people around the world need to regain the sense of hope and urgency for the fate of women and their place in the political decision making process that was lost soon after the Arab Spring ended. She recalled a quote from a woman that had taken part in a few protests associated with the Arab Spring which she thought embodied this spirit of hope: "To join the protests on Friday mornings and pray Al Juma'a with other women, I had to take shortcut routes through the rugged mountains every Thursday night. After what I had done, no force on earth dares neglect me." Ibrahim referenced a 2012 study that rated women's political representation in the Middle East and North Africa as the lowest in the world in order to illustrate that the euphoria of the revolutions has been lost. This euphoria, she went on, has been lost at a critical time—the immediate aftermath of the revolutions. At a time when real political decisions are set to determine the fate of the region, the media's and the international community's focus has shifted from human rights and social and gender justice to counterterrorism.

In order to refocus the spotlight on social issues, particularly when it comes to the roles of women in politics, Ibrahim suggested that the issue of fragmentation within the women's rights movement needs to be solved. She said that within the movement there are divides on a geographical, gender, ideological, and institutional level that need to be addressed. Once those are solved, the movement will be able to put forth a clear articulation of its goals and start making real progress. One of the biggest examples of these divides, she said, was the divide between more religiously conservative Muslim women seeking equal footing with men in the political realm and secular Western women. Ibrahim said that Muslim women often see their secular Western counterparts as "intolerant liberals." The secular Western segment of the movement, she said, often don't realize that many Muslim women from Arab countries interpret their roles in government and society through Islam. She said something needs to be done about this divide so that these women can meet on unified ground.

Another challenge that the movement needs to overcome, stated Ibrahim, was its over-reliance on technology. She acknowledged that technology, particularly social media, plays a big role in the movement. Still, it is important to realize that not all of the key populations like the rural impoverished women who need to be involved in the movement, have access to this technology. Doing work on the ground to spread the message, moving away from social media, she said, would lend itself to creating true and more representative collective identity among the men and women in the movement. The leaders in the movement need to find alternative ways of engaging those who are not in the conversation due to the over-reliance on technology. She said that the case she has put forth shows that fragmentation is the most detrimental part of the movement.

Maryam Jamshidi started by saying that she was going to push back some on Ibrahim's comments. She then asked, "Was the Arab Spring a revolution?" She went through what she thought were the standards for a revolution. She said that revolutions are usually regarded as a positive thing with clear goals in mind and that they usually happen quickly. She said that the Arab Spring was neither of these. However, she qualified the Arab Spring as a series of slow and unclear revolutions which are still ongoing in some regards. She said that the revolutions encouraged people toward civil entrepreneurship. In other words, more and more people in the MENA region since the revolution have taken to working for the public good. She said that after the Arab Spring, this type of activity continued which left the public arena open for people to meet and collaborate.

Unlike Ibrahim, Jamshidi thinks that collaboration within the movement during and after the Arab Spring has been thriving and that it's more dynamic than ever across the sectors. This type of dynamic interaction, she claimed, created an open public sector and has since maintained it. Furthermore, the Arab Spring gave young women involved in the struggle in the region and around the world on-the-job leadership training for the future. She said that the role of women in the Arab Spring is history repeating itself in the region. Much like the Arab Spring, women in the anti-colonial revolutions of the 1900s in the Middle East played a large role. And as soon as the violence of the revolutions was over and the decision making process was about to begin, the women were turned away. Women, she said, have always been used in revolutions as their presence is charged and does a lot to further these uprisings. Their presence is charged as they are often targets of physical violence. Now that the violence of the revolutions has diminished, she continued, it is important to keep the public arena as open as possible. She said that if the movement were to be reorganized and regulated on an institutional level, the flexibility that is necessary to maintain the public arena would disappear.

Foster began by reiterating a few of the ideas brought up by the other speakers. She agreed that the spotlight needs to shift back to social issues and that she has seen that the State Department is just now beginning to make that shift. This work includes trying to institutionalize women’s issues by working to put women in decision-making positions in every level of politics and government. Furthermore, she said that the more established segments of the women’s movement need to provide public spaces to address social issues to ensure that networks of women within the movement can learn from each other.

After Foster’s remarks, Esfandiari told the audience that when she was imprisoned in Iran for social activism, she noticed that there were so many women who were in her same situation for fighting for women’s rights. This, to her surprise, showed her just how active that women’s movement had always been. Women, she said, were put into the movement all around the Middle East and North Africa because of the existing family laws. They need to be revised, she said.

Jamshidi added that revising these laws doesn’t mean getting rid of religion. She said that people have to understand that there are many women in the region who want equal rights, but also interpret their place in society through Islam.

Foster then ended by noting that Moroccan and Jordanian governments are the only two countries in the region who are part of the Equal Futures pact, an agreement to revise family laws to work toward creating equality between men and women in their countries. She hopes that in the near future, more countries in the region will follow Morocco and Jordan’s examples and join the pact.

4. Q & A

Q. (Timur Mahmud, International Law and Policy Group) What are your reactions to my claim claim that women play a very large role in the economic sector? Their contribution is stronger than people think.

A. (Ibrahim) I don’t know where you got your information from, but the participation levels of women are very low. Women’s participation levels in the informal sectors of the economies are astonishingly high. Therefore, it is important that the world recognizes women’s contribution in the informal economies and that they be integrated into the formal sectors.

(Jamshidi) While women’s participation in politics and the formal economies are low, they are highly educated in the region. Still, they are knowledgeable, but don’t have any opportunities to use what they have learned.

Q. (Habib Khan, USAID) What mechanisms exist to encourage women to want to participate in politics?

A. (Jamshidi) Women themselves are doing the outreach. They are learning on the job. This process has not yet been institutionalized.

Q. (Virginia Austin Schubert, Coaching Network) To what degree do female political leaders around the world inspire repressed women in the Middle East?

A. (Jamshidi) They are indeed inspirational and one should not forget the inspirational power that grassroots leaders have too.

(Ibrahim) The power for women leaders to inspire will be even greater once the media culture changes from highlighting what women leaders wear and how they look to what they actually do and what their policies are.

5. Observation

There were around fifty people in attendance. This discussion underscores the two prisms from which the American government and the media view the Middle East and North Africa region—those of social issues and counterterrorism. Although the forum focused on bridging the divides within the women’s rights movement, there was also a sense that once the movement makes a comeback, the next divide to fix is the one between the social and counterterrorism agendas. Morocco was not a focal point of the discussion, but was mentioned, along with Jordan, as a model for dealing with this debate.

\(Back to top\)

Energy and Security: Strategies for a World in Transition

Date: February 5, 2014

1. Title: Energy and Security: Strategies for a World in Transition

Hosted by the Brookings Institution

Participants:

David Goldwyn: President of Goldwyn Global Strategies, LLC

Jan Kalicki: Senior Scholar, Woodrow Wilson Center

Philip van Niekerk: President and Managing Partner, Calabar Africa

Charles McPherson: Global Faculty, University of Dundee, Scotland

Charles Ebinger: Moderator: Senior Fellow and Director, Energy Security Initiative

2. Overview

The Energy Security Initiative at the Brookings Institution stemmed from the first edition of a book entitled: “Energy and Security: Toward a New Foreign Policy Strategy,” launched by the Woodrow Wilson Center Press and Johns Hopkins University Press in 2005. This forum hosted the event in order to address topics such as energy governance and transparency, and new developments in African energy. The event also discussed a second edition of the book entitled, “Energy and Security: Strategies for a World in Transition.”

3. Summary

Ebinger gave a brief on the original book, Energy and Security, and stated that since the book was launched there have been drastic changes in the energy landscape due to new tensions in the Middle East and the global expansion of oil and gas production. The editors have updated this book since this geopolitical shift has taken place in Africa to provide insight into the shale gas and oil revolution, newly found energy resources in deep-water regions and the Arctic, the safety concerns that go along with this sector, energy poverty, and modernizing infrastructure, and climate concerns. The forum was treated as a conversation and each speaker did not have an allotted time to speak, the moderator initiated with questions which then the other speakers would respond depending on their expertise.

Kalicki stated that energy and poverty are strongly correlated. There are 1.4 billion people without access to electricity, due principally to corruption and wasted energy. United States foreign policy plays a big role, according to Kalicki. The United States needs to create a more coherent policy on managing foreign energy sources. One of the biggest shifts in the last nine years has been that the biggest consumers of oil and gas, like the United States, have become the biggest producers, which helps level the playing field. This will result in opening up the oil and gas markets which will decrease monopoly prices. The United States no longer depends on foreign reserves for oil and gas which eliminates the demand from countries that are less politically and socially stable, which creates a more stable market for US citizens.

Ebinger discussed the idea that limited access of electricity to 2 billion people causes instability and hinders development. The next big thing to watch for is Asia selecting its type of fuel and where to begin exploration and importation. The United States has become less of a factor in the oil and gas sector as it is producing from domestic reserves, therefore international attention has been placed more on Asia, another large consumer.

McPherson stated that transparency in a government creates stability. The political elite of developing countries do not feel accountable to anyone, especially not to the general population. Therefore, the political elite dictate from whom sources of energy are secured and to whom it is sold. Transparency is the cornerstone to a good government that is trusted by the general population. It also would improve access to financial records and distribution of wealth among the general population. Energy investors working in countries struggling with internal political stability and corruption need to require better policy frameworks, including, but not limited to better fiscal regimes, re-organizing roles, revenue management, expenditure policies, and social and environmental guidelines. NGOs are lobbying to require proof of financial records for foreign governments in which the US works with, like the "publish what you pay" act, which is a positive trend.

McPherson noted the challenges in achieving this kind of accountability. As many host countries manipulate follow-up data given to US investors and policymakers, how can we succeed in receiving accurate follow-up records from them? He argued that the US needs grassroots pressure and high standards for their companies working abroad, especially in the energy business.

Van Niekerk added that Africa produces only 9% of the world's oil and gas; however, because the markets inside the continent are a lot smaller than others, it is a large part of their economies. Countries that lie inside the Rift Valley are oil producers, as well as countries bordering the Indian Ocean. Not only are large companies such as BP, Shell, Exxon, and Chevron investing in these regions, but also smaller indigenous companies as well. The US is no longer buying oil and gas from these parts of the world, but they are still investing in the infrastructure. The role of the US in oil and gas production in Africa and the Middle East has changed drastically after producing shale gas in North Dakota, which replaced demand from Nigeria. Countries such as China, which receive oil and gas from Sudan or Angola, continue to stay out of the political and social crisis in these countries, and have no desire to become involved.

Van Niekerk stated that although the international community is aware of political and economic corruption in Africa, the window of fighting corruption has narrowed in the last 10 years. FCPA, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, has had a major impact on this issue, as it sets up standards on the ground level where corruption in a country begins. There are cases, for example Angola, where international businesses must form a partnership with indigenous corporations, which are tied to the government ruling class, therefore continuing the growth of corruption. The oil and gas revenue should be for all of its citizens, not just the elite. The growth of democracy will aid in spreading the wealth to the general population.

McPherson discussed the importance of having basic electricity and access to running water. An example he used was that in Pakistan, having a single water pump creates a chain of affects on its general population: women and children not having to haul water back and forth to their homes throughout the day, which frees them to receive basic education and improves their status of life. Having access to a radio, a television, or internet gives people access to the outside world allowing them to access news and knowledge they may have never been exposed to. IEA estimates a 90 percent growth in energy demand in 2035. Having access to basic energy and water needs can change a nation.

4. Q & A

Q: (Lisa Friedman, Climate Wire) What do you think of the United Nations call to end energy poverty by 2030? Is it possible to bring energy to 1.3 billion people without raising emissions?

A: (McPherson) India has made great progress with off grid energy resources, however we need a greater energy production. We need NGOs to invest their time and energy and government investing in order to accomplish this task.

(Ebinger) Gas is cheap for the US and coal rivals gas prices, especially overseas. Coal mining and production is the biggest generator of employment. We cannot stop producing coal as this would affect the stability of developing countries.

Q: (Reba Coruth, Georgetown University) There needs to be achievable goals for basic infrastructure growth in certain places in Africa. Africa must also engage in industrial countries such as the US, Japan, and Germany to invest in their growing energy industry.

A: (Kalicki) The private sector holds the power to meet or fall short of infrastructure goals. There must be microfinance and entrepreneurship. No single resource or institution can accomplish these tasks alone. It must be a top down effort. There must be goals set and guidelines to achieving them.

(McPherson) There must be something done at the top level of governance and there must be domestic-political incentives. The political motivations need to be sustainable. There should be a structure of external pressure from international institutions and internal will from governments and the general public.

Q: (Rose, Hope for Tomorrow) Rural areas of Africa are where the majority of Africans live. You cannot leave this problem to the Africans alone. Rural Africans needs energy in their villages, we cannot function without it. There are clinics, schools, and small businesses that have the need for energy.

A: (van Niekerk) Africa is a great place to develop electrification in rural areas. Most of Africa does live in the villages. Pre-paid electric meters are being tested in urban areas and might work in rural as well. This is one way to begin the process of providing power to rural areas.

5. Observation

About 100 people attended this discussion on energy and security, around a third of which were students and the remaining were foreign policy professionals. The tone of the discussion was very exploratory. The event was extremely light on specific information relating to Morocco, but it did describe the change in relationship between post-colonial countries and more powerful nations. Finding solutions to the security and energy crisis in Africa will definitely assist Morocco's own development and economic progress.

\(Back to top\)

Crisis Response in the Mediterranean and Africa

Date: February 10, 2014

1. Crisis Response in the Mediterranean and Africa

Hosted by the Atlantic Council

Participants:

Col. Scott Benedict: Commander, Special-Purpose Marine Air-Ground Task Force-Crisis Response, US Marine Corps

Steven Grundman: Moderator: George Lund Fellow, Emerging Defense Challenges, Brent Scowcroft Center on International Security, Atlantic Council

2. Overview

Col. Scott Benedict addressed the recent strategic changes that the US Marine Corps is making in its approach to crisis response in Africa and the Mediterranean as a result of ongoing instability in the broader region. He emphasized the return to the small-war types of operations that went away during the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and increasing non-operational relationships with other militaries like those of Spain and France.

3. Summary

Col. Benedict started off with a brief lesson on the basic functions of the unit he was assigned to command, the Special-Purpose Marine Air-Ground Task Force-Crisis Response (SP-MAGTAF) and how creation of this special-purpose unit and the types of tactics it employs is indicative of a grander strategic shift. He said that the purpose of the unit is to defuse dangerous and volatile situations before they reach critical boiling points. Backing up Marine embassy security during a siege is one example of these missions. One of the most significant changes is the use of the V-22 Osprey in Africa. This aircraft is the combination of a fighter jet and a helicopter. The V-22 can travel at the speeds that operations in the region demand and can go into smaller spaces because of its vertical landing and takeoff capabilities. This gives his unit much greater reach into the interior of Africa.

These tactics were put into live operational use on January 3, 2014 in South Sudan when the Marines, backed up by the Army, evacuated American personnel from the embassy in South Sudan. It was during this mission that the V-22 was introduced for the first time in South Sudan. These types of missions, said Col. Benedict, have changed the training of these Marines. The US Marines have teamed up with the French Foreign Legion and Spanish Marines and the Spanish Army for evacuation and crisis response training. Both of these forces, said Col. Benedict, are compatible with the Marine Corps style of training and its capabilities. Furthermore, he said, it provides the Marines with a chance to exchange ideas and start friendships with their international counterparts. Although, he said, these relationships with foreign forces are, for the moment, non-operational.

Col. Benedict then went on to say that all of these changes in tactics, strategy, training, and missions are due to the "new normal" paradigm. In this model, the world has macro-stability which is in direct contrast to the international climate during the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. In those wars, under the old paradigm, terrorism threatened the stability of the whole world. Now that the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have been scaled down, there are no major wars to manage. The "new normal" will feature small wars and small crisis situations that require fast responses and the capabilities and training to defuse situations. He underscored that this "new normal" is actually a return to the way things were before the outbreak of the War on Terror. The US Marine Corps has traditionally performed small-ops - it was its original function.

4. Q & A

Q. (Steven Grundman) Was the moment of rupture that led to the creation to the SP-MAGTAF, Benghazi?

A. Benghazi is just one of many examples of the "new normal" which called for the creation of the SP-MAGTAF.

Q. (Joe Tabet, Alhurra) Does SP-MAGTAF inform the local authorities of a given area of their missions? Do the Marines and the local authorities coordinate with one another?

A. We do inform and work with the local authorities depending on the mission.

Q. (Tod Lindberg, Hoover Institution) Is SP-MAGTAF equipped and trained to handle mass atrocities like genocide?

A. Handling mass atrocities does not fall under the purview of the SP-MAGTAF.

- Q. (Julia Marvin, US Global Leadership Coalition) What is cooperation like between the Marine Corps and USAID and the State Department.
- A. There are working relationship between the Marine Corps and USAID and cooperation between the Marine Corps and the State Department is great. The Marines allow for American diplomats around the world to take risks and know that they're all protected.
- Q. (Eric Schmitt, New York Times) How does the Marine Corps assess the threat level on the ground in this "new norm?"
- A. Just as any other unit in the Marine Corps, the SP-MAGTAF is equipped and trained to defend itself from threats on the ground.
- Q. (Paul Shinkman, US News and World Report) What has Marine Corps learned from Benghazi?
- A. Events like the one in Benghazi are part of the "new norm."
- Q. (Steven Grundman) What is the reception of the Marines like in Africa?
- A. One should not make the mistake of talking about Africa as if it is one place and that everyone's interests are the same. The SP-MAGTAF has received a positive reception from the local populations that they have interacted with.

5. Observation

Col. Benedict spoke to a room of approximately 40 military officers, university students, journalists and representatives from a diverse cross-section of foreign embassies from Jordan to Serbia to Denmark. Most of the talk was focused on the Marine Corps' adaptation to the "new norm" in Africa and the revival of the Marine Corps strategy and tactics from before the War on Terrorism. However, the audience and the moderator seemed interested in knowing what the Colonel's thoughts were on Benghazi. In each of those instances, the Colonel deliberately evaded addressing the issue directly. Still, Col Benedict said that Benghazi is one of many recent examples that falls under the category of the "new norm." The politicization and media attention explains why the incident repeatedly came up during the talk. The message here was to say that these changes in tactics and strategy came about because of the change in the global paradigm and not because of the ever-changing political fads in Washington.

\(Back to top\)

Political Islam: Revival, Retreat, or Adaptation

Date: February 18, 2014

1. Title: Political Islam: Revival, Retreat, or Adaptation

Hosted by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Participants:

Wael Haddara: Advisor to former Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi

Mustapha el Khalfi: Minister of Communications, Kingdom of Morocco

Marwan Muasher: Moderator: Vice President for Studies, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

2. Overview

The panel addressed the status and future of political Islam with two Islamists from the region, who discussed the different trajectories of their respective governments as a result of Islamist ascensions to power. Wael Haddara, adviser to former Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi, and Mustapha el Khalfi, Minister of Communications for Morocco and a member of the Islamist Justice and Development Party, considered the very different paths of Islamic parties in Egypt and Morocco and the outlook for the future. They discussed the process of what happened in their respective countries after Islamic parties took control in their governments. Haddara explained what went wrong while the Islamist party held power in Egypt before being ousted and el Khalfi discussed what the Moroccan Islamist Party has done to prevent political upheaval.

3. Summary

Muasher began by stating that there has been a genuine loss of support for the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt due to poor performance while in office, which precipitated the intervention by the military. Muasher asked if the Muslim Brotherhood did the right thing or not? What will they do in the future?

Haddara stated that he has never been a part of the Muslim Brotherhood or the Freedom and Justice Party (FJP). He has nevertheless become the point person for all questions regarding the failure of the Muslim Brotherhood in office because the principals cannot field these questions for themselves. He described his observations of the last year in a simple sentence, "Every way of not describing, is a way of describing," adding that there are many questions, but no one wants to give answers in Egypt. Haddara noted that because there were only two parties, it created a vacuum of power because it did not create a 'winner takes all' government. Although there were fundamental errors in what the FJP did, Haddara argued that Morsi regime was set up for failure, as there was no infrastructure to enact their ideas and they were instead forced to undertake the slow and arduous task of rebuilding state institutions. After the Revolution, Egypt needed a new kind of political skills and spirit and the FJP did not move fast enough. During the first assembly as a new government, nothing was accomplished until the second, when articles were agreed upon. Haddara argued that all government leaders make mistakes and when a country is stable, it is rarely felt by the citizens, but when a country is unstable, one mistake can mean a failed government.

El Khalfi explained that what is happening in Morocco is a totally different situation. Morocco was able to make reforms without the same instability in the government that Egypt experienced. This is largely due to Morocco's political system. In the 1980s and 1990s, the government of Morocco developed an idea that the role of the Monarchy is necessary for keeping the stability of the government. Toward this end, the Monarchy was and continues to be the driver of reform. In July 2011, Morocco adopted a new Constitution and the Monarchy and the Parliament created a road map of reforms before the election, which is a huge difference from what happened in Egypt. The PJD, which won the 2011 elections and formed a coalition government, also has a longstanding legacy of being involved in elections. It practices and believes in pluralism. El Khalfi stressed this, noting that there is no Islamist party rule, but rather a coalition government.

The role of the Monarchy in Moroccan politics nevertheless pushed the Islamist government to focus on economic and social issues. This was also the priority of the Islamist government because society was looking to see if the political reforms would have an impact on their daily lives. El Khalfi underscored that economic reform and growth improves the efficacy of other social reforms and makes more substantial impact on people's lives. The focus was thus on job creation, health care reform, education reform, and economic stability.

Three years after the new constitution, Moroccan officials are working on judicial reform, with a focus on achieving judicial independence, eliminating the practice of civilians being tried in military courts, and decriminalization of press codes. Moroccan officials are working on a process for the decentralization of power to regions. According to El Khalfi, the biggest challenge Morocco will have in the future is job creation and good governance. It is not a top down project, or vice versa, it is everything together.

4. Q & A

Q: Why did the Muslim Brotherhood fail? Is there a clear strategy for the Muslim Brotherhood for future voting against the military being in power? Islamists have experience governing in Yemen and Morocco since 1993. The Muslim Brotherhood in Yemen told the one in Egypt to not assume power or work in a coalition, why? And why did the Morsi Administration not learn faster from their mistakes?

A: (Haddara) I am not an economic advisor, so my knowledge is limited to what I have been told. Statements of President Morsi and his economic advisors indicated that economic policies of the past decade lead to an exclusive economic system. It needed to be changed. The hardest questions were how to implement and sequence it. The approach was to attract foreign direct investment, target small and medium companies to create employment, and reform subsidy policy. That was a focus for the Morsi Administration. The first step did not happen because strong administrative support from the government was needed and that was just not there. There needed to be systems set in place because there were no standing systems to utilize. From the beginning of the Presidency, everyone was living in crisis management mode just trying to control demonstrations, which made anything more than that extremely difficult.

Q: Can you clarify about social justice reforms? Will there be better control over the elite? What is holding the elite accountable?

A: (El Khalfi) The main problem is to keep the priority of politics on serving the public. There are issues of subsidies and that less than 10% of the budget goes to poor people in Morocco. Reforms are still difficult and this is why it is our number one goal of 2014. We have raised the amount of scholarships for students, aid to divorced mothers, minimum wage, and retirement funds. The goal of this next year is to really fight corruption and to continue with reforms.

5. Observation

This discussion was held via webcast. The dialogue was very explanatory and both participants spoke from their experiences. The highlight was the comparative discussion between the Islamists in Egypt and in Morocco. Morocco was portrayed as the country that is succeeding with an Islamist lead government and possibly a model for countries such as Egypt to follow. Only time will tell if El Khalfi's prognosis on his government's priorities will be successful.

\(Back to top\)

Regional Solutions to Challenges in Africa

Date: February 28, 2014

1. Title: Regional Solutions to Challenges in Africa

Hosted by the Embassy of the Kingdom of Morocco

Participants:

H.E. Ambassador Michael Moussa-Adamo: Ambassador of the Gabonese Republic to the US

H.E. Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal: Ambassador of the Kingdom of Morocco to the US

Dr. J. Peter Pham: Director, Atlantic Council's Africa Center

Joseph K. Grieboski: Moderator: Chairman, Institute on Religion and Public Policy

2. Overview

In light of King Mohammad VI of Morocco's African tour to Mali, Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea-Conakry, and Gabon, the Embassy of the Kingdom of Morocco in Washington, D.C. brought together ambassadors, US government representatives, and scholars to discuss the challenges that the nations of Africa face and the need for regional political and economic partnerships.

3. Summary

Joseph Grieboski's set the framework for the conversation by saying that the rest of Africa should prioritize political and economic regional partnerships. King Mohammad VI's tour through Africa sets a precedent for African leaders to begin to reach out to their neighbors in this way.

Dr. J. Peter Pham began by stating that today Africa is abundant with natural resources such as phosphates, arable land, and minerals. Along with these resources, Africa's population growth means that soon one in every four workers on the planet will be African. The continent, he continued, also has an emerging tech market with sophisticated mobile telephone networks. Today, he said, Africa is seeing an improving business climate. Morocco is the leading nation in this regard as it is both open to foreign investors and starting to look to its African neighbors for economic partnerships. King Mohammad VI's delegation on the tour through Africa, after all, is made up in large part by Moroccan business representatives. Dr. Pham said that Morocco's banks were among the largest in Africa. All of this success in Morocco, coupled with the abundant resources throughout Africa, said Dr. Pham, should be used to advance the regional partnerships throughout Africa.

Ambassador Moussa-Adamo focused on the challenges that Africa faces as it moves toward building these regional partnerships. He said that while cell phone technology has done a lot to bring Africans closer together, physical infrastructure still keeps Africans apart. The success in Africa, he said, is too theoretical and abstract. The continent needs to see concrete physical changes starting with building up its transportation infrastructure. This lack of infrastructure has made it easier for an African nation to trade with Europe than with its own African neighbors. Along with this change, Ambassador Moussa-Adamo also stated that African nations need to deal with the problem of terrorists and bandits. Confronting the latter would help attract foreign investors. African nations, he said, should look to foreign investors to help build the infrastructure. This continental infrastructure would result in stronger economic regional partnerships.

Ambassador Rachad Bouhhal spoke about how King Mohammad VI sees Africa as a key issue for Morocco. He sees a lot of potential in the continent. To date, the King has cancelled the debts of the poorest nations in Africa and built social housing for the poor in Mali and the Ivory Coast. These are the kind of changes, said the Ambassador, that Africa needs - human and social development from within Africa, not humanitarian aid from external agents.

Ambassador Bisa Williams, Deputy Assistant Secretary at the Bureau of African Affairs at the State Department, started the roundtable discussion by noting that one of the abundant resources in Africa that had been underplayed during the opening remarks from the panelists was the abundance of human resources. She said that African leaders need to look to their own people, particularly impoverished farmers, as assets. After all, she continued, 60 percent of the arable land in Africa is not being cultivated. People always ask, how are we going to feed everyone in Africa? The reality is that Africa has the potential to feed the world. Tapping into its human resources and having people from the United States come in to provide assistance would help boost the economies of Africa. Furthermore, the United States can also provide technical assistance on infrastructure. Infrastructure and land cultivation are intertwined. Ultimately, the combination of these two goals would provide food security.

The Ambassador from the Ivory Coast to the United States, Daouda Diabate said that what King Mohammad VI of Morocco is doing in Africa to strengthen and create regional partnerships is from the legacy of his father. The attachment that King Mohammad VI has to Africa and his efforts to develop the region is key for the continent's success.

Ambassador Michael Battle, Senior Advisor for the US-Africa Leaders Summit, stated that Morocco's leadership in this development "is showing the way within the framework of an approach that doesn't recognize artificial differences between North and Sub-Saharan Africa." "The truth," he continued, "is Morocco is Africa and Africa is Morocco, just as Egypt is Africa." He then went on to say that the human race has its original genetic links in Africa. Since all the world is connected to Africa in this way, the problems in the continent should not be seen as solely an African problem, but a problem for the world.

Anne Pence, formerly of the US Department of State, agreed with Bisa Williams' point on the importance of treating people as assets to ensure food security.

Charles Dahan, a Moroccan-American, spoke up about how Morocco is a leader in Africa not just on the business front but on many fronts. Morocco, he said, was the first country to give legality to illegal immigrants, for example. The United States, he said, should look to Morocco and pay more attention to what is going on in West Africa. The biggest challenge, he continued, is transportation infrastructure. The United States needs to pay more attention to this region and start recognizing its economic potential.

Said Tamsamani, senior fellow at the Meridian International Center said that Moroccan diplomacy has done a lot to advance the regional partnerships in Africa. Morocco, he said, is a critical partner in the region.

Anne Pence took the floor again to address a few issues she thought the ambassadors were ignoring—leadership and corruption. She said that all of these partnerships and goals could only be advanced if African nations dealt, in a serious way, with corrupt leadership. She also added that many African countries have started centralizing their control and bring large portions of their populations to major cities. This, she said, leaves the rural areas vulnerable to terrorist takeovers.

Bisa Williams stated that the perception that the United States is biased toward Asia in investment of resources is false. She went on to say that this perception is proof that government alone cannot aid in the construction of infrastructure. The US government, she said, is working to encourage the American private sector to invest in Africa.

Michael Battle reiterated Williams' statement that efforts are being made to bring private US wealth to Africa. He also underscored the importance of using existing African mechanisms to advance African solutions to African problems. He noted that there are three pan-African organizations on the continent and stressed that there needs to be a very intentional effort to unify these three pan-African organizations - the African Union, the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa, and the African Development Bank. He underscored, "when you look at these three organizations, coupled with what Morocco has the capacity to do on the continent, it is clearly the case that African solutions to African problems can be found on, in, and within the continent."

Battle also called on Algeria to do more, noting, "Algeria has so much money invested in European banks. If just a part of that were utilized in African Development Bank projects, the African Development Bank can fund almost every project in the African program for infrastructure development." He concluded by praising Morocco and reiterating his point about using existing African mechanisms, stating, "Morocco is setting the pace by showing how African countries which are prosperous can be responsive to African countries, which are in the process of becoming prosperous. So in that regard I applaud you, but I also want to emphasize that unless we look at these three pan-African organizations and unleash their potential, the continental will struggle. So I challenge all of us to use these three pan-African organizations."

5. Observation

The forum brought together African ambassadors and representatives of the US State Department to discuss the future of inter-African partnerships. Approximately 30 people were in attendance. The discussion focused around the future of African business and economic development. It is important to note however, that this type of development is being based off of the Moroccan model. The visiting ambassadors and US State Department officials alike praised Morocco throughout the discussions for setting a healthy and constructive foundation from which to base this economic and business development and for taking on a leadership role in the continent. Morocco has set the tone for Africa helping Africa and using outside agents as supplementary tools for success, not as the main purveyors of change.

\(Back to top\)

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

January-February 2014 Events Bulletin

January 24

Restoring Peace in Africa, Revitalizing European Defense, and Renewing NATO: The View from Paris

January 24

International Cooperation in Combating Terrorism: Review of 2013 and Outlook for 2014

January 30

The Geopolitics of North African Energy Trends

January 31

Arab Spring or Arab Autumn? Women's Political Participation in the Uprisings and Beyond: Implications for International Donor Policy

February 5

Energy and Security: Strategies for a World in Transition

February 10

Crisis Response in the Mediterranean and Africa

February 18

Political Islam: Revival, Retreat, or Adaptation

February 28

Regional Solutions to Challenges in Africa

Restoring Peace in Africa, Revitalizing European Defense, and Renewing NATO: The View from Paris

Date: January 24, 2014

1. Title: Restoring Peace in Africa, Revitalizing European Defense, and Renewing NATO: The View from Paris

Hosted By CSIS Statesmen Forum

Participants:

H.E. Jean-Yves le Drian: Minister of Defense, The Republic of France

Dr. John J. Hamre: President, CEO and Pritzker Chair, CSIS

Heather A. Conley: Moderator: Director and Senior Fellow, CSIS Europe Program

2. Overview

At this event, the French Minister of Defense, H.E. Jean-Yves Le Drian, discussed the importance of French military intervention in Africa for regional and global stability with particular emphasis on the recent French defense operations in Mali and The Central African Republic (CAR). He also discussed his vision for the future of French military activity in Africa.

3. Summary

Le Drian posited that French military intervention in Africa is of major importance for global security. He argued that the recent examples of interventions in Mali and The Central African Republic (CAR) serve as evidence that without a French military presence in the region, many more people would have died and Mali and CAR would have plunged into deeper chaos. He stated that the defense operation in Mali prevented its government from falling into the hands of terrorists. This prevention maintained regional stability and global security. Meanwhile, in CAR, the French and CAR forces seized over 250 tons of weapons from terrorists and other criminals. This, he noted, is just one example of what the French and African forces can accomplish together when combating terrorist threats in the region.

He stated that in the future, France seeks to continue to have a military presence in Africa to maintain stability. He went on to say that the actions in Mali and in CAR are not sufficient to maintain that stability. The neighboring countries around Mali and CAR are growing concerns, particularly Libya. He stated that Africa stands out as a continent with more failed states than any other region. Therefore, France will adapt itself in Africa by reorganizing its military response capabilities to ensure security. The goal is for military leaders to be able to make quicker decisions when a crisis strikes.

He claimed that France's commitment to stabilizing Africa is part of its responsibility as a protector of global security and its fight against terrorism. Without France, the Minister argued, Africa would have fallen into complete chaos and become a haven for terrorists and spread its instability around the world.

4. Q & A

Q. (Josh Rogin, Daily Beast) What is your stance on Iran's decision to continue to enrich Uranium?

A. I agree with our Western allies. We are committed to preventing Iran from continuing to enrich Uranium.

Q. (Stanly Roth, Boeing Co.) How are France's military expeditionary units being affected by the sluggish European economies?

A. I am not worried about France's capacity to act in this regard. Furthermore, I am not worried about the capacity to mobilize France's allies in a pulling effort since these interventions in Africa are for the sake of international security.

Q. (Leo Michel, National Defense University) Do you see opportunities for increased military to military cooperation in the Asia Pacific region?

A. I see France as a Pacific nation as it has territories in the region. Thus, we want to participate in all of the international security initiatives throughout the Pacific.

Q. (Michael Mosettig, PBS Online Newshour) How will the new cuts to the French national defense budget will affect the military?

A. I have no particular concern with the recent cuts. They would not significantly affect the military's capabilities.

Q. (Stanislas Moussa-Kembe, Ambassador of CAR to the US) What is the role of the CAR military in the efforts to rid the country of jihadist mercenaries and disarm the terrorists?

A. The mercenaries must go. And the concern of the collective security in Africa is to avoid pockets of mercenaries in neighboring states. Regarding disarmament, greater efforts must be made and must be lead by the president of CAR. The CAR military must be rebuilt in order for it to play a role in securing the region.

5. Observation

The Minister spoke to a packed room. Among the crowd, there were military officers from Guatemala, The Central African Republic, the United States and other countries. There were also a number of journalists and foreign diplomats, including the ambassador of The Central African Republic to the United States. While no mention was made of Morocco, directly or indirectly, the Minister asserted that France will maintain a military presence in Africa and it sounds like this role will expand as instability continues and spreads across the region. Throughout the talk, the Minister repeatedly mentioned that France has spent a great deal of blood and treasure in Africa for the sake of global stability. This repetition, coupled with hints at an expanding role in Africa, underscored a strong and aggressive message to the world that France has and will continue to fight and serve a custodian for regional and global stability. At one point this message was softened with the acknowledgement that there should be a civilian role in stabilizing the region focused on humanitarian efforts. However, this was mentioned as an afterthought. The talk was vague, but the message is clear: France will, for the foreseeable future, maintain a strong and expanding military presence in Africa and act as a safeguard for global peace and security.

\(Back to top\)

International Cooperation in Combating Terrorism: Review of 2013 and Outlook for 2014

Date: January 24, 2014

1. Title: International Cooperation in Combating Terrorism: Review of 2013 and Outlook for 2014

Hosted by the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies at the National Press Club

Participants:

Michael Swetnam: CEO and Chairman, Potomac Institute for Policy Studies

General (ret.) Alfred Gray: 29th Commandant of the USMC; Senior Fellow and Chairman of the Board of Regents, Potomac Institute for Policy Studies

Ambassador Mohamed M. Tawfik: Ambassador of the Arab republic of Egypt to the US

Ambassador Rachad Bouhjal: Ambassador of the Kingdom of Morocco to the US

Ambassador (ret.) Al Maamoun Baba Lamine Keita: Embassy of the Republic of Mali

Dr. Edward Luttwak: Senior Associate, Center for Strategic and International Studies

Prof. Don Wallace, Jr.: Chairman, International Law Institute; Professor of Law, Georgetown Law Center

Dr. Yonah Alexander: Moderator: Director of Inter-University Center for Terrorism Studies; Senior Fellow, and Member, Board of Regents, Potomac Institute for Policy Studies

2. Overview

This event marked the 16th annual review of international terrorism hosted by the Potomac Institute and launched their 5th annual report on terrorism in North Africa and the Sahel. The panelists provided a bleak assessment of terrorism in 2013, given the significant increase of terrorism in the region as noted in the report. The discussion then largely focused on prospects and strategies available to fight terrorism in the years to come. Participants agreed that a deeper understanding of cultural and religious motivators on a case-by-case basis is absolutely necessary for those looking to stem the tide of extremist violence in the region.

3. Summary

Michael Swetnam opened with a description of the report, focusing on the alarming spread of terrorist violence in the Sahel-Sahara and beyond. This "scourge of our society" is increasing in both frequency and lethality, he said, despite the vast increase of international security cooperation, which he claimed was the "silver lining" of the situation. Dr. Yonah Alexander noted that the numbers represented a 605% increase in incidents since he began tracking after 9/11, for a total of around 230 for the year of 2013. The area deserves much more attention, he said.

General Alfred Gray provided recommendations for better fighting terrorism, though he began by saying that "we are making progress, generally." Terrorism has been a big concern of the US military since Vietnam, which he considered to be an early terror conflict. "What's really needed is a total global effort," he said, involving each government, where no one country has a "corner of the market." This would create an environment conducive to a series of comprehensive strategies, with a dynamic focus oriented towards local, regional, and global initiatives. "Start with what you want the world to look like and work backwards," he added. General Gray said that the role for military force is limited. Working towards consensus, on the other hand, is essential. Keeping the high moral ground every step of the way is essential to containing the appeal of violent fundamentalism. General Gray stressed that the US must educate everyone on what it is up against and have a disciplined media that keeps higher goals of society in mind regarding the overall narrative. General Gray said that there are many challenges, but believes that they are solvable.

Ambassador Mohamed Tawfik elucidated three tenets to keep in mind in the fight against terrorism. First, terrorism is culturally universal and not endemic to one group or another. Second, incidents of terrorism are a nebulous culmination of a network: propaganda, financing, training, logistics, etc. Thirdly, states cannot deal with the threat alone. He cited the attack that occurred in Egypt that day as an example – a result of an ongoing political process. He stressed that the Egyptian people would not succumb to these efforts, as turnout for the referendum vote was very high despite attacks and intimidation. Ambassador Tawfik added that Egypt could see more terrorism due to questionable pardons issued under former president Muhammad Morsi. He mentioned a "bizarre" statement in which Morsi essentially tied the hands of the Army by valuing the lives of terrorist kidnappers equally with their victims. Tawfik added that the new government has undertaken many efforts to reverse the trend under Morsi, notably by closing 80 percent of smuggling tunnels in Gaza. He agreed that targeting development and marginalization are a big part of the fight against terrorism, adding that Egypt has a plan to do the same. Egypt is also sending scholars to the Sahel region to combat fundamentalist ideology, among other efforts.

Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal stated that Morocco is well aware of the scope and phenomenon of terrorism, a manifestation of violent political ideology that exploits religion for political purposes. The solution to this, he said, is a structured and methodological framework that features a proactive approach and solidarity development. Morocco continues to promote moderate Islam and build state capacity in countries where terrorism is spreading. A sustained regional and international system of cooperation would help expand Morocco's efforts. Morocco's mandate as United Nations Security Council President focused on the elevation of cooperation in the region for that purpose. Morocco has worked to draft a common vision in the fight against terrorism, echoing previous comments. Ambassador Bouhlal cited Morocco's migration policy reform as a positive example of the proactive approach, working to combat a real threat to peace and stability. Morocco has also demonstrated its commitment to security throughout the Mali crisis, and the training of 500 Malian Imams is again part of the comprehensive approach to stamp out terror there.

Ambassador Al Maamoun Baba Lamine Keita agreed that terrorism in the region has become more lethal and more dispersed geographically, as the successive reports by the Potomac Institute have shown. He predicted that al-Qaeda and similar organizations would again expand in 2014, as the mode of attacks moves from sporadic to serial in many countries. Terrorists, he added, are becoming more entrepreneurial and disparate, gaining experience and networks from fighting in Syria. "The Sahel has become a hideout" for terrorists and transnational organized crime, Ambassador Keita added. Promoting competencies and increasing cooperation among African governments is necessary to solve the problem, he concluded.

Dr. Edward Luttwak wrapped up the individual comments by stating that US foreign policy cannot address the problems until it acquires a more nuanced perception of the factors at play on the ground. The US national security structure is meant to deal with "high-contrast targets," he said, but ever since the end of the Cold War, it has faced mostly low-contrast targets. This, he added, requires much more situational awareness. Citing State Department reports on Turkey that incorrectly identify religious sects there, Luttwak stated that the inability to correctly analyze religious factors behind conflicts is an enormous problem among US officials. In Egypt, for example, he said that loyalty in many sects is to God and not to the people, so it's no surprise that public sentiment is deemed irrelevant. In light of this, how can democracy be directly applied to Muslim countries? The US needs to better evaluate groups based on core religious philosophy and the extent to which they are devoted to that philosophy and tolerant of others. Luttwak cited the example of the US having labor attachés in countries where there are no trade unions. Yet, there are no religious attachés from the US. If you are going to engage, he said, you need better situational awareness.

4. Q & A

Q: (Lawrence Freeman, Director, Africa Desk at Executive Intelligence Review magazine) With the increasingly apparent involvement in terrorist activities on the part of Saudi Arabia, why isn't the country more subject to scrutiny? And regarding Africa, what we really need is a massive Marshall Plan strategy to eradicate terrorism.

A: (Dr. Edward Luttwak) Saudi Arabia is a self-styled Salafist-like country, though al-Qaeda turned against them at some point. The country doesn't support terrorism, except maybe indirectly by way of schools they established in places like Pakistan, but not directly as a state. The best thing we can do is stop them from teaching across the world.

(Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal) You are right about economic development as an important goal for Africa. It is a challenge for domestic and international cooperation. It is also part of why Morocco undertakes reforms such as with migration policy, which seeks to promote opportunity for youthful populations.

(Ambassador Mohamed Tawfik) I agree with Morocco's focus on economic development. There are two types of Islamist organizations: those with extreme views espoused peacefully, and those with extreme or even moderate views which are expressed violently. People have a right to express their views, but we should end links between violent extremists and parallel political organizations.

Concluding Remarks

Prof. Don Wallace Jr. agreed with the other panelists and said that terrorism represented a "sea of troubles" for the entire world. He added that it appears as though 2014 will again bring more acts of terrorism and expansion of violent extremist groups. It is "a growth industry in the Sahel," he said.

5. Observation

This event was attended by around 40 foreign policy professionals. The panelists had a similar assessment of the outlook for terrorism in the Sahel/Sahara region as well as a common prescription for eradicating violent extremists: a comprehensive, international effort with well-informed stakeholders that addresses economic opportunity and capacity building to be executed locally, regionally, and globally. Although the solution demands a lot of a great number of stakeholders and the short-term outlook is for more violence in the coming year, the panelists seemed confident that the causes of terrorism can be successfully addressed by the global community.

For a complete video of the event, please visit:

<http://www.potomacinstitute.org/past-events/2616-16th-annual-event-international-cooperation-in-combating-terrorism>.

(Back to top)

The Geopolitics of North African Energy Trends

January 30, 2014

1. Title: The Geopolitics of North African Energy Trends

Hosted by the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS)

Participants:

Leonardo Bellodi: Executive Vice President of Government Affairs, Eni

Arezki Daoud: Editor, The North Africa Journal

Haim Malka: Moderator: Deputy Director and Senior Fellow, Middle East Program, CSIS

2. Overview

To discuss the state of energy production in North Africa and its impact on geopolitics, this event brought together North African expert, Arezki Daoud and the VP of Eni, Leonardo Ballodi, to examine the issues of insecurity, domestic consumption, and new sources of hydrocarbons in North Africa. They also discussed exploration plans to develop renewable energy sources in the Maghreb.

3. Summary

Malka briefly introduced the topic, noting that North African energy environment is shifting, particularly as a result of instability in the region.

Leonardo Ballodi discussed Eni's work in the region. Eni is the biggest oil and gas operator in Algeria, Libya, and Egypt. The circumstances surrounding the production of oil and gas in each country are unique, though it is globally acknowledged that North Africa is a difficult place to work in because of the political instability of the region. However, those invested in the region must continue to be optimistic. Of course, security of facilities and personnel is a major concern, but Ballodi is confident that their assets are secure.

Ballodi discussed circumstances on the ground in each country and how they affect companies like Eni. If the country becomes either a failed state or the security situation further deteriorates, as it has in previous months with the assassinations of persons in political power, companies such as Eni will have to take action. Egypt is running out of money to pay international companies who are there extracting gas and oil. Egypt is also having issues exporting fossil fuels, as they must fulfill domestic needs first, which in turn causes great concern to companies deeply invested in gas and oil facilities as the domestic economy in Egypt is unstable.

And then there is Algeria, a country that appears more stable than Libya or Egypt for energy companies. Algeria is the 2nd biggest exporter of gas to Europe and although there have been some setbacks last year, terrorism or instability in the country has been less pervasive. However, the upcoming presidential election in April is something Eni is paying close attention to. These issues aren't a priority for the US because, as Ballodi stated, the United States has the luxury of choosing its energy partners, which means the oil production and the political stability in Libya is not a priority for the US. Italy, however, is much closer and experiences the effects vastly different than those in the United States.

Daoud began his comments by asking, "how are energy trends shaping government policy?" He claimed that the most important factor in government policy affecting energy is crisis management. If a government can demonstrate an ability to manage and control instability, they will be able to grow their energy industries. Daoud stated that there are a lot of constraints on the industry in North Africa, mainly other countries producing oil and gas within a more politically stable environment. Some of the other main constraints include the reality that the US is a tier 1 producer, meaning that it is a direct supplier of oil to original equipment manufacturers who sell the final product, and is thus a competitor, as are Iran and Iraq. Additionally, the Chinese economy is beginning to slow down and therefore investing less into North African oil and gas reserves. Non-producing countries are in a good place right now because oil and gas prices are beginning to fall.

Daoud discussed the industry in Libya, Algeria, and Tunisia more specifically. With Libya's continued political crisis, its oil revenue came out 20% lower than projected and its economy may even get worse as instability continues. Daoud nevertheless predicts a 50% increase in oil and gas production in Libya in the next 10 years. As for Tunisia, it is trying to be pro-active and reduce the impact of oil and gas imports on the economy. For countries that are non-producers, like Morocco for example, it is perfect time to distance themselves from oil subsidies. This heightens popular discontent, which the Moroccan government is partly countering by increasing the minimum wage. Morocco has been looking for a balanced source of energy, including nuclear, solar, hydroelectric, natural gas, wind, solar, and off shore drilling. Not relying on a single source puts them in a comfortable position. Daoud concluded by noting that the evolution of the oil market is important as social balance and domestic politics tend to outweigh regular economic logic.

4. Q & A

Q: (Malka) The oil and gas companies in the Maghreb region need international companies' capital for investment and growth, however investing in this region is risky, what are some of their incentives?

A: (Ballodi) US oil companies are going home because they have options, notably on US soil. There are still a lot of companies investing in the North African region because of their proximity to the region. European countries cannot count on North American oil as it is far too expensive. They must instead look to the Mediterranean countries, North Africa, and Russia.

(Daoud) Political security is a reality. The cost of security has increased immensely in the months following the Arab Spring. Algeria is investing in terrorism security, which may increase the price of oil and gas production, adding another element. Companies such as BP continue to be skeptical of investing in Algeria and are looking for safer, cheaper places to land.

Q: (Frank Verrastro, CSIS) If the Algerian government continues to manage conflict and remain stable resulting in oil and gas companies to remain active in the country, how do you expand production with fewer investors?

A: (Bellodi) With regards to Algeria, In Amenas was a terrible accident, but it is not a constant concern. Algeria is keen to attract international investment. There are many international gas and oil companies that want to get into Algeria. If they can find a way to pay international companies they will stay in a good place. As for Libya, there are no major problems.

(Daoud) Algeria is the wild card. Their president is old, and their policies swing back and forth between being liberal and conservative. However, they usually end somewhere in the middle of that spectrum.

Q: (Raton, Congressional Research Service) What milestones will you look for, as your company decides to continue investing or leave the North African region entirely?

A: (Bellodi) We are drafting our business plan for the next four years and that is difficult because we are unsure of the next few months. Security is our biggest risk in the region. If the situation gets worse in each country, we'll have to pull our company out. If we look at the biggest issue, it is the price of oil and gas. They have what we need for a cheap price. If you would have asked me three years ago about the Libya situation, I would have said it was completely fine, but now we are in a different era.

5. Observation

Around 50 people attended this round table; nearly all attendees were foreign policy professionals with students or interns. The tone of the roundtable was explanatory and cordial. Bellodi seemed to have somewhat of an optimistic bias towards the region because of the business he has there with Eni. The event was light on specific information relating to Morocco, but what was stated about the country was positive and optimistic, as the country was mentioned as the most stable of the region and a country where many are looking for investment opportunities.

\(Back to top\)

Arab Spring or Arab Autumn? Women's Political Participation in the Uprisings and Beyond: Implications for International Donor Policy

Date: January 31, 2014

1. Title: Arab Spring or Arab Autumn? Women's Political Participation in the Uprisings and Beyond: Implications for International Donor Policy

Hosted by The Wilson Center and CARE

Participants:

Stephanie Foster: Senior Policy Advisor, State Department's Office of Global Women's Issues

Maryam Jamshidi: Founder, Muftah.org

Sherine Ibrahim: Senior Regional Management in the Middle East and Asia, CARE

Haleh Esfandiari: Moderator: Director of the Middle East Program, Woodrow Wilson Center for International Scholars

2. Overview:

As part of their efforts to support and expand women's political participation in the Middle East, CARE and the Woodrow Wilson Center brought together three speakers who serve as leaders in the fight for women's rights around the world. They spoke on the state of women's rights organizations focused on the Middle East at the informal, formal, grassroots, and institutional levels. They identified the issues and the problems that these organizations face and hypothesized on what can be done to fix these issues.

3. Summary:

Sherine Ibrahim provided an overview of the state of women's rights movements in the Middle East and what can be done to improve them. She started out by declaring that people around the world need to regain the sense of hope and urgency for the fate of women and their place in the political decision making process that was lost soon after the Arab Spring ended. She recalled a quote from a woman that had taken part in a few protests associated with the Arab Spring which she thought embodied this spirit of hope: "To join the protests on Friday mornings and pray Al Juma'a with other women, I had to take shortcut routes through the rugged mountains every Thursday night. After what I had done, no force on earth dares neglect me." Ibrahim referenced a 2012 study that rated women's political representation in the Middle East and North Africa as the lowest in the world in order to illustrate that the euphoria of the revolutions has been lost. This euphoria, she went on, has been lost at a critical time—the immediate aftermath of the revolutions. At a time when real political decisions are set to determine the fate of the region, the media's and the international community's focus has shifted from human rights and social and gender justice to counterterrorism.

In order to refocus the spotlight on social issues, particularly when it comes to the roles of women in politics, Ibrahim suggested that the issue of fragmentation within the women's rights movement needs to be solved. She said that within the movement there are divides on a geographical, gender, ideological, and institutional level that need to be addressed. Once those are solved, the movement will be able to put forth a clear articulation of its goals and start making real progress. One of the biggest examples of these divides, she said, was the divide between more religiously conservative Muslim women seeking equal footing with men in the political realm and secular Western women. Ibrahim said that Muslim women often see their secular Western counterparts as "intolerant liberals." The secular Western segment of the movement, she said, often don't realize that many Muslim women from Arab countries interpret their roles in government and society through Islam. She said something needs to be done about this divide so that these women can meet on unified ground.

Another challenge that the movement needs to overcome, stated Ibrahim, was its over-reliance on technology. She acknowledged that technology, particularly social media, plays a big role in the movement. Still, it is important to realize that not all of the key populations like the rural impoverished women who need to be involved in the movement, have access to this technology. Doing work on the ground to spread the message, moving away from social media, she said, would lend itself to creating true and more representative collective identity among the men and women in the movement. The leaders in the movement need to find alternative ways of engaging those who are not in the conversation due to the over-reliance on technology. She said that the case she has put forth shows that fragmentation is the most detrimental part of the movement.

Maryam Jamshidi started by saying that she was going to push back some on Ibrahim's comments. She then asked, "Was the Arab Spring a revolution?" She went through what she thought were the standards for a revolution. She said that revolutions are usually regarded as a positive thing with clear goals in mind and that they usually happen quickly. She said that the Arab Spring was neither of these. However, she qualified the Arab Spring as a series of slow and unclear revolutions which are still ongoing in some regards. She said that the revolutions encouraged people toward civil entrepreneurship. In other words, more and more people in the MENA region since the revolution have taken to working for the public good. She said that after the Arab Spring, this type of activity continued which left the public arena open for people to meet and collaborate.

Unlike Ibrahim, Jamshidi thinks that collaboration within the movement during and after the Arab Spring has been thriving and that it's more dynamic than ever across the sectors. This type of dynamic interaction, she claimed, created an open public sector and has since maintained it. Furthermore, the Arab Spring gave young women involved in the struggle in the region and around the world on-the-job leadership training for the future. She said that the role of women in the Arab Spring is history repeating itself in the region. Much like the Arab Spring, women in the anti-colonial revolutions of the 1900s in the Middle East played a large role. And as soon as the violence of the revolutions was over and the decision making process was about to begin, the women were turned away. Women, she said, have always been used in revolutions as their presence is charged and does a lot to further these uprisings. Their presence is charged as they are often targets of physical violence. Now that the violence of the revolutions has diminished, she continued, it is important to keep the public arena as open as possible. She said that if the movement were to be reorganized and regulated on an institutional level, the flexibility that is necessary to maintain the public arena would disappear.

Foster began by reiterating a few of the ideas brought up by the other speakers. She agreed that the spotlight needs to shift back to social issues and that she has seen that the State Department is just now beginning to make that shift. This work includes trying to institutionalize women's issues by working to put women in decision-making positions in every level of politics and government. Furthermore, she said that the more established segments of the women's movement need to provide public spaces to address social issues to ensure that networks of women within the movement can learn from each other.

After Foster's remarks, Esfandiari told the audience that when she was imprisoned in Iran for social activism, she noticed that there were so many women who were in her same situation for fighting for women's rights. This, to her surprise, showed her just how active that women's movement had always been. Women, she said, were put into the movement all around the Middle East and North Africa because of the existing family laws. They need to be revised, she said.

Jamshidi added that revising these laws doesn't mean getting rid of religion. She said that people have to understand that there are many women in the region who want equal rights, but also interpret their place in society through Islam.

Foster then ended by noting that Moroccan and Jordanian governments are the only two countries in the region who are part of the Equal Futures pact, an agreement to revise family laws to work toward creating equality between men and women in their countries. She hopes that in the near future, more countries in the region will follow Morocco and Jordan's examples and join the pact.

4. Q & A

Q. (Timur Mahmud, International Law and Policy Group) What are your reactions to my claim that women play a very large role in the economic sector? Their contribution is stronger than people think.

A. (Ibrahim) I don't know where you got your information from, but the participation levels of women are very low. Women's participation levels in the informal sectors of the economies are astonishingly high. Therefore, it is important that the world recognizes women's contribution in the informal economies and that they be integrated into the formal sectors.

(Jamshidi) While women's participation in politics and the formal economies are low, they are highly educated in the region. Still, they are knowledgeable, but don't have any opportunities to use what they have learned.

Q. (Habib Khan, USAID) What mechanisms exist to encourage women to want to participate in politics?

A. (Jamshidi) Women themselves are doing the outreach. They are learning on the job. This process has not yet been institutionalized.

Q. (Virginia Austin Schubert, Coaching Network) To what degree do female political leaders around the world inspire repressed women in the Middle East?

A. (Jamshidi) They are indeed inspirational and one should not forget the inspirational power that grassroots leaders have too.

(Ibrahim) The power for women leaders to inspire will be even greater once the media culture changes from highlighting what women leaders wear and how they look to what they actually do and what their policies are.

5. Observation

There were around fifty people in attendance. This discussion underscores the two prisms from which the American government and the media view the Middle East and North Africa region—those of social issues and counterterrorism. Although the forum focused on bridging the divides within the women's rights movement, there was also a sense that once the movement makes a comeback, the next divide to fix is the one between the social and counterterrorism agendas. Morocco was not a focal point of the discussion, but was mentioned, along with Jordan, as a model for dealing with this debate.

\(Back to top\)

Energy and Security: Strategies for a World in Transition

Date: February 5, 2014

1. Title: Energy and Security: Strategies for a World in Transition

Hosted by the Brookings Institution

Participants:

David Goldwyn: President of Goldwyn Global Strategies, LLC

Jan Kalicki: Senior Scholar, Woodrow Wilson Center

Philip van Niekerk: President and Managing Partner, Calabar Africa

Charles McPherson: Global Faculty, University of Dundee, Scotland

Charles Ebinger: Moderator: Senior Fellow and Director, Energy Security Initiative

2. Overview

The Energy Security Initiative at the Brookings Institution stemmed from the first edition of a book entitled: "Energy and Security: Toward a New Foreign Policy Strategy," launched by the Woodrow Wilson Center Press and Johns Hopkins University Press in 2005. This forum hosted the event in order to address topics such as energy governance and transparency, and new developments in African energy. The event also discussed a second edition of the book entitled, "Energy and Security: Strategies for a World in Transition."

3. Summary

Ebinger gave a brief on the original book, Energy and Security, and stated that since the book was launched there have been drastic changes in the energy landscape due to new tensions in the Middle East and the global expansion of oil and gas production. The editors have updated this book since this geopolitical shift has taken place in Africa to provide insight into the shale gas and oil revolution, newly found energy resources in deep-water regions and the Arctic, the safety concerns that go along with this sector, energy poverty, and modernizing infrastructure, and climate concerns. The forum was treated as a conversation and each speaker did not have an allotted time to speak, the moderator initiated with questions which then the other speakers would respond depending on their expertise.

Kalicki stated that energy and poverty are strongly correlated. There are 1.4 billion people without access to electricity, due principally to corruption and wasted energy. United States foreign policy plays a big role, according to Kalicki. The United States needs to create a more coherent policy on managing foreign energy sources. One of the biggest shifts in the last nine years has been that the biggest consumers of oil and gas, like the United States, have become the biggest producers, which helps level the playing field. This will result in opening up the oil and gas markets which will decrease monopoly prices. The United States no longer depends on foreign reserves for oil and gas which eliminates the demand from countries that are less politically and socially stable, which creates a more stable market for US citizens.

Ebinger discussed the idea that limited access of electricity to 2 billion people causes instability and hinders development. The next big thing to watch for is Asia selecting its type of fuel and where to begin exploration and importation. The United States has become less of a factor in the oil and gas sector as it is producing from domestic reserves, therefore international attention has been placed more on Asia, another large consumer.

McPherson stated that transparency in a government creates stability. The political elite of developing countries do not feel accountable to anyone, especially not to the general population. Therefore, the political elite dictate from whom sources of energy are secured and to whom it is sold. Transparency is the cornerstone to a good government that is trusted by the general population. It also would improve access to financial records and distribution of wealth among the general population. Energy investors working in countries struggling with internal political stability and corruption need to require better policy frameworks, including, but not limited to better fiscal regimes, re-organizing roles, revenue management, expenditure policies, and social and environmental guidelines. NGOs are lobbying to require proof of financial records for foreign governments in which the US works with, like the "publish what you pay" act, which is a positive trend.

McPherson noted the challenges in achieving this kind of accountability. As many host countries manipulate follow-up data given to US investors and policymakers, how can we succeed in receiving accurate follow-up records from them? He argued that the US needs grassroots pressure and high standards for their companies working abroad, especially in the energy business.

Van Niekerk added that Africa produces only 9% of the world's oil and gas; however, because the markets inside the continent are a lot smaller than others, it is a large part of their economies. Countries that lie inside the Rift Valley are oil producers, as well as countries bordering the Indian Ocean. Not only are large companies such as BP, Shell, Exxon, and Chevron investing in these regions, but also smaller indigenous companies as well. The US is no longer buying oil and gas from these parts of the world, but they are still investing in the infrastructure. The role of the US in oil and gas production in Africa and the Middle East has changed drastically after producing shale gas in North Dakota, which replaced demand from Nigeria. Countries such as China, which receive oil and gas from Sudan or Angola, continue to stay out of the political and social crisis in these countries, and have no desire to become involved.

Van Niekerk stated that although the international community is aware of political and economic corruption in Africa, the window of fighting corruption has narrowed in the last 10 years. FCPA, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, has had a major impact on this issue, as it sets up standards on the ground level where corruption in a country begins. There are cases, for example Angola, where international businesses must form a partnership with indigenous corporations, which are tied to the government ruling class, therefore continuing the growth of corruption. The oil and gas revenue should be for all of its citizens, not just the elite. The growth of democracy will aid in spreading the wealth to the general population.

McPherson discussed the importance of having basic electricity and access to running water. An example he used was that in Pakistan, having a single water pump creates a chain of affects on its general population: women and children not having to haul water back and forth to their homes throughout the day, which frees them to receive basic education and improves their status of life. Having access to a radio, a television, or internet gives people access to the outside world allowing them to access news and knowledge they may have never been exposed to. IEA estimates a 90 percent growth in energy demand in 2035. Having access to basic energy and water needs can change a nation.

4. Q & A

Q: (Lisa Friedman, Climate Wire) What do you think of the United Nations call to end energy poverty by 2030? Is it possible to bring energy to 1.3 billion people without raising emissions?

A: (McPherson) India has made great progress with off grid energy resources, however we need a greater energy production. We need NGOs to invest their time and energy and government investing in order to accomplish this task.

(Ebinger) Gas is cheap for the US and coal rivals gas prices, especially overseas. Coal mining and production is the biggest generator of employment. We cannot stop producing coal as this would affect the stability of developing countries.

Q: (Reba Coruth, Georgetown University) There needs to be achievable goals for basic infrastructure growth in certain places in Africa. Africa must also engage in industrial countries such as the US, Japan, and Germany to invest in their growing energy industry.

A: (Kalicki) The private sector holds the power to meet or fall short of infrastructure goals. There must be microfinance and entrepreneurship. No single resource or institution can accomplish these tasks alone. It must be a top down effort. There must be goals set and guidelines to achieving them.

(McPherson) There must be something done at the top level of governance and there must be domestic-political incentives. The political motivations need to be sustainable. There should be a structure of external pressure from international institutions and internal will from governments and the general public.

Q: (Rose, Hope for Tomorrow) Rural areas of Africa are where the majority of Africans live. You cannot leave this problem to the Africans alone. Rural Africans needs energy in their villages, we cannot function without it. There are clinics, schools, and small businesses that have the need for energy.

A: (van Niekerk) Africa is a great place to develop electrification in rural areas. Most of Africa does live in the villages. Pre-paid electric meters are being tested in urban areas and might work in rural as well. This is one way to begin the process of providing power to rural areas.

5. Observation

About 100 people attended this discussion on energy and security, around a third of which were students and the remaining were foreign policy professionals. The tone of the discussion was very exploratory. The event was extremely light on specific information relating to Morocco, but it did describe the change in relationship between post-colonial countries and more powerful nations. Finding solutions to the security and energy crisis in Africa will definitely assist Morocco's own development and economic progress.

\(Back to top\)

Crisis Response in the Mediterranean and Africa

Date: February 10, 2014

1. Crisis Response in the Mediterranean and Africa

Hosted by the Atlantic Council

Participants:

Col. Scott Benedict: Commander, Special-Purpose Marine Air-Ground Task Force-Crisis Response, US Marine Corps

Steven Grundman: Moderator: George Lund Fellow, Emerging Defense Challenges, Brent Scowcroft Center on International Security, Atlantic Council

2. Overview

Col. Scott Benedict addressed the recent strategic changes that the US Marine Corps is making in its approach to crisis response in Africa and the Mediterranean as a result of ongoing instability in the broader region. He emphasized the return to the small-war types of operations that went away during the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and increasing non-operational relationships with other militaries like those of Spain and France.

3. Summary

Col. Benedict started off with a brief lesson on the basic functions of the unit he was assigned to command, the Special-Purpose Marine Air-Ground Task Force-Crisis Response (SP-MAGTAF) and how creation of this special-purpose unit and the types of tactics it employs is indicative of a grander strategic shift. He said that the purpose of the unit is to defuse dangerous and volatile situations before they reach critical boiling points. Backing up Marine embassy security during a siege is one example of these missions. One of the most significant changes is the use of the V-22 Osprey in Africa. This aircraft is the combination of a fighter jet and a helicopter. The V-22 can travel at the speeds that operations in the region demand and can go into smaller spaces because of its vertical landing and takeoff capabilities. This gives his unit much greater reach into the interior of Africa.

These tactics were put into live operational use on January 3, 2014 in South Sudan when the Marines, backed up by the Army, evacuated American personnel from the embassy in South Sudan. It was during this mission that the V-22 was introduced for the first time in South Sudan. These types of missions, said Col. Benedict, have changed the training of these Marines. The US Marines have teamed up with the French Foreign Legion and Spanish Marines and the Spanish Army for evacuation and crisis response training. Both of these forces, said Col. Benedict, are compatible with the Marine Corps style of training and its capabilities. Furthermore, he said, it provides the Marines with a chance to exchange ideas and start friendships with their international counterparts. Although, he said, these relationships with foreign forces are, for the moment, non-operational.

Col. Benedict then went on to say that all of these changes in tactics, strategy, training, and missions are due to the "new normal" paradigm. In this model, the world has macro-stability which is in direct contrast to the international climate during the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. In those wars, under the old paradigm, terrorism threatened the stability of the whole world. Now that the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have been scaled down, there are no major wars to manage. The "new normal" will feature small wars and small crisis situations that require fast responses and the capabilities and training to defuse situations. He underscored that this "new normal" is actually a return to the way things were before the outbreak of the War on Terror. The US Marine Corps has traditionally performed small-ops - it was its original function.

4. Q & A

Q. (Steven Grundman) Was the moment of rupture that led to the creation to the SP-MAGTAF, Benghazi?

A. Benghazi is just one of many examples of the "new normal" which called for the creation of the SP-MAGTAF.

Q. (Joe Tabet, Alhurra) Does SP-MAGTAF inform the local authorities of a given area of their missions? Do the Marines and the local authorities coordinate with one another?

A. We do inform and work with the local authorities depending on the mission.

Q. (Tod Lindberg, Hoover Institution) Is SP-MAGTAF equipped and trained to handle mass atrocities like genocide?

A. Handling mass atrocities does not fall under the purview of the SP-MAGTAF.

Q. (Julia Marvin, US Global Leadership Coalition) What is cooperation like between the Marine Corps and USAID and the State Department.

A. There are working relationship between the Marine Corps and USAID and cooperation between the Marine Corps and the State Department is great. The Marines allow for American diplomats around the world to take risks and know that they're all protected.

Q. (Eric Schmitt, New York Times) How does the Marine Corps assess the threat level on the ground in this "new norm?"

A. Just as any other unit in the Marine Corps, the SP-MAGTAF is equipped and trained to defend itself from threats on the ground.

Q. (Paul Shinkman, US News and World Report) What has Marine Corps learned from Benghazi?

A. Events like the one in Benghazi are part of the "new norm."

Q. (Steven Grundman) What is the reception of the Marines like in Africa?

A. One should not make the mistake of talking about Africa as if it is one place and that everyone's interests are the same. The SP-MAGTAF has received a positive reception from the local populations that they have interacted with.

5. Observation

Col. Benedict spoke to a room of approximately 40 military officers, university students, journalists and representatives from a diverse cross-section of foreign embassies from Jordan to Serbia to Denmark. Most of the talk was focused on the Marine Corps' adaptation to the "new norm" in Africa and the revival of the Marine Corps strategy and tactics from before the War on Terrorism. However, the audience and the moderator seemed interested in knowing what the Colonel's thoughts were on Benghazi. In each of those instances, the Colonel deliberately evaded addressing the issue directly. Still, Col Benedict said that Benghazi is one of many recent examples that falls under the category of the "new norm." The politicization and media attention explains why the incident repeatedly came up during the talk. The message here was to say that these changes in tactics and strategy came about because of the change in the global paradigm and not because of the ever-changing political fads in Washington.

\(Back to top\)

Political Islam: Revival, Retreat, or Adaptation

Date: February 18, 2014

1. Title: Political Islam: Revival, Retreat, or Adaptation

Hosted by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Participants:

Wael Haddara: Advisor to former Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi

Mustapha el Khalfi: Minister of Communications, Kingdom of Morocco

Marwan Muasher: Moderator: Vice President for Studies, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

2. Overview

The panel addressed the status and future of political Islam with two Islamists from the region, who discussed the different trajectories of their respective governments as a result of Islamist ascensions to power. Wael Haddara, adviser to former Egyptian President Mohammed Morsi, and Mustapha el Khalfi, Minister of Communications for Morocco and a member of the Islamist Justice and Development Party, considered the very different paths of Islamic parties in Egypt and Morocco and the outlook for the future. They discussed the process of what happened in their respective countries after Islamic parties took control in their governments. Haddara explained what went wrong while the Islamist party held power in Egypt before being ousted and el Khalfi discussed what the Moroccan Islamist Party has done to prevent political upheaval.

3. Summary

Muasher began by stating that there has been a genuine loss of support for the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt due to poor performance while in office, which precipitated the intervention by the military. Muasher asked if the Muslim Brotherhood did the right thing or not? What will they do in the future?

Haddara stated that he has never been a part of the Muslim Brotherhood or the Freedom and Justice Party (FJP). He has nevertheless become the point person for all questions regarding the failure of the Muslim Brotherhood in office because the principals cannot field these questions for themselves. He described his observations of the last year in a simple sentence, "Every way of not describing, is a way of describing," adding that there are many questions, but no one wants to give answers in Egypt. Haddara noted that because there were only two parties, it created a vacuum of power because it did not create a 'winner takes all' government. Although there were fundamental errors in what the FJP did, Haddara argued that Morsi regime was set up for failure, as there was no infrastructure to enact their ideas and they were instead forced to undertake the slow and arduous task of rebuilding state institutions. After the Revolution, Egypt needed a new kind of political skills and spirit and the FJP did not move fast enough. During the first assembly as a new government, nothing was accomplished until the second, when articles were agreed upon. Haddara argued that all government leaders make mistakes and when a country is stable, it is rarely felt by the citizens, but when a country is unstable, one mistake can mean a failed government.

El Khalfi explained that what is happening in Morocco is a totally different situation. Morocco was able to make reforms without the same instability in the government that Egypt experienced. This is largely due to Morocco's political system. In the 1980s and 1990s, the government of Morocco developed an idea that the role of the Monarchy is necessary for keeping the stability of the government. Toward this end, the Monarchy was and continues to be the driver of reform. In July 2011, Morocco adopted a new Constitution and the Monarchy and the Parliament created a road map of reforms before the election, which is a huge difference from what happened in Egypt. The PJD, which won the 2011 elections and formed a coalition government, also has a longstanding legacy of being involved in elections. It practices and believes in pluralism. El Khalfi stressed this, noting that there is no Islamist party rule, but rather a coalition government.

The role of the Monarchy in Moroccan politics nevertheless pushed the Islamist government to focus on economic and social issues. This was also the priority of the Islamist government because society was looking to see if the political reforms would have an impact on their daily lives. El Khalfi underscored that economic reform and growth improves the efficacy of other social reforms and makes more substantial impact on people's lives. The focus was thus on job creation, health care reform, education reform, and economic stability.

Three years after the new constitution, Moroccan officials are working on judicial reform, with a focus on achieving judicial independence, eliminating the practice of civilians being tried in military courts, and decriminalization of press codes. Moroccan officials are working on a process for the decentralization of power to regions. According to El Khalfi, the biggest challenge Morocco will have in the future is job creation and good governance. It is not a top down project, or vice versa, it is everything together.

4. Q & A

Q: Why did the Muslim Brotherhood fail? Is there a clear strategy for the Muslim Brotherhood for future voting against the military being in power? Islamists have experience governing in Yemen and Morocco since 1993. The Muslim Brotherhood in Yemen told the one in Egypt to not assume power or work in a coalition, why? And why did the Morsi Administration not learn faster from their mistakes?

A: (Haddara) I am not an economic advisor, so my knowledge is limited to what I have been told. Statements of President Morsi and his economic advisors indicated that economic policies of the past decade lead to an exclusive economic system. It needed to be changed. The hardest questions were how to implement and sequence it. The approach was to attract foreign direct investment, target small and medium companies to create employment, and reform subsidy policy. That was a focus for the Morsi Administration. The first step did not happen because strong administrative support from the government was needed and that was just not there. There needed to be systems set in place because there were no standing systems to utilize. From the beginning of the Presidency, everyone was living in crisis management mode just trying to control demonstrations, which made anything more than that extremely difficult.

Q: Can you clarify about social justice reforms? Will there be better control over the elite? What is holding the elite accountable?

A: (El Khalfi) The main problem is to keep the priority of politics on serving the public. There are issues of subsidies and that less than 10% of the budget goes to poor people in Morocco. Reforms are still difficult and this is why it is our number one goal of 2014. We have raised the amount of scholarships for students, aid to divorced mothers, minimum wage, and retirement funds. The goal of this next year is to really fight corruption and to continue with reforms.

5. Observation

This discussion was held via webcast. The dialogue was very explanatory and both participants spoke from their experiences. The highlight was the comparative discussion between the Islamists in Egypt and in Morocco. Morocco was portrayed as the country that is succeeding with an Islamist lead government and possibly a model for countries such as Egypt to follow. Only time will tell if El Khalfi's prognosis on his government's priorities will be successful.

\(Back to top\)

Regional Solutions to Challenges in Africa

Date: February 28, 2014

1. Title: Regional Solutions to Challenges in Africa

Hosted by the Embassy of the Kingdom of Morocco

Participants:

H.E. Ambassador Michael Moussa-Adamo: Ambassador of the Gabonese Republic to the US

H.E. Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal: Ambassador of the Kingdom of Morocco to the US

Dr. J. Peter Pham: Director, Atlantic Council's Africa Center

Joseph K. Grieboski: Moderator: Chairman, Institute on Religion and Public Policy

2. Overview

In light of King Mohammad VI of Morocco's African tour to Mali, Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea-Conakry, and Gabon, the Embassy of the Kingdom of Morocco in Washington, D.C. brought together ambassadors, US government representatives, and scholars to discuss the challenges that the nations of Africa face and the need for regional political and economic partnerships.

3. Summary

Joseph Grieboski's set the framework for the conversation by saying that the rest of Africa should prioritize political and economic regional partnerships. King Mohammad VI's tour through Africa sets a precedent for African leaders to begin to reach out to their neighbors in this way.

Dr. J. Peter Pham began by stating that today Africa is abundant with natural resources such as phosphates, arable land, and minerals. Along with these resources, Africa's population growth means that soon one in every four workers on the planet will be African. The continent, he continued, also has an emerging tech market with sophisticated mobile telephone networks. Today, he said, Africa is seeing an improving business climate. Morocco is the leading nation in this regard as it is both open to foreign investors and starting to look to its African neighbors for economic partnerships. King Mohammad VI's delegation on the tour through Africa, after all, is made up in large part by Moroccan business representatives. Dr. Pham said that Morocco's banks were among the largest in Africa. All of this success in Morocco, coupled with the abundant resources throughout Africa, said Dr. Pham, should be used to advance the regional partnerships throughout Africa.

Ambassador Moussa-Adamo focused on the challenges that Africa faces as it moves toward building these regional partnerships. He said that while cell phone technology has done a lot to bring Africans closer together, physical infrastructure still keeps Africans apart. The success in Africa, he said, is too theoretical and abstract. The continent needs to see concrete physical changes starting with building up its transportation infrastructure. This lack of infrastructure has made it easier for an African nation to trade with Europe than with its own African neighbors. Along with this change, Ambassador Moussa-Adamo also stated that African nations need to deal with the problem of terrorists and bandits. Confronting the latter would help attract foreign investors. African nations, he said, should look to foreign investors to help build the infrastructure. This continental infrastructure would result in stronger economic regional partnerships.

Ambassador Rachad Bouhlal spoke about how King Mohammad VI sees Africa as a key issue for Morocco. He sees a lot of potential in the continent. To date, the King has cancelled the debts of the poorest nations in Africa and built social housing for the poor in Mali and the Ivory Coast. These are the kind of changes, said the Ambassador, that Africa needs - human and social development from within Africa, not humanitarian aid from external agents.

Ambassador Bisa Williams, Deputy Assistant Secretary at the Bureau of African Affairs at the State Department, started the roundtable discussion by noting that one of the abundant resources in Africa that had been underplayed during the opening remarks from the panelists was the abundance of human resources. She said that African leaders need to look to their own people, particularly impoverished farmers, as assets. After all, she continued, 60 percent of the arable land in Africa is not being cultivated. People always ask, how are we going to feed everyone in Africa? The reality is that Africa has the potential to feed the world. Tapping into its human resources and having people from the United States come in to provide assistance would help boost the economies of Africa. Furthermore, the United States can also provide technical assistance on infrastructure. Infrastructure and land cultivation are intertwined. Ultimately, the combination of these two goals would provide food security.

The Ambassador from the Ivory Coast to the United States, Daouda Diabate said that what King Mohammad VI of Morocco is doing in Africa to strengthen and create regional partnerships is from the legacy of his father. The attachment that King Mohammad VI has to Africa and his efforts to develop the region is key for the continent's success.

Ambassador Michael Battle, Senior Advisor for the US-Africa Leaders Summit, stated that Morocco's leadership in this development "is showing the way within the framework of an approach that doesn't recognize artificial differences between North and Sub-Saharan Africa." "The truth," he continued, "is Morocco is Africa and Africa is Morocco, just as Egypt is Africa." He then went on to say that the human race has its original genetic links in Africa. Since all the world is connected to Africa in this way, the problems in the continent should not be seen as solely an African problem, but a problem for the world.

Anne Pence, formerly of the US Department of State, agreed with Bisa Williams' point on the importance of treating people as assets to ensure food security.

Charles Dahan, a Moroccan-American, spoke up about how Morocco is a leader in Africa not just on the business front but on many fronts. Morocco, he said, was the first country to give legality to illegal immigrants, for example. The United States, he said, should look to Morocco and pay more attention to what is going on in West Africa. The biggest challenge, he continued, is transportation infrastructure. The United States needs to pay more attention to this region and start recognizing its economic potential.

Said Temsamani, senior fellow at the Meridian International Center said that Moroccan diplomacy has done a lot to advance the regional partnerships in Africa. Morocco, he said, is a critical partner in the region.

Anne Pence took the floor again to address a few issues she thought the ambassadors were ignoring—leadership and corruption. She said that all of these partnerships and goals could only be advanced if African nations dealt, in a serious way, with corrupt leadership. She also added that many African countries have started centralizing their control and bring large portions of their populations to major cities. This, she said, leaves the rural areas vulnerable to terrorist takeovers.

Bisa Williams stated that the perception that the United States is biased toward Asia in investment of resources is false. She went on to say that this perception is proof that government alone cannot aid in the construction of infrastructure. The US government, she said, is working to encourage the American private sector to invest in Africa.

Michael Battle reiterated Williams' statement that efforts are being made to bring private US wealth to Africa. He also underscored the importance of using existing African mechanisms to advance African solutions to African problems. He noted that there are three pan-African organizations on the continent and stressed that there needs to be a very intentional effort to unify these three pan-African organizations - the African Union, the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa, and the African Development Bank. He underscored, "when you look at these three organizations, coupled with what Morocco has the capacity to do on the continent, it is clearly the case that African solutions to African problems can be found on, in, and within the continent."

Battle also called on Algeria to do more, noting, "Algeria has so much money invested in European banks. If just a part of that were utilized in African Development Bank projects, the African Development Bank can fund almost every project in the African program for infrastructure development." He concluded by praising Morocco and reiterating his point about using existing African mechanisms, stating, "Morocco is setting the pace by showing how African countries which are prosperous can be responsive to African countries, which are in the process of becoming prosperous. So in that regard I applaud you, but I also want to emphasize that unless we look at these three pan-African organizations and unleash their potential, the continental will struggle. So I challenge all of us to use these three pan-African organizations."

5. Observation

The forum brought together African ambassadors and representatives of the US State Department to discuss the future of inter-African partnerships. Approximately 30 people were in attendance. The discussion focused around the future of African business and economic development. It is important to note however, that this type of development is being based off of the Moroccan model. The visiting ambassadors and US State Department officials alike praised Morocco throughout the discussions for setting a healthy and constructive foundation from which to base this economic and business development and for taking on a leadership role in the continent. Morocco has set the tone for Africa helping Africa and using outside agents as supplementary tools for success, not as the main purveyors of change.

\(Back to top\)

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, March 31, 2014 9:05 AM
To: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Subject: FW: FOR REVIEW & OK - MONDAY E-LETTER: "Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue - Secretary of State John Kerry Visits Rabat This Week"

Importance: High

FYI, email to policy makers today with news of the strategic dialogue.

Having trouble viewing this email? Click here

Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue: Secretary of State John Kerry

to Visit Rabat This Week

Sec. of State John Kerry and Moroccan Foreign Minister Salaheddine Mezouar.

Kerry to co-chair 2nd meeting of Strategic Dialogue with Moroccan Foreign Minister Salaheddine Mezouar, discuss range of bilateral and regional issues with senior Moroccan officials

March 31, 2014

WASHINGTON, DC (AFP, State Dept, MOTM) -- John Kerry will visit Morocco for the first time as Secretary of State later this week, on the final stop of an April 1-5 tour to Brussels, Algiers, and Rabat, the State Department announced last week. While in Rabat, Secretary Kerry will co-chair the second meeting of the Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue with Moroccan Foreign Minister Salaheddine Mezouar, and also will meet with senior Moroccan officials to discuss a range of bilateral and regional issues.

The Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue -- the first for the US with a Maghreb nation -- underscores America's "close cooperation with Morocco and will focus on political affairs, economic and security cooperation, and educational and cultural issues," said the State Department.

Kerry's visit to Rabat comes as Morocco continues to move forward with its agenda of leadership for peaceful reform and progress in the region, including revisions to its military justice system to exclude civilians from military trial, providing greater protections for the rights of migrants, strengthening civil society and the ability to form associations, and a new model for development and local empowerment in Morocco's Saharan provinces.

Earlier this month, King Mohammed VI completed a four-nation Africa trip that deepened Morocco's relations with other countries in the region. Photo: MAP

Earlier this month, King Mohammed VI also completed his four-nation Africa trip, during which more than 80 agreements were signed to advance economic development, food security, trade, and religious cooperation to limit the spread of Islamic extremism in the region. In January, the King chaired the al-Quds Committee of the Organization of the Islamic Conference to bolster the recent US initiative to rebuild momentum in the Middle East peace process.

The Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue was first launched on September 13, 2012 in Washington, DC, where then-Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said that "the United States looks to Morocco to be a leader and a model" in a region where America needs a strong, reliable, and influential ally. "King Mohammed [VI] deserves great credit," said

Clinton, for Morocco's strong record of reforms and commitment to change, highlighted by the 2011 Constitution.

At launch of Morocco-US Strategic Dialogue Sept. 13, 2012, then-US Sec. of State Hillary Clinton praised Morocco as "leader and a model" in the region. State Dept.

"But we're not satisfied with simply having a friendship that is longstanding," Clinton said. "We want one that is dynamic, growing, looking toward the future," she said, calling the Dialogue an important tool to further strengthen relations and implement the shared Morocco-US vision for Africa and the Middle East.

Building on achievements over the past decade -- including the Morocco-US Free Trade Agreement, Millennium Challenge Compact, and Morocco's designation as a major non-NATO ally -- the Strategic Dialogue established a high-level forum to continue advancing common interests on political, economic, security, and educational and cultural affairs, which Secretary Kerry and Foreign Minister Mezouar are expected to address in Rabat.

Last November, when King Mohammed VI met with President Obama at the White House, the President lauded the King's leadership in "deepening democracy and promoting economic progress and human development during the past decade." The two leaders reaffirmed the strength of the US-Morocco strategic alliance, which dates back to 1777 when Morocco was the first nation to recognize the US.

The King and President

Obama stressed the importance of mapping out "a new and ambitious plan for the strategic partnership" and pledged to advance their shared priorities for a secure, stable, and prosperous Maghreb, Africa, and Middle East, working to promote human and economic development, counter the spread of terrorism and extremism, and support democratic reforms and human rights. They called attention to the upcoming Strategic Dialogue meeting in Rabat, pledging "to continue on a path of increased cooperation that will strengthen the US-Morocco strategic partnership."

King Mohammed VI meets with President Obama in the Oval Office on Nov. 22, 2013. Photo: MAP

As AFP reported, Kerry planned to visit Morocco and Algeria late last year, but had to change his schedule at the last minute. This trip follows a week-long visit to Europe and Saudi Arabia, during which Kerry made a surprise visit to Amman to meet with Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas to keep Middle East peace talks on track, and is also addressing developments in Ukraine and Crimea. When Kerry arrives in Algiers, he will also co-chair the US-Algeria Strategic Dialogue, launched in October 2012. His Algeria visit comes just two weeks before that country's presidential elections, where 77-year-old Abdelaziz Bouteflika is seeking a fourth term.

Kerry's visit to Morocco, considered an important US ally in combating radical Islamist ideology, said AFP, takes place less than a month before the Security Council's annual vote on renewing the mandate of the UN peacekeeping force in Western Sahara.

Senior officials from Morocco and the US at the first meeting to the two country's Strategic Dialogue in Washington, DC on Sept. 13, 2012. Photo: CNN

During the King's meeting at the White House, President Obama reiterated the long-held US support for Morocco's autonomy plan in its Sahara provinces as "serious, realistic, and credible." The two leaders also "affirmed their shared commitment to the improvement of the lives of the people of the Western Sahara," as well as to continuing to "protect and promote human rights."

For more on Morocco and the region, visit

www.moroccoonthemove.com

Follow us on Twitter - @MorocOnTheMove

Like us on Facebook at

<http://www.facebook.com/MoroccoOnTheMove>

The Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP) is a non-profit organization whose principal mission is to inform opinion makers, government officials, and interested publics in the United States about political and social developments in Morocco and the role being played by the Kingdom of Morocco in broader strategic developments in North Africa, the Mediterranean, and the Middle East. For more, please visit www.moroccoonthemove.com

This material is distributed by the Moroccan American Center for Policy on behalf of the Government of Morocco. Additional information is available at the Department of Justice in Washington, DC.

Visit us at
www.moroccoonthemove.com

Forward email

This email was sent to gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com by
gneuffer@moroccanamericancenter.com |
Update Profile/Email Address | Instant removal with SafeUnsubscribe™ | Privacy Policy.
Moroccan American Center | 1220 L St NW | Suite 411 | Washington | DC | 20005

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Monday, March 31, 2014 9:13 AM
To: Rachad Bouhlal; rachad@maec.gov.ma
Subject: Meeting with A/S Richards

Rachad, I Got your message via Jordan. What a mistake on my part. I asked and thought I saw the entire table come up to you to say hello. It was a mistake on my part. I'm very sorry. I thought it happened. Do you want him to pay a courtesy call to you on Monday/tuesday? Again sorry for this slight. Ed

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

From: "Jordan Paul" <jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com>
Date: March 30, 2014 at 11:46:55 AM EDT
To: "Edward Gabriel" <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Subject: Fw: Meeting with A/S Richards

See below. Thanks

Sent from my BlackBerry 10 smartphone on the Verizon Wireless 4G LTE network.

From: Mouaad Ibriz
Sent: Sunday, March 30, 2014 11:04 AM
To: Jordan Paul
Subject: Meeting with A/S Richards

Dear Jordan

The Ambassador was trying to send this email to Ed, but I think there is a server/email issue that prevents him from getting this email.

Please pass it on to Ed.

Thanks a lot

Mouaad

Begin forwarded message:

From: Rachad Bouhlal <rachadbouhlal@yahoo.com>
Date: March 30, 2014 at 8:45:42 AM EDT
To: Mouaad Ibriz <ibriz.mouaad@gmail.com>

Ed,

It was my pleasure to attend last night's event and thank you for inviting me. I am glad to hear that A/S Richards and Mhamed Charif were introduced and there is a possibility for them to meet.

Your suggestion makes sense. The Embassy will handle the meeting request Monday morning and they will coordinate with your team.

The DCM and Mouad will accompany Charif to this meeting.

PS: i never met Charif and wish i was introduced to him at the event.
Rachad Bouhlal

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, April 23, 2014 7:15 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Algerian situation report
Attachments: AMSR 140422.doc

Summary in French below. Full report in English attached.

ALGÉRIE : RAPPORT DE SITUATION MENSUEL
22 avril 2014

Résumé

Les Tendances Politiques

- * Après une campagne électorale très tendue, le Président Bouteflika a été réélu avec plus de 80% des voix sur un taux de participation de 51% - selon les chiffres officiels, qui sont violemment contestés par l'opposant principal de Bouteflika, Ali Benflis, ainsi que ceux qui ont appelé à un boycott d'une élection qu'ils considèrent comme truqué à l'avance.
- * Benflis, qui prétend d'être le véritable vainqueur de l'élection présidentielle, appelle à un mouvement de masse pacifique pour le changement démocratique, et envisage de créer un nouveau parti politique à cette fin. Il ne semble pas y avoir, cependant, une vague de fond de l'opposition active à la suite de l'élection comparable au « mouvement vert » qui s'est développé après l'élection présidentielle iranienne en 2009.
- * Avec Bouteflika visiblement très mal diminué par les effets de son accident vasculaire cérébral, des sources concordantes indiquent que son frère et conseiller Saïd assume de plus en plus le rôle de régent.
- * Dans ces conditions, la question de la succession, apparemment réglé lorsque l'option d'un quatrième mandat pour Bouteflika a été approuvée avec force, pourrait être posée à nouveau très bientôt, et le plus grand danger pour le système semble de provenir de ses propres contradictions internes.

Les Relations Etrangères

- * La visite de John Kerry en Algérie au début d'avril a été l'occasion pour l'une des rares apparitions publiques de Bouteflika durant la campagne électorale, mais le Secrétaire d'État des États-Unis n'a pas montré beaucoup d'enthousiasme pour la réélection imminente du Président, préférant dîner avec un critique virulent de Bouteflika plutôt qu'avec son homologue le Ministre des Affaires Etrangères.
- * Kerry était à Alger pour le Dialogue Stratégique Etats-Unis-Algérie, auquel une place de choix a été accordée à la coopération en matière de sécurité, notamment dans la région du Sahara-Sahel* Le Secrétaire d'Etat a également souligné la coopération énergétique, tant en termes de débouchés pour les entreprises des États-Unis dans le secteur du pétrole et du gaz de l'Algérie et de coopération algérien pour compenser pour les réductions possibles de livraisons de gaz russe vers l'Europe à la suite de la crise en Ukraine.
- * Bien que les Européens puissent également frapper à sa porte pour plus de gaz, selon certaines sources, Alger est réticent à s'engager pour fournir des volumes supplémentaires pour compenser les baisses possibles des livraisons russes. Ses raisons pourraient avoir autant à voir avec des considérations commerciales et géopolitiques qu'avec un manque de capacité adéquate.

La Sécurité

- * Bien que la situation de la sécurité nationale dans la première moitié de Avril ait été remarquablement calme par rapport aux périodes pré-électorales précédentes, AQMI a démontré qu'il est toujours capable d'arracher des attaques spectaculaires occasionnelles en faisant une embuscade contre un convoi de l'armée en Kabylie peu après les élections, tuant jusqu'à 16 soldats.

* Bien que les sources de sécurité régionales citées par l'AFP affirment que Mokhtar Belmokhtar prévoit des opérations dans la région à partir d'une base arrière dans le sud de la Libye, il y a eu très peu de rapports d'incidents tout le long des frontières de l'Algérie avec la Libye ou le Mali.

* Selon certaines sources, les autorités ont commencé à renforcer des mesures de sécurité relatives au transport de substances diverses utilisées par l'industrie du pétrole et du gaz dans le sud Algérie qui pourraient être d'intérêt pour les groupes terroristes.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT #134

April 22, 2014

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- After a very tense election campaign, President Bouteflika has been re-elected with over 80% of the votes on a 51% turnout – according to official figures, which are vehemently disputed by Bouteflika's main challenger, Ali Benflis, as well as those who called for a boycott of an election they saw as rigged in advance.
- Benflis, who claims to be the real victor in the presidential poll, is calling for a peaceful mass movement for democratic change, and plans to set up a new political party to this end. There does not however seem to be a major groundswell of active opposition to the election result comparable to the 'Green Movement' that developed after Iran's 2009 presidential election.
- With Bouteflika visibly very badly diminished by the effects of his stroke, concordant sources indicate that his brother and advisor Saïd is increasingly taking on the role of regent.
- In these circumstances, the question of the succession, ostensibly settled when the option of a fourth term for Bouteflika was steamrolled through, may be posed again very soon, and the greatest danger to the system seems likely to come from its own internal contradictions.

Foreign Relations

- John Kerry's visit to Algeria at the beginning of April provided the occasion for one of Bouteflika's very few public appearances during the election campaign, but the US Secretary of State showed no great enthusiasm for the President's impending re-election, preferring to dine with an outspoken critic of Bouteflika rather than with his Foreign Minister.
- Kerry was in Algiers for the US-Algeria Strategic Dialogue, at which pride of place was given to security cooperation, notably in the Sahara-Sahel region.
- The Secretary of State also highlighted energy cooperation, in terms both of opportunities for US companies in Algeria's oil and gas sector and of Algerian cooperation in making up for possible cuts in Russian gas supplies to Europe as a consequence of the Ukraine crisis.
- Although the Europeans may also be knocking at its door for more gas, Algiers is reportedly reluctant to commit to supplying extra volumes to compensate for any cuts in Russian deliveries. Its reasons may have as much to do with commercial and geopolitical considerations as with a lack of adequate capacity.

Security

- While the security situation nationwide in the first half of April was remarkably calm compared to previous pre-electoral periods, AQMI demonstrated that it is still capable of pulling off occasional spectacular attacks by ambushing an army convoy in Kabylia shortly after the election, killing up to 16 soldiers.
- Although regional security sources quoted by AFP allege that Mokhtar Belmokhtar is planning operations across the region from a rear base in southern Libya, there have been very few reports of incidents along Algeria's borders with either Libya or Mali.
- The authorities are reported to have begun stepping up security measures relating to the transport various substances used by the oil and gas industry in southern Algeria that could be of interest to terrorist groups.

Political Trends

In the afternoon of April 18, Interior Minister Taïeb Belaïz announced the official preliminary results (minus the votes of Algerians living abroad) for the previous day's presidential election. With 51.70% of registered voters having turned out on the day, President Abdelaziz Bouteflika had won 81.53% of the vote, with his nearest challenger, Ali Benflis scoring 12.18% and the remaining four candidates¹ totaling less than 6% between them. Benflis, who had condemned “massive fraud” even before the official figures were announced, rushed to proclaim his refusal to recognise the result, denouncing a “confiscation of the people's will”. There is of course ample precedent for the doctoring of electoral results in Algeria (as one Wikileaks' famous US Embassy cables dating from 2009 observed, that year's presidential elections were “carefully choreographed and heavily controlled”, with the official turnout figure “exaggerated” by at least 45%), and it is entirely plausible that, if nothing else, the turnout was artificially inflated this time as well.

The election followed an unusually tense campaign. Abdelmalek Sellal, Ahmed Ouyahia, Amar Saadani and other dignitaries campaigning on behalf of Bouteflika were regularly greeted by rowdy protests, some organised by the recently created Barakat! movement, others spontaneous. While the largest and most militant demonstrations were mostly in the traditionally rebellious region of Kabylia, the Sellal was booed in the southern town of Ouargla (a hotbed of protests by the unemployed) and pelted with eggs in Ghardaia (which has been plagued by violent clashes between Berber-speaking Ibadites and Arabic-speaking Sunnis for several months). There were also sizeable demonstrations in the towns of the Aurès region, the heartland of the Chaoui minority. Enraged by an insensitive quip by Sellal as the campaign got under way, the Chaouis were further encouraged to take a stand against Bouteflika's fourth term bid by an open letter published by former President Liamine Zeroual (who, like Ali Benflis, hails from the Chaoui 'capital', Batna) in late March. In a rare television appearance on April 13 in the company of visiting Spanish Foreign Minister José Manuel Garcia-Margallo, Bouteflika himself contributed to the tension by falsely accusing Benflis of inciting violence: “When a candidate comes to threaten prefects and the authorities, telling them to pay attention to their families and their children in the event of fraud, what does that tell you? This is terrorism via television”². The privately owned, pro-Bouteflika Ennahar TV station, meanwhile, launched a virulent campaign against Barakat! and other proponents of a boycott, accusing them of complicity with sundry foreign governments and agencies.

In the last few days before the poll, amid dire warnings from some commentators of chaos and violence immediately after election day, there were reports of panic buying of groceries and fuel in several cities. Speaking off the record, Industry Minister Amara Ben Younes voiced concern that Benflis might score well or even come first in the east of the country thanks to the support he was gathering among the Chaouis, with the risk that this might fuel a resurgence of Algeria's historic east-west divide.

1 Abdelaziz Belaid (Future Front) 3.036 %; Louisa Hanoun (Workers Party) 1.37 %; Ali Fawzi Rebaine (Ahd 54) 0.99%; Moussa Touati (Algerian National Front) 0.56%.

2 Apparently a reference to a statement made by Benflis on April 9 about the risks of electoral fraud and appealing to local government officials to refuse to be complicit in it: "Fraud is haram [religiously forbidden]. Forgery and the use of forgery is haram. I say this to prefects and leaders of dairas: you have family, think about them".

In striking counterpoint to the last minute worries of Amara Ben Younes, a staffer at the Presidency to whom we spoke in the hours before the official results were announced totally discounted the possibility that Benflis might represent any sort threat. Bouteflika was in the lead nationwide and had come first even in Batna, the staffer claimed, arguing that Benflis had alienated some potential supporters by championing the rehabilitation of the FIS. Asked whether there was a risk that Benflis might seek to prolong the battle by creating a new party of his own after the election, the presidential aide scoffed at the idea, suggesting scornfully that the unlucky challenger would “probably go off to live in France”.

Benflis began the press conference he held immediately after the official results were announced by pointedly stating that he was not going anywhere, and that this time, unlike 2004 when he faded rapidly into the background, he had every intention of continuing the struggle. Benflis outlined his “four essential convictions: the Algerian political system has led the country to a complete impasse; it has once again irrefutably proven its inability to reform itself; change can only come from outside this system; and the democratic alternative must be consensus-based, orderly and peaceful”. On this basis, he called for mass action in favour of democratic change, and pledged to provide “an organised political framework” for such a campaign – promising, in short, to set up a political party. Benflis and the 25 small political groupings that supported his candidacy are understood to be holding consultations to that end, with an announcement promised for the coming days. There have also reportedly been some exploratory contacts between the Benflis campaign and the so-called “boycott front”, made up of five somewhat more substantial parties (including the moderate islamist MSP and the mainly Kabyle, secularist RCD) and another former Prime Minister, Ahmed Benbitour³.

It remains to be seen how successful Benflis – who has since explicitly claimed to have won more than 50% of the “real” national vote – will be in rallying and mobilising opposition to Bouteflika and the system as a whole. While the Benflis campaign did noticeably gather momentum as election day approached, drawing behind it at least some of those who might otherwise have chosen to boycott the poll, he has not so far inspired anything like the enthusiasm that was seen, say, for Mir Hussein Mussavi in Iran's 2009 presidential election, and the emergence of mass protests of the scale and determination of the so-called 'Green Movement' that developed in response to the shock of Mussavi's defeat does not seem to be the most likely perspective as things now stand. With no serious provocations by either camp in the 48 hours following the election, the moment of greatest danger may now have passed⁴.

The extent to which Benflis is able to make good on his promise to develop and lead a movement for democratic change “outside the system” will of course need to be monitored over the coming weeks and months. But as things stand now, arguably the greatest danger to the system comes from within.

As we suggested in our last report, the fourth term option appears to have been steamrolled through in the absence of any consensus on an alternative candidate among the clans and interest groups that make up the power structure, and with the election out of the way the rifts between the various factions, and within them, seem likely to come to the surface⁵. For while the re-election of Bouteflika may have settled the immediate question of the succession, it is likely to be posed anew very quickly, since there are to say the least serious doubts as to whether he will be able to complete his fourth term of office.

³ Benbitour, who fell out with Bouteflika as early as 2000, hails from the troubled Wilaya of Ghardaïa.

⁴ Although angry demonstrations continue to be violently repressed in Kabylia, they are now chiefly focused on the commemoration of the Berber Spring of 1980, and are highly unlikely in and of themselves to mobilise protesters in other parts of the country.

Bouteflika is visibly diminished. In live television coverage of him casting his vote, he had to be assisted in every stage of the process, down to being instructed by the doctor who was pushing his wheelchair to get out his voter ID, and then being accompanied into the polling booth by an aide; the President's influential brother and advisor Saïd was alongside him throughout and appeared to be directing the operation⁶.

This almost brazen appearance by Saïd Bouteflika – who has hitherto preferred to keep to the shadows – looked like a calculated show of confidence, but he may soon find that he is becoming dangerously overexposed. Earlier this year, a source at the Presidency intimated to us that Saïd was acting as grand chamberlain or gatekeeper to his brother; in the days immediately before the election other sources indicated that he is going beyond this and is in effect taking on the role of regent. Less than a week before the poll, one civil servant working at the Presidency told us:

The climate at the Presidency, as elsewhere, has gone from lethargy to stagnation. No decisions are being taken pending Bouteflika's fourth term, during which it will be Saïd Bouteflika who really wields power. He already takes part in decision-making meetings, including in the field of security, on behalf of his brother, who hardly ever leaves his home and cannot participate in this sort of meeting. Saïd and his friends are waiting until the election is out of the way before they show their hand. The real test is what will happen after the election. They fear a violent and potentially destabilising reaction [to the election result]. They are on the alert for any sign of destabilisation, or of opposition from within the system, against Bouteflika's fourth term. All government departments are just taking care of day-to-day administration for now, nothing more than that. The first indications of what Saïd and his friends intend to do should be expected in a month or so.

A separate source has confirmed that Saïd has begun to interfere in even in oil and gas sector security – a situation that does not bode well for the future of the alliance between the presidential clan, DRS chief Lt-Gen. Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène and Chief of Staff Lt-Gen. Ahmed Gaïd Saleh to which Bouteflika owes his re-election.

Foreign Relations

On April 2, US Secretary of State John Kerry arrived in Algiers for a two-day visit as part of 5 Some, indeed, remained in full sight even as the election campaign was unfolding. In late March, FLN General Secretary Amar Saadani spoke defiantly of his dissatisfaction with the continued presence of “eradicators” (a rather dated term referring to proponents of the total eradication, by all means necessary, of the armed Islamist groups and the FIS) within the army and of their animosity towards him. In the closing days of the campaign, Saadani was the target of a carefully planted leak to the French media concerning his real estate and financial assets in France, allegedly the fruit of extensive embezzlement.

6 The initial, live broadcast of the event by ENTV (Algerian state television), Saïd was seen entering the polling booth after Bouteflika had been wheeled out, retrieving the discarded voting slips from the waste bin and checking them (in Algerian elections, there is one slip per candidate, each voter putting the slip for the candidate of his or her choice in an envelop that is then put into the ballot box and discarding the others). Replays later in the day had this and other potentially embarrassing details edited out, but the initial, full sequence was reused, with much relish, by France's Canal+, which has made something of a speciality out of exposing ENTV's manipulation of its footage of the President to enhance his image.

a mini-tour of North Africa that had been postponed from November, when he was forced to cancel at the last minute due to the demands of multilateral negotiations towards a deal with Iran on its nuclear programme. Shortly before his arrival, there was a flurry of speculation in the Algerian press that the Secretary of State might cancel again, to avoid being seen as taking sides in the presidential election contest.

If the fact that Kerry turned up regardless of such considerations was an endorsement of Bouteflika, it was a half-hearted one at best. With Libya imploding and Mali still teetering on the brink, Washington badly needs a stable partner in north-west Africa, and to this extent at least favours stability and continuity in Algeria⁷; the Algerian regime having plumped for a fourth term for Bouteflika as the 'least worst' means of ensuring its own stability, the US administration has little choice for now but to play along with that. But there were no signs of enthusiasm about this option. At his press conference marking the beginning of the second round of the US-Algeria Strategic Dialogue on April 3, Kerry tiptoed around the issue of the upcoming election with a deliberately ambiguous formula:

We look forward to elections that are transparent and in line with international standards, and the United States will work with the president that the people of Algeria choose. And that is a future where citizens can enjoy the free exercise of their civil, political, and human rights, and where global companies, businesses, are confident in being able to invest for the long haul.

The previous evening, the Secretary of State is reported to have surprised his hosts by skipping the formal dinner with his opposite number Ramtane Lamamra that had been scheduled for him in favour of a private dinner at the Hotel Aurassi⁸ with his old friend, former Prime Minister Sid Ahmed Ghazali – who happens to be an outspoken critic of Bouteflika.

Unwittingly, however, Kerry did play a part in Bouteflika's re-election bid, in the sense that his visit provided one of very few occasions during the campaign on which the President appeared in person on national television. Unusually, the footage of his meeting with the Secretary of State was broadcast with the sound. Earlier, mainly silent images of the ailing President having led many to conclude that Bouteflika had lost the faculty of speech altogether, this time a short exchange was broadcast in which the head of state was heard – albeit with some difficulty – enjoining his visitor to see to improve the level of electronic intelligence sharing: “You have technology, you have intelligence that we do not have. What we would like to have is the intelligence in real time – in the Sahara, in the Sahel region”.

An identical point was made by Foreign Minister Lamamra at the opening of the Strategic Dialogue, in which security issues clearly had pride of place. But economic cooperation also featured heavily on the agenda for the Strategic Dialogue. It was clear from Kerry's public

7 This was laid out very clearly by Kerry at his Algiers press conference: “First and foremost [...]: the United States will absolutely continue to stand with Algeria to fight the scourge of terrorism [...]. And we will continue to work with you through the Global Counterterrorism Forum in order to combat drug trafficking, kidnapping for ransom, both of which fund terrorism in North and West Africa. We will look to increase our security assistance to Algeria. We really want to work in a cooperative way, and we want to do this so that Algerian security services have the tools and the training needed in order to defeat al-Qaida and other terrorist groups. And we will work to address the instability that has spread throughout the Maghreb and Sahel. We are grateful, very grateful, for Algeria's efforts in Mali and Niger which underscore Algeria's constructive role in regional stability not only in the east, but to the south also. In the years to come, the United States hopes to partner with Algeria to build a more robust defense relationship based on mutual respect, and obviously, what I mentioned earlier, our shared interests. Together, we can help other nations in the region secure their borders, strengthen rule of law, and build stable democratic institutions.”

8 Kerry is also reported to have stayed the night at the Aurassi, eschewing the accommodation that had been laid on for him at the Algerian government's Djenane El Mithaq residence for visiting VIPs.

comments that “economic cooperation” is still largely conceived of in terms of openings for US companies in Algeria's hydrocarbons sector⁹. But Kerry is also understood to have quizzed his hosts on the question of whether Algeria would be able to channel additional volumes of natural gas to Europe as a substitute for Russian gas, should Russian supplies be diminished as a result of the crisis in Ukraine – currently emerging as one of Washington's most important foreign policy challenges.

The Europeans have themselves begun looking to Algerian gas as a possible substitute for Russian supplies. As it mulls sanctions against Moscow in relation to the Ukraine crisis, the European Commission has been preparing a review Europe's options for reducing its energy dependence on Russia to be submitted to EU heads of government when they meet in June. These options undoubtedly include increasing imports from Norway and Algeria. ENI's outgoing CEO Paolo Scaroni has said he expects a “gigantic” diversification effort should the EU and the United States fail to reach an accommodation with Vladimir Putin, while Sedigas, the Spanish gas industry association, is claiming that Spain could provide about 10% of the current Russian gas exports to Europe if a proposed pipeline along the Mediterranean coast (MidCat) is built. Using a different comparison, Minister for Industry and Energy José Manuel Soria argues that Spain could cover almost half the gas that currently flows to Europe through Ukraine. Spain buys all its gas from non-Russian sources, and while it has been investing heavily in expanding its LNG regasification capacity, Algeria still supplies 45% of Spanish natural gas imports via the Medgas and Maghreb-Europe pipelines, and would appear to be an obvious choice for additional volumes if and when they are needed. In comments to reporters upon his arrival in Algiers on a two-day visit on April 13, Foreign Minister Jose Manuel Garcia-Margallo seemed to imply that he would be discussing just such a possibility.

However, according to one source close to the DRS, Kerry's Algerian interlocutors refused to commit to providing additional volumes of natural gas to make up for any cut in Russian supplies. According to the source, this was due to Algiers' fears that it simply may not have enough gas to meet additional European demand. There may be some truth in this: Algeria's natural gas production has been in decline, partly as a result of underinvestment, while a sharp and sustained rise in domestic energy consumption is increasingly putting the squeeze on volumes available for export. But other factors may be at play.

Whereas Chakib Khelil during most of his tenure as Energy Minister opposed any moves towards duopolistic cooperation with Russia in European gas markets, Ali Hached (former Sonatrach Vice President for gas marketing, removed by Khelil in 2006) is understood to have favoured closer collaboration with the Russians – and Hached, since the fall of Khelil, has emerged as the chief advisor to his successor Youcef Yousfi (now interim Prime Minister as well as Energy Minister). At the same time, Russia remains the Algerian military's leading supplier of armaments¹⁰ and Moscow's general stance as a bulwark against the supposedly hegemonic ambitions of the West (including its opposition to the forcible overthrow of the Qaddafi regime in Libya and ongoing support for Bashar Al-Assad in Syria) plays well with Algiers. Thus, regardless of whether or not it has sufficient available natural gas production capacity, Algiers may be reluctant to spring to the assistance of the Americans and Europeans in their efforts to counter Russia's moves in Ukraine, for both commercial and geopolitical reasons.

⁹ In this respect it is worth noting that US Secretary of Energy Ernest Moniz is to be the guest of honor at this year's Algeria International Trade Fair in June.

¹⁰ CoS Gaïd Saleh made a week-long visit to Russia last October, taking in trips to a number of arms production facilities, and received the head of Russia's Federal Military and Technical Cooperation Service in Algiers in January of this year.

Security

With a total of 20 incidents recorded – up from 11 in February and 14 in January – March saw the highest levels of political violence since August 2013. In terms of operations initiated by AQMI, however, the number was level with previous months: five jihadist operations were recorded in March, against three in February and six in January. With just eight incidents overall, of which three were initiated by the jihadists, violence in April has been largely on a par with levels observed in February and January.

The relative calm that characterised the first half of April, although in keeping with the general pattern since last August, is nonetheless remarkable insofar as jihadist groups in Algeria generally try to take advantage of election periods, when the security forces are busy securing rallies and preparations for voting¹¹, to go on the offensive. The run-up to the parliamentary elections of May 2012, for example, saw a significant spike of jihadist operations. The fact that no such upsurge occurred this time would seem to be indicative of a gradual decline in AQMI's capability inside Algeria itself.

ALGIERS and its immediate environs were entirely calm over the past month, and AQMI's traditional heartland in KABYLIA was mostly quiet in the run-up to the election¹². Shortly after polling day, however, the region witnessed one spectacular jihadist operation: in the evening of April 19, a 30-strong armed group ambushed a small army convoy near the village of Tiguemounine, 40 km south of Tizi Ouzou, killing 11 soldiers and wounding five others (some accounts put the toll as high as 16 dead and nine wounded). The convoy was targeted as it was on its way to a nearby army outpost, as part of the regular rotation of troops. Dwindling though its forces may be, AQMI is still apparently capable of mounting occasional spectacular attacks, especially when it is able to take advantage of lapses in vigilance on the part of army field commanders (as seems to be the case in this instance, according to retired General Abderrezzak Maïza former chief-of-staff of the 1st Military Region where the attack took place).

Although little is known about AQMI's internal structures, according to reports dating back to 2008 Tiguemounine and the entire Wilaya of Tizi Ouzou (along with the Wilayas of Boumerdes, Bouira, Bejaia, M'sila and Djelfa) lie within AQMI's Central Region. In an unusual development a statement ostensibly signed by the leaders of the Central Region surfaced in jihadist forums around March 22, declared their support for the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS), the ultra-hardline jihadist group currently battling against rival rebel organisations in Syria. The document has been seen by some commentators as a sign that a “dissident wing” emerging inside the Algerian jihadist organisation¹³. However, the 11 Some 186,000 policemen and gendarmes were mobilised to secure the presidential poll this year.

12 Three incidents between March 19 and April 17: two ambushes organised by the security forces and one roadside bomb.

13 The statement exhorted ISIS fighters to stand firm and “obey the Commander of the Believers Abu Bakr Al-Baghdadi Al-Quraishi”, ISIS's emir. Although ISIS started off as Al-Qaeda's arm in Iraq, before expanding into Syria in late 2013-early 2014, Al-Baghdadi was effectively disowned by Al-Qaeda's international head Ayman Al-document is difficult if not impossible to authenticate, and it is worth bearing in mind that the DRS is well versed in the arts of generating suspicions, divisions and splits within Islamist guerilla groups.

Looking southwards, Algerian Arabic-language daily El-Khabar reported (March 24) that the armed forces had launched a “major search and destroy mission” along Algeria’s EASTERN & SOUTHERN BORDERS, “mobilising more than 15,000 soldiers” to prevent jihadists crossing. The results of this operation, which was expected to last a week, were not reported in the media. The Defence Ministry did however announce that an army unit had discovered a small cache of arms (five AK-47s, two submachine guns, one heavy machine gun and 1,005 rounds of ammunition) near Bordj Badji Mokhtar on the southern border with Mali on April 8. In a separate statement a week later, the Algerian Defence Ministry indicated that security forces had intercepted an offroader that was carrying a “considerable quantity” of weapons and ammunition “at a point 230 km northeast of Bordj Baji Mokhtar”¹⁴ on April 15; two Algerian nationals were arrested and two machine guns, two RPGs and one “rocket launcher” were seized. One minor incident was also reported on the country’s eastern border with Libya: on April 12 the security forces found an offroader loaded with weapons abandoned not far from Deb Deb; the vehicle had Libyan number plates and is believed to have been left there by smugglers after a failed attempt to cross the border.

The apparent calm on the border with Libya (which may be partly due to under-reporting) should not be allowed to obscure the continued importance of this zone for Algeria’s national security, and for the security of the oil and gas industry in particular. This fact was underlined by an AFP report dated April 13 quoting unnamed “Malian security sources” as saying that Mokhtar Belmokhtar, leader of the Al-Mourabitoun group, has “for some time” been hiding in Libya, “from where he plans to mastermind terrorist attacks across Africa’s Sahel region”. Belmokhtar’s presence in southern Libya was confirmed to AFP by a Nigerian security source, and another source close to MINUSMA, the United Nations peacekeeping mission in Mali.

As regards OIL & GAS SECTOR security, Algerian Arabic-language daily Echorouk (March 22) reported that the “authorities in charge of oil company security” are acting “in cooperation with the Ministries of Defence, Interior and Energy” to tighten up security around the transport of 20 types of “dangerous chemicals” in the south of the country “after reports revealed the presence of criminal gangs that steal those substances and sell them on to jihadist groups for bomb-making purposes”. Gendarmerie investigators “recently seized 50 kg of stolen mercury and 800 kg of copper at a warehouse in Hassi Messaoud”.

END

Zawahiri after his organisation began to clash with another Al-Qaeda affiliate, the Nusra Front, in Syria. Insofar as the AQMI Central Region statement takes ISIS’s defence, it can be seen as siding with Baghdadi against Zawahiri and, by extension, against AQMI’s own leadership, which owes allegiance to Zawahiri.

¹⁴ This would in fact situate the incident approximately half way between Bordj Badji Mokhtar, on the Malian border, and the town of Tamanrasset.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, May 14, 2014 6:30 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: FW: March-April 2014 MAC Events Bulletin
Attachments: March-April 2014 Events Bulletin.docx

Dear Team,

Below please find the March-April 2014 MAC Events Bulletin. Our team compiles a list of reports based on our attendance of events that focus on Morocco, the Maghreb, and/or MENA. Clicking on any event below will link you to that specific report. We hope that this exercise will provide you with a value-added MAC perspective on policy events and help to keep you up-to-date on events that you do not have the time to attend.

Please do not forward this bulletin.

March-April 2014 Events Bulletin

March 11

A Mixed Picture: The Political and Economic Future of the Arab Transitions

March 18

Should the United States give up on Arab Democracy?

April 7

Human Rights Perspectives in Morocco

April 8

Beyond the Arab Spring: U.S. Engagement in a Changing Middle East

April 9

House Subcommittee Hearing: U.S. Policy Toward Morocco

April 9

Youth Inclusion in Morocco: A Discussion With Minister Mohamed Ouzzine

April 9

Governance, Rule of Law, and the International Development Agenda

April 25

Islamists in Government: Do They Moderate Once in Power?

April 30

Morocco in a Post-Arab Spring World: Addressing the challenges of reform, regionalization and resource management

.....

A Mixed Picture: The Political and Economic Future of the Arab Transitions

Date: March 11, 2014

1. Title: "A Mixed Picture: The Political and Economic Future of the Arab Transitions"

Hosted by the Atlantic Council

Participants:

Yasser El Shimy: Teaching Fellow, Boston University

Ellen Laipson: President and CEO, Stimson Center

Mohsin Khan: Senior Fellow, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, Atlantic Council

Mirette F. Mabrouk: Moderator: Deputy Director for Regional Programs, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, Atlantic Council

2. Overview

The forum, considered the future of the Arab Spring countries as they emerge from political transitions. The panelists discussed their political and economic expectations for countries such as Egypt, Libya, Tunisia, and Yemen which overthrew their autocratic regimes. They also mentioned countries such as Morocco and Jordan, which went through similar political transitions, yet maintained longstanding elements of their political structures, notably their monarchies. The Arab Spring had many economic and political consequences, which each country responded to in different ways. Three years into the transition, the panelists sought to address the progress of these countries in becoming more politically and economically stable.

3. Summary

Mabrouk noted that since the Arab Spring, the world has been watching to see how the countries in transition react to the aftermath. Some of these countries have progressed and others have regressed in terms of political stability, resulting in uneven progress among the Arab Spring countries.

Laipson began by saying foreign policy professionals need to move on from what happened during the Arab Spring and look to the future of this region. Revolutions do not change a country overnight; it takes years to reform a government, an economic system, and the political mindset of a country. Laipson continued by giving the example of Ukraine's democratic progression, which took ten years to resemble a democratic state after their revolution. It took Tunisia three years of confusion and struggle before things began to be sorted out. The international community needs to be sensitive and patient because it has taken decades for countries like the US, France, and others to transform into democracies. The Arab revolts happened so suddenly and the younger generations wanted individual freedoms, but did not think of the implications on a larger scale. Creating and reforming institutions will take many years if the Arab Spring countries want to have individual freedoms as well as a stable democratic government.

El Shimy added that throughout the Arab Spring, most of those societies have only seen democracy in a negative light, as it brought down standards of living in the region – in contrast to relative stability under authoritarian leadership. The usage of the term 'Arab Spring' presumes that there will be an optimistic outcome, however most likely there will not be democracy at the end of this long road ahead for these people. The future of political Islam may be decided in countries like Morocco. Morocco is not using the zero-sum method in government like Egypt is, and this is why it is continuing to be a stable state. The pattern in most Arab Spring countries is to jump into elections and the winner takes all of the power, which is obviously not working. El Shimy also added that in order to foster hope for the Arab Spring countries, states must decentralize powers and increase the involvement of rural communities in the political sector, which will build competencies, confidence, and encourage investment.

Khan began by stating the world economy and price of oil is going down; it is a perfect atmosphere for a storm to take place in oil producing countries. Something that is rarely seen in the developing world is an economic depression which Yemen and Tunisia had in 2011. Traditionally, Arab governments tried to adjust their economies by avoiding recession and dependence on imports from other countries. What the Arab Spring countries suffered after the uprisings was the lack of any coherent economic plan, mostly because the new leaders focused on national security and installing a new political regime. There was no cohesive economic model, therefore the governments catered to immediate and more populist needs, expanding subsidies and increasing government jobs at the expense of long-term economic growth. Looking to the future, the Arab region needs to get growth going. A long term plan needs to include international investment and the short term plan needs to start with useful spending of existing capital, concurrently as economic reforms are being made. Khan added that he does not share the optimism of the other panelists; he argued that these country's economies are in fact further deteriorating. Assuming the economic climate will improve, it would be a good sign for democratization.

4. Q & A

Q: (Khalil Al Anani, Johns Hopkins) What can other Arab countries do to help those undergoing Arab Spring transitions?

A: (Laipson) Inter-Arab politics are interesting. Some Arab countries want to distance themselves from being clumped into a homogeneous region and create individualized plans and names for themselves. The countries of the Arab peninsula deter other Arab countries from going down the democratic path. They do this not only with their words but with investments.

(El Shimy) Egypt is ungovernable right now. There are 90 million people who are mostly living in extreme poverty, unemployment is high, and 60% of Egypt is under the age of 35. Tourism is down by 35% and it was once 10% of Egypt's GDP. The changes that are occurring in Egypt are unsustainable, which is why the people turn to violence. The Army will not be under civilian control anytime soon, as it is the only way to maintain any national security.

Q: (Lily Lousada, Center for American Progress) There is a great need of institutional development, what role can the United States play?

A: (Laipson) A period of retrenchment and reflection is needed from the United States. The Egyptian people are not supportive of US aid in the ongoing internal political conflicts. It shows that the people of Egypt are not always supportive of actual common good for their society, since they should be accepting help from the United States. What are the parameters of civil society engagement? The international community needs to see this as a period of adjustment in US foreign policy.

Q: (Danya Greenfield, Atlantic Council) The IMF will come in again to try to help. If the macro-economic status seems to be improving, why is everyday life deteriorating?

A: (Khan) The IMF will create reform and investment structure, and there will be growth along with IMF programs because of the financing that comes with it. The Gulf countries have promised a lot of money that will also act as a fiscal stimulus. I am optimistic about this; this has the ability to kick-start the economies, if it will be sustainable, though depends on the country.

(El Shimy) The money that the Gulf states are putting into the Arab Spring countries has gone towards energy, food subsidies, stabilizing the currency, and preventing bankruptcy, but these policies have had no effect on the actual economy.

(Laipson) Reform will happen at different rates; however local leadership and ownership must happen. Democracy would be great, but security comes first. In order to make any reforms there must be day to day security available to the general population.

Q: (Christopher Jarvis, IMF) Egypt's IMF assistance has shown improvement towards democracy and addressing fundamental economic problems, but it seems that the future of democracy in Egypt is dark.

A: (Khan) The issue that I am concerned with Egypt's economy is El-Sisi and the new government. The military is the only way to maintain stability and it has returned once again.

(El Shimy) Egypt is at a point of no return. The legitimacy of whoever remains in power is questionable. Also, the extreme polarization of society in Egypt makes it difficult for any government to run it.

5. Observation

The forum was attended by around 100 people from varying backgrounds, including foreign policy professionals, members of the think tank community, members of the IMF and USAID, and students. The tone of the forum seemed a bit pessimistic of the current state of the Middle East and countries that were involved in the Arab Spring. El Shimy had been in Egypt for the last three years and had an extremely pessimistic point of view on the status of Egypt, though he mentioned Morocco as a possible source of inspiration to the region.

\(Back to top\)

Should the United States give up on Arab Democracy?

Date: March 18, 2014

1. Title: "Should the United States give up on Arab Democracy?"

Hosted by SFS Program for Jewish Civilization

Participants:

Elliot Abrams: Senior Fellow, Middle Eastern Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations

2. Overview

The Program for Jewish Civilization hosted a lecture by Elliot Abrams, senior fellow for Middle Eastern Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations. Abrams pushed back against the common consensus that because of the unhappy aftermath of the Arab Spring, the United States should by and large give up on supporting democracy in the Middle East. At the event, he deconstructed and debunked this popular attitude and put forth an alternative of his own.

3. Summary

Elliot Abrams began by answering the question, what is the Arab Spring? He stated that the Arab Spring, as it is popularly described, was not a series of revolutions, but instead a series of uprisings against illegitimate authoritarian governments. The only consensus among the participants of these revolts was that the status quo had to change. There was no agreement about what that change would be. He said that democracy didn't prevail in the aftermath of these revolts because the ousted governments had left no mechanisms which would serve as the basis for a democracy. Furthermore, there are no Middle Eastern Arab models of democracy to serve as a basis either. While the authoritarian governments were in power, all democratic organizations had been completely crushed. The champions of democracy in the Middle East during the Arab Spring had to start from scratch.

Abrams then listed some of the popular theories about the failure of creating a democracy in the Arab World. He said that some attribute the failure of democracy to Arab culture and Islam. There is this idea, he said, that Islam and Arab culture is simply incompatible with democracy. Another theory is that Arabs are too suspicious of the West and any attempt by the West to provide assistance. The final theory Abrams listed was the idea that Ottoman and colonial models of governance have put democracy in the Middle East at a disadvantage. These theories, he said, are inadequate. They do not, for example, explain the Tunisian case, where democracy might have a fighting chance. Furthermore, he stated that when there is a vacuum of power in the Middle East as we saw during the Arab Spring, Islamist takeovers are not inevitable as the common consensus portrays.

The Middle East has seen Islamist takeovers because the ousted dictatorships had kept them intact. They were organized after the Arab Spring in Egypt and in Gaza. These Islamist movements were intact and organized under the dictatorships, but they were not in power. The perception was that the dictatorships did not look out for the best interest of their populations and that the Islamist movements were the ones who provided aid, food, and medical care to the poor. However, once an Islamist group gets into power, just like the dictatorships, they fall for the same temptations and the populations no longer continue to perceive them as populist agents. They see them as unfit to rule.

Time and time again, Abrams stated, the Islamists take power because under the authoritarian regimes, democrats had no chance of organizing to develop the same positive reputation that the Islamists made as altruists. This means that the transition to democracy in the Middle East needs to happen slowly in order to allow Arab democrats the time and resources they need to organize. Furthermore, the aforementioned idea that Arabs are too suspicious to trust democrats is not based in reality. A study, said Abrams, written by Arab intellectuals attribute the "freedom deficit" to all of the underdevelopment in the Middle East. It does not, as the "suspicion" theory suggests, blame colonialism or Zionism. The mindset a culture needs to create a successful democracy is present in the Middle East, it just needs to be given the time and US support that it has been lacking.

The United States, said Abrams, should stop cozying up to authoritarian leaders in the name of stability and start openly or clandestinely supporting Arab democrats. The idea in foreign policy that on one hand there is one set of issues called "the real" issues of business, security, and economy and on the other hand there are the secondary "fake issues" of human rights is false. The human rights issue is just as important for US national interests. For example, in Egypt the US has a case of an oppressive authoritarian government it supported for the sake of stability and to the detriment of human rights. The government of Egypt was friendly toward the US, but now, because of that relationship, the population is hostile toward the US. Meanwhile, in Iran, the US has a case of a government that it openly denounces with a population that for the most part is supportive of the US. Abrams said that the US policy in the Middle East should be to seek out, protect, and endorse Arab democrats. Furthermore, the US should speak out against Middle Eastern governments that make democrats suffer. It is in the moral and national interest of the United States to do so.

4. Q & A

Q: If you were the president of the United States, what would you do about Syria?

A: Well, Syria is a proxy war. The US mishandled this. The top advisors to President Obama told him that he should have sought out and provided support to Syrian democrats. It was a missed opportunity. This lack of support has given the jihadis most of the power. They are a danger to Israel today and the rest of the world tomorrow. There was no US willpower to support the democrats. If I were the president, I would have ramped up military support for non-jihadi rebels.

Q: (Stewart Sloane, American Jewish International Relations) Talk a little about why the US didn't support the 2009 Green movement in Iran.

A: The US should have been more vocal in their support of the Iranian people and more vocal in their complaints against the Iranian government.

Q: (Yasmin, student at the School of Foreign Service) How does the US save face to authoritarian governments with which it has relations with and reach out to democrats under that authoritarian governments' rule?

A: It is difficult. There is no question about that. The US must be willing to take that kind of trouble from authoritarian governments. A presidential administration could also hide behind Congress so as not to run the risk of breaking up its relations.

Q: (Ann Zigna, no stated affiliation) What role does Facebook play in revolutions in the Middle East?

A: It makes news and ideas more difficult to block by the authoritarian governments.

5. Observation

There were approximately 40 people in attendance, among them there were professors, graduate students, and academics. While Morocco was not mentioned specifically, the topic at hand is relevant. These are the types of US policy changes the Moroccan government should be aware of as it is one of the most important strategic allies in the North Africa and Middle East region.

\(Back to top\)

Human Rights Perspectives in Morocco

Date: April 7, 2014

1. Title: Human Rights Perspectives in Morocco

Hosted by the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS)

Participants:

Driss El Yazami: President, National Human Rights Council (CNDH), Morocco

Jon Alterman: Moderator: Director of the Middle East Program, CSIS

2. Overview

This event focused on the activities of the CNDH as well as the general state of human rights in Morocco. Mr. El Yazami described the activities of the CNDH under the 2011 Constitution, its priorities, its challenges, and its evolving role in Morocco and the region.

3. Summary

Mr. El Yazami posed the key question about human rights, in his perspective: Can an Arab country build a democracy and protect human rights peacefully, rapidly, without foreign intervention? He reiterated several times that what Morocco is trying to do in a relatively short period of time took decades if not generations in other countries. In addition, there are new players –youth and Islamists, who may not agree on the definition of universal human values. He feels strongly that a democracy is centered on the ability to discuss issues and respect differences.

Morocco is building a democracy and human rights regime step by step, by themselves, through extensive public discussion. Three important events in that process: the family code, the Royal Institute for Amazigh Culture (recognizing diversity and the country's cultural pluralism), and the IER – Morocco's version of transitional justice which is now informing similar projects in other countries.

Morocco has taken a different path to democracy in its new constitution, in which 60 of 180 sections include human rights. Key reforms that are upcoming include two dealing with the judiciary, violence against women, child labor, military tribunals, migration/asylum. He gave several examples of how much has to be done: 60 percent of women surveyed said that they have experienced domestic violence in the previous 12 months; 100,000 children are working illegally. Migration today is predominately south to south, which has its own unique challenges.

4. Q & A

Q: (Alterman) The pace of change seems very slow. There are expectations raised, then nothing seems to happen. Is this good or bad?

A: It is good because what is happening is that people are staying on board, they are involved in a national public discussion among many different points of view. There is a need to train people on how to promote and embrace reform. According to the most recent detailed study, there are 45,000 NGOs in Morocco; 30 percent have a budget less than $500, 37 percent don't have an office. They need training on the fundamentals of organizing and operating an NGO. Also, 52 NGOs do not have licenses from the Ministry of Interior. They should be allowed to register. That's guaranteed in the Constitution. The HCP has prepared a report on Civil Society that was released last week. In five months, it will become legislation. We are still waiting for a law on decentralization. We need to create educational materials for use in the schools on Sahrawis. We have three offices in the Sahara and held 20 seminars over the past two years on building a human rights culture. All this takes time.

Q: (HRW) What about freedom of assembly, of association?

A: NGOs should use the courts to get registered – the HPC report will generate new laws on this issue.

Q: (CSIS) What about human rights training for police and other officials?

A: Programs are moving ahead but they are difficult to do since you need three elements: the conditions such as salary, equipment, and resources have to be in place; You have to build a human rights culture through education. CNDH is hoping to be commissioned as the "national mechanism against torture" responsible for monitoring without restraint torture charges.

Q: (Independent Diplomat) What about people convicted previously under the military tribunals?

A: The sentences are being appealed to the Court of Cession, which can move the cases to civil courts if it rules that the procedures/processes were incorrect or insufficient.

Q: (Congressional Research Service) How does one differentiate between what is the purview of the Palace and that of the Parliament?

A: Under the new constitution, the Palace does not draft legislation. It can request legislation be drafted by the Parliament. The reform process is an interaction among the Palace, civil society, international actors, and local leadership. The challenge is how to learn the new roles/powers and enhance Parliament's efforts given that they have no staff and a democracy needs an active Parliament.

Q: (Moroccan community member) Do you think that human rights issues are sometimes manipulated by outside parties for political purposes?

A: Moroccans want human rights; from the 60s until now people have been fighting for human rights. It is both a national and an international agenda and it is a national and international responsibility. Morocco signed international conventions because it wanted to, not because it was forced to. Outside reporting helps Morocco, which will host the Global Human Rights Summit November 27-29.

Q: (Western Sahara representative) Why is Morocco afraid of human rights monitoring included in MINURSO?

A: Morocco doesn't need external parties. The challenge for Muslims is how to implement human rights in each country. Morocco is doing that and is doing it well.

Q: (William Lawrence, GW/POMED) What is your opinion about Salafists and jihadists and how they should be treated?

A: They should be integrated into the national dialogue. We need to have the peaceful inclusion of diverse opinions. Also, we need to deal with the issue on integrating Muslims into other societies.

Q: (Moroccan Association for Relief and Development) What can the media do to promote human rights education?

A: Morocco must do much more to use the media in schools to promote a human rights culture.

5. Observation

This event was attended by about 30 people from think tanks, the Embassy, Moroccan community, and other organizations. El Yazami was quite forthright; answering difficult questions; exhibiting a very deep commitment to CNDH's work; and consistent in framing his analysis in terms of human rights, not political posturing. MACP should continue to integrate the work of CNDH into its materials and include them in delegation visits.

\(Back to top\)

Beyond the Arab Spring: U.S. Engagement in a Changing Middle East

Date: April 8, 2014

1. Title: "Beyond the Arab Spring: U.S. Engagement in a Changing Middle East"

Hosted by The Wilson Center and USIP

Participants:

Daniel Brumberg: Senior Adviser, USIP

Danya Greenfield: Acting Director, The Atlantic Council

Steven Heydemann: Vice President, USIP

Haleh Esfandiari: Moderator: Director, The Wilson Center

2. Overview

The Wilson Center and the United States Institute of Peace brought together three area studies scholars on the Middle East and North Africa to discuss their assessments of the state of authoritarianism and democracy in the Middle East three years after the Arab Spring, and how US policy should adapt to changing dynamics in the region.

3. Summary

Steven Heydemann began with what he described as his "bleak" outlook on the state of democracy and freedom in the post-Arab Spring Middle East with regards to local and national governance. He said that when the first protests of the movement began, scholars and politicians wrongfully characterized Middle Eastern authoritarian regimes as brittle. However, he continued, three years down the line it appears that the Arab Spring has yielded an increase in exclusionary and centralized governments. He said that these authoritarian regimes upgraded their tactics to survive the Arab Spring with a renewed commitment to clamp down on and control the media, contain and demobilize civil society, and buy off the public. Morocco, he said, has shown one of the biggest increases in public spending in order to buy off the public. Along with these measures, Morocco has started to shift its diplomacy and economy away from the west in order to evade the accompanying pressure it receives regarding human rights and democratization. He said that his prediction is grim for building and sustaining an international coalition to fight authoritarianism.

Daniel Brumberg said that he agreed with Steve Heydemann's assessment of the region in the wake of the Arab Spring, adding that the situation is worse than he or anyone ever predicted. He stated that he foresees increasing antagonism toward the west emanating from the North Africa and the Middle East. The Arab Spring has created a challenging new landscape for the US and its interests. Russia, Iran, and China are in competition with the US for influence in the region. Syria and Egypt especially have opened up new opportunities for Russia to make regional dynamics fall in their favor.

Danya Greenfield began by saying that for the US to gain more influence in the Middle East and North Africa over Russia, Iran, and China, the government needs to be clear about what it wants to achieve. She said that the US has been unclear with what its goals are with Iran and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The US hasn't shown any core interest in democratization in the Middle East since the Arab Spring. Lastly, she recommended that the US and the EU coordinate their interests in the region to gain more influence and offset Iran, China, Russia, and Saudi Arabia, who have been gaining greater leverage in the region lately.

4. Q & A

Q: (Dana Dauda, Jordanian Embassy) Is three years after the Arab Spring enough time to start making assessments about the state of the Middle East? Jordan for example has shown a lot of commitment to reform. We have a road map to democracy. We have milestones set.

A: (Greenfield) When we evaluate the reforms of authoritarian regimes, we determine whether these reforms are meaningful or cosmetic.

(Steven Heydemann) It is true. Jordan is the regional leader of reform.

(Daniel Brumberg) Although Morocco insists that it's leader in the region.

(Steven Heydemann) Are they real reforms? There is some degree of commitment but it's not adequate. It's also not useful to compare these nations in the Middle East to one another. There are countries that are worse off than others but it's not to say that the better off countries are on the right trajectory.

5. Observation

There were about one hundred scholars, students and members of the press in attendance. The speakers showed great pessimism with regards to the aftermath of the Arab Spring. The entire panel showed a lot of skepticism toward all the governments in the Arab World and a lot of pessimism about the development of democracy there. The panel viewed most reforms and expansions of power in the region as disingenuous and as authoritarian tactics to demobilize would-be protestors. The overall skepticism of the panel and crowd were made even more clear after comment on Morocco 'insisting' that it is the regional leader in reform, whereby many in attendance laughed. This kind of perception is neither rare nor common, and is something that should be addressed carefully.

\(Back to top\)

Subcommittee Hearing: U.S. Policy Toward Morocco

Date: April 9, 2014

1. Title: "Subcommittee Hearing: U.S. Policy Toward Morocco"

Hosted by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, Subcommittee on the Middle East and North Africa

Participants:

Congresswoman Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL): Chairwoman, Subcommittee on the Middle East and North Africa

Congressman Theodore E. Deutch (D-FL): Ranking Member, Subcommittee on the Middle East and North Africa

William Roebuck: Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Egypt and Maghreb Affairs, Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs, U.S. Department of State

Alina Romanowski: Deputy Assistant Administrator, Bureau for the Middle East,

2. Overview

This hearing allowed Members of Congress and the public the opportunity to hear more about what the Administration is doing to assist Morocco and what US strategic goals and objectives are in Morocco as well as the greater region. The hearing took place in the context of an imminent report from the Department of State required by Congress in the latest Appropriations Bill, as well as the recent visit for Secretary Kerry to Rabat for the US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue. Members of the Subcommittee gave statements and offered questions to the attending representatives of the State Department and the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID), making known their priorities for the future of the bilateral relationship.

3. Observation

The hearing was attended by eight members of the Subcommittee as well as Rep. Grimm, who also attended but is not a member of the actual Subcommittee. The opening statements, as well as the questions and replies, yielded many positive remarks about Morocco and the commitment of the US to the bilateral relationship, addressing security, economic development, and political and social reforms. The vast majority of comments were very positive and focused on the constructive friendship between the two countries, the positive trajectory of Morocco, and the welcome role of Morocco as a model for other countries undergoing the process of reform. Mr. Roebuck gave some indication of what to expect in the upcoming report, and reiterated the Department's support for the Moroccan autonomy plan.

4. Opening Statements

Chairwoman Ros-Lehtinen opened the hearing by welcoming the committee and guests and reading an opening statement. With all the upheaval, instability, and social unrest caused by the Arab Spring, Morocco is designated as a Major Non-Nato Ally and is working towards a political transition and instituting democratic reforms. Three years ago, the King proposed constitutional reforms that would push the country towards democracy and reform, shifting some power that was centralized from the monarchy, to the people. Parliamentary elections followed later with a new Prime Minister from an opposition party with a mandate to have more power to govern. She added that "of course the political situation in Morocco is still not perfect, but it is important for us to recognize the positive steps forward."

On the issue of the Western Sahara, Ros-Lehtinen noted, "longstanding US policy, which I support, advocates for a solution based on a formula of autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty." The kingdom has made advancements in human rights, but "certainly more can still be done," she continued. The chairwoman quoted a State Department report which cited restrictions on civil liberties for pro-independence advocates as among Morocco's most pressing human rights challenges. On the other hand, she noted, "Morocco has made strides in expanding women's rights," and created the CNDH to evaluate human rights issues. She added that "as allies, we should work together to accelerate their plans to implement the constitutional reforms that urged gender equality and parity."

Ros-Lehtinen continued by underscoring that Morocco and the US have shared a longstanding strategic bilateral relationship, "which has continued to strengthen over the past few years," and continues to do so with Secretary of State John Kerry's recent trip to Rabat. The Chairwoman cited the Free Trade Agreement and added that more can be done to get US businesses invested in Morocco. She mentioned the conclusion of the 5-year Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) Compact, which helped Morocco increase productivity, employment prospects, investments, and economic growth. The "MCC concluded that the results were impressive," especially in regards to literacy programs, despite complications, she noted. The political transition towards democracy is being paralleled by Morocco's economic transition, which is also underway.

Ros-Lehtinen next addressed the topic of security, noting that the US and Morocco collaborate closely on the issue; she argued, "where the rest of the region struggles to cope with radicalization and Islamic fundamentalism, Morocco is looking to foster and spread a more moderate form of Islam." Morocco does this partly through efforts such as the focus on training women in Islamic theology right alongside their male counterparts. This idea would not only be taboo in many other countries, or likely even illegal. The kingdom has not been immune from the threat of homegrown extremism; as Ros-Lehtinen noted, "Morocco is on the frontlines of fighting terrorism throughout the region," and "Morocco has proven to be an important ally." The Trans-Saharan Counterterrorism Program is an important project that Morocco and the US can work closely together on. She concluded by saying that "the administration must continue to see Morocco as the potential for what other North African transitional countries can do, and we must look to glean the best practices from its approach and see how it can be implemented in neighboring countries as well."

Rep. Deutch began his opening statement by reminding the audience that Morocco was the first country to recognize US independence. He added that Morocco is a "critical partner" in improving security in the Maghreb and Sahel. This is evidenced by its status as a Major Non-NATO ally, as a member of the Global Counterterrorism Forum, and by the recently-begun African Lion exercise involving 350 American service members and 150 Moroccan armed services members. This level of cooperation is "paramount" to fighting terrorism, arms, and narcotics trafficking in the region. Deutch underscored that, "It's clear that Morocco is committed to taking substantial action," to improve security and stability in the region. Rep. Deutch commended Morocco on its Imam training and other bilateral programs with Mali, which he called "a welcome approach."

Turning to the economy, Rep. Deutch said that Morocco's struggles were due to stagnation in Europe, and that increased government spending and high unemployment are serious issues, which he is happy to see are being addressed by USAID programs. He added that political reforms have met success and should be encouraged. Rep. Deutch commended Morocco's performance with the conclusion of the first MCC compact and its $698 million investment in the country.

Rep. Deutch also commended Morocco's good work with the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC), and its leadership in the al-Quds committee, which plays a great role in working towards resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict. "We look to Morocco to play a positive role," he said. Rep. Deutch reminded the audience that Morocco has had a longstanding commitment to this conflict, as Hassan II "took the bold step" of inviting Simon Peres to meet publicly in Morocco for peace talks. He expressed concerns about recent news related potential anti-Israeli laws in Morocco. Rep. Deutch affirmed his support for the US policy of supporting Morocco's plan for autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty for the Western Sahara, adding that it continues to receive strong bipartisan support in Congress. Lastly, Rep. Deutch said that in the wake of the Kerry visit to Rabat, he values the future of the bilateral relationship.

Rep. Chabot (R-OH) also added a short opening statement, beginning by reminding the audience that Morocco has been a source of calm in a chaotic region. He added that he looks forward to an update from the State Department on the status of the bilateral relationship following the recent visit of Secretary Kerry for the Strategic Dialogue meetings. He mentioned the promise of the 2011 constitution, and asked how that reform is carried out. He also asked for a comment on the success of the PJD in the most recent elections.

Rep. Grimm (R-NY) opened by saying that Morocco is historically one of America's strongest allies, and has been a "strong partner in combatting terrorism throughout North Africa." He mentioned that "King Mohammed successfully weathered the Arab Spring mostly by listening to the Moroccan people and making appropriate reforms, and for this, I think, he should be commended." Rep. Grimm reiterated his support for Morocco's plan for autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty, saying that "I believe the United States Congress has a responsibility to assist Morocco in achieving this resolution."

Mr. Roebuck began his opening statement by saying that Morocco is "an important and longstanding ally," and that "we continue to enjoy a strong bilateral relationship." He said that the relationship is "focused on promoting regional stability, supporting democratic reform efforts, countering violent extremism, and strengthening trade and cultural ties." The recent visit of the King and the recent Strategic Dialogue meetings provided an opportunity to affirm the relationship, he added.

Regarding democratic reforms, under King Mohammed VI, "the Moroccan political system has gradually liberalized," Roebuck noted, and that the country "moved forward in 2013" with "calibrated but steady" political and economic reforms. "We have a robust dialogue" with Morocco on human rights and ongoing political reform, he added. The US and Morocco are fully engaged on ensuring peace and security in the region. Roebuck expressed approval that USAID's new country strategy directly addresses the issue of youth employment. He also mentioned the recent US Business Development Conference, which had 58 American businesses participating.

Regarding security cooperation, "Morocco is one of our closest security partners," he said, mentioning the Trans-Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership as well as the Global Counterterrorism Forum. Regarding the Sahara, Roebuck said that "the United States supports the United Nations-led process, designed to bring about a peaceful, sustainable, and mutually acceptable solution to the Western Sahara question." US policy "has remained consistent for many years," he added. Roebuck reiterated support for UN Envoy Ross and his efforts to find a mutually acceptable solution.

Lastly, the US and Morocco have a longstanding history of people-to-people ties, Roebuck said, citing Morocco's generous support for the J. Christopher Stephens virtual exchange initiative.

Romanowski began her opening statement by talking about the 56-year partnership between Morocco and USAID. She referred to it as a "strong relationship that focuses on growth, improving educational opportunities, and strengthening the effectiveness of civil society." USAID has also worked on improving maternal health, constructing dams, converting land for agricultural use, and helping Morocco's microfinance sector.

A new 5-year country development strategy was developed in consultation with the Moroccan government and civil society, and private sector, aiming to increase youth employment, enhancing civic participation in governance, and increasing enrollment in primary schools. Alliances with key regional allies and public-private partnerships with companies like Microsoft, Volvo, and Chevron, will help to control costs.

Romanowski stressed that targeting youth unemployment is crucial, as young people account for 30% of the population, and graduates can't find jobs while employers cite a lack of necessary skills. Without a change, "Morocco cannot generate sufficient prosperity through private sector growth," she stated. Toward that end, Romanowski underscored that USAID is launching the Youth Employability Project, which will "facilitate partnerships between government ministries, Moroccan universities, and technical institutes, as well as local NGOs and the private sector, to create workforce development services for a broad range of youth." She mentioned current work with 40 Moroccan startups.

USAID is also helping Morocco's push to promote civil society by working with 80 local governments to create platforms for dialogue, especially for youth and women. USAID is also focused on primary education, especially for rural girls. From 2000 to 2004, attendance rates for girls improved from 62% to 83%, though the overall literacy rate remains 55%. Early grad reading is also being boosting in conjunction with Moroccan reforms. These development projects will also help to combat violent extremism by giving at-risk Moroccan youth a voice and opportunity.

5. Q & A

Q: (Rep. Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL)) In the omnibus bill passed in January, Congress authorized that funds could also be used in the Western Sahara and that a report would be issued on the subject – can you describe what the report will entail and if it will be delivered on time? With the extremism threat on the rise in the region, how would you describe the cooperation with Morocco on counterterrorism? And lastly, what was the result of the recent meeting for the Strategic Dialogue with Secretary Kerry?

A: (Roebuck) The Strategic Dialogue was a great success. The focus is on three areas: political security, economic and political cooperation, and education and cultural cooperation. I think we made steps forward in all three areas. There was a robust discussion on the topic of Morocco's domestic reforms, counterterrorism, and regional economic integration. They were also focused on strengthening Morocco's end of the Free Trade Agreement, interfaith dialogue, the aforementioned Chris Stephens project, and cultural exchange programs such as the Fulbright program. On counterterrorism, this has been a decade-long development, fed by developments in Mali and Libya and the wider Sahel. We work very closely with Morocco on counterterrorism, and our partnership is quite strong. We are working together to improve law enforcement and criminal justice system strengthening in support of counterterrorism.

Q: (Rep. Deutch (D-FL)) Clearly, security cooperation is a critical part of the relationship. The amount of youth unemployment is a staggering figure, and we share concerns with Morocco that this population could be vulnerable to extremism – the porous borders in North Africa make the proposition of recruitment in conflict like Syria easier. What is being done to address this specific issue?

A: (Roebuck) The US and Morocco work closely on this. There is "a need for a multifaceted approach to this - and a counterterrorism approach in general - and this is what Morocco has in place." Morocco's "vigilant security efforts" include a "soft-side" countering through education and socio-economic assistance as part of a broad, focused policy, which we're very supportive of.

Q: (Rep. Deutch (D-FL)) I was pleased to see USAID is focused on youth unemployment. Now that Morocco announced ambitious plans to increase industry and employment, how will USAID programs realign?

A: (Romanowski) We have already realigned with this in mind. Focusing on bringing universities, vocational students, the private sector, and the government, centers together.

Q. (Rep. Deutch (D-FL)): Morocco focuses on increasing civic participation among women, with the 60-seat quota for women in Parliament. What trend lines are you seeing for women in politics?

A: (Romanowski) I think the trend lines for women in Morocco are positive. In my last several visits I've met women parliamentarians and politicians and others active in politics, and through our programs we are making sure that young men and women are getting more active participation.

Q: (Rep. Chabot (R-OH)) Morocco has been supportive of the Arab-Israeli peace negotiations, though recently an anti-Israeli group has worked to end ties between Morocco and Israel. Is this group a cause for concern?

A: (Roebuck) Morocco and Israel have a long history of positive relations. These anti-Israel efforts have stalled and we believe that broader values of religious dialogue will triumph. The King and government have worked hard to foster religious tolerance and interfaith understanding in the country.

Q: (Rep. Chabot (R-OH)) We know there are a lot of bad actors in the region and Morocco has taken a proactive approach to counterterrorism, can you comment on some of the successful elements?

A: (Roebuck) The Moroccans have been very effective counterterrorism partners due to broad proven elements. They are very good at developing programs to promote tolerant, moderate Islam. Efforts to train imams in neighboring countries are effective. They've also been very active as regional interactive partner in counterterrorism. They've hosted a border conference in Libya and other things on a wide range of fronts.

(Romanowski) I would point to our civic participation programs that focus on marginalized urban youth. We've targeted the areas of Tangiers and Tetouan neighborhoods to bring out the voices and bring confidence by youth in politics.

Q: (Rep. Chabot (R-OH)) Some argue that the US-Morocco trade agreement limits greater regional economic integration. Would you agree with that and do you believe both sides have benefitted and what is the future of trade between Morocco and the US?

A: (Roebuck) It's been a huge benefit to both sides. The US somewhat more in the initial years but I don't believe it's been a hindrance to Morocco. They have a bright future as a hub for Europe and Africa.

Q: (Rep. Frankel (D-FL)) The 2011 constitution guaranteed gender equality, but I'm told it is still not where Moroccan women would like it to be. Judges still allow marriage under the supposed new age limit and there are inheritance laws that still favor men. What is your opinion of the status of women in Morocco? What measures of effectiveness in counterterrorism measures have there been? What is the strategic importance of Morocco in their relationship to neighboring countries?

A: (Roebuck) On the issue of reform and women's society, I would say that it's a work in progress in Morocco. Moroccans underwent major reforms in 2003 and 2004 that benefitted women through family code reform and inheritance and child custody. The 2011 constitution strengthened further some of those reforms and made constitutionally clear gender equality. Some of those issues remain a problem – the Moroccan government is aware of it. "Our sense is that they are reform-oriented, they want to make improvements, they are continuing to do this, and what we've seen in the last decade really is a steady move of progress. One of the human rights people in 2012 noted an emerging culture of human rights in Morocco." On the strategic importance of Morocco, we have a strategic relationship with Morocco because it is such an important country in the region – its geographic location is very important, it is involved in one of the major conflict areas in the Western Sahara, which is important, and it is creating some issue with Algeria. It is also a critical partner in fighting extremism, trade, and promoting moderate Islam. It is a very important strategic partner for the United States.

A: (Romanowski) On the issue of monitoring effectiveness, the new 5-year country strategy afforded us that opportunity to evaluate programs. This caused our shift to focus on workforce development.

Q: (Rep. Grimm (R-NY)) The Chairwoman before mentioned the report on Western Sahara funds. Is it on schedule?

A: (Roebuck) Yes sir, we are preparing the report and it will be delivered in compliance with the law.

Q: (Rep. Grimm (R-NY)) Can you provide some idea of what to expect?

A: (Roebuck) "I think the report will describe our efforts to provide assistance to Morocco, and it will outline some of the areas where we have provided that assistance, addressing the particular areas that the legislation wants to see more information on. It will make the point that with regard to assistance for Morocco that would be used in the Western Sahara; our policy is that we should not take any actions that would be perceived as undermining our support for the UN-led mediation process, and that's a pillar of our policy, and the report would include that point."

Q: (Rep. Grimm (R-NY)) Changing gears a little bit, I'm very happy to see that Morocco is becoming a destination for many US companies, not just as an export market but also as a platform for exports into Africa, Europe, and the broader Middle East. Casablanca Finance City is poised to become one of the central economic hubs for international companies on the continent. Can you tell us about how companies are looking at Morocco as a gateway market?

A: (Roebuck) The primary way that American companies work in Morocco so far is to use the vehicle of the FTA, which gives companies an ability to invest in Morocco and invest there. We also signed a trade facilitation agreement to shore up those efforts.

(Romanowski) In my most recent conversations with Moroccan businessmen, it was very clear that they were looking to our programs to build networks into the US and were looking forward to further development.

Q: (Rep. Connolly (D-VA)) What is the impact of the crackdown and political repression in Egypt of the Moroccan government and public opinion?

A: (Roebuck) It is difficult for me to say directly, but people in the region are looking closely. In Tunisia, some of the political parties watched and it probably made them more flexible in their national dialogue. Morocco was in a different situation with no approaching elections. I suspect people in Morocco are concerned and it may be causing some changed perception of the Arab Spring and democratic evolution and the side effects of turmoil.

Q: (Rep. Connolly (D-VA)) Hopefully Morocco looks at that and says, that's not where we want to go. Where is the Polisario right now? What is their appeal and political standing? Are they stronger or weaker? Has Morocco exercised sovereignty in a meaningful way that is recognized?

A: (Roebuck) The Polisario is the political organization that advocates for independence in the Western Sahara. "I'd say that their influence has been somewhat circumscribed in the last decade." It is an area that has remained in conflict. There are two parties to it – those parties have to reach a mutually agreed-upon solution. "I think probably over the past decade or so they've gotten weaker." They remain a key party in that conflict, weaker or not. On sovereignty, "the territory of Western Sahara is considered by the UN as a non-self-governing territory, and Morocco exercises as sort of an administrator for its part of the territory, but it's not recognized by the UN as an official administering power for the Western Sahara."

Q: (Rep. Connolly (D-VA)) Does anybody think Western Sahara could actually function as an independent functioning state viably?

A: (Roebuck) We don't reach that level of inquiry, we focus on the process of resolving the conflict and haven't reached any decision about the viability of Western Sahara as a state. "The Moroccans have put forward a proposal which is autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty as their solution to that conflict – we believe that's a serious, realistic, and credible proposal. It's a potential approach to address the concerns of the people of Western Sahara and to help them to live their lives in justice and dignity, so we think it's a potential approach." But in the end we don't think you can impose it.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber (R-TX)) Morocco receives substantial US development aid and bilateral assistance that has increased following a 2006 Free Trade Agreement. How much has our trade increased as a result of that?

A: (Roebuck) Our trade has increased about 400% - it's a big increase on both sides. Its about 400% on the US side and between 150% and 200% on the Moroccan side. So its been a big benefit for both, a little more for US exports. We are working with the Moroccans though our commercial development programs, through USAID, and through the MCC to even that out and improve competitiveness so that Moroccans can equally benefit.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber (R-TX)) I saw that Morocco recently concluded a $697 million MCC compact which focuses on alleviating poverty. Was it successful?

A: (Roebuck) I think it was very successful. It focused on sustainable tourism, sustainable fisheries, and agriculture. It educated with basic literacy about 40,000 poor people in those fields. 80% of those people were women. It helped build a tourist infrastructure in Fez medina and focused to a limited degree on financial services. Morocco was re-selected for a second compact – I think many people were impressed by the way it engaged with its institutions and its enthusiasm. And we are moving forward with shaping a further compact for Morocco.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber (R-TX)) With regard to the improvement of women's rights with the passage of the 2004 family code that aimed to improve women's socioeconomic rights – has that been successful? Can you give me a status update?

A: (Romanowski) We ensure that all of our USAID programs are supportive of women and include women, particularly when it comes to our democracy and governance. We are making sure that women who want to get into politics have the training and skills, and have the advantage. This is also the case in our economic and workforce development program. There is a lot more work to do – that is true across the region – but I think Morocco actually stands out as making some great strides.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber (R-TX)) I have read that there is some concern that the Western Sahara will actually become a training ground for terrorists and even that some of those potential terrorists had been training in Western Europe. Is that right?

A: (Roebuck) I am not aware of that report. Our general assessment of the Western Sahara is as follows: it is a large space and we don't think that it's good for a space that big to be an ungoverned space. That is why we support the UN being there with MINURSO organization. In terms of what you are talking about with ties between and people in the Western Sahara, to our knowledge we are not aware of significant terrorist activity in the Western Sahara and we are not aware of links between the Polisario, for example, and terrorist organizations like the ones you cited.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber (R-TX)) Morocco and the Polisario both have advocates who regularly appeal to Congress to support their positions on the Western Sahara, Many members of Congress support Morocco's support Morocco's position of sovereignty over the territory. How many members of Congress support that position? Do you know?

A: (Roebuck) I don't know. Our view is that the issue of sovereignty is something that should be resolved through negotiations with the parties. Both sides have put forward proposals. We think that the Moroccan proposal is very serious, credible, and realistic. But in the end we can't impose it.

Full video of the hearing as well as opening statements can be found here:

<http://foreignaffairs.house.gov/hearing/subcommittee-hearing-us-policy-towards-morocco>

\(Back to top\)

Youth Inclusion in Morocco: A Discussion With Minister Mohamed Ouzzine

Date: April 9, 2014

1. Title: "Youth Inclusion in Morocco: A Discussion With Minister Mohamed Ouzzine"

Hosted by Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Participants:

Mohamed Ouzzine: Minister for Youth and Sports, The Kingdom of Morocco

Gloria La Cava: Co-coordinator, the World Bank's Middle East and North Africa region youth program

2. Overview

Moroccan Minister of Youth and Sports Mohamed Ouzzine discussed the challenges facing young people in Morocco, including the high unemployment rate and corresponding lack of economic opportunities. Gloria La Cava provided a perspective from the World Bank on recent developments in response to the minister.

3. Summary

Mohamed Ouzzine began by stating the importance of the youth in Morocco during the aftermath of the Arab Spring. The majority of Morocco's population is made of young people and he stressed that it is the responsibility of the government to provide the youth with opportunities and inspiration. People have asked if the youth of North Africa benefitted from the Arab Spring. He said that Morocco is a special case. The government, he said, had taken an interest in the country's youth long before the Arab Spring. The reforms that the King launched during the Arab Spring were a result of this interest. The youth in Morocco displayed the same demands of its government that everyone did during the Arab Spring. The King of Morocco anticipated these demands, listening to the youth and reacting to their demands in a constructive way. In Tunisia, for example, they did it the other way around.

The subsequent Constitutional reform process in Morocco involved consultation with the Moroccan youth - they had a say in the process. Ouzzine underscored that the Moroccan monarchy wants young people to be involved in the policymaking process and that the government is providing youth a chance to create their own vision of the country. He noted, "the policies made are their own policies," because Morocco has an integrated strategy of political reform - all the government departments are involved. No more does the Moroccan government approach these issues in a unilateral way. Each department plays an important role as one team. This is the new approach that Morocco has invested in.

Gloria La Cava started by talking about how the Moroccan government has pushed the World Bank to think outside the box with regards to youth inclusion issues. The World Bank has learned a lot of lessons from Morocco. There is hope for the future, but expectations must be grounded in realism. La Cava stressed that the focus on unemployed graduates is necessary because they are an important group. However, in terms of numbers, they are a very small segment of the population - the majority of the youth population is made up of non-graduates. These young people are out of work and out of school. The World Bank noted these demographics and started designing youth inclusion programs in response. La Cava stated that it has provided Morocco with some assistance with some strategies, but Morocco has done the bulk of the work. La Cava concluded that the World Bank is there when needed, but Morocco is truly driving the process.

4. Q & A

Q. (Julian Sutzker, Human Rights Watch) Is there a human rights component to this youth plan? What does it entail?

A. (Ouzzine) We are offering a wide range of services to young people. The human rights component is something that is good and we encourage.

Q. (Nancy Taggert, Education Development Center) Give some details about the economic development plan regarding youth in Morocco.

A. (La Cava) This program is new. It targets young women in particular. In terms of the design features of this strategy there are some programs that will be implemented that will be integrated with the ministry of labor. We will be introducing a lot of innovations.

A. (Ouzzine) The North Africa and the Middle East is characterized by a mismatch of demography and economic structure. The point now is to target the underprivileged youth.

5. Observation

This event highlighted Morocco's exceptionalism in the region with regards to human rights, youth unemployment, and dialogue between the people and the government. Ouzzine underscored that Morocco was reacting and planning its innovative plan to engage the youth of the country long before the Arab Spring. These reforms and changes are not necessarily a response to the Arab Spring; the King had anticipated this unrest and had already begun to listen and react in a constructive way.

\(Back to top\)

Governance, Rule of Law, and the International Development Agenda

Date: April 9, 2014

1. Title: "Governance, Rule of Law, and the International Development Agenda"

Hosted by Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS)

Participants:

Ambassador Jan Eliasson: Deputy Secretary-General, United Nations

Henrietta Holsman-Fore: Chairman and CEO, Holsman International, CSIS Trustee

Daniel Runde: Moderator: Director, Project on Prosperity and Development, CSIS

2. Overview

This event focused on the evolving international development landscape, predominantly on ways to incorporate better governance and rule of law initiatives in the post-2015 development plan for the UN. Deputy Secretary-General Eliasson offered his viewpoint on how to continue to build on the successes of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs), as well as ways that the UN is adapting its priorities to meet the current development challenges.

3. Summary

Ambassador Eliasson opened his presentation with a question: is good governance an appropriate ambition for the Millennium Development Goals (MDG) challenge? Promoting good governance and rule of law is a priority in the eyes of the UN. To explain, he cited a quote: "There is no peace without development, there is no development without peace, there is no development or peace without the respect of human rights." He argued that today he would add rule of law and underscored that peace and security, development, and human rights are one. These things all need to be developed at the same time because if one of the elements is weak, then the whole structure is weak. Thus it is important for development goals to incorporate good governance objectives. The UN, other international organizations, and national governments must see problems in a horizontal matter from all perspectives in order to ensure that the whole structure is strong. This of course requires partnerships – between international organizations, national governments, civil society, and the private sector, among others - and resources.

Eliasson continued by stating that the MDGs have provided an important planning instrument that has helped promote positive development in the last 15 years. The percentage of extreme poverty has gone down, Africa’s GDP growth of around 5-7% per year, and gender equality in education has also improved immensely. However, maternal health and sanitation continue to be huge problems and the biggest disappointments to the UN. Confronting these challenges is especially important since they have a multiplier effect on other issues. Water and sanitation are closely linked to health, health is closely linked to education performance, and education performance is linked to improving gender inequality. MDGs for post-2015 will thus most likely focus on three core areas: eradicating poverty by means of job creation, gender equality, industrialization, and the use of natural resources; environmental sustainability; and creating institutions in order to enhance rule of law. The later is particularly important as it protects human rights. And human rights violations are at the root of most modern conflicts, particularly civil wars; if the international community can confront these issues at the start, through institutions and rule of law, it would go a long way toward preventing mass atrocities.

4. Q & A

Q: (Daniel Runde, CSIS) Many Americans are skeptical of the UN, what is in it for the United States for the reconsideration of the MDGs?

A: It is not only the right thing to do morally and ethically, it is also good for all countries to help create equal development which continues to bring about global peace and prosperity. If one country thrives, its neighbors will then thrive. That is how global development works.

Q: (Daniel Runde, CSIS) Can you talk about the developments between now and December 2015 when the new MDGs will be made?

A: The General Assembly will most likely create clusters of problems and issues by this July. Then they will begin the search for finances and people to solve and create plans for these problems. MDGs will not become a reality unless there are financial resources to pull from, so that is also a priority. The question most important in our current world is ‘how’. All international policy professionals know ‘what’ needs to happen, but they need to create a plan of action. There needs to be a holistic approach, not squeezing problems into already created institutions, but rather creating institutions around problems.

Q: (Will Davis, United Nations Development Programme) Is there anyone arguing against the rule of law? What are their arguments?

A: The people who are arguing against the rule of law are the governments that are being challenged to abide by this. Their biggest arguments against this matter are issues of sovereignty and why international organizations, like the UN, feel the right to get involved in their internal politics.

Q: (Tony Carroll, CSIS) What is the realistic UN dialogue concerning the natural resources in Africa, considering the misappropriation of funds?

A: Everyone working in the UN is fully aware of the corruption in Africa. The scariest part is organized crime that develops from corruption and how the undermine structures and governments. Organized crime is the biggest contributor to terrorism which becomes an international issue.

5. Observation

There were nearly 100 foreign policy professionals and about 10 students in attendance at this event. This event was of great importance for anyone working in international development - Ambassador Eliasson remarks provided insight into the 2015 UN Millennium Development Goals. While not directly relevant to Morocco or broader US policy, Morocco is a stakeholder in the MDGs and may well be invested in the second round of them, having committed to the previous round of MDGs and looking set to achieve them.

\(Back to top\)

Date: April 25, 2014

1. Title: "Islamists in Government: Do They Moderate Once in Power?"

Hosted by the Washington Institute

Participants:

Eric Trager: Esther K. Wagner Fellow, the Washington Institute

Haroon Ullah: Member, Secretary of State's Policy Planning Staff

Vish Sakthivel: Next Generation Fellow, the Washington Institute

2. Overview

The Washington Institute brought together three scholars to discuss issues of governance in the Middle East and the trajectory of recent Arab uprisings. They discussed what lessons could – and could not – be drawn from the Islamist political experience in Egypt, Pakistan, Morocco, and other countries. The panelists suggested that the answer to the question of whether Islamists moderate once in power may be “no,” and concluded that some groups have become even more hard-line under the climate of the Arab Spring.

3. Summary

Eric Trager provided his assessment of The Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and their development throughout history, with particular emphasis on the changes within the Brotherhood in the immediate aftermath of the Arab Spring. In assessing whether or not it moderated once in power, Trager first tried to debunk certain characterizations about the Brotherhood. He argued that one can't see the Brotherhood as just a political party as this ignores the other things that it has done in its history such as its violent activity and social services. Similarly, one cannot make the mistake of seeing the Brotherhood as a broad social movement either. This wrongly assumes that the Brotherhood is a social movement. He argued that these descriptions wrongly characterized the Brotherhood as a democratic party with an Islamist ideology, rather than what it actually is: a hierarchical vanguard whose raison d'etre is achieving societal support and political power to resist Western political and cultural influences in Egypt. This rigid internal structure affected its behavior in power far more than its Islamist ideology.

What this means is that while the Brotherhood is in fact an Islamist group, it's not what dictates its behavior. The hierarchical vanguard structure is what dictates its behavior and as a result it did not moderate once in power for three reasons. First, it feared losing the internal cohesion on which vanguards depend, so its priority was appeasing a rank-and-file that wanted the Brotherhood to consolidate power quickly, rather than governing inclusively. Second, its intolerance toward outsiders -- another characteristic of insular vanguards -- further encouraged its exclusivist governing style. Muhammad Morsi's November 2012 constitutional declaration, through which he asserted unchecked executive authority, is the best example of this. Third, the Brotherhood faced its most serious political challenge from hardline Salafists, and this compelled it to embrace a far more theocratic constitution than it otherwise might have. Of these three reasons, only this last one has anything to do with the Brotherhood's Islamist ideology.

Given that the Brotherhood is primarily a hierarchical vanguard and an Islamist group only secondarily, its failure to moderate in power does not necessarily teach us much about how Islamists in general will behave in power. However, Trager argued that their experiences nevertheless illustrates that Islamists' organizational culture frequently determines their political behavior far more than their ideological pronouncements, particularly when those pronouncements are tailored for a Western audience.

Haroon Ullah started his segment by defining extremism. One can identify an extremist party by looking for several signs. Firstly, does the party seek power through extra-electoral means? In other words, do they use violence or the threat of violence? The second dimension in looking at extremism is seeing if a political entity adopts exclusionary policies toward certain groups based on their moral edicts. The third sign of extremism is incendiary rhetoric and symbolism in their campaigns for power.

He then went on to talk about Pakistan. He said the way to understand extremists in the Arab Spring is by understanding Pakistan because Islamists have the longest track record in Pakistan. The entire evolution of Islamism has already been played out in Pakistan and we may see the same pattern in the Arab world in the years to come. Ullah drew five lessons from the Islamist experience in Pakistan that can help enhance understanding of their rule.

First, the violence carried out or supported by Islamist parties in Pakistan is not indiscriminate or gratuitous, but targeted and strategic. Through connections with extremist groups, Islamists leverage political violence to push their agenda and maximize votes. Second, Pakistan proves that democracy does not necessarily moderate Islamist party platforms and ideologies. While Islamists can become more moderate through repeated electoral competition, they are just as likely to become more extreme if it serves their interests. Third, Islamist parties are not monolithic. In Pakistan, they are diverse and compete hardest against one another. To increase their appeal to the electorate, each party claims to be the most authentically religious, creating significant animosity between them. Fourth, the idea that poverty drives militancy -- which is often assumed when formulating US policy in the Middle East and South Asia -- is largely mistaken. In Pakistan, the key constituencies for Islamists hail from the thin middle class and urban areas; this and other factors may help explain why Islamist parties do better in provincial, regional, and local elections than at the national level. In order to be more effective on the ground, the United States should align its programs based on this rethinking of what drives militancy. Fifth, Islamist parties want more than just a seat at the table. They also want to shape the debate around morality.

As for their views of foreign actors, Ullah argued that Islamist political parties in Pakistan are not inherently anti-Western, though they frequently use religion to mobilize voters and have helped create a toxic environment in the country. Going forward, Washington could influence such groups through public diplomacy and faith-based engagement. For example, by interacting with figures who hold sway among Islamists -- such as imams who are increasingly bearing the cost of violence -- the United States could greatly improve its credibility. After all, most Islamists are like other political parties: they are pragmatists, not staunch ideologues.

Vish Sakthivel addressed the situation of Islamists in Morocco and argued their experiences, most prominently the governing Justice and Development Party (PJD), show the different levels of moderation that can apply once they are in power. There is moderation in signaling: for example, an Islamist group can send a message to constituents or authorities that it does not pose a threat. There is also moderation in behavior, which may actually be a shift in the group's ethos. And lastly, there is moderation in ideology, which yields a more fundamental change in mission. Factors that can push a group to moderate include the presence of a grand arbiter or some other power-sharing imperative.

Sakthivel then assessed the PJD's moderation within the Moroccan political system. To start, the PJD had to moderate when it came to power because of the unique religious situation in Morocco: that of the King having a monopoly on Islam as Commander of the Faithful. As Morocco's version of Islam is moderate -- and perpetuated by a popular King, the country has branded itself as an example of moderate and tolerant Islam. This branding serves as a counter weight against the Salafi and Wahabi ideologies. This structure has resulted in the PJD evolving from an underground extremist movement into a more accommodating political party in Morocco -- and of course moderating in the process. It had to moderate in order to operate in Morocco and has thus moderated its policies and approach to legislation.

Its resultant political pragmatism and moderation, which were originally meant to demonstrate loyalty, have crippled its ability to effect change on various issues. Despite this trajectory, the PJD has not abandoned its ideology. It is still an Islamist group and still believes that Islam should not only inform policy, but also form the basis of Moroccan law. Yet this lack of ideological moderation is largely inconsequential in the Moroccan context because it does not have immediate political consequences. At the end of the day, the King reigns supreme, and any turn toward extremism would cause the PJD to lose the royal patronage for which all political parties in Morocco are vying. At this point, political expediency is just as important as ideology to the PJD, if not more so.

Since Morocco's political circumstances are regionally unique, the PJD's moderation -- in policy, behavior, and internal processes -- cannot be extrapolated to answer questions about Islamist groups in other countries. In addition, Sakthivel stressed that one cannot extrapolate from the Egyptian and Tunisian Islamist aftermath to understand how the PJD would operate if truly in power -- that is, in the absence of a greater powerbroker. When analyzing such groups, one must situate their behavior in the contexts in which they operate. Ignoring those sociopolitical contexts would result in purely speculative analysis. Finally, if political immoderation is defined as the penchant for exclusionary rhetoric and power grabbing versus a more pluralistic approach, then it is not limited to Islamists alone.

4. Q & A

Q: (Zach Gold, Brookings) What can countries put in place to curb extremism and force moderation instead of a King like in Morocco?

A: (Vish Sakthivel) Power sharing is an important component.

Q: (Manar Ghueen, Middle East News Egypt) Do you think the Muslim Brotherhood is moderating?

A: (Eric Trager) They do absolutely use the Quran in a fundamentalist way. But it's not what defines their behavior. Islamism in the Brotherhood is just the flavoring. It's not irrelevant. It's part of the reason for why people join. It's the vanguard that dictates their behavior.

5. Observation

There were around 50 people in attendance. Most were university researchers and journalists. Vish Sakhivel's comments on the relationship between Islamists and the Moroccan monarchy revealed a sustainable system of government that forces the moderation, cooperation, and integration of Islamists groups. Along with this structure, the gradual democratization of governments like the Moroccan government would further moderate any threats from Islamists political parties.

For a video of the event, please visit: <http://www.washingtoninstitute.org/policy-analysis/view/islamists-in-government-do-they-moderate-once-in-power>

(Back to top)

Morocco in a Post-Arab Spring World: Addressing the challenges of reform, regionalization and resource management

Date: April 30, 2014

1. Title: Morocco in a Post-Arab Spring World: Addressing the challenges of reform, regionalization and resource management

Hosted by Kosmos Energy

Participants:

Jean AbiNader: Executive Director, Moroccan American Trade and Investment Center

Dr. William Lawrence: Visiting Professor of Political Science and International Affairs, Elliott School, George Washington University

Davide Furceri: Economist, International Monetary Fund

Krista Hendry: Moderator: Executive Director, The Fund for Peace

2. Overview

Kosmos Energy hosted this experts' roundtable on Morocco designed to provide a lively discussion of current events in Morocco and the broader Maghreb region. The event was meant to be an educational tool geared towards a primary audience of legislative assistants, senior foreign policy analysts, and homeland security staffers to Members of the US House and Senate. Discussion focused on economic development, political and social reform, and Morocco's unique experience of the Arab Spring.

3. Summary

Krista Hendry introduced Morocco by highlighting its "evolutionary change," which offers a stark contrast from its more revolutionary neighbors. The hallmark of Morocco's experience from the past several years is one of a positive, yet slow trend towards sustainable social and political progress, especially given the immense regional and domestic pressures it has faced. She added that despite this, "expectations, which are almost always too high, were not met."

In the international community, "it becomes easy to overlook countries like this," Hendry added. Morocco needs continued support to develop its economy and infrastructure to maintain stability and an environment conducive to reform. The need for this external support is increasingly urgent as combatants in Syria enter North Africa and threaten even more instability.

Dr. Lawrence reminded the audience that during the Arab Spring 18 countries experienced political upheaval, of which Morocco was "the last but not the least." Somewhere between 120,000 and 1 million Moroccans demonstrated at some point over a number of weeks against the government in political protest, resulting in 27 deaths and 20 self-immolations – which was a relatively small number compared to the total of 400 in the rest of the countries that experienced the Arab Spring. In comparison, this uprising was small, he said. Despite that, the February 20 movement has a profound and still pending impact on internal dynamics in the country. Moroccan Prime Minister Benkirane even called the movement ‘successful’ as a result.

Looking back, Morocco demonstrated a commitment to reform well before the Arab Spring. A dramatic page was turned in 1999 for Moroccan civil society, allowing it to develop more maturity than was possible in other neighboring countries. This development was a strong influence on the relatively moderate nature of the February 20 movement, as Lawrence described, “the protesters’ choice was a deliberate one.”

Today, youth unemployment is the looming threat to society. 49% of youth in the country is neither employed nor in school. Even worse, unemployed graduates suffer an unemployment rate four times higher than the rest of the population. Although overall employment figures have shown significant improvement due to wise investments, the economy simply “hasn’t caught up yet,” and Morocco has a youth bubble like most other Middle East and North African countries. The youth unemployment figure will be a bellwether for the future stability of the country.

Regarding reforms, Lawrence described the 2011 constitution as “remarkable,” noting that certain elements of Morocco’s new constitution were incorporated into Tunisia’s. In the US, Islamist involvement in the new government was ‘the story,’ yet the truly noteworthy element for Morocco was the occurrence of a free and fair election. The “extraordinary concessions in executive power” were remarkable, but not everything desired from the reforms has happened yet, he added. Voting issues did persist, however, as “spoiled ballots” were so numerous that their tally amounted to a second place finish in the 2011 election. Despite the criticism, the effort amounted to “significant progress.”

Regarding human rights, Lawrence repeated a phrase he had heard, observing Morocco’s “emerging culture of human rights.” Protestors, he added, are aware of a “larger space” in which they can operate. Morocco is “investing hugely and had significant gains” in policing, investigations, crowd control, and other human rights issues. Lawrence noted recent reforms which included institutionalized civil society dialogue and new laws on civilian trials and immigration. The King is focused on the ‘youth issue,’ he added, and young people in the country reciprocate and maintain positive feelings towards the monarch.

Despite concerns in the US about press freedom in the country, Lawrence said that there was vast change after 1999 that resulted in much more openness, which journalists continue to ‘test’ in terms of changing boundaries for their reporting. The increase in this ‘testing’ behavior is a positive sign of continued opening of press freedoms.

Lawrence specifically mentioned the work being done by Nizar Baraka and Morocco’s Economic, Social, and Environmental Council (CESE) as exemplary. He described the process as being done in an “inclusive and intelligent way; you couldn’t be envisioning a better way to go about this.”

Lawrence concluded in saying that as Morocco democratizes, a lot of these other problems will have a chance to be resolved. He paraphrased the State Department testimony at the recent Congressional hearing on Morocco in saying that the country effectively “uses the tools in its toolkit.” Morocco is also deeply invested in developing its neighbors in Libya and Mali, trying to play the regional role that has long been asked of it.

Daide Furceri began his talk by saying that Morocco is an exceptional case for the region, describing its recent economic performance as “almost stellar.” This is despite suffering major internal and external shocks such as instability associated with the Arab Spring, rising costs from subsidies, and dampened demand from its main trading and investment partners in the EU. Performance has indeed weakened as a result of these shocks, resulting in a widened current account deficit that remains burdensome. However, Morocco was better placed than most to face these issues, as it enjoys high and sustained Foreign Direct Investment (FDI).

Growth has remained relatively strong, though not strong enough to make impactful change in unemployment, which increases the urgency for further reforms. Tariffs, credit access, SME development, capital flows, labor markets, and business environment reforms, are all priorities for potential reforms. Furceri estimated that Moroccan GDP growth could increase from 4% to 7% if these are successfully implemented.

Furceri echoed the concern about youth unemployment, adding that it has actually worsened over the last three years. Despite having a relatively good education system, those with diplomas have a hard time finding jobs. A rigid labor market, emphasis on the public sector over the private sector for jobs and development, and a mismatch between education and the true labor market remain barriers. Students don’t study engineering, a sector that has been a point of emphasis for investment and development, but students instead study social sciences in hopes of securing government work, Furceri stated. As a result, some international investors bring laborers along with them when the local labor pool isn't qualified for high-tech manufacturing.

Morocco can do more for its economy. Although it has been quite successful in reducing poverty in the country, inequality has increased. The lack of effective social programs and access to public services impose economic limitations. Furceri was, on the other hand, encouraged by recent reforms to subsidies, which generally have a greater benefit to the top quintile of the population. The savings should be reinvested in basic services such as healthcare and infrastructure, he said.

Jean AbiNader added his thoughts on Morocco as a business partner, particularly in the Western Sahara. Morocco knows what it needs to do to attract business, focusing on best practices because its trade partners in the US and EU have high standards. Morocco's focus is not only business, he added, but impact investing. For investors, "it's about the money, but it's also about being a partner in the long term," he said.

Regarding resources in the Sahara, he said, the serious interest here is new, "despite what you hear," because a massive investment in infrastructure is needed to support substantial resource extraction. One of the weaknesses of the last MCC compact with Morocco was that it didn't focus on this kind of infrastructure in the south.

AbiNader stated that the Western Sahara issue has generally been ignored by the global community; that is, until the political costs started to change with the Arab Spring, as Polisario trafficking routes and lack of effective government in their areas of authority extending into the Sahara and Sahel, provide a ready-made network which is being used by "forces that include jihadists, militants, criminals and terrorists." He added that "Africa does not need, nor can support, another vague territory known as a state."

Political steps towards resolution via negotiated political solution (rather than by referendum) caused a shifting reality that has increased interest by international businesses in the Western Sahara. Companies are aware of the spotlight which will serve to enforce the need to conduct their business sensitively and responsibly. Morocco has worked to do its part by promoting expanded rights and investing towards economic development in the territory.

AbiNader spoke of the King's leadership in development; "he gets it," demonstrated by the use of inclusive processes to address problems credibly, realistically, and seriously. The King "is deadly serious about getting the political system to mature," AbiNader added, towards a full parliamentary democracy. AbiNader described how the King declined to get involved when the parliamentary coalition fell apart, essentially empowering the parties by forcing them to resolve the issue themselves and without the King's intervention. Five month later, the parties themselves emerged with a new coalition. This demonstrated the King's desire to fill the political space created by the new constitution, and establish a mature political system.

AbiNader agreed with Dr. Lawrence's assessment of the CESE, lauding the deliberate process of its yearlong consultation with civil society and experts in drafting its recommendations for improving social and economic development in Morocco. The honest assessment of past policy will lead to better development results. The commitment to better understand and engage with local stakeholders is already being reflected in the recent EU fisheries agreement. Altogether, $18 billion will be invested in the Western Sahara in the next ten years, whether or not gas or oil are found in commercial quantities.

In conclusion, AbiNader speculated that the discovery of resources in Western Sahara might actually encourage the process towards a political resolution, as all sides could realize that participating in an autonomous Sahara would be the best option for ending the humanitarian crisis in Tindouf and maximizing benefits to the local population.

4. Q & A

Q: What has been the impact of the US-Morocco Free Trade Agreement (FTA)? How is that in balance?

A. (AbiNader) Morocco has been able to export less to the US, but the reason is that only 22% of its economy is manufactured goods, so what are they able to offer? The key to balancing the bilateral trade relationship, on the other hand, is encouraging US investments in Morocco. Those companies can then address needs in Europe, Africa, and the Middle East, where Morocco has a competitive advantage in doing business.

(Furceri) Morocco was not really well-placed at the time of the FTA implementation, with relatively high unit labor costs, and it is still held back by its fixed exchange rate regime.

Q: (Hendry) Does Morocco have an emerging culture of entrepreneurialism?

A: (AbiNader) Entrepreneurs operate in an ecosystem, and Morocco has done a lot to build this ecosystem with the support of the US. Arabs have proven themselves all over the world to be strong entrepreneurs.

(Lawrence) I agree that Arabs don't need help being entrepreneurial. There is actually no real lack of capital, given the massive informal economy. On the other hand, early investors are lacking at funding stages that occur well before venture capital usually likes to operate. Morocco should develop venture capital infrastructure and better match capital with the real need.

Q: Is there anything being done on the university level to promote public private partnerships (PPP)?

A: (Furceri) Aeronautics has been expanding a lot in Morocco because of investment in these kinds of efforts, for example.

(AbiNader) There's a number of broad programs aimed at that. The biggest problem is the inhibition caused by the French language. People want American universities and colleges, and the University of New England's new campus in Morocco is an example of this starting to happen. Regarding PPPs, the Aeronautic and Automotive sectors have joint councils with the Government to design curriculums that lead to skills which are in demand. The problem is that this that the government needs more external money to scale up programs to have sufficient impact on the labor market.

(Lawrence) I agree with Jean that Morocco has great ideas but it has to scale up to meet the massive demand.

Q: Regarding unemployment, how can we fix the public job entitlement that the youth seem to have?

A: (Lawrence) Moroccan families invest a lot in university graduates. In their view, the state is rich and should give them jobs to share the investment. Morocco needs to find private sector jobs in the short, medium, and long term.

Q: What role are remittances playing in the economy and entrepreneurship?

A: (Lawrence) Infrastructure for remittances is ubiquitous in the country, so it's clear that it plays a large role. However, it's used more for consumption rather than investment. On the other hand, ex-pats do often return to Morocco and invest.

(Furceri) It should also be noted that remittances have a negative impact on the labor market.

5. Observation

The event was attended by about 60 people, mostly comprised of staff members for Members of Congress and other US Government officials, as well as lobbyists and other foreign policy professionals. The discussion was a largely positive evaluation of Morocco's economy and reforms, and the audience was very interested in the speakers' insights and inside perspectives on Morocco.

\(Back to top\)

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

March-April 2014 Events Bulletin

March 11

A Mixed Picture: The Political and Economic Future of the Arab Transitions

March 18

Should the United States give up on Arab Democracy?

April 7

Human Rights Perspectives in Morocco

April 8

Beyond the Arab Spring: U.S. Engagement in a Changing Middle East

April 9

House Subcommittee Hearing: U.S. Policy Toward Morocco

April 9

Youth Inclusion in Morocco: A Discussion With Minister Mohamed Ouzzine

April 9

Governance, Rule of Law, and the International Development Agenda

April 25

Islamists in Government: Do They Moderate Once in Power?

April 30

Morocco in a Post-Arab Spring World: Addressing the challenges of reform, regionalization and resource management

A Mixed Picture: The Political and Economic Future of the Arab Transitions

Date: March 11, 2014

1. Title: "A Mixed Picture: The Political and Economic Future of the Arab Transitions"

Hosted by the Atlantic Council

Participants:

Yasser El Shimy: Teaching Fellow, Boston University

Ellen Laipson: President and CEO, Stimson Center

Mohsin Khan: Senior Fellow, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, Atlantic Council

Mirette F. Mabrouk: Moderator: Deputy Director for Regional Programs, Rafik Hariri Center for the Middle East, Atlantic Council

2. Overview

The forum, considered the future of the Arab Spring countries as they emerge from political transitions. The panelists discussed their political and economic expectations for countries such as Egypt, Libya, Tunisia, and Yemen which overthrew their autocratic regimes. They also mentioned countries such as Morocco and Jordan, which went through similar political transitions, yet maintained longstanding elements of their political structures, notably their monarchies. The Arab Spring had many economic and political consequences, which each country responded to in different ways. Three years into the transition, the panelists sought to address the progress of these countries in becoming more politically and economically stable.

3. Summary

Mabrouk noted that since the Arab Spring, the world has been watching to see how the countries in transition react to the aftermath. Some of these countries have progressed and others have regressed in terms of political stability, resulting in uneven progress among the Arab Spring countries.

Laipson began by saying foreign policy professionals need to move on from what happened during the Arab Spring and look to the future of this region. Revolutions do not change a country overnight; it takes years to reform a government, an economic system, and the political mindset of a country. Laipson continued by giving the example of Ukraine's democratic progression, which took ten years to resemble a democratic state after their revolution. It took Tunisia three years of confusion and struggle before things began to be sorted out. The international community needs to be sensitive and patient because it has taken decades for countries like the US, France, and others to transform into democracies. The Arab revolts happened so suddenly and the younger generations wanted individual freedoms, but did not think of the implications on a larger scale. Creating and reforming institutions will take many years if the Arab Spring countries want to have individual freedoms as well as a stable democratic government.

El Shimy added that throughout the Arab Spring, most of those societies have only seen democracy in a negative light, as it brought down standards of living in the region – in contrast to relative stability under authoritarian leadership. The usage of the term 'Arab Spring' presumes that there will be an optimistic outcome, however most likely there will not be democracy at the end of this long road ahead for these people. The future of political Islam may be decided in countries like Morocco. Morocco is not using the zero-sum method in government like Egypt is, and this is why it is continuing to be a stable state. The pattern in most Arab Spring countries is to jump into elections and the winner takes all of the power, which is obviously not working. El Shimy also added that in order to foster hope for the Arab Spring countries, states must decentralize powers and increase the involvement of rural communities in the political sector, which will build competencies, confidence, and encourage investment.

Khan began by stating the world economy and price of oil is going down; it is a perfect atmosphere for a storm to take place in oil producing countries. Something that is rarely seen in the developing world is an economic depression which Yemen and Tunisia had in 2011. Traditionally, Arab governments tried to adjust their economies by avoiding recession and dependence on imports from other countries. What the Arab Spring countries suffered after the uprisings was the lack of any coherent economic plan, mostly because the new leaders focused on national security and installing a new political regime. There was no cohesive economic model, therefore the governments catered to immediate and more populist needs, expanding subsidies and increasing government jobs at the expense of long-term economic growth. Looking to the future, the Arab region needs to get growth going. A long term plan needs to include international investment and the short term plan needs to start with useful spending of existing capital, concurrently as economic reforms are being made. Khan added that he does not share the optimism of the other panelists; he argued that these country's economies are in fact further deteriorating. Assuming the economic climate will improve, it would be a good sign for democratization.

4. Q & A

Q: (Khalil Al Anani, Johns Hopkins) What can other Arab countries do to help those undergoing Arab Spring transitions?

A: (Laipson) Inter-Arab politics are interesting. Some Arab countries want to distance themselves from being clumped into a homogeneous region and create individualized plans and names for themselves. The countries of the Arab peninsula deter other Arab countries from going down the democratic path. They do this not only with their words but with investments.

(El Shimy) Egypt is ungovernable right now. There are 90 million people who are mostly living in extreme poverty, unemployment is high, and 60% of Egypt is under the age of 35. Tourism is down by 35% and it was once 10% of Egypt's GDP. The changes that are occurring in Egypt are unsustainable, which is why the people turn to violence. The Army will not be under civilian control anytime soon, as it is the only way to maintain any national security.

Q: (Lily Lousada, Center for American Progress) There is a great need of institutional development, what role can the United States play?

A: (Laipson) A period of retrenchment and reflection is needed from the United States. The Egyptian people are not supportive of US aid in the ongoing internal political conflicts. It shows that the people of Egypt are not always supportive of actual common good for their society, since they should be accepting help from the United States. What are the parameters of civil society engagement? The international community needs to see this as a period of adjustment in US foreign policy.

Q: (Danya Greenfield, Atlantic Council) The IMF will come in again to try to help. If the macro-economic status seems to be improving, why is everyday life deteriorating?

A: (Khan) The IMF will create reform and investment structure, and there will be growth along with IMF programs because of the financing that comes with it. The Gulf countries have promised a lot of money that will also act as a fiscal stimulus. I am optimistic about this; this has the ability to kick-start the economies, if it will be sustainable, though depends on the country.

(El Shimy) The money that the Gulf states are putting into the Arab Spring countries has gone towards energy, food subsidies, stabilizing the currency, and preventing bankruptcy, but these policies have had no effect on the actual economy.

(Laipson) Reform will happen at different rates; however local leadership and ownership must happen. Democracy would be great, but security comes first. In order to make any reforms there must be day to day security available to the general population.

Q: (Christopher Jarvis, IMF) Egypt's IMF assistance has shown improvement towards democracy and addressing fundamental economic problems, but it seems that the future of democracy in Egypt is dark.

A: (Khan) The issue that I am concerned with Egypt's economy is El-Sisi and the new government. The military is the only way to maintain stability and it has returned once again.

(El Shimy) Egypt is at a point of no return. The legitimacy of whoever remains in power is questionable. Also, the extreme polarization of society in Egypt makes it difficult for any government to run it.

5. Observation

The forum was attended by around 100 people from varying backgrounds, including foreign policy professionals, members of the think tank community, members of the IMF and USAID, and students. The tone of the forum seemed a bit pessimistic of the current state of the Middle East and countries that were involved in the Arab Spring. El Shimy had been in Egypt for the last three years and had an extremely pessimistic point of view on the status of Egypt, though he mentioned Morocco as a possible source of inspiration to the region.

\(Back to top\)

Should the United States give up on Arab Democracy?

Date: March 18, 2014

1. Title: "Should the United States give up on Arab Democracy?"

Hosted by SFS Program for Jewish Civilization

Participants:

Elliot Abrams: Senior Fellow, Middle Eastern Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations

2. Overview

The Program for Jewish Civilization hosted a lecture by Elliot Abrams, senior fellow for Middle Eastern Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations. Abrams pushed back against the common consensus that because of the unhappy aftermath of the Arab Spring, the United States should by and large give up on supporting democracy in the Middle East. At the event, he deconstructed and debunked this popular attitude and put forth an alternative of his own.

3. Summary

Elliot Abrams began by answering the question, what is the Arab Spring? He stated that the Arab Spring, as it is popularly described, was not a series of revolutions, but instead a series of uprisings against illegitimate authoritarian governments. The only consensus among the participants of these revolts was that the status quo had to change. There was no agreement about what that change would be. He said that democracy didn't prevail in the aftermath of these revolts because the ousted governments had left no mechanisms which would serve as the basis for a democracy. Furthermore, there are no Middle Eastern Arab models of democracy to serve as a basis either. While the authoritarian governments were in power, all democratic organizations had been completely crushed. The champions of democracy in the Middle East during the Arab Spring had to start from scratch.

Abrams then listed some of the popular theories about the failure of creating a democracy in the Arab World. He said that some attribute the failure of democracy to Arab culture and Islam. There is this idea, he said, that Islam and Arab culture is simply incompatible with democracy. Another theory is that Arabs are too suspicious of the West and any attempt by the West to provide assistance. The final theory Abrams listed was the idea that Ottoman and colonial models of governance have put democracy in the Middle East at a disadvantage. These theories, he said, are inadequate. They do not, for example, explain the Tunisian case, where democracy might have a fighting chance. Furthermore, he stated that when there is a vacuum of power in the Middle East as we saw during the Arab Spring, Islamist takeovers are not inevitable as the common consensus portrays.

The Middle East has seen Islamist takeovers because the ousted dictatorships had kept them intact. They were organized after the Arab Spring in Egypt and in Gaza. These Islamist movements were intact and organized under the dictatorships, but they were not in power. The perception was that the dictatorships did not look out for the best interest of their populations and that the Islamist movements were the ones who provided aid, food, and medical care to the poor. However, once an Islamist group gets into power, just like the dictatorships, they fall for the same temptations and the populations no longer continue to perceive them as populist agents. They see them as unfit to rule.

Time and time again, Abrams stated, the Islamists take power because under the authoritarian regimes, democrats had no chance of organizing to develop the same positive reputation that the Islamists made as altruists. This means that the transition to democracy in the Middle East needs to happen slowly in order to allow Arab democrats the time and resources they need to organize. Furthermore, the aforementioned idea that Arabs are too suspicious to trust democrats is not based in reality. A study, said Abrams, written by Arab intellectuals attribute the "freedom deficit" to all of the underdevelopment in the Middle East. It does not, as the "suspicion" theory suggests, blame colonialism or Zionism. The mindset a culture needs to create a successful democracy is present in the Middle East, it just needs to be given the time and US support that it has been lacking.

The United States, said Abrams, should stop cozying up to authoritarian leaders in the name of stability and start openly or clandestinely supporting Arab democrats. The idea in foreign policy that on one hand there is one set of issues called "the real" issues of business, security, and economy and on the other hand there are the secondary "fake issues" of human rights is false. The human rights issue is just as important for US national interests. For example, in Egypt the US has a case of an oppressive authoritarian government it supported for the sake of stability and to the detriment of human rights. The government of Egypt was friendly toward the US, but now, because of that relationship, the population is hostile toward the US. Meanwhile, in Iran, the US has a case of a government that it openly denounces with a population that for the most part is supportive of the US. Abrams said that the US policy in the Middle East should be to seek out, protect, and endorse Arab democrats. Furthermore, the US should speak out against Middle Eastern governments that make democrats suffer. It is in the moral and national interest of the United States to do so.

4. Q & A

Q: If you were the president of the United States, what would you do about Syria?

A: Well, Syria is a proxy war. The US mishandled this. The top advisors to President Obama told him that he should have sought out and provided support to Syrian democrats. It was a missed opportunity. This lack of support has given the jihadis most of the power. They are a danger to Israel today and the rest of the world tomorrow. There was no US willpower to support the democrats. If I were the president, I would have ramped up military support for non-jihadi rebels.

Q: (Stewart Sloane, American Jewish International Relations) Talk a little about why the US didn't support the 2009 Green movement in Iran.

A: The US should have been more vocal in their support of the Iranian people and more vocal in their complaints against the Iranian government.

Q: (Yasmin, student at the School of Foreign Service) How does the US save face to authoritarian governments with which it has relations with and reach out to democrats under that authoritarian governments' rule?

A: It is difficult. There is no question about that. The US must be willing to take that kind of trouble from authoritarian governments. A presidential administration could also hide behind Congress so as not to run the risk of breaking up its relations.

Q: (Ann Zigna, no stated affiliation) What role does Facebook play in revolutions in the Middle East?

A: It makes news and ideas more difficult to block by the authoritarian governments.

5. Observation

There were approximately 40 people in attendance, among them there were professors, graduate students, and academics. While Morocco was not mentioned specifically, the topic at hand is relevant. These are the types of US policy changes the Moroccan government should be aware of as it is one of the most important strategic allies in the North Africa and Middle East region.

\(Back to top\)

Human Rights Perspectives in Morocco

Date: April 7, 2014

1. Title: Human Rights Perspectives in Morocco

Hosted by the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS)

Participants:

Driss El Yazami: President, National Human Rights Council (CNDH), Morocco

Jon Alterman: Moderator: Director of the Middle East Program, CSIS

2. Overview

This event focused on the activities of the CNDH as well as the general state of human rights in Morocco. Mr. El Yazami described the activities of the CNDH under the 2011 Constitution, its priorities, its challenges, and its evolving role in Morocco and the region.

3. Summary

Mr. El Yazami posed the key question about human rights, in his perspective: Can an Arab country build a democracy and protect human rights peacefully, rapidly, without foreign intervention? He reiterated several times that what Morocco is trying to do in a relatively short period of time took decades if not generations in other countries. In addition, there are new players –youth and Islamists, who may not agree on the definition of universal human values. He feels strongly that a democracy is centered on the ability to discuss issues and respect differences.

Morocco is building a democracy and human rights regime step by step, by themselves, through extensive public discussion. Three important events in that process: the family code, the Royal Institute for Amazigh Culture (recognizing diversity and the country's cultural pluralism), and the IER – Morocco's version of transitional justice which is now informing similar projects in other countries.

Morocco has taken a different path to democracy in its new constitution, in which 60 of 180 sections include human rights. Key reforms that are upcoming include two dealing with the judiciary, violence against women, child labor, military tribunals, migration/asylum. He gave several examples of how much has to be done: 60 percent of women surveyed said that they have experienced domestic violence in the previous 12 months; 100,000 children are working illegally. Migration today is predominately south to south, which has its own unique challenges.

4. Q & A

Q: (Alterman) The pace of change seems very slow. There are expectations raised, then nothing seems to happen. Is this good or bad?

A: It is good because what is happening is that people are staying on board, they are involved in a national public discussion among many different points of view. There is a need to train people on how to promote and embrace reform. According to the most recent detailed study, there are 45,000 NGOs in Morocco; 30 percent have a budget less than $500, 37 percent don't have an office. They need training on the fundamentals of organizing and operating an NGO. Also, 52 NGOs do not have licenses from the Ministry of Interior. They should be allowed to register. That's guaranteed in the Constitution. The HCP has prepared a report on Civil Society that was released last week. In five months, it will become legislation. We are still waiting for a law on decentralization. We need to create educational materials for use in the schools on Sahrawis. We have three offices in the Sahara and held 20 seminars over the past two years on building a human rights culture. All this takes time.

Q: (HRW) What about freedom of assembly, of association?

A: NGOs should use the courts to get registered – the HPC report will generate new laws on this issue.

Q: (CSIS) What about human rights training for police and other officials?

A: Programs are moving ahead but they are difficult to do since you need three elements: the conditions such as salary, equipment, and resources have to be in place; You have to build a human rights culture through education. CNDH is hoping to be commissioned as the “national mechanism against torture” responsible for monitoring without restraint torture charges.

Q: (Independent Diplomat) What about people convicted previously under the military tribunals?

A: The sentences are being appealed to the Court of Cessation, which can move the cases to civil courts if it rules that the procedures/processes were incorrect or insufficient.

Q: (Congressional Research Service) How does one differentiate between what is the purview of the Palace and that of the Parliament?

A: Under the new constitution, the Palace does not draft legislation. It can request legislation be drafted by the Parliament. The reform process is an interaction among the Palace, civil society, international actors, and local leadership. The challenge is how to learn the new roles/powers and enhance Parliament’s efforts given that they have no staff and a democracy needs an active Parliament.

Q: (Moroccan community member) Do you think that human rights issues are sometimes manipulated by outside parties for political purposes?

A: Moroccans want human rights; from the 60s until now people have been fighting for human rights. It is both a national and an international agenda and it is a national and international responsibility. Morocco signed international conventions because it wanted to, not because it was forced to. Outside reporting helps Morocco, which will host the Global Human Rights Summit November 27-29.

Q: (Western Sahara representative) Why is Morocco afraid of human rights monitoring included in MINURSO?

A: Morocco doesn’t need external parties. The challenge for Muslims is how to implement human rights in each country. Morocco is doing that and is doing it well.

Q: (William Lawrence, GW/POMED) What is your opinion about Salafists and jihadists and how they should be treated?

A: They should be integrated into the national dialogue. We need to have the peaceful inclusion of diverse opinions. Also, we need to deal with the issue on integrating Muslims into other societies.

Q: (Moroccan Association for Relief and Development) What can the media do to promote human rights education?

A: Morocco must do much more to use the media in schools to promote a human rights culture.

5. Observation

This event was attended by about 30 people from think tanks, the Embassy, Moroccan community, and other organizations. El Yazami was quite forthright; answering difficult questions; exhibiting a very deep commitment to CNDH’s work; and consistent in framing his analysis in terms of human rights, not political posturing. MACP should continue to integrate the work of CNDH into its materials and include them in delegation visits.

\(Back to top\)

.....

Beyond the Arab Spring: U.S. Engagement in a Changing Middle East

Date: April 8, 2014

1. Title: "Beyond the Arab Spring: U.S. Engagement in a Changing Middle East" Hosted by The Wilson Center and USIP

Participants:

Daniel Brumberg: Senior Adviser, USIP

Danya Greenfield: Acting Director, The Atlantic Council

Steven Heydemann: Vice President, USIP

Haleh Esfandiari: Moderator: Director, The Wilson Center

2. Overview

The Wilson Center and the United States Institute of Peace brought together three area studies scholars on the Middle East and North Africa to discuss their assessments of the state of authoritarianism and democracy in the Middle East three years after the Arab Spring, and how US policy should adapt to changing dynamics in the region.

3. Summary

Steven Heydemann began with what he described as his "bleak" outlook on the state of democracy and freedom in the post-Arab Spring Middle East with regards to local and national governance. He said that when the first protests of the movement began, scholars and politicians wrongfully characterized Middle Eastern authoritarian regimes as brittle. However, he continued, three years down the line it appears that the Arab Spring has yielded an increase in exclusionary and centralized governments. He said that these authoritarian regimes upgraded their tactics to survive the Arab Spring with a renewed commitment to clamp down on and control the media, contain and demobilize civil society, and buy off the public. Morocco, he said, has shown one of the biggest increases in public spending in order to buy off the public. Along with these measures, Morocco has started to shift its diplomacy and economy away from the west in order to evade the accompanying pressure it receives regarding human rights and democratization. He said that his prediction is grim for building and sustaining an international coalition to fight authoritarianism.

Daniel Brumberg said that he agreed with Steve Heydemann's assessment of the region in the wake of the Arab Spring, adding that the situation is worse than he or anyone ever predicted. He stated that he foresees increasing antagonism toward the west emanating from the North Africa and the Middle East. The Arab Spring has created a challenging new landscape for the US and its interests. Russia, Iran, and China are in competition with the US for influence in the region. Syria and Egypt especially have opened up new opportunities for Russia to make regional dynamics fall in their favor.

Danya Greenfield began by saying that for the US to gain more influence in the Middle East and North Africa over Russia, Iran, and China, the government needs to be clear about what it wants to achieve. She said that the US has been unclear with what its goals are with Iran and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The US hasn't shown any core interest in democratization in the Middle East since the Arab Spring. Lastly, she recommended that the US and the EU coordinate their interests in the region to gain more influence and offset Iran, China, Russia, and Saudi Arabia, who have been gaining greater leverage in the region lately.

4. Q & A

Q: (Dana Dauda, Jordanian Embassy) Is three years after the Arab Spring enough time to start making assessments about the state of the Middle East? Jordan for example has shown a lot of commitment to reform. We have a road map to democracy. We have milestones set.

A: (Greenfield) When we evaluate the reforms of authoritarian regimes, we determine whether these reforms are meaningful or cosmetic.

(Steven Heydemann) It is true. Jordan is the regional leader of reform.

(Daniel Brumberg) Although Morocco insists that it's leader in the region.

(Steven Heydemann) Are they real reforms? There is some degree of commitment but it's not adequate. It's also not useful to compare these nations in the Middle East to one another. There are countries that are worse off than others but it's not to say that the better off countries are on the right trajectory.

5. Observation

There were about one hundred scholars, students and members of the press in attendance. The speakers showed great pessimism with regards to the aftermath of the Arab Spring. The entire panel showed a lot of skepticism toward all the governments in the Arab World and a lot of pessimism about the development of democracy there. The panel viewed most reforms and expansions of power in the region as disingenuous and as authoritarian tactics to demobilize would-be protestors. The overall skepticism of the panel and crowd were made even more clear after comment on Morocco 'insisting' that it is the regional leader in reform, whereby many in attendance laughed. This kind of perception is neither rare nor common, and is something that should be addressed carefully.

\(Back to top\)

Subcommittee Hearing: U.S. Policy Toward Morocco

Date: April 9, 2014

1. Title: "Subcommittee Hearing: U.S. Policy Toward Morocco"

Hosted by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, Subcommittee on the Middle East and North Africa

Participants:

Congresswoman Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL): Chairwoman, Subcommittee on the Middle East and North Africa

Congressman Theodore E. Deutch (D-FL): Ranking Member, Subcommittee on the Middle East and North Africa

William Roebuck: Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Egypt and Maghreb Affairs, Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs, U.S. Department of State

Alina Romanowski: Deputy Assistant Administrator, Bureau for the Middle East, U.S. Agency for International Development

2. Overview

This hearing allowed Members of Congress and the public the opportunity to hear more about what the Administration is doing to assist Morocco and what US strategic goals and objectives are in Morocco as well as the greater region. The hearing took place in the context of an imminent report from the Department of State required by Congress in the latest Appropriations Bill, as well as the recent visit for Secretary Kerry to Rabat for the US-Morocco Strategic Dialogue. Members of the Subcommittee gave statements and offered questions to the attending representatives of the State Department and the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID), making known their priorities for the future of the bilateral relationship.

3. Observation

The hearing was attended by eight members of the Subcommittee as well as Rep. Grimm, who also attended but is not a member of the actual Subcommittee. The opening statements, as well as the questions and replies, yielded many positive remarks about Morocco and the commitment of the US to the bilateral relationship, addressing security, economic development, and political and social reforms. The vast majority of comments were very positive and focused on the constructive friendship between the two countries, the positive trajectory of Morocco, and the welcome role of Morocco as a model for other countries undergoing the process of reform. Mr. Roebuck gave some indication of what to expect in the upcoming report, and reiterated the Department's support for the Moroccan autonomy plan.

4. Opening Statements

Chairwoman Ros-Lehtinen opened the hearing by welcoming the committee and guests and reading an opening statement. With all the upheaval, instability, and social unrest caused by the Arab Spring, Morocco is designated as a Major Non-Nato Ally and is working towards a political transition and instituting democratic reforms. Three years ago, the King proposed constitutional reforms that would push the country towards democracy and reform, shifting some power that was centralized from the monarchy, to the people. Parliamentary elections followed later with a new Prime Minister from an opposition party with a mandate to have more power to govern. She added that "of course the political situation in Morocco is still not perfect, but it is important for us to recognize the positive steps forward."

On the issue of the Western Sahara, Ros-Lehtinen noted, "longstanding US policy, which I support, advocates for a solution based on a formula of autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty." The kingdom has made advancements in human rights, but "certainly more can still be done," she continued. The chairwoman quoted a State Department report which cited restrictions on civil liberties for pro-independence advocates as among Morocco's most pressing human rights challenges. On the other hand, she noted, "Morocco has made strides in expanding women's rights," and created the CNDH to evaluate human rights issues. She added that "as allies, we should work together to accelerate their plans to implement the constitutional reforms that urged gender equality and parity."

Ros-Lehtinen continued by underscoring that Morocco and the US have shared a longstanding strategic bilateral relationship, "which has continued to strengthen over the past few years," and continues to do so with Secretary of State John Kerry's recent trip to Rabat. The Chairwoman cited the Free Trade Agreement and added that more can be done to get US businesses invested in Morocco. She mentioned the conclusion of the 5-year Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) Compact, which helped Morocco increase productivity, employment prospects, investments, and economic growth. The "MCC concluded that the results were impressive," especially in regards to literacy programs, despite complications, she noted. The political transition towards democracy is being paralleled by Morocco's economic transition, which is also underway.

Ros-Lehtinen next addressed the topic of security, noting that the US and Morocco collaborate closely on the issue; she argued, "where the rest of the region struggles to cope with radicalization and Islamic fundamentalism, Morocco is looking to foster and spread a more moderate form of Islam." Morocco does this partly through efforts such as the focus on training women in Islamic theology right alongside their male counterparts. This idea would not only be taboo in many other countries, or likely even illegal. The kingdom has not been immune from the threat of homegrown extremism; as Ros-Lehtinen noted, "Morocco is on the frontlines of fighting terrorism throughout the region," and "Morocco has proven to be an important ally." The Trans-Saharan Counterterrorism Program is an important project that Morocco and the US can work closely together on. She concluded by saying that "the administration must continue to see Morocco as the potential for what other North African transitional countries can do, and we must look to glean the best practices from its approach and see how it can be implemented in neighboring countries as well."

Rep. Deutch began his opening statement by reminding the audience that Morocco was the first country to recognize US independence. He added that Morocco is a "critical partner" in improving security in the Maghreb and Sahel. This is evidenced by its status as a Major Non-NATO ally, as a member of the Global Counterterrorism Forum, and by the recently-begun African Lion exercise involving 350 American service members and 150 Moroccan armed services members. This level of cooperation is "paramount" to fighting terrorism, arms, and narcotics trafficking in the region. Deutch underscored that, "It's clear that Morocco is committed to taking substantial action," to improve security and stability in the region. Rep. Deutch commended Morocco on its Imam training and other bilateral programs with Mali, which he called "a welcome approach."

Turning to the economy, Rep. Deutch said that Morocco's struggles were due to stagnation in Europe, and that increased government spending and high unemployment are serious issues, which he is happy to see are being addressed by USAID programs. He added that political reforms have met success and should be encouraged. Rep. Deutch commended Morocco's performance with the conclusion of the first MCC compact and its $698 million investment in the country.

Rep. Deutch also commended Morocco's good work with the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC), and its leadership in the al-Quds committee, which plays a great role in working towards resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict. "We look to Morocco to play a positive role," he said. Rep. Deutch reminded the audience that Morocco has had a longstanding commitment to this conflict, as Hassan II "took the bold step" of inviting Simon Peres to meet publicly in Morocco for peace talks. He expressed concerns about recent news related potential anti-Israeli laws in Morocco. Rep. Deutch affirmed his support for the US policy of supporting Morocco's plan for autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty for the Western Sahara, adding that it continues to receive strong bipartisan support in Congress. Lastly, Rep. Deutch said that in the wake of the Kerry visit to Rabat, he values the future of the bilateral relationship.

Rep. Chabot (R-OH) also added a short opening statement, beginning by reminding the audience that Morocco has been a source of calm in a chaotic region. He added that he looks forward to an update from the State Department on the status of the bilateral relationship following the recent visit of Secretary Kerry for the Strategic Dialogue meetings. He mentioned the promise of the 2011 constitution, and asked how that reform is carried out. He also asked for a comment on the success of the PJD in the most recent elections.

Rep. Grimm (R-NY) opened by saying that Morocco is historically one of America's strongest allies, and has been a "strong partner in combatting terrorism throughout North Africa." He mentioned that "King Mohammed successfully weathered the Arab Spring mostly by listening to the Moroccan people and making appropriate reforms, and for this, I think, he should be commended." Rep. Grimm reiterated his support for Morocco's plan for autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty, saying that "I believe the United States Congress has a responsibility to assist Morocco in achieving this resolution."

Mr. Roebuck began his opening statement by saying that Morocco is "an important and longstanding ally," and that "we continue to enjoy a strong bilateral relationship." He said that the relationship is "focused on promoting regional stability, supporting democratic reform efforts, countering violent extremism, and strengthening trade and cultural ties." The recent visit of the King and the recent Strategic Dialogue meetings provided an opportunity to affirm the relationship, he added.

Regarding democratic reforms, under King Mohammed VI, "the Moroccan political system has gradually liberalized," Roebuck noted, and that the country "moved forward in 2013" with "calibrated but steady" political and economic reforms. "We have a robust dialogue" with Morocco on human rights and ongoing political reform, he added. The US and Morocco are fully engaged on ensuring peace and security in the region. Roebuck expressed approval that USAID's new country strategy directly addresses the issue of youth employment. He also mentioned the recent US Business Development Conference, which had 58 American businesses participating.

Regarding security cooperation, "Morocco is one of our closest security partners," he said, mentioning the Trans-Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership as well as the Global Counterterrorism Forum. Regarding the Sahara, Roebuck said that "the United States supports the United Nations-led process, designed to bring about a peaceful, sustainable, and mutually acceptable solution to the Western Sahara question." US policy "has remained consistent for many years," he added. Roebuck reiterated support for UN Envoy Ross and his efforts to find a mutually acceptable solution.

Lastly, the US and Morocco have a longstanding history of people-to-people ties, Roebuck said, citing Morocco's generous support for the J. Christopher Stephens virtual exchange initiative.

Romanowski began her opening statement by talking about the 56-year partnership between Morocco and USAID. She referred to it as a "strong relationship that focuses on growth, improving educational opportunities, and strengthening the effectiveness of civil society." USAID has also worked on improving maternal health, constructing dams, converting land for agricultural use, and helping Morocco's microfinance sector.

A new 5-year country development strategy was developed in consultation with the Moroccan government and civil society, and private sector, aiming to increase youth employment, enhancing civic participation in governance, and increasing enrollment in primary schools. Alliances with key regional allies and public-private partnerships with companies like Microsoft, Volvo, and Chevron, will help to control costs.

Romanowski stressed that targeting youth unemployment is crucial, as young people account for 30% of the population, and graduates can't find jobs while employers cite a lack of necessary skills. Without a change, "Morocco cannot generate sufficient prosperity through private sector growth," she stated. Toward that end, Romanowski underscored that USAID is launching the Youth Employability Project, which will "facilitate partnerships between government ministries, Moroccan universities, and technical institutes, as well as local NGOs and the private sector, to create workforce development services for a broad range of youth." She mentioned current work with 40 Moroccan startups.

USAID is also helping Morocco's push to promote civil society by working with 80 local governments to create platforms for dialogue, especially for youth and women. USAID is also focused on primary education, especially for rural girls. From 2000 to 2004, attendance rates for girls improved from 62% to 83%, though the overall literacy rate remains 55%. Early grad reading is also being boosting in conjunction with Moroccan reforms. These development projects will also help to combat violent extremism by giving at-risk Moroccan youth a voice and opportunity.

5. Q & A

Q: (Rep. Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL)) In the omnibus bill passed in January, Congress authorized that funds could also be used in the Western Sahara and that a report would be issued on the subject – can you describe what the report will entail and if it will be delivered on time? With the extremism threat on the rise in the region, how would you describe the cooperation with Morocco on counterterrorism? And lastly, what was the result of the recent meeting for the Strategic Dialogue with Secretary Kerry?

A: (Roebuck) The Strategic Dialogue was a great success. The focus is on three areas: political security, economic and political cooperation, and education and cultural cooperation. I think we made steps forward in all three areas. There was a robust discussion on the topic of Morocco's domestic reforms, counterterrorism, and regional economic integration. They were also focused on strengthening Morocco's end of the Free Trade Agreement, interfaith dialogue, the aforementioned Chris Stephens project, and cultural exchange programs such as the Fulbright program. On counterterrorism, this has been a decade-long development, fed by developments in Mali and Libya and the wider Sahel. We work very closely with Morocco on counterterrorism, and our partnership is quite strong. We are working together to improve law enforcement and criminal justice system strengthening in support of counterterrorism.

Q: (Rep. Deutch (D-FL)) Clearly, security cooperation is a critical part of the relationship. The amount of youth unemployment is a staggering figure, and we share concerns with Morocco that this population could be vulnerable to extremism – the porous borders in North Africa make the proposition of recruitment in conflict like Syria easier. What is being done to address this specific issue?

A: (Roebuck) The US and Morocco work closely on this. There is "a need for a multifaceted approach to this - and a counterterrorism approach in general - and this is what Morocco has in place." Morocco's "vigilant security efforts" include a "soft-side" countering through education and socio-economic assistance as part of a broad, focused policy, which we're very supportive of.

Q: (Rep. Deutch (D-FL)) I was pleased to see USAID is focused on youth unemployment. Now that Morocco announced ambitious plans to increase industry and employment, how will USAID programs realign?

A: (Romanowski) We have already realigned with this in mind. Focusing on bringing universities, vocational students, the private sector, and the government, centers together.

Q: (Rep. Deutch (D-FL)): Morocco focuses on increasing civic participation among women, with the 60-seat quota for women in Parliament. What trend lines are you seeing for women in politics?

A: (Romanowski) I think the trend lines for women in Morocco are positive. In my last several visits I've met women parliamentarians and politicians and others active in politics, and through our programs we are making sure that young men and women are getting more active participation.

Q: (Rep. Chabot (R-OH)) Morocco has been supportive of the Arab-Israeli peace negotiations, though recently an anti-Israeli group has worked to end ties between Morocco and Israel. Is this group a cause for concern?

A: (Roebuck) Morocco and Israel have a long history of positive relations. These anti-Israel efforts have stalled and we believe that broader values of religious dialogue will triumph. The King and government have worked hard to foster religious tolerance and interfaith understanding in the country.

Q: (Rep. Chabot (R-OH)) We know there are a lot of bad actors in the region and Morocco has taken a proactive approach to counterterrorism, can you comment on some of the successful elements?

A: (Roebuck) The Moroccans have been very effective counterterrorism partners due to broad proven elements. They are very good at developing programs to promote tolerant, moderate Islam. Efforts to train imams in neighboring countries are effective. They've also been very active as regional interactive partner in counterterrorism. They've hosted a border conference in Libya and other things on a wide range of fronts.

(Romanowski) I would point to our civic participation programs that focus on marginalized urban youth. We've targeted the areas of Tangiers and Tetouan neighborhoods to bring out the voices and bring confidence by youth in politics.

Q: (Rep. Chabot (R-OH)) Some argue that the US-Morocco trade agreement limits greater regional economic integration. Would you agree with that and do you believe both sides have benefitted and what is the future of trade between Morocco and the US?

A: (Roebuck) It's been a huge benefit to both sides. The US somewhat more in the initial years but I don't believe it's been a hindrance to Morocco. They have a bright future as a hub for Europe and Africa.

Q: (Rep. Frankel (D-FL)) The 2011 constitution guaranteed gender equality, but I'm told it is still not where Moroccan women would like it to be. Judges still allow marriage under the supposed new age limit and there are inheritance laws that still favor men. What is your opinion of the status of women in Morocco? What measures of effectiveness in counterterrorism measures have there been? What is the strategic importance of Morocco in their relationship to neighboring countries?

A: (Roebuck) On the issue of reform and women's society, I would say that it's a work in progress in Morocco. Moroccans underwent major reforms in 2003 and 2004 that benefitted women through family code reform and inheritance and child custody. The 2011 constitution strengthened further some of those reforms and made constitutionally clear gender equality. Some of those issues remain a problem – the Moroccan government is aware of it. "Our sense is that they are reform-oriented, they want to make improvements, they are continuing to do this, and what we've seen in the last decade really is a steady move of progress. One of the human rights people in 2012 noted an emerging culture of human rights in Morocco." On the strategic importance of Morocco, we have a strategic relationship with Morocco because it is such an important country in the region – its geographic location is very important, it is involved in one of the major conflict areas in the Western Sahara, which is important, and it is creating some issue with Algeria. It is also a critical partner in fighting extremism, trade, and promoting moderate Islam. It is a very important strategic partner for the United States.

A: (Romanowski) On the issue of monitoring effectiveness, the new 5-year country strategy afforded us that opportunity to evaluate programs. This caused our shift to focus on workforce development.

Q: (Rep. Grimm (R-NY)) The Chairwoman before mentioned the report on Western Sahara funds. Is it on schedule?

A: (Roebuck) Yes sir, we are preparing the report and it will be delivered in compliance with the law.

Q: (Rep. Grimm (R-NY)) Can you provide some idea of what to expect?

A: (Roebuck) "I think the report will describe our efforts to provide assistance to Morocco, and it will outline some of the areas where we have provided that assistance, addressing the particular areas that the legislation wants to see more information on. It will make the point that with regard to assistance for Morocco that would be used in the Western Sahara; our policy is that we should not take any actions that would be perceived as undermining our support for the UN-led mediation process, and that's a pillar of our policy, and the report would include that point."

Q: (Rep. Grimm (R-NY)) Changing gears a little bit, I'm very happy to see that Morocco is becoming a destination for many US companies, not just as an export market but also as a platform for exports into Africa, Europe, and the broader Middle East. Casablanca Finance City is poised to become one of the central economic hubs for international companies on the continent. Can you tell us about how companies are looking at Morocco as a gateway market?

A: (Roebuck) The primary way that American companies work in Morocco so far is to use the vehicle of the FTA, which gives companies an ability to invest in Morocco and invest there. We also signed a trade facilitation agreement to shore up those efforts.

(Romanowski) In my most recent conversations with Moroccan businessmen, it was very clear that they were looking to our programs to build networks into the US and were looking forward to further development.

Q: (Rep. Connolly (D-VA)) What is the impact of the crackdown and political repression in Egypt of the Moroccan government and public opinion?

A: (Roebuck) It is difficult for me to say directly, but people in the region are looking closely. In Tunisia, some of the political parties watched and it probably made them more flexible in their national dialogue. Morocco was in a different situation with no approaching elections. I suspect people in Morocco are concerned and it may be causing some changed perception of the Arab Spring and democratic evolution and the side effects of turmoil.

Q: (Rep. Connolly (D-VA)) Hopefully Morocco looks at that and says, that's not where we want to go. Where is the Polisario right now? What is their appeal and political standing? Are they stronger or weaker? Has Morocco exercised sovereignty in a meaningful way that is recognized?

A: (Roebuck) The Polisario is the political organization that advocates for independence in the Western Sahara. "I'd say that their influence has been somewhat circumscribed in the last decade." It is an area that has remained in conflict. There are two parties to it - those parties have to reach a mutually agreed-upon solution. "I think probably over the past decade or so they've gotten weaker." They remain a key party in that conflict, weaker or not. On sovereignty, "the territory of Western Sahara is considered by the UN as a non-self-governing territory, and Morocco exercises as sort of an administrator for its part of the territory, but it's not recognized by the UN as an official administering power for the Western Sahara."

Q: (Rep. Connolly (D-VA)) Does anybody think Western Sahara could actually function as an independent functioning state viably?

A: (Roebuck) We don't reach that level of inquiry, we focus on the process of resolving the conflict and haven't reached any decision about the viability of Western Sahara as a state.

"The Moroccans have put forward a proposal which is autonomy under Moroccan sovereignty as their solution to that conflict – we believe that's a serious, realistic, and credible proposal. It's a potential approach to address the concerns of the people of Western Sahara and to help them to live their lives in justice and dignity, so we think it's a potential approach." But in the end we don't think you can impose it.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber (R-TX)) Morocco receives substantial US development aid and bilateral assistance that has increased following a 2006 Free Trade Agreement. How much has our trade increased as a result of that?

A: (Roebuck) Our trade has increased about 400% - it's a big increase on both sides. Its about 400% on the US side and between 150% and 200% on the Moroccan side. So its been a big benefit for both, a little more for US exports. We are working with the Moroccans though our commercial development programs, through USAID, and through the MCC to even that out and improve competitiveness so that Moroccans can equally benefit.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber (R-TX)) I saw that Morocco recently concluded a $697 million MCC compact which focuses on alleviating poverty. Was it successful?

A: (Roebuck) I think it was very successful. It focused on sustainable tourism, sustainable fisheries, and agriculture. It educated with basic literacy about 40,000 poor people in those fields. 80% of those people were women. It helped build a tourist infrastructure in Fez medina and focused to a limited degree on financial services. Morocco was re-selected for a second compact – I think many people were impressed by the way it engaged with its institutions and its enthusiasm. And we are moving forward with shaping a further compact for Morocco.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber (R-TX)) With regard to the improvement of women's rights with the passage of the 2004 family code that aimed to improve women's socioeconomic rights – has that been successful? Can you give me a status update?

A: (Romanowski) We ensure that all of our USAID programs are supportive of women and include women, particularly when it comes to our democracy and governance. We are making sure that women who want to get into politics have the training and skills, and have the advantage. This is also the case in our economic and workforce development program. There is a lot more work to do – that is true across the region – but I think Morocco actually stands out as making some great strides.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber (R-TX)) I have read that there is some concern that the Western Sahara will actually become a training ground for terrorists and even that some of those potential terrorists had been training in Western Europe. Is that right?

A: (Roebuck) I am not aware of that report. Our general assessment of the Western Sahara is as follows: it is a large space and we don't think that it's good for a space that big to be an ungoverned space. That is why we support the UN being there with MINURSO organization. In terms of what you are talking about with ties between and people in the Western Sahara, to our knowledge we are not aware of significant terrorist activity in the Western Sahara and we are not aware of links between the Polisario, for example, and terrorist organizations like the ones you cited.

Q: (Representative Randy Weber (R-TX)) Morocco and the Polisario both have advocates who regularly appeal to Congress to support their positions on the Western Sahara, Many members of Congress support Morocco's support Morocco's position of sovereignty over the territory. How many members of Congress support that position? Do you know?

A: (Roebuck) I don't know. Our view is that the issue of sovereignty is something that should be resolved through negotiations with the parties. Both sides have put forward proposals. We think that the Moroccan proposal is very serious, credible, and realistic. But in the end we can't impose it.

Full video of the hearing as well as opening statements can be found here:

<http://foreignaffairs.house.gov/hearing/subcommittee-hearing-us-policy-towards-morocco>

(Back to top)

Youth Inclusion in Morocco: A Discussion With Minister Mohamed Ouzzine

Date: April 9, 2014

1. Title: "Youth Inclusion in Morocco: A Discussion With Minister Mohamed Ouzzine"

Hosted by Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

Participants:

Mohamed Ouzzine: Minister for Youth and Sports, The Kingdom of Morocco

Gloria La Cava: Co-coordinator, the World Bank's Middle East and North Africa region youth program

2. Overview

Moroccan Minister of Youth and Sports Mohamed Ouzzine discussed the challenges facing young people in Morocco, including the high unemployment rate and corresponding lack of economic opportunities. Gloria La Cava provided a perspective from the World Bank on recent developments in response to the minister.

3. Summary

Mohamed Ouzzine began by stating the importance of the youth in Morocco during the aftermath of the Arab Spring. The majority of Morocco's population is made of young people and he stressed that it is the responsibility of the government to provide the youth with opportunities and inspiration. People have asked if the youth of North Africa benefitted from the Arab Spring. He said that Morocco is a special case. The government, he said, had taken an interest in the country's youth long before the Arab Spring. The reforms that the King launched during the Arab Spring were a result of this interest. The youth in Morocco displayed the same demands of its government that everyone did during the Arab Spring. The King of Morocco anticipated these demands, listening to the youth and reacting to their demands in a constructive way. In Tunisia, for example, they did it the other way around.

The subsequent Constitutional reform process in Morocco involved consultation with the Moroccan youth - they had a say in the process. Ouzzine underscored that the Moroccan monarchy wants young people to be involved in the policymaking process and that the government is providing youth a chance to create their own vision of the country. He noted, "the policies made are their own policies," because Morocco has an integrated strategy of political reform - all the government departments are involved. No more does the Moroccan government approach these issues in a unilateral way. Each department plays an important role as one team. This is the new approach that Morocco has invested in.

Gloria La Cava started by talking about how the Moroccan government has pushed the World Bank to think outside the box with regards to youth inclusion issues. The World Bank has learned a lot of lessons from Morocco. There is hope for the future, but expectations must be grounded in realism. La Cava stressed that the focus on unemployed graduates is necessary because they are an important group. However, in terms of numbers, they are a very small segment of the population - the majority of the youth population is made up of non-graduates. These young people are out of work and out of school. The World Bank noted these demographics and started designing youth inclusion programs in response. La Cava stated that it has provided Morocco with some assistance with some strategies, but Morocco has done the bulk of the work. La Cava concluded that the World Bank is there when needed, but Morocco is truly driving the process.

4. Q & A

Q. (Julian Sutzker, Human Rights Watch) Is there a human rights component to this youth plan? What does it entail?

A. (Ouzzine) We are offering a wide range of services to young people. The human rights component is something that is good and we encourage.

Q. (Nancy Taggart, Education Development Center) Give some details about the economic development plan regarding youth in Morocco.

A. (La Cava) This program is new. It targets young women in particular. In terms of the design features of this strategy there are some programs that will be implemented that will be integrated with the ministry of labor. We will be introducing a lot of innovations.

A. (Ouzzine) The North Africa and the Middle East is characterized by a mismatch of demography and economic structure. The point now is to target the underprivileged youth.

5. Observation

This event highlighted Morocco's exceptionalism in the region with regards to human rights, youth unemployment, and dialogue between the people and the government. Ouzzine underscored that Morocco was reacting and planning its innovative plan to engage the youth of the country long before the Arab Spring. These reforms and changes are not necessarily a response to the Arab Spring; the King had anticipated this unrest and had already began to listen and react in a constructive way.

\(Back to top\)

Governance, Rule of Law, and the International Development Agenda

Date: April 9, 2014

1. Title: "Governance, Rule of Law, and the International Development Agenda"

Hosted by Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS)

Participants:

Ambassador Jan Eliasson: Deputy Secretary-General, United Nations

Henrietta Holsman-Fore: Chairman and CEO, Holsman International, CSIS Trustee

Daniel Runde: Moderator: Director, Project on Prosperity and Development, CSIS

2. Overview

This event focused on the evolving international development landscape, predominantly on ways to incorporate better governance and rule of law initiatives in the post-2015 development plan for the UN. Deputy Secretary-General Eliasson offered his viewpoint on how to continue to build on the successes of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs), as well as ways that the UN is adapting its priorities to meet the current development challenges.

3. Summary

Ambassador Eliasson opened his presentation with a question: is good governance an appropriate ambition for the Millennium Development Goals (MDG) challenge? Promoting good governance and rule of law is a priority in the eyes of the UN. To explain, he cited a quote: "There is no peace without development, there is no development without peace, there is no development or peace without the respect of human rights." He argued that today he would add rule of law and underscored that peace and security, development, and human rights are one. These things all need to be developed at the same time because if one of the elements is weak, then the whole structure is weak. Thus it is important for development goals to incorporate good governance objectives. The UN, other international organizations, and national governments must see problems in a horizontal matter from all perspectives in order to ensure that the whole structure is strong. This of course requires partnerships – between international organizations, national governments, civil society, and the private sector, among others - and resources.

Eliasson continued by stating that the MDGs have provided an important planning instrument that has helped promote positive development in the last 15 years. The percentage of extreme poverty has gone down, Africa's GDP growth of around 5-7% per year, and gender equality in education has also improved immensely. However, maternal health and sanitation continue to be huge problems and the biggest disappointments to the UN. Confronting these challenges is especially important since they have a multiplier effect on other issues. Water and sanitation are closely linked to health, health is closely linked to education performance, and education performance is linked to improving gender inequality. MDGs for post-2015 will thus most likely focus on three core areas: eradicating poverty by means of job creation, gender equality, industrialization, and the use of natural resources; environmental sustainability; and creating institutions in order to enhance rule of law. The latter is particularly important as it protects human rights. And human rights violations are at the root of most modern conflicts, particularly civil wars; if the international community can confront these issues at the start, through institutions and rule of law, it would go a long way toward preventing mass atrocities.

4. Q & A

Q: (Daniel Runde, CSIS) Many Americans are skeptical of the UN, what is in it for the United States for the reconsideration of the MDGs?

A: It is not only the right thing to do morally and ethically, it is also good for all countries to help create equal development which continues to bring about global peace and prosperity. If one country thrives, its neighbors will then thrive. That is how global development works.

Q: (Daniel Runde, CSIS) Can you talk about the developments between now and December 2015 when the new MDGs will be made?

A: The General Assembly will most likely create clusters of problems and issues by this July. Then they will begin the search for finances and people to solve and create plans for these problems. MDGs will not become a reality unless there are financial resources to pull from, so that is also a priority. The question most important in our current world is 'how'. All international policy professionals know 'what' needs to happen, but they need to create a plan of action. There needs to be a holistic approach, not squeezing problems into already created institutions, but rather creating institutions around problems.

Q: (Will Davis, United Nations Development Programme) Is there anyone arguing against the rule of law? What are their arguments?

A: The people who are arguing against the rule of law are the governments that are being challenged to abide by this. Their biggest arguments against this matter are issues of sovereignty and why international organizations, like the UN, feel the right to get involved in their internal politics.

Q: (Tony Caroll, CSIS) What is the realistic UN dialogue concerning the natural resources in Africa, considering the misappropriation of funds?

A: Everyone working in the UN is fully aware of the corruption in Africa. The scariest part is organized crime that develops from corruption and how the undermine structures and governments. Organized crime is the biggest contributor to terrorism which becomes an international issue.

5. Observation

There were nearly 100 foreign policy professionals and about 10 students in attendance at this event. This event was of great importance for anyone working in international development - Ambassador Eliasson remarks provided insight into the 2015 UN Millennium Development Goals. While not directly relevant to Morocco or broader US policy, Morocco is a stakeholder in the MDGs and may well be invested in the second round of them, having committed to the previous round of MDGs and looking set to achieve them.

\(Back to top\)

Islamists in Government: Do They Moderate Once in Power?

Date: April 25, 2014

1. Title: "Islamists in Government: Do They Moderate Once in Power?"

Hosted by the Washington Institute

Participants:

Eric Trager: Esther K. Wagner Fellow, the Washington Institute

Haroon Ullah: Member, Secretary of State's Policy Planning Staff

Vish Sakthivel: Next Generation Fellow, the Washington Institute

2. Overview

The Washington Institute brought together three scholars to discuss issues of governance in the Middle East and the trajectory of recent Arab uprisings. They discussed what lessons could – and could not – be drawn from the Islamist political experience in Egypt, Pakistan, Morocco, and other countries. The panelists suggested that the answer to the question of whether Islamists moderate once in power may be "no," and concluded that some groups have become even more hard-line under the climate of the Arab Spring.

3. Summary

Eric Trager provided his assessment of The Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and their development throughout history, with particular emphasis on the changes within the Brotherhood in the immediate aftermath of the Arab Spring. In assessing whether or not it moderated once in power, Trager first tried to debunk certain characterizations about the Brotherhood. He argued that one can't see the Brotherhood as just a political party as this ignores the other things that it has done in its history such as its violent activity and social services. Similarly, one cannot make the mistake of seeing the Brotherhood as a broad social movement either. This wrongly assumes that the Brotherhood is a social movement. He argued that these descriptions wrongly characterized the Brotherhood as a democratic party with an Islamist ideology, rather than what it actually is: a hierarchical vanguard whose raison d'etre is achieving societal support and political power to resist Western political and cultural influences in Egypt. This rigid internal structure affected its behavior in power far more than its Islamist ideology.

What this means is that while the Brotherhood is in fact an Islamist group, it's not what dictates its behavior. The hierarchical vanguard structure is what dictates its behavior and as a result it did not moderate once in power for three reasons. First, it feared losing the internal cohesion on which vanguards depend, so its priority was appeasing a rank-and-file that wanted the Brotherhood to consolidate power quickly, rather than governing inclusively. Second, its intolerance toward outsiders -- another characteristic of insular vanguards -- further encouraged its exclusivist governing style. Muhammad Morsi's November 2012 constitutional declaration, through which he asserted unchecked executive authority, is the best example of this. Third, the Brotherhood faced its most serious political challenge from hardline Salafists, and this compelled it to embrace a far more theocratic constitution than it otherwise might have. Of these three reasons, only this last one has anything to do with the Brotherhood's Islamist ideology.

Given that the Brotherhood is primarily a hierarchical vanguard and an Islamist group only secondarily, its failure to moderate in power does not necessarily teach us much about how Islamists in general will behave in power. However, Trager argued that their experiences nevertheless illustrates that Islamists' organizational culture frequently determines their political behavior far more than their ideological pronouncements, particularly when those pronouncements are tailored for a Western audience.

Haroon Ullah started his segment by defining extremism. One can identify an extremist party by looking for several signs. Firstly, does the party seek power through extra-electoral means? In other words, do they use violence or the threat of violence? The second dimension in looking at extremism is seeing if a political entity adopts exclusionary policies toward certain groups based on their moral edicts. The third sign of extremism is incendiary rhetoric and symbolism in their campaigns for power.

He then went on to talk about Pakistan. He said the way to understand extremists in the Arab Spring is by understanding Pakistan because Islamists have the longest track record in Pakistan. The entire evolution of Islamism has already been played out in Pakistan and we may see the same pattern in the Arab world in the years to come. Ullah drew five lessons from the Islamist experience in Pakistan that can help enhance understanding of their rule.

First, the violence carried out or supported by Islamist parties in Pakistan is not indiscriminate or gratuitous, but targeted and strategic. Through connections with extremist groups, Islamists leverage political violence to push their agenda and maximize votes. Second, Pakistan proves that democracy does not necessarily moderate Islamist party platforms and ideologies. While Islamists can become more moderate through repeated electoral competition, they are just as likely to become more extreme if it serves their interests. Third, Islamist parties are not monolithic. In Pakistan, they are diverse and compete hardest against one another. To increase their appeal to the electorate, each party claims to be the most authentically religious, creating significant animosity between them. Fourth, the idea that poverty drives militancy -- which is often assumed when formulating US policy in the Middle East and South Asia -- is largely mistaken. In Pakistan, the key constituencies for Islamists hail from the thin middle class and urban areas; this and other factors may help explain why Islamist parties do better in provincial, regional, and local elections than at the national level. In order to be more effective on the ground, the United States should align its programs based on this rethinking of what drives militancy. Fifth, Islamist parties want more than just a seat at the table. They also want to shape the debate around morality.

As for their views of foreign actors, Ullah argued that Islamist political parties in Pakistan are not inherently anti-Western, though they frequently use religion to mobilize voters and have helped create a toxic environment in the country. Going forward, Washington could influence such groups through public diplomacy and faith-based engagement. For example, by interacting with figures who hold sway among Islamists -- such as imams who are increasingly bearing the cost of violence -- the United States could greatly improve its credibility. After all, most Islamists are like other political parties: they are pragmatists, not staunch ideologues.

Vish Sakthivel addressed the situation of Islamists in Morocco and argued their experiences, most prominently the governing Justice and Development Party (PJD), show the different levels of moderation that can apply once they are in power. There is moderation in signaling: for example, an Islamist group can send a message to constituents or authorities that it does not pose a threat. There is also moderation in behavior, which may actually be a shift in the group's ethos. And lastly, there is moderation in ideology, which yields a more fundamental change in mission. Factors that can push a group to moderate include the presence of a grand arbiter or some other power-sharing imperative.

Sakthivel then assessed the PJD's moderation within the Moroccan political system. To start, the PJD had to moderate when it came to power because of the unique religious situation in Morocco: that of the King having a monopoly on Islam as Commander of the Faithful. As Morocco's version of Islam is moderate -- and perpetuated by a popular King, the country has branded itself as an example of moderate and tolerant Islam. This branding serves as a counter weight against the Salafi and Wahabi ideologies. This structure has resulted in the PJD evolving from an underground extremist movement into a more accommodating political party in Morocco -- and of course moderating in the process. It had to moderate in order to operate in Morocco and has thus moderated its policies and approach to legislation.

Its resultant political pragmatism and moderation, which were originally meant to demonstrate loyalty, have crippled its ability to effect change on various issues. Despite this trajectory, the PJD has not abandoned its ideology. It is still an Islamist group and still believes that Islam should not only inform policy, but also form the basis of Moroccan law. Yet this lack of ideological moderation is largely inconsequential in the Moroccan context because it does not have immediate political consequences. At the end of the day, the King reigns supreme, and any turn toward extremism would cause the PJD to lose the royal patronage for which all political parties in Morocco are vying. At this point, political expediency is just as important as ideology to the PJD, if not more so.

Since Morocco's political circumstances are regionally unique, the PJD's moderation -- in policy, behavior, and internal processes -- cannot be extrapolated to answer questions about Islamist groups in other countries. In addition, Sakthivel stressed that one cannot extrapolate from the Egyptian and Tunisian Islamist aftermath to understand how the PJD would operate if truly in power -- that is, in the absence of a greater powerbroker. When analyzing such groups, one must situate their behavior in the contexts in which they operate. Ignoring those sociopolitical contexts would result in purely speculative analysis. Finally, if political immoderation is defined as the penchant for exclusionary rhetoric and power grabbing versus a more pluralistic approach, then it is not limited to Islamists alone.

4. Q & A

Q: (Zach Gold, Brookings) What can countries put in place to curb extremism and force moderation instead of a King like in Morocco?

A: (Vish Sakthivel) Power sharing is an important component.

Q: (Manar Ghueen, Middle East News Egypt) Do you think the Muslim Brotherhood is moderating?

A: (Eric Trager) They do absolutely use the Quran in a fundamentalist way. But it's not what defines their behavior. Islamism in the Brotherhood is just the flavoring. It's not irrelevant. It's part of the reason for why people join. It's the vanguard that dictates their behavior.

5. Observation

There were around 50 people in attendance. Most were university researchers and journalists. Vish Sakthivel's comments on the relationship between Islamists and the Moroccan monarchy revealed a sustainable system of government that forces the moderation, cooperation, and integration of Islamists groups. Along with this structure, the gradual democratization of governments like the Moroccan government would further moderate any threats from Islamists political parties.

For a video of the event, please visit: <http://www.washingtoninstitute.org/policy-analysis/view/islamists-in-government-do-they-moderate-once-in-power>

(Back to top)

Morocco in a Post-Arab Spring World: Addressing the challenges of reform, regionalization and resource management

Date: April 30, 2014

1. Title: Morocco in a Post-Arab Spring World: Addressing the challenges of reform, regionalization and resource management

Hosted by Kosmos Energy

Participants:

Jean AbiNader: Executive Director, Moroccan American Trade and Investment Center

Dr. William Lawrence: Visiting Professor of Political Science and International Affairs, Elliott School, George Washington University

Davide Furceri: Economist, International Monetary Fund

Krista Hendry: Moderator: Executive Director, The Fund for Peace

2. Overview

Kosmos Energy hosted this experts' roundtable on Morocco designed to provide a lively discussion of current events in Morocco and the broader Maghreb region. The event was meant to be an educational tool geared towards a primary audience of legislative assistants, senior foreign policy analysts, and homeland security staffers to Members of the US House and Senate. Discussion focused on economic development, political and social reform, and Morocco's unique experience of the Arab Spring.

3. Summary

Krista Hendry introduced Morocco by highlighting its "evolutionary change," which offers a stark contrast from its more revolutionary neighbors. The hallmark of Morocco's experience from the past several years is one of a positive, yet slow trend towards sustainable social and political progress, especially given the immense regional and domestic pressures it has faced. She added that despite this, "expectations, which are almost always too high, were not met."

In the international community, "it becomes easy to overlook countries like this," Hendry added. Morocco needs continued support to develop its economy and infrastructure to maintain stability and an environment conducive to reform. The need for this external support is increasingly urgent as combatants in Syria enter North Africa and threaten even more instability.

Dr. Lawrence reminded the audience that during the Arab Spring 18 countries experienced political upheaval, of which Morocco was "the last but not the least." Somewhere between 120,000 and 1 million Moroccans demonstrated at some point over a number of weeks against the government in political protest, resulting in 27 deaths and 20 self-immolations – which was a relatively small number compared to the total of 400 in the rest of the countries that experienced the Arab Spring. In comparison, this uprising was small, he said. Despite that, the February 20 movement has a profound and still pending impact on internal dynamics in the country. Moroccan Prime Minister Benkirane even called the movement 'successful' as a result.

Looking back, Morocco demonstrated a commitment to reform well before the Arab Spring. A dramatic page was turned in 1999 for Moroccan civil society, allowing it to develop more maturity than was possible in other neighboring countries. This development was a strong influence on the relatively moderate nature of the February 20 movement, as Lawrence described, "the protesters' choice was a deliberate one."

Today, youth unemployment is the looming threat to society. 49% of youth in the country is neither employed nor in school. Even worse, unemployed graduates suffer an unemployment rate four times higher than the rest of the population. Although overall employment figures have shown significant improvement due to wise investments, the economy simply "hasn't caught up yet," and Morocco has a youth bubble like most other

Middle East and North African countries. The youth unemployment figure will be a bellwether for the future stability of the country.

Regarding reforms, Lawrence described the 2011 constitution as "remarkable," noting that certain elements of Morocco's new constitution were incorporated into Tunisia's. In the US, Islamist involvement in the new government was 'the story,' yet the truly noteworthy element for Morocco was the occurrence of a free and fair election. The "extraordinary concessions in executive power" were remarkable, but not everything desired from the reforms has happened yet, he added. Voting issues did persist, however, as "spoiled ballots" were so numerous that their tally amounted to a second place finish in the 2011 election. Despite the criticism, the effort amounted to "significant progress."

Regarding human rights, Lawrence repeated a phrase he had heard, observing Morocco's "emerging culture of human rights." Protestors, he added, are aware of a "larger space" in which they can operate. Morocco is "investing hugely and had significant gains" in policing, investigations, crowd control, and other human rights issues. Lawrence noted recent reforms which included institutionalized civil society dialogue and new laws on civilian trials and immigration. The King is focused on the 'youth issue,' he added, and young people in the country reciprocate and maintain positive feelings towards the monarch.

Despite concerns in the US about press freedom in the country, Lawrence said that there was vast change after 1999 that resulted in much more openness, which journalists continue to 'test' in terms of changing boundaries for their reporting. The increase in this 'testing' behavior is a positive sign of continued opening of press freedoms.

Lawrence specifically mentioned the work being done by Nizar Baraka and Morocco's Economic, Social, and Environmental Council (CESE) as exemplary. He described the process as being done in an "inclusive and intelligent way; you couldn't be envisioning a better way to go about this."

Lawrence concluded in saying that as Morocco democratizes, a lot of these other problems will have a chance to be resolved. He paraphrased the State Department testimony at the recent Congressional hearing on Morocco in saying that the country effectively "uses the tools in its toolkit." Morocco is also deeply invested in developing its neighbors in Libya and Mali, trying to play the regional role that has long been asked of it.

Davide Furceri began his talk by saying that Morocco is an exceptional case for the region, describing its recent economic performance as "almost stellar." This is despite suffering major internal and external shocks such as instability associated with the Arab Spring, rising costs from subsidies, and dampened demand from its main trading and investment partners in the EU. Performance has indeed weakened as a result of these shocks, resulting in a widened current account deficit that remains burdensome. However, Morocco was better placed than most to face these issues, as it enjoys high and sustained Foreign Direct Investment (FDI).

Growth has remained relatively strong, though not strong enough to make impactful change in unemployment, which increases the urgency for further reforms. Tariffs, credit access, SME development, capital flows, labor markets, and business environment reforms, are all priorities for potential reforms. Furceri estimated that Moroccan GDP growth could increase from 4% to 7% if these are successfully implemented.

Furceri echoed the concern about youth unemployment, adding that it has actually worsened over the last three years. Despite having a relatively good education system, those with diplomas have a hard time finding jobs. A rigid labor market, emphasis on the public sector over the private sector for jobs and development, and a mismatch between education and the true labor market remain barriers. Students don't study engineering, a sector that has been a point of emphasis for investment and development, but students instead study social sciences in hopes of securing government work, Furceri stated. As a result, some international investors bring laborers along with them when the local labor pool isn't qualified for high-tech manufacturing.

Morocco can do more for its economy. Although it has been quite successful in reducing poverty in the country, inequality has increased. The lack of effective social programs and access to public services impose economic limitations. Furceri was, on the other hand, encouraged by recent reforms to subsidies, which generally have a greater benefit to the top quintile of the population. The savings should be reinvested in basic services such as healthcare and infrastructure, he said.

Jean AbiNader added his thoughts on Morocco as a business partner, particularly in the Western Sahara. Morocco knows what it needs to do to attract business, focusing on best practices because its trade partners in the US and EU have high standards. Morocco's focus is not only business, he added, but impact investing. For investors, "it's about the money, but it's also about being a partner in the long term," he said.

Regarding resources in the Sahara, he said, the serious interest here is new, "despite what you hear," because a massive investment in infrastructure is needed to support substantial resource extraction. One of the weaknesses of the last MCC compact with Morocco was that it didn't focus on this kind of infrastructure in the south.

AbiNader stated that the Western Sahara issue has generally been ignored by the global community; that is, until the political costs started to change with the Arab Spring, as Polisario trafficking routes and lack of effective government in their areas of authority extending into the Sahara and Sahel, provide a ready-made network which is being used by "forces that include jihadists, militants, criminals and terrorists." He added that "Africa does not need, nor can support, another vague territory known as a state."

Political steps towards resolution via negotiated political solution (rather than by referendum) caused a shifting reality that has increased interest by international businesses in the Western Sahara. Companies are aware of the spotlight which will serve to enforce the need to conduct their business sensitively and responsibly. Morocco has worked to do its part by promoting expanded rights and investing towards economic development in the territory.

AbiNader spoke of the King's leadership in development; "he gets it," demonstrated by the use of inclusive processes to address problems credibly, realistically, and seriously. The King "is deadly serious about getting the political system to mature," AbiNader added, towards a full parliamentary democracy. AbiNader described how the King declined to get involved when the parliamentary coalition fell apart, essentially empowering the parties by forcing them to resolve the issue themselves and without the King's intervention. Five months later, the parties themselves emerged with a new coalition. This demonstrated the King's desire to fill the political space created by the new constitution, and establish a mature political system.

AbiNader agreed with Dr. Lawrence's assessment of the CESE, lauding the deliberate process of its yearlong consultation with civil society and experts in drafting its recommendations for improving social and economic development in Morocco. The honest assessment of past policy will lead to better development results. The commitment to better understand and engage with local stakeholders is already being reflected in the recent EU fisheries agreement. Altogether, $18 billion will be invested in the Western Sahara in the next ten years, whether or not gas or oil are found in commercial quantities.

In conclusion, AbiNader speculated that the discovery of resources in Western Sahara might actually encourage the process towards a political resolution, as all sides could realize that participating in an autonomous Sahara would be the best option for ending the humanitarian crisis in Tindouf and maximizing benefits to the local population.

4. Q & A

Q: What has been the impact of the US-Morocco Free Trade Agreement (FTA)? How is that in balance?

A: (AbiNader) Morocco has been able to export less to the US, but the reason is that only 22% of its economy is manufactured goods, so what are they able to offer? The key to balancing the bilateral trade relationship, on the other hand, is encouraging US investments in Morocco. Those companies can then address needs in Europe, Africa, and the Middle East, where Morocco has a competitive advantage in doing business.

(Furceri) Morocco was not really well-placed at the time of the FTA implementation, with relatively high unit labor costs, and it is still held back by its fixed exchange rate regime.

Q: (Hendry) Does Morocco have an emerging culture of entrepreneurialism?

A: (AbiNader) Entrepreneurs operate in an ecosystem, and Morocco has done a lot to build this ecosystem with the support of the US. Arabs have proven themselves all over the world to be strong entrepreneurs.

(Lawrence) I agree that Arabs don't need help being entrepreneurial. There is actually no real lack of capital, given the massive informal economy. On the other hand, early investors are lacking at funding stages that occur well before venture capital usually likes to operate. Morocco should develop venture capital infrastructure and better match capital with the real need.

Q: Is there anything being done on the university level to promote public private partnerships (PPP)?

A: (Furceri) Aeronautics has been expanding a lot in Morocco because of investment in these kinds of efforts, for example.

(AbiNader) There's a number of broad programs aimed at that. The biggest problem is the inhibition caused by the French language. People want American universities and colleges, and the University of New England's new campus in Morocco is an example of this starting to happen. Regarding PPPs, the Aeronautic and Automotive sectors have joint councils with the Government to design curriculums that lead to skills which are in demand. The problem is that this that the government needs more external money to scale up programs to have sufficient impact on the labor market.

(Lawrence) I agree with Jean that Morocco has great ideas but it has to scale up to meet the massive demand.

Q: Regarding unemployment, how can we fix the public job entitlement that the youth seem to have?

A: (Lawrence) Moroccan families invest a lot in university graduates. In their view, the state is rich and should give them jobs to share the investment. Morocco needs to find private sector jobs in the short, medium, and long term.

Q: What role are remittances playing in the economy and entrepreneurship?

A: (Lawrence) Infrastructure for remittances is ubiquitous in the country, so it's clear that it plays a large role. However, it's used more for consumption rather than investment. On the other hand, ex-pats do often return to Morocco and invest.
(Furceri) It should also be noted that remittances have a negative impact on the labor market.

5. Observation

The event was attended by about 60 people, mostly comprised of staff members for Members of Congress and other US Government officials, as well as lobbyists and other foreign policy professionals. The discussion was a largely positive evaluation of Morocco's economy and reforms, and the audience was very interested in the speakers' insights and inside perspectives on Morocco.

\(Back to top\)

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, May 27, 2014 4:42 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal (rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com)
Subject: Thank you and EU projects list in English
Attachments: TR_ListofProjectsSouthernProvinces.xlsx

Rachad,

Thank you for lunch today and a very relaxed and thoughtful conversation. I look forward to another session soon. Attached is the EU list we discussed, translated into English. Talk with you soon. Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

From: Jordan Paul [<mailto:jpaul@moroccanamericanpolicy.com>]
Sent: Tuesday, May 27, 2014 12:22 PM
To: Robert M. Holley; Edward Gabriel; Fatima Kurtz; Caitlin Dearing
Subject: Fw: EU Projects List

Here is the translated version of the pdf we received from the Embassy on projects funded in the South by the EU/UN/other.

Sent from my BlackBerry 10 smartphone on the Verizon Wireless 4G LTE network.

From: David Bloom
Sent: Tuesday, May 27, 2014 12:18 PM
To: Jordan Paul
Cc: Caitlin Dearing
Subject: RE: EU Projects List

Here's the translated spreadsheet. I went ahead and added two columns with a formula for converting MAD to USD – Caitlin said this wasn't necessary, but two of the amounts were listed in dollars already so it was a bit confusing. I took the exchange rate from Bloomberg and can modify easily if need be. Let me know if you'd like me to change the formatting in any way.

From: Jordan Paul
Sent: Tuesday, May 27, 2014 9:26 AM
To: David Bloom
Subject: Re: EU Projects List

Thanks!

Sent from my BlackBerry 10 smartphone on the Verizon Wireless 4G LTE network.

From: David Bloom
Sent: Tuesday, May 27, 2014 9:18 AM
To: Jordan Paul

Subject: RE: EU Projects List

Not a problem. Will get started on this shortly.

From: Jordan Paul
Sent: Friday, May 23, 2014 12:35 PM
To: David Bloom
Subject: FW: EU Projects List

Can we translate this and put it into a similar excel type document on Tuesday? Thanks!

From: RobertMHolley@aol.com [<mailto:RobertMHolley@aol.com>]
Sent: Friday, May 23, 2014 9:08 AM
To: Jordan Paul; Caitlin Dearing
Cc: Fatima Kurtz; Edward Gabriel
Subject: EU Projects List

Jordan, Caitlin,

Excellent list and useful tool in our effort to show both Congress and the Executive that others in the international community, in this case the EU, are already engaged in providing various assistance projects in Western Sahara.

I wonder if other bilateral donors aren't also doing this already in their own national assistance programs with Morocco.

If the European Union is not concerned about such useful assistance programs that promote and support social and political reform efforts, as well as basic quality of life issues, undermining the UN effort to find a political solution to the issue there, why should we be?

A quick review of the projects seems to indicate that many are oriented to the same kinds of social and political development issues that we would want the USG to support in the region as well.

I think we need to get this chart translated and make wide use of it in the appropriate offices on the Hill and ensure that it gets in the right hands at State -- probably from those in Congress as they push back on State's report to Congress "explaining" why they do not intend to provide assistance in Western Sahara.

Bob

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Project Code	Project Name	Sector	Executing Agency	Region	Nature of Agreement	Project Start Date	Financing (in MAD)	Amount Disursed (in MAD)	Financing (in USD)	Amount Disursed (in USD)
UE/ONG/0052	Community media for citizen information	Media & free information	NGO/Civil Society	Several regions including Laayoune-Boujdour-Sakia el Hamra & Guelmim Es Smara	Donation	1/1/2011	3,347,224.30	1,221,764.30	406,018.31	148,200.01
UE/ONG/0048	Promotion of Parliamentary best practices	Legislative assemblies and political parties	NGO	Several regions including Laayoune-Boujdour-Sakia el Hamra & Guelmim Es Smara	Donation	12/21/2010	2,117,565.83	941,536.52	256,860.74	114,208.38
PNUS/0010	Adaptation project for oases resilient to climate change	Environment	Ministry of Environment	Several regions including Guelmim Es Smara	Donation	1/4/2010	25,406,500	4,968,360.65	3,081,808.45	602,662.15
ONEPA/0007	Integrating early detection and treatment of breast and cervical cancers and promotion of RH in primary health care	Health	Ministry of Health	Several regions including Qued ed Dahab-Lagouira	Donation	10/1/2009	4,683,420	2,505,060	568,098.85	303,863.78
BAD/0029	Technical assistance project for preserving oases in the south	Agriculture and rural development	Agency for the Development of the Southern Provinces	Guelmim Es Smara	Donation	7/31/2009	6,279,048.46	1,649,062.40	761,648.58	200,031.27
UE/ONG/0028	Reinforcing the role of union actors in the promotion of social, judicial, and economic rights of workers.	Individual rights	NGO/Democratic work organization Ministry of Agriculture and Maritime Aquaculture	Several regions including Guelmim Es Smara	Donation	4/1/2009	1,404,041.60	1,258,684.13	170,310.25	152,678.38
LOEP/0003	Perimeter rehabilitation project in Tambardoute Guelmim	Agriculture and rural development	Maritime Aquaculture	Guelmim Es Smara	Donation	1/1/2009	2,550,000	768,950	309,315.00	93,273.64
ONG/0006	Reinforcing the capabilities of organizations preserving oasis ecosystems in Morocco	Environment	NGO/Association for the fight against the effects of drought & desertification	Guelmim Es Smara	Donation	2/1/2008	14,030,042	10,944,473.94	1,701,844.09	1,327,564.69
PPA/0005	Industries as vectors for development in Morocco - 2008-2012"	Government & Civil Society	NGO Ministry of Agriculture and Maritime Aquaculture	Guelmim Es Smara	Donation	1/1/2008	1,979,106	277,034	240,065.56	33,604.22
UE/ONG/0000	Rehabilitation and development of oases in Tata province	Agriculture and rural development	Maritime Aquaculture	Guelmim Es Smara	Donation	12/19/2006	21,800,000	9,795,321.62	2,644,340.00	1,188,172.51
UE/ONG/0000	Promotion of human rights for women in the process of transitional justice	Government & Civil Society	Civil Society Ministry of Agriculture and Maritime Aquaculture	Qued ed Dahab-Lagouira	Donation	9/25/2006	3,925,905.44	3,587,286.92	476,212.33	435,137.90
D/0000	Project for integrated rural development emphasising irrigation zones	Agriculture and rural development	Several regions including Guelmim Es Smara	Loan	7/7/2004	264,792,000	112,152,344.93	32,119,269.60	13,604,079.44
/PN/0014	MDG-F "Culture heritage and creative industries as vectors for development in Morocco"	Government & Civil Society	NGO	Guelmim Es Smara	Donation	9/1/2008	4,492,168.00	-	544,899.98	-
/PAY
/S/001	Promotion of human rights for women in the process of transitional justice	Government & Civil Society	NGO	Qued ed Dahab-Lagouira	Donation	6/25/2008	880,380.44	902,245.58	106,790.15	109,442.39
UE/004	Promotion of human rights for women in the process of transitional justice	Government & Civil Society	NGO	Qued ed Dahab-Lagouira	Donation	6/25/2008	3,045,525.00	2,717,338.77	369,422.18	329,613.19
FADES Fonds Koweïte	Potable water supply in Tan Tan	Potable Water	ONEE	Guelmim Es Smara	Loan	3/3/2010	197,841,600.00	-	24,000,000.00	-
n	Transport network and electricity distribution in the South	Electricity	ONEE	Laayoune-Boujdour-Sakia el Hamra & Guelmim Es Smara	Loan	10/14/2010	197,841,600.00	-	24,000,000.00	-

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, May 27, 2014 6:33 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: WS situation report

TRADUCTION NON-OFFICIELLE

Ces informations nous parviennent d'une source fiable. Elles n'ont pas été corroborées par des sources tierces.

SAHARA OCCIDENTAL/RAPPORT DE SITUATION
16/05/14

Le Front Polisario a célébré son 41^e anniversaire le 10 mai, suite a des mois turbulents durant lesquels il paraît avoir eu un espoir remarquable concernant l'élargissement du mandat de MINURSO pour inclure les droits humains seulement pour les voir ruinés lors de la réunion annuelle du Conseil de Sécurité de l'ONU fin avril. Le Polisario était aussi angoissé a causé de l'élection présidentielle en Algérie. Maintenant Comme, il semble s'orienter vers une nouvelle stratégie.

Suite à la visite du Roi Mohammed VI à Washington en automne 2013, un membre du Secrétariat National du Polisario avait prévu avec confiance que « lorsque le mois d'avril arrivera, [une composante de droits humains pour la mission de la MINURSO] sera incluse dans la résolution du Conseil de Sécurité, ainsi que la question des ressources naturelles dans les territoires administrés par le Maroc, » et avait aussi constaté « d'avoir reçu des promesses fermes a cet égard des membres du Congrès. » Plus tard, le même fonctionnaire semblait optimiste que la France « adopterait une position neutre » à la réunion du Conseil de Sécurité et s'abstiendrait d'utiliser son pouvoir de veto pour bloquer une résolution avec le monitoring des droits humains comme partie du mandat de la MINURSO.^[1]

Cet optimisme était encouragé encore plus par la crise soudaine dans les relations franco marocaines fin février. Le 20 février, des policiers français se sont rendu a la résidence de l'ambassadeur marocain à Paris pour informer Abdellatif Hamouche, chef de l'agence marocaine de renseignements domestiques (DGST), qui était en France avec le Ministre de l'Intérieur, d'une convocation devant un juge d'enquête en connexion avec deux procès civils déposés par une ONG l'accusant de « complicité dans la torture. » Pour ajouter l'insulte à l'injure, le même jour acteur espagnol Javier Bardem (défenseur de la cause de l'autodétermination pour les sahraouis) a été cité par les médias français constatant que l'ambassadeur de la France aux Etats-Unis François Delattre, lui aurait affirmé que le Maroc était « une maîtresse avec laquelle on (la France) dort toutes les nuits, dont on n'est pas particulièrement amoureux mais qu'on doit défendre. » Le double incident a provoqué les protestations de Rabat, qui a suspendu sa convention de coopération judiciaire avec la France et a rappelé le diplomate chargé de son application, poussant Président François Hollande à téléphoner au Roi Mohammed VI directement pour résoudre le problème.

En parlant a ce même fonctionnaire du Polisario peu après cet incident, il l'a caractérisé de « signal de réveil » pour les autorités françaises concernant « la situation des droits humains au Maroc, » démontrant que la France devrait « mettre la défense des droits humains et l'abolition de la torture au Maroc en première ligne des relations entre les deux pays. » Pour sa part, un ancien fonctionnaire au Palais Royal marocain a constaté que les Français « n'étaient pas assez vigilants » en ce que concerne les tentatives « pour déstabiliser les relations entre Paris et Rabat, » dans lesquelles « les Algériens ont surtout joué un rôle ». Cette même source a constaté que la réaction forte du Roi à l'incident (perçue comme disproportionnée, il a constaté, même par des fonctionnaires marocains) avait en fait l'intention d'envoyer un message non seulement aux Français, mais aussi aux Algériens.

Comme la réunion au Conseil de Sécurité de l'ONU se rapprochait, les fonctionnaires du Polisario ont continué à exprimer leur optimisme. En leur parlant en mi-avril, un membre de haut niveau du leadership du Polisario qui est conseiller du Secrétaire Général Mohamed Abdelaziz a même suggéré que la cause de l'indépendance sahraouie est maintenant « au deuxième tournant important dans son histoire après l'accord de cessez-le-feu de 1991. » La communauté internationale, la source a constaté, prend conscience de la nécessité de finalement mener à bonne fin le conflit du Sahara Occidental, avec une conclusion acceptable et durable qui assurera les droits des sahraouis à l'autodétermination. Selon le membre, un indice de cette nouvelle situation est « la panique visible au plus haut de la structure de pouvoir marocaine, » comme démontré par l'appel du Roi Mohammed au Secrétaire Générale de l'ONU Ban Ki-moon quand le Conseil de Sécurité a commencé ses consultations avant la réunion annuelle sur MINURSO^[2], entre autres. Selon la source, la délégation du Polisario à l'ONU « a reçu des promesses que la protection des civils dans les territoires administrés par le Maroc sera prise en compte » par le Conseil (elle n'a cependant pas indiqué qui a fait de telles promesses.). La source a poursuivi :

Les leaders du Polisario sont, sans exception, convaincus que la communauté internationale a perdu patience. Nous nous dirigeons vers une résolution qui fixera une date limite pour le Maroc pour revenir aux principes de cessez-le-feu, qui incluent les négociations pour une solution viable au conflit, c.-à-d. un referendum sur l'autodétermination. A la réunion des cadres du Polisario le 10 avril, Mohamed Abdelaziz était très claire : Le Polisario doit déclarer son empressement de négocier directement avec le Maroc et doit renouveler sa confiance en l'Envoyé Spécial du Secrétaire Générale Christopher Ross quand nécessaire, mais en même temps le Polisario doit déclarer clairement que, pour être utile, toute négociation futur devrait focaliser sur le referendum et les questions des droits humains.

Ayant organisé sa propre campagne de lobbying du Conseil de Sécurité pour inclure le monitoring des droits humains dans le mandat de la MINURSO, avec 115 « organisations de société civils, » issues de 21 pays le soutenant, le Polisario aurait été encouragé encore plus par les messages explicites de soutien pour l'idée par Human Rights Watch et Amnesty International à l'approche de la réunion. Le représentant du Front à New York Ahmed Boukhari a ajouté sa voix au sens général des attentes le 11 avril, en commentant sur le rapport de Ban Ki-Moon : la question du Sahara Occidental pourrait entrer dans « une phase décisive » en 2015, il a dit, avec le Secrétaire Générale de l'ONU suggérant que le Conseil de Sécurité devrait entreprendre une revue complète du processus de négociations entre le Front Polisario et le Maroc s'il aucun progrès n'est fait avant avril 2015. Ceci, Boukhari a constaté, signifie que « le Conseil de Sécurité assumera une responsabilité lourde, soit d'avancer et résoudre définitivement la question sahraouie, soit de jeter l'éponge et par conséquent ouvrir les portes à l'inconnu. »

Le rapport de Ban Ki-moon a appelé pour une surveillance des droits humains « soutenue, indépendante et impartiale » dans le territoire contesté, sans explicitement recommander que ceci soit confié à la MINURSO. Cependant, il a en même temps donné une note positive d'encouragement sur l'intention de Rabat, récemment annoncée, d'améliorer le Conseil Nationale des Droits de l'Homme (CNDH) et mettre fin à la pratique de juger les civils dans les tribunaux militaires. Selon les diplomates du Conseil de Sécurité cités par Reuters (19/04/14), les versions initiales du rapport de Ban Ki-moon ont en fait inclus un appel pour « un mécanisme de surveillance » des droits humains, mais ont été révisées deux fois dans un période de quelques heures et l'idée d'un « mécanisme » a été remplacée avec un appel pour une « surveillance » non spécifiée. Même si l'Ambassadeur de France à l'ONU a nié avoir fait pression sur le Secrétariat pour modifier le rapport de Ban Ki-moon, Paris a rapidement bien fait comprendre ce qu'il a considéré comme acceptable : lors d'une conférence de presse le 11 avril, le porte-parole du Ministère des Affaires Etrangères Romain Nadal a loué « les efforts majeurs » du Maroc et a constaté que « les efforts pour protéger les droits humains dans cette région » devraient continuer dans le contexte de « la coopération par le Maroc avec les procédures spéciales de l'OHCHR et du Haut Commissaire Navi Pillay, » sans un nécessité de charger la MINURSO de la question. Quand la délégation américaine à l'ONU a circulé une résolution initiale quelques jours plus tard, celle-ci n'a inclus aucune référence à un rôle des droits humains pour la MINURSO. L'Ambassadeur français à Gérard Araud a rapidement nié (via Twitter) que la France avait menacé d'utiliser son veto contre l'inclusion du monitoring des droits humains, mais le point a été un peu académique.

La résolution 2152 adoptée le 29 avril, n'a inclus aucune innovation substantive, soit en termes de la surveillance des droits humains, les limitations sur l'exploitation de ressources naturelles, ou les dates limites ou ultimatums pour un accord négocié, et a effectivement renouvelé le mandat de la MINURSO pour un an avec des exhortations normales au Maroc et au Front Polisario de « continuer les négociations sous les auspices du Secrétaire Général sans les conditions préalables et en bonne esprit. » La réaction du représentant du Polisario Ahmed Boukhari était sans éclat, exprimant sa « satisfaction avec l'engagement du Conseil de Sécurité en faveur d'une solution politique au conflit du Sahara Occidental basée sur le droit inaliénable des Sahraouis à l'auto-détermination » et son regret que la MINURSO reste la seule opération de maintien de la paix sans un mécanisme de surveillance des droits humains.

Les réactions en privé, avec les responsables du Polisario avons qui nous avons eu l'occasion de parler, étaient un peu plus révélatrices. Un membre du Conseil national sahraoui (pseudo parlement de la RASD) a parlé le lendemain de l'adoption et a qualifie les déclarations de Boukhari applaudissant la résolution No.2152 comme une façade diplomatique, car en réalité la résolution a marqué « une régression pour la cause sahraouie. » Le Maroc et de ses amis, la source a ajouté:

ont élaboré un plan pour enterrer la cause sahraouie le 30 Avril 2015. Les Marocains disent déjà que la résolution 2152 sera la dernière avant que l'ONU ne reconnaisse le plan d'autonomie comme la meilleure solution au conflit. Parallèlement, les dirigeants du Polisario n'ont même pas levé le petit doigt lorsque le roi du Maroc a visité le Sahara avec sa femme et ses enfants^[3] pour défilé dans les rues de ses villes et montrer au monde qu'il se sentait comme chez lui et que les gens du Sahara lui doivent allégeance. Les dirigeants du Polisario étaient plus préoccupés par la politique interne de l'Algérie que par la direction que la question du Sahara pourrait prendre résultant d'une résolution favorable au Maroc comme celle qui vient d'être adoptée. Le président de la RASD et ses principaux lieutenants passaient la plupart de leur temps à analyser l'élection présidentielle algérienne et son impact, au lieu de répondre aux initiatives du Maroc telles que la visite du roi au Sahara et son lobbying du Secrétaire général de l'ONU.

S'adressant à nous, presque une quinzaine de jours plus tard, le conseiller de Mohamed Abdelaziz cité ci-dessus a donné une évaluation de la situation qui, bien que plus mesurée dans le ton, était tout aussi sombre que la réaction du membre du Conseil national sahraoui. Suite à la Résolution 2152, le conseiller a fait valoir que le Polisario se trouve à un tournant pour lequel il n'était pas préparé. La résolution appelle à des progrès vers une solution mutuellement acceptable, mais les positions des deux parties restent divergentes et, en effet, irréconciliables. Le Polisario continuera à insister qu'il ne puisse y avoir une solution autre que celle basée sur un référendum qui offre plus d'une option, dont l'une doit être l'indépendance totale. La source a continué:

Le problème est que, contrairement à la situation des années précédentes, le Polisario est mal placé pour imposer cette solution. La situation a changé, et elle est de plus en plus défavorable pour Polisario. L'Algérie est dans une phase de stagnation, où la prise de décision est très lente. À l'heure actuelle, l'Algérie est complètement prise avec ses propres problèmes et préoccupations, beaucoup plus que ce qu'il était le cas même au cours de sa décennie de guerre contre le terrorisme islamiste. Donc, le meilleur qu'Alger peut offrir est de maintenir sa position historique et son aide traditionnelle au Polisario, choses qu'elle ne peut vraiment changer de toute façon. Les Algériens sont inquiets au sujet de la succession présidentielle, qui est de plus en plus risquée. Il est devenu clair lors de la campagne de l'élection présidentielle que les Algériens ont peur de l'avenir. Nous n'avons pas besoin de cette stagnation en Algérie au moment où la population des camps des réfugiés augmente de plus en plus, et nos besoins matériels augmentent également. En plus de cela, il y a un sentiment palpable de fatigue de la part des partisans internationaux du Polisario, qui envoient de l'aide alimentaire et écoutent poliment les envoyés du Polisario, mais ils murmurent sur la question du Sahara afin de ne pas perturber le Maroc ou ses alliés. L'Afrique du Sud est un exemple. La dernière visite en Espagne par le Premier Ministre Abdelkader Taleb Oumar en est un autre. Celle-ci s'est déroulée presque en silence, alors que dans le passé, cela aurait été un événement important pour les médias espagnols et la société civile.

Il semble, d'autre part, que la direction du Polisario a eu le temps de tirer quelques conclusions pratiques de cette évaluation sombre de la situation. Selon la même source:

Pour toute leur expérience, tirée d'années d'activisme, les représentants du Polisario et de la RASD à l'étranger ont besoin d'un nouvel élan. Le Polisario doit prendre les leçons appropriées et se préparer pour ce tournant stratégique. Les campagnes de défense des droits humains qui n'ont pas le soutien massif d'autres acteurs ne peuvent réussir. Le Polisario ne peut pas imposer un référendum sur l'indépendance seulement en organisant des comités pour défendre les prisonniers politiques. Nous avons besoin d'une nouvelle stratégie. C'est le message que le président Mohamed Abdelaziz a transmis lors de la dernière réunion du Secrétariat national juste avant les célébrations du 41e anniversaire du Polisario. En outre, il a donné quelques indications sur ce que pourrait être la stratégie. Par exemple, le Polisario doit prendre l'initiative pour trouver l'appui à sa demande pour une solution basée sur un référendum de la part partis politiques marocains et des associations professionnelles. Mohamed Abdelaziz a posé une question légitime: pourquoi faut-il que les Sahraouis se sentent obligés de négocier exclusivement avec l'Etat marocain? Ils ont besoin de créer un mouvement au Maroc, et même au sein de l'établissement marocain, qui est sympathique avec et en faveur de leur cause. Et quand certains membres du Secrétariat national ont évoqué la possibilité que les Algériens pourraient avoir des réserves sur une telle stratégie, Mohammed Abdelaziz avait de la difficulté à rassurer les participants quant à la position de l'Algérie. L'Algérie, il a dit, n'a pas de réserves quant à cette orientation, et elle n'a pas l'intention d'intervenir.

TEXTE EN ANGLAIS

WESTERN SAHARA / SITUATION REPORT

16/05/14

The Polisario Front celebrated its 41st anniversary on May 10, after a roller-coaster couple of months during which it appears to have built up remarkably high hopes regarding the extension of MINURSO's mandate to cover defence of human rights only to see them dashed at the UN Security Council's annual meeting on the subject at the end of April, while simultaneously living through a bout of anxiety over the Algerian presidential election. As it takes stock, the Front now seems to be turning towards a new strategy.

In the wake of King Mohamed VI's visit to Washington last autumn, it will be recalled, a member of Polisario's National Secretariat had confidently forecast that "when April comes around, [a human rights component for MINURSO's mission] will be included in the UN Security Council resolution, as will the question of the natural resources in the Moroccan-administered territories," and claimed to have "have received firm promises in this regard from members of Congress". The same Polisario official later appeared optimistic that France would "adopt a neutral position" at the UNSC meeting in April and would refrain from using its veto power to block a resolution making human rights monitoring part of MINURSO's mandate[4].

Such optimism was further encouraged by a sudden squall in Franco-Moroccan relations in late February. On February 20, French police officers visited the Moroccan ambassador's residence in Paris to inform Abdellatif Hammouchi, the head of Morocco's domestic intelligence agency (DGST), who was at the time accompanying the Interior Minister on a visit to France, of a summons issued by an investigating judge in connection with two civil lawsuits filed by an NGO accusing him of "complicity in torture". Adding insult to injury, on the same day Spanish actor Javier Bardem (an outspoken supporter of the cause of Saharawi self-determination) was quoted by the French media as claiming that France's ambassador to the United States François Delattre had once described Morocco to him as "a mistress who you sleep with every night, who you don't particularly love but you have to defend". The double incident provoked howls of protest from Rabat, which suspended its judicial cooperation convention with France and recalled the diplomat in charge of its application, prompting President François Hollande to call King Mohamed directly in an attempt to smoothe over the problem.

Speaking to us shortly after the Hammouchi incident, the same Polisario National Secretariat member cast it as a "wake-up call" for the French authorities concerning "the human rights situation in Morocco", arguing that it showed that France needed "to put the defence of human rights and the abolition of torture in Morocco at the forefront of relations between the two countries". For his part, a former senior official at the Moroccan royal palace argued that the French "had not been vigilant enough" with regard to attempts to "destabilise the relationship between Paris and Rabat" in which "the Algerians certainly had a hand"; the same source argued that the King's very strong reaction to the incident (seen as disproportionate, he claimed, even by some Moroccan officials) was in fact intended to send a message not only to the French but also to the Algerians.

As the UN Security Council meeting drew nearer, Polisario officials continued to express optimism. Speaking to us in mid-April, a senior member of the Front's leadership who acts as an advisor to Secretary General Mohamed Abdelaziz went as far as to suggest that the cause of Saharawi independence stood before "the second most important turning point in its history, after the ceasefire agreement of 1991". The international community, the source argued, was becoming aware of the need to bring the Western Sahara conflict at long last to an acceptable and lasting conclusion that would ensure the Saharawi people's right to self-determination. One symptom of this new situation, the Polisario official went on to argue, was the "visible panic at the very top of the Moroccan power structure", as shown amongst other things by King Mohammed's telephone call to UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon as the Security Council began its consultations in the run-up to the annual meeting on MINURSO[5]. Polisario's delegation at the UN had "received assurances that the protection of civilians in the territories administered by Morocco would be taken into account" by the UNSC, claimed the source \(without indicating who had given such assurances, however\). The source continued:

Polisario's leaders are, without exception, convinced that the international community has lost patience. We are heading towards a resolution that will set Morocco a 12-month deadline to revert to the principles of the ceasefire agreement, which include negotiations towards a viable solution to the conflict, i.e. the holding of a referendum on self-determination. At the meeting of Polisario cadres held on April 10, Mohamed Abdelaziz was very clear: Polisario has to state its readiness to conduct direct negotiations with Morocco and must renew its confidence in the Secretary General's Special Envoy Christopher Ross whenever necessary, but at the same time Polisario has to state loud and clear that to be worthwhile any future negotiations must focus on the referendum and the question of human rights.

Having mounted its own campaign to lobby the Security Council to include human rights monitoring in MINURSO's remit, with 115 sympathetic "civil society organisations" from 21 countries backing the call, Polisario will have been further encouraged by explicit messages of support for the idea from Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International in the run-up to the UNSC meeting. The Front's representative at the UN in New York Ahmed Boukhari gave voice to the general sense of expectation on April 11, commenting on Ban Ki-moon's report: the Western Sahara question could enter a "decisive phase" in 2015, he argued, with the UN Secretary General suggesting that the Security Council should undertake a total review of the negotiation process between the Polisario Front and Morocco if there is no progress before April 2015. This, Boukhari argued, means that "the Security Council will assume a heavy responsibility, whether to move forward and definitively solve the Sahrawi issue, or throw in the towel and consequently open the doors to the unknown."

Ban's report called for "sustained, independent and impartial" monitoring of human rights in the disputed territory but without explicitly recommending that this be entrusted to MINURSO. At the same time, however, the Secretary General sounded a positive note of encouragement for Rabat's recently announced intention to enhance the role of the National Human Rights Council (CNDH) and put an end to the practice of trying civilians before military tribunals. According to Security Council diplomats quoted by Reuters (19/05/14), the initial drafts of Ban's report did in fact include a call for a human rights "monitoring mechanism", but the UN Secretariat revised the report twice within the space of a few hours, replacing the idea of a "mechanism" with a call for unspecified "monitoring". Although France's UN ambassador denied having exerted pressure on the Secretariat to modify Ban's report, Paris soon made it clear what it considered acceptable: at a press conference on April 11, French Foreign Ministry spokesman Romain Nadal lauded Morocco's "major efforts" and argued that "efforts to protect human rights in this region" should continue in the context of "cooperation by Morocco with the special procedures of the OHCHR and High Commissioner Navi Pillay", with no need to task MINURSO on the matter. When the United States delegation to the UN circulated a draft resolution a few days later, it contained no reference to a human rights role for MINURSO. French UN ambassador Gerard Araud rushed to deny (via Twitter) that France had threatened to veto the inclusion of human rights monitoring, but the point was somewhat academic.

The resulting Resolution 2152, passed on April 29, contained no substantive innovations whatsoever, be it in terms of human rights monitoring, limitations on the exploitation of natural resources, or deadlines or ultimatums for a negotiated settlement, and effectively came down to another one year renewal of MINURSO's mandate accompanied by the usual exhortations to Morocco and the Polisario Front "to continue negotiations under the auspices of the Secretary-General without preconditions and in good faith". The reaction of Polisario's UN representative Ahmed Boukhari was correspondingly lacklustre, expressing "satisfaction with the Security Council's commitment in favour of a political solution to the Western Sahara conflict based on Saharawis' inalienable right to self-determination," while regretting that MINURSO remains the only United Nations peace mission without a human rights monitoring mechanism.

The reactions in private of the Polisario officials we were able to talk to were somewhat more revealing. Speaking the day after it was adopted, a member of the Saharawi National Council (the SADR's pseudo-parliament) dismissed statements such as Boukhari's welcoming Resolution 2152 as mere diplomatic window-dressing, since in reality the resolution marked "a step backwards for the Saharawi cause". Morocco and its friends, the source went on:

have drawn up a plan to bury the Saharawi cause by April 30, 2015. The Moroccans are already saying that Resolution 2152 will be the last before the UN recognises the autonomy plan as the best solution to the conflict. Meanwhile, Polisario's leaders didn't even lift a finger when the King of Morocco visited the Sahara with his wife and children in tow [\[6\] to parade through the streets of its cities and show the world that he was completely at home there and that the people of the Sahara owe allegiance to him. Polisario's leadership was more preoccupied by the internal politics](#) of Algeria than by the turn that the Sahara question might take with a resolution as favourable to Morocco as the one that has just been adopted. The President of the SADR and his main lieutenants were spending most of their time analysing the Algerian presidential election and its impact, instead of responding to Morocco's initiatives such as the King's visit to the Sahara and his lobbying of the UN Secretary General.

Speaking to us almost a fortnight later, the advisor to Mohamed Abdelaziz quoted above gave an assessment of the situation which, while more measured in tone, was scarcely less gloomy than the reaction of the Saharawi National Council Member. Following Resolution 2152, the advisor argued, Polisario finds itself at a turning point for which it was not prepared. The resolution calls for progress towards a mutually acceptable solution, but the positions of the two parties remain divergent and, indeed, irreconcilable. Polisario will continue to insist that there can be no solution other than on the basis of a referendum that offers more than one option, one of which must be full independence. The source continued:

The problem is that, contrary to the situation in previous years, Polisario is in no position to impose such a solution. The situation has changed, and is increasingly unfavourable for Polisario. Algeria is in a phase of stagnation, in which decision-making is very slow. At present, Algeria is completely taken up with its own problems and anxieties, far more than was the case even during its decade of war against Islamist terrorism. So the best Algeria has to offer is the maintenance of its historic position and its traditional aid to Polisario, neither of which it can really alter in one way or the other. The Algerians are anxious about the presidential succession, which is turning out to be increasingly risky. It became clear during the presidential election campaign that the Algerians are afraid of what future has in store for them. This stagnation in Algeria is not what we need at a time when the population of the refugees camps is growing, and our material needs with it. On top of this, there is a palpable sense of fatigue on the part of Polisario's international supporters, who salve their consciences by sending food aid and politely listening to Polisario envoys but speak as quietly as the possibly can on the Sahara question so as not to upset Morocco or its allies. South Africa is one example. Another came with SADR Prime Minister Abdelkader Taleb Oumar's latest visit to Spain, which passed off almost in silence, whereas in the past it would have been an important event for the Spanish media and civil society.

It would seem, however, that the Polisario leadership has had time to draw some practical conclusions from this rather grim assessment of the situation. According to the same source:

For all their experience, drawn from years of activism, the representatives of Polisario and the SADR abroad need a new impetus. Polisario has to draw the appropriate lessons and prepare for this turning point. Human rights campaigns that do not have massive support from other actors cannot bear fruit. Polisario cannot impose a referendum on independence just by organising committees to defend political prisoners. We need a new strategy. That is the message that President Mohammed Abdelaziz delivered at the last meeting of the National Secretariat just before the celebrations to mark Polisario's 41st anniversary. And he gave a few indications of what that strategy might be. For example, Polisario needs to take the initiative of getting Moroccan political parties and professional associations to support its demand for a solution based on a referendum. President Mohammed Abdelaziz asked a legitimate question: why should Saharawis feel compelled to negotiate exclusively with the Moroccan state? They need to create a current within Morocco, and even within the Moroccan establishment, that is sympathetic with and supports their cause. And when certain members of the National Secretariat raised the possibility that the Algerians might have reservations about such a strategy, Mohammed Abdelaziz was at pains to reassure the participants about Algeria's position. Algeria, he said, has no reservations about this orientation, and has no intention of intervening.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.

President and CEO

The Gabriel Company, LLC

1220 L Street NW, Suite 411

Washington DC, 20005

Phone: +1 202.887.1113

Fax: +1 202.887.1115

Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com

Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

- [1] Le Polisario pourrait être encouragé à le croire étant donné l'expérience de la période qui a précédé la dernière réunion de UNSC sur le Sahara occidental en 2013, au cours de laquelle la France aurait indiqué qu'il ne utiliserait pas son veto pour bloquer une proposition initialement présentée par la délégation des États-Unis d'inclure la surveillance des droits humains dans la mission de MINURSO, selon des diplomates proches du Groupe des Amis du Sahara Occidental cité par Reuters.
- [2] Dans une conversation téléphonique avec M. Ban le 11 Avril, le Roi du Maroc a exigé que le rôle de l'ONU au Sahara occidental reste inchangé, en évitant les « approches biaisées » et « options difficiles », et a souligné la nécessité de « préserver les paramètres de négociation tel que défini par le Conseil de Sécurité. »
- [3] Le 19 avril, juste après le Conseil de Sécurité a commencé ses consultations sur le brouillon qui est devenu Résolution 2152.
- [4] Polisario may have been encouraged to believe this by the experience of the run-up to last year's UNSC meeting on Western Sahara, during which France reportedly indicated that it would not veto a proposal initially put forward by the US delegation to include human rights monitoring in MINURSO's mission, according to diplomats close to the Group of Friends on Western Sahara quoted by Reuters news agency.
- [5] In a telephone conversation with Ban on April 11, the Moroccan King called for the UN role in the Western Sahara to remain unchanged, avoiding "biased approaches" and "perilous options", and stressed the need to "preserve the parameters of negotiation as defined by the Security Council".
- [6] On April 19, just after the Security Council began its consultations on the draft that was to become Resolution 2152.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Tuesday, June 10, 2014 12:16 PM
To: Rachad Bouhlal (rachad.bouhlal@gmail.com); rachad@maec.gov.ma
Subject: FW: us news and world report: obama's high-risk africa summit

Rachad,
Per our discussion this morning. See below

Op-ed by Stephen Hayes in US News/World Report. Hayes is president and CEO of the Corporate Council on Africa, a trade association focusing on strengthening commercial relationships between the United States and Africa.

Obama's High-Risk Africa Summit

The president is breaking with tradition during a meeting with more than 50 African leaders.

Is Obama's Africa Leaders Summit worth the time?

By Stephen Hayes June 9, 2014 | 11:15 a.m. EDT + More

In eight weeks, Washington, D.C., will see another historic event: the first U.S.-Africa Leaders Summit. All but a few of the heads of state of the 54 nations of Africa have been invited and most are expected to attend. It will be the most heads of state to ever be in Washington at one time, likely creating traffic jams Washington has seldom seen before as the Secret Service escorts the presidents and prime ministers across town several times a day.

The purpose of the program is ostensibly to bring Africa and the United States closer together economically and politically. While it is a program also designed to strengthen the legacy of the Obama presidency, it is not without significant risks and challenges, for this summit will be like none the African leaders have ever experienced.

The summit represents a shift in strategy in the administration. In the first term, the administration was adamant that it would work with the "like-minded" nations (read, democratically elected leaders) first, receiving selected leaders in Washington either alone or in small groups of three or four. There would be no massive summits with Africa. During this period, no African head of state was given a state dinner, a fact that did not go unnoticed in Africa.

During the same period, China, Japan, India and Europe have all had African summits, respectively, with China being the first. Nearly every African head of state flew to Beijing and met Chinese leadership one-on-one and dined at a state dinner in the Great Hall. No leader of Africa was uninvited and the Chinese entertained the leaders lavishly and made commitments towards the development of most of the countries attending. A $20 billion commitment of aid to Africa was made, and that has since been supplemented by another $10 billion.

Japan followed course, and Prime Minister Shinzo Abe gave each of 46 African leaders a 15 minute meeting over a three-day period. Japan, fearing a rising China, and also needing Africa's trade and resources for its own economy, promised $30 billion in aid among several other means of support for African development, including 10,000 business internships for African students. India and the European Union also brought the African presidents together to pledge support and cooperation. There was little choice left at the White House but to also host nearly all African heads of state, but with some interesting wrinkles to the formula.

The White House has told African ambassadors and others that no African leader will be given a one-on-one meeting with President Obama during the August summit, a fact that has caused some African leaders to ask what is the utility of the trip. This breaks all protocol tradition as the Africans know it.

Instead, the African presidents received an invitation to "an interactive dialogue" with the American president on Aug. 6. What, many ask, is an interactive dialogue? There will be a state dinner on the White House lawn for all presidents the evening before, but once the interactive dialogue is concluded the next day, so too is the summit. There is to be no final document, another break with protocol. No doubt Obama will shake the hand of each president, but there will be little substantive dialogue.

The African leaders have been asked to come to Washington for at least three days, with a Monday morning program focusing on civil society and an afternoon with Congress, organized by Sen. Chris Coons, D-Delaware, chairman of the Senate subcommittee on Africa. Currently, the White House has asked various cabinet secretaries to host African heads of state for private dinners that evening. This, too, is a very different approach to diplomacy. Cabinet secretaries and African government ministers rank below heads of state, of course, and protocol-sensitive heads of state may seriously question whether they should attend. Furthermore, who is hosted by the secretary of state or the secretary of defense will be noted by those hosted by less prestigious cabinet officers. It may be all too easy for some heads of state to take umbrage.

Economics and trade will have their day as well, as the administration plans a U.S.-Africa CEO summit, organized by the secretary of commerce and her staff. Three hundred CEOs will be invited to meet and discuss business and trade over six hours with African heads of state. The White House is strictly adhering to selected CEOs only. In some ways, this meeting may be the most critical of all to U.S.-Africa relations, as the U.S. private sector has been slow to respond to the new African market and is falling behind as an investor and trader in the world's largest emerging market. The administration is hoping that this program will spark new interest in Africa from the corporate world. To help them, the White House called upon business and political titan Michael Bloomberg to add his name as co-convener, in order to better draw corporate peers to this meeting.

The program breaks many international protocol traditions. That it is also held on President Obama's birthday has added fuel for critics who say that this more a legacy' program than a working meeting with real results. It is too early to say. An innovative program is being planned. This is a program of high risk, ultimately to be judged by the results to come. We shall hope and then we shall see.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Friday, June 27, 2014 11:20 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Algeria situation report

The information contained in this report is compiled from public and private sources and cannot be verified for accuracy.
Thank you

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT

June 27, 2014

Executive Summary

Political Trends

- A conference in Algiers on June 10 brought together the broadest ever range of opposition parties and personalities behind the demand for a “peaceful democratic transition”. The opposition parties still have no joint platform, however, and no strategy for convincing the power structure of the need to accept change, making it easy for the PM to brush them off as irrelevant.
- The Presidency is forging ahead with consultations around its draft constitutional amendment package, while the government has met under President Bouteflika's chairmanship to adopt the “presidential programme of action” for the next five years.
- There have been some indications that tensions persist to some degree within the establishment, despite the successful re-election of Bouteflika. Against this background, moves by CoS Gaïd Saleh to push over 70 army and DRS officers into retirement have been interpreted as a purge of those who might have thrown in their lot with efforts to block Bouteflika's fourth term of office by having him impeached on grounds of ill health.
- Whether or not the proposed retirements are politically motivated, there are signs that they are meeting some resistance within the military, at a time when the army and the DRS face unprecedented challenges on the country's borders.

Foreign Relations

- Following on from the French Defence Minister's visit in mid-May, the French Gendarmerie commander and Foreign Minister have also held talks in Algiers, with potential cooperation in “pacifying” northern Mali and southern Libya high on the agenda in all cases.
- Algiers appears keen to capitalise on its continuing rapprochement with Paris by urging the French to “help” Morocco reach agreement with Polisario.
- There has been a rash of press reports of operations by the Algerian army and DRS in Libya, in contradiction with the established doctrine of not intervening militarily in other countries.
- While these reports have met with strenuous official denials, private sources confirm that Algerian forces have indeed been conducting counter-terrorism operations on Libyan territory and have established control over a buffer strip on the Libyan side of the border.
- Military intervention in foreign countries and collaboration with “imperialist” nations remain highly controversial, but with no end in sight to the operations in Libya now that they have begun, there is likely to be increasing pressure to address these issues more openly.

Security

- After relatively high levels of political violence in May, including several clashes between the security forces and arms smugglers and/or jihadists along the border with Libya, reporting has all but dried up in June, suggesting that a news blackout may have been enforced in connection with the Algerian army's controversial intervention in Libya.

- The capital has remained quiet, but a network set up to send would-be fighters to Syria has been discovered in the adjacent wilaya of Blida, suggesting that AQMI still faces competition for recruits from the more 'fashionable' jihadist groups in Syria.
- As the situation in Libya deteriorates, the Presidency and the General Staff are reported to have issued orders for a new operation to secure the eastern border and oil and gas production sites, which involves exclusion zones on the Algerian side of the border and intensive patrolling of the border by army helicopters.

Political Trends

On June 10, the long-awaited conference organised by the National Coordinating Committee for Freedoms and Democratic Transition (CNLTD) in response to the re-election of Bouteflika convened in Algiers, bringing together what was undoubtedly the broadest range of opposition parties and personalities Algeria has ever seen: in addition to the members of the CNLTD itself^[1], the conference saw participation from the mainly Kabyle, social-democratic FFS, the moderate Islamist El Islah, Bouteflika's main challenger in the April election Ali Benflis, veteran human rights campaigner Ali Yahia Abdenour, and former Prime Ministers Mouloud Hamrouche, Sid Ahmed Ghazali and Mokdad Sifi. However much of an achievement it was to bring together such a broad panel, in the final analysis the mountain laboured and brought forth a mouse: after a day of speeches, the conference handed the task of penning a new “platform for freedoms and democratic transition” over to a committee that has yet to be established and which seems to have no deadline for completing the job. The main slogan that emerged from the conference, around which the future platform ought theoretically to be built, was for a peaceful, negotiated transition to a more authentically democratic system. But the question of how the power structure might be induced to negotiate anything at all with the opposition does not seem to have been addressed – an omission that speaks volumes as to the opposition parties' lack of confidence in their own capacity for mass mobilisation, and their failure to connect with existing grassroots protest campaigns (such as the well organised movement of unemployed youth in the south of the country, the movement against fracking that is now also emerging in the south, the long suffering families of the 'disappeared' who appealed – apparently in vain – to the conference for help, etc.).

It is perhaps no great surprise therefore that the power structure itself has remained largely impervious to this “historic” event. Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal did allude to the opposition's initiative in a speech to parliament on June 5, but only to brush aside the very idea of a “democratic transition” as irrelevant, since “we are a democratic country [and] people have to realise that the transition is behind us”. The Presidency is pressing on regardless with the consultations around its own, very limited, constitutional reform package; some of the participants in the June 10 conference, such as the FFS, have consented to take part in the consultations while others are boycotting the whole process, which is in itself indicative of the very flimsy nature of the opposition alliance. Meanwhile, the Council of Ministers met twice in May, under the chairmanship of President Bouteflika^[2], adopting the draft “Government Action Plan for the implementation of the presidential programme”.

Behind the appearance of business as usual, however, there are some indications that tensions within the power structure may not have been laid to rest by the successful re-election of Bouteflika. AlgériePatriotique.com – an online newspaper that is understood to be co-owned by the sons of DRS chief Lt-Gen. Mohamed 'Tewfik' Médiène and former Defence Minister and CoS Gen. Khaled Nezzar – has for example reported that Gen. Nezzar has declined an invitation to take part in the consultations on constitutional reform. Nezzar, once the leading light of the so-called “eradicator” faction of the army and never a fan of Bouteflika's, is said to be disgruntled that suggestions he made during the round of consultations on the constitution held in 2011 were essentially ignored and, beyond this, to be fuming about Bouteflika's stage-managed re-election this year and, in particular, “the army's role in this event”. AlgériePatriotique.com has also reported that Col. Fawzi, the former head of the Centre de Communication et de Diffusion (the DRS's former media management branch), who was among the prominent DRS officers dismissed last year, has been forbidden to leave the country^[3] pending prosecution – for unspecified offences – before a “specialised court”. For his part, the present CoS and Deputy Defence Minister, Lt-Gen. Ahmed Gaïd Saleh, is reported to have convened the Haut Conseil de la Fonction Militaire^[4] in the days following Bouteflika's investiture in order to have it approve a list of 74 DRS and army officers to be put out to grass in the upcoming annual round of retirements and promotions on July 5. This list – which is said to await President Bouteflika's signature – seems to be a modified version of the list of 80 or more names Gaïd Saleh is reported to have proposed in mid-January^[5].

A source close to the middle ranks of the DRS suggests that the mooted retirements are in fact a barely disguised purge, casting them as a prolongation of the wave of changes that began last summer with the removal of Col. Fawzi and continued in the following months with the removal of Gen. M'henna Djebbar, Maj-Gen. Bachir Tartag et al. The source claims that these and other senior DRS officers are accused of having attempted to orchestrate a “coup d'Etat blanc” after Bouteflika's stroke in April of last year, by exploiting their influence over Algeria's media and political parties to force through the application of article 88 of the constitution (which provides for the impeachment of the President on grounds of lasting incapacitation). With his new list of 70-plus names for retirement, Gaïd Saleh is now going after their various sympathisers in the DRS and the army, the source suggests. Tewfik, it would seem, is not seen as having been in cahoots with the alleged plotters. The source adds that there have been lengthy internal discussions about who should be left on or taken off the list, since many of the officers in question have not yet reached retirement age and there is resistance within the army to dispensing with their skills when the country is virtually on a war footing because of the deteriorating situation in Libya and the Sahel.

This account, which casts the changes in the army and the intelligence service in a new light, has not as yet been either confirmed to us or denied by other sources close to the military and security establishment, although a source close to Bouteflika told us, albeit over the ‘phone, “the President has neutered ‘them’ (sic), and as long as he remains alive, none of ‘them’ will dare raise his head again.” In this connection it may be worth quoting at some length from El Watan's article on the retirements Lt-Gen. Gaïd Saleh is said to be preparing for July 5:

Informed sources say that [...] “these retirements are being imposed by leaders who themselves well past retirement age. The majority of heads of military regions and services should have retired long ago. Why have they not been concerned by the application of Article 20^[6]? Is it normal for officers as young as 50 years to be retiring?” The answer, say our interlocutors, is known to all. “We are in the same situation as in 2004, when part of the army, represented by Chief of Staff Lt-Gen. Mohamed Lamari had refused to endorse Bouteflika's second term, seconded by Gen. Toufik. But the late Smail Lamari and Larbi Belkheir were strong supporters of Bouteflika and eventually won over Gen. Toufik, who then sacrificed the Chief of Staff and a list of senior officers, officers and non-commissioned officers, who all retired in 2006 with another wave in 2008, under very suspicious circumstances. No one had so much as imagined Gaïd Salah could ever become Chief of Staff when he was already thought to be close to retirement in 2004. The relationship between him and the President has grown quite strong and [...] he is only accountable to the President, or perhaps rather the brother of the President. He is [...] organising a witch-hunt for troublesome officers just when the military needs them the most because of the situation on our borders,” explain our interlocutors. They call these measures “score-settling that might make the sense of frustration in the ranks even worse and lead to demoralisation, and that is something the military could really do without, especially in these times of crisis”

The article, it should be noted, appeared under the by-line of Salima Tlemçani, a veteran journalist with an established record of being used as a conduit by certain elements within the military and the security services.

Foreign Relations

On May 27, less than a week after French Defence Minister Jean-Yves Le Drian's visit to Algiers, Gen. Denis Favier, the head of France's Gendarmerie (which answers to the Ministry of the Interior) arrived in the Algerian capital at the head of a sizeable delegation for two days of discussions with Algerian Gendarmerie commander Maj-Gen. Ahmed Boustila and his team. On June 8, French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius flew in for a two-day visit, during which he was received by President Bouteflika and held talks with his opposite number Ramtane Lamamra, Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal and Industry Minister Abdesselam Bouchouareb. Questions of regional security, and in particular the situations in Mali and southern Libya, were central to all of these visits, which Algerian French-language daily Liberté was quick to portray as part of a broader campaign of “strong [international] pressure on Algeria to get involved militarily in the Sahel”, pointing to what it suggested were the first signs of operational collaboration in the field between Algerian and French forces^[7]. At a joint press conference with his Algerian counterpart, Foreign Minister Fabius saluted Algeria's “pacifying role” in Mali^[8] and proclaimed that France and Algeria “stand side by side in the fight against terrorism”. At the same time however, he dismissed any suggestions that the two countries' armed forces might be involved in joint military operations in Libya as “allegations with no basis in reality”.

The French Foreign Minister was referring to a series of press reports, beginning with an article in London Times on May 30^[9], claiming that the Algerian military had begun conducting anti-terrorist operations on Libyan soil – a breach of Algeria's official doctrine, which eschews military operations beyond the country's own borders. While the Times article limited itself to asserting that “French, American and Algerian special forces have been sent to the south of Libya to attack terrorist networks” and did not elaborate further with regard to the alleged Algerian involvement, Algerian daily El Watan soon picked up the story, adding a wealth of detail. In its June 6 edition, noting that “no official would talk about it,” El Watan reported that “Algerian forces have been on the offensive in Libya since May 29”. Some “3,500 Algerian paratroopers plus a 1,500-strong logistical support unit are currently deployed on the other side of the [Algeria-Libya] border,” claimed the daily, adding that “another source, a diplomat, talked of 5,000 troops on the ground and a major aerial operation”. The military's plan stresses mobility, so the troops “move aboard lightly armed off-roaders with machine guns, supported by artillery.” The real heavy firepower “comes from the Algerian military's attack helicopters”. El Watan adds that “other players joined the American-French-Algerian effort: forces from Chad and forces loyal to Libya's Gen. Haftar”. El Watan revisited the story on June 13, reporting that the operation was “still under way, now in its second week”, covering a strip of territory about 100 km deep on the Libyan side of the border:

Surveillance aircraft detect targets which are then “handled” by ground troops or attack helicopters. It should also be noted that there are constant contacts with Libyan tribes to reassure and support them. The idea is to stabilise the west of Libya so as to make sure that isolated and vulnerable tribes do not throw in their lot with the jihadists. Another objective is to destroy the military and logistics capacity of jihadist groups and occupy space so as to prevent them from leaving Libya. The thick of the action is happening in Benghazi, where the forces of Gen. Haftar are facing stiff resistance from Islamist militias. Egyptian forces are also taking part in operations the east of Libya, whereas France, which is deploying modest forces but working with the Chadians, is taking care of Libya's south. The US deployed its helicopter carrier USS Bataan with 2,000 troops on board carrying out targeted attacks.

On June 16, France's Nouvel Observateur reiterated the news: commandos from Algeria's 4th parachute regiment, combat helicopters and men from the DRS's Special Intervention Group were said to be operating in Libya alongside America's 317th Special Forces Squadron (sic). "They are there," Le Nouvel Observateur claimed, "to help Gen Haftar take power"^[10]. According to the French news magazine, which says its information "was not denied by Algerian security sources," some 25,000 Algerian troops are deployed along the border with Libya. Le Nouvel Observateur did not, on the other hand, mention any French presence.

Algerian officials have repeatedly denied such reports. Even before the Times broke the story, Foreign Minister Ramtane Lamamra was assuring reporters on the sidelines of a ministerial meeting of the Non-Aligned Movement in Algiers on May 26 that "Algeria is not ready to coordinate with" Gen. Khalifa Haftar and "will not change its policy of non-interference in the affairs of brotherly and friendly countries"^[11]. After the first El Watan article, Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal assured parliament that "the Algerian military will not intervene in any foreign country as long as Bouteflika is head of state", while other dailies such as Echourouk and L'Expression ran articles quoting unnamed security sources as denying categorically that there had been or could ever be any breach of Algeria's "sacrosanct principle" of non-intervention in conflicts beyond its borders. On June 17, Algerian Defence Ministry sources were again quoted as denying the reports, especially Le Nouvel Observateur's version which was described as "a deliberate disinformation effort".

And yet, however strenuous the denials, it would seem that there is no smoke without fire. Concordant sources have assured us that the Algerian military is indeed involved in cross-border operations to the east. A member of the staff of Sonatrach's legal department told us in mid-June:

As of May 22, elite units of the Algerian armed forces entered Libyan territory, in particular going into the area around Ghadames in order to secure the assets of Sipex, Sonatrach's subsidiary in Libya. Once the assets – drilling sites in blocks 65, 95 and 96 – had been secured, Sipex repatriated all its personnel, at the same time as the Algerian staff of other companies and Algerian diplomats who had been posted to Libya^[12]. On the ground, the Algerian army controls a strip several kilometres deep on the Libyan side of the border.

Speaking to us a week earlier, a source close to a number of middle-ranking DRS officers was even more explicit:

Elements from the 4th Parachute Regiment, which is based in Ouargla, are operating over 200 km deep within Libyan territory. And they are not alone. Snipers from the DRS's Special Intervention Group have also conducted several missions in Libya. One of them resulted in the elimination of 13 influential members of terrorist groups that were planning to attack Algeria's vital oil installations at Hassi Messaoud, and another culminated in the elimination of the head of an Islamist militia from Misrata. All these operations have been organised with the assistance of militiamen from the Zintan brigades^[13] and members of the Warfalla tribe.

Neither source, however, mentioned any collaboration with Gen. Haftar's campaign against Islamist militias in the north of the country. It is also striking that they both remained silent on the matter of cooperation with US or French forces. While it seems likely that there would be at least some information sharing with the French and the Americans^[14], the idea of active collaboration with "imperialist" powers is at least as much of a taboo in Algeria as the idea of intervening militarily in other countries in the first place, if not more so. It is therefore perhaps unsurprising that nobody is shouting it from the rooftops. But having crossed the Rubicon by sending troops into Libya, Algiers finds itself involved in cross-border operations with no clear end date; as they drag on, some form of coordination with US, French and possibly other forces is likely to become increasingly unavoidable, and pressure to address these controversial issues publicly will grow correspondingly.

In the meantime, the rapprochement with France continues, with Speaker of the APN (lower house of parliament) Mohamed Larbi Ould Khalifa visiting Paris on June 18 for a follow-up visit with Laurent Fabius, during which “stability in the North Africa-Sahel region” was once again the central theme. In a statement issued after their talks, Fabius again lauded Algeria as “a key country in a troubled region” that “plays a strategic role in the consecration of security and stability”. Algeria, the French Foreign Minister added approvingly, “protects the entire region from the impact of crises in certain countries with which it shares extensive borders”. For his part, Ould Khalifa called for coordination between Algeria and France in the fight against terrorism, stressing the importance of “preserving the stability of the region of North Africa and the Sahel” and highlighting the role and contribution of Algeria “in the settlement of internal crises in certain countries”. Neither did the Algerian parliamentary Speaker miss the occasion to slip in a reference to the Western Sahara conflict, emphasising the need to “help” the Polisario Front and Morocco “implement international resolutions on the right to self-determination”.

Security

Levels of violence in May were relatively high, with some 21 security incidents (of which eight were initiated by the jihadists themselves) making it the busiest month since August 2013. However, these levels of activity do not appear to have carried on into June, which has so far been unusually quiet, with only two operations reported by June 18 – although it is possible that this is the consequence of a media blackout that may have been imposed in connection with the Algerian army's incursions into Libya (see above) and extended to cover the whole the country. Strikingly, there has been not a single incident reported along the southern border with Mali since mid-May – which, if our assumption that a media blackout is in place, may be a measure of the political sensitivity of the question of military and intelligence cooperation with French forces operating just across the border.

ALGIERS and its suburbs were generally quiet, although the press reported that security forces in the wilaya of Blida, adjacent to Algiers, “dismantled a network that had been recruiting fighters for Syria” around June 4, arresting eight people. This is however unlikely to have had any direct connection to AQMI, which has been competing for recruits with the tug of Syria, releasing a statement in March 2013 in which it implored “the Muslim youth in the Maghreb and especially Tunisia^[15]” not to leave to take part in jihad in other countries unless “the leaders of jihad in your area, judging the move to be in the interest of Islam, authorise you to go”.

KABYLIA was unusually quiet this past month, with only two operations reported (a roadside bomb in Tizi Ouzou on May 28 and an ambush of a security forces patrol near Kadiria, Bouira, on June 4).

There were a handful of incidents in the WEST of the country, including a roadside bomb on May 28 that killed one soldier and wounded a number of others aboard a supply truck on their way to a border post with Morocco, near Beni Snous in the wilaya of Tlemcen. Also of note was an incident on June 16 in which the shrine of Sidi Cheikh, in the town of the same name in the wilaya of El-Bayadh, was burnt down by persons unknown – the second attack against a Sufi shrine within a month, following the attack on the shrine in Merine, wilaya of Sidi Bel Abbès on May 13 (see previous report).

Several incidents were reported in the SOUTH EAST of the country:

- Security forces on May 19 arrested five people in In Amenas suspected of running an arms smuggling ring between Mali, Chad and Libya.
- Also on May 19, the Algerian army killed eight Libyan militiamen near the border with Libya. The armed group was reportedly preparing to set up an ambush for Algerian border patrols. Al-Khabar, which reported the story, gave no details on the location of the incident, except for saying that the bodies of the dead fighters were taken to Bordj Omar Driss, in the northwest of the wilaya of Illizi, which suggests the incident took place in the northern sector of the border strip between Algeria and Libya.
- The security forces on May 20 raided an arms cache near the town of El-Oued, near the border with Tunisia, and recovered at least 11 machine guns and “eight missiles” believed to have been smuggled in from Libya.
- Al-Khabar, May 22, quoted “informed sources” as saying that “the highest security authorities” had dispatched “117 special operations troops” to Djanet, wilaya of Illizi, to plan operations against the forces of one Zain bin Qada, a Libyan militia leader who used to serve in Qadhafi’s forces and had established a base in the Libyan town of Dirj^[16]. A week later, the same newspaper reported that the Algerian General Staff had decided to send 5,000 additional troops to the border with Libya.
- Al-Khabar on May 25 said the Algerian army had “in the past two days” foiled an attempt by a group of seven armed Libyan militiamen to cross into Algeria “in the Djili area of the wilaya of Illizi”. Two of the armed men were killed and five arrested. Seven machine guns, one heavy machine gun and three RPG shells were seized.

END

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

[1] Three moderate islamist parties, the MSP, the FJD and Ennahda, the mainly Kabyle secularist RCD, the smaller and more recently formed Jil Jadid, plus former Prime Minister Ahmed Benbitour.

[2] In addition to chairing the two Council of Ministers meetings on May 7 and 21, President Bouteflika has begun receiving foreign visitors far more regularly than was the case prior to the presidential election – every few days since the beginning of May, and on some occasions more than one per day – suggesting that his stamina is improving. After being received by Bouteflika on June 9, visiting French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius told France Info radio station that the President had showed “great mental alacrity, but he has a problem with elocution. He speaks very softly, so he has a little microphone to talk through.”

- [3] Similarly, there were reports in the Algerian media at the beginning of April of Gen. M'henna Djebbar, the former head of the Direction Centrale de la Sécurité des Armées, being informed, as he was about to board a flight at Algiers Houari Boumedienne International Airport, that he was barred from leaving the country.
- [4] The HCFM, established by presidential order in February 2006, is supposed to be chaired by the Defence Minister (i.e. Bouteflika) but it would seem that this responsibility has been delegated to Gaid Saleh in his capacity as Deputy Defence Minister. The Haut Conseil is “the institutional framework in which are discussed general issues relating to the condition and status of military personnel” and includes: the Permanent Undersecretary of the Ministry of Defence; the commanders of the army, navy, air force, air defence, gendarmerie and the Republican Guard; the commanders of the military regions; and the head of the DRS.
- [5] In its June 8 issue, Algerian daily El Watan referred to a meeting of the HCFM on January 14, noting that it was at this meeting that several high-ranking DRS officers (Col. Fawzi; ex-DCSA chief Maj-Gen. M'henna Djebbar; former special intervention force commander Gen. Abdelkader Ait Ourabi, or Ouarab, a.k.a. Hassan; and Gen. Chafik, former head of the SCPJ, the investigative police branch of the DRS that was abolished last autumn) were put into retirement. At the time, however, news portal Tout Sur l'Algérie and two private sources suggested that the retirements had been discussed at a meeting on January 13 of a newly established 'Special Security Commission' rather than the HCFM.
- [6] Of the regulations governing the status of military personnel, which sets maximum age limits for various ranks of officer.
- [7] “Leaks in France have suggested that the recent neutralisation of ten AQMI terrorists by the Algerian army on the border with Mali was the result of intelligence supplied by France and after an operation in the Adrar des Ifoghas region of northern Mali by French special forces involved in Operation Serval.”
- [8] On June 9, after months of cajoling by Algerian diplomats, six northern Malian movements – the Arab Movement of Azawad (MAA), Coordination of the People of Azawad (CPA), Coordination of Movements of Patriotic Resistance Fronts (CM-FPR), the Azawad National Liberation Movement (MNLA), the High Council for the Unity of Azawad (HCUA) and the Arab Movement of Azawad (MAA) – came together in Algiers to sign two documents committing themselves to a peace process based on inclusive dialogue and respect for the territorial integrity of Mali.
- [9] 'US special forces arrive to tackle Libya Islamists'. Deborah Haynes, Michael Evans and Hassan Morajea. The Times, May 30 2014.
- [10] Khalifa Haftar, a retired military officer who heads the self-styled “Libyan National Army”, launched a large scale air and ground offensive against powerful Islamist militias in the Benghazi area on May 16 that he described as a “correction to the path of the revolution”, dubbing it Operation Dignity. Haftar's offensive did not have the approval of the central Libyan government, and on May 18 was extended into Tripoli, with the storming of the Libyan General National Congress building by militiamen from the western town of Zintan. Haftar's offensive against the Islamist militias, which is still ongoing, enjoys a good measure of popular support, but has been cast as a thinly disguised coup attempt
- [11] Lamamra was reacting to rumours of Algerian support for Khalifa Haftar's “Operation Dignity”, which have been encouraged by Haftar's own public statements. In an interview with Egyptian daily Al-Masri Al-Yawm at the end of May, for example, Haftar indicated that he welcomed military intervention by Libya's neighbours: “Of course I support any military strike that aims to secure Egyptian borders, even if it takes place inside Libya. We would like to get rid of these groups in Derna, Benghazi, Egdabia, Sert, Tripoli, and on the Algerian borders. It is impossible for us to allow any of them to carry out any action against neighboring and friendly countries.”
- [12] The evacuation of diplomatic staff actually took place somewhat earlier than the source seems to be suggesting. As noted in our last report, the Algerian military carried out an emergency evacuation of the ambassador and 50-strong staff of the embassy in Tripoli on May 16, after receiving “credible information of a serious and imminent threat” against Algerian diplomats in Libya.
- [13] Some months ago there were hints that for purposes of border security the Algerian military and/or the DRS had struck up contact with the Zintan Brigades, which have been one of the major players in south-west Libya since the fall of the Qaddafi regime, although they are far from enjoying full hegemony in this ethnically heterogeneous region.
- [14] Under the telling headline “Faced with chaos in Libya, the Algerian doctrine called into question”, El Watan claimed in its May 23 edition that: “When John Kerry visited Algiers at the beginning of April, the Americans did indeed put the request [for Algeria to use its military to help stabilise Libya and/or the Sahel] to the Algerian authorities, first and foremost Bouteflika, the General Staff and the DRS. Senior Algerian and American security envoys discussed the details of a more military role for Algeria in Libya. 'There can be no question of adopting an aggressive policy of crossborder intervention by the Algerian army,' a military source explains. 'It is a matter of protecting our national territory from the outside, very close to the borders, by means of swift, ad hoc operations. A major force projection was undertaken during the last few weeks all along the border with Libya, with air support also being prepared at the same time.'”
- [15] On June 1, AQMI underlined its growing orientation towards Tunisia with a statement claiming responsibility for an attack on the house of Tunisian Interior Minister Lotfi Ben Jeddou in Kasserine, Tunisia, on May 28 – the first time the organisation has explicitly laid claim to an operation on Tunisian soil. The statement lists the military operations “against the lions of Islam in Chaambi Mountains” the “oppression of Ansar Al-Sharia, placed by the criminals who rule Tunisia on the list of terrorist organisations in the hope this will earn them sympathy from the head of the infidels, America, and the corrupt generals in Algeria”. AQMI's message goes on to deny involvement in “any targeting of civilians in Tunisian towns and villages,” claiming that “any such operations are the dirty work of the authorities who then blame them on the mujahideen to tarnish their image and isolate them from their popular base, following the example of the criminal generals of Algeria”. It would seem that the group that carried out the Kasserine attack, which left four policemen dead, was made up of a mix of Tunisians and Algerians – Tunisian security said three of the five jihadists were Algerian nationals.
- [16] Note however that Dirj is located to the east of Ghadames, way to the north of the Djanet segment of the border.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, July 09, 2014 2:11 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: Algerian report

ALGERIA / SECURITY

02/07/14

“AQMI Central Region” swears allegiance to ISIS leader Abu Bakr Al-Baghdadi

In an eight-minute audio message posted on YouTube on June 26, Abou Abdallah El Âsemi^[1], who is presented as “Qadi [religious judge] of AQMI-Central Region”, delivered a long paean of praise for the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS), the Al-Qaeda splinter group which together with an alliance of Iraqi Sunni forces took the cities of Mosul and Tikrit in mid-June. Three days later, on June 29 – also the first day of the holy month of Ramadan – ISIS itself issued a statement proclaiming the “restoration” of the Islamic Caliphate and demanding the allegiance (bay'a) of all Muslims to its leader, Ibrahim Al-Badri a.k.a. Abu Bakr Al-Baghdadi, as the new “Caliph Ibrahim”. This was followed, in the early hours of the morning of June 30, by what is purported to be a short written communiqué from the Shura Council of the Central Region, signed by all its members^[2], formally declaring the group's allegiance to “the venerable sheikh and servant of God, Ibrahim Bin Awad Al-Quraishi Al-Baghdadi Abu Bakr, the Caliph of the Muslims”. These developments may have serious implications for the jihadist movement in Algeria.

Already in March of this year, a written communiqué had been published in the name of AQMI-Central Region^[3] that declared support for ISIS and exhorted its fighters to stand firm and “obey the Commander of the Believers Abu Bakr Al-Baghdadi Al-Quraishi”. This came at a time when Al-Baghdadi had effectively been disowned by Al-Qaeda's international leader Ayman Al-Zawahiri after clashes between ISIS and another Al-Qaeda affiliate, the Nusra Front, in Syria. Insofar as the AQMI-Central Region statement took ISIS's defence, it could be seen as siding with Baghdadi against Zawahiri and, by extension, against AQMI's own national leadership, which owes allegiance to Zawahiri. Noting that the document is difficult if not impossible to authenticate, we raised the possibility at the time that it might be a DRS fabrication. This can still not be entirely ruled out: AQMI is known to have been having trouble competing for recruits with the more “fashionable” jihad in Syria for some time, issuing a statement in March 2013 in which it implored “the Muslim youth in the Maghreb” not to leave to take part in jihad in other countries without authorisation from “the leaders of jihad in your area”, and it might be argued that from this point of view it would make sense for the Algerian authorities to amplify the successes of ISIS in order to divert Algerian would-be jihadis away from AQMI. And whether or not the DRS has had any hand in talking up ISIS, there is some recent evidence that Algerian networks, presumably without any connection to AQMI's leadership, have indeed continued to recruit fighters for Syria.

And yet there are some grounds to believe that the various “Central Region” statements may indeed be genuine. While the DRS is undoubtedly well versed in the dark arts of false-flag operations, it is also well acquainted with the problem of “blowback”: returnees from the conflict in Afghanistan formed the backbone of the GIA and other armed Islamist groups in the early 1990s and similar patterns have been repeated in numerous other countries ever since, to the point where the negative cost/benefit ratio of sending wannabe jihadis overseas has become a central tenet of counter-terrorism lore. Furthermore, it is perhaps significant that AQMI's national leadership does not seem to have issued any statement condemning the messages attributed to its Central Region as DRS fabrications (as it might have been expected to do, preventively, if it had reason to believe that they were fakes cooked up with hostile intent). On the other hand, AQMI's leadership has implicitly recognised the existence of sharp controversies over ISIS and its roles in Syria and Iraq and in the global jihadist movement in a slightly earlier communiqué (dated June 22) welcoming ISIS's victories in Iraq but calling on it and rival jihadi groups in Syria and Iraq to put aside their differences and cooperate with one another and begging all “supporters of the mujahidin to cease their campaigns of carping and denigration in online forums and social media”.

There are also some indications that, although there are no known independent communications from the “Central Region” prior to March of this year, the structure itself is not imaginary. Back in February 2008, European intelligence sources suggested that, as it morphed into AQMI the previous year, the former GSPC^[4] had overhauled its internal structures, paring them down to just two zones, one covering the whole of northern Algeria and another covering a vast area extending south from roughly Biskra and taking in virtually the whole of the Algerian Sahara and part of northern Mali. At the same time, however, the European intelligence sources conceded that the AQMI fighters still seemed to be observing the old organisational forms – which suggests that the overhaul may have remained to a large extent a dead letter in practice. Subsequent (more or less well informed) reports in the Algerian media referred to a four-region structure, with the hard core of AQMI's fighters concentrated in its Central Region. This was variously reported to comprise the Wilayas of Tizi Ouzou, Boumerdès, Bouira, Béjaïa, M'sila and Djelfa (Le Soir d'Algérie, May 2008), or Tizi Ouzou, Boumerdès, Bouira and Béjaïa (L'Expression, March 2009), or just Tizi Ouzou, Boumerdès and Bouira (Al-Akhbar Alaan TV, 2012) – a shrinking footprint that would seem to be coherent with losses sustained by the organisation under the pressure of the security forces in the mid-to-late 2000s.

By Al-Akhbar Alaan's account, furthermore, the Central Region was made up of three djounds (brigades or regiments): Djound El I'tissam, Djound El Ahouel and Djound El Ançar. Djound El I'tissam is mentioned in reports dating from 2003 on the known structure and development of the GSPC in the Wilaya of Boumerdes, which indicate that it was at some point in the late 1990s or early 2000s headed by a certain Omar Chaouch, a.k.a. Abou Khaled^[5]. By 2006, the same Omar Chaouch/Abou Khaled was said to be commanding Djound El Ahouel in the Khemis El Khechna area of the Wilaya of Boumerdes; the same reports claimed that the national Emir of the GSPC, Abdelmalek Droudkal a.k.a. Abou Mossaâb Abdelouadoud had placed one Abou Houraira (real name unknown) in charge of a brigade operating “to the west” (no further detail). Jihadist noms de guerre are very much a mix-and-match affair, with the same elements frequently reused by various individuals, which makes identification on the basis of a konya^[6] alone something of a hazardous undertaking. It is nonetheless worth noting that signatories of both the March 2014 communiqué and the June 30 statement of allegiance to the Abu Bakr Al-Baghdadi include an Abou Khaled Abderrahmane and an Abou Houraira Thabet. Although fragmentary, these details do seem to suggest that there may be a degree of continuity between the Central Region of the GSPC/AQMI as it was in the mid-2000s and the group that began issuing statements in the name of the Central Region in March of this year.

While not altogether unheard of, appending a list of several signatories to a communiqué rather than just the name of the group's emir or simply the name of the organisation has not been the usual practice in the Algerian jihadist movement^[7]. The inclusion of such lists at the end of both the March communiqué and the June 30 statement of allegiance may perhaps be indicative of the seriousness of the controversy over what attitude to take towards ISIS: assuming that at least some of the noms de guerre are known within the broader jihadist movement (as they might be expected to be if, as we have postulated, some are “historic” figures of the GSPC/AQMI), citing them would in itself be a sort of argumentum ad verecundiam. The slight differences between the list of signatories on the March communiqué and that on the June 30 statement of allegiance may also be significant. Four names included in the former are absent from the latter: Abou Souheïb Oussama (identified in March as the group's Emir), Sheikh Ahmed (its treasurer), Abou Fadl Oussama (its media manager) and Abou Youssef Abdelkahar (the head of its diwan, or secretariat). The implication is that they may have been unwilling to take the final leap of swearing allegiance to Abu Bakr Al-Baghdadi, a particularly serious step insofar as it appears to have consummated the split with AQMI: in its June 30 statement, the group no longer self-identifies as AQMI–Central Region but “Islamic Maghreb – Central Region (Algerian Front^[8])”.

Iraq has had a special significance for the Algerian jihadist movement for a good decade. It was, after all, as a consequence of its direct contacts with Al-Qaeda in Iraq (probably established by Algerian volunteers fighting American forces in Iraq) that the GSPC's embattled leadership opted to join Al-Qaeda in September 2006 and formally change the group's name to Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb in January of the following year. It is possible that Abdelmalek Droudkel chose his present konya in imitation of Al-Qaeda in Iraq's founder and leader Abu Mus'ab Al-Zarqawi – whose own organisation, since his death in June 2006, has evolved into ISIS. But AQMI's national leadership and the Central Region are not merely at odds over a matter of sentimental attachment. Their dispute is evolving to encompass substantive differences over issues of tactics, strategy and even theology: what degree of priority to give to which theatre of jihad (their home turf or the more dynamic and seemingly more promising struggle in Syria and Iraq); the relevance of maintaining allegiance to Al-Qaeda's international leadership; whether or not now is the opportune moment to attempt to restore the caliphate, in theory the ultimate goal of many if not all jihadist movements; and so on.

Working on the assumption that the Central Region communiqués are authentic, these differences already appear to have led to an organisational split between the two tendencies. To judge by the history of insurgencies in general and of the Algerian jihadist movement in particular, the logical next step would seem to be physical confrontation between the rival groups – a prospect that would be all the more likely if, as is generally assumed, AQMI's national leadership is still based in the organisations historic heartland in the forests and mountains of Kabylia, spread across the Wilayas of Tizi Ouzou, Bouira and Boumerdes, i.e. the Central Region's presumed territory.

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
 President and CEO
 The Gabriel Company, LLC
 1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
 Washington DC, 20005
 Phone: +1 202.887.1113
 Fax: +1 202.887.1115
 Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
 Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

-
- [1] “El Âssemi” meaning “from the capital”, indicating that he hails from Algiers.
- [2] Abou Slimane Khaled, Abou Abdallah Athmane [clearly the same individual as Abou Abdallah El Âssemi], Abou Meriem Abdallah, Abou Amama Yaacoub, Abou Houraira Thabet, Abou Oussama Laayachi, Abou Khaled Abderrahmane and Abou Abdallah Lokmane, “together with all the mujahidin”.
- [3] The list of signatories is slightly longer and more detailed than for the June 30 statement of allegiance, comprising: Abou Soheib Oussama (Emir of the Central Region), Abou Abdallah Athmane (Qadi of the Central Region), Abou Amama Yaacoub (head of the Sharia Committee), Abou Slimane Khaled (head of the Military Committee), Abou Khaled Abderrahmane Zitouni (in charge of training), Abou Meriem Abdallah (in charge of arms manufacturing), Abou Houraira Thabet (in charge of communications), Sheikh Ahmed (Treasurer), Abou El Fadl Oussama (in charge of media), Abou Oussama Laayachi (head of the medical department), Abou Youssef Abdelkahar (head of the Secretariat of the Central Region).
- [4] Groupe Salafiste pour la Prédication et le Combat, or Salafist Group for Preaching and Struggle.
- [5] Born in Algiers in 1967, joined the islamist insurgency as of 1993.
- [6] The “Abou X” part of the pseudonym.
- [7] Intriguingly, Abdelmalek Droudkel a.k.a. Abou Moussab Abdelouadoud, still nominally the national emir of AQMI, has not signed a communiqué since late 2012. He last appeared in a video message issued in early December 2012.
- [8] Thaghr Al-Jaza'ir – the word thaghr in Islamic jurisprudence designating a zone situated between the territory ruled by the Muslim community or state and the lands of the infidels

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Wednesday, July 16, 2014 9:57 AM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: WS situation report: not confirmed by independent 3rd party sources

1)

According to member of Polisario's National Secretariat, the visit to the Canary Islands by a small Polisario delegation [including Speaker of the Saharawi National Council Khatri Addouh and Polisario's representative in Spain Bouchraya Bayoun] during the second week of July had nothing to do with the fisheries agreement between Morocco and European Union [against which Polisario has been campaigning vigorously]. The main object of the visit, the National Secretariat member said, was to sign a number of agreements providing for aid for Saharawi refugees [in the Tindouf camps] on the one hand and Canary Island regional government grants for Saharawi students studying at Spanish universities.

2)

The same National Secretariat member denied reports that SADR President and Polisario General Secretary Mohamed Abdelaziz will not be invited to attend the investiture of the newly re-elected President of Mauritania. Relations between the SADR and Mauritania are "at their best", according to the source

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Sunday, July 20, 2014 3:59 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: FW: Do you agree the WINEP article should be translated and sent to Rabat?
Attachments: WashingtonInstitutelSISMaroc15Juillet2014.docx

Attached is a report of the Washington Institute for Near East Studies (WINEP), concerning the Islamic problems in Morocco, FYI. Thank you, Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

TRADUCTION NON-OFFICIELLE

POLICYWATCH 2283

L'État Islamique s'en Prend aux Islamistes du Maroc

Vish Sakthivel

15 juillet 2014

En critiquant les factions islamistes non violentes diverses du Maroc en ligne, les membres d'ISIS/IS tentent de semer les graines de l'opposition violente enhardi dans le royaume.

L'État islamique d'Irak et al-Sham (ISIS) s'est récemment déclaré simplement « l'Etat islamique" (IS), » annonçant un «retour au califat. » Et en dépit de sa mise au point nominale sur le Levant et du Mashreq, il a clairement se penché sur le Maghreb aussi. Dans une vidéo publiée plus tôt ce mois-ci, plusieurs membres du groupe ont dénoncé les islamistes marocains clés, en soulignant les retombées potentiellement profondes des crises en Irak et en Syrie.

QUI A ETE CIBLE, ET POURQUOI

Étonnamment, le Roi Mohammed VI, une cible constante de la rhétorique djihadiste - plus récemment par Al-Qaïda au Maghreb Islamique (AQMI) - n'a pas été mentionné dans la vidéo sermon. Pourtant, les Marocains qui ont été choisis pour l'opprobre ne sont pas vraiment une surprise.

Le premier était Omar Haddouchi, anciennement du groupe marocain Salafia Jihadia. Au cours des dernières années, dans le but d'intégrer les salafistes radicaux, le roi a montré grâce aux salafistes emprisonnés impliqués dans les attentats de Casablanca en 2003, y compris Haddouchi. À leur tour, ces salafistes ont assoupli - même inversée- leur critique du monarque (pour en savoir plus sur cette tendance, voir « Y salafistes politiques du Maroc souscrites à la paix? »). Haddouchi, à la mode nouvellement monarchiste, a souvent dénoncé l'implication de jeunes marocains dans le « jihad en Syrie. » Et le 1^{ère} juillet, pour démontrer l'illégitimité de toute allégeance faite au « calife » IS Abou Bakr al-Baghdadi, il a également cité un hadith du Prophète qui dit: « toute personne prêtant allégeance à un étranger sans l'approbation de, ou en consultation avec le ensemble de la communauté musulmane, est admissible à la peine de mort. »

En réponse, la vidéo est sévèrement censuré Haddouchi pour avoir rejoint le roi à décourager les jeunes de se joindre à la lutte - en particulier lorsque la lutte contre l'extrémisme et le recrutement provenant du Maroc à la Syrie a été un sorte de problématique important pour le monarque sur la scène régionale. La vidéo a également plaint que Haddouchi préféré soutenir « ses frères démocratiques et les aider dans leur détresse" » au lieu de sauvegarder «les initiatives de vrais djihadistes. » Deux autres dirigeants de Salafia Jihadia - Abou Hafs et Hassan al-Kettani - ont été choisis pour la critique ainsi.

En outre, la vidéo est s'emporta contre Parti de la Justice et Développement au Maroc (PJD), une faction opposition-monarchiste islamiste, se référant à un membre du parti et Ministre de la Justice marocain Mustafa Ramid le « ministre de l'injustice. » Cela vient trop peu surprenant - alors que le PJD a des racines dans le groupe clandestine, contestataire Shabiba Islamiyah, , ses membres ont abandonné le discours sur un «Etat islamique» et même la charia en faveur de la participation politique, sans doute sous la conviction qu'ils peuvent prendre les « petits pas » islamiques de l'intérieur. Pour sa part, Ramid - une fois une figure anti-roi virulente - a fait des décisions diverses avec le palais en tant que Ministre de la Justice. Un exemple célèbre est venu au sommet des soulèvements de 2011 et la répression du gouvernement, quand il a cherché à dissimuler la torture par des agents du palais et avait nié publiquement l'existence de prisonniers politiques dans le pays.

Une autre cible de la vidéo est le défunt Cheikh Abdessalam Yassine, le guide suprême du groupe islamiste interdit Al-Adl wal-Ihsan (AWI, ou Justice et Bienfaisance). Ancien membre de rang du soufi marocain zawiyah (école religieuse / monastère), il a été décrit dans la vidéo comme inauthentique et comme un « polythéiste. » C'est une accusation assez commune portée contre les soufis, dont beaucoup cherchent la bénédiction de saints locaux. Cette vénération des saints et les pèlerinages aux mausolées a saigné en rituel marocain ordinaire, au grand dam des salafistes et autres extrémistes locaux. Il a également fourni du carburant aux groupes islamistes transnationaux qui cherchent à discréditer l'islam marocain. Les plus importantes, les soufis marocains - y compris Yassine, qui a cherché à islamiser lentement le pays - ont généralement été antipathiques et insensibles aux approches coraniques littérales des groupes djihadistes. En tant que tel, la décision de cibler Yassine est également surprenant: bien qu'il était (et AWI reste) farouchement anti-roi, croyant que toute monarchie contrevient l'islam, même cette position n'est pas suffisante pour l'IS.

MENACANT LE MAROC

Après les commentaires contre Yassine et les autres islamistes, huit membres marocains sont apparus dans la vidéo. Parler un mélange d'arabe et le dialecte marocain (darija), ils ont averti qu'ils "ont l'intention de faire le djihad sur le sol marocain", ajoutant qu'ils sont heureux "d'être en capacité d'aider le califat" et qu'ils sont « prêts à installer ce système de règle au Maroc ».

Ces messages sont particulièrement importants pour deux raisons: (1) ils confirment l'approche d'exclusion du groupe à l'islam et à la gouvernance islamique – AQMI a principalement passé critiques contre le souverain marocain non-islamiste et « moderne, » ISIS / IS critique les islamistes en premier lieu, les dépeignant comme insuffisants, inauthentiques, même kuffar (infidèles); et (2) ils élaborent la menace que pose l'IS à l'Etat marocain et le Maghreb en général. Par exemple, Oumou Adam Fatiha Mejjati, une salafiste marocaine bien connue femme connue sous le nom « Black Widow d'al-Qaïda, » a tweeté son serment d'allégeance à al-Baghdadi le 29 Juin, le reconnaître comme calife et lui conférant le titre d'Amir al-Mouminin (commandeur des croyants) - une étiquette réservée, au Maroc, pour le roi. D'autres salafistes locaux ont emboîté le pas. Le 9 Juillet, Mejjati a tweeté qu'elle avait déménagé en Syrie pour rejoindre ISIS - une évolution inquiétante et révélatrice. Son mari, Karim Mejjati, a été fondateur défunt du Groupe Islamique Combattant Marocain (MICG) et a été tué en Arabie Saoudite. Les personnalités comme ceux-ci et leur capacité à influencer les autres disciples sont probablement ce qui a conduit Haddouchi, un nouveau contrepoids de palais contre les forces salafistes extrêmes, de se prononcer contre l'annonce de califat.

Alors que les Marocains ordinaires n'ont pas été visiblement émus par ISIS/IS, le groupe a couvert toutes les bases en attaquant un large éventail de personnalités islamistes locales: selon son récit, pas de type de l'islam ou l'islamisme au Maroc est haqiqi (authentique). La vidéo a clarifié les intentions du groupe dans les pays du Maghreb et a cherché à transformer les jeunes marocains à l'écart des nombreuses options islamiques/ islamistes non-violents dans leur pays, que ce soit la dernière tendance pro-roi salafiste, l'itinéraire politique du PJD, ou la route activiste de l'AWI. Les citoyens ont déjà été recrutés dans plusieurs groupes extrémistes de défense en Syrie, y compris le bataillon majorité-marocain Harakat Sham al-Islam, le filiale d'al-Qaïda Jabhat al-Nusra, Ahrar al-Sham, et l'IS, qui compte près d'un millier de membres marocains (pour en savoir plus sur ce type de recrutement, voir « Résistant les Ralliés Marocains de la Syrie »).

Le palais n'a pas encore publié une déclaration sur la vidéo elle-même. La réponse du roi sera révélatrice sur deux fronts: comment Rabat se positionne comme une autorité politique régionale, et s'il approfondit son utilisation des outils symboliques/ rhétoriques dans la lutte contre le recrutement et l'extrémisme chez soi. La décision récente du roi d'interdire les chefs religieux de participer à toute forme d'activité politique ou syndicale peut être indicative de ce dernier.

CONSÉQUENCES POUR LA POLITIQUE US

Compte tenu des tendances régionales en cours - avec la dynamique du Levant débordant souvent au Maghreb au fil du temps, et de l'instabilité qui sévit dans le Sahel - Maroc doit se préparer à la possibilité d'une opposition violente enhardi dans les années à venir. L'État islamique fonctionne de plus en plus sur l'hypothèse arrogante qu'une large bande de musulmans dans le monde soutiennent sa cause, encourageant davantage le groupe à élargir le recrutement dans le Maghreb. Les groupes extrémistes ont également creusé dans les poches des différents pays de la région, et dans les espaces non gouvernés de la grande Sahel.

Les pays du Maghreb tiennent une importance stratégique pour les États-Unis en grande partie en raison de leur relative stabilité dans une région instable, leur engagement à l'amitié avec Washington, et leur dévouement pour endiguer l'influence croissante de l'AQMI. Maroc, un allié clé à cet égard, n'est pas terriblement affligé par le terrorisme domestique pour le moment, mais ses citoyens sont recrutés à des mouvements violents avec une régularité déconcertante. Le nombre de marocains en Irak et en Syrie a explosé dans la dernière année seulement.

Ainsi, alors que l'empreinte d'IS sur cette région ne peut devenir évidente aujourd'hui ou demain, les développements actuels à l'intérieur et à travers le Maroc mettent en évidence la nécessité d'une action rapide. En particulier, Washington et Rabat doivent redoubler d'efforts sur l'échange de renseignements sur le recrutement dans des groupes extrémistes armés. Les États-Unis devraient également continuer à aider les gouvernements du Maroc et d'autres maghrébins sur contre radicalisation et d'autres initiatives préventives importantes, ainsi que sur l'interrogation des arrêtées sur les facteurs qui les ont poussés à quitter le Maroc et les a entraînés dans la guerre en Syrie. En outre, le palais pourrait offrir des avantages pour convaincre le nombre augmenté, mais encore gérable, de djihadistes ralliés à abandonner leur mode de vie, faisant la lutte contre les facteurs d'incitation qui ont conduit à leur départ. Enfin, comme le recrutement a lieu principalement chez les jeunes radicaux, Washington pourrait encourager le gouvernement marocain de stimuler les voix comme Haddouchi, qui pourraient être utilisés pour couvrir celles des figures telles que Mejjati.

TRADUCTION NON-OFFICIELLEALGÉRIE : RAPPORT DE SITUATION MENSUEL #137*18 juillet 2014*Résumé*Les Tendances Politiques

- La vie politique, et même et la prise de décision de base dans le secteur public, semblent être en grande partie sur le verrouillage en attendant l'achèvement du processus de révision de la Constitution en automne.
- Avec le président Bouteflika affaibli par l'âge et la mauvaise santé, le pouvoir exécutif est apparemment géré par ses courtisans, dont les intrigues ont abouti au licenciement d'une partie des aides les plus anciens de Bouteflika. Les Sources divergent en ce qui concerne qui a la haute main à la présidence – s'il est le chef du cabinet du Président Ahmed Ouyahia ou son frère et conseiller Saïd.
- Le secteur du pétrole et du gaz est signalé à être sous l'autorité d'un triumvirat composé de M. Ouyahia, Ministre adjoint de la Défense et CoS Gaïd Saleh, et Ministre de l'Énergie Yousfi.
- Le cycle annuel de promotions militaires pourrait vu l'onction des futurs chefs de la gendarmerie et, éventuellement, la DRS.

Les Relations Etrangères

- Les événements au Mali, en Tunisie et, en particulier, la Libye ce mois-ci confirment que l'objectif principal de la politique régionale de l'Algérie doit rester pour l'avenir prévisible, la « arc de crise » à l'est et au sud.
- Le rôle de premier plan pris par l'Algérie et l'Égypte à une réunion récente des voisins de la Libye, et la visite du Président égyptien Al-Sisi à Alger, semblent pointer vers l'émergence d'un axe algéro-égyptienne.
- Dans le même temps, il y a eu une nouvelle poussée dans la guerre des mots entre Alger et Rabat, après la décision de l'Union Africaine de nommer un envoyé spécial pour le Sahara Occidental.
- La dernière prise de bec entre l'Algérie et le Maroc est une nouvelle manifestation de la longue guerre d'usure entre les deux pays pour l'influence en Afrique.

La Sécurité

- Les niveaux d'activité djihadiste enregistrés ont été exceptionnellement faibles au cours du mois passé. Même si cela peut être dû en partie à un black-out médiatique sur les nouvelles liées à la sécurité au long des frontières orientales et méridionales, il semble également de refléter un véritable recul de l'activité dans ce qui a été longtemps considéré comme le cœur de l'AQMI en Kabylie et les approches orientales à Alger.
- La baisse de l'activité en Kabylie pourrait être liée à une scission qui s'est ouvert entre la direction nationale de l'AQMI et la Région Centrale de l'organisation sur l'attitude à adopter « le califat » proclamé au début du Ramadan par l'Etat Islamique en Irak et Syrie.

- Il y a des petits signes que la controverse agitée par le nouveau «Califat» peut également provoquer des divisions au sein de l'organisation Al-Mourabitoun de Mokhtar Belmokhtar.
- Le petit groupe Fils du Sud pour le Mouvement Justice Islamique a annoncé un cessez-le-feu, qui semble présager sa dissolution et une amnistie pour ses membres.
- Les nouveaux bouleversements pourraient être à venir dans le cadre des enquêtes de corruption à Sonatrach, cette fois affectant les sociétés de sécurité privées qui servent l'industrie du pétrole et du gaz.

Political Trends

After a brief spurt of political activity following the April 17 presidential election, Algeria appears to be back in the doldrums once again. With a scant few exceptions – the new Minister for Religious Affairs's controversial decision to allow the re-opening of synagogues in Algeria, for example – cabinet ministers appear to be reduced to sitting on their hands, unable to take any decisions of major importance or even, it has been claimed, reshuffle the heads of the departments or state-owned companies that fall under their remit. There have also been reports that Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal has been refused permission to make limited changes to his cabinet line-up[1] (which, it is true, only dates from early May). The stock response from the Presidency, according to Algerian press reports, is that everything must wait until after the constitutional amendment process has been completed – which could take another three or four months.

This state of affairs is strongly reminiscent of the gridlock that prevailed in the year prior to April 17, when decision-making throughout much of the administration was effectively put on hold pending the presidential election, against a background of sharp differences between members of the ruling elite over the wisdom of having Bouteflika run for a fourth term of office despite his stroke. We argued in May that while the re-election of Bouteflika may have settled the immediate question of the succession, it was likely to be posed anew relatively quickly, and that the rifts between the various factions, and within them, would be likely to come increasingly into the open.

Recent reports of the surprise dismissal of several long-standing presidential aides may not amount to open factional warfare, but they do suggest that the situation created by the re-election of a severely weakened president is already generating some unseemly palace intrigues. Bouteflika advisors Mohamed Meguedem, Mohamed Touati and Rachid Aïssat have all been given their marching orders, along with the President's private secretary Mohamed Rougab. Meguedem had held a variety of positions at the Presidency since the Chadli era, Aïssat and Rougab have been part of Bouteflika's inner circle since the early days of his first term of office, while Touati (a former general, once known as “the brains” of the army) rapidly became a permanent fixture at El Mouradia palace after retiring from the military and being appointed security advisor to the President in the early 2000s. In the case of Meguedem, El Watan (15/07/14) attributes his dismissal to the influence of national police chief (DGSN) Maj-Gen. Abdelghani Hamel[2], and while the daily's claim that Hamel feared Meguedem was after his job scarcely rings true, it is known that there had been deep suspicion between the two for several months. Sources at the Presidency to whom we have been able to talk, meanwhile, give contrasting explanations of the sudden cull. One mid-ranking civil servant assured us: The decision had been on the way ever since the presidential election campaign, when Bouteflika's chief of staff (directeur de cabinet) Ahmed Ouyahia became infuriated by repeated interference from Mohamed Meguedem, who claimed to be acting on behalf of the President and Saïd Bouteflika. Meguedem had – or at least said he had – the support of Mohamed Touati and the President's private secretary Mohamed Rougab, and dragged other officials at the Presidency in as well: he even took the initiative of contacting the rival candidate, Ali Benflis, using Rachid Aïssat as an intermediary, without informing Ahmed Ouyahia. All through the election campaign, Meguedem insinuated that he was acting in complete harmony with Tewfik, and on occasion even claimed to be speaking in his name, in Ouyahia's presence. Ouyahia at one point threatened to resign if “this nonsense”, as he put it, didn't stop. After the campaign, it was actually Tewfik who carried out the operation that culminated in the decision to dismiss all those who had had a hand in this interference, notably Rougab, Meguedem, Touati and Aïssat. As a consequence, Ahmed Ouyahia is now in command, with the blessing of Tewfik and also of Saïd Bouteflika, who had no choice because Tewfik had prepared a solid dossier (including photos, witness statements and wire taps) against Meguedem's friends.

A presidential staffer, on the other hand, dismisses the idea that Maj-Gen. Hamel or Ahmed Ouyahia could have had the clout to drive out Bouteflika's longest serving advisors, arguing emphatically that only Saïd Bouteflika had both the power and the motive to organise such a cull. This would indeed be coherent with reports we received on more than one occasion earlier this year to the effect that Saïd was acting as grand chamberlain to his brother, filtering all information the President receives, and even growing into the role of regent – a situation, we were given to understand, that was viewed with resentment and suspicion by at least some of the President's advisors.

Whether the dismissals were the work of Saïd or Ouyahia, however, the one thing that both accounts have in common is the lack of agency of Bouteflika himself, suggesting that the executive branch is now being run not by the President but by his courtiers. Hence, according to an executive at Sonatrach's legal department, the crucial oil and gas sector is now being overseen by a triumvirate:

Over the past few weeks, three leading figures have been holding regular meetings to discuss matters relating to Sonatrach: Ahmed Ouyahia, Deputy Defence Minister Lt-Gen. Gaïd Saleh, and Energy Minister Youcef Yousfi. Sonatrach CEO Abdelhamid Zerguine also attends sometimes, but only when he is invited to do so by the others. A rumour that Zerguine is on the way out, which started at the end of June, is still doing the rounds.

Meanwhile, the annual round of military promotions took place as usual at the beginning of July. Curiously, the full list of promoted officers has not yet been made public, but it has been possible to glean some details from partial press reports[3] and online discussion forums for Algerian military personnel. In all, some 89 officers are reported to have received promotions, 22 of them from the Gendarmerie and 67 from the army (although the latter figure may also cover the DRS). Of these, five Gendarmerie colonels and 51 Army colonels were promoted to the rank of general. No fewer than 16 Army generals were promoted to major-general, while the Gendarmerie saw just one officer, its chief of staff Menad Nouba elevated to this rank, the second highest rank in the Algerian armed forces. Menad Nouba appears to be in line to take over from Maj-Gen. Ahmed Boustila as Gendarmerie Commander[4]. At the same time, according to postings by Algerian military personnel in specialist online forums, the other 16 new major generals include at least three DRS officers: former DSI (internal security) chief Abdelkader Kherfi, a.k.a. "General Ahmed" (who was reported in early June to have begun working with Ahmed Ouyahia at the Presidency); Gen. Mokri, identified as the head of the DREC (the intelligence service's foreign liaison bureau); and current DSI chief Ali Bendaoud. The latter is particularly noteworthy in light of what we were told in May by a source close to the DRS, who suggested that the annual round of promotions should be watched closely for indications of who is being groomed for the top positions, adding that the promotion of Bendaoud to major general might be taken as a sign that he is on course to replace Tewfik at the head of the DRS.

Foreign Relations

Events across the region in mid-July – the outbreak of fighting between rival factions in Tripoli on July 13 that rendered the Libyan capital's international airport unusable; the killing of a French soldier in the Al-Moustarat area north of Gao by a suicide bomber belonging to Mokhtar Belmokhtar's Al-Mourabitoun organisation on July 14; the deaths of at least 14 Tunisian soldiers in a clash with armed islamists in the Djebel Chaambi area near the border with Algeria on July 16 – have provided further confirmation that the principal focus of concern for Algiers must remain, for the foreseeable future, the "arc of crisis" to the east and south, opened up by the fall of the Qaddafi regime in Libya.

Having unilaterally opted to take military action across the border in southern Libya as of late May, Algiers has over the last few weeks also been devoting at least some effort to the quest for a multilateral response to Libya's slow-motion collapse into a failed state. On July 14, Foreign Minister Ramtane Lamamra led an Algerian delegation to the 3rd ministerial conference of Libya's neighbouring countries in the Tunisian resort town of Hammamet, with Chad, Egypt, Niger, Sudan and Tunisia also attending the two-day event[5]. The meeting set up two commissions, the first of which was tasked with "examining military and security issues, including border surveillance" and is to be chaired by Algeria, while Egypt will be in charge of the second commission tasked with "contacting the political class and members of civil society in Libya" to facilitate the launching of a national dialogue. The two commissions are supposed to report back to the Tunisian foreign minister in the last week of July, ahead of the next meeting of Libya's neighbours during the first half of August. This initiative – together with Egyptian President Abdulfattah Al-Sisi's visit to Algiers on June 25, his first foreign trip since his election in May – seems to establish the premises for an Algerian-Egyptian axis of sorts. It might ultimately also provide the basis for an ex post facto legitimisation of Algeria's unannounced military intervention on Libyan territory, especially in light of a Libyan government statement issued on the eve of the Hammamet meeting in which it said it was "looking into the possibility of making an appeal for international forces on the ground to re-establish security and help the government impose its authority".

At the same time, there has been a renewed flare-up in tension between Algeria and its western neighbour and traditional rival, Morocco. Speaking at a public hearing before a parliamentary committee in Rabat on July 10, Moroccan Foreign Minister Salaheddine Mezouar condemned

Algeria's attitude on the question of Western Sahara as “pathetic”, causing howls of outrage in Algiers[6]. Referring to a decision by the African Union's Peace and Security Council in Malabo, Equatorial Guinea, at the end of June to appoint former Mozambican president Joaquim Chissano as the AU's special envoy for Western Sahara[7], Mezouar blustered:

Algeria uses all financial and logistical means to thwart the efforts of Morocco to find a resolution [to the Western Sahara question]. The latest thing was [the appointment of] the special envoy of the African Union. [...] When we see attempts by the Algerian regime to counter our efforts, we find that the methods used are really pathetic. Our conflict today is not with Polisario but with Algeria.

The Algerian ambassador to Rabat signalled his dissatisfaction by boycotting a meeting of Arab ambassadors convened by Mezouar the next day, while Algerian Foreign Ministry spokesman Benali Cherif made a long statement (dutifully reproduced by the government news agency APS) condemning the Moroccan Foreign Minister's “outrageously insulting declarations”:

The irresponsible remarks against Algeria made by senior Moroccan government officials mark a return to the Moroccan party's well-known lemming-like habits, which it revives whenever there is a step forward in the process of completing the decolonization of Western Sahara. [...] Morocco's setbacks and disappointments, which are the direct cause of these verbal excesses, obviously derive from its unilateral and unjustified demands with regard to the handling of the question of Western Sahara both at the African level and internationally. [...] Algeria, whose position on the question of Western Sahara sticks to the international consensus and the doctrine of the United Nations, can but firmly reject the false accusations made by the said Moroccan officials, and deeply regret such behavior which is in direct contradiction with the values shared by the brotherly Moroccan and Algerian peoples.

This exchange of brickbats between Rabat and Algiers is of course just the latest episode in an on-off series, against a backdrop of a diplomatic war of attrition between the two countries for influence in Africa. Perhaps the clearest manifestation of this over the past few months has been the Moroccan-Algerian rivalry in Mali, where Rabat has been striving to carve out a role for itself as a mediator between the central government and the rebel groups in the north, to the detriment of Algeria, which has traditionally treated Mali as its backyard. Although Morocco did seem to be having some success in pulling the rug from under the Algerians' feet earlier this year, hosting a couple of exploratory meetings, Algerian Foreign Minister Ramtane Lamamra appears to have taken back the initiative of late, embarking on another mini-African tour taking in Mali, Burkina Faso and Ghana[8], in early July before chairing the initial phase of the “Malian inclusive dialogue”, bringing together Mali's central government and northern rebel movements, in Algiers as of July 16[9]. At the same time, however, there are signs of increasing activity on another front in this diplomatic war: the African Union itself. Although Morocco is not a member of the AU, having withdrawn from its predecessor, the Organisation of African Unity, in 1984 after Polisario's Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR) was admitted as a member, it has of late been showing increasing interest in the organisation, for example sending Assistant Foreign Minister Mbarka Bouaida (who happens to be of Saharawi origin) to Addis Abeba in January of this year to lobby delegations attending the 22nd AU summit – the aim seeming to be to chip away at African support for the SADR and ultimately, perhaps, pave the way for its derecognition by the AU. Such is the background to Foreign Minister Mezouar's rather undiplomatic outburst in parliament over the AU Peace and Security Council's decision to appoint a special envoy for the Western Sahara – a decision that was adopted, according to a senior Polisario official, in spite of very active efforts by a “pro-Moroccan lobby” at the Malabo meeting to prevent it going through.

Security

The level of recorded jihadist activity in June was unusually low, with only three minor incidents reported, and this appearance of calm has continued into July, with two incidents reported so far. None of these incidents were around the country's borders.

While it is likely that an unannounced media blackout is keeping some incidents, especially along the eastern and southern borders, out of the news[10], the apparent lack of activity on the part of AQMI in the north of the country cannot be attributed solely to government censorship, insofar as AQMI is present on social media and regularly claims responsibility for operations it carries out. The fact that AQMI has signalled only two operations over the past couple of months leads us to believe the organisation has indeed scaled back its operations[11].

ALGIERS remained quiet over the past month. The only event of note was an alert issued by the US embassy on July 4, warning American citizens to stay away from American-owned hotels for July 4-5 since “an unspecified terrorist group may have been considering attacks in Algiers, possibly in the vicinity of a US branded hotel”. No such attacks transpired, however, and the alert appears to have been essentially a rote warning ahead of the United States' and Algeria's respective Independence Days.

KABYLIA was also quiet this past month, with no incidents reported at all. The last AQMI operation reported in Kabylia – generally held to be the jihadist group's heartland – dates back to May 28, and the last security forces operation took place on June 4. Further to the EAST, the army was reported by L'Expression to be conducting a “major search and destroy mission” in the wilayas of Skikda, Jijel and Annaba around July 15, including bombardment of sites where jihadists were believed to be hiding. Unusually, the bloodiest incident of the past month was in the WEST of the country: according to an official statement from the Defence Ministry, a roadside bomb killed three soldiers and four members of the Garde communale on July 12 near Sidi Chaïb, wilaya of Sidi Bel Abbès (a region that has seen only sporadic jihadist activity over recent years)[12]. The army launched a search and destroy mission in the area. On July 17, the army ambushed and killed two jihadists in Beni Mileuk, wilaya of Tipaza.

With the oil and gas producing SOUTH (ostensibly) quiet throughout the month, an executive at Sonatrach's legal department, speaking to us in mid-July, has shed new light on the lack of progress in the much talked about plans to forge a new security structure for the oil and gas sector out of the myriad private security companies that currently exist:

The signs are that there will soon be new developments in the Sonatrach corruption cases soon. The Gendarmerie has taken over from the DRS in running the investigations. In the past few weeks there have been investigations concerning the Skikda LNG complex and one of Sonatrach Downstream's departments in Oran. The Gendarmerie has also been running checks on oilfield service companies and security companies in Ghardaia, Hassi Messaoud and Illizi, and we are now expecting there to be arrests, transfers of Sonatrach managers away from their present jobs and cancellations of the licences of a number of oilfield services companies and security outfits.

Meanwhile, in a video communiqué dated June 3 (but posted to YouTube on June 20) Abdessalam Tarmoune, leader of the Sons of the Sahara for Islamic Justice, announced a ceasefire. In the communiqué – in reality more of a long and rambling sermon than a structured statement – Tarmoune, after what seems to be a pro forma promise to continue the “jihad” against the corrupt regime, explicitly thanks Prime Minister Abdelmalek Sellal for his role in negotiating the ceasefire, and for standing up to opposition from the “eradicator wing” (his words) to including the Sons of the Sahara in the national reconciliation process – implying that the group's members are likely to be amnestied in the near future[13]. Filmed in the Tassili n'Ajjer mountains of the far south-east, where Tarmoune's group, believed to be about one hundred strong, has been holed up for months, the rest of the video is essentially a homily encouraging the youth of the south to devote themselves to education, marriage and work.

Leading Arabic-language daily Al Khabar (24/06) subsequently reported that negotiations with the Sons of the South began in February 2013 and were conducted initially in the greatest secret, with only PM Sellal, President Bouteflika and “a few top military and security officials” informed. According to Al-Khabar, Sellal delegated responsibility for conducting the negotiations, which had been dragging on fruitlessly, to DGSN chief Abdelghani Hamel and “certain Army officers”, among them the commander of the 4th Military Region[14]. The delay in reaching an agreement prior to that is said to have been due to the “lack of trust between Abdeslam Tarmoune and the negotiators from the DRS”, Tarmoune being considered “treacherous” by many members of the security services for having taken advantage of the national reconciliation pact and then going on to join MUJAO alongside Lamine Bencheneb[15]; Al-Khabar goes on to suggest that the negotiations with the Sons of the Sahara may have made it possible to collect a wealth of intelligence on MUJAO.

In principle, of course, MUJAO no longer exists as an independent group, having merged with Belmokhtar's group in August 2013 to form a new organisation named Al-Mourabitoun. Strikingly, one of MUJAO's founders, Hamad bin Mohamed al-Chenguiti, who is believed to be a member of the leadership council of Al-Mourabitoun, issued a statement from northern Mali on July 13 stating his full support for the so-called “Caliphate” proclaimed on June 29 by the Al-Qaeda breakaway group Islamic State in Iraq and Syria. Chenguiti seemed however to be speaking in his own name rather than representing any specific group, signing simply as “the former head of Islamic courts in Gao[16]” and making no reference to either MUJAO or Al-Mourabitoun. It may be recalled that Mokhtar Belmokhtar himself issued a statement reaffirming and renewing his allegiance to Ayman Zawahiri, the emir of Al-Qaeda's international leadership, on April 30, at a time when the worldwide jihadist movement was becoming embroiled in controversy after Zawahiri had disavowed the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria due to its repeated clashes with another Al-Qaeda affiliate, the Nusra Front, in Syria. This apparent divergence between Al-Chenguiti and Belmokhtar's statements suggests that the successes in the field of ISIS (or the Islamic State as it is now calling itself) and its proclamation of the “Caliphate” may have opened up rifts in Al-Mourabitoun.

If so, Al-Mourabitoun would by no means be alone. While the Islamic State's call on Muslims everywhere to swear allegiance to the new “Caliph”, Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, may have been greeted with bewilderment by most ordinary Muslims, to jihadist groups — which take the notion of caliphate seriously and claim to be fighting to unite the “Muslim nation” into a single Islamic state — this is an extremely serious matter. ISIS’ stunning breakthrough in western Iraq in late June and Al-Baghdadi’s claim of universal dominion over Muslims have forced other jihadist groups to take position for or against the “Caliphate”, and by extension for or against Zawahiri. Al-Baghdadi’s declaration has drawn sharp criticism from some of the most respected international theorists of jihad, including Jordanian ideologues Abu Muhammad al-Maqdisi and Abu Qatada, who have argued that a unilateral declaration of caliphate is meaningless and that only a “council of elders” may appoint a caliph. But this has not stopped several fighting groups on the ground declaring allegiance to ISIS and its leader.

These include a group presenting itself as AQMI's Central Region[17], which on June 30, just hours after the proclamation of the Caliphate by Al-Baghdadi's group, issued a short written communiqué, signed by all the members of its Shura Council, formally declaring the group's allegiance to “the venerable sheikh and servant of God, Ibrahim Bin Awad Al-Quraishi Al-Baghdadi Abu Bakr, the Caliph of the Muslims”. This was the latest and most explicit in a series of statements from the group this year stating its admiration and support for ISIS – in apparent contradiction with the line of AQMI's national leadership, which has been more inclined to restate its allegiance to Zawahiri.

The national leadership effectively replied to the Central Region in a statement posted online around July 15 (though dated July 4):

We have kept quiet so far for fear of adding more fuel to the fire of discord, but now we feel the need to make our position clear. The caliphate is the goal of all true mujahidin. [...] But declaring an Islamic caliphate is a momentous decision that requires broad consultation. How can you declare a caliphate without consulting with other jihad groups and [leading jihad theorists]? And what about Molla Omar of the Taliban? What about Sheikh Ayman Zawahiri? What about all the other branches of Al-Qaeda?... AQMI invites leading emirs and sheikhs — including Abu Mohamed al-Maqdisi, Abu al-Walid al-Ghazzi, Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, Molla Omar, Ayman Zawahiri, Sheikh Nasser al-Wuhaishi[18], Abu al-Zubeir, Abu Mohamed al-Joulani[19], and others — to discuss the issue among themselves and come to terms; and AQMI will be the first to submit to their decision. [...] Meanwhile we maintain our allegiance to Sheikh Ayman Zawahiri, for it is legally binding and we have seen nothing that would lead us to change that.

Thus the split between the national leadership and the units active in Kabylia and the eastern approaches of Algiers appears to have been consummated, after months of incipient tension – a development which may help to explain AQMI's declining effectiveness in what was long considered its heartland.

END

ALGERIA MONTHLY SITUATION REPORT #138August 31, 2014Executive SummaryALGÉRIE : RAPPORT DE SITUATION MENSUEL*31 août 2014RésuméTendances Politiques

- Après avoir purgé plusieurs aides présidentielles en juillet, la présidence a sommairement rejeté Abdelaziz Belkhadem en tant que Ministre d'Etat et Conseiller Spécial auprès du président, et donné des ordres pour son expulsion du FLN, le parti qu'il a dirigé une fois.
- En tant que «islamo-conservateur» et critique virulent de la conduite de l'Egypte durant de la crise à Gaza, Belkhadem a peut-être tombé sous le coup de la nouvelle alliance entre Alger et le Caire.
- L'axe algéro-égyptien survient en grande partie en réponse à l'effondrement continu de la Libye, ce qui semble également être l'une des raisons du nouveau poids accordé à la DRS dans la structure du pouvoir.
- Habilitée par un décret présidentiel rétablissant son service des enquêtes criminelles, la DRS a également repris son rôle de surveillance à la Sonatrach. Abdelhamid Zerguine, remplacé en tant que PDG de la Sonatrach après deux ans et demi de travail, semble avoir été une victime collatérale.

Relations Etrangères

- Bien que les responsables, à commencer par le Président Bouteflika continuent de s'accrocher publiquement à la ligne que l'Algérie ne s'ingère pas dans les affaires internes d'autres pays, sa longue doctrine de la non-intervention aurait été discrètement révisée pour permettre des opérations de sécurité transfrontalière s dans la défense des frontières de l'Algérie.
- Il est prétendu que le personnel militaire et de renseignement algérien est profondément impliqué dans la Tunisie et la Libye, et il y a eu des allégations selon lesquelles l'État-major a rédigé des plans d'urgence pour les grands raids aériens contre les groupes djihadistes en Libye.
- Bien que la plupart des signes pointent dans la direction de l'Egypte et des Emirats Arabes Unis, il existe des allégations selon lesquelles l'armée de l'air algérienne a peut-être été responsable pour deux raids aériens sur des cibles à Tripoli en août.
- Alors que la conversation entre Alger et Washington sur la situation en Libye est en cours, les responsables américains ne semblent pas favoriser une intervention militaire externe à ce stade.

Sécurité

- L'activité d'AQMI en Algérie a diminué au cours des deux dernières années à des niveaux historiquement bas en raison de multiples facteurs, notamment la réduction du recrutement, l'attrition par les forces de sécurité, et, plus récemment, une scission au sein de ses rangs concernant l'attitude à adopter face à « l'État Islamique » en Irak et Syrie.
- Il y a eu un certain nombre d'incidents au long des frontières orientales et méridionales du pays, et un affrontement à proximité de champs de gaz dans la wilaya de Ghardaïa, dans lequel un groupe armé a tenté d'intercepter un convoi de la Sonatrach.

- Un groupe d'experts en sécurité de la France, du Japon, des États-Unis, et de l'Italie a visité le sud-est de l'Algérie, à la recherche d'assurances que les frontières et les installations de pétrole et de gaz sont assurées de manière adéquate.
- Il semblerait que la police nationale cherche à acquérir des drones pour la sécurisation des installations pétrolières et gazières.

Political Trends

Following on from July's mini-purge of presidential aides, the past month has seen the surprise departure of two more senior officials. At the very end of July, after just over two and a half years in the job, Abdelhamid Zerguine was dismissed as Sonatrach CEO and replaced by Saïd Sahnoun (hitherto Vice President/Upstream). There has been no official explanation for Zerguine's dismissal – leaving the field wide open to speculation in the press. Then, on August 26, official news agency APS dropped a political bombshell in the form of a dispatch quoting a “source at the Presidency” as announcing that:

President Bouteflika has signed a decree terminating the functions of Abdelaziz Belkhadem as Minister of State and Special Advisor to the President of the Republic, as well as all activities related to the overall structures of the state. The Secretary General of the FLN has [also] been contacted in order to take the necessary steps to terminate all Abdelaziz Belkhadem's functions within the party and ban him from participation in any of its structures.

Again, no explanation was offered by APS or its source at the Presidency for this abrupt political death sentence, which seemed eerily reminiscent of the days of the one-party state.

Given that Belkhadem's presidential ambitions were an open secret, his abrupt dismissal might be seen as another symptom of the inward-looking palace intrigues that cost the four unfortunate presidential aides their jobs in July. Some senior FLN members have suggested that Belkhadem's unsuccessful attempt to force entry into the June 24 Central Committee meeting, flanked by his ministerial bodyguards and claiming that he had been mandated by the President to settle the party's festering internal crisis, had so angered the President and his closest advisors that it was decided that he had to go. But it is possible that there may be a more substantive political dimension to Belkhadem's sudden termination.

Belkhadem has long been clearly identified as an “islamo-conservative”, or “barbe FLN” as those within the former single party who have sought to fuse Algerian nationalism with political Islam are often known. In the past, the Presidency has been happy enough to have Belkhadem on its team, as a gesture to conservative/moderate Islamist opinion. But Belkhadem's Islamist-tinged nationalism has led him of late to be openly critical of the conduct of various Arab regimes, and in particular of the Egyptian authorities' response to the Israeli offensive against Gaza. Unfortunately for Belkhadem, this comes at a time when Algiers, faced with a rapidly deteriorating situation in Libya, is forging a new axis with Cairo (and thus, indirectly at least, with its Saudi and Emirati backers, who have thrown their full weight behind President Abdulfattah Al-Sisi as a rampart against the Muslim Brotherhood and all its offshoots, including Hamas). In this context, Belkhadem clearly is no longer an appropriate choice as President Bouteflika's ‘Special Advisor’ and representative.

In this respect, it is worth noting a report that a bilateral Algerian-Egyptian security commission, made up of high-ranking intelligence officers from both countries, has been established to address the threat posed by the situation in Libya, with unnamed “security sources” quoted by Algerian daily El Watan (01/08/14) claiming that a delegation of DRS officers had been dispatched to Cairo “on orders from President Bouteflika” to establish a roadmap for strategic security cooperation on Libya. This may be a pointer to a subtle but important shift within the Algerian power structure. In earlier reports, we discussed the possibility that the DRS's position within the power structure might have suffered in 2012 and 2013 as a consequence of the twin crises in Mali and Libya, with the army emerging as the defender of the country's borders and main interlocutor of the Western powers and thereby profiting at the expense of the intelligence and security agency. Paradoxically, however, the prolongation of those crises, having stretched the regular armed forces to the limit, may now have paved the way for the return to grace of the DRS, whose services cannot be so easily dispensed with. This would seem to be what a retired Algerian general (now in private business, dealing with Tunisia) was suggesting when speaking to us in mid-August:

Algeria's national security doctrine is in the process of changing. Faced with mounting dangers in neighbouring countries, but also with foreign military interventions in those same countries, Algeria's sacrosanct principle of refusing to intervene militarily in the territory of any foreign country is giving way to a new doctrine. This new doctrine says that national security requires that our borders be protected, and this task must be addressed on the soil of any neighbouring country that harbours a threat to Algeria. It is the DRS that is responsible for the intellectual acrobatics required to justify abandoning the old doctrine, [DRS chief Gen. Mohamed] 'Tewfik' [Médiène] having won over President Bouteflika. [...] Bouteflika has no choice: he has to strengthen the DRS. The Army is being kept busy on the borders with Libya, Mali and Tunisia. And the domestic situation is becoming worrying, for two reasons: a return to the creation of terrorist sleeper cells to keep their struggle in neighbouring countries supplied, and a rise in the incidence of economic crimes.

Speaking to us ten days later, an official at Sonatrach's legal department drew a picture which seems to confirm that the DRS is bouncing back after a period of somewhat diminished power:

We are going back to the situation that prevailed before the changes within the DRS. Over the past few weeks, DRS officers have been returning to Sonatrach – and not just at group headquarters. The decision to bring back the DRS was taken in application of a presidential decree dated June 14 [sic] that bestows expanded powers on the DRS¹.

The same source at Sonatrach claims, furthermore, that the dismissal of Abdelhamid Zerguine “was one of the consequences of the return of the DRS”. The legal department official explains:

Various accumulated reasons led to his departure, but the first was his security plan for Sonatrach's sites and buildings. In a note to the Ministry [of Energy and Mining] he had advocated various measures, including the authorities supplying weapons to Sonatrach's security guards. After equipping Sonatrach's own security guards with weaponry appropriate to the threat [that Sonatrach's facilities face] in the initial phase, the measure would later be extended to include staff employed by private security companies. In writing his note, Zerguine drew on regulations dating back to the 1990s, i.e. before Bouteflika came to power. He had also adopted a stance of opposition to the government's decision in May to authorise shale gas production (although in fact, like many other Sonatrach managers, his position was not one of rejecting of shale gas outright but suggesting that development be postponed until the impact studies have been completed). As of June, he was no longer ‘covered’ by Energy and Mining Minister Youcef Yousfi or the Prime Minister. And so, at meetings at the Presidency, he was told that his management methods were not only responsible for the security lapses [in the oil and gas sector] but also for the decline in production at Hassi Messaoud and Hassi R’mel.

¹ This appears to refer to a presidential decree, actually dated June 11 and published in the official gazette of the Algerian Democratic People's Republic dated June 12, establishing a criminal investigations department (Service d'Investigation Judiciaire) within the DRS's Internal Security Directorate (DSI), replacing the old Service de Police Judiciaire which was dissolved in September of last year. According to the terms of the decree: “The activities of the Criminal Investigation Department of the Internal Security Directorate are to be carried out under the supervision of the Public Attorney and the control of the Indictments Division of each local jurisdiction, and in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Penal Code. [...] The Criminal Investigation Department of the Internal Security Directorate is tasked with handling [...] the prosecution of cases in connection with: homeland security, terrorism, subversion and organized crime. [...] Interventions [...] initiated outside the tasks and responsibilities conferred on this structure are prohibited.”

It might be argued that scapegoating Zerguine in this manner for problems that are, in fact, systemic harks back, like Belkhadem’s unceremonious dismissal, to the methods of the 1970s – were it not the most frequent fate of Sonatrach CEOs even in the post-single-party era².

Foreign Relations

In a speech to mark Algeria’s Veterans Day on August 20, read on his behalf by his advisor Mohamed Ali Boughazi, President Bouteflika revisited the theme of the threats to Algeria’s stability and integrity posed by the turmoil in neighbouring states, and restated Algiers’ traditional position of non-intervention in foreign countries:

The stability our country enjoys today [stands in contrast to] a background of regional and geostrategic upheavals which have unfortunately weakened many countries, in particular because of insufficient attachment to the values of unity and sovereignty and a poor understanding of the traps laid by those who are bent on sowing discord in order to divide and rule those societies.

[...]

We have opted for dialogue and good neighbourly relations with everyone, without seeking to interfere in the internal affairs of other states. Algeria will pursue its efforts to put a stop to hegemony, bloodshed and the dismantling of regimes, because the stability and security of our country are dependent on the stability, development and prosperity of our neighbours.

Such statements of principle, however, ring increasingly hollow. Over the past months, sources have alluded on more than one occasion to an Algerian military presence in neighbouring Libya, in direct contravention of Algeria’s long-established doctrine; more recently, a retired Algerian general, who is now in business and involved in trade with Tunisia, has told us that the official doctrine has been revised to bring it into line with the new realities (see above, Political Trends). The same source adds:

The Algerian army’s involvement in Tunisia and Libya goes beyond anything one could imagine. In Tunisia, Algerian officers in plain clothes are present on the ground, with a double mission: to train Tunisian military and security personnel in counter-terrorism, and to gather intelligence. Tunisia lacks effective intelligence structures and relies on collaboration with its allies. Algeria is gathering both TECHINT, including by satellite, and human intelligence. Tunisia and Algeria signed an agreement allowing for this in May³. Algeria has set up an intelligence processing and analysis centre in Skikda

² An alternative interpretation of Zerguine’s dismissal is that he was removed at the behest of public works tycoon Ali Haddad, whose plans to branch out into petrochemicals are said to have been hindered by Zerguine. Haddad is a close associate of President Bouteflika’s brother and eminence grise Saïd. While this version of events has mainly been propagated by Workers’ Party leader Louisa Hanoune, one usually well informed source with close knowledge of the workings of the Algerian power structure has also suggested to us that a clash with Ali Haddad and Saïd Bouteflika was at least part of the reason for Zerguine’s departure.

³ According to a “senior Algerian army officer” quoted by El Watan (04/08/14), who confirmed that Algerian military personnel are present in Tunisia, a secret agreement on border security was signed focussing on the situation in Tunisia and on the borders with Tunisia. Meanwhile, Algeria, which heads the security commission of the group of Libya's neighbours⁴, has been given a green light by the other member countries to take executive action in Libya. The army and the DRS are present on Libyan territory in all operational forms, with the primary objective of collecting human intelligence and building permanent intelligence-gathering channels. The Algerians have infiltrated some of the armed groups in Libya.

The foreign ministers of Libya's neighbours met again in Cairo on August 25, adopting a statement, drafted by Egypt, stressing "respect for Libyan unity and sovereignty and rejection of any interference in the country's internal affairs", while calling for "all militias to lay down their arms simultaneously" and "an immediate end to all military operations, in order to support the political process and reinforce the dialogue between all parties that have renounced violence". But as Libya descends into open warfare between a host of militias and political groups with islamist leanings on the one hand and a loose alliance of forces with generally more secularist inclinations on the other, such pious statements look increasingly like mere window dressing. The latter grouping – comprising the Zintan brigades from north-west Libya, forces in the east of the country loyal to former General Khalifa Haftar, and former interim Prime Minister Mahmoud Jibril's National Forces Alliance – clearly enjoys Egyptian support, and there have been insistent suggestions, including from US officials quoted anonymously by the New York Times (25/08/14), that two night-time air raids against islamist militias in Tripoli, first on August 18 and again a few days later, were carried out by the Emirati air force flying from Egyptian airbases (although Cairo and Abu Dhabi have officially denied involvement). There have been similar, but less widely reported, claims⁵ that the air raids, which are understood to have targeted a major arms depot in the Libyan capital that had fallen under the control of an islamist militia, may have been the work of the Algerian air force. This followed earlier suggestions in the Algerian and international media that "Algeria and Egypt have decided to provide air support to forces fighting the islamist insurgents" (Euronews, 28/07/14) and that the Algerian General Staff has been drawing up contingency plans for major bombing raids against targets in Libya should the situation deteriorate to the point of posing an imminent threat to Algerian national security⁶ (Al-Khabar, 14/08/14).

The situation in Libya was at the heart of American-Algerian conversations during the US-Africa Summit in Washington at the beginning of August, including talks between a delegation of high-ranking Algerian military officers who met discreetly with officials from the National Security Council. Such contacts have encouraged those media commentators on May 27 of this year, a copy of which was subsequently deposited with the United Nations. The agreement is said to provide for exchange of intelligence between the two countries and coordination of operations aimed at securing their common border.

⁴ See previous report.

⁵ Notably by Algerian defence specialist Akram Khariief, interviewed by Maghreb Emergent, 28/08/14.

⁶ According to the Arabic-language daily, the planning department of the Algerian General Staff has drawn up plans for major, but limited, air strikes against targets in Libya if (a) there are indications that a Libya-based jihadist group is planning a terrorist operation in Algerian territory, in particular against oil and gas industry targets in the south-east, or (b) if jihadists were to manage to seize power in Tripoli and attack Tunisia in support of similar groups operating in that country.

who are inclined to believe that Algiers has conducted air raids against targets in Libya to leap to the conclusion that any such action would have been undertaken with the blessing of the Western powers in general and the United States in particular. However, comments by the American officials quoted by the New York Times in the wake of the raids on Tripoli (albeit working on the assumption that they were the work of Egypt and the UAE) suggest to the contrary that Washington is not for now on the same page as Libya's largest and most potent neighbours: the airstrikes, the "fuming" US government officials are said to have argued, risked further inflaming the Libyan conflict even as the United Nations and Western powers were trying to broker a peaceful resolution. As Algiers continues cautiously to cultivate security relations with Washington, it would seem that there is still ample scope for disagreements over questions of strategy and tactics – which may be either eased or exacerbated by developments in the field over which neither, as things now stand, has very much influence.

Security

With only six incidents reported, of which two were operations initiated by AQMI, the level of political violence in July was slightly higher than in June, but still way below the trend in previous months. The relative calm continued into August, with only seven incidents reported up to Aug. 28, of which just three were initiated by jihadists or armed smugglers.

Looking back at trends over recent years, these figures represent a new phase in what seems to be a long-term decline in AQMI's capability to wage effective guerrilla warfare. In the two years to August 2013, AQMI averaged about 12-13 operations a month. The level of activity dropped abruptly after that to an average of about five operations a month from August 2013 to May 2014. Since late May there has been another drop, with AQMI barely mustering two or three operations a month in June, July and August. In reaction, the security forces too appear to have scaled back offensive operations inside Algeria.

There is no obvious single cause for this decline⁷. There does not seem to have been any major offensive or series of offensives by the security forces in the summer of 2013, or the spring of 2014. Prior to this, AQMI's forces, notably in its historic core areas in Kabylia, may have been depleted to some extent by the group's reported decision to send reinforcements from northern Algeria to boost the forces of its Saharan units after the jihadist takeover of northern Mali as of mid-2012, and to assist in the fight against the French intervention in Mali as of early 2013. But the number of fighters involved is hard to establish and may have been rather lower than the 'several hundred' claimed by some Western sources. AQMI's battle-readiness is likely to have been further damaged by the outbreak of dissident within its own ranks as of March of this year over the question of what attitude to take towards the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (since rebranded as the Islamic State), which appears to have resulted in an outright split between AQMI's national leadership and the organisation's "central region" (seemingly the operational units in the organisation's heartland in the Kabyle Wilayas of Tizi Ouzou, Boumerdes and Bouira)⁸. These factors aside, it is possible that the drop in recorded levels of jihadist activity as of the late summer of last year reflects a tipping point in the Algerian military's long war of attrition against AQMI and related groups: having seemingly slowed to a trickle⁹, recruitment of new fighters may no longer be sufficient to replace those killed in combat, resulting in a slow but steady decline in the organisation's ability to fight.

⁷ This analysis comes of course with usual caveats concerning incomplete data. The Algerian authorities seem to have limited reporting of security incidents as of late summer of 2013. However, these restrictions appear mainly to have applied to activity along the southern and eastern borders and have in any case been irregularly applied.

Indeed, AQMI itself implicitly admitted that it was suffering from the effects of attrition and struggling to maintain its numbers as far back as March 2013 when it issued a statement¹⁰ urging "the Muslim youth in the Maghreb and especially Tunisia" not to leave to take part in jihad in other countries unless forced by circumstances to flee, in which case they "would do better to join the jihad in the Islamic Maghreb, where your brethren in northern Mali are struggling in the face of the French Crusade, or in northern Algeria, where the need for men and materiel is pressing, after two decades of war against the infidels." That March 2013 communiqué drew attention for the first time to the possibility that AQMI might be facing competition from more 'fashionable' theatres of jihad, in particular Syria. There is now mounting evidence that recruitment is indeed taking place for groups active in Syria and, possibly, Libya. In June, it was reported that security forces in the Wilaya of Blida had dismantled a network that had been recruiting fighters for Syria, making a number of arrests. Speaking to us in early August, a retired senior Algerian army officer told us that there is currently "a return to the creation of terrorist sleeper cells to keep their struggle in neighbouring countries supplied" with fighters – a development which is being viewed with some concern by the Algerian military, according to the source.

Looking more closely at political violence region by region, no incidents were reported in ALGIERS, while KABYLIA saw a handful of clashes – the first since early June – including a search and destroy mission by the army, complete with "heavy aerial bombardment", in the wooded areas between Aït Chafaa and Zekri in the east of the Wilaya of Tizi Ouzou as of August 11.

⁸ In what appears to be an indirect response to a statement issued by AQMI's national leadership in early July restating the group's allegiance to Al-Qaeda's international leader Ayman Al-Zawahiri and disputing the legitimacy of the Islamic State's proclamation of a "caliphate", the Qadi [religious judge] of AQMI's Central Region Abou Abdallah Othmane Al-Asemi issued a new audio statement on or around July 17, in which he invites all Muslims to "hasten to declare allegiance to the Commander of the Believers, Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi al-Quraishi", IS leader and self-proclaimed Caliph. Abou Abdallah Al-Asemi goes on to invite jihadi fighters "not to hesitate, now that God has given you what you have been looking for", and concludes: "Before closing, I say to the noble sheikh, the Commander of the Believers Abu Bakr Al-Baghdadi: We are you soldiers in the land of Algeria, so go ahead to the aim that God has set for you, and we hope you will see from us what pleases your eyes."

⁹ There is in fact very little recent data about AQMI recruitment. It is striking, however, that out of the 15 or more fighters that appeared in a recently released video of the gathering at which AQMI's merger with the Defenders of Salafi Preaching group (see AMSR #131, 24/01/14), only one was clearly in his early 20s (the typical age bracket of new recruits), all the others appearing to be in their 30s and in many cases their late 40s. The video, which although it was released on August 10 appears to have been filmed in December 2013, prominently features AQMI's national emir Abdelmalek Droukdel, a.k.a. Abou Mossaâb Abdelouadoud – the first proof that he is still alive since an audio recording issued in late August 2012.

¹⁰ See AMSR #123, 19/04/13.

One incident was reported in the oil and gas producing areas of the SOUTH: on August 23, according to Arabic-language daily Echourouk, a Sonatrach convoy of four off-roaders, heading towards the gas fields south of Métlili in the Wilaya of Ghardaïa, was intercepted by an armed group at Hadb el-Troudi, deep in the desert, 80 km from the RN-1 (main north-south highway). The eight armed assailants made away with the vehicles, GPS devices and “some other equipment”. The Sonatrach workers were later rescued by helicopter and the security forces launched a search and destroy mission in the area.

Several incidents were reported along the SOUTHERN BORDERS:

- The army is reported to have foiled an attempt to smuggle foodstuffs to north Mali through the Bordj Baji Mokhtar sector on or around July 21. The security forces tracked and seized five trucks loaded with tonnes foodstuffs and fuel.
- Security forces on July 31 ambushed and killed a jihadist near the town of Timiaouine, Wilaya of Adrar, on the border with Mali.
- A group of armed men on motorbikes on August 21 gunned down a Gendramerie major in the town of Bordj Baji Mokhtar on the border with Mali. He worked with Border Guard units against smuggling gangs who are believed to be behind the attack.

On the EASTERN BORDERS and in adjacent areas:

- El-Khabar (19/07/14) reported a heavy security presence in the Wilaya of Tébessa on the border with Tunisia and all the way to the boundary with the Wilaya of Khenchela, where army helicopters are said to have bombarded jihadists’ positions.
- Tunisian news sources reported that seven Algerian jihadists¹¹ arrived in the Tunisian town of Souk el-Djoumaa, Jendouba, on the other side of the border from the Algerian Wilaya of El-Tarf, around August 5.
- Algerian media around August 10 reported that the Algerian army was deploying Russian-made anti-aircraft missiles on the eastern borders with Tunisia and Libya. The Algerian authorities, according to the press, seemed deeply worried that the Libyan jihadist groups that had seized control of Tripoli airport might use civilian airliners in 9/11-style attacks against Algerian targets¹².
- El-Khabar later reported that Algerian and Tunisian forces carried out joint operations against jihadists on the borders between the two countries on August 15-16. Algerian land forces and helicopters reportedly took part in the operations around the Kasserine-Tébessa sector of the border.
- On August 19, soldiers on a search and destroy mission in the areas straddling the Wilayas of Khenchela, Tébessa and El-Oued found and dismantled three roadside bombs, according to French-language daily El-Watan.
- Further south, in the Wilaya of Illizi, an armed group is reported to have kidnapped a 60 year-old notable of the border town of Deb Deb on July 18 and taken him to Libya, according to Echorouk (19/07/14).

¹¹ According to a retired Algerian general who is now involved in trade with Tunisia, to whom we spoke in mid-August, “from the joint anti-terrorist operations of the past few months, it has become apparent that two thirds of the terrorists that are active in the border strip between the two countries are either Algerians or Tunisian residents of Algeria.”

¹² However, it now appears that all the aircraft at Tripoli International Airport have either been destroyed or flown to safety in Malta.

Meanwhile, according to El Watan (23/08/14), experts from France, Japan, the United States and Italy inspected the security measures taken by Algiers in the oil areas of the south-east near the border with Libya, in mid-August. The experts, accompanied by an Algerian delegation composed of civilians and police, army and DRS officers, are reported to have expressed dissatisfaction with plans for securing oil and gas producing areas in the Wilayas of Illizi and Ouargla (including Hassi Messaoud, El Borma and In Amenas). El Watan quoted an unnamed military source as saying that despite the presence of some 50,000 men from the army, the gendarmerie and border guard all along the 1000 km border with Libya, the commission of foreign experts doubted the effectiveness of security measures and asked that security along the border be strengthened so as to prevent terrorist incursions from Libya. The foreign security experts were obsessed with the possibility that terrorists might infiltrate the country and target an oil and gas facility, as happened at Tiguentourine.

However, the Algerian delegation accompanying the French, Japanese, Italian and American experts are reported to have informed their foreign visitors that the issue of border control was a task for the Army alone and not a matter that foreign experts could have any say in.

The inclusion of representatives of the police (DGSN) in the delegation welcoming the foreign security experts may seem surprising, given that oil and gas sector security and border protection have traditionally been the preserve of the army, the gendarmerie (of which the border guard is part) and the DRS. However, in a further sign that the DGSN is becoming involved in the hydrocarbons sector, reports have emerged that the Interior Ministry has been in touch with Boeing lately in connection with a project to acquire a number of unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs) to protect oil and gas facilities.

END

From: Edward Gabriel <ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com>
Sent: Thursday, September 04, 2014 12:42 PM
To: Edward Gabriel
Subject: FW: Note from Bill
Attachments: DOC090314-09032014140005.pdf

The attached sums up the US human rights policy. Worth a look. Ed

Ambassador Edward M. Gabriel, Ret.
President and CEO
The Gabriel Company, LLC
1220 L Street NW, Suite 411
Washington DC, 20005
Phone: +1 202.887.1113
Fax: +1 202.887.1115
Email: ed.gabriel@thegabrielco.com
Website: <http://thegabrielco.com>

Confidentiality Notice: The information in this document is private and confidential. It is intended only for the use of the named recipient. If you are not the intended recipient, please notify the sender immediately by return e-mail and then delete this document immediately. Do not disclose the contents of this document to any other person, nor take any copies. Violation of this notice may be unlawful.

MAMS Event Report

September 19, 2014

1. Title: Algeria-U.S. Relations: Challenges in the Maghreb and Sahel

Hosted by the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS)

Participants:

H.E. Ramtane Lamamra: Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Republic of Algeria

Jon Alterman: Moderator: Senior Vice President, Zbigniew Brzezinski Chair in Global Security and Director, Middle East Program, CSIS

2. Overview

Foreign Minister Lamamra discussed US-Algeria relations and Algeria's role in the Maghreb and Sahel, with a special focus on security issues. He addressed at length the conflicts in Mali and Libya, and the broader terrorism threat in the region. Minister Lamamra used the platform to highlight Algeria's contributions to the security and stability of the MENA region.

3. Summary

Minister Lamamra began by stating that he wanted to reframe the topic in a way that reflects more of what he wanted to address - Algeria's role in the Maghreb and Sahel regions as a security providing country. Before delving into that topic, he did briefly discuss US-Algeria relations, noting that Algeria and US share similar values of independence and self-determination. He provided several examples of collaboration between the two countries, making reference to Algeria's role in ending the Tehran hostage crisis and JFK's pronouncements on Algeria's independence. Minister Lamamra also stressed that Algeria and the US share strategic interests, evidenced by its Strategic Dialogue Partnership to address international and regional issues, such as effective counterterrorism cooperation.

Turning back to Algeria's leadership as a security providing country, Minister Lamamra noted that this leadership was based on the geographical, historical, and cultural attributes of the country. Geographically, Algeria is located at the crossroads of Africa, the Middle East, and Western Europe. It has the largest territory in the continent of Africa and in the Arab world. The country is inhabited by 38 million people and is endowed with huge energy, mineral, and other natural resources. He also stated that Algeria and the inhabitants of Algeria are a peaceful people who are deeply attached to their identity, which is Arab, Berber, and Muslim. He stated that Algeria is a moderate nation that follows moderate Sunni Islamic teaching and that Algeria has resolutely adopted and practiced good neighbor diplomacy with all of its neighbors, including Europe. As a result, Algeria has played a leading role in peaceful mediation of international disputes and crises and has offered its expertise in confronting security challenges. Minister Lamamra suggested that Algeria has refuted terrorism by developing a vibrant, multi-party democracy outside of the so-called Arab Spring phenomena. He credited Algeria with having a high-quality, experienced, moderate, and forward looking leadership, and credited President Bouteflika for his vast foreign policy experience, which has helped lead Algeria in its regional endeavors.

Minister Lamamra highlighted Algeria's particular role in the Sahel, noting that Algeria is a Sahel nation and has no bilateral problems with its neighbors. He noted, "Our relations with all of our Saharan neighbors are just excellent. We share with them similar actions; we acknowledge the closeness of people between borders, including nomadic populations, of the same ethnic and cultural background." Through this solidarity, Algeria has worked with its neighbors to fight drought, insecurity, organized crime, and terrorism. The overriding principal of Algerian diplomacy is nevertheless that of non-interference and non-intervention in the internal affairs of neighboring countries. However, he stated that this principle cannot translate into indifference to the internal problems of neighboring countries.

Describing Algeria as a key regional actor in the Sahel, Minister Lamamra underscored Algeria's contribution to peace and security through the Nouakchott Process of the African Union, which works to empower regional countries to take charge of their own security. He also stated that Algeria is the current lead mediator in seeking peace in Mali and that its efforts have been successful. According to the Minister, there is now a roadmap for peace, a timeframe, and a declaration of a ceasefire. The Minister noted that he is optimistic about resolving the challenging task of peace.

After concluding his remarks on the Sahel, the Foreign Minister turned to Algeria's "key role" in the Maghreb. It is the center of the region and is the only North African country that borders all of the other Maghreb countries. Lamamra stated that Algeria "displays strong solidarity and respect for all of the people in the region," but he acknowledged that its neighboring countries have differing views on important issues and conflicting interests. He argued, however, that "those should not and cannot, lead to unilateral actions," or "leaps into the unknown." He stated that instead the region needs to cooperate in order to resolve issues between neighbors. The Arab Maghreb Union is one such tool for regional integration, but Lamamra noted that it has not fulfilled its potential. According to Lamamra, the AMU has seen few things materialize on the ground and for the people in the region, and he stated that one of the major reasons behind its failure is the conflict in Western Sahara.

On the Sahara, Lamamra argued, "This is a conflict that may be forgotten to some, but it is highly sensitive issue. It is also a test for the UN credibility, and when we say UN I refer to five members in the Security Council as well. It is test of credibility for the UN doctrine on decolonization and human rights." He continued, "as far as Algeria is concerned, it is well known, that we have been supporting self-determination since the time when the territory was under Spanish rule. We have no change of position on that, the position of principle, and also from a humanitarian point of view, as Algeria is also home to 165,000 Sahawarian refugees. As you know, many distinguished US statesmen and diplomats have been sent to the UN, including James Baker and Ambassador Christopher Ross. He has strong support from my country."

Lamamra touched on the rest of the countries of the Maghreb, briefly noting that Algeria has strong "brotherly solidarity" with Tunisia and that it has been working closely with the Tunisian authorities on counterterrorism measures. He stated that Algeria had a great relationship with Mauritania, and closed with extended remarks on Libya. He stated that Libya and Algeria are very close, and that Algeria has a strong interest in the political future of Libya. He underscored that he does not believe Libya qualifies as a failed country - "It's a country with tremendous problems, but certainly not a failed country. It has vibrant actors, it has big potential to recover, and we believe that it is worthwhile to believe and help the Libyans reach their full potential."

Lamamra stated that the, "Libya problem should be resolved by the leaders themselves through inclusive political dialogue," but that of course some groups would be excluded if they shared a connection with international terrorist organizations. To him the objective of dialogue is to promote national reconciliation and the constitution-making process. He firmly believes that it is possible. Lamamra also made it clear that Algeria is against intervention in Libya. According to Lamamra, "Democracy, legality and legitimacy should be key" to the reconstruction of Libya and not military actions. In conclusion, Lamamra discussed Algeria's role in mediating the crisis, noting that it had been asked to offer its good offices to host a reconciliation process for the country - "Algeria, along with countries that border Libya, has developed a plan of action to help and assist the Libyan with finding peace and stability for their country." He mentioned meeting between Libyan transitional government and the 5+5 group that recently took place and stated that it was helpful in creating key guiding principles and objectives to help solve the problem. He mentioned that the upcoming General Assembly in New York offered additional opportunities for discussing the crisis. He stated that as far as Algeria is concerned, it will do anything to bring Libyans together in order to reject violence and terrorism and accept democracy and pluralism. The key will be power and wealth sharing, and immediate security for all Libyans.

4. Q&A

Q: (Jon Alterman) You mentioned, in passing, the relationship with Morocco, which from a US perspective is frustrating that it has not been better. Foreign ministers, in my experience, are trained to be optimists, so if you could tell us what is actually going well in this relationship, the Moroccan-Algerian relationship, because people don't often know about. What is the good news in that relationship?

A: We are the same people. Moroccan, Algerian people are the same. We share everything. I believe they are mature enough to know that differences are there and that they can be resolved peacefully, in a civilized way, that we can develop plans of action and resolution that we can put together. But I don't think it would be fair to the vision of bilateral problem, of the inability of two neighborly countries that are out there, that have been out there together for ages to live together in order to share a vision of the future. Algeria has no linkage on this issue, it is impartial. I think there is a difference, a very important aspect of international relations, it's a legal issue, it's a moral issue, it's also a strategic issue that affects security in the region. Now are there solutions? There are no problems that don't have a solution. It is just a question of political will. The leadership of the Polisario has shown will to sit down and look at the issue within the frame of international law. I also don't believe that everything needs to be frozen while we wait for a solution on the Sahara. We can revive the AMU and bilateral relations, as Algeria doesn't have a role in the Sahara.

Q: (Charles Dahan) Why is the border closed? What can be done to mitigate the tensions since as you said Moroccans and Algerians are the same people?

A: I could sit here and tell you the history and the Algerian side of the crisis, which is quite convincing, but we really need to talk about the future. There are technical working groups working on this and at the border level trade is going on - Morocco's trade with Algeria is higher than it is with most African countries. Life continues. If the working groups are allowed to make recommendations and the government accepts them, there will be a solution. The border will be open in the future, but I can't see that future yet because the work hasn't been done.

Q: (Haim Malka, CSIS) We have seen reports about North Africans joining ISIL. Do you have any figures on the number of Algerians? What about the impact on Algeria and the Maghreb of returning fighters?

A: The Palestinian issue is at the root of some of this extremism and it needs to be resolved. Extremism is a phenomenon with deeply rooted causes and we need to address the underlying causes. The question of returnees is very serious. Part of what happened in the past in Algeria was the result of returnees from Afghanistan. As for Algerian fighters, Algerians are starting to realize that terrorism no future. The number of Algerians fighting for ISIL is in the hundreds - maybe 300-400. We have the same concerns that now even non-Arabs are having with regard to recruits. It is an issue for everyone now. I also should have stated from the beginning that terrorism is not inherent to any religion. It results from marginalization, a lack of education, and a lack of opportunity.

Q: (Alterman) What about Algerians in Libya? Or Algerian border areas serving as a refuge for Libyan militants?

A: It seems to me that Algerians are francophone and mostly operating in the Sahel. But yes, also in Libya. Border areas are difficult – they are not quiet and in the Sahel there are hard to control. Algeria has mobilized countless resources to address the borders – it wants to be a provider of security and stability in the region. This fight against terrorism is a priority and we are encouraged by the results at home. We believe our neighbors can also achieve similar results.

Q: (Gare Smith, Foley Hoag (did not identify as Algerian lobbyist) Algeria has shown significant leadership in Mali, in promoting human rights for the Sahrawi people, and in Libya. What is the most constructive role for the US to play in supporting Algeria's efforts in Mali, Libya, and for self-determination for the Sahrawi? What advice will you give to Kerry on how the US can support these efforts?

A: Well I actually already met with Secretary Kerry last night so if you have advice, I would be happy to hear it for when I speak with him in New York. Our partnership with the US is all-encompassing. Through the Strategic Dialogue we discuss – the sky is the limit. At present, the focus is on crises in Libya and in Mali, where we are pushing the parties to be more flexible. We are also engaged on Palestine – we appreciate the efforts of Secretary Kerry and regret that they were not successful. Secretary Kerry and I had a candid conversation about the vision for the region more broadly. And on Syria, I believe a peaceful transition is possible.

Q: (Alterman) Do you have any advice for Obama on how he is handling ISIL? He has been criticized for how he has gone about coalition building. As a friend and leader, do you have any advice for the Administration on leadership?

A: Listen to us.

5. Observation

Approximately 60 people attended the event, notably members of the diplomatic corps, scholars, and North Africa experts. Minister Lamamra's speech offered little in the way of substance and focused instead on Algeria's messaging on its "key leadership role in promoting security and stability in the Maghreb and Sahel." This was even pointed out on occasion during the Q&A when he wasn't really answering some of the questions. That said, he had a good demeanor throughout the event, making several jokes and engaging with the audience. In his prepared remarks, he didn't even mention Morocco when commenting on the AMU.

On the question of the Sahara and relations with Morocco, Minister Lamamra mostly danced around the topic – making vague references to "differences in the region" and Algeria's commitment to the principle of self-determination – the same policy it has maintained since the Sahara was under Spanish rule. With regard to Gare Smith's questions, it was quite interesting to note that Smith was out of the loop as to when Secretary Kerry met with Minister Lamamra. It is also interesting that Minister Lamamra did not answer Smith's question as to his discussions with Kerry about human rights in the Sahara. From this event – and other developments in Congress over the past year – it seems quite evident that Algeria is happy to engage in low-level lobbying on the Sahara to keep the issue alive and maintain its position against Morocco, but that it has not prioritized the question of the Sahara in its foreign policy.